In Reference re Impact Assessment Act, 2023 SCC 23, the Supreme Court once again considered the federal-provincial division of powers over environmental assessment. Although the Court reaffirmed that jurisdiction over environmental assessment was divided – as it had held in Oldman River – it struck down the federal Impact Assessment Act. The notable feature of the decision is that the Court read its holding in References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act on the scope of federal environmental jurisdiction very narrowly. In particular, despite the link between carbon emissions and large infrastructure projects, the Court firmly held that federal jurisdiction over carbon pricing did not extend to environmental assessment generally. The dissent concurred.

This chapter also includes material in this extract on the presumption of constitutionality. As the majority explains, this is the principle of statutory interpretation that a law is presumed to lie within the jurisdiction of the enacting level of government. Although Oldman River did not cite the presumption, it lies at the core of that decision. In essence, Oldman River interpreted broadly worded federal environmental assessment legislation to apply only to aspects of projects within with federal jurisdiction. Moreover, the principle is symmetric – it applies to provincial legislation as well. For several decades, the presumption of constitutionality has enabled both levels of government to conduct environmental assessments of the same projects. For the first time, the Court refused to apply the doctrine to narrow the application of federal environmental assessment legislation. The dissent sharply disagreed on this point.

6.2 Background

In 2019, following a review of the existing federal environmental assessment process, Parliament enacted the Impact Assessment Act and the Governor in Council made the Physical Activities Regulations under the IAA. The IAA and the Regulations establish a complex information gathering and regulatory scheme, which was essentially two schemes in one. First, a discrete portion of the scheme — contained in ss. 81 to 91 of the IAA — deals with projects carried out or financed by federal authorities on federal lands or outside Canada. The assessment process set forth in ss. 81 to 91 focuses on a narrow set of projects: physical activities carried out on federal lands or outside Canada, while the designated projects that attract environmental impact has the potential of affecting purely intraprovincial matters.

Controversy turned on the second part of the scheme. This concerned the ability of the federal government to identify "designated projects" for which an environmental impact assessment is required and federal restrictions on projects potentially imposed. The relevant provision outlined the mandatory public interest factors that the decision maker must take into account:

> The Minister's determination under paragraph 60(1)(a) in respect of a designated project referred to in that subsection, and the Governor in Council's determination under section 62 in respect of a designated project referred to in that subsection, must be based on the report with respect to the impact assessment and a consideration of the following factors:
> (a) the extent to which the designated project contributes to sustainability;
> (b) the extent to which the adverse effects within federal jurisdiction and the adverse direct or incidental effects that are indicated in the impact assessment report in respect of the designated project are significant;
> (c) the implementation of the mitigation measures that the Minister or the Governor in Council, as the case may be, considers appropriate;
> (d) the impact that the designated project may have on any Indigenous group and any adverse impact that the designated project may have on the rights of the Indigenous peoples of Canada recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982; and
> (e) the extent to which the effects of the designated project hinder or contribute to the Government of Canada's ability to meet its environmental obligations and its commitments in respect of climate change.

6.3 WAGNER CJ (Côté, Rowe, Martin and Kasirer JJ. concurring):

> [2] Three decades ago, this Court acknowledged that the "protection of the environment has become one of the major challenges of our time" (Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 3, at p. 16). In a long line of cases since then, this Court has affirmed that both Parliament and the provincial legislatures have the ability to enact laws to address various facets of environmental protection, including schemes of environmental assessment [cites to cases including Crown Zellerbach and References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act]. But this Court has also affirmed that each level of government must confine its legislative efforts to its own constitutional sphere.
> [3] … This Court must ensure that, in its laudable pursuit of environmental protection and sustainability, Parliament has not overstepped its constitutional limits.
> [4] … Given the "sweeping" nature of environmental regulation, division of powers disputes in the environmental context must be approached with "[g]reat sensitivity" (see Hydro-Québec, at para. 154). Respect for the division of powers drives the enactment of robust environmental protection legislation and facilitates cooperation between the two levels of government.
> [5] Having carefully considered the complex legislative scheme at issue in this appeal, I conclude that it is unconstitutional in part. As I will explain, the scheme is essentially two schemes in one. First, a discrete portion of the scheme — contained in ss. 81 to 91 of the IAA — deals with projects carried out or financed by federal authorities on federal lands or outside Canada. In pith and substance, this portion of the scheme directs the manner in which federal authorities assess the significant adverse environmental effects that such projects may have. This portion of the scheme is clearly intra vires.
> [6] Second, the balance of the scheme — made up of the IAA's remaining provisions and the Regulations — deals with "designated projects" as defined in the IAA. The pith and substance of this designated projects scheme is to assess and regulate designated projects with a view to mitigating or preventing their potential adverse environmental, health, social and economic impacts. In my view, Parliament has plainly overstepped its constitutional competence in enacting this designated projects scheme. This scheme is ultra vires for two overarching reasons. First, it is not in pith and substance directed at regulating "effects within federal jurisdiction" as defined in the IAA because these effects do not drive the scheme's decision-making functions. Second, I do not accept Canada's contention that the defined term "effects within federal jurisdiction" aligns with federal legislative jurisdiction. The overbreadth of these effects exacerbates the constitutional frailties of the scheme's decision-making functions. …

A. The "Designated Projects" Regulatory Scheme

[34] Like its predecessor, the IAA applies to "designated projects", which are defined in s. 2 as "physical activities . . . carried out in Canada or on federal lands [that] are designated by regulations made under paragraph 109(b) or designated in an order made by the Minister under subsection 9(1)". This includes "any physical activity that is incidental to those physical activities" (s. 2). …

[36] In addition, pursuant to s. 9(1), the Minister may "designate a physical activity that is not prescribed by regulations . . . if, in his or her opinion, either the carrying out of that physical activity may cause adverse effects within federal jurisdiction or adverse direct or incidental effects" (two defined terms, to which I will return), or public concerns related to those effects warrant the designation. The IAA imposes some limitations on ministerial designation, including that it must occur before the carrying out of the physical activity has substantially begun (s. 9(7)(a)). …

[52] The majority [of the Alberta Court of Appeal] considered s. 92A of the Constitution Act, 1867, which it referred to as the "Resource Amendment". It held that s. 92A assures "exclusive provincial jurisdiction over the exploration, development, management and conservation of the province's . . . natural resources" and that approval of natural resource projects is therefore "vested exclusively" in the province that owns the resources (paras. 72 and 81 (emphasis deleted)). The majority referred to projects that are wholly within a province and are primarily regulated by the province as "intra-provincial projects".

[53] The majority then turned to the two-step constitutional validity analysis. At the characterization step, the majority concluded that the pith and substance of the IAA and the Regulations is "the establishment of a federal impact assessment and regulatory regime that subjects all activities designated by the federal executive to an assessment of all their effects and federal oversight and approval" (para. 372). The majority held that this matter "intrudes fatally into provincial jurisdiction and the provinces' proprietary rights as owners of their public lands and natural resources" (para. 372).

[54] Turning to classification, the majority concluded that the matter of the scheme does not fall under any of the federal heads of power relied upon by Canada: sea coast and inland fisheries (s. 91(12) of the Constitution Act, 1867), imperial treaties (s. 132), "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" (s. 91(24)) and the national concern branch of the peace, order and good government ("POGG") power (s. 91). Nor does the matter fall under the federal heads of power proposed by the interveners: trade and commerce (s. 91(2)) and the criminal law power (s. 91(27)). Instead, the majority held that the matter of the scheme, when applied to intra-provincial designated projects, falls squarely within multiple heads of provincial power, including the development and management of natural resources (s. 92A) and property and civil rights in the province (s. 92(13)).

[55] The majority thus found the IAA and the Regulations to be ultra vires Parliament and unconstitutional in their entirety. Canada argued before the Court of Appeal that the IAA and the Regulations are not severable and must therefore stand or fall as a whole. The majority agreed and noted that it would not be practical to sever offending provisions from the IAA or to sever the Regulations from the IAA (para. 426).

[56] Finally, the majority considered the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. It held, in the alternative, that if the scheme were valid, then the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity would apply to protect the "core" of relevant provincial heads of power (para. 430).

[57] The dissenting justice characterized the pith and substance of the IAA and the Regulations as the establishment of "a federal environmental assessment regime that facilitates planning and information gathering with respect to specific projects to inform decision-making, cooperatively with other jurisdictions, as to whether the project should be authorized to proceed on the basis that identified adverse environmental effects purported to be within federal jurisdiction are in the public interest" (para. 593).

[58] The dissenting justice concluded that this matter can be classified under a number of federal heads of power. She found that each of the "effects within federal jurisdiction" defined in the IAA falls within Parliament's legislative authority (paras. 605-6 and 611). In addition, she rejected the majority's characterization of the public interest determination as a federal "veto" power (para. 717). Instead, she concluded that the IAA is designed to facilitate interjurisdictional cooperation rather than creating a competitive veto (paras. 723 and 730). The Attorney General of Canada appeals as of right to the Court. …

VI. Step 1: Characterization

A. The Governing Principles

(3) The Presumption of Constitutionality

[70] … according to this presumption, "every legislative provision is presumed to be intra vires the level of government that enacted it" (Murray-Hall, at para. 79; P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at § 15:13). In other words, a court should approach any question as to the validity of legislation "on the assumption that it was validly enacted", unless the party challenging the validity of the legislation demonstrates otherwise (McNeil, at pp. 687-88; Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, at p. 255; Murray-Hall, at para. 80). …

[73] …the presumption of constitutionality is not an impermeable shield that protects legislation from constitutional review by courts. Nor can courts employ the presumption of constitutionality to rewrite legislative text as they see fit in order to bring it into compliance with the Constitution. Courts cannot rely on the presumption of constitutionality to disregard a statute that speaks clearly and is ultra vires its enacting body. …

[74] Similarly, a court cannot circumvent its duty to meaningfully review the constitutionality of legislation by suggesting that, insofar as an administrative decision maker applies a law unconstitutionally, the application of that law may be judicially reviewed. The constitutional validity of a law and its administrative application are distinct concepts. …

B. The Application of the Governing Principles

[76] In my view, a careful analysis of the purpose and effects of the impugned statute and Regulations reveals that the scheme they establish has two distinct components: one dealing with "designated projects" and another addressing projects carried out or financed by federal authorities on federal lands or outside Canada. In my view, the pith and substance of the "designated projects" component of the scheme is to assess and regulate designated projects with a view to mitigating or preventing their potential adverse environmental, health, social and economic impacts. By contrast, the pith and substance of the secondary component in ss. 81 to 91 is to direct the manner in which federal authorities that carry out or finance a project on federal lands or outside Canada assess the significant adverse environmental effects that the project may have.

VII. Step 2: Classification

(2) The Environmental Context

(a) The "Environment" Is an Aggregate of Matters

[114] Classifying environmental legislation presents a challenge because the "environment" is not a head of power under s. 91 or 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This Court has recognized that the environment is a "constitutionally abstruse matter which does not comfortably fit within the existing division of powers without considerable overlap and uncertainty" (Oldman River, at pp. 16 and 63-64; see also Hydro-Québec, at para. 86). …

[118] This is consistent with the double aspect doctrine, which reflects the idea that the same fact situation can be regulated from different perspectives, one falling within s. 91 and the other falling within s. 92 …

[119] Many significant legislative matters cannot be reduced to one discrete subject. Indeed, Canadian governments must address complex and multifaceted issues that may fall within multiple heads of power (Downey et al., at p. 282). The double aspect doctrine explains how laws enacted by both the federal and provincial levels of government may validly regulate the same fact scenario from different perspectives, pursuant to their respective heads of power. Overlaps of this nature are an inevitable and legitimate feature of the Canadian federal system (Desgagnés Transport, at para. 83; Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, at pp. 180-81; Canadian Western Bank, at paras. 36 and 42).

[120] Nonetheless, the double aspect doctrine must be applied with caution. First, not all fact situations have a double aspect, and each fact situation must be identified with precision. Environmental assessment of physical activities may or may not have a double aspect in relation to a specific project. …

(1) The "Designated Projects" Scheme

[131] As discussed, there is no doubt that Parliament can enact impact assessment legislation that is directed at the federal aspects of projects. The breadth of these "federal aspects" will vary with the circumstances. Where Parliament is vested with jurisdiction to legislate in respect of a particular activity, it has broad discretion to regulate that activity and its effects (Oldman River, at pp. 67-68; Harrison, at p. 36; Kennett (1993), at pp. 187-89). But Parliament's jurisdiction is more restricted where the activity falls outside of its legislative competence; in these cases, it can validly legislate only from the perspective of the federal aspects of the activity, such as the impacts of the activity on federal heads of power. Federal legislation that is insufficiently tailored — that is, whose pith and substance is to regulate the activity qua activity, rather than only its federal aspects — is ultra vires (Reference re Environmental Management Act (BCCA), at paras. 98-101). …

[134] In my view, the pith and substance of the portion of the scheme that deals with "designated projects" exceeds the bounds of federal jurisdiction, and this portion of the scheme is therefore ultra vires. This is so for two overarching reasons.

[135] First, even if I were to accept Canada's contention as to the defined federal effects, these effects do not drive the scheme's decision-making functions. Consequently, the scheme is not in pith and substance directed at regulating these effects.

[136] Second, I do not accept that the defined term "effects within federal jurisdiction" aligns with federal legislative jurisdiction under s. 91. This overbreadth exacerbates the constitutional frailties of the scheme's decision-making functions. …

(ii) The Screening Decision

[148] While all designated projects are subject to the IAA's planning phase, they are not automatically subject to an impact assessment. Rather, following the planning phase, the Agency is empowered to make a screening decision as to whether an impact assessment is required for a particular project. …

[150] In my view, the Agency's broad discretion to require an impact assessment of a designated project demonstrates that the matter of the scheme exceeds the bounds of federal legislative competence. The decision to require an assessment must be rooted in the possibility of adverse federal effects (MacLean, Doelle and Tollefson, at pp. 44-45). This is a corollary of the scheme's broad designation mechanism: the wider the scheme casts its net, the more critical the funneling function of the screening decision becomes to keeping the overall scheme within the bounds of federal legislative powers. As drafted, the screening decision under s. 16(2) is not driven by possible federal effects and therefore fails to focus the scheme on the federal aspects of designated projects.

[151] The IAA requires the Agency to "take into account" an open-ended list of factors, all of seemingly equal importance. Only s. 16(2)(b) and (c) relate to adverse effects within federal jurisdiction and adverse direct or incidental effects. As a result, an impact assessment of a designated project could be required for reasons other than, or not sufficiently tied to, the project's possible impacts on areas of federal jurisdiction. Given the breadth of the considerations permitted to drive the screening decision, I am not satisfied that this decision performs the funneling function necessary to maintain the scheme's focus on federal impacts.

[152] Canada argues that the "key" decision-making factor is "the possibility that the carrying out of the designated project may cause Adverse Federal Effects" (A.F., at para. 92). This submission is not reflected in the text of s. 16(2), which gives no primacy to the possibility of adverse effects relative to the other mandatory considerations.

[153] Canada also argues that "[w]here there is insufficient linkage to federal jurisdiction, a reasonable exercise of the Agency's discretion under s. 16(1) will not require an impact assessment" (A.F., at para. 113). However, under s. 16(2), the discretion granted to the Agency is not limited to projects that may cause federal effects. The Agency can require projects with little or no possibility of federal effects to undergo an impact assessment on the basis of, for example, "any comments received . . . from the public", regardless of whether such comments are in respect of areas of federal jurisdiction (s. 16(2)(d)). The IAA's expansive purposes, set out in s. 6, do little to confine the exercise of this discretion.

[154] Due to the wide net cast by the scheme's designation mechanism, the screening decision is constitutionally problematic. The risk is that projects with little or no potential for adverse federal effects will nonetheless be required to undergo an impact assessment on the basis of less relevant, yet mandatory, considerations. The fact that this decision is not driven by the likelihood of federal impacts demonstrates that the "main thrust" of the scheme strays from federal matters. I am unable to resort to the presumption of constitutionality in relation to s. 16 because its text, context, and purpose preclude a reasonable interpretation consistent with constitutional validity. …

(iv) Public Interest Decision

[166] In my view, s. 63 of the IAA represents an unconstitutional arrogation of power by Parliament. Even if this Court were to accept Canada's submission that the defined "effects within federal jurisdiction" are aligned with federal legislative competence … the public interest decision is constitutionally vulnerable. This decision-making process transforms what is prima facie a determination of whether adverse federal effects are in the public interest into a determination of whether the project as a whole is in the public interest. …

[169] The central problem with the public interest decision is not the s. 63 factors themselves but rather the manner in which these factors drive decision making. The public interest decision must reflect a focus on the project's federal effects. … s. 63 permits the decision maker to blend their assessment of adverse federal effects with other adverse effects that are not federal, such as the project's anticipated greenhouse gas emissions (under s. 63(e)). Put another way, the adverse non-federal effects can amplify the perceived severity of the adverse federal effects and, effectively, become the underlying basis for the conclusion that the latter are not in the public interest. The mandatory cumulation of adverse non-federal effects shifts the focus of the decision from the adverse effects within federal jurisdiction to the overall adverse effects of the project. …

[173] … as I have explained, the IAA makes no distinction between the assessment of activities that fall under federal jurisdiction and the assessment of impacts of activities that are primarily regulated by the provinces.

[174] The hypothetical scenarios set out above demonstrate how the dominant thrust of the public interest decision-making process veers away from federal heads of power because there are so few constraints on how the s. 63 factors may be used.

[177] For this scheme to be intra vires, it must be consistently focused on federal matters. … at the ultimate decision-making juncture, the focus on federal impacts must be restored. Parliament can validly regulate only the impacts that fall within its jurisdiction or that arise from activities within its jurisdiction. …

(b) As Defined, "Effects Within Federal Jurisdiction" Exceed Federal Jurisdiction

[179] The constitutional frailties of the scheme's decision-making functions are exacerbated by its focus on regulating an overbroad range of impacts. The mere fact that certain effects are defined as being "within federal jurisdiction" is, of course, not determinative of their status within the constitutional division of powers (Desgagnés Transport, at para. 137, per Wagner C.J. and Brown J., concurring). In my view, the defined "effects within federal jurisdiction" go far beyond the limits of federal legislative jurisdiction. This overbreadth reinforces the conclusion that the pith and substance of the scheme cannot be classified under federal heads of power.

[180] The overbreadth of the defined "effects within federal jurisdiction" is manifested in two distinct ways. First, the definition is central to the scheme's decision-making functions. Its overbreadth dilutes the decision maker's focus at the key decision-making junctures, shifting it away from federal aspects and encompassing aspects that are within provincial jurisdiction. Second, the defined "effects within federal jurisdiction" form the basis of the s. 7 prohibitions. Due to the overbreadth of these defined effects, the conduct prohibited by s. 7 extends beyond the range of conduct that Parliament can validly regulate pursuant to its assigned heads of power.

(i) The Defined "Effects Within Federal Jurisdiction" Dilute the Decision Maker's Focus at the Key Decision-Making Junctures

[181] As discussed, the scheme contains four decision-making junctures: (i) the designation of physical activities as "designated projects"; (ii) the screening decision; (iii) the delineation of the scope of the impact assessment and the factors to be considered therein; and (iv) the public interest decision and resulting regulation and oversight. The definition of "effects within federal jurisdiction" is of central importance to most of these key decision-making junctures. First, it is on the basis of potential adverse "effects within federal jurisdiction" that some physical activities are designated as "designated projects" (s. 9(1); see also Regulatory Impact Analysis Statement). Second, the ultimate decision made under the scheme is, at least on its face, concerned with whether the adverse "effects within federal jurisdiction" are in the public interest (ss. 60(1) and 62). Finally, conditions imposed along with a positive public interest determination must be "in relation to the adverse effects within federal jurisdiction" (s. 64(1)).

[182] The defined "effects within federal jurisdiction" thus influence each of these key decision-making junctures. Due to the overbreadth of this definition, the scheme permits the Minister to designate a project based on effects that cannot be regulated from a federal perspective, to impose conditions in relation to these effects, or to declare these effects not to be in the public interest and put a permanent halt to the project as planned.

[183] For example, one of the "effects within federal jurisdiction" is "a change to the environment that would occur . . . in a province other than the one where the physical activity or the designated project is being carried out" (s. 2 "effects within federal jurisdiction" (b)(ii)). The breadth of this "interprovincial effects" clause is astonishing. The IAA's expansive definition of "environment" captures every component of the Earth (s. 2):

> environment means the components of the Earth, and includes
> (a) land, water and air, including all layers of the atmosphere;
> (b) all organic and inorganic matter and living organisms; and
> (c) the interacting natural systems that include components referred to in paragraphs (a) and (b).

[184] The "interprovincial effects" clause therefore captures an unlimited range of interprovincial environmental changes. This would include, for example, greenhouse gas emissions, which this Court has acknowledged "represent a pollution problem that is not merely interprovincial, but global, in scope" (References re GGPPA, at para. 173). As a result, the IAA expressly permits projects to be designated, assessments to be required and public interest decisions to be made on the basis that a project emits greenhouse gases that cross provincial and national borders.

[186] In the References re GGPPA, this Court upheld a law whose matter was limited to carbon pricing of greenhouse gas emissions, "a narrow and specific regulatory mechanism" (para. 199). By contrast, the "designated projects" scheme's defined interprovincial effects lack specificity as to the type or scale of the "change to the environment" that is said to be a federal effect. In the References re GGPPA, this Court expressly cautioned that "[a]ny legislation that related to non-carbon pricing forms of [greenhouse gas] regulation — legislation with respect to roadways, building codes, public transit and home heating, for example — would not fall under the matter of national concern"

(para. 199). If the matter of national concern recognized by this Court in the References re GGPPA does not extend to enabling the federal government to comprehensively regulate greenhouse gas emissions, then the inclusion of such sweeping regulatory powers in impact assessment legislation is likewise impermissible.

[189] Accordingly, while Canada asserts that it is simply relying on this Court's prior holdings, it is, in substance, attempting to do an end run around this Court's recent national concern jurisprudence. Our jurisprudence has recognized that preventing marine pollution and preventing pollution of interprovincial rivers are matters of national concern. However, Canada has made no attempt to apply the clarified national concern framework set out in the References re GGPPA or to lead any evidence on which to base the recognition of a new and broader matter of national concern (para. 133 and 162-66). With respect, neither have my colleagues, who simply assert that the "interprovincial effects" clause is a matter of national concern without applying the legal framework or evidentiary requirements endorsed by this Court in the References re GGPPA. …

II. Federalism and the Environment

[228] Because the Constitution is a framework for life and political action in Canada, this Court has directed that courts must approach constitutional interpretation in a way that allows governments to address complex and evolving issues and that "foster[s] co-operation among governments and legislatures for the common good" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 22; see also para. 42). The "dominant tide" of modern constitutional interpretation finds expression in the idea "that a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (para. 37 (emphasis in original)). Thus, "[i]n the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest" (para. 37; see also Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 SCR 134, at para. 63; Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 SCR 189, at para. 17). This Court has repeatedly stressed that "overlap of legislation is to be expected and accommodated in a federal state" (Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783, at para. 26, quoting General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at p. 669). Cooperative federalism and the modern approach to constitutional interpretation must guide every step of the analysis in this reference.

[229] This modern approach to constitutional interpretation is reflected in the "presumption of constitutionality". According to this presumption, "every legislative provision is presumed to be intra vires the level of government that enacted it" (Murray-Hall, at para. 79). The party challenging legislation that has "emerged from the democratic process" bears the onus of demonstrating that the enactment does not fall within the legislature's jurisdiction …

[231] For present purposes, the presumption of constitutionality has two related legal consequences. First, as noted by Professors Hogg and Wright, "in choosing between competing, plausible characterizations of a law, the court should normally choose that one that would support the validity of the law" (§ 15:13; see also Daly, at p. 7; Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at para. IV.57; G.-A. Beaudoin, in collaboration with P. Thibault, La constitution du Canada (3rd ed. 2004), at p. 338). Second, "where a law is open to both a narrow and a wide interpretation, and under the wide interpretation the law's application would extend beyond the powers of the enacting legislative body, the court should 'read down' the law so as to confine it to those applications that are within the power of the enacting legislative body" (Hogg and Wright, at § 15:13; Daly, at p. 10; Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at paras. IV.47 and IV.57). The presumption of constitutionality operates as a principle of "[j]udicial restraint in determining the validity of statutes" that has "the effect of reducing interference by unelected judges with the affairs of the elected legislative branch of government" (Hogg and Wright, at § 15:13). The presumption "remains a cardinal principle of our division of powers jurisprudence" (Murray-Hall, at para. 79).

[232] In applying these principles of constitutional interpretation, courts have upheld the constitutionality of both federal and provincial environmental legislation …

V. Analysis

A. Characterization of the Impact Assessment Act Scheme

[255] As part of the characterization exercise, the law should be described as precisely as possible, without considering potential heads of power that might support the law, to avoid the characterization stage being overly influenced by the classification stage.

[257] … In our view, the pith and substance of the designated projects scheme is, more specifically, to establish an environmental assessment process to (1) assess the effects of physical activities or major projects on federal lands, Indigenous peoples, fisheries, migratory birds, and lands, air, or waters outside Canada or in provinces other than where a project is located, and (2) determine whether to impose restrictions on the project to safeguard against significant adverse federal effects, unless allowing those effects is in the public interest. This description of the pith and substance is more precise and highlights the critical role of the public interest decision-making process under the legislation.

[280] In sum, the statutory text, context and purpose, along with the applicable interpretive principles, show that Parliament did not intend to capture de minimis effects. Moreover, even if interpreting the IAA to capture de minimis effects were a reasonably available interpretation, the presumption of constitutionality demands that it be rejected in favour of our constitutionally conforming interpretation. …

B. Classification of the IAA Scheme ...

[302] Consistent with these principles of flexible and cooperative federalism, both orders of government have constitutional authority to enact environmental legislation. Thus, Parliament is competent to enact federal environmental legislation under the federal powers over fisheries (Northwest Falling Contractors; Oldman River), navigable waters (Oldman River), Indians and lands reserved for Indians (Oldman River), criminal law (Hydro-Québec), international and interprovincial rivers (Interprovincial Co-operatives), and the national concern branch of the peace, order, and good government power (Crown Zellerbach; References re GGPPA). There is also no doubt about the authority of the provinces to enact environmental legislation under a host of provincial legislative powers, including the powers over property and civil rights in the province, local works and undertakings, municipal institutions, and matters of a local or private nature, to name but a few …

[319] We therefore agree with the majority that a federal environmental assessment "is not restricted to considering environmental effects that are 'federal' in nature" and has "wide latitude to evaluate the project's anticipated effects" (paras. 157 and 161). This is essential for federal authorities to make an integrated decision as to the designated project's overall costs and benefits. …

[321] In our view, the integrated public interest decision-making process contemplated under the IAA — a process involving a cost-benefit balancing of the adverse federal effects and all other relevant public interest considerations relating to the project — falls within federal legislative jurisdiction.

[326] It also bears noting that the IAA provides for joint federal-provincial environmental review and assessment and requires federal authorities to consider provincial comments and assessments to promote cooperative federalism and help alleviate potential jurisdictional concerns (Johnston, at pp. 110-11). The IAA allows federal authorities to substitute a provincial assessment for the federal assessment on the request of provincial authorities (s. 31(1)), to delegate a federal assessment to provincial authorities (s. 29), and to provide for a joint federal-provincial assessment (s. 39(1)). A federal impact assessment must also consider comments from provincial authorities received during consultations, a relevant provincial assessment, and any study or plan conducted or prepared by a province (s. 22(1)(o), (p) and (r)). Provincial participation is thus integrated into the IAA scheme as a matter of cooperative federalism. …

[327] In our view, as long as the public interest decision is anchored in federal jurisdiction based on adverse federal effects, federal authorities are entitled to make an integrated and proportionate decision that weighs the costs and benefits of allowing the project to proceed, and, if it is allowed to proceed, whether conditions should be imposed.

[335] In closing on this point, we hasten to add that, if federal authorities tried to rely on a trivial adverse federal effect as a "constitutional Trojan horse" enabling them, "on the pretext of some narrow ground of federal jurisdiction", to conduct a far ranging inquiry into a designated project, the federal action would be subject to judicial review on administrative law grounds (Oldman River, at p. 71). Such a federal decision in a particular case would be unreasonable as being contrary to the object and purpose of the IAA. …

(b) Protecting "Migratory Birds" Falls Under Parliament's Imperial Treaty Power …

[342] The IAA defines "effects within federal jurisdiction" as including a change to the component of the environment including "migratory bird[s]", as defined in s. 2(1) of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, 1994, S.C. 1994, c. 22. …

[343] The Migratory Birds Convention is an imperial treaty entered into between the United Kingdom and the United States of America, and thus falls under Parliament's legislative power to implement imperial treaties under s. 132 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Canada implemented the Migratory Birds Convention through the Migratory Birds Convention Act, S.C. 1917, c. 18. When Canada and the United States amended the Migratory Birds Convention in 1994, Parliament implemented the amended Convention by adopting the Migratory Birds Convention Act, 1994 …

(c) Protecting the Indigenous Peoples of Canada and Their Rights Falls Under Parliament's Power Over "Indians, and Lands Reserved for the Indians"

[346] The IAA defines "effects within federal jurisdiction" as including a change to the component of the environment with respect to the Indigenous peoples of Canada — occurring in Canada and resulting from a change to the environment — on (i) physical and cultural heritage, (ii) the current use of lands and resources for traditional purposes, or (iii) any structure, site, or thing that is of historical, archaeological, paleontological or architectural significance. It also includes any change occurring in Canada to the health, social, or economic conditions of the Indigenous peoples of Canada.

[348] … In our view, the definition of effect within federal jurisdiction involving the Indigenous peoples of Canada and their rights is constitutional.

(d) The Protection Against Interprovincial and International Pollution Falls Under the National Concern Branch of Parliament's Peace, Order, and Good Government Power …

[349] The IAA defines "effects within federal jurisdiction" as meaning, among other things, a change to a component of the environment that would occur in a province other than one in which the act or thing is done and a change to the environment that would occur outside Canada. Collectively, these aspects of the definition of effects within federal jurisdiction target interprovincial and international pollution.

[350] This Court has accepted that federal jurisdiction over several forms of international and interprovincial pollution can be grounded under the national concern branch of Parliament's residuary power of peace, order, and good government in the introductory words of s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. …

[351] We agree with Canada's concession that greenhouse gas ("GHG") emissions — although relevant to the public interest determination — will generally not be an effect within federal jurisdiction under the IAA's definition. Under the IAA's project-specific approach, the federal government would need to show that an individual project's GHG emissions would cause a non-trivial change to the environment in another province or outside Canada. If Canada attempts to treat a project's GHG emissions as an effect within federal jurisdiction, then whether an individual project's GHG emissions, in context of the global scale of the climate crisis, may cause non-trivial changes to the environment is best assessed through case-specific judicial review of whether a particular exercise of discretion is consistent with the national concern test, set out in the References re GGPPA. Nor, we would add, is there any evidence that Canada has ever treated GHG > emissions as an effect within federal jurisdiction in administering the IAA. While the Minister has referred to a project's GHG emissions when discussing the impacts of a project that was otherwise not in the public interest, we are not aware of any instance in which GHG emissions have themselves ever been relied on as an effect within federal jurisdiction …

> [352] … to repeat: if particular exercises of federal authority under the IAA seek to stretch the boundaries of Parliament's constitutional authority to regulate international and interprovincial pollution, including potentially GHG emissions, such instances can be addressed in future cases reviewing concrete government action and with the benefit of a well-developed evidentiary record. It is "neither necessary nor desirable" to address "speculative concern[s]" regarding potential misuse of the IAA in this reference (References re GGPPA, at para. 220).
> [353] As a result, in our view, the component of the definition of "effects within federal jurisdiction" involving interprovincial and international pollution is constitutional. …
> C. Provincial Undertakings Are Not Immune From Federal Environmental Assessment Under the Doctrine of Interjurisdictional Immunity ...
> [357] Alberta asserts that applying federal environmental assessment legislation would impair the "core" of the province's legislative powers under several provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867: ss. 92(5) (management and sale of the public lands belonging to the province and of the timber and wood thereon), 92(10) (local works and undertakings), 92(13) (property and civil rights in the province), 92(16) (matters of a merely local or private nature in the province), 92A(1) (non-renewable natural resources, forestry resources, and electrical energy), and 109 (property in all lands, mines, minerals, and royalties). We would not give effect to this argument. …
> [360] Alberta offered no precedent to support the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to the heads of provincial power invoked here. As a result, we see no basis to apply the doctrine in the circumstances.
> VI. Conclusion
> [361] In our opinion, the IAA and the Regulations fall within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada under the Constitution Act, 1867. As a result, the constitutional questions should be answered in the negative and the appeal allowed.

Chapter 8: S 91(27), The Federal Criminal Law Power

By Benjamin L. Berger and Hoi Kong

1 Introduction

Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns to the Parliament of Canada jurisdiction over "[t]he Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the Procedure in Criminal Matters." This means that both the substance of the criminal law—what the criminal law prohibits—and the rules of criminal procedure are, in Canada, a federal matter. Many criminal laws are found in the Criminal Code, but—as you will see in this chapter—many are found in other federal statutes passed pursuant to the criminal law power.

From the perspective of constitutional design, the decision as to which level of government ought to have jurisdiction over criminal law is one of considerable significance. The criminal law has direct and meaningful effects on the rights, liberties, and security of subjects and, as this chapter will show, the criminal law power grants government a broad scope of authority, backed by the force of the state. Some federal constitutional orders vest this important power in the sub-national level of government. Notably, this is the arrangement in the United States, where criminal law is primarily a state, not a federal, matter. The decision to centralize this power at the federal level in Canada was made in reaction to this approach in the United States, viewed by some as a defect in American constitutional design that contributed to the Civil War. Sir John A. Macdonald, Attorney-General at the time of the constitutional debates in 1865, emphasized the importance of having the same criminal law throughout the country, ensuring common protections of life and property across the nation. (On this history, see Martin L. Friedland, "Criminal Justice and the Division of Power in Canada" in Martin L. Friedland, ed, A Century of Criminal Justice: Perspectives on the Development of Canadian Law (Toronto: Carswell, 1984), ch 2).

Though the substance of the criminal law is a matter for the Parliament of Canada, it is important to acknowledge the important role that provinces play in the criminal justice system, according to the division of legislative authority. Critically, provinces are responsible for the administration of justice in the provinces (s 92(14)). This sees the provinces responsible for the running and maintenance of the courts, policing, and the prosecution of most Criminal Code offences. Provincial legislatures also have authority over jails (s 92(6)), though Parliament has authority over penitentiaries under s 91(28). Additionally, under s 92(15), provincial legislatures have the power to impose fines and penalties (including imprisonment) to enforce laws validly passed pursuant to their other legislative competencies. The provincial laws that impose such penalties are often referred to as "regulatory offences," which, together with federal criminal law, constitute the "penal law"—the law of offences and punishment. The scope of this provincial authority over regulatory offences, particularly as it relates to the federal criminal law power, is a difficult and delicate question that will be touched upon in the second substantial section below.

In what follows, the cases are first and centrally concerned with the definition and scope of the federal criminal law power. It will become apparent that it is a vast power, affording federal Parliament authority over matters touching on a breadth of subjects, concerns, and aspects of Canadian life and public policy. In that, it plays a similar role federally as that played by the s 92(13) provincial authority over "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". Indeed, in the Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, Justice Karakatsanis explained that both powers are "broad and plenary, and may overlap when a given subject is approached from two different perspectives, one supporting the exercise of federal authority and the other supporting the exercise of provincial authority" (para 69). For that reason, this head of power gives rise to many disputes about the shape and scope of the respective federal and provincial powers.

2 The federal criminal law power

In Re Board of Commerce Act, 1921 CanLII 399 (UK JCPC), [1922] 1 A.C. 191, Viscount Haldane held that the criminal law power was confined to cases "where the subject matter is one which by its very nature belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence" (198-199) — a construal of the power that appeared both narrow and frozen in pre-Confederation views of the scope of criminal law. In 1928, in P.A.T.A. v. A.-G. Can, 1931 CanLII 385 (UK JCPC), [1931] A.C. 310, Lord Atkin changed course, clarifying that the power was not circumscribed by the shape of criminal law at Confederation and offering a much more expansive definition: "The criminal quality of an act cannot be discerned by intuition; nor can it be discovered by reference to any standard but one: Is the act prohibited with penal consequences?" (324) But this formulation is too broad, granting the federal Parliament jurisdiction so long as legislation takes the form of a prohibition and a penalty.

A third, constraining element was added in Reference re Validity of Section 5 (a) Dairy Industry Act, 1948 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1949] SCR 1, known today as the Margarine Reference. That third element, still essential to the modern definition of the criminal law power, is that the legislation pursues a valid criminal law purpose, being directed at addressing "some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public". As you read the Margarine Reference, try to identify what those public purposes—purposes that qualify it as criminal law—include.

2.1 Reference re Validity of Section 5 (a) Dairy Industry Act

Reference re Validity of Section 5 (a) Dairy Industry Act, 1948 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1949] SCR 1

RAND, J.: His Excellency in Council has referred to this Court the following question:—

Is section 5(a) of the Dairy Industry Act, R.S.C. 1927, Chapter 45, ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada either in whole or in part and if so in what particular or particulars and to what extent?

The section is as follows:—

5. No person shall

(a) manufacture, import into Canada, or offer, sell or have in his possession for sale, any oleomargarine margarine, butterine, or other substitute for butter, manufactured wholly or in part from any fat other than that of milk or cream;

The appearance of the provision in a statute dealing comprehensively with the dairy industry and the inclusion of prohibition of importation, the ordinary mode of protection of industry in its ultimate form, are, for this initial purpose, of considerable significance. On the other hand, the scope and importance of agriculture in the economy of this country, the part played by the dairy industry as an essential branch of it, and the desirability of maintaining a market demand for butter to meet the seasonal exigencies of that industry, are beyond controversy. What, then, in that whole background is the true nature of the enactment?

Mr. Varcoe argues that it is simply a provision of criminal law, a field exclusively Dominion, and the issue, I think, depends upon the validity of that contention. In The Proprietary Articles Trade Association vs. Attorney-General of Canada, 38, Lord Atkin rejected the notion that the acts against which criminal law is directed must carry some moral taint. A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened.

In examining the question, we are to consider not only the matters and conditions upon which the legislation will operate but as well its consequences; and in addition to what will be judicially noticed, evidence may be presented in a case which calls for it […].

Criminal law is a body of prohibitions; but that prohibition can be used legislatively as a device to effect a positive result is obvious; […] Under a unitary legislature, all prohibitions may be viewed indifferently as of criminal law; but as the cases cited demonstrate, such a classification is inappropriate to the distribution of legislative power in Canada.

Is the prohibition then enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law, but they do not appear to be the object of the parliamentary action here. That object, as I must find it, is economic and the legislative purpose, to give trade protection to the dairy industry in the production and sale of butter; to benefit one group of persons as against competitors in business in which, in the absence of the legislation, the latter would be free to engage in the provinces. To forbid manufacture and sale for such an end is prima facie to deal directly with the civil rights of individuals in relation to particular trade within the provinces…

The public interest in this regulation lies obviously in the trade effects: it is annexed to the legislative subject matter and follows the latter in its allocation to the one or other legislature. But to use it as a support for the legislation in the aspect of criminal law would mean that the Dominion under its authority in that field, by forbidding the manufacture or sale of particular products, could, in what it considered a sound trade policy, not only interdict a substantial part of the economic life of one section of Canada but do so for the benefit of that of another. Whatever the scope of the regulation of interprovincial trade, it is hard to conceive a more insidious form of encroachment on a complementary jurisdiction.

Finally, it was said the legislation related to Agriculture. Its object, I agree, is to benefit the trade in a product of agriculture; but that is a mere consequential effect and does not of itself relate the legislation to agriculture. […]

Then undoubtedly the dairy industry has an aspect of concern to this country as a whole, but […] if the fact of such an interest or that the matter touched the peace, order and good government of Canada was sufficient to attach the jurisdiction of Parliament, "there is hardly a subject enumerated in sec. 92 upon which it might not legislate, to the exclusion of the provincial legislatures". There is nothing before us from which it can be inferred that the industry has attained a national interest, as distinguished from the aggregate of local interests, of such character as gives it a new and preeminent aspect within the rule of the Russell case […]. Until that state of things appears, the constitutional structure of powers leaves the regulation of the civil rights affected to the legislative judgment of the province.

My answers to the questions, therefore, are:—

1. The prohibition of importation of the goods mentioned in the section is intra vires of Parliament.

2. The prohibition of manufacture, possession and sale is ultra vires of Parliament.

Since the Margarine Reference, this three-part structure for the definition of the criminal law power—a prohibition, a penalty, and a valid criminal law purpose—has been accepted. Though the Court has addressed important issues relative to the requirements of form (the prohibition and the penalty), the dominant story in the development of the jurisprudence on s 91(27) has been about working through how expansively the courts are willing to view the range of valid criminal law purposes.

The Supreme Court's judgment in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, advanced this central story, clarifying an important formal point in the process: that the prohibitions contained in legislation passed pursuant to the criminal law power may include exemptions—the inclusion of such exemptions does not render the legislation a regulatory, rather than criminal, scheme. As you read RJR-MacDonald, ask yourself, what is the criminal law purpose pursued by this legislation?

2.2 RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General)

RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199

2 LA FOREST J. (dissenting, [but not on the federalism point – here he wrote for himself, Lamer C.J., L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ.]) -- The issues in these appeals are whether the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20 (the "Act"), falls within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, either as criminal law or under the peace, order and good government clause, and if so whether it constitutes an infringement of freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter. In broad terms, the Act prohibits, subject to specified exceptions, all advertising and promotion of tobacco products, and prohibits the sale of a tobacco product unless the package containing it sets forth prescribed health warnings and a list of the toxic constituents of the product and of the smoke produced from its combustion.

The Legislative Scheme

5 The Act, the long title of which is An Act to prohibit the advertising and promotion and respecting the labelling and monitoring of tobacco products, received Royal Assent on June 28, 1988 and came into force on January 1, 1989. The purpose of the Act is set out in s. 3, which reads:

> 3. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
> (a) to protect the health of Canadians in the light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
> (b) to protect young persons and others, to the extent that is reasonable in a free and democratic society, from inducements to use tobacco products and consequent dependence on them; and
> (c) to enhance public awareness of the hazards of tobacco use by ensuring the effective communication of pertinent information to consumers of tobacco products.

Section 3 thus states that Parliament's purpose in enacting the legislation is to address the "national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern" arising from the use of tobacco, by protecting young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products, and by enhancing public awareness concerning the hazards of tobacco use. However, it is of significance to these appeals that, with the exception of a prohibition on the distribution of free samples of tobacco products under s. 7, the Act does not purport to proscribe the sale, distribution or use of tobacco products. Rather, as its long title indicates, the Act seeks to attain its purpose through the institution of a prohibition on the advertising and promotion of tobacco products offered for sale in Canada and through the institution of a requirement that manufacturers of tobacco products display health warnings on tobacco product packages.

6 In furtherance of the purpose set out in s. 3, Parliament has created a legislative scheme that targets three distinct categories of commercial activity: advertising, promotion and labelling. Sections 4 and 5 of the Act, which fall under the title "ADVERTISING", deal with the advertisement and display of tobacco products. Section 4 prohibits the advertisement, by publication, broadcast or otherwise, of tobacco products offered for sale in Canada. An exception to this prohibition is created by s. 4(3) and (4), which stipulate that the prohibition does not extend to foreign advertising in foreign publications imported into Canada or foreign broadcasts retransmitted in Canada, as long as those advertisements are not intended primarily for the purpose of promoting the sale of a tobacco product in Canada. Section 5 is directed to the retail display of tobacco products in retail establishments and vending machines. Section 5(1) stipulates that a retailer may expose tobacco products for sale and may post signs that indicate, other than by their brand names or trade marks, the tobacco products offered for sale on the premises. Section 5(2) permits the operation of tobacco vending machines, and the identification of products and prices on the exterior of the machines.

7 Sections 6 to 8 of the Act fall under the title "PROMOTION", and deal with various direct and indirect promotional activities involving tobacco products. Section 6(1) stipulates that the full name of a tobacco manufacturer may be used in a representation to the public that promotes a cultural or sporting event, but prohibits the use of brand names in such representations unless the use of a brand name is required by a contract made before January 25, 1988. Section 6(2) stipulates that, where a contract requiring the use of a brand name was in place before January 25, 1988, the value of contributions under that contract are frozen at 1987 levels. Section 7 prohibits the free distribution of tobacco products in any form. Section 8 prohibits the use of a tobacco trade mark on any article other than a tobacco product, and also prohibits the use and distribution of tobacco trade marks in advertising for products other than tobacco products; however, a special exemption from the s. 8 prohibition is created under s. 8(3) for the "Dunhill" trade mark.

8 Section 9 falls under the title "LABELLING", and prohibits tobacco manufacturers from selling their products unless they display on the package containing the product unattributed messages describing the health effects of the product as well as a list of the product's toxic constituents and the quantities of those constituents present in it. Section 17(f) authorizes the Governor in Council to adopt regulations prescribing the content, position, configuration, size and prominence of the health messages. Under the Tobacco Products Control Regulations, amendment, SOR/93-389, s. 11 (July 21, 1993), every tobacco package must display one of the following messages:

> (i) "Cigarettes are addictive" . . .
> (ii)"Tobacco smoke can harm your children" . . .
> (iii) "Cigarettes cause fatal lung disease" . . .
> (iv) "Cigarettes cause cancer" . . .
> (v)"Cigarettes cause strokes and heart disease" . . .
> (vi) "Smoking during pregnancy can harm your baby" . . .
> (vii) "Smoking can kill you" . . .

Section 17(g) also authorizes the Governor in Council to require leaflets providing health information to be placed inside packages of a tobacco product and to prescribe their content, form and manner of placement in those packages. Under s. 9(2), tobacco manufacturers are prohibited from displaying on their packages any writing other than the name, brand name, trade mark, and other information required by legislation.

9 One further provision of the Act is of relevance to these appeals. Section 17(a) gives the Governor in Council power to make regulations exempting a tobacco product from the application of ss. 4 and 7 where, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, that product is likely to be used as a substitute for other tobacco products and poses less risk to the health of users than those other products.

10 The enforcement provisions of the Act are found in ss. 11 to 16. These provisions confer upon the Minister the power to designate a "tobacco product inspector" with powers of inspection, search and seizure, analysis, detention of things seized, and forfeiture. The "offences and punishments" for contravention of the Act are set out in ss. 18 and 19. Section 18 stipulates that every person who contravenes ss. 4, 6(2), 7, 8, 9 or 10 is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction or an indictable offence. The penalties range in seriousness from a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars or six months' imprisonment, or both, for a first offence on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars or two years' imprisonment, or both, for a second or subsequent offence pursued by way of indictment.

Issues Before This Court

27 The argument before this Court was conducted on the basis of two constitutional questions, stated by Chief Justice Lamer on November 4, 1993:

> 1 Is the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20, wholly or in part within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada as being a law enacted for the peace, order and good government of Canada pursuant to s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867; as being enacted pursuant to the criminal law power in s. 91(27) thereof; or otherwise?
> [The Court also dealt the constitutional validity of the labeling requirements under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Those parts of the decision are reproduced elsewhere in these materials.]

Analysis

1. Jurisdiction under the Constitution Act, 1867

The Criminal Law Power

28 The first question arising on these appeals is whether the Act constitutes a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power and is therefore intra vires the federal Parliament. Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 confers on the federal Parliament the exclusive power to legislate in relation to the criminal law. The criminal law power is plenary in nature and this Court has always defined its scope broadly. As Estey J. observed in Scowby v. Glendinning […] "[t]he terms of s. 91(27) of the Constitution must be read as assigning to Parliament exclusive jurisdiction over criminal law in the widest sense of the term" […]. In developing a definition of the criminal law, this Court has been careful not to freeze the definition in time or confine it to a fixed domain of activity […]. In Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General for Canada, […] the Privy Council defined the federal criminal law power in the widest possible terms to include any prohibited act with penal consequences. Subsequent to that decision, this Court recognized that the Privy Council's definition was too broad in that it would allow Parliament to invade areas of provincial legislative competence colourably simply by legislating in the proper form […]. So, as Estey J. put it in Scowby, […] "it was accepted that some legitimate public purpose must underlie the prohibition". This necessary adjustment was introduced in […] (the Margarine Reference). Rand J. drew attention, at pp. 49-50, to the need to identify the evil or injurious effect at which a penal prohibition was directed. He stated:

> A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened.
> . . .
> Is the prohibition . . . enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law . . . . [Emphasis added.]

See also R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463, at p. 489.

29 Taking into account the broad definition of the criminal law developed by this Court, I am satisfied that the Act is, in pith and substance, criminal law. A law's pith and substance, or "matter", is best described as its dominant purpose or true character; see Morgentaler, supra, at pp. 481-82. From a plain reading of the Act, it seems clear that Parliament's purpose in enacting this legislation was to prohibit three categories of acts: advertisement of tobacco products (ss. 4 and 5), promotion of tobacco products (ss. 6 to 8) and sale of tobacco products without printed health warnings (s. 9). These prohibitions are accompanied by penal sanctions under s. 18 of the Act, which, […] creates at least a prima facie indication that the Act is criminal law. However, the crucial further question is whether the Act also has an underlying criminal public purpose in the sense described by Rand J. in the Margarine Reference, supra. The question, as Rand J. framed it, is whether the prohibition with penal consequences is directed at an "evil" or injurious effect upon the public.

30 In these cases, the evil targeted by Parliament is the detrimental health effects caused by tobacco consumption. This is apparent from s. 3, the Act's "purpose" clause […]. Quite clearly, the common thread running throughout the three enumerated purposes in paras. 3(a) to (c) is a concern for public health and, more specifically, a concern with protecting Canadians from the hazards of tobacco consumption. This is a valid concern. A copious body of evidence was introduced at trial demonstrating convincingly, and this was not disputed by the appellants, that tobacco consumption is widespread in Canadian society and that it poses serious risks to the health of a great number of Canadians. I note in passing the well-established principle that a court is entitled, in a pith and substance analysis, to refer to extrinsic materials, such as related legislation, Parliamentary debates and evidence of the "mischief" at which the legislation is directed; see Morgentaler, supra, at pp. 483-84; Reference Re Anti-Inflation Act, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC) […]. An appropriate starting point in an examination of these extrinsic materials is the speech given by Jake Epp, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, on November 23, 1987 before second reading of Bill C-51, which was later given Royal Assent to the Act. He stated (House of Commons Debates, vol. IX, at p. 11042):

> The federal Government has taken an active role in addressing the issue of cigarette smoking. It is important for people to understand why smoking, which was thought of as merely a personal habit, has become a legitimate public concern. There is overwhelming evidence that tobacco smoke is the largest preventable cause of illness, disability and premature death in Canada. Moreover, it has also become evident that Canadians who are consistently exposed to smoke in the environment may suffer from adverse health effects. Not surprisingly, the public is increasingly asking for an environment that protects non-smokers from tobacco smoke.
> As Minister of National Health and Welfare, my primary concern is the health of Canadians. Therefore, I must do all that I can to protect their health by discouraging the advertising and promotion of tobacco, and by increasing public health knowledge of the health hazards of smoking.
> This is not a moral crusade. It is not a case of some overzealous individuals attempting to force their life-style on others. It is responsible government action in reaction to overwhelming evidence that tobacco, despite its widespread use by a third of the adult population, is actually responsible for 100 deaths a day in Canada.

31 Apart from shedding light upon the government's intent in introducing this legislation, this speech also gives some indication of the nature and scope of the societal problem posed by tobacco consumption. Statistics show that approximately 6.7 million Canadians, or 28 percent of Canadians over the age of 15, consume tobacco products […]. The harm tobacco consumption causes each year to individual Canadians, and to the community as a whole, is tragic. Indeed, it has been estimated that smoking causes the premature death of over 30,000 Canadians annually […]. Overwhelming evidence was introduced at trial that tobacco use is a principal cause of deadly cancers, heart disease and lung disease. In our day and age this conclusion has become almost a truism. […]

32 It appears, then, that the detrimental health effects of tobacco consumption are both dramatic and substantial. Put bluntly, tobacco kills. Given this fact, can Parliament validly employ the criminal law to prohibit tobacco manufacturers from inducing Canadians to consume these products, and to increase public awareness concerning the hazards of their use? In my view, there is no question that it can. "Health", of course, is not an enumerated head under the Constitution Act, 1867. As Estey J. observed in Schneider v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 112, at p. 142:

> . . . "health" is not a matter which is subject to specific constitutional assignment but instead is an amorphous topic which can be addressed by valid federal or provincial legislation, depending in the circumstances of each case on the nature or scope of the health problem in question.
> Given the "amorphous" nature of health as a constitutional matter, and the resulting fact that Parliament and the provincial legislatures may both validly legislate in this area, it is important to emphasize once again the plenary nature of the criminal law power. In the Margarine Reference, supra, at pp. 49-50, Rand J. made it clear that the protection of "health" is one of the "ordinary ends" served by the criminal law, and that the criminal law power may validly be used to safeguard the public from any "injurious or undesirable effect". The scope of the federal power to create criminal legislation with respect to health matters is broad, and is circumscribed only by the requirements that the legislation must contain a prohibition accompanied by a penal sanction and must be directed at a legitimate public health evil. If a given piece of federal legislation contains these features, and if that legislation is not otherwise a "colourable" intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction, then it is valid as criminal law; see Scowby, supra, at pp. 237-38.

33 As I have indicated, it is clear that this legislation is directed at a public health evil and that it contains prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions. Is it colourable? In my view, it is not. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive what Parliament's purpose could have been in enacting this legislation apart from the reduction of tobacco consumption and the protection of public health. If Parliament's underlying purpose or intent had been to encroach specifically upon the provincial power to regulate advertising, it would surely have enacted legislation applying to advertising in more than one industry. Similarly, if Parliament's intent had been to regulate the tobacco industry as an industry, and not merely to combat the ancillary health effects resulting from tobacco consumption, then it would surely have enacted provisions that relate to such matters as product quality, pricing and labour relations. In this respect, the present cases must be distinguished from cases such as Morgentaler, supra, where there was evidence that Nova Scotia's major purpose in enacting the Medical Services Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 281, which purported to be for the control of private health care facilities, was in fact the elimination of free-standing abortion clinics […]. In [that case], it was clear that the provincial legislature was attempting to intrude indirectly upon federal powers when it could not do so directly […]. By contrast, there is no evidence in the present cases that Parliament had an ulterior motive in enacting this legislation, or that it was attempting to intrude unjustifiably upon provincial powers under ss. 92(13) and (16). They thus differ from the Margarine Reference, supra, where the prohibition was not really directed at curtailing a public evil, but was in reality, in pith and substance, aimed at regulating the dairy industry.

34 Why, then, has Parliament chosen to prohibit tobacco advertising, and not tobacco consumption itself? In my view, there is a compelling explanation for this choice. It is not that Parliament was attempting to intrude colourably upon provincial jurisdiction but that a prohibition upon the sale or consumption of tobacco is not a practical policy option at this time. It must be kept in mind that the very nature of tobacco consumption makes government action problematic. Many scientists agree that the nicotine found in tobacco is a powerfully addictive drug. For example, the United States Surgeon General has concluded that "[c]igarettes and other forms of tobacco are addicting" and that "the processes that determine tobacco addiction are similar to those that determine addiction to other drugs, including illegal drugs"; see The Health Consequences of Smoking -- Nicotine Addiction -- A report of the Surgeon General (1988). Given the addictive nature of tobacco products, and the fact that over one-third of Canadians smoke, it is clear that a legislative prohibition on the sale and use of tobacco products would be highly impractical. Indeed a prohibition on the manufacture and sale of tobacco products would likely lead many smokers to resort to alternative, and illegal, sources of supply. As legislators in this country discovered earlier in the century, the prohibition of a social drug such as tobacco or alcohol leads almost inevitably to an increase in smuggling and crime.

35 However, the mere fact that it is not practical or realistic to implement a prohibition on the use or manufacture of tobacco products does not mean that Parliament cannot, or should not, resort to other intermediate policy options. […]

36 It is apparent […] that the social problems created by tobacco consumption are complex and that innovative legislative solutions are required to address them effectively. Faced with the insurmountable difficulties a complete prohibition upon tobacco consumption would create, the federal Parliament has undertaken the task of devising such solutions. Indeed, the Act forms only one part of a comprehensive and multi-faceted federal and provincial program to control and reduce the consumption of tobacco. This program has been in development for over 25 years. […]

38 Subsequent to the passage of the Act, Parliament has also introduced an array of legislative measures as part of its larger initiative to curb tobacco consumption. These include a law prohibiting the sale of tobacco to minors (Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act, S.C. 1993, c. 5.), a law eliminating smoking in federal government work environments (Non-smokers' Health Act, S.C. 1988, c. 21), and the prohibition of the sale of cigarettes in the small package formats often purchased by children (so-called "kiddie packs" of less than 20 cigarettes); see An Act to amend the Excise Act, the Customs Act and the Tobacco Sales to Young Persons Act, S.C. 1994, c. 37. Parliament has also sought to reduce smoking through major tax increases in 1985, 1989 and 1991, although taxes were partially rolled back in 1994 due to a large contraband problem. Also relevant is that nine provinces have introduced legislation respecting the sale of tobacco to young persons and smoking in public places […].

39 Quite clearly, then, Parliament has been innovative in seeking to find alternatives to a prohibition on the sale or use of tobacco. In light of the practical difficulties entailed in prohibiting the sale or consumption of tobacco, and the resulting need for innovative legislative solutions, Parliament's decision to criminalize tobacco advertisement and promotion is, in my view, a valid exercise of the criminal law power. This Court has long recognized that Parliament may validly employ the criminal law power to prohibit or control the manufacture, sale and distribution of products that present a danger to public health, and that Parliament may also validly impose labelling and packaging requirements on dangerous products with a view to protecting public health. This was recognized as early as the Margarine Reference, supra. […]

43 From the foregoing, it is clear that Parliament could, if it chose, validly prohibit the manufacture and sale of tobacco products under the criminal law power on the ground that these products constitute a danger to public health. Such a prohibition would be directly analogous to the prohibitions on dangerous drugs and unsanitary foods or poisons mentioned earlier, which quite clearly fall within the federal criminal law power. In my view, once it is accepted that Parliament may validly legislate under the criminal law power with respect to the manufacture and sale of tobacco products, it logically follows that Parliament may also validly legislate under that power to prohibit the advertisement of tobacco products and sales of products without health warnings. In either case, Parliament is legislating to effect the same underlying criminal public purpose: protecting Canadians from harmful and dangerous products.

The Appellants' Principal Arguments

45 The foregoing considerations, it seems to me, are sufficient to establish that the pith and substance of the Act is criminal law for the purpose of protecting public health and that Parliament accordingly has the legislative authority under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to enact this legislation. However, I think it right to address directly the three principal arguments raised by the appellants in support of their submission that the Act is not valid as criminal law: first, that the conduct prohibited by the Act does not have an "affinity with a traditional criminal law concern"; second, that Parliament cannot criminalize an activity ancillary to an "evil" if it does not criminalize the "evil" itself; and, third, that the Act is more properly characterized as regulatory, not criminal, legislation. I will now address each of these arguments in turn.

i. Affinity of the Act with a Traditional Criminal Law Concern

46 The appellants' first argument is that the Act is not a valid exercise of the criminal law power because it does not involve conduct having an affinity with a traditional criminal law concern. The appellants observe that both tobacco consumption and tobacco advertising have always been legal in this country and, on this basis, argue that this legislation does not serve a "public purpose commonly recognized as being criminal in nature"; see Swain, supra, at p. 998.

47 In my view, this argument fails because it neglects the well-established principle that the definition of the criminal law is not "frozen as of some particular time" […]. It has long been recognized that Parliament's power to legislate with respect to the criminal law must, of necessity, include the power to create new crimes. This was made clear as early as 1931, when the Privy Council upheld the validity of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 26 […]. That legislation criminalized a wide array of commercial activities not hitherto perceived to have an affinity with criminal law concerns.

48 In my view, the reasoning in PATA and Goodyear Tire is directly applicable here. The simple fact that neither tobacco consumption nor tobacco advertising have been illegal in the past in no way precludes Parliament from criminalizing either of those activities today. Indeed, given the fact that the first medical reports linking cigarette smoking to disease did not emerge until the 1950s, and that governments have only recently been made aware of the truly devastating health consequences of tobacco consumption, it is clear that Parliament had no reason, before that time, to criminalize this activity. The evolution in medical knowledge since the 1950s has radically altered the social and political landscape, producing a growing consensus, both nationally and internationally, that tobacco consumption is a sui generis problem that can only be properly addressed with an array of innovative and multifaceted legislative responses. In Canada, the decision to criminalize tobacco advertising was made incrementally, as part of a 25-year public policy process, and only after Parliament had determined that there was compelling evidence concerning the health effects of tobacco consumption and that the variety of non-criminal measures then in place were not sufficiently effective in reducing consumption. It would be artificial, if not absurd, to limit Parliament's power to legislate in this emerging area of public health concern simply because it did not, and logically could not, legislate at an earlier time.

ii. The Ancillary Nature of the Prohibited Act

49 The appellants' second argument is that the Act lacks the requisite "criminal public purpose" because Parliament cannot criminalize an activity ancillary to an "evil" (the advertisement and promotion of tobacco), when the underlying activity the legislation is designed to combat (the manufacture, sale and consumption of tobacco) is itself legal.

50 In my view, this argument fails because it cannot be reconciled with the recent jurisprudence of this Court. In both Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123 (the Prostitution Reference), and Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 519, this Court upheld the constitutionality of legislation that criminalized an ancillary activity without also criminalizing the underlying activity or "evil". …

iii. The Creation of Exemptions Under the Criminal Law Power

52 The appellants' third argument is that the Act is fundamentally regulatory, not criminal, in nature. In support of this argument, they observe that the Act contains exemptions for publications and broadcasts originating outside Canada (s. 4(3)), for the Dunhill trademark (s. 8(3)), and for tobacco product substitutes exempted by the Governor in Council on the ground that they pose less risk to the health of users (s. 17(a)). The practical effect of these exemptions, the appellants argue, is that the very same act can be legal when committed by one party in Canada but illegal when committed by another.

53 In my view, this argument fails because it disregards the long-established principle that the criminal law may validly contain exemptions for certain conduct without losing its status as criminal law. […]

54 This principle was reiterated in Morgentaler v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1976] 1 SCR 616, where this Court addressed the constitutionality of s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34. Under s. 251(1) of the Code, the intentional procurement of a miscarriage was declared to be unlawful. However, under s. 251(4) and (5), Parliament had also created an exemption for miscarriages carried out by qualified medical practitioners where the life of the woman was in danger. Laskin C.J., dissenting in the result but not on this issue, made it clear that the creation of such an exemption did not detract from the validity of the provision as criminal law, at p. 627:

> I need cite no authority for the proposition that Parliament may determine what is not criminal as well as what is, and may hence introduce dispensations or exemptions in its criminal legislation. It has done this in respect of gaming and betting by prescribing for lawful operation of pari-mutuel systems…,by exempting agricultural fairs or exhibitions from certain of the prohibitions against lotteries and games of chance… and by expressly permitting lotteries under stated conditions…

56 The clear implication of this Court's decisions in Lord's Day Alliance, Morgentaler and Furtney, is that the creation of a broad status-based exemption to criminal legislation does not detract from the criminal nature of the legislation. On the contrary, the exemption helps to define the crime by clarifying its contours. In my view, this is precisely what Parliament has done in creating exemptions under the Act. The crime created by Parliament is the advertisement and promotion of tobacco products offered for sale in Canada. Rather than diluting the criminality of these acts, the exemptions to which the appellants refer serve merely to delineate the logical and practical limits to Parliament's exercise of the criminal law power in this context. For example, it is clear that the exemption for foreign media under s. 4(3) was created to avoid both the extraterritorial application of Canadian legislation and the page-by-page censorship of foreign publications at the border. … Given the fact that foreign tobacco products comprise less than 1 percent of the Canadian market, it is apparent that the exemption has an extremely limited scope. There is an equally logical and practical explanation for the exemptions created under ss. 17(a) and 8(3). With respect to the exemption under s. 17(a), which permits the Governor in Council to make regulations exempting substitute tobacco products from the application of ss. 4 and 7 where they pose less risk to the health of users, it is clear that Parliament was seeking to encourage the development of alternatives to tobacco. Such an exemption is, of course, completely consistent with the Act's underlying purpose of protecting public health. […] Thus, none of these exemptions serves in any way to confuse, or detract from, the category of acts Parliament has validly criminalized under the Act.

57 For all the foregoing reasons, I am of the view that the Act is a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power.

193 MAJOR J. [(Sopinka J. concurring) (dissenting)] --

195 It is undisputed that Parliament may legislate with respect to hazardous, unsanitary, adulterated and otherwise dangerous foods and drugs pursuant to its power to legislate in the field of criminal law.

196 It follows that Parliament can require manufacturers to place warnings on tobacco products which are known to have harmful effects on health. Manufacturers of tobacco products are under a duty to disclose and warn of the dangers inherent in the consumption of tobacco products. Failure to place warnings on tobacco products can validly constitute a crime, a "public wrong" which merits proscription and punishment and ought to be suppressed as "socially undesirable conduct" […]. […]

197 However, I do not agree that Parliament under its criminal law power is entitled to prohibit all advertising and promotion of tobacco products and restrict the use of tobacco trademarks as provided for in ss. 4, 5, 6, 8 and 9 of the Act. […]

200 A definitive and all-encompassing test to determine what constitutes a "criminal offence" remains elusive but the activity which Parliament wishes to suppress through criminal sanction must pose a significant, grave and serious risk of harm to public health, morality, safety or security before it can fall within the purview of the criminal law power. While there is a range of conduct between the most and less serious, not every harm or risk to society is sufficiently grave or serious to warrant the application of the criminal law.

201 The heart of criminal law is the prohibition of conduct which interferes with the proper functioning of society or which undermines the safety and security of society as a whole. Reference re Alberta Statutes, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] SCR 100, held that a crime is a public wrong involving a violation of the public rights and duties to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity. Matters which pose a significant and serious risk of harm or which cause significant and serious harm to public health, safety or security can be proscribed by Parliament as criminal.

202 Consequently, lesser threats to society and its functioning do not fall within the criminal law, but are addressed through non-criminal regulation, either by Parliament or provincial legislatures, depending on the subject matter of the regulation.

204 […] I agree that criminal law is not frozen in time. Parliament can decriminalize what once was thought criminal, and can also criminalize conduct which was not part of the criminal law at the time of Confederation. I disagree that affinity with a traditional criminal law concern has no part to play in the analysis, whether the conduct proscribed by Parliament has an affinity with a traditional criminal law concern is a starting point in determining whether a particular matter comes within federal criminal competence. Cases such as Morgentaler, supra, and Knox Construction, supra, demonstrate that courts will often look for an affinity with a traditional criminal law concern, or affinity with activities historically recognized as criminal, to determine whether a certain exercise of legislative power falls within the field of criminal law.

208 The objective of the advertising ban and trade mark usage restrictions, as stated by McLachlin J., is to prevent Canadians from being persuaded by advertising and promotion to use tobacco products. I respectfully disagree with La Forest J. that this type of persuasion constitutes criminal conduct.

209 Tobacco advertising and promotion may encourage some people to start or to continue to smoke. For that reason, it is viewed by many as an undesirable form of commercial expression. I do not disagree that it may be an undesirable form of expression, but is this undesirability sufficient to make such expression criminal? Does tobacco advertising pose a significant, grave and serious danger to public health? Or does it simply encourage people to consume a legal but harmful product? I cannot agree that the commercial speech at issue poses such a significant, grave and serious danger to public health to fall within the purview of the federal criminal law power. In my opinion, the Act is too far removed from the injurious or undesirable effects of tobacco use to constitute a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. Legislation prohibiting all advertising of a product which is both legal and licensed for sale throughout Canada lacks a typically criminal public purpose and is ultra vires Parliament under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Such advertising can hardly be considered to be a public wrong involving a violation of public rights and duties to the whole community, the type of conduct that Parliament is entitled to proscribe and punish as harmful and socially undesirable under its criminal law power.

212 Since Parliament has chosen not to criminalize tobacco use, it is difficult to understand how tobacco advertising can somehow take on the character of criminal activity. The Act does not deal in any way with the regulation or prohibition of dangerous products or drugs. The underlying "evil" of tobacco use which the Act is designed to combat remains perfectly legal. Tobacco advertising is in itself not sufficiently dangerous or harmful to justify criminal sanctions. In my view, it is beyond Parliament's competence to criminalize this type of speech where Parliament has declined to criminalize the underlying activity of tobacco use.

213 On a final note, La Forest J. addressed the exemptions contained within the Act, most notably the exemption for foreign periodicals. He concluded that notwithstanding the exemptions, tobacco advertising still constitutes criminal law. I disagree. […] While exemptions do not necessarily take a statute out of criminal law, broadly based exemptions are a factor which may lead a court to conclude that the proscribed conduct is not truly criminal. […]

215 In these appeals, McLachlin J. notes that despite the advertising ban, 65 percent of the Canadian magazine market will contain tobacco advertisements, given that the ban applies only to Canadian media and not to imported publications. The exemptions for advertising cannot be seen as being limited in nature because most Canadians will be exposed to advertising for tobacco products in newspapers, magazines and so forth. It is hard to understand how the respondent on the one hand claims that nothing short of a total ban will accomplish the goal of reducing tobacco consumption while at the same time the Act allows a very significant amount of advertising to enter the country. It is difficult to imagine how tobacco advertising produced by the United States or other countries and distributed in Canada through publications somehow becomes criminal when produced and distributed by Canadians. The broadly based exemptions contained in the Act, combined with the fact that the Act does not engage a typically criminal public purpose, leads to the conclusion that the prohibitions on advertising cannot be upheld as a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power.

For an engaging and critical analysis of this decision that focusses on the politics of the criminal law power, see Allan Hutchinson and David Schneiderman, "Smoking Guns: The Federal Government Confronts the Tobacco and Gun Lobbies" (1995) 7 Const Forum Const 16.

R. v. Hydro-Québec, 1997 CanLII 318 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 213 dealt with similar questions as those taken up in RJR-MacDonald. In this case, the Supreme Court held that the protection of the environment is a valid criminal law purpose and that, in addition to including exemptions, criminal prohibitions may also provide for broad ministerial discretion.

2.3 R. v. Hydro-Québec

This case concerned the constitutionality of provisions of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, RSC 1985, c 16 (4th Supp). Hydro-Québec had been charged with violating an order made pursuant to the Act that restricted its emissions of certain hazardous substances. It challenged the relevant provisions on the basis that they were ultra vires federal Parliament. The federal government sought to defend the legislation as a valid exercise of Parliament's POGG and criminal law powers. The complex scheme at issue was summarized in the dissenting reasons of Chief Justice Lamer and Justice Iacobucci, which appeared first in the reasons. The majority reasons, written by La Forest J., follow. Only the portions of the judgments addressing the criminal law power are included below.

R. v. Hydro-Québec*, 1997 CanLII 318 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 213

The reasons of Lamer C.J. and Sopinka, Iacobucci and Major JJ. were delivered by

1 THE CHIEF JUSTICE and IACOBUCCI J. (dissenting) – This appeal arose as a result of an interim order made in 1989 by the then Minister of the Environment of Canada, the Honourable Lucien Bouchard. It restricted the emission of chlorobiphenyls ("PCBs") to 1 gram per day. The respondent, Hydro-Québec, was charged with breaching this Interim Order and challenged the charges by claiming that the Interim Order, as well as the underlying provisions supporting it, were ultra vires Parliament as invading provincial territory.

2 We have had the advantage of reading the lucid reasons of La Forest J. While we share his concern for the protection of the environment, we are of the view that the impugned provisions cannot be justified under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and are therefore ultra vires the federal government. Because of our disagreement with our colleague's approach, we will set out the relevant factual and judicial background.

A. The Legislative Structure of the Act

15 The Canadian Environmental Protection Act was adopted by Parliament in 1988. It consolidated and replaced several other laws dealing with various kinds of environmental protection. Part II of the Act, which contains ss. 34 and 35, is called "Toxic Substances" and deals with the identification and regulation of substances which could potentially pose a risk to the environment and/or to human health. According to s. 11 of the Act, a substance is toxic where "it is entering or may enter the environment" under conditions "having or that may have an immediate or long-term harmful effect on the environment", "constituting or that may constitute a danger to the environment on which human life depends", or "constituting or that may constitute a danger in Canada to human life or health". Section 3 broadly defines a "substance" as "any distinguishable kind of organic or inorganic matter, whether animate or inanimate" and the "environment" as "the components of the Earth". "Harmful effect" and "danger" are not defined.

16 The Act instructs the Ministers of the Environment and Health to compile and maintain four lists: the Domestic Substances List (DSL), the Non-Domestic Substances List (NDSL), the Priority Substances List (PSL) and the List of Toxic Substances (LTS). The DSL includes all substances in use in Canada since 1986 (some 21,700 substances as of January 1991). The NDSL contains all other substances. At present, the NDSL list includes over 41,000 substances. See E. A. Fitzgerald, "The Constitutionality of Toxic Substances Regulation Under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act" (1996), 30 U.B.C. L. Rev. 55, at p. 70. There is a blanket restriction on importing NDSL substances into Canada until they are approved (s. 26).

17 Sections 12 and 13 of the Act require the Ministers to compile a "Priority Substances List" specifying those substances to which priority should be given in determining whether or not they should be placed on the List of Toxic Substances. […]

18 Once a priority listed substance is found to be toxic within the meaning of s. 11, the Ministers may recommend adding it to the List of Toxic Substances. After a federal-provincial advisory committee (established under s. 6) has been given an opportunity to provide its advice, the Governor in Council may add the substance to the list and bring it under the regulatory control of s. 34.

19 Section 34 provides for the regulation of substances on the List of Toxic Substances. The Governor in Council is given extensive powers to prescribe regulations dealing with every conceivable aspect of the listed substance, including: the quantity or concentration in which it can be released; the commercial or manufacturing activity in the course of which it can be released; the quantity of that substance that can be manufactured, imported, owned, sold, or used -- including total prohibitions on its manufacture, importation, ownership, use or sale -- and likewise the manner in and purposes for which it can be manufactured, imported, processed, used, offered for sale or sold; the manner and conditions in which the substance may be advertised, stored, displayed, handled, transported or offered for transport; the manner, conditions, places and method of disposal of the substance; the maintenance of books and records in respect of the substance; and the extent to which reports must be made to the Minister regarding the monitoring of the substance. Section 34(1)(x) allows the Governor in Council to regulate "any other matter necessary to carry out the purposes of this Part".

20 Where a substance is not on the List of Toxic Substances (or where it is listed, but the Ministers believe that it is not adequately regulated), and where the Ministers believe that immediate action is necessary in respect of that substance, s. 35 allows for the making of "interim orders" without going through the usual procedure. These orders can contain any regulation which could have been made under s. 34, but they remain in effect for only 14 days unless they are approved by the Governor in Council. Approval can be given only if, inter alia, the Ministers have offered to consult with the governments of any affected provinces to see whether they are prepared to take sufficient action to deal with the threat posed by the substance (s. 35(4)). According to s. 35(8), interim orders expire after two years, even if such approval is granted.

22 Finally, the Act prescribes a number of civil and criminal penalties. Section 113(f), for example, creates an offence of contravening regulations made under s. 34. The punishment ranges from a maximum $300,000 fine or six months imprisonment (or both) on summary conviction to a maximum $1 million fine or three years imprisonment (or both) on indictment. A defence of due diligence is allowed for all offences under the Act except those under s. 114 (knowingly providing false or misleading information), s. 115(1)(a) (intentionally or recklessly causing an environmental disaster) or s. 115(1)(b) (showing wanton or reckless disregard for the lives or safety of other persons). These offences require a higher standard of moral culpability.

C. The Criminal Law Power

34 Parliament has been given broad and exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law by virtue of s. 91(27) […]. This power has traditionally been construed generously. As La Forest J. noted in RJR-MacDonald, at p. 240, "[i]n developing a definition of the criminal law, this Court has been careful not to freeze the definition in time or confine it to a fixed domain of activity".

35 Nevertheless, the criminal law power has always been made subject to two requirements: laws purporting to be upheld under s. 91(27) must contain prohibitions backed by penalties; and they must be directed at a "legitimate public purpose" […]. As Rand J. stated in the Margarine Reference […]:

> A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened.
> Is the prohibition then enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law....

36 These two criteria have been consistently applied: […]. Criminal law under s. 91(27) must attempt to achieve a criminal public purpose through the imposition of prohibitions and penalties. Colourable attempts to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction under the guise of criminal legislation will be declared ultra vires. As La Forest J. wrote in RJR-MacDonald, at p. 246:

> The scope of the federal power to create criminal legislation with respect to health matters is broad, and is circumscribed only by the requirements that the legislation must contain a prohibition accompanied by a penal sanction and must be directed at a legitimate public health evil. If a given piece of federal legislation contains these features, and if that legislation is not otherwise a "colourable" intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction, then it is valid as criminal law.... [Emphasis added.]

37 These comments were made in the context of criminal legislation concerning health, but we see no reason why they should not be of general application as regards s. 91(27). […].

38 The next step is therefore to examine the impugned provisions and determine whether they meet these criteria. In our view, they fall short. While the protection of the environment is a legitimate public purpose which could support the enactment of criminal legislation, we believe the impugned provisions of the Act are more an attempt to regulate environmental pollution than to prohibit or proscribe it. As such, they extend beyond the purview of criminal law and cannot be justified under s. 91(27).

(i) A Legitimate Public Purpose

39 The appellant and several interveners urged us to uphold the provisions as related to health, one of the criminal public purposes recognized in the Margarine Reference, supra. In this regard, they cited numerous studies outlining the hazardous effects of PCBs, which were the subject of the Interim Order that gave rise to this litigation. […]. With respect, the toxicity of PCBs, while clearly important to the environment itself, is not directly relevant to this appeal, since what is at issue is not simply the Interim Order, but the enabling provisions under which that order was enacted. That is, the question is not whether PCBs pose a danger to human health, which it appears they clearly do, but whether the Act purports to grant federal regulatory power over substances which may not pose such a danger.

40 In our view, there is no question but that the Act does so. […]

42 […] As such, we cannot see how the provisions can be upheld as legislation relating to health. Their scope extends well beyond matters relating to human health into the realm of general ecological protection. Parliament's clear intention was to allow for federal intervention where the environment itself was at risk, whether or not the substances concerned posed a threat to human health and whether or not the aspect of the environment affected was one on which human life depended. Having specifically excluded both direct and indirect danger to human health as preconditions for the application of these provisions, Parliament cannot now say that they were enacted in order to guard against such dangers.

43 To the extent that La Forest J. suggests that this legislation is supportable as relating to health, therefore, we must respectfully disagree. We agree with him, however, that the protection of the environment is itself a legitimate criminal public purpose, analogous to those cited in the Margarine Reference, supra. We would not add to his lucid reasoning on this point, save to state explicitly that this purpose does not rely on any of the other traditional purposes of criminal law (health, security, public order, etc.). To the extent that Parliament wishes to deter environmental pollution specifically by punishing it with appropriate penal sanctions, it is free to do so, without having to show that these sanctions are ultimately aimed at achieving one of the "traditional" aims of criminal law. The protection of the environment is itself a legitimate basis for criminal legislation.

44 However, we still do not feel that the impugned provisions qualify as criminal law under s. 91(27). While they have a legitimate criminal purpose, they fail to meet the other half of the Maragarine Reference test. The structure of Part II of the Act indicates that they are not intended to prohibit environmental pollution, but simply to regulate it. As we will now explain in further detail, they are not, therefore, criminal law […].

(ii) Prohibitions Backed by Penalties

45 Ascertaining whether a particular statute is prohibitive or regulatory in nature is often more of an art than a science. […] Some guidelines have, however, emerged from previous jurisprudence.

46 The fact that a statute contains a prohibition and a penalty does not necessarily mean that statute is criminal in nature. Regulatory statutes commonly prohibit violations of their provisions or regulations promulgated under them and provide penal sanctions to be applied if violations do, in fact, occur. Any regulatory statute that lacked such prohibitions and penalties would be meaningless. However, as La Forest J. himself recognized […], the penalties that are provided in a regulatory context serve a "pragmatic" or "instrumental" purpose and do not transform the legislation into criminal law. […] In environmental law, as in competition law or income tax law, compliance cannot always be ensured by the usual regulatory enforcement techniques, such as periodic or unannounced inspections. Hence, in order to ensure that legal standards are being met, a strong deterrent, the threat of penal sanctions, is necessary. […]

47 […] [A] criminal law does not have to consist solely of blanket prohibitions. It may, as La Forest J. noted in RJR-MacDonald […], "validly contain exemptions for certain conduct without losing its status as criminal law". […] These exemptions may have the effect of establishing "regulatory" schemes which confer a measure of discretionary authority without changing the character of the law, as was the case in RJR-MacDonald.

48 Determining when a piece of legislation has crossed the line from criminal to regulatory involves, in our view, considering the nature and extent of the regulation it creates, as well as the context within which it purports to apply. A scheme which is fundamentally regulatory, for example, will not be saved by calling it an "exemption". As Professor Hogg suggests, supra, at p. 18-26, "the more elaborate [a] regulatory scheme, the more likely it is that the Court will classify the dispensation or exemption as being regulatory rather than criminal". At the same time, the subject matter of the impugned law may indicate the appropriate approach to take in characterizing the law as criminal or regulatory.

49 Having examined the legislation at issue in this case, we have no doubt that it is essentially regulatory in nature, and therefore outside the scope of s. 91(27). In order to have an "exemption", there must first be a prohibition in the legislation from which that exemption is derived. Thus, the Tobacco Products Control Act […] at issue in RJR-MacDonald, supra, contained broad prohibitions against the advertising and promotion of tobacco products in Canada. […].

51 In the legislation at issue in this appeal, on the other hand, no such prohibitions appear…

52 [Section 34] is not ancillary to existing prohibitions found elsewhere in the Act or to exemptions to such prohibitions. It is not itself prohibitory in nature. In fact, the only time the word "prohibition" appears in s. 34(1) is in s. 34(1)(l), which provides that the Governor in Council may, at his or her discretion, prohibit the manufacture, import, use or sale of a given substance. Clearly, this is not analogous to the broad general prohibitions found in the statutes cited above.

54 Moreover, as Professor Hogg notes […]:

> A criminal law ordinarily consists of a prohibition which is to be self-applied by the persons to whom it is addressed. There is not normally any intervention by an administrative agency or official prior to the application of the law. The law is "administered" by law enforcement officials and courts of criminal jurisdiction only in the sense that they can bring to bear the machinery of punishment after the prohibited conduct has occurred.

55 In this case, there is no offence until an administrative agency "intervenes". Sections 34 and 35 do not define an offence at all: which, if any, substances will be placed on the List of Toxic Substances, as well as the norms of conduct regarding these substances, are to be defined on an on-going basis by the Ministers of Health and the Environment. It would be an odd crime whose definition was made entirely dependent on the discretion of the Executive. This further suggests that the Act's true nature is regulatory, not criminal, and that the offences created by s. 113 are regulatory offences, not "true crimes": […]. Our colleague, La Forest J., would hold that the scheme of the impugned act is an effective means of avoiding unnecessarily broad prohibitions and carefully targeting specific toxic substances. The regulatory mechanism allows the schemes to be changed flexibly, as the need arises. Of course, simply because a scheme is effective and flexible does not mean it is intra vires the federal Parliament.

57 Moreover, this process is further complicated by the equivalency provisions in s. 34(6) of the Act. Under this provision, the Governor in Council may exempt a province from the application of regulations made under ss. 34 or 35 if that province already has equivalent regulations in force there. This would be a very unusual provision for a criminal law. Provinces do not have the jurisdiction to enact criminal legislation, nor can the federal government delegate such jurisdiction to them […]. Any environmental legislation enacted by the provinces must, therefore, be of a regulatory nature. Deferring to provincial regulatory schemes on the basis that they are "equivalent" to federal regulations made under s. 34(1) creates a strong presumption that the federal regulations are themselves also of a regulatory, not criminal, nature.

58 The appellant relies on this Court's decision in RJR-MacDonald, supra, arguing that the statutory regime in this case is analogous to that upheld (on division of powers grounds) in RJR-MacDonald. We believe this reliance is, with respect, misplaced. As noted above, the legislation at issue in RJR-MacDonald contained broad prohibitions, tempered by certain exemptions. The impugned provisions in this case, on the other hand, involve no such general prohibition. In our view, they can only be characterized as a broad delegation of regulatory authority to the Governor in Council. The aim of these provisions is not to prohibit toxic substances or any aspect of their use, but simply to control the manner in which these substances will be allowed to interact with the environment.

59 RJR-MacDonald, may be further distinguished, in our view. The Tobacco Products Control Act addressed a narrow field of activity: the advertising and promotion of tobacco products. The impugned provisions here deal with a much broader area of concern: the release of substances into the environment. This Court has unanimously held that the environment is a subject matter of shared jurisdiction, that is, that the Constitution does not assign it exclusively to either the provinces or Parliament: Oldman River, supra, at p. 63 […]. A decision by the framers of the Constitution not to give one level of government exclusive control over a subject matter should, in our opinion, act as a signal that the two levels of government are meant to operate in tandem with regard to that subject matter. One level should not be allowed to take over the field so as to completely dwarf the presence of the other. This does not mean that no regulation will be permissible, but wholesale regulatory authority of the type envisaged by the Act is, in our view, inconsistent with the shared nature of jurisdiction over the environment. As La Forest J. noted in his dissenting reasons in Crown Zellerbach, at p. 455, "environmental pollution alone [i.e. as a subject matter of legislative authority] is itself all-pervasive. It is a by-product of everything we do. In man's relationship with his environment, waste is unavoidable."

60 We agree completely with this statement. Almost everything we do involves "polluting" the environment in some way. The impugned provisions purport to grant regulatory authority over all aspects of any substance whose release into the environment "ha[s] or ... may have an immediate or long-term harmful effect on the environment" (s. 11(a)). One wonders just what, if any, role will be left for the provinces in dealing with environmental pollution if the federal government is given such total control over the release of these substances. Moreover, the countless spheres of human activity, both collective and individual, which could potentially fall under the ambit of the Act are apparent. Many of them fall within areas of jurisdiction granted to the provinces under s. 92. Granting Parliament the authority to regulate so completely the release of substances into the environment by determining whether or not they are "toxic" would not only inescapably preclude the possibility of shared environmental jurisdiction; it would also infringe severely on other heads of power assigned to the provinces. […]

61 For all of the above reasons, we are unable to uphold the impugned provisions of the Act under the federal criminal law power. That being said, we wish to add that none of this should be read as foredooming future attempts by Parliament to create an effective national -- or, indeed, international -- strategy for the protection of the environment. We agree with La Forest J. that achieving such a strategy is a public purpose of extreme importance and one of the major challenges of our time. There are, in this regard, many measures open to Parliament which will not offend the division of powers set out by the Constitution, notably the creation of environmental crimes. Nothing, in our view, prevents Parliament from outlawing certain kinds of behaviour on the basis that they are harmful to the environment. But such legislation must actually seek to outlaw this behaviour, not merely regulate it.

The judgment of La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory and McLachlin JJ. was delivered by 85 LA FOREST J. -- This Court has in recent years been increasingly called upon to consider the interplay between federal and provincial legislative powers as they relate to environmental protection. Whether viewed positively as strategies for maintaining a clean environment, or negatively as measures to combat the evils of pollution, there can be no doubt that these measures relate to a public purpose of superordinate importance, and one in which all levels of government and numerous organs of the international community have become increasingly engaged. In the opening passage of this Court's reasons in what is perhaps the leading case, Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 3, at pp. 16-17, the matter is succinctly put this way:

> The protection of the environment has become one of the major challenges of our time. To respond to this challenge, governments and international organizations have been engaged in the creation of a wide variety of legislative schemes and administrative structures.

86 The all-important duty of Parliament and the provincial legislatures to make full use of the legislative powers respectively assigned to them in protecting the environment has inevitably placed upon the courts the burden of progressively defining the extent to which these powers may be used to that end. In performing this task, it is incumbent on the courts to secure the basic balance between the two levels of government envisioned by the Constitution. However, in doing so, they must be mindful that the Constitution must be interpreted in a manner that is fully responsive to emerging realities and to the nature of the subject matter sought to be regulated. Given the pervasive and diffuse nature of the environment, this reality poses particular difficulties in this context.

87 This latest case in which this Court is required to define the nature of legislative powers over the environment is of major significance. The narrow issue raised is the extent to and manner in which the federal Parliament may control the amount of and conditions under which Chlorobiphenyls (PCBs) -- substances well known to pose great dangers to humans and the environment generally -- may enter into the environment. However, the attack on the federal power to secure this end is not really aimed at the specific provisions respecting PCBs. Rather, it puts into question the constitutional validity of its enabling statutory provisions. What is really at stake is whether Part II ("Toxic Substances") of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. 16 (4th Supp.), which empowers the federal Ministers of Health and of the Environment to determine what substances are toxic and to prohibit the introduction of such substances into the environment except in accordance with specified terms and conditions, falls within the constitutional power of Parliament.

Analysis

Introduction

112 In considering how the question of the constitutional validity of a legislative enactment relating to the environment should be approached, this Court in Oldman River, supra, made it clear that the environment is not, as such, a subject matter of legislation under the Constitution Act, 1867. As it was put there, "the Constitution Act, 1867 has not assigned the matter of 'environment' sui generis to either the provinces or Parliament" (p. 63). Rather, it is a diffuse subject that cuts across many different areas of constitutional responsibility, some federal, some provincial (pp. 63-64). Thus Parliament or a provincial legislature can, in advancing the scheme or purpose of a statute, enact provisions minimizing or preventing the detrimental impact that statute may have on the environment, prohibit pollution, and the like. In assessing the constitutional validity of a provision relating to the environment, therefore, what must first be done is to look at the catalogue of legislative powers listed in the Constitution Act, 1867 to see if the provision falls within one or more of the powers assigned to the body (whether Parliament or a provincial legislature) that enacted the legislation (ibid. at p. 65). If the provision in essence, in pith and substance, falls within the parameters of any such power, then it is constitutionally valid.

The Criminal Law Power

118 Section 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 confers the exclusive power to legislate in relation to criminal law on Parliament. The nature and ambit of this power has recently been the subject of a detailed analytical and historical examination in RJR-MacDonald, supra, where it was again described (p. 240), as it has for many years, as being "plenary in nature" (emphasis added). I shall not attempt to repeat the analysis so recently set forth at length by this Court, or attempt to refer extensively to all of the many authorities there cited, but will confine myself to underlining the findings in that case that are most salient to the issues raised here. […]

119 What appears from the analysis in RJR-MacDonald is that as early as 1903, the Privy Council, […] had made it clear that the power conferred on Parliament by s. 91(27) is "the criminal law in its widest sense" (emphasis added). […] This approach has been consistently followed ever since and, as RJR-MacDonald relates, it has been applied by the courts in a wide variety of settings. Accordingly, it is entirely within the discretion of Parliament to determine what evil it wishes by penal prohibition to suppress and what threatened interest it thereby wishes to safeguard, to adopt the terminology of Rand J. in the Margarine Reference, supra, at p. 49, cited infra.

121 The Charter apart, only one qualification has been attached to Parliament's plenary power over criminal law. The power cannot be employed colourably. Like other legislative powers, it cannot, as Estey J. put it in Scowby v. Glendinning, 1986 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 226, at p. 237, "permit Parliament, simply by legislating in the proper form, to colourably invade areas of exclusively provincial legislative competence". To determine whether such an attempt is being made, it is, of course, appropriate to enquire into Parliament's purpose in enacting the legislation. As Estey J. noted in Scowby, at p. 237, since the Margarine Reference, it has been "accepted that some legitimate public purpose must underlie the prohibition". […]

122 […] [T]he listed purposes by no means exhaust the purposes that may legitimately support valid criminal legislation. […] [T]his is, of course, consistent with the view, most recently reiterated in RJR-MacDonald, at pp. 259-61, that criminal law is not frozen in time.

127 What the foregoing underlines is what I referred to at the outset, that the protection of the environment is a major challenge of our time. It is an international problem, one that requires action by governments at all levels. And, as is stated in the preamble to the Act under review, "Canada must be able to fulfil its international obligations in respect of the environment". I am confident that Canada can fulfil its international obligations, in so far as the toxic substances sought to be prohibited from entering into the environment under the Act are concerned, by use of the criminal law power. The purpose of the criminal law is to underline and protect our fundamental values. While many environmental issues could be criminally sanctioned in terms of protection of human life or health, I cannot accept that the criminal law is limited to that because "certain forms and degrees of environmental pollution can directly or indirectly, sooner or later, seriously harm or endanger human life and human health", as the paper approvingly cited by Gonthier J. in Ontario v. Canadian Pacific, supra, observes. But the stage at which this may be discovered is not easy to discern, and I agree with that paper that the stewardship of the environment is a fundamental value of our society and that Parliament may use its criminal law power to underline that value. The criminal law must be able to keep pace with and protect our emerging values.

123 During the argument in the present case, however, one sensed, at times, a tendency, even by the appellant and the supporting interveners, to seek justification solely for the purpose of the protection of health specifically identified by Rand J. Now I have no doubt that that purpose obviously will support a considerable measure of environmental legislation, as perhaps also the ground of security. But I entertain no doubt that the protection of a clean environment is a public purpose within Rand J.'s formulation in the Margarine Reference, cited supra, sufficient to support a criminal prohibition. It is surely an "interest threatened" which Parliament can legitimately "safeguard", or to put it another way, pollution is an "evil" that Parliament can legitimately seek to suppress. Indeed, as I indicated at the outset of these reasons, it is a public purpose of superordinate importance; it constitutes one of the major challenges of our time. It would be surprising indeed if Parliament could not exercise its plenary power over criminal law to protect this interest and to suppress the evils associated with it by appropriate penal prohibitions.

128 In saying that Parliament may use its criminal law power in the interest of protecting the environment or preventing pollution, there again appears to have been confusion during the argument between the approach to the national concern doctrine and the criminal law power. The national concern doctrine operates by assigning full power to regulate an area to Parliament. Criminal law does not work that way. Rather it seeks by discrete prohibitions to prevent evils falling within a broad purpose, such as, for example, the protection of health. In the criminal law area, reference to such broad policy objectives is simply a means of ensuring that the prohibition is legitimately aimed at some public evil Parliament wishes to suppress and so is not a colourable attempt to deal with a matter falling exclusively within an area of provincial legislative jurisdiction.

129 The legitimate use of the criminal law I have just described in no way constitutes an encroachment on provincial legislative power, though it may affect matters falling within the latter's ambit. […]

130 I conclude that Parliament may validly enact prohibitions under its criminal law power against specific acts for the purpose of preventing pollution or, to put it in other terms, causing the entry into the environment of certain toxic substances. […]

131 Though I shall deal with this issue in more detail once I come to consider the legislation, it is well at this point to recall that the use of the federal criminal law power in no way precludes the provinces from exercising their extensive powers under s. 92 to regulate and control the pollution of the environment either independently or to supplement federal action. The situation is really no different from the situation regarding the protection of health where Parliament has for long exercised extensive control over such matters as food and drugs by prohibitions grounded in the criminal law power. This has not prevented the provinces from extensively regulating and prohibiting many activities relating to health. The two levels of government frequently work together to meet common concerns. […]

The Provisions Respecting Toxic Substances

133 The respondent, the mis en cause and their supporting interveners primarily attack ss. 34 and 35 of the Act as constituting an infringement on provincial regulatory powers conferred by the Constitution. This they do by submitting that the power to regulate a substance is so broad as to encroach upon provincial legislative jurisdiction. That is because of what they call the broad "definition" given to toxic substances under s. 11 […]

134 I cannot agree with this submission. As I see it, the argument focusses too narrowly on a specific provision of the Act and for that matter only on certain aspects of it, and then applies that provision in a manner that I do not think is warranted by a consideration of the provisions of the Act as a whole and in light of its background and purpose. I shall deal with the latter first. […]

135 I turn then to the background and purpose of the provisions under review. Part II does not deal with the protection of the environment generally. It deals simply with the control of toxic substances that may be released into the environment under certain restricted circumstances, and does so through a series of prohibitions to which penal sanctions are attached. […]

146 [A]s I see it, the broad purpose and effect of Part II is to provide a procedure for assessing whether out of the many substances that may conceivably fall within the ambit of s. 11, some should be added to the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I and, when an order to this effect is made, whether to prohibit the use of the substance so added in the manner provided in the regulations made under s. 34(1) subject to a penalty. These listed substances, toxic in the ordinary sense, are those whose use in a manner contrary to the regulations the Act ultimately prohibits. This is a limited prohibition applicable to a restricted number of substances. The prohibition is enforced by a penal sanction and is undergirded by a valid criminal objective, and so is valid criminal legislation.

147 This, in my mind, is consistent with the terms of the statute, its purpose, and indeed common sense. It is precisely what one would expect of an environmental statute -- a procedure to weed out from the vast number of substances potentially harmful to the environment or human life those only that pose significant risks of that type of harm. Specific targeting of toxic substances based on individual assessment avoids resort to unnecessarily broad prohibitions and their impact on the exercise of provincial powers. Having regard to the particular nature and requirements of effective environmental protection legislation, I do not share my colleagues' concern that the prohibition originates in a regulation, the breach of which gives rise to criminal sanction. The careful targeting of toxic substances is borne out by practice.

149 I turn now to a more detailed examination of the provisions of the Act impugned in the present case, i.e. ss. 34 and 35. I mentioned earlier that the testing phase provided for under Part II ends with s. 32. Up to that point, Part II deals with the testing of substances that may be toxic when released into the environment as described in s. 11. The remainder of Part II, beginning with s. 33, however, is no longer addressed at substances that may be toxic in that broad sense. Rather it is more narrowly addressed at substances specifically listed in the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I of the Act. In particular, s. 34 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations setting forth the restrictions imposed on those using or dealing with such substances. Failure to comply with any such restriction constitutes an offence and is punishable on summary conviction by a fine not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars or a term of imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both; or, on indictment, by a fine not exceeding one million dollars or a term of imprisonment not exceeding three years, or both (s. 113(f), (o) and (p)).

150 Without attempting to regurgitate the whole of s. 34, I shall simply give some flavour of the nature of the prohibitions created by the regulations made thereunder. Generally, s. 34 includes regulations providing for or imposing requirements respecting the quantity or concentration of a substance listed in Schedule I that may be released into the environment either alone or in combination with others from any > source, the places where such substances may be released, the manufacturing or processing activities in the course of which the substance may be released, the manner and conditions of release, and so on. In short, s. 34 precisely defines situations where the use of a substance in the List of Toxic Substances in Schedule I is prohibited, and these prohibitions are made subject to penal consequences. This is similar to the techniques Parliament has employed in providing for and imposing highly detailed requirements and standards in relation to food and drugs, which control their import, sale, manufacturing, labelling, packaging, processing and storing .... These techniques have, in a number of cases including several in this Court, been upheld as valid criminal law […].

> 151 What Parliament is doing in s. 34 is making provision for carefully tailoring the prohibited action to specified substances used or dealt with in specific circumstances. This type of tailoring is obviously necessary in defining the scope of a criminal prohibition, and is, of course, within Parliament's power. As Laskin C.J. noted in Morgentaler v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1976] 1 SCR 616, at p. 627: "I need cite no authority for the proposition that Parliament may determine what is not criminal as well as what is". […].
> 152 As Stevenson J. notes [in R. v. Furtney, 1991 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1991] 3 SCR 89], this kind of legislation does not constitute an invasion of provincial regulatory power; […]. This is true as well in the case of detailed legislation such as that in question here […]. As noted earlier, we are dealing with prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions, so that we are really not concerned with whether these may incidentally affect property and civil rights but whether the prohibitions are directed at a public evil. […]
> 153 In truth, there is a broad area of concurrency between federal and provincial powers in areas subjected to criminal prohibitions, and the courts have been alert to the need to permit adequate breathing room for the exercise of jurisdiction by both levels of government. […] This type of approach is essential in dealing with amorphous subjects like health and the environment. […]
> 154 In Crown Zellerbach, I expressed concern with the possibility of allocating legislative power respecting environmental pollution exclusively to Parliament. I would be equally concerned with an interpretation of the Constitution that effectively allocated to the provinces, under general powers such as property and civil rights, control over the environment in a manner that prevented Parliament from exercising the leadership role expected of it by the international community and its role in protecting the basic values of Canadians regarding the environment through the instrumentality of the criminal law power. Great sensitivity is required in this area since, as Professor Lederman has rightly observed, environmental pollution "is no limited subject or theme, [it] is a sweeping subject or theme virtually all-pervasive in its legislative implications" […].
> 155 Turning then to s. 35, I mentioned that it is ancillary to s. 34. It deals with emergency situations. The provision, it seems to me, indicates even more clearly a criminal purpose, and throws further light on the intention of s. 34 and of the Act generally. It can only be brought into play when the Ministers believe a substance is not specified in the List in Schedule I or is listed but is not subjected to control under s. 34. In such a case, they may make an interim order in respect of the substance if they believe "immediate action is required to deal with a significant danger to the environment or to human life or health".
> 156 In sum, then, I am of the view that Part II of the Act, properly construed, simply provides a means to assess substances with a view to determining whether the substances are sufficiently toxic to be added to Schedule I of the Act (which contains a list of dangerous substances carried over from pre-existing legislation), and provides by regulations under s. 34 the terms and conditions under which they can be used, with provisions under s. 35 for by-passing the ordinary provisions for testing and regulation under Part II in cases where immediate action is required.

Jean Leclair writes approvingly of the decision in Hydro-Québec, arguing that federal jurisdiction over the environment is important to the creation of Canadian national identity: see "The Supreme Court, the Environment, and the Construction of National Identity" 1998 4 Rev Const Stud 372. For a much more critical treatment of the decision, see David M Beatty, "Polluting the Law to Protect the Environment" (1998) 9:2 Const Forum Const 55. Note that, in the course of his majority reasons, Justice La Forest pauses to distinguish the justification of an exercise of federal legislative authority pursuant to the criminal law power from the invocation of the national concern doctrine, which is part of the federal power over peace, order, and good government (POGG). What is the difference in how these two bases for Parliament's authority operate?

The vast scope of the federal criminal law power is clear from the foregoing cases. This is not to say that the Court has invariably accepted federal assertions that legislation was properly enacted pursuant to this power. See, for example, Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, 1979 CanLII 190 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 914 (in which the Court found that federal regulations governing the marketing of "light beer" were not valid exercises of the criminal law power) and R. v. Boggs, 1981 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 49 (invalidating federal prohibitions on driving with a suspended or cancelled licence, even when the suspension involves purely provincial issues like failure to pay insurance premiums or discharge civil judgments). However, the weight of the caselaw demonstrates the notable breadth of the criminal law power: the formal elements of the definition are approached liberally and the valid criminal law purposes are broad and permissively applied.

In more recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, however, some debate has emerged within the Court as to whether a more circumscribed approach to the purpose element would be appropriate, given concerns about the power's capacity to intervene into important areas of provincial jurisdiction.

One can see this debate at work in the following case, the Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, which dealt with the constitutionality of federal legislation governing assisted human reproductive technologies. The two principal sets of readings, each attracting the agreement of four members of the Court, take different views of how permissively or exactingly the exercise of s 91(27) should be reviewed. Chief Justice McLachlin adopted an expansive position to the purpose element that led to her upholding the legislation, while Justices LeBel and Deschamps assumed a stricter posture that would have had them invalidate significant parts of the scheme. Justice Cromwell's deciding vote endorsed neither approach entirely, upholding certain of the provisions, but striking down many.

As you read this decision pay particular attention to what each of the two principal judgments demands of Parliament by way of an evidentiary or reasoned foundation for the exercise of the criminal law power. Recall, also, Justice Rand's description, in the Margarine Reference, of a criminal law public purpose being directed at "some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public." What weight does each opinion lay on this language?

2.4 Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act

The Act of Parliament at issue in this case involved the prohibition and regulation of various activities related to human reproduction. To gain a sense of the legislation, consider the principles set out in s 2 of the Act:

> 2. [Declaration] The Parliament of Canada recognizes and declares that

(a) the health and well-being of children born through the application of assisted human reproductive technologies must be given priority in all decisions respecting their use;

(b) the benefits of assisted human reproductive technologies and related research for individuals, for families and for society in general can be most effectively secured by taking appropriate measures for the protection and promotion of human health, safety, dignity and rights in the use of these technologies and in related research;

(c) while all persons are affected by these technologies, women more than men are directly and significantly affected by their application and the health and well-being of women must be protected in the application of these technologies;

(d) the principle of free and informed consent must be promoted and applied as a fundamental condition of the use of human reproductive technologies;

(e) persons who seek to undergo assisted reproduction procedures must not be discriminated against, including on the basis of their sexual orientation or marital status;

(f) trade in the reproductive capabilities of women and men and the exploitation of children, women and men for commercial ends raise health and ethical concerns that justify their prohibition; and

(g) human individuality and diversity, and the integrity of the human genome, must be preserved and protected.

Important to the judgment below is that the legislation included both a set of "prohibited activities" and a range of "controlled activities." The scheme is summarized at paragraphs 11-13 of Chief Justice McLachlin's judgment, below. As you will read, the Court unanimously held that the absolute prohibitions were valid exercises of the federal criminal law power but differed on the rest.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

I. Introduction

[1] Every generation faces unique moral issues. And historically, every generation has turned to the criminal law to address them. Among the most important moral issues faced by this generation are questions arising from technologically assisted reproduction — the artificial creation of human life. Parliament has passed a law dealing with these issues under its criminal law power. The question on appeal is whether this law represents a proper exercise of Parliament's criminal law power. I conclude that it does.

[2] Since time immemorial, human beings have been conceived naturally. Human beings have sought to enhance this process, to be sure; fertility rites, prayers and various medical and quasi-medical prescriptives to enhance fertility are part of human history. Human beings have also sought to constrain the process, through rules governing sexual conduct and marriage. These rules are deeply embedded in morality, which speaks to our conception of how human beings should behave for their own good and the greater good of society. Through morality, often abetted by the criminal law, society has traditionally found collective answers to reproductive issues. Yet, until recently, the fundamental processes by which new human beings were conceived remained largely beyond technological manipulation.

[3] This changed in the latter part of the 20th century, with the development of technology that allowed ova and sperm to be captured and united to form a zygote outside the human body. Refining the process even further, scientists found ways to disassemble and recombine genetic material within the ovum. Implantation techniques allowed couples and surrogate mothers to carry pregnancies created in a petri dish to term. At the far end of the spectrum lay the possibility of combining animal and human forms or reproducing an individual through cloning.

[4] These new techniques raise important moral, religious and juridical questions. The new questions do not fit neatly within the traditional legal frameworks that have developed in a world of natural conception. These challenges have opened a dialogue between ethicists, religious leaders and the public. Different people have taken different moral views on the issues. Fears have been expressed as to the possibility that some may abuse the new techniques in ways that might damage individuals — both existing and yet to be conceived — and ultimately society. Traditional criminal law imposed no obvious restraints and offered no clear answers to these questions.

[5] It was against this background that Parliament decided to act. It did not act precipitously. Rather, it established the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies (the "Baird Commission") to study the matter and make recommendations. […]

[6] Between 1993 and 1995, the federal government consulted with the provinces, the territories and independent groups, including researchers, men and women dealing with infertility problems, persons with disabilities, religious denominations and physicians. It also asked a group of experts in philosophy, sociology, anthropology, medicine and law for their advice on the issue of human embryo research. The result of these consultations was the ultimate passage of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, S.C. 2004, c. 2 (also referred to as the "Act"), enacted in March 2004, as an exercise of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[10] My colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ. conclude that the impugned sections of the Act, in pith and substance, constitute an attempt to regulate hospitals and medical research, and thus are ultra vires the federal Parliament. I respectfully disagree. The prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7 are conceded to be valid criminal legislation. In my view, the remaining prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 are also valid criminal law. Although some of these prohibitions impact on the regulation of medical research and practice, all matters within provincial jurisdiction, the impact is incidental to the legislation's dominant criminal law purpose and limited to those ends. Finally, while not criminal law in pith and substance, the administrative, organizational, and enforcement provisions in ss. 14 to 68 are integrated into this prohibition regime, and hence they are valid under the ancillary powers doctrine. I would therefore allow the appeal.

II. The Legislation

[11] The prohibitions are of two types. Sections 5 to 9 are cast in absolute terms. In those sections, the Act prohibits:

(a) human cloning (s. 5(1)(a)) and the use, manipulation and transplantation of reproductive material of a non-human life form, chimera or hybrid, in order to create a human being (s. 5(1)(g) to (j));

(b) the creation of an in vitro embryo for any purpose other than creating a human being or improving or providing instruction in assisted reproduction procedures (s. 5(1)(b));

(c) the creation of an embryo from a cell taken from an embryo or foetus (s. 5(1)(c)) or the maintenance of such an embryo outside of the body after the fourteenth day of its development (s. 5(1)(d));

(d) the determination of an embryo's sex for non-medical reasons (s. 5(1)(e));

(e) the alteration of the genome of an in vitro embryo or cell of a human being such that the alteration is capable of being transmitted to descendants (s. 5(1)(f));

(f) the commercialization of the reproductive functions of women and men, particularly the payment of consideration to surrogate mothers (s. 6) and the purchase and sale of in vitro embryos or the purchase of human reproductive material (s. 7);

(g) any use of in vitro embryos unless the donor has given written consent, as well as the use and posthumous removal of human reproductive material unless the donor has given written consent, when the purpose of the use or removal is the creation of an embryo (s. 8); and

(h) the removal or use of sperm or ova from a donor under 18 years of age, except for the purpose of preserving the sperm or ova or for the purpose of creating a human being where it is reasonable to believe that the human being will be raised by the donor (s. 9).

[12] Other prohibitions, referred to in the Act as "controlled activities", are found in ss. 10 to 13. These sections prohibit various activities, unless they are carried out in accordance with regulations made under the Act, under licence, and in licensed premises. The activities in question involve:

(a) altering, manipulating, treating, obtaining, storing, transferring, destroying, importing and exporting human reproductive material or in vitro embryos for certain purposes (s. 10);

(b) combining any part of the human genome with any part of the genome of another species (s. 11);

(c) reimbursing a donor for an expenditure incurred in the course of donating sperm or ova and a surrogate mother for an expenditure incurred by her in relation to her surrogacy (s. 12);

(d) undertaking a controlled activity in an unlicensed facility (s. 13).

[13] The prohibition regime is followed by provisions that do not in themselves purport to create criminal offences, but are directed to administering and enforcing the primary criminal law prohibitions. These include a mechanism for gathering and storing information related to assisted reproduction procedures, the establishment of an administrative agency (the Assisted Human Reproduction Agency of Canada ("Agency")), the power of the Governor in Council to make regulations respecting the Act (s. 65), and the power of the Governor in Council to exempt the operation of certain provisions if there are equivalent provincial laws in force that cover the field (s. 68).

IV. Analysis

The Validity of the Legislative Scheme as a Whole

[16] Since the Attorney General of Quebec is challenging individual provisions of the federal scheme, this Court must examine the whole scheme and the impugned provisions separately (General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at p. 666). Ordinarily, this Court would begin by examining the impugned provisions in order to determine if and to what extent they intrude on the provincial sphere of competence […]

[17] However, in the case at bar it is necessary to examine the whole scheme first before we can make sense of the challenged provisions. […] In this case, the Attorney General of Quebec is challenging the bulk of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act. While it concedes that ss. 5 to 7 of the Act are valid, it challenges almost all the remaining operative provisions. Under these circumstances, it is impossible to meaningfully consider the provisions at issue without first considering the nature of the whole scheme.

[18] Therefore, the first question is whether the matter of the statutory scheme, viewed as a whole, is a valid exercise of federal power. The second question is whether its individual provisions are also valid. If the scheme as a whole is valid, but some of its provisions invalid, the invalid provisions are severed, leaving the remaining provisions intact. […]

(1) Characterizing the Legislative Scheme

[21] The issue is as follows: Is the Assisted Human Reproduction Act properly characterized as legislation to curtail practices that may contravene morality, create public health evils or put the security of individuals at risk, as the Attorney General of Canada contends? Or should it be characterized as legislation to promote positive medical practices associated with assisted reproduction, as the Attorney General of Quebec contends? In pith and substance, what is this legislation about? Controlling and curtailing the negative impacts associated with artificial human reproduction? Or establishing salutary rules to govern the practice of medicine and research in this emerging field?

[24] The text of the Act suggests that its dominant purpose is to prohibit inappropriate practices, rather than to promote beneficial ones. It is true that the Act establishes a scheme to control assisted reproduction on a national level, and this initiative necessarily touches on provincial jurisdiction over medical research and practice. However, the dominant thrust of the Act is prohibitory, and the aspects that concern the provision of health services do not rise to the level of pith and substance. As s. 2 of the Act explains, the purpose of the Act is to safeguard against practices that may offend fundamental values and rights and harm human health, safety and dignity. The emphasis is on preventing practices that offend these values and produce this harm.

[26] The Attorney General of Quebec concedes that the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 7 of the Act are valid criminal law. In my view, the prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 advance the same criminal law purpose. Sections 8 to 13, viewed in context, are not aimed at promoting the beneficial aspects of assisted reproduction. While they distinguish the beneficial from the reprehensible, it is only for the purpose of carving out the latter. In this sense, the prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13 all advance a common purpose, but do so in a manner tailored to the conduct that they address. Conduct that is always reprehensible is prohibited absolutely (ss. 5 to 9). Conduct that is reprehensible in particular situations is prohibited selectively; thus, ss. 10 to 13 prohibit only the harmful aspects of the conduct at issue. In other words, they prohibit conduct, subject to exceptions for practices that Parliament does not consider to be harmful. These prohibitions do not prevent the provinces from enacting legislation promoting beneficial practices in the field of assisted reproduction. Subject to the Act's prohibitions, the provinces are free to regulate these practices. The scheme of the Act is to carve out from the broader field of assisted reproduction conduct that Parliament considers criminal. These prohibitions give the Act its content and define its purpose.

[27] In support of the Attorney General of Quebec's position that the Act should be characterized as health legislation, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. argue that the Act has a two-fold purpose: (1) the prohibition of reprehensible practices; and (2) the promotion of beneficial practices. Criminal law, they argue, is concerned with prohibiting undesirable conduct, and cannot extend to promoting the beneficial aspects of assisted reproduction. In their view, Parliament's desire to promote beneficial practices proves that the Act is intended to create a national scheme for the regulation of assisted reproductive technologies.

[31] Turning to the effects of the Act, this legislation clearly has an impact on the regulation of medical research and practice, and hospital administration. Researchers, practitioners and hospitals will be subject to both the Act and the regulations it contemplates.

[32] However, the doctrine of pith and substance permits either level of government to enact laws that have "substantial impact on matters outside its jurisdiction": P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 15-9. The issue in such cases is to determine the dominant effect of the law. Viewed as a whole, the dominant effect of the Act is to prohibit a number of practices which Parliament considers immoral and/or which it considers a risk to health and security, not to promote the positive aspects of assisted reproduction. The dominant effect of the prohibitory and administrative provisions is to create a regime that will prevent or punish practices that may offend moral values, give rise to serious public health problems, and threaten the security of donors, donees, and persons not yet born.

[33] In sum, while the Act will have beneficial effects — one hopes all criminal laws will have beneficial effects — and while some of its effects may impact on provincial matters, neither its dominant purpose nor its dominant effect is to set up a regime to regulate and promote the benefits of artificial reproduction in hospitals and laboratories.

[34] I conclude that the pith and substance of the Act is properly characterized as the prohibition of negative practices associated with assisted reproduction.

(2) Does the Matter of the Act Come Within Section 91(27)?

[35] Having characterized the matter to which the Act relates, the next question is whether it comes within the scope of the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. In order to answer this question, we must consider whether the matter satisfies the three requirements of valid criminal law: (1) a prohibition; (2) backed by a penalty; (3) with a criminal law purpose: Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783 ("Firearms Reference"), at para. 27.

[38] In my view, the requirement that a criminal law contain a prohibition prevents Parliament from undermining the provincial competence in health. The federal criminal law power may only be used to prohibit conduct, and may not be employed to promote beneficial medical practices. Federal laws (such as the one in this case) may involve large carve-outs for practices that Parliament does not wish to prohibit. However, the use of a carve-out only means that a particular practice is not prohibited, not that the practice is positively allowed by the federal law. This has important implications for the doctrine of federal paramountcy. If a province enacted stricter regulations than the federal government, there would be no conflict in operation between the two sets of provisions since it would be possible to comply with both. Further, there would be no frustrations of the federal legislative purpose since federal criminal laws are only intended to prohibit practices. A stricter provincial scheme would complement the federal criminal law. […] There may be a conflict between a criminal law and a less strict provincial scheme. However, in such a case, Parliament's stricter scheme would be acting as a prohibition. In this way, the prohibition requirement for criminal laws acts as a major limitation on the effect of s. 91(27).

(3) Does the Act Serve a Valid Criminal Law Purpose?

[39] Having determined that the Act imposes prohibitions backed by penalties, it remains to be determined whether it does so in the service of a criminal law objective. The Attorney General of Canada asserts that the Act serves broad criminal law purposes centred around morality, health, and security. The Attorney General of Quebec suggests that the real purpose of the law is not criminal, but regulatory — namely, to establish a system to regulate assisted reproduction. In turn, it contends that such a scheme is provincial turf.

[43] [O]n the one hand, the jurisprudence properly recognizes that confining the criminal law power to precise categories is impossible. The criminal law must be able to respond to new and emerging matters of public concern that go to the health and security of Canadians and the fundamental values that underpin Canadian society. A crabbed, categorical approach to valid criminal law purposes is thus inappropriate. On the other hand, a limitless definition, combined with the doctrine of paramountcy, has the potential to upset the constitutional balance of federal-provincial powers. Both extremes must be rejected. To constitute a valid criminal law purpose, a law's purpose must address a public concern relating to peace, order, security, morality, health, or some similar purpose. At the same time, extensions that have the potential to undermine the constitutional division of powers should be rejected.

[44] Whether a federal law falls within Parliament's criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867, is a question of which level of government has jurisdiction to enact this law. This question relates to the powers of one level of government vis-à-vis the other, and it is resolved by determining the law's pith and substance. The degree to which the Act may impact on individual liberties is not relevant to this inquiry. […]

[45] It follows that this case does not require us to balance the impact of the Act on liberty against the importance of Parliament's legislative objective. The only question is whether the Act comes within the scope of s. 91(27). In this respect, I differ from my colleagues LeBel and Deschamps JJ., who argue that there is insufficient societal consensus to justify the restrictions that the Act imposes on individual liberties. With respect, the language of justification has no place in the pith and substance analysis.

[46] Criminal law objectives, such as peace, order, security, morality, and health do not occupy separate watertight compartments. The question in each case is whether the matter of the legislation at issue relates to one or more of the recognized criminal law purposes, or a similar objective. Criminal laws will often engage more than one objective, and the objectives may overlap with each other.

[48] I turn now to consider the scope of the criminal law purposes that Parliament has identified. I conclude that upholding morality is the principal criminal law object of the Act. What is at stake is not merely two competing health schemes, but Parliament's power to enact general norms for the whole of Canada to meet the pressing moral concerns raised by the techniques of assisted reproduction. The objects of prohibiting public health evils and promoting security play supporting roles with respect to some provisions. Taken together, these objects confirm that the Act serves valid criminal law purposes. In reaching this conclusion, moreover, I do not intend to broaden the scope of the criminal law power, but rather apply this Court's jurisprudence.

(a) Morality

[50] Criminal law may target conduct that Parliament reasonably apprehends as a threat to our central moral precepts: Malmo-Levine, at para. 78. Moral disapprobation is itself sufficient to ground criminal law when it addresses issues that are integral to society. Different people hold different views about issues such as the artificial creation of human life. However, under federalism analysis, the focus is on the importance of the moral issue, not whether there is societal consensus on how it should be resolved. Parliament need only have a reasonable basis to expect that its legislation will address a moral concern of fundamental importance, even if hard evidence is unavailable on some points because "the jury is still out": Malmo-Levine, at para. 78. Whether the law violates the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees of individual liberty is another issue.

(b) Health

[52] Health is a jurisdiction shared by both the provinces and the federal government. In order to preserve the balance of powers, Parliament's ability to pass criminal laws on the basis of health must be circumscribed. To this end, criminal laws for the protection of health must address a "legitimate public health evil": RJR-MacDonald, at para. 32; see also Schneider v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 112, at p. 142.

[53] It has proven difficult to articulate a precise definition of a legitimate public health evil. It has been held that the federal criminal law power encompasses the regulation or prohibition of threats as diverse as tobacco (RJR-MacDonald); dangerous and adulterated food and drug products (Wetmore); illicit drugs (Malmo-Levine); gun control (Firearms Reference); and environmental degradation (Hydro-Québec).

[54] Behind the diversity in the cases that have upheld criminal laws on the basis of public health evils lie three constant features. In each of these cases, the criminal law was grounded in (1) human conduct (2) that has an injurious or undesirable effect (3) on the health of members of the public.

[56] No constitutional threshold level of harm, as such, constrains Parliament's ability to target conduct causing these evils. […] This said, the need to establish a reasonable apprehension of harm means that conduct with little or no threat of harm is unlikely to qualify as a "public health evil": Malmo-Levine, at para. 212, per Arbour J., dissenting, but not on this point.

[57] […] [P]rovided it is not a colourable intrusion upon provincial jurisdiction (i.e. one not supported by a valid criminal law purpose), Parliament is entitled to use the criminal law power to safeguard the public from conduct that may have an injurious or undesirable effect on the health of members of the public, notwithstanding the provinces' general right to regulate the medical profession. Health is subject to overlapping federal and provincial jurisdiction, and the provinces' power to legislate in this field does not exclude Parliament's authority to target conduct that constitutes a public health evil: RJR-MacDonald, at para. 32.

[64] I conclude that the legislative scheme is not directed toward the promotion of positive health measures, but rather addresses legitimate criminal law objects. As discussed above, the other two elements of criminal law, prohibition and penalty, are established on the face of the Act. I therefore conclude that the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, viewed as a whole, is valid criminal legislation.

[65] It may be appropriate at this point to address the arguments relied on by LeBel and Deschamps JJ. in support of their view that the criminal law must be circumscribed to prevent trenching on provincial powers to regulate health.

[Chief Justice McLachlin responds to various of LeBel and Deschamps JJ's arguments, including by making the following comments on the role of the courts in reviewing the use of the criminal law power:]

[76] As I explained earlier, I do not share the view that the Act can be characterized as legislation in relation to the positive aspects of assisted reproduction. However, my colleagues' argument on this point raises a more fundamental issue. Their reasoning, with respect, substitutes a judicial view of what is good and what is bad for the wisdom of Parliament. Similar arguments have been rejected in other contexts. In Malmo-Levine, for example, it was argued that use of marijuana benefits many Canadians and not just those in medical need. My colleagues break new ground in enlarging the judiciary's role in assessing valid criminal law objectives. It is ground on which I respectfully decline to tread.

Do the Prohibitions in Sections 8 to 13 of the Act Constitute Valid Criminal Law?

[78] The federalism analysis does not end merely because it has been determined that a law, viewed as a whole, is valid criminal legislation. Even if a law is in pith and substance criminal legislation, it may nevertheless contain provisions which are neither valid criminal prohibitions, nor ancillary to valid criminal prohibitions. An invalid legislative provision is not rendered valid merely because it is included in a legislative scheme that, viewed globally, is valid: General Motors. In each case, the question is whether the provision, considered in the context of the larger scheme of the Act, is valid criminal legislation, in terms of prohibition, penalty and criminal law purpose.

[156] I conclude that the impugned sections of the Act are valid. The prohibitions in ss. 8 to 13 fall within the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The remaining sections are ancillary to this criminal law scheme.

English version of the reasons of LeBel, Deschamps, Abella and Rothstein JJ. delivered by [157] LEBEL AND DESCHAMPS JJ. — In 2001, Health Canada estimated that every 100th baby in the industrialized world was being conceived through the application of some kind of assisted human reproduction technology (Proposals for Legislation Governing Assisted Human Reproduction: An Overview (May 2001)). The popularity of assisted human reproduction was bound to increase, as it corresponded to a need. The same department reported in 2009 that one in eight Canadian couples experienced problems related to infertility.

This appeal does not concern the appropriateness or wisdom of the decision to regulate assisted human reproduction, or even the validity of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, S.C. 2004, c. 2 ("AHR Act"), as a whole. Rather, the dispute relates to the connection between certain provisions of the AHR Act and the federal criminal law power. The Attorney General of Canada is appealing as of right from an opinion of the Quebec Court of Appeal on a reference under the Court of Appeal Reference Act, R.S.Q., c. R-23. The following constitutional question was stated:

> Do ss. 8 to 19, 40 to 53, 60, 61 and 68 of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, S.C. 2004, c. 2, exceed, in whole or in part, the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada under the Constitution Act, 1867?

[158] For the reasons that follow, we would answer this question in the affirmative, except to the extent that the offences provided for in ss. 60 and 61 relate to provisions that are not in dispute. The provisions of the AHR Act concerning controlled activities, namely those involving assistance for human reproduction and related research activities, do not fall under the criminal law power, but belong to the jurisdiction of the provinces over hospitals, civil rights and local matters. We would therefore dismiss the appeal.

VII. Analysis of the Impugned Provisions

A. Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions

Purpose of the Provisions

[202] The words of the statute itself can of course be of assistance in the identification of the purpose of impugned provisions. However, the context of the enactment of the statute often reveals as much as, if not more than, the words used. […] We must therefore go back to the Baird Commission's studies and the extensive work that followed, as well as to the bills that preceded the enactment of the AHR Act. […]

[206] It is clear that the Baird Commission wanted certain activities to be denounced and prohibited because, in its view, there was a consensus that they were reprehensible. But the Commission also wanted assisted human reproduction and related research activities to be regulated for the purpose of establishing uniform standards that would apply across Canada. Thus, it can be seen that the distinction drawn in the AHR Act between prohibited activities and controlled activities corresponds to the two distinct categories of activities for which the Baird Commission recommended two distinct approaches with different purposes.

[213] […] [W]hile it is true that certain groups in Canadian society are opposed to assisted human reproductive technologies and fundamentally challenge their legitimacy, the evidence shows that assisted human reproduction is usually regarded as a form of scientific progress that is of great value to individuals dealing with infertility problems. The same attitudes are adopted with respect to research into reproductive technologies. For the purposes of this appeal, there is no need to summarize the evidence on every field of research into new reproductive technologies. Suffice it to observe that no one has denounced research into assisted human reproduction on the basis that it is reprehensible. Despite the agreement that technologies related to assisted human reproduction need to be regulated, it is clear from the evidence that research into such technologies is considered to be not only desirable, but necessary. […]

[217] We therefore cannot agree with the Attorney General of Canada that the impugned provisions concerning the controlled activities have the same purpose as the unchallenged provisions concerning the prohibited activities. Parliament responded to what was presented to it as a consensus that some of the prohibited activities are reprehensible. […] It showed no such intention with respect to the activities that are not prohibited completely. As can be seen from the legislative history, the technologies and activities included among the controlled activities are very different in nature from the activities that are prohibited completely. These are technologies and activities to which professionals working in the field commonly have recourse. Parliament did not indicate that it intended to prohibit or even limit them. The purpose of the impugned provisions is instead to set up a national scheme to regulate the activities in question. […]

Effect of the Provisions

[226] We concluded […] that the purpose of the impugned provisions was to establish mandatory national standards for assisted human reproduction. A review of the practical consequences of these provisions shows that they have a significant impact on the practice of medicine. We therefore cannot agree with the Attorney General of Canada that the impugned provisions have nothing to do with the quality of services or the management of health-care institutions.

[227] Rather, the purpose and the effects of the provisions in question relate to the regulation of a specific type of health services provided in health-care institutions by health-care professionals to individuals who for pathological or physiological reasons need help to reproduce. Their pith and substance must be characterized as the regulation of assisted human reproduction as a health service. It would of course have been possible to say that the pith and substance of the impugned provisions relates to the regulation of research and practice associated with assisted human reproduction, but in our opinion, the effects of the provisions make a more precise characterization necessary. This approach is more consistent with the principles discussed above according to which the pith and substance should be identified as precisely as possible in light of the need to connect it with legislative powers (see para. 190). At the next step in the constitutional analysis, we must in fact establish that connection by identifying the head of power with which the impugned provisions — viewed from the perspective of their pith and substance — are connected.

B. Connecting the Pith and Substance of the Provisions With Heads of Power

[232] [In the Margarine Reference,] Rand J. stressed that a substantive component was needed to justify the exercise of the federal criminal law power. However, the most frequently quoted passage from his opinion does little to clarify the content of this substantive component:

> Is the prohibition . . . enacted with a view to a public purpose which can support it as being in relation to criminal law? Public peace, order, security, health, morality: these are the ordinary though not exclusive ends served by that law . . . . [p. 50]

Health, which Rand J. mentioned, cannot always justify action by Parliament in relation to the criminal law. This passage must therefore also be considered in the context of Rand J.'s definition of the criminal law. […]

> A crime is an act which the law, with appropriate penal sanctions, forbids; but as prohibitions are not enacted in a vacuum, we can properly look for some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed. That effect may be in relation to social, economic or political interests; and the legislature has had in mind to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened.

In our view, therefore, it is not enough to identify a public purpose that would have justified Parliament's action. […] Where its action is grounded in the criminal law, the public purpose must involve suppressing an evil or safeguarding a threatened interest.

[233] This view of the constituent elements of the federal criminal law power, namely that it has two components, one substantive and the other formal, continues to be valid today and was applied in, inter alia, the Reference re Firearms Act (para. 27). Three criteria have to be met to connect a law or a provision with this federal head of power, namely that it

1 - suppress an evil,

2 - establish a prohibition, and

3 - accompany that prohibition with a penalty.

[234] The formal component — establishing a prohibition and accompanying it with a penalty — supports a finding that a regulatory scheme, even one that takes the form of exemptions from a prohibitory scheme, falls within the field of criminal law. However, the substantive component, the justifiable criminal law purpose — the prohibition of a real or apprehended evil, and the concomitant protection of legitimate societal interests — must also be present. The substantive criterion assumes particular importance because of the liberal interpretation given to the formal component.

[236] Rand J.'s reference to an evil to be suppressed or a threatened interest to be safeguarded necessarily implied that the evil or threat must be real. In the context of the Charter, the recognized threshold is that of the reasoned apprehension of harm. The reasoned apprehension of harm, which was accepted as a criterion in R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452, and in R. v. Malmo-Levine, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 SCR 571, at para. 78, must be real and must relate to conduct or facts that can be identified and established. Although the instant case does not involve the application of the Charter, referring to a threshold illustrates what form a substantive component might take and helps give concrete form to the substantive component of the criminal law. […]

[238] The requirement of a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm applies with equal force where the legislative action is based on morality. In establishing the basis for Parliament's action, the Chief Justice relies heavily on the purpose of upholding public morality. In her view, to justify having recourse to the criminal law by relying on morality, Parliament need only have a reasonable basis to expect that its legislation will address a concern of fundamental importance (para. 50). If her interpretation were adopted, the decision to bring certain conduct within the criminal law sphere would never be open to effective review by the courts. The issue would simply be whether a moral concern is addressed and whether there is a consensus that the concern is of fundamental importance (para. 51). This approach in effect totally excludes the substantive component that serves to delimit the criminal law. Not only does it go far beyond morality, which as a result serves only as a formal component, but it inevitably encompasses innumerable aspects of very diverse matters or conduct, such as participation in a religious service, the cohabitation of unmarried persons or even international assistance, which, although they involve moral concerns in respect of which there is a consensus that they are important, cannot all be considered to fall within the criminal law sphere.

[239] In our opinion, this goes further than any previous judicial interpretation. A definition such as this amounts to what the Chief Justice herself describes as a "limitless definition" that must be rejected because it jeopardizes the constitutional balance of the federal-provincial division of powers (para. 43). It is true that the criminal law often expresses aspects of social morality or, in broader terms, the fundamental values of society. However, legislative action by Parliament on this basis presupposes the existence of a real and important moral problem. Yet care must be taken not to view every social, economic or scientific issue as a moral problem. In 1931, in Proprietary Articles Trade Association, the Privy Council rejected any conception of the criminal law that did not take into account the evolution of society. Thus, when Parliament criminalizes an act, its decision remains subject to review by the courts, which will take society's attitude into account. And it must be borne in mind in this area that a broad range of philosophical and religious ideas coexist in a society as diverse as contemporary Canadian society. Although the rules in the Criminal Code have long been understood in light of the principles of Judeo-Christian morality, societal changes have freed them from those fetters. The coming into force of the Charter, for example, resulted in fundamental changes that affected offences related to sex, pornography and prostitution and demonstrated the importance of the explosion of the former conceptual […] The judgments on the application of the Charter have not of course purported to define the limits of the federal criminal law power, but they do clearly illustrate what is considered to be an evil, which is a question the Chief Justice does not deal with in her analysis relating to morality. […]

[243] Although a reasoned apprehension of harm necessarily constitutes a criminal law purpose, health, ethics and morality do not automatically arouse such an apprehension in every case. For an activity to fall under the criminal law, it must be found that there is an evil to be suppressed or prevented and that the pith and substance of the provisions in issue is the suppression of that evil or the elimination of that reasoned risk of harm.

(2) Lack of a Connection Between the Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions and the Federal Criminal Law Power

[250] To find that the pith and substance of the impugned provisions relates to the prohibition of reprehensible conduct is therefore problematic in two ways. First, from the standpoint of morality, no evil has been identified. Second, all activities related to assisted human reproduction are regulated, not just specific ones that Parliament could theoretically have considered — but in fact did not consider — reprehensible. […]

[254] […] Although assisted human reproduction raises moral and ethical questions, this does not necessarily mean that exercising the criminal law power is justified on the basis that there is an evil to be suppressed. Rather, both those who testified before the Baird Commission and those who participated in the parliamentary debates acknowledged that the development of assisted human reproduction amounts to a step forward for the constantly growing number of people dealing with infertility. Moreover, it represents the only option for homosexuals who wish to reproduce. The risks for the health and safety of people who resort to these technologies do not distinguish the field of assisted human reproduction from other fields of medical practice that have evolved after a period of experimentation, such as that of organ transplants or grafts.

[256] In the end, if we were to adopt the Attorney General of Canada's interpretation and accept that the fact that a technology is "novel" justifies, on its own, resorting to the criminal law power, nearly every new medical technology could be brought within federal jurisdiction. This view of the criminal law is incompatible with the federal nature of Canada; it not only upsets the constitutional balance of powers in the field of health, but also undermines the very definition of federalism.

Connection With Provincial Powers

[260] […] [I]n light of the pith and substance of the impugned provisions — the regulation of assisted human reproduction as a health service — those provisions are closely connected with the activities of hospitals and fall within the power of the provinces to make laws in relation to that matter.

[265] In reviewing the effects of the impugned provisions, we observed that the provisions affect essential aspects of the relationship between a physician and persons who require assistance for reproduction. The fact that several of the impugned provisions concern subjects that are already governed by the Civil Code of Québec, the AHSSS, the Medical Act and the rules of ethics applicable to the professionals in question is an important indication that, in pith and substance, the provisions lie at the very core of the provinces' jurisdiction over civil rights and local matters.

[267] In short, the fact that the impugned provisions have a significant effect on activities that generally fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces confirms that those provisions represent an overflow of the exercise of the federal criminal law power. At this point, it might be tempting to declare that the impugned provisions are unconstitutional on this basis alone, as the Quebec Court of Appeal did. But it is necessary to complete the analysis and consider whether the ancillary powers doctrine applies. […]

[273] In sum, the conclusion that the impugned provisions, far from falling under the federal criminal law power, relate instead to the provinces' jurisdiction over hospitals, property and civil rights and matters of a merely local or private nature is self-evident. If any doubt remained, this is where the principle of subsidiarity could apply, not as an independent basis for the distribution of legislative powers, but as an interpretive principle that derives, as this Court has held, from the structure of Canadian federalism and that serves as a basis for connecting provisions with an exclusive legislative power. If subsidiarity were to play a role in the case at bar, it would favour connecting the rules in question with the provinces' jurisdiction over local matters, not with the criminal law power […].

The following are the reasons delivered by

[285] In my view, the essence of the impugned provisions of the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, S.C. 2004, c. 2, is regulation of virtually every aspect of research and clinical practice in relation to assisted human reproduction. The sweep of the regulation authorized by the impugned provisions is most vividly illustrated by reading ss. 10, 11 and 13 along with the regulation-making power in s. 65 and the licensing authority set out in s. 40. […]

[287] […] Substantially for the reasons given by Justices LeBel and Deschamps at paras. 259-66, I conclude that the "matter" of the challenged provisions, viewed as a whole, is best classified as being in relation to three areas of exclusive provincial legislative competence: the establishment, maintenance and management of hospitals; property and civil rights in the province; and matters of a merely local or private nature in the province. In my respectful view, the "matter" of the challenged provisions cannot be characterized as serving any criminal law purpose recognized by the Court's jurisprudence. […]

[288] That does not conclude the analysis, however. It may be that not each of the impugned provisions shares the constitutional characterization which attaches to the "matter" of the impugned provisions viewed as a whole. In my view, this is the case here […] Sections 5 to 7 are validly enacted under Parliament's criminal law power as the Attorney General of Quebec concedes. The same is true, in my view, of ss. 8, 9 and 12. In this respect, I part company with Justices LeBel and Deschamps.

[291] I conclude that ss. 8, 9 and 12 in purpose and effect prohibit negative practices associated with assisted reproduction and that they fall within the traditional ambit of the federal criminal law power.

[292] As I would affirm the constitutionality of s. 12 of the Act, I would also uphold the constitutionality of provisions which set up the mechanisms to implement it. […]

For a case comment on this decision, see Graeme G Mitchell, "Not a General Regulatory Power: A Comment on Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act" (2011) 54 SCLR (2d) 633. The principle of subsidiarity, which makes an appearance in this and the next case, is explored in Eugénie Brouillet, "Canadian Federalism and the Principle of Subsidiarity: Should We Open Pandora's Box?" (2011) 54 SCLR (2d) 601 and Hoi L Kong, "Subsidiarity, Republicanism, and the Division of Powers in Canada" (2015) 45 RDUS 13.

This incipient debate on the posture toward the criminal law power continued in Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 1. Though a majority of the Court upheld the constitutionality of the Act as a valid exercise of the federal jurisdiction over criminal law, in this decision we see three different approaches to the public purpose element of the definition of the criminal law power, none of which enjoys a majority. At one end of the spectrum, Justice Karakatsanis (with Justices Abella and Martin concurring) appears to further expand the scope of the power by adding the promotion of various values to the permissible purposes of criminal legislation, while at the other, Justice Kassirer (with the support of Wagner CJ and Brown and Rowe JJ) wish to bring more strictness to the review of Parliament's purposes, much as LeBel and Deschamps JJ did in AHRA, above. Justices Moldaver and Côté issue a judgment upholding the legislation but without endorsing the approach of either of their colleagues. We appear to be in a period of some instability and uncertainty as to the direction in which the federal criminal law power will evolve. As you read this decision, consider which approach you think is most sound, given what you have learned about the history and nature of the federal power over criminal law. In particular, do you think that the promotion of fundamental values ought to be included among the valid criminal purposes?

2.5 Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act

Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act*, 2020 SCC 1

The reasons of Abella, Karakatsanis and Martin JJ. were delivered by

Karakatsanis J. —

[1] Parliament criminalized compulsory genetic testing and the non-voluntary use or disclosure of genetic test results in the context of a wide range of activities — activities that structure much of our participation in society. This Court must decide whether Parliament could validly use its broad criminal law power to do so.

[2] In particular, we must decide whether s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 empowers Parliament to prohibit forcing an individual to take a genetic test or to disclose genetic test results, or to prohibit using an individual's genetic test results without consent, by way of ss. 1 to 7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, S.C. 2017, c. 3. Answering that question turns on whether Parliament enacted the challenged prohibitions for a valid criminal law purpose. I find that it did.

[3] The Government of Quebec referred the constitutionality of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act to the Quebec Court of Appeal, which concluded that those provisions fell outside Parliament's authority to make criminal law. The appellant, the Canadian Coalition for Genetic Fairness, appeals to this Court as of right.

[4] I would allow the appeal and conclude that Parliament had the power to enact ss. 1 to 7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act under s. 91(27). As I explain below, the "matter" (or pith and substance) of the challenged provisions is to protect individuals' control over their detailed personal information disclosed by genetic tests, in the broad areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services, in order to address Canadians' fears that their genetic test results will be used against them and to prevent discrimination based on that information. This matter is properly classified within Parliament's s. 91(27) power over criminal law. The provisions are supported by a criminal law purpose because they respond to a threat of harm to several overlapping public interests traditionally protected by the criminal law. The prohibitions in the Act protect autonomy, privacy, equality and public health, and therefore represent a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power.

I. Genetic Non-Discrimination Act

[5] In December 2015, Senator James S. Cowan introduced Bill S-201, An Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., 2017, which would eventually become the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, in the Senate. The Senate passed the bill by unanimous vote. The House of Commons passed it with 222 members of Parliament voting in favour and 60 against. Although the government opposed the bill, it did not require its backbenchers to vote against it. The bill came into force on royal assent as the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act: see Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, s. 5(2).

[6] Section 2 of the Act defines a genetic test as "a test that analyzes DNA, RNA or chromosomes for purposes such as the prediction of disease or vertical transmission risks, or monitoring, diagnosis or prognosis". Sections 3, 4 and 5 establish the following prohibitions relating to genetic tests:

> 3 (1) It is prohibited for any person to require an individual to undergo a genetic test as a condition of
> (a) providing goods or services to that individual;
> (b) entering into or continuing a contract or agreement with that individual; or
> (c) offering or continuing specific terms or conditions in a contract or agreement with that individual.
> (2) It is prohibited for any person to refuse to engage in an activity described in any of paragraphs (1)(a) to (c) in respect of an individual on the grounds that the individual has refused to undergo a genetic test.
> 4 (1) It is prohibited for any person to require an individual to disclose the results of a genetic test as a condition of engaging in an activity described in any of paragraphs 3(1)(a) to (c).
> (2) It is prohibited for any person to refuse to engage in an activity described in any of paragraphs 3(1)(a) to (c) in respect of an individual on the grounds that the individual has refused to disclose the results of a genetic test.
> 5 It is prohibited for any person who is engaged in an activity described in any of paragraphs 3(1)(a) to (c) in respect of an individual to collect, use or disclose the results of a genetic test of the individual without the individual's written consent.

[7] Thus, individuals and corporations cannot force individuals to take genetic tests or disclose genetic test results and cannot use individuals' genetic test results without their written consent in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services.

[8] Section 7 provides that doing anything prohibited by ss. 3, 4 or 5 is an offence punishable on summary conviction by a fine of up to $300,000 or imprisonment of up to 12 months, or both, and on indictment by a fine of up to $1 million or imprisonment of up to 5 years, or both.

[9] Section 6 provides that the prohibitions established by ss. 3 to 5 do not apply to a physician, pharmacist or other health care practitioner "in respect of an individual to whom they are providing health services" and also do not apply to "a person who is conducting medical, pharmaceutical or scientific research in respect of an individual who is participating in the research".

III. Issue

[15] The only issue before this Court is whether Parliament had the power under s. 91(27) to enact ss. 1 to 7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act. The wisdom of Parliament's decision to criminalize the conduct the provisions prohibit is not in issue. Nor is it this Court's task to consider whether the policy objectives advanced by the provisions could be better achieved by other means, such as provincial legislation. My conclusion that ss. 1 to 7 of the Act are valid criminal law does not preclude the provincial legislatures from addressing similar matters within their spheres of jurisdiction, subject to the doctrine of paramountcy.

A. Characterization

(1) Purpose

[30] Identifying a law's pith and substance requires considering both the law's purpose and its effects: Firearms Reference, at para. 16. Both Parliament's or the provincial legislature's purpose and the legal and practical effects of the law will assist the court in determining the law's essential character.

[34] To determine a law's purpose, a court looks to both intrinsic and extrinsic evidence. Intrinsic evidence includes the text of the law, and provisions that expressly set out the law's purpose, as well as the law's title and structure. Extrinsic evidence includes statements made during parliamentary proceedings and drawn from government publications: Firearms Reference, at para. 17.

[36] Turning to the Act's text and structure, the prohibitions created by ss. 3 to 5 apply to a wide range of circumstances (obtaining goods and services and entering into contracts) in which individuals might be treated adversely based on their decision whether to undergo genetic testing and based on test results. The prohibitions are of general application, as they do not target a particular activity or industry. Instead, they target specific behaviour related to genetic testing, namely forcing individuals to undergo testing and disclose test results, and using test results without consent. The prohibitions target conduct that enables genetic discrimination.

[39] [T]he Act aims to combat discrimination based on genetic test results. Health-related genetic tests reveal highly personal information — details that individuals might not wish to know or share and that could be used against them. The prohibitions target a broad range of conduct that creates the opportunity for genetic discrimination based on intimate personal information revealed by health-related tests. Parliament saw genetic test results relating to health as particularly vulnerable to abuse and discrimination. The intrinsic evidence suggests that the purpose of the provisions is to combat discrimination based on information disclosed by genetic tests by criminalizing compulsory genetic testing, compulsory disclosure of test results, and non-consensual use of test results in a broadly-defined context (the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services). The extrinsic evidence points largely in the same direction.

[46] In addition to enacting substantive provisions, the Act also amended the Canada Labour Code to protect employees from forced genetic testing or disclosure of test results, and from disciplinary action on the basis of genetic test results, and amended the Canadian Human Rights Act to add "genetic characteristics" as a prohibited ground of discrimination and to create a deeming provision relating to refusal to undergo genetic testing or disclose test results: see Canada Labour Code, ss. 247.98 and 247.99, as amended by s. 8 of the Act; Canadian Human Rights Act, s. 3(1) and (3), as amended by ss. 9 to 11 of the Act.

[49] The title of the Act and the text of the prohibitions provide strong evidence that the prohibitions have the purpose of combatting genetic discrimination based on test results, and that the more precise mischief they are intended to address is the lack of legal protection for the results of genetic testing. The Act does what its title says it does: it prevents genetic discrimination by directly targeting that mischief. The parliamentary debates also provide strong evidence to support this. I find that the purpose of the challenged provisions is to combat genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination based on the results of genetic tests by prohibiting conduct that makes individuals vulnerable to genetic discrimination in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services.

[50] As I will explain, the effects of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act are consistent with their purpose.

(2) Effects

[51] Both legal and practical effects are relevant to identifying a law's pith and substance. Legal effects "flo[w] directly from the provisions of the statute itself", whereas practical effects "flow from the application of the statute [but] are not direct effects of the provisions of the statute itself": Kitkatla, at para. 54, citing Morgentaler (1993), at pp. 482-83.

[52] Starting with legal effects, ss. 3 to 5 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act prohibit genetic testing requirements and non-consensual uses of genetic test results in a broad range of circumstances. Section 7 imposes significant penalties for contravening these prohibitions.

[54] The most significant practical effect of the Act is that it gives individuals control over the decision of whether to undergo genetic testing and over access to the results of any genetic testing they choose to undergo. […]

[56] By protecting choices about who has access to such information, the legislation reduces the risk of genetic discrimination. And by removing the fear of some of the negative consequences that could flow from genetic testing, the Act may encourage individuals to undergo genetic testing. Additional testing may in turn produce health benefits, including by enabling earlier detection of health problems or predispositions, providing for more accurate and sometimes life-saving diagnoses and improving the health care system's ability to provide maximally beneficial care.

[57] The legislation may also affect the insurance industry and, potentially, insurance premiums. By preventing insurers from using genetic test results without an individual's consent in making decisions about what policies to underwrite, the provisions at issue may result in increased insurance premiums. Since insurers will not be able to adjust individual premiums (or decline to insure an individual) based on genetic test results without written consent, they may be more likely to insure individuals who may be at risk of future health problems, or to insure those individuals at lower premiums than they would otherwise charge. Individuals who know they are at higher risk of future health problems may also be more likely to purchase insurance. This may in turn increase the amounts the insurer will be required to pay out. To make sure that they will be able to meet those potential increased future liabilities, insurers may need to raise premiums overall.

[63] In enacting the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, Parliament acted to combat genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination based on genetic test results. It sought to do so by filling the gap in Canada's laws that made individuals vulnerable to genetic discrimination in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services. […]

[64] Crucially, Parliament's purpose in enacting the provisions in question is borne out in the provisions' effects. The most direct and significant practical effect of the prohibitions is to give individuals control over the decision of whether to undergo genetic testing and over access to the results of genetic testing. This practical effect is a direct result of the prohibitions' legal effects.

[65] I accordingly conclude that, in pith and substance, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act protect individuals' control over their detailed personal information disclosed by genetic tests in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services in order to address fears that individuals' genetic test results will be used against them and to prevent discrimination based on that information.

B. Classification

[66] […] [T]he only question the Court must answer in this part of the division of powers analysis is whether the provisions at issue come within Parliament's s. 91(27) criminal law power.

(1) The Criminal Law Power

[68] There is no dispute that the challenged provisions meet the first two requirements. They prohibit specific conduct and impose penalties for violating those prohibitions. The only issue is whether the matter of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is supported by a criminal law purpose. […].

[74] […] A law will have a criminal law purpose if it addresses an evil, injurious or undesirable effect on a public interest traditionally protected by the criminal law, or another similar public interest.

[79] Taken together, the requirements established in the Margarine Reference and subsequently applied in this Court's jurisprudence mean that a law will have a criminal law purpose if its matter represents Parliament's response to a threat of harm to public order, safety, health or morality or fundamental social values, or to a similar public interest. As long as Parliament is addressing a reasoned apprehension of harm to one or more of these public interests, no degree of seriousness of harm need be proved before it can make criminal law. The court does not determine whether Parliament's criminal law response is appropriate or wise. The focus is solely on whether recourse to criminal law is available under the circumstances.

(2) Application

[80] As stated above, the only classification issue concerning ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is whether the provisions are supported by a criminal law purpose. In my view, the essential character of the prohibitions represents Parliament's response to the risk of harm that the prohibited conduct, genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination based on genetic test results pose to several public interests traditionally protected by the criminal law: autonomy, privacy and the fundamental social value of equality, as well as public health.

(a) Autonomy, Privacy and Equality

[82] This Court has consistently recognized that individuals have powerful interests in autonomy and privacy, and in dignity more generally, protected by various Charter guarantees: see, for example, R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, at p. 166, per Wilson J. It has specifically recognized individuals' clear and pressing interest in safeguarding information about themselves — the ability to do so is "closely tied to the dignity and integrity of the individual, [and] is of paramount importance in modern society": R. v. Jarvis, 2019 SCC 10, [2019] 1 SCR 488, at para. 66; R. v. Dyment, 1988 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R 417, at p. 429.

[84] The conduct prohibited by ss. 1 to 7 of the Act poses a risk of harm to two facets of autonomy and personal privacy because individuals have an interest in deciding whether or not to access the detailed genetic information revealed by genetic testing and whether or not to share their test results with others.

[85] In particular, forced genetic testing (prohibited in s. 3 of the Act) poses a clear threat to autonomy and to an individual's privacy interest in not finding out what their genetic makeup reveals about them and their health prospects. People may not want to learn about their "genetic destiny", or risk the psychological harm that can result from obtaining unfavourable genetic test results: Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada, The Potential Economic Impact of a Ban on the Use of Genetic Information for Life and Health Insurance, by M. Hoy and M. Durnin (2012), at p. 11 (Hoy and Durnin). Forced disclosure of genetic test results (prohibited in s. 4) and the collection, use or disclosure of genetic test results without written consent (prohibited in s. 5) threaten autonomy and privacy by compromising an individual's control over access to their detailed genetic information. Such threats to autonomy and personal privacy are threats to human dignity.

[86] The prohibitions target this autonomy- and privacy-threatening conduct in the contexts of the provision of goods and services and the conclusion of contracts. The risk of harm to dignity-related interests in these contexts is neither narrow nor trivial: individuals meaningfully participate in society by way of goods, services and contracts. The prohibitions in the Act target a wide swath of conduct.

[90] Protecting fundamental moral precepts or social values is an established criminal law purpose […]. Parliamentarians considered discrimination on the basis of health-related genetic test results to be morally wrong. They viewed such genetic discrimination to be antithetical to the values of equality and human dignity. It is easy to see why. Such genetic discrimination threatens the fundamental social value of equality by stigmatizing and imposing adverse treatment on individuals because of their inherited, immutable genetic characteristics, and, in particular, the characteristics that may help to predict disease or disability. In acting to suppress a threat of that nature, Parliament acted with a criminal law purpose.

[…]

(b) Public Health

[96] Parliament is entitled to use its criminal law power to respond to a reasoned apprehension of harm, including a threat to public health.

[97] Genetic discrimination and the fear of genetic discrimination are not merely theoretical concerns. Testimony before Parliament demonstrated that fear of genetic discrimination leads patients to forego beneficial testing, results in wasted health care dollars and may deter patients from participating in research that could advance medical understanding of their conditions. Genetic discrimination is a barrier to accessing suitable, maximally effective health care, to preventing the onset of certain health conditions and to participating in research and other initiatives serving public health. Parliament accordingly apprehended individuals' vulnerability to and fear of genetic discrimination based on test results as a threat to public health.

[102] Here, in pith and substance, Parliament's action was a response to the harm that vulnerability to and fear of genetic discrimination posed to public health. Giving individuals control over access to their genetic test results by prohibiting forced genetic testing and disclosure of test results and the non-consensual collection, use or disclosure of genetic test results in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services targets the harmful fear of genetic discrimination that poses a threat to health. The Act was intended to target that fear.

(3) Conclusion

[103] Parliament took action in response to its concern that individuals' vulnerability to genetic discrimination posed a threat of harm to several public interests traditionally protected by the criminal law. Parliament enacted legislation that, in pith and substance, protects individuals' control over their detailed personal information disclosed by genetic tests in the areas of contracting and the provision of goods and services in order to address Canadian's fears that their genetic test results will be used against them and to prevent discrimination based on that information. It did so to safeguard autonomy, privacy and equality, along with public health. The challenged provisions fall within Parliament's criminal law power because they consist of prohibitions accompanied by penalties, backed by a criminal law purpose.

[110] In the result, I agree with my colleague Justice Karakatsanis that ss. 1 to 7 of the *Act*represent a valid exercise of Parliament's power over criminal law set out at s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, and with respect, I arrive at this result in a different manner because I see the pith and substance of the impugned provisions differently from her, as well as from my colleague Justice Kasirer.

A. Characterization

[114] […] I take the view that the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is to protect health by prohibiting conduct that undermines individuals' control over the intimate information revealed by genetic testing. This is borne out by the purpose and effects of these provisions.

[115] […] I do not agree with Justice Karakatsanis that preventing discrimination forms part of the pith and substance of the challenged provisions. While I accept that ss. 1 to 7 of the Act reduce the opportunities for discrimination based on one's genetic test results, thereby mitigating individuals' fear of genetic discrimination, they do so by giving people control over the information revealed by genetic tests in furtherance of the purpose of protecting health. With respect, preventing or combating genetic discrimination is not the "dominant purpose or true character" of these provisions […].

[116] Nor can I agree with Justice Kasirer that the pith and substance of the provisions is "to regulate contracts and the provision of goods and services, in particular contracts of insurance and employment, by prohibiting some perceived misuses of one category of genetic tests, the whole with a view to promoting the health of Canadians" (para. 154). As I see it, what is at stake here is not the promotion of beneficial health practices but the protection of individuals from a serious threat to health. Further, I have no doubt that the impugned provisions affect contracting and the provision of goods and services. However, with respect, I believe that the manner in which my colleague characterizes them "confuse[s] the law's purpose with 'the means chosen to achieve it'" (Quebec v. Canada, at para. 29, quoting Ward v.

Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 SCR 569, at para. 25). Although the means chosen by Parliament engage aspects of contracting and the provision of goods and services, as I see it, "the regulation of contracts and the provision of goods and services" is, at best, peripheral to the dominant purpose or true character of the legislation. Indeed, as Justice Kasirer himself recognizes, "health dominates the discussion" (para. 221).

[136] […] I conclude that the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is to protect health by prohibiting conduct that undermines individuals' control over the intimate information revealed by genetic testing. These provisions prohibit compulsory genetic testing, compulsory disclosure of genetic test results, and the non-consensual collection, disclosure and use of those results in a wide array of contexts that govern how people interact with society. By giving people control over this information, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act mitigate their fears that it will be used against them. Such fears lead many to forego genetic testing, to the detriment of their own health, the health of their families, and the public healthcare system as a whole.

B. Classification

[137] As my colleagues have noted, the classification stage of this appeal turns on whether ss. 1 to 7 of the Act are backed by a criminal law purpose. […]

[139] Sections 1 to 7 of the Act are backed by a criminal law purpose because they are directed at suppressing a threat to health. People were choosing to put themselves at risk of preventable death and disease because they were concerned that they would not have control over the information revealed by genetic tests in a wide variety of contexts that govern how they interact with and in society. Parliament sought to mitigate these concerns by prohibiting conduct — namely, compulsory genetic testing, and compulsory disclosure and non-consensual collection, disclosure, and use of genetic test results — that undermined individuals' control over the information revealed by genetic testing. By giving people control over that information, Parliament sought to mitigate their fears that it would be used against them, thereby curbing the injurious effect on health.

[143] In light of this evidence, I cannot agree with Justice Kasirer's conclusion that the impugned provisions do not target a "'public health evil' or threat", but rather seek "to foster or promote beneficial health practices" (para. 239). While my colleague agrees that the provisions in question relate to a public purpose that is properly the subject of criminal law — health — he contends that "there is no defined 'public health evil' or threat to be suppressed" (para. 239). As I see it, by contrast, ss. 1 to 7 are not directed at the mere "promotion of beneficial health services or practices" (Kasirer J.'s reasons, at para. 240), but rather at protecting people from severe harms to their health caused by foregoing genetic testing out of fear that their information will be used against them (e.g., by way of non-consensual collection, disclosure, or use of genetic test results). While it is no doubt true that not dying of a preventable disease is a "better health outcom[e]" than dying from that disease (Kasirer J.'s reasons, at para. 239), I believe it makes more sense to describe measures directed at preventing such outcomes as being protective of health.

[150] In sum, as I see it, by enacting ss. 1 to 7 of the Act, Parliament targeted conduct that was having an injurious effect on health. Canadians choosing to forego genetic testing and thereby dying preventable deaths and suffering other preventable health-related harms for no reason other than the fear that their genetic test results could be used against them is a threat to health that Parliament was constitutionally entitled to address, pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Sections 1 to 7 of the Act, which prohibit conduct that undermines individuals' control over the information revealed by genetic testing in a wide variety of contexts that govern how people interact with and in society, accordingly represent a valid exercise of Parliament's power to enact laws in relation to the criminal law.

III. Conclusion

[151] For these reasons, I would dispose of the appeal in the manner proposed by Justice Karakatsanis (see para. 108).

The reasons of Wagner C.J. and Brown, Rowe and Kasirer JJ. were delivered by Kasirer J. (dissenting) —

Introduction

[152] I begin these reasons by noting that I find the explanations of the method for determining the constitutionality of ss. 1 to 7 of the Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, S.C. 2017, c. 3 ("Act"), offered by my colleagues Justice Moldaver and Justice Karakatsanis most helpful. With great respect, however, I do not share their view that the impugned provisions were enacted within the constitutional authority of the Parliament of Canada over the criminal law pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[154] On my understanding, the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 is to regulate contracts and the provision of goods and services, in particular contracts of insurance and employment, by prohibiting some perceived misuses of one category of genetic tests, the whole with a view to promoting the health of Canadians. The Act has certain incidental purposes and effects, but when the dominant character of the impugned provisions is identified, they cannot be classified as a valid exercise of Parliament's constitutional power over criminal law. These provisions do not prohibit what is often styled, in language archaic but telling, an "evil" associated with the criminal law. Instead, ss. 1 to 7 fall within the provinces' constitutional authority over property and civil rights conferred by s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. In the main, I find myself in broad agreement with the report of the Court of Appeal in the reference.

[155] Many of the spirited submissions made in support of the impugned legislation's constitutionality stressed what might be understood, in some circles, as noble public policy: to encourage government action that would combat genetic discrimination so that Canadians can, without fear, undergo genetic testing if they so desire. Whether or not this Court feels it is appropriate to recognize what the appellant referred to as the deeply personal character of the decision to undertake a genetic test is not the question before us. The task of the courts — perforce in a constitutional reference such as this one — is not to measure the suitability of public policy but to determine the validity of legislation pursuant to the division of powers under the Constitution. The urgings in favour of what counsel supporting the law see as sound policy would be best done before the appropriate legislative powers that be, acting within their right spheres of constitutional jurisdiction.

[…]

A. Characterization: What Is the Pith and Substance of Sections 1 to 7 of the Act?

[170] The wide range of characterization in this case suggests strongly to me that not all of the interpretative efforts at this stage have followed the cardinal rule that it is the dominant purpose and effect of ss. 1 to 7 that should concern us. In fairness, part of the mischief comes from Parliament's choice for the Act's short title (Genetic Non-Discrimination Act). This title may have put some readers of the impugned provisions on the wrong path by stressing what may have been an aspiration of parliamentarians — legitimate or not, be that as it may — that does not find expression in the statute's leading purpose or effects. Moreover, another part of the mischief appears to come from the wide-ranging and disparate character of the legislative debates, which offer a number of often conflicting accounts of the purposes and effects of the Act. This makes the identification of pith and substance difficult, especially given the absence of a statutory preamble or clearly-stated objective in the contested portion of the Act itself.

[174] In my view, neither the long title of this statute — An Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination — nor its short title — Genetic Non-Discrimination Act — can be said to reflect clearly the impugned provisions' true purpose. With respect, I disagree that these titles reveal that the provisions' purpose is to prohibit discrimination on genetic grounds and prevent such discrimination from occurring in the first place. To my mind, genetic non-discrimination cannot be said to be the primary objective of the impugned provisions.

[184] As the Court of Appeal explained in its reasons, taken together, ss. 1 to 7 aim to prohibit making the provision of goods and services or the making, continuing, or offering of specific terms or conditions of a contract conditional upon an individual undergoing or disclosing the results of genetic testing (paras. 8 and 10). The provisions do not prohibit the use of genetic information that may be disclosed voluntarily or that may be required or obtained through other means, such as family history or other medical tests, and they do not prohibit genetic discrimination. […]

[203] When considering the whole of the record, and giving appropriate weight to intrinsic and extrinsic evidence of purpose, it is plain that the main goal of ss. 1 to 7 is not to combat discrimination based on genetic characteristics. Genetic discrimination may have been on the mind of parliamentarians, but it is not prohibited in the impugned provisions. Nor is their objective to control the use of private information revealed by genetic testing, which is secondary to the true purpose of the provisions. Rather, the true aim of the provisions is to regulate contracts, particularly contracts of insurance and employment, in order to encourage Canadians to undergo genetic tests without fear that those tests will be misused so that their health can ultimately be improved.

[…]

B. Classification: Does the Pith and Substance of the Impugned Provisions Fall Under the Section 91(27) Criminal Law Power?

[…]

Scope of the Criminal Law Power

[230] As the parties all agree, the impugned provisions satisfy the formal requirements of a criminal law. The only issue concerns whether they are supported by the third requirement, a valid criminal law purpose. My colleague Justice Karakatsanis and I have different views of this requirement, and we accordingly reach different conclusions on whether it is satisfied. Our respective views of the matter — which find echo in the disagreement at the heart of the AHRA Reference — cannot be said to have no impact on the result of this case.

Criminal Law Purpose

[232] I disagree with the appellant that the word "evil" — the traditional measure of the criminal law in this context — is unhelpful in the classification analysis. Rather, the concept of "evil" is necessary to remind Parliament that mere undesirable effects are not sufficient for legislation to have a criminal purpose, contrary to my colleague's suggestion (see Karakatsanis J.'s reasons, at para. 76). In my view, discarding this concept from the core of the criminal law purpose inquiry would be a dramatic change of course from this Court's past jurisprudence. While the word "evil" may echo language drawn from another time, it has been used frequently in the modern law and it remains conceptually useful for courts to search for an evil before the criminal law purpose requirement is satisfied. Furthermore, to my ear, the French equivalent "mal" is perfectly current as a choice of word and I observe that other equivalent words such as "fléau" are also used for "evil" in the decided cases (see, e.g., R. v. Malmo-Levine, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 SCR 571, at para. 33).

[233] The words "some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public against which the law is directed" point to a more precise idea than the protection of central moral precepts, in a broad sense: Parliament cannot act unless it seeks to suppress some threat. This threat itself must be well-defined and have ascertainable contours to constitute the valid subject-matter of criminal law pursuant to s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It must also be real, in the sense that Parliament has a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm. To suggest otherwise would be to render the substantive requirement so vague as to be impractical as a measure of what amounts to criminal law for constitutional purposes.

[234] I draw from the Margarine Reference and LeBel and Deschamps JJ.'s reasons in the AHRA Reference that three questions must be confronted when determining whether a law rests upon a valid criminal law purpose. First, does the impugned legislation relate to a "public purpose", such as public peace, order, security, health, or morality? Second, did Parliament articulate a well-defined threat to be suppressed or prevented by the impugned legislation (i.e. the "evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public")? Third, is the threat "real", in the sense that Parliament had a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm when enacting the impugned legislation? I will discuss each question in turn.

Application

(a) Do the Impugned Provisions Relate to a Public Purpose?

[236] My colleagues and I agree that the contested provisions can be said to relate to a public purpose: health. As I have concluded, the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 7 of the Act is to regulate contracts and the provision of goods and services, in particular contracts of insurance and employment, by prohibiting some perceived misuses of one category of genetic tests, the whole with a view to promoting the health of Canadians. Thus, there is a clear dimension related to health in the dominant character of the legislation. I recognize that the impugned provisions have an impact on privacy and autonomy but, as I have said, the scope of the definition of "genetic test" means that health is the primary character of the law and that privacy and autonomy are only derivatives thereof.

(b) Has Parliament Articulated a Well-Defined Threat to Be Suppressed or Prevented By the Impugned Legislation?

[237] Parliament cannot use the criminal law power to address a vague threat. Rather, the legislation must be directed against "some evil or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public" and the legislature must have in mind "to suppress the evil or to safeguard the interest threatened". As a result, Parliament must clearly articulate and define the scope of the threat it seeks to suppress. That is, it must articulate a precise threat with ascertainable contours. This requirement ensures that the scope of Parliament's actions is limited to a specific problem, and it is particularly important in relation to matters that have provincial aspects, such as health, in order to preserve the balance of federal and provincial powers.

[254] In my view, Parliament did not target a threat within the purview of the criminal law through the impugned provisions. Quite simply, the prohibitions target certain practices related to contracts and the provision of goods and services, and more specifically, to insurance and employment. There is nothing on the record suggesting that the prohibited conduct is a threat to Canadians.

[257] Moreover, I respectfully disagree with the view that just because the impugned law "target[s] conduct that Parliament reasonably apprehends as a threat to our central moral precepts", this means that the impugned provisions are validly backed by a criminal law purpose (Karakatsanis J.'s reasons, at para. 73, citing with approval AHRA Reference, at para. 50, perMcLachlin C.J.). It bears emphasizing that McLachlin C.J. went on to state that "[t]he role of the courts is to ensure that such a criminal law in pith and substance relates to conduct that Parliament views as contrary to our central moral precepts" and upheld the legislation because "[i]t targets conduct that Parliament has found to be reprehensible" (para. 51; see also para. 30 (emphasis added)). Yet, as LeBel and Deschamps JJ. explained, while "the criminal law often expresses aspects of social morality or, in broader terms, the fundamental values of society . . . . Care must be taken not to view every social, economic or scientific issue as a moral problem" (AHRA Reference, at para. 239). In other words, "Parliament's wisdom" cannot trump the requirement to identify a real evil, even from the standpoint of morality (paras. 76 and 250). To do otherwise has the potential to amplify the scope of s. 91(27) beyond any constitutional precedent (paras. 43 and 239).

(c) Is the Threat Real, in the Sense That Parliament Had a Concrete Basis and a Reasoned Apprehension of Harm When Enacting the Impugned Legislation?

[259] The amicus curiae urges this Court to embrace McLachlin C.J.'s approach in the AHRA Reference. […] [W]hile McLachlin C.J. used the phrase "reasonable apprehension of harm", she also categorically rejected any constitutional threshold level of harm. She noted that LeBel and Deschamps JJ.'s view "substitutes a judicial view of what is good and what is bad for the wisdom of Parliament" (para. 76).

[260] I understand this to be an important point of disagreement between McLachlin C.J. and LeBel and Deschamps JJ.. […] Essentially, what is urged upon us is that where Parliament perceives a risk of harm, that is sufficient for the criminal law power to exist. According to this view, if this Court were to conclude that a certain threshold of harm must be met before Parliament could adopt criminal prohibitions, this would amount to courts second-guessing Parliament.

[261] I respectfully disagree with this point because the approach advocated for is overly deferential to Parliament on division of powers disputes and, if left unchecked, could undermine the federal-provincial balance of powers as set by the Constitution. Whether behaviour constitutes a risk of harm, such that it should be prohibited, is a question of public policy, rather than a basis for constitutional authority. In my respectful view, LeBel and Deschamps JJ.'s reasons in the AHRA Reference should guide this Court […] .

[262] In respect of the "harm" argument, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. would require Parliament to describe the apprehended harm "precisely enough that a connection can be established between the apprehended harm and the evil in question" (para. 237). Ensuring Parliament can clearly identify the harm it seeks to suppress and how the impugned legislation is rationally connected to that harm is not onerous, and it does not amount to courts "second-guessing" Parliament (see A.F., at para. 28; factum of the amicus curiae, at paras. 4 and 41). Rather, it merely prevents Parliament from invoking vague terms such as "morality", "safety", or even "evil" to justify laws that in reality have little connection to the criminal law.

[267] In my view, the threat Parliament seeks to suppress must be real, in the sense that Parliament has a concrete basis and a reasoned apprehension of harm.

[270] In this case, had I concluded there is a well-defined threat, I would also conclude that there is no evidentiary foundation of harm. Rather, Parliament seeks to improve the health of Canadians by making them aware of underlying conditions they may have and does so by attempting to encourage the use of genetic tests. Just as in the AHRA Reference, this advance in technology and health services is beneficial to Canadians, and has always been perceived as such.

(d) Conclusion

[271] From the foregoing, I conclude that the contested provisions do not satisfy the substantive component of criminal law. While they do relate to a public purpose, Parliament has neither articulated a well-defined threat that it intended to target, nor did it provide any evidentiary foundation of such a threat. It matters little to the present task whether the impugned provisions constitute good policy: they are ultra vires Parliament's criminal law power.

[272] In my view, ss. 1 to 7 of the Act rather fall within provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights conferred by s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. As explained above, the impugned provisions substantially affect the substantive law of insurance as well as human rights and labour legislation in all provinces. There is no question that the provinces could enact the impugned provisions in their own jurisdiction, if they so desired (see Citizens Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 7 App. Cas. 96 (P.C.)).

IV. Disposition

[274] In my respectful view, the reference question should be answered affirmatively. The Genetic Non-Discrimination Act enacted by ss. 1 to 7 of the Act to prohibit and prevent genetic discrimination, is ultra vires to Parliament's jurisdiction over criminal law under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[275] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal without costs.

For scholarship discussing this decision, see eg, Hoi L Kong, "Reference Re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act: How to Make Space for Some Certainty" (2022) 104 SCLR (2d) 45; Eric M Adams, "Touch of Evil: Disagreements at the Heart of the Criminal Law Power" (2022) 104 SCLR (2d) 67. In his detailed analysis of the decision, Kong ultimately approves of Kasirer J's approach on the basis that it is most consistent with the broader federalism jurisprudence. Adams, in his article reviewing the requirement for the suppression of "some evil" over the history of the interpretation of s 91(27), favours a broader conception of the criminal law purpose element.

A central lesson of these cases is the enormous breadth of the federal criminal law power. The topics on which s 91(27) authorizes federal Parliament to legislate—topics like health, order, environment, morality, and even the protection of certain values—mean that the exercise of the power will frequently also engage central areas of provincial jurisdiction and concern. Moreover, the implementation and enforcement of the criminal law will often require the involvement of provincial authorities and institutions; recall that this interdependency is overtly imagined in the distribution of powers in the Constitution Act, 1867, with s 92(14) assigning responsibility for the administration of justice to the provinces. The extent and depth of this overlap and interaction is why the criminal law power has been such a crucible for federalism in Canada, surfacing and testing fundamental principles of the division of powers, including the nature and demands of co-operative federalism.

That is the frame for the following case. It is settled law that the authority to enact criminal law includes the authority to repeal it. However, Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14 raised novel questions about how the repeal of a complex (and historically highly controversial) criminal law scheme might affect provincial jurisdiction and what the foundational principles of Canadian federalism therefore required.

Cromwell and Karakatsanis JJ. —

I. Introduction

[1] Fifteen years ago, this Court determined that Parliament, acting under its power to legislate in relation to criminal law, had the constitutional authority to establish a nationwide gun control scheme. Parliament's decision to do so was a contentious policy choice that was contested on constitutional grounds. Three years ago, Parliament reversed in part that earlier policy choice: it repealed the legislation that had established the long-gun registry within the gun control scheme, and provided for the destruction of the data it contained. This too was a contentious policy choice which is now contested on constitutional grounds.

[2] When the government tabled the bill abolishing the long-gun registry and providing for the destruction of the data it contained, Quebec expressed its intention to create its own provincial gun control scheme and asked Canada to give it the data on long guns connected with the province. The federal government refused. As a result, Quebec challenged the constitutionality of the federal law providing for destruction of the data and sought an order requiring the federal government to turn it over. The Superior Court of Quebec declared that Parliament's legislative jurisdiction with respect to criminal law does not allow it to legislate for the destruction of the long-gun registration records without first making this data available to provinces seeking to establish their own registries, and ordered the federal government to transfer the relevant data to Quebec. A five-member panel of the Quebec Court of Appeal disagreed. Finding the law a valid exercise of the federal criminal law power, it set aside those declarations and orders. Quebec now appeals to this Court, raising three issues:

1. Does the principle of cooperative federalism prevent Parliament from legislating to dispose of the data?
2. Does Quebec have the right to obtain the data?
3. Is s. 29 of an Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Firearms Act, S.C. 2012, c. 6, ultra vires Parliament's criminal law power?

[3] We agree with the conclusions of the Quebec Court of Appeal and would dismiss the appeal. The principle of cooperative federalism does not constrain federal legislative competence in this case, Quebec has no legal right to the data, and s. 29 of the Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Firearms Act (short title Ending the Long-gun Registry Act ("ELRA")) is a lawful exercise of Parliament's criminal law legislative power under the Constitution. We add this; to some, Parliament's choice to destroy this data will undermine public safety and waste enormous amounts of public money. To others, it will seem to be the dismantling of an ill-advised regime and the overdue restoration of the privacy rights of law-abiding gun owners. But these competing views about the merits of Parliament's policy choice are not at issue here. As has been said many times, the courts are not to question the wisdom of legislation but only to rule on its legality. In our view, the decision to dismantle the long-gun registry and destroy the data that it contains is a policy choice that Parliament was constitutionally entitled to make.

III. Analysis

Does the Principle of Cooperative Federalism Prevent Parliament from Legislating to Dispose of the Data?

[15] Quebec invokes the principle of cooperative federalism in support of both its argument that s. 29 of the ELRA is ultra vires and its claim that Quebec has the right to receive the data contained in the CFR related to long guns connected to Quebec. In essence, Quebec is asking us to recognize that the principle of cooperative federalism prevents Canada and the provinces from acting or legislating in a way that would hinder cooperation between both orders of government, especially in spheres of concurrent jurisdiction.

[16] In our respectful view, Quebec's position has no foundation in our constitutional law and is contrary to the governing authorities from this Court.

[17] Cooperative federalism is a concept used to describe the "network of relationships between the executives of the central and regional governments [through which] mechanisms are developed, especially fiscal mechanisms, which allow a continuous redistribution of powers and resources without recourse to the courts or the amending process": P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 5-46; see also W. R. Lederman, "Some Forms and Limitations of Co-Operative Federalism", in Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (1981), 314. From this descriptive concept of cooperative federalism, courts have developed a legal principle that has been invoked to provide flexibility in separation of powers doctrines, such as federal paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity. It is used to facilitate interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes and to avoid unnecessary constraints on provincial legislative action […]. With respect to interjurisdictional immunity, for example, the principle of cooperative federalism has been relied on to explain and justify relaxing a rigid, watertight compartments approach to the division of legislative power that unnecessarily constrains legislative action by the other order of government: "In the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 37).

> . . . the text of the federal constitution as authoritatively interpreted in the courts remains very important. It tells us who can act in any event. In other words, constitutionally it must always be possible in a federal country to ask and answer the question — What happens if the federal and provincial governments do not agree about a particular measure of co-operative action? Then which government and legislative body has power to do what? [Emphasis added; footnote omitted.]

[19] The principle of cooperative federalism, therefore, cannot be seen as imposing limits on the otherwise valid exercise of legislative competence […]. This was recently reiterated by this Court in its unanimous opinion in Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837, at paras. 61-62:

> While flexibility and cooperation are important to federalism, they cannot override or modify the separation of powers. The Secession Reference affirmed federalism as an underlying constitutional principle that demands respect for the constitutional division of powers and the maintenance of a constitutional balance between federal and provincial powers.
> In summary, notwithstanding the Court's promotion of cooperative and flexible federalism, the constitutional boundaries that underlie the division of powers must be respected. The "dominant tide" of flexible federalism, however strong its pull may be, cannot sweep designated powers out to sea, nor erode the constitutional balance inherent in the Canadian federal state. [Emphasis added.]

[21] We conclude that the principle of cooperative federalism does not prevent Parliament from exercising legislative authority that it otherwise possesses to dispose of the data.

[Justices Cromwell and Karakatsanis then addressed the question of whether Quebec had a legal right to receive the registry data from the federal government, concluding that it did not.]

C. Is Section 29 Ultra Vires Parliament's Criminal Law Power?

(1) Applicable Legal Principles

[27] The Constitution confers on Parliament the exclusive authority to legislate with respect to, among others, "all [m]atters" coming within "[t]he Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the Procedure in Criminal Matters": Constitution Act, 1867, s. 91(27). In that regard, the Chief Justice stated the following constitutional question in this case:

> Is s. 29 of the Ending the Long-gun Registry Act, S.C. 2012, c. 6, ultra vires Parliament having regard to its criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

[28] To answer this question, we first characterize the law — that is, determine its subject matter or "pith and substance" — and then classify it as to whether it is in relation to the subject of criminal law and procedure.

The "Matter" of Section 29

[34] In essence, Quebec submits that the pith and substance of s. 29 of the ELRA is to prevent the long-gun registry from being continued through provincial legislation. Although Quebec does not suggest that this "matter" comes within any of the enumerated heads of provincial legislative power, it submits nonetheless that the federal legislation is not a valid exercise of the criminal law power because it [TRANSLATION] "encroaches massively on the ability of a provincial legislature to exercise as it sees fit its powers with respect to the administration of justice, public safety, the prevention of crime and the social costs associated with crime": A.F., at para. 122; see also para. 115. Quebec relies on several statements made by the Prime Minister and other federal cabinet ministers to the effect that Canada's objective is to put a definite end to the long-gun registry by destroying the data contained in the CFR connected to long guns, and that they will do nothing to support any province or territory who would like to create a local long-gun registry. Quebec also submits that the effect of the destruction of the data will be to make it prohibitively expensive and complicated for the province to create its own long-gun registry. Section 29 of the ELRA therefore constitutes an encroachment on the province's powers.

[35] Canada submits that the subject matter of s. 29 is the same as the rest of the ELRA: to abolish the long-gun registry and put an end to what it considers an unwarranted intrusion into the private lives of Canadian gun owners. Canada also asserts that the practical effects of the destruction of the data on provinces who want to create their own gun control scheme do not change the pith and substance of the impugned provision.

[36] In our respectful view, the proper characterization of the "matter" of s. 29 of the ELRA derives from that of the scheme that it is undoing. In the Reference re Firearms Act, this Court held that both the criminal prohibition on possessing an unregistered firearm and the registration scheme provided for in the Firearms Act were valid public safety measures. It determined that the purpose of the scheme was to address "the problem of the misuse of firearms and the threat it poses to public safety": para. 21. It also held that the effects of the scheme supported the conclusion that the Firearms Act is a public safety measure: para. 24. The Court rejected arguments from Ontario and Saskatchewan to the effect that the "matter" of the registration and data retention provisions, which s. 29 seeks to dismantle, was the regulation of property within the province. The Court concluded that the "matter" of these provisions was the same as the rest of the scheme — public safety — and that they should accordingly be classified as being in relation to the subject of criminal law […].

[37] Viewed in this light, the "matter" of s. 29 is simply to determine what will happen with the data collected under a now repealed legislative scheme. Given that the "matter" of the registration scheme, including data collection, was found to be public safety in the Reference re Firearms Act, dealing with the collected data following the repeal of the scheme must share that same characterization. It is logical that the ELRA provides for what is to happen with the remains of the scheme that it repeals, and destroying the data is the means Parliament adopted to accomplish that purpose. […]

[38] Quebec's submissions, in our respectful view, confuse the subject matter of s. 29 of the ELRA with Canada's motives and the means employed by Parliament. In determining the true character of s. 29, we are not concerned with whether destroying the data is good policy, whether Canada's motives were sound, or whether the destruction of that data conflicts with the policy objectives of Quebec. We recognize that the federal government's ultimate goal may well have been to prevent Quebec from creating its own long-gun registry. We also accept that the destruction of the data is the means chosen by Canada because of its irremediable nature. That being said, these considerations are not indicative of a "colourable" purpose from a division of powers' perspective. An intention on the part of one level of government to prevent another from realizing a policy objective it disagrees with does not, on its own, lead to the conclusion that there is an encroachment on the other level of government's sphere of exclusive jurisdiction. The fact that s. 29 of the ELRA has the practical effect of making it more difficult financially for Quebec to create its own gun control regime does not […] affect the pith and substance of the provision. […]

[41] In summary, this Court has already been called upon in the Reference re Firearms Act to determine the pith and substance of the scheme enacted by the Firearms Act. In our view, legislation repealing the part of that scheme relating to long guns, including a provision addressing what will happen to the data collected thereunder, must be characterized in the same way. We conclude that s. 29, in essence, relates to public safety — as did the long-gun registration scheme being repealed by the balance of the ELRA.

Classification: Does Section 29 Come Within the Criminal Law Power?

[42] Quebec submits that s. 29 cannot be a valid exercise of Parliament's criminal law power because it is not aimed at preventing crime or at decriminalizing any conduct. We disagree and would hold that s. 29 of the ELRA falls under the criminal law head of power.

[43] It is not contested that the repeal of criminal provisions constitutes a valid exercise of the criminal law power: Hogg, at p. 18-21. We accept that there is a factual difference between repealing a criminal provision and providing for what will happen to the data collected under that provision. That being said, we are of the view that there is no significant legal distinction between these two actions in the current case because the data at issue here was collected exclusively through the exercise of the criminal law power. The power to repeal a criminal law provision must logically be wide enough to give Parliament jurisdiction to destroy the data collected for the purpose of a criminal law provision. If a law establishing a scheme requiring collection of data is legislation "in relation to" criminal law, then legislation providing for the destruction of that data on the repeal of the scheme must also be legislation "in relation to" criminal law. This is the case here.

[44] In addition, the prospect that Parliament would not have the power to destroy records under its control and created under a scheme validly enacted by it is concerning. Since we do not see how provinces could have the power to destroy the data contained in the federally enacted long-gun registry, Quebec's position — if it were accepted — would suggest that neither Parliament nor provincial legislatures could legislate to destroy the data of the repealed scheme. We reject this proposition as it would run afoul of the principle that the Constitution Act, 1867 provides for a complete division of powers between both orders of governments […]. There is no topic that cannot be legislated upon […]. Quebec's proposition would also be inconsistent with the notion that Parliament possesses the residual power to legislate on subject matters that do not come within a provincial head of power […].

[45] Therefore, we agree with the Quebec Court of Appeal that s. 29 of the ELRA should be characterized as being in relation to criminal law. It therefore falls within the legislative competence of Parliament.

English version of the reasons of LeBel, Abella, Wagner and Gascon JJ. delivered by

LeBel, Wagner and Gascon JJ. (dissenting) —

[50] We are of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed, but only in part. This conclusion is dictated by the exceptional circumstances in which long-gun regulation was implemented in Canada. In our opinion, and this is where we diverge from our colleagues' view, both the collection of the data with respect to long guns and the broader initiatives aimed at regulating the use of such guns were the result of a partnership with the provinces, including Quebec. Where an integrated scheme such as this requires the exercise of both federal and provincial legislative powers, the analytical framework for questions related to the division of powers must be adapted and applied accordingly. Whether the means the federal government adopted to terminate this partnership were constitutional can be measured, in particular, in terms of the effect they will have on its partners' powers.

[51] The ELRA is the measure chosen by Parliament to end its participation in long-gun regulation. But s. 29 goes beyond the scope of that purpose, as it requires that the data in question be destroyed without providing for a possibility of their first being transferred to the provincial partners, which prevents the latter from using them in the exercise of their powers. This section has significant effects on Quebec's legislative powers and is not necessary to the achievement of the ELRA's purpose. Section 29 is therefore unconstitutional and should be declared to be invalid.

[52] Although we find that s. 29 is unconstitutional, the AGQ has nonetheless failed to establish a legal basis for his request for a compulsory transfer of the data. The conditions applicable to such a transfer are a matter for the governments concerned, not the courts.

[152] The dominant tide with respect to the division of powers admits of overlapping powers and favours co-operation between the different levels of governments. It also supports the validity of schemes established jointly through partnerships developed between members of our federation. In our opinion, our courts must protect such schemes both when they are implemented and when they are dismantled. It would hardly make sense to encourage co-operation and find that schemes established in the context of a partnership are valid while at the same time refusing to take this particular context into account when those schemes are terminated.

[153] In our opinion, the dismantling of a partnership like the one established with respect to gun control must be carried out in a manner that is compatible with the principle of federalism that underlies our Constitution. Thus, Parliament or a provincial legislature cannot adopt legislation to terminate such a partnership without taking into account the reasonably foreseeable consequences of the decision to do so for the other partner. The courts must, in considering whether legislation or a statutory provision having as its purpose to dismantle the partnership is constitutional, be aware of the impact of that legislation or provision on the other partner's exercise of its powers, especially when the partner that terminates the relationship is intentionally bringing about that impact.

[154] In other words, a co-operative scheme from which both the federal and provincial governments benefit cannot be dismantled unilaterally by one of the parties without taking the impact of such a decision on its partner's heads of power into account. To conclude otherwise would be to accept a one-way form of co-operative federalism. That would upset the balance between, on the one hand, the principle of co-operative federalism — which permits a government at one level to pass laws that have an impact on the powers of the other level — and, on the other hand, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity — which is inherent in the principle of federalism. The requirement that a government respect the other level's powers is all the more important when the parties have chosen to form a partnership. In a co-operative context, actions of a government at one level can have serious consequences for the other level. It is therefore necessary to show vigilance for the increased risk of disrupting the constitutional balance that is protected by the principle of federalism. The concern here is not to alter the separation of powers in our Constitution through the application of co-operative federalism, but to ensure that it is respected. […]

D. Constitutionality of Section 29 of the ELRA

[157] […] It is true that Parliament can repeal or amend legislation it has validly enacted under one of its heads of power: Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), 1991 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 525, at pp. 548-49. Nevertheless, the courts must consider the impugned provision or legislation to determine whether, in pith and substance, all that it does in fact is repeal or amend legislation that was validly enacted.

(1) Analysis Regarding the Pith and Substance of Section 29

[176] In our opinion, in light of its purpose and its effect, s. 29 goes much farther than simply requiring that the data be destroyed. Given that they are to be destroyed with no possibility of their first being transferred to the partners, and therefore without the impact of this measure on the partners' exercise of their powers being taken into account, the section's true purpose is to ensure that the information on long guns can no longer be used for any provincial purposes. As we mentioned above, however, the regulation of long guns and the use of information about them fall primarily within the provinces' power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights. This is all the more true now that the failure to comply with the requirement to register has been decriminalized, because the use of the information has lost its federal aspect. As a result, the pith and substance of s. 29 relates to the provinces' power over property and civil rights.

[177] To be valid, therefore, s. 29 must be integrated into the ELRA as a whole. This conclusion makes sense to us, given that whether the CFR is constitutional in fact depends on its being ancillary to a criminal law purpose, as the Court found in the FA Reference.

(2) Ancillary Powers Analysis

[178] To determine whether s. 29 of the ELRA is constitutional on the basis of the ancillary powers doctrine, we must consider the seriousness, or extent, of its encroachment on provincial powers, bearing in mind that the provincial power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights is a head that should not be intruded upon lightly: General Motors, at pp. 672-73. We should mention that s. 29 may also encroach on the provinces' powers in relation to the administration of justice, as can be seen from our analysis below.

[179] The seriousness of the encroachment of s. 29 must be analyzed on the basis of the specific factual and legal context of the instant case, which includes the existence of the partnership between the federal government and Quebec.

[184] [I]n terms of both its nature and its effects, s. 29 causes a substantial encroachment on provincial jurisdiction. In such a case, the Court's past decisions tell us that for the encroachment of s. 29 to be found to be ancillary to the ELRA, the degree to which the section is integrated into the Act must be high, that is, it must satisfy the necessity or "integral part" criterion: General Motors, at p. 671; see also Northern Telecom Ltd. v. Communications Workers of Canada, 1979 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 115; Clark v. Canadian National Railway Co., 1988 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 680; R. v. Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Ltd., 1979 CanLII 187 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 695.

[186] In our opinion, the destruction of the data in question in s. 29 cannot be considered necessary to the abolition of the requirement to register long guns. These two purposes are distinct. Moreover, as we mentioned above, the earlier bills did not provide for the destruction of these data.

[187] We also doubt that s. 29 can be linked to the ELRA on the basis of a test of rationality. Although the destruction of data in which the federal government is no longer interested might seem rational at first glance, we find it hard to reconcile the manner in which their destruction was provided for with the desire certain provinces might show to maintain a registry within the limits of their powers. The AGC in fact acknowledged at the hearing that what was problematic was not really the fact of transferring the data to the government of Quebec, but that of transmitting personal information about long-gun owners: transcript, at p. 55. We have already rejected this argument as an explanation of the refusal to transfer the data.

[188] Finally, we agree with Blanchard J. that Parliament's declared intention to cause harm to the other level of government cannot be disregarded. This Court had written the following in the FA Reference:

> This law does not allow the federal government to significantly expand its jurisdictional powers to the detriment of the provinces. There is no colourable intrusion into provincial jurisdiction, either in the sense that Parliament has an improper motive or that it is taking over provincial powers under the guise of the criminal law. [para. 53]

In this appeal, we cannot say the same thing about the ELRA, as the exact opposite is true.

[189] Although it is not necessary to take this into account for the purposes of our analysis, the intention to cause harm is all the more relevant in that it arises in a context in which Quebec and the federal government had agreed to act jointly, in the spirit of co-operative federalism, a principle whose source lies in the growing need for intergovernmental co-operation in order to enable the Canadian federation to act to address questions of a polycentric nature. In this context, it is hard to imagine how a provision whose purpose is to put an end to this co-operation and that is enacted with an intention to cause harm to a partner can be rational.

[191] Our conclusion does not necessarily mean that Parliament cannot enact legislation to destroy the data. What we are saying is merely that to destroy the data, as provided for in s. 29, without first offering to transfer them is unconstitutional. This conclusion is therefore not incompatible with the principle of parliamentary sovereignty as set out in s. 42 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-21, as parliamentary sovereignty is applicable only where Parliament has exercised one of its legislative powers validly, that is, in a manner consistent with the Constitution. That is not the case here.

[Justices LeBel, Wagner, and Gascon would have limited the resulting declaration of invalidity to data regarding long guns that have a connection with Quebec. They declined, however, to issue a declaration that Quebec is entitled to the data, leaving the precise form of the "termination of their joint venture" to the two governments to negotiate.]

For a discussion of the principle of cooperative federalism as it arises in this case, see Kate Glover, "Structural Cooperative Federalism" (2016) 76 SCLR (2d) 45 and Eric M Adams, Judging the Limits of Cooperative Federalism" (2016) 76 SCLR (2d) 27.

The next section of this chapter approaches the interaction of federal and provincial legislative authority in the context of the criminal power from the other direction—by examining provincial power over morality and public order.

3 The provincial power over morality and public order

Section 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867 confers on provinces the power to impose punishment "by Fine, Penalty or Imprisonment". The section empowers provinces to impose these punishments for the purpose of enforcing laws made in relation to any powers within provincial jurisdiction. As you have seen, the provincial powers to legislate in respect of property and civil rights (section 92(13)) and matters of a merely local nature (section 92(16) are broad. Moreover, as you will see in the cases that follow, courts have found that provinces can validly legislate under those powers, when regulating matters relating to morality and public order. As a consequence, provinces have potentially broad powers to legislate over matters that seem to overlap with some of the criminal law purposes identified in the cases above. Provinces can, moreover, enforce such legislation with punishment. Where, then, do courts draw the dividing line between the federal criminal law power and the provincial powers to regulate over morality and public order? The debate between the majority and dissent in the following case illustrates the challenges involved in that line-drawing exercise.

3.1.1 Dissent

Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil*, 1978 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 662

The judgment of Laskin C.J. and Judson, Spence and Dickson JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)—The Attorney General of Nova Scotia appeals, with leave of this Court, from a judgment of the Appeal Division of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court declaring, by unanimous decision of the four members of the Appeal Division, that (1) it was ultra vires the Legislature of Nova Scotia to enact, by use of the word "prohibiting", s. 2(1)(b)(g) and s. 3(2)(3) of the Theatres and Amusements Act, R.S.N.S. 1967, c. 304, as amended, and (2) Regulations 4, 5(1), 13, 18 and 32, made pursuant to the Act were also ultra vires.

The issue in this appeal which gave rise to the declaration of invalidity was precipitated by the banning by the Amusements Regulation Board (a tribunal established under the aforementioned Act and known prior to May 15, 1972, as the Nova Scotia Board of Censors) of the film "Last Tango in Paris" from public viewing in theatres or other places in the Province. The ban was announced on or about January 8, 1974. No reasons were given for the prohibition and, indeed, it was one of the submissions of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia that reasons were not obligatory because there was no requirement under the Act or Regulations that the Board give reasons. […]

In this Court, following the granting of leave to appeal, the constitutional question to be considered was formulated as follows by an order of June 4, 1976, amended by an order of July 5, 1976:

18. (1) No film shall be used or exhibited in the Province unless the film has been submitted to the Board and the Board has authorized the use or exhibition thereof.

(2) The Board may authorize or prohibit the use or exhibition of any film may authorize the use of any film with such changes as it may direct. No film shall be so changed without the consent of the film exchange.

(3) The Board shall give a certificate in respect of every film which it has authorized for use or exhibition in the Province.

(4) The Board may at any time or from time to time re-examine any film and may prohibit the use or exhibition of any film which it has previously authorized for use or exhibition or may permit its use or exhibition with such further changes as the Board may direct.

(2) No performer shall take part in any indecent or improper performance.

(3) The Board may from time to time define what constitutes an indecent or improper performance within the meaning of these Regulations.

The issues before this Court in the present case do not engage the licensing authority of the Amusements Regulation Board, they do not relate to any film classification system, they are in no way concerned with the safety or suitability of premises in which films are sought to be exhibited or presented. The only inference that can be, indeed must be, drawn from the bare facts on the record is that the Board presumes to protect the general public from exposure to certain kinds of films, to insulate members of the public from viewing those films because, in the Board's allegedly unchallengeable judgment, the general public should not see them. Put another way, the Board asserts an unlimited statutory authority to determine for the general public what films are fit for public viewing.

Nova Scotia is not the only Province where censorship of films is left at large to a tribunal upon whose judgment the public is required to rely as to what may or may not be seen. […]

In those Provinces where criteria were set out in film censorship legislation, general terms were used in giving direction to film censors to determine the fitness of films for public viewing. For example, they were to determine whether the films depicted "scenes of an immoral or obscene nature" or suggested "lewdness or indecency" or were "injurious to the morals of the city or any citizen thereof" or offered "evil suggestions to the minds of children" or were against the public welfare or likely to offend the public. […]

I have referred to provincial censorship legislation in the other Provinces not to pass any judgment on any of it but simply to show the various ways in which movie censorship is being handled in the various Provinces, the more recent legislation having moved to a classification scheme and to advertising control. The former is not involved in the present case and the latter in only a supplementary way.

What is involved, as I have already noted, is an unqualified power in the Nova Scotia Board to determine the fitness of films for public viewing on considerations that may extend beyond the moral and may include the political, the social and the religious. Giving its assertion of power the narrowest compass, related to the film in the present case, the Board is asserting authority to protect public morals, to safeguard the public from exposure to films, to ideas and images in films, that it regards as morally offensive, as indecent, probably as obscene.

The determination of what is decent or indecent or obscene in conduct or in a publication, what is morally fit for public viewing, whether in films, in art or in a live performance is, as such, within the exclusive power of the Parliament of Canada under its enumerated authority to legislate in relation to the criminal law. […]

It is beside the point to urge that morality is not co-extensive with the criminal law. Such a contention cannot of itself bring legislation respecting public morals within provincial competence. Moreover, the federal power in relation to the criminal law extends beyond control of morality, and is wide enough to embrace anti-social conduct or behaviour and has, indeed, been exercised in those respects. Films have been held to fall within s. 159 of the Criminal Code, dealing with obscene publications […]. I draw attention as well to s. 163 of the Criminal Code dealing with the presentation or giving of immoral, indecent or obscene performances, entertainments or representations, and it seems to me that if films are within s. 159 they are a fortiori within s. 163. […]

This is not a case where civil consequences are attached to conduct defined and punished as criminal under federal legislation […], but rather a case where a provincially authorized tribunal itself defines and determines legality, what is permissible and what is not. This, in my view, is a direct intrusion into the field of criminal law. At best, what the challenged Nova Scotia legislation is doing is seeking to supplement the criminal law enacted by Parliament, and this is forbidden […].

It does not follow from all of the foregoing that provincial legislative authority may not extend to objects where moral considerations are involved, but those objects must in themselves be anchored in the provincial catalogue of powers and must, moreover, not be in conflict with valid federal legislation. It is impossible in the present case to find any such anchorage in the provisions of the Nova Scotia Statute that are challenged, and this apart from the issue of conflict which, I think, arises in relation to ss. 159 and 163 of the Criminal Code. What is asserted, by way of tying the challenged provisions to valid provincial regulatory control, is that the Province is competent to licence the use of premises, and entry into occupations, and may in that connection determine what shall be exhibited in those premises. This hardly touches the important issue raised by the present case and would, if correct, equally justify control by the Province of any conduct and activity in licensed premises even if not related to the property aspect of licensing, and this is patently indefensible. Moreover, what is missing from this assertion by the appellant is a failure to recognize that the censorship of films takes place without relation to any premises and is a direct prior control of public taste.

For all the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss this appeal and answer the constitutional question in the negative. […]

3.1.2 Majority

The judgment of Martland, Ritchie, Pigeon, Beetz and de Grandpré JJ. was delivered by

RITCHIE J.— […]

I should say that I have had the benefit of reading the reasons for judgment prepared for delivery by the Chief Justice in which he has recited the relevant sections of the Act and of the Regulations made thereunder […].

In all such cases, the Court cannot ignore the rule implicit in the proposition stated as early as 1878 by Mr. Justice Strong in Severn v. The Queen, at p. 103, that any question as to the validity of provincial legislation is to be approached on the assumption that it was validly enacted. As was said by Fauteux J., as he then was, in the Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, at p. 255:

> There is a presumptio juris as to the existence of the bona fide intention of a legislative body to confine itself to its own sphere and a presumption of similar nature that general words in a statute are not intended to extend its operation beyond the territorial authority of the Legislature.

When the Act and the Regulations are read as a whole, I find them to be primarily directed to the regulation, supervision and control of the film business within the Province of Nova Scotia, including the use and exhibition of films in that Province. To this end the impugned provisions are in my view enacted for the purpose of reinforcing the authority vested in a provincially appointed Board to perform the task of regulation which includes the authority to prevent the exhibition of films which the Board, applying its own local standards, has rejected as unsuitable for viewing by provincial audiences. This legislation is concerned with dealings in and the use of property (i.e. films) which take place wholly within the Province […].

It will be seen that, in my opinion, the impugned legislation constitutes nothing more than the exercise of provincial authority over transactions taking place wholly within the province and it applies to the "regulating, exhibition, sale and exchange of films" whether those films have been imported from another country or not.

We are concerned however in this appeal with a decision of the Appeal Division of the Supreme Court of. Nova Scotia in which the majority quite clearly struck down the legislation as ultra vires on the sole ground that it was concerned with morality and as such constituted an invasion of the criminal law field reserved to the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament under s. 91(27) of the B.N.A. Act.

In the present context, the question of whether or not the impugned legislation encroaches on the criminal law authority is, in my opinion, best approached in light of the statement made by Kerwin, C.J., in the course of his reasons for judgment in the Lord's Day Alliance, at p. 503, where he said:

> In constitutional matters there is no general area of criminal law and in every case the pith and substance of the legislation in question must be looked at.

Under the authority assigned to it by s. 91(27), the Parliament of Canada has enacted the Criminal Code, a penal statute the end purpose of which is the definition and punishement of crime when it has been proved to have been committed.

On the other hand, the Theatres and Amusements Act is not concerned with creating a criminal offence or providing for its punishment, but rather in so regulating a business within the Province as to prevent the exhibition in its theatres of performances which do not comply with the standards of propriety established by the Board.

The areas of operation of the two statutes are therefore fundamentally different on dual grounds. In the first place, one is directed to regulating a trade or business where the other is concerned with the definition and punishment of crime; and in the second place, one is preventive while the other is penal.

As the decision of the Appellate Division depends upon equating morality with criminality, I think it desirable at this stage to refer to the definitive statement made by Lord Atkin in this regard in the course of his reasons for judgment in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General of Canda, where he said, at p. 324:

> Morality and criminality are far from coextensive; nor is the sphere of criminality necessarily part of a more extensive field covered by morality—unless the moral code necessarily disapproves all acts prohibited by the State, in which case the argument moves in a circle. It appears to their Lordships to be of little value to seek to confine crimes to a category of acts which by their very nature belong to the domain of 'criminal jurisprudence';…

I share the opinion expressed in this passage that morality and criminality are far from coextensive and it follows in my view that legislation which authorizes the establishment and enforcement of a local standard of morality in the exhibition of films is not necessarily "an invasion of the federal criminal field" […].

As I have already said, however, I take the view that the impugned legislation is not concerned with criminality. The rejection of films by the Board is based on a failure to conform to the standards of propriety which it has itself adopted and this failure cannot be said to be "an act prohibited with penal consequences" by the Parliament of Canada either in enacting the Criminal Code or othewise [sic]. This is not to say that Parliament is in any way restricted in its authority to pass laws penalizing immoral acts or conduct, but simply that the provincial government in regulating a local trade may set its own standards which in no sense exclude the operation of the federal law.

There is, in my view, no constitutional barrier preventing the Board from rejecting a film for exhibition in Nova Scotia on the sole ground that it fails to conform to standards of morality which the Board itself has fixed notwithstanding the fact that the film is not offensive to any provision of the Criminal Code; and, equally, there is no constitutional reason why a prosecution cannot be brought under s. 163 of the Criminal Code in respect of the exhibition of a film which the Board of Censors has approved as conforming to its standards of propriety.

It will be seen that in my view the impugned legislation "has for its true object, purpose, nature and character" the regulation and control of a local trade and that it is therefore valid provincial legislation.

As I have said, I take the view that the legislation here in question is in pith and substance directed to property and civil rights and therefore valid under s. 92(13) of the British North America Act, but there is a further and different ground on which its validity might be sustained. In a country as vast and diverse as Canada, where tastes and standards may vary from one area to another, the determination of what is and what is not acceptable for public exhibition on moral grounds may be viewed as a matter of a "local and private nature in the Province" within the meaning of s. 92(16) of the B.N.A. Act, and as it is not a matter coming within any of the classes of subject enumerated in s. 91, this is a field in which the Legislature is free to act.

According to the majority in McNeil, provincial laws in relation to morality are valid if they can be classified as falling under provincial heads of powers. In the following judgment, the Court held that a municipal by-law could not be classified in this way.

3.2 Westendorp v. the Queen

Westendorp v. the Queen, 1983 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 43

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

1. THE CHIEF JUSTICE--This appeal, which is here by leave of this Court, arises out of a charge against the appellant of being on a street for the purpose of prostitution in contravention of s. 6.1(2) of By-law 9022 of the City of Calgary, as enacted by amending By-law 25M81. The accused was acquitted at her trial on the ground, inter alia, that the impugned by-law was unconstitutional as invading federal authority in relation to the criminal law as well as federal legislation in that area. […]

The Facts

2. The facts are not in dispute. There is no question but that the accused and a female friend approached a plain clothes officer on a city street and solicited his interest to engage in intercourse or fellatio for stated payments. They moved with him to a car on a parking lot where another plain clothes officer was waiting and both women were then arrested. The charge followed, reading that the accused Westendorp was on the street for the purpose of prostitution.

4. […] The central question is, of course, that of constitutional validity, and I turn to […] a consideration of the terms of the challenged by-law.

The Issues

5. Three issues were raised in the appeal, of which only the constitutional issue need be addressed. Of the two which may be set aside, one was whether the power to enact this by-law was delegated to the municipality as allegedly conferred by the provincial legislature. I am prepared to proceed in this respect on the supposition that the challenged by-law was authorized under provincial legislation. […]

7. What, therefore, is left for determination by this Court is whether the challenged by-law s. 6.1(1) is outside the powers assigned to the Province, invading federal legislative authority. In my opinion, for the reasons expressed below, the by-law is ultra vires as invading exclusive federal power in relation to the criminal law.

The Calgary By-law and Section 6.1 thereof

8. By-law 9022, first enacted in 1974, and cited as The Street By-law, is an extensive regulatory and prohibitory enactment relating to the use of city streets. I shall come to some of its details shortly. As it first stood, it contained no provision respecting prostitution although it did embrace control of certain street activities such as soliciting or carrying on business, trades or occupations on any street. On June 25, 1981, city council amended By-law 9022 by enacting By-law 25M81, adding s. 6.1 to the master by-law. Clearly, it had to stand on its own terms because there was no suggestion that prior to its enactment what it encompassed could in any way be subsumed under any other terms of the master by-law.

11. Section 6.1, when separately enacted under By-law 25M81, was preceded by a heading and a lengthy recital which were as follows:

> Being a By-law of The City of Calgary to Amend By-law Number 9022 to Prohibit Use of City Streets by those Approaching or being Approached by Others for the Purpose of Prostitution
> > WHEREAS subsection (3) of section 169 of The Municipal Government Act provides that subject to every other act, a municipal council has control and management of, among other things, the public highways, roads, streets, lanes, alleys and bridges within the municipality including the air space above;

> AND WHEREAS subsection (1) of section 14 of The Highway Traffic Act 1975 provides, among other things, that a municipal council may make by-laws controlling and regulating the use of all highways, sidewalks and other public places and delegating to the chief constable or municipal commissioner any powers in connection therewith;
> AND WHEREAS there are persons who locate themselves upon, and hold themselves out on City streets for the purpose of prostitution;
> AND WHEREAS there are persons who approach or are approached by others on City streets for the purpose of prostitution;
> AND WHEREAS these above mentioned persons often collect in groups on City streets and attract crowds on City streets, vehicular and pedestrian;
> AND WHEREAS the above mentioned activities are a source of annoyance and embarrassment to members of the public and interfere with their right and ability to move freely and peacefully upon the City streets;
> AND WHEREAS it is expedient to provide by by-law that the highways, streets, sidewalks, alleys, lanes and public places of the City shall not be used for the purpose of holding out or offering to other persons lawfully using the streets services of a prostitute and to amend by-law number 9022, The Street By-law for this purpose;

This heading and recital do not appear in s. 6.1 as it was subsumed under By-law 9022 but it was relied on to support the challenged by-law.

12. Section 6.1 as found in by-law 9022 reads:

6.1 (1) In this section

(a) "offering" includes but is not limited to the holding out, proposing, making available or expressing willingness to participate in a sexual service with a person for payment;

(b) "prostitution" means the sale or offering for sale of sexual services and includes the purchase or offering to purchase sexual services;

(c) "sexual services" include but are not limited to activities of a sexual nature for amusement, gratification, pleasure, stimulation, titillation or otherwise of any person;

(2) No person shall be or remain on a street for the purpose of prostitution.

(3) No person shall approach another person on a street for the purpose of prostitution.

(4) Any person contravening the provisions of this section is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction;

(a) for a first offence to a fine of not less than one hundred dollars ($100.00) and not more than five hundred dollars ($500.00) or in default of payment of the fine and costs, to imprisonment for not more than sixty (60) days; and

(b) for a second or subsequent offence to a fine of not less than three hundred dollars ($300.00) and not more than five hundred dollars ($500.00) or in default of payment of the fine and costs to imprisonment for not more than six (6) months unless in either case the fine and costs, including the cost of committal are sooner paid.

Terms of Section 6.1: Its Pith and Substance

16. It is patent, from a comparison of s. 6.1 with ss. 3, 4 and 5 of the by-law, that s. 6.1 is of a completely different order from its preceding sections and, certainly, from all those succeeding it. It is specious to regard s. 6.1 as relating to control of the streets. If that were its purpose, it would have dealt with congregation of persons on the streets or with obstruction, unrelated to what the congregating or obstructing persons say or otherwise do. As the by-law stands and reads, it is activated only by what is said by a person, referable to the offer of sexual services. For persons to converse together on a street, as did the two women and the police officer here, and to discuss a recent or upcoming sporting event or a concert or some similar event would not attract liability. It is triggered only by an offer of sexual services or a solicitation to that end. There is no violation of s. 6.1 by congregation or obstruction per se; the offence arises only by proposing or soliciting another for prostitution. To remain on a street for the purpose of prostitution or to approach another for that purpose is so patently an attempt to control or punish prostitution as to be beyond question. […] There is no property question here, no question even of interference with the enjoyment of public property let alone private property.

17. Nor can any comparison be made between this case and the judgment of this Court in Attorney General for Canada and Dupond v. Montreal […] which related to a municipal anti-demonstration by-law which was also emphasized as being of a temporary nature. That by-law related plainly to parades and assemblies on the streets, different from s. 6.1 of the present case.

18. The question remains, however, whether, recognizing the differences in principle between the present case and the three cases in this Court mentioned above, there is nonetheless constitutional scope for the valid enactment of the challenged by-law. This brings me to consider the reasons given by Kerans J.A. for upholding the by-law. He construed it as an attempt to deal with a public nuisance. This is not how the offence under the by-law is either defined or charged. The recitals in the by-law as enacted by By-law 25M81 cannot be used to justify substantive charging sections when those sections contain a different formulation and their own definition of an offence. It is these aspects that present the constitutional issue.

19. In examining the submission of counsel for the accused that the by-law was a colourable attempt to deal, not with a public nuisance but with the evil of prostitution, Kerans J.A. observed that the evil of prostitution is a matter of public morality and, if the pith and substance of this legislation were an attack on this evil, it might well be a matter beyond the competence of the Legislature of Alberta. He then went on to say that "the by-law does not strike at prostitution as such; it does not seek to suppress the market for sexual favours; it seeks only to protect the citizens who use the streets from the irritation and embarrassment of being unwilling participants in that market".

20. This assessment of "pith and substance" is to me baffling when regard is had to the terms of s. 6.1. It becomes doubly baffling when Kerans J.A. says this:

> I concede that the Calgary legislation makes it an offence for a prostitute simply to enter upon a street for the purpose of prostitution, i.e. without yet doing anything. But this is not an attack on prostitution as such. This is an attempt, by preventative measure, to regulate the activities of the prostitutes and their customers on the streets. It is, as it were, a pre-emptive strike. And as such is troubling. But it is insufficiently troubling to change the pith and substance of the legislation.

21. What appears to me to emerge from Kerans J.A.'s consideration of the by-law is to establish a concurrency of legislative power, going beyond any double aspect principle and leaving it open to a province or to a municipality authorized by a province to usurp exclusive federal legislative power. If a province or municipality may translate a direct attack on prostitution into street control through reliance on public nuisance, it may do the same with respect to trafficking in drugs. And, may it not, on the same view, seek to punish assaults that take place on city streets as an aspect of street control!

22. However desirable it may be for the municipality to control or prohibit prostitution, there has been an overreaching in the present case which offends the division of legislative powers. I would, accordingly, allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal and restore the acquittal directed by the Provincial Court Judge.

Appeal allowed.

The Court in Westendorp cited to the case of Dupond. The majority in Dupond emphasized the purely local nature of the activities that were prohibited by the municipal regulations in that case and upheld the regulations as falling within provincial jurisdiction. The Court in Westendorp distinguished the bylaw in Dupond from the one at issue in Westendorp, by stating that the former bylaw was "plainly related to parades and assemblies on the streets." Is that distinction convincing? Can you articulate a principled distinction between the outcome in Westendorp and the results in Dupond and McNeil? Do the cases primarily turn on how the different courts applied the pith and substance analysis or did the courts differ in how they understood the jurisdictional limits on the provincial powers to regulate public order and morality? For an analysis of these three cases, see Charles Bosecke, "Westendorp—The Demise of McNeil and Dupond" (1984) 22:3 Alb L Rev 525 .

The majority of the Supreme Court in McNeil and the Court of Appeal in Westendorp described the laws and regulations in the respective cases as having preventative and not punitive purposes. The Court in the case that follows also characterized the impugned provincial legislation as preventative. What role does that characterization play in the Court's coming to the conclusion that the legislation is intra vires?

3.3 Chatterjee v Ontario (Attorney General)

Chatterjee v Ontario (Attorney General)*, 2009 SCC 19 (CanLII), [2009] 1 SCR 624

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] BINNIE J. — The question raised on this appeal is whether the […] Civil Remedies Act, 2001 or CRA […], which authorizes the forfeiture of proceeds of unlawful activity, is ultra vires Ontario because it encroaches on the federal criminal law power. In my view, the CRA is valid provincial legislation.

[2] The argument that the CRA is ultra vires is based in this case on an exaggerated view of the immunity of federal jurisdiction in relation to matters that may, in another aspect, be the subject of provincial legislation. Resort to a federalist concept of proliferating jurisdictional enclaves (or "interjurisdictional immunities") was discouraged by this Court's decisions […] and should not now be given a new lease on life. As stated in Canadian Western Bank, "a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" […].

[3] The present appeal provides an opportunity to apply the principles of federalism affirmed in those recent cases. The CRA was enacted to deter crime and to compensate its victims. The former purpose is broad enough that both the federal government (in relation to criminal law) and the provincial governments (in relation to property and civil rights) can validly pursue it. The latter purpose falls squarely within provincial competence. Crime imposes substantial costs on provincial treasuries. Those costs impact many provincial interests, including health, policing resources, community stability and family welfare. It would be out of step with modern realities to conclude that a province must shoulder the costs to the community of criminal behaviour but cannot use deterrence to suppress it.

[4] Moreover, the CRA method of attack on crime is to authorize in rem forfeiture of its proceeds and differs from both the traditional criminal law which ordinarily couples a prohibition with a penalty […]. The appellant's answer, however, is that the effect of the CRA in rem remedy just adds to the penalties available in the criminal process, and as such the CRA invalidly interferes with the sentencing regime established by Parliament. It is true that forfeiture may have de facto punitive effects in some cases, but its dominant purpose is to make crime in general unprofitable, to capture resources tainted by crime so as to make them unavailable to fund future crime and to help compensate private individuals and public institutions for the costs of past crime. These are valid provincial objects. […]

I. Facts

[5] The appellant was stopped by York Regional Police on March 27, 2003, because his car had no front licence plate. A computer search showed the police that he was in breach of his recognizance, which required him to reside in Ottawa, some 400 kilometres away. When the appellant acknowledged that he was then living in Thornhill, just north of Toronto, the officers arrested him and, incidental to the arrest, searched his car. They discovered $29,020 in cash, as well as an exhaust fan, a light ballast and a light socket. According to police, all of these items smelled of marijuana, although no marijuana was found.

[6] The appellant was never charged with any offence in relation to the money, items, or any drug related activity. However, on May 13, 2003, the Attorney General of Ontario brought an interlocutory motion under ss. 4 and 9 of the CRA to preserve the seized money and equipment. A preservation order was granted.

[7] On May 16, 2003, the Attorney General brought an application under ss. 3 and 8 of the CRA for forfeiture of the seized money as proceeds of unlawful activity and of the items as instruments of unlawful activity. In response, the appellant challenged the CRA's constitutionality: that challenge eventually led to this appeal.

[15] Crime imposes significant costs at every level of government: federal, provincial and municipal. Impaired driving is a Criminal Code offence but carnage on the roads touches numerous matters within provincial jurisdiction including health, highways, automobile insurance and property damage. The cost associated with drug abuse is another example. Each level of government bears a portion of the costs of criminality and each level of government therefore has an interest in its suppression. The appellant's argument is, however, that the CRA adopts a method of fighting crime and compensating its victims that is not constitutionally permissible in relation to federal offences. The forfeiture of property tainted by crime in relation to federal offences, he says, "encroaches directly on the federal government's exclusive jurisdiction over criminal law and is ultra vires" […]. It is apparent that provincial objectives can become so entangled in the enforcement of criminal law as to be declared ultra vires. […] The appellant's contention that the CRA is an invalid attempt to increase the penalty for federal offences therefore requires careful scrutiny.

[After examining the title and several clauses in the CRA that spoke to its purposes, Binnie J. drew the following conclusion about the purpose of the Act.]

[18] The internal evidence of purpose thus suggests a credible intent to recover from the proceeds of crime found in Ontario the costs to victims and to the public of criminality that would otherwise fall on the provincial treasury. Forfeiture is the transfer of property from the owner to the Crown. Forfeiture does not result in the conviction of anybody for any offence. On its face, therefore, the CRA targets property rights.

[23] In essence, therefore, the CRA creates a property-based authority to seize money and other things shown on a balance of probabilities to be tainted by crime and thereafter to allocate the proceeds to compensating victims of and remedying the societal effects of criminality. The practical (and intended) effect is also to take the profit out of crime and to deter its present and would-be perpetrators.

[25] As stated, the CRA fits neatly into the provincial competence in relation to Property and Civil Rights in the Province (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92(13)) or Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province (s. 92(16)). The Attorneys General rely on Martineau v. M.N.R., 2004 SCC 81, [2004] 3 SCR 737, for the proposition that "civil mechanisms include the seizure as forfeit of goods and conveyances" (para. 27).

[Justice Binnie further noted the Court's jurisprudence provides "many examples of the interplay between provincial legislative jurisdiction over property and civil rights and federal legislative jurisdiction over criminal law and procedure." (para 26). He framed the issue in the following way.]

[29] The question, however, is at what point does a provincial measure designed to "suppress" crime become itself "criminal law"? There will often be a degree of overlap between measures enacted pursuant to the provincial power (property and civil rights) and measures taken pursuant to the federal power (criminal law and procedure). In such cases it is necessary for the Court to identify the "dominant feature" of an impugned measure. If, as is argued by the Attorneys General here, the dominant feature of the CRA is property and civil rights, it will not be invalidated because of an "incidental" intrusion into the field of criminal law.

Justice Binnie concluded that although the CRA may have had incidental effects on criminal law and procedure, it was valid because it was, in pith and substance, enacted in relation to the provincial powers he identified above. For an assessment of Chatterjee, see Carissima R Mathen, "Developments in Constitutional Law: The 2008-2009 Term" (2009) 48 SCLR (2d) 71.

This chapter concludes with a case in which the Court again considered provisions of a provincial law that interacted with federal legislation. In the process, the Court traced the boundary between Parliament's jurisdiction over criminal law matters and the power of the provinces to legislate in respect of public order and morality. The Court also applied the paramountcy doctrine and concluded that there was no conflict between the federal and provincial laws at issue in the case.

3.4 Murray-Hall v. Quebec (Attorney General)

Murray-Hall v. Quebec (Attorney General)*, 2023 SCC 10

THE CHIEF JUSTICE –

[1] A few years ago, the federal Parliament passed legislation relating to cannabis. Under that legislation, it is prohibited for an individual to possess or cultivate more than four cannabis plants in the individual's home. The provinces and territories subsequently passed their own legislation to regulate such practical matters as the manner in which cannabis was to be sold and stored. Through a broad legislative initiative that included the creation of a monopoly on the sale of cannabis, the Quebec legislature, for its part, enacted provisions that completely prohibit the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants at home, regardless of the number of plants. What must be determined in this appeal is whether the Quebec provisions are constitutionally valid in light of the division of powers and, if so, whether they are operative under the doctrine of federal paramountcy. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the impugned provisions are a valid exercise by the Quebec legislature of the powers conferred on it by s. 92(13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867. I also conclude that the impugned provisions do not frustrate the purpose of the federal legislation and are therefore operative.

[2] In these reasons, I express no opinion on the appropriateness or merits of the approaches adopted by Parliament and the Quebec legislature, respectively. I focus on explaining why two approaches to the self-cultivation of cannabis — the more "permissive" federal approach and the more "restrictive" Quebec approach — can coexist from a legal standpoint within the Canadian federation.

Background

[4] On June 19, 2018, Parliament passed Bill C-45, An Act respecting cannabis and to amend the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, the Criminal Code and other Acts, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl. On October 17, 2018, that statute came into force as the Cannabis Act, S.C. 2018, c. 16 ("federal Act"). Decriminalizing the recreational use of cannabis is the central feature of this legislation, which excludes this substance from the application of the criminal prohibitions set out in ss. 4 to 7.1 of the CDSA. The federal Act prohibits the possession of cannabis plants and the cultivation of such plants for personal purposes, but it exempts the possession and cultivation of no more than four plants from these prohibitions. The provisions creating the prohibitions read as follows:

Possession

8 (1) Unless authorized under this Act, it is prohibited

(e) for an individual to possess more than four cannabis plants that are not budding or flowering; . . .

Production

12 . . .

Cultivation, propagation and harvesting — 18 years of age or older

(4) Unless authorized under this Act, it is prohibited for an individual who is 18 years of age or older to cultivate, propagate or harvest, or to offer to cultivate, propagate or harvest,

(b) more than four cannabis plants at any one time in their dwelling-house.

[5] The enactment of the federal Act represents a paradigm shift in the Canadian legal landscape. Canada has moved from a suppression-based approach to a scheme that gives the provinces responsibility for determining the framework for the sale and distribution of cannabis within their borders. In other words, the provinces are being called upon to make laws, within their fields of jurisdiction, concerning a substance that was previously subject to criminal prohibitions for nearly a century. The statutes and regulations passed by the provinces in parallel with the federal Act primarily establish rules governing the sale of the substance, for example with regard to the location, operation and staff of the stores where the various cannabis products are sold. Much of the provincial legislation also sets out additional restrictions that supplement the federal legislative framework, including with respect to the minimum age required to purchase cannabis, the applicable limit on the possession of this substance and the places where it may be consumed in public.

[6] On June 12, 2018, the Quebec legislature introduced its own scheme to regulate cannabis when it passed Bill 157, An Act to constitute the Société québécoise du cannabis, to enact the Cannabis Regulation Act and to amend various highway safety-related provisions, 1st Sess., 41st Leg. The creation of the Société québécoise du cannabis ("SQDC"), a subsidiary of the Société des alcools du Québec with a monopoly on the sale of cannabis in Quebec, was one of the most important measures. The enactment of the Cannabis Regulation Act, CQLR, c. C-5.3 ("provincial Act"), was another. The provincial Act contains a broad range of provisions concerning the possession, cultivation, use, transportation, storage, sale and promotion of cannabis in Quebec. The specific provisions of the provincial Act being challenged in this case are ss. 5 and 10, which completely prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the cultivation of such plants for personal purposes in a dwelling-house. These prohibitions are accompanied by fines of between $250 and $750, which are doubled for a subsequent offence. ...:

> 5. It is prohibited to possess a cannabis plant.
> Anyone who contravenes the first paragraph commits an offence and is liable to a fine of $250 to $750. Those amounts are doubled for a subsequent offence.
> 10. It is prohibited to cultivate cannabis for personal purposes.
> That prohibition against cultivating cannabis applies, in particular, to the planting of seeds and plants, the propagation of plants from cuttings, the cultivation of plants and the harvesting of their production.
> Anyone who contravenes the first paragraph by cultivating four cannabis plants or less in their dwelling-house commits an offence and is liable to a fine of $250 to $750. Those amounts are doubled for a subsequent offence.
> For the purposes of the third paragraph, "dwelling-house" has the meaning assigned by subsection 8 of section 12 of the Cannabis Act (S.C. 2018, c. 16).

[7] Therefore, under ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act, the possession and cultivation at home of cannabis plants are subject to penal sanctions in Quebec — just as in Manitoba, which has adopted an approach similar to Quebec's in The Liquor, Gaming and Cannabis Control Act, C.C.S.M., c. L153, ss. 101.13(1) and 101.15.

[8] On October 25, 2018, the appellant in this Court, Janick Murray-Hall, brought an action in the Quebec Superior Court on his own behalf and on behalf of all persons who, in Quebec, are liable to be prosecuted for possession of a cannabis plant in their dwelling-house and who may thus face the penal consequences arising from the provincial Act. He argued that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act fall within the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and outside the heads of power assigned to the provinces. He sought a declaration from the Superior Court that these provisions are ultra vires or, in the alternative, that they are of no force or effect pursuant to the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

III. Issues

[18] This appeal raises the following two questions:

A. Did the Quebec Court of Appeal err in law in holding that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are constitutionally valid?

B. Did the Quebec Court of Appeal err in law in holding that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are constitutionally operative?

IV. Analysis

A. Did the Quebec Court of Appeal Err in Law in Holding That Sections 5 and 10 of the Provincial Act are Constitutionally Valid?

[20] As I will explain below, I am of the view that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are a valid exercise by the Quebec legislature of the powers conferred on it by s. 92(13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and that the Court of Appeal therefore made no error in its analysis of the validity of the impugned provisions.

(2) Characterization of the Impugned Provisions

[28] In my view, the pith and substance of the impugned provisions is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly in order to protect the health and security of the public, and of young persons in particular, from cannabis harm. It follows that the prohibitions against the possession of cannabis plants and their cultivation at home set out in ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are a means of serving the public health and security objectives pursued by that Act. With a few slight differences, my conclusion at the characterization stage is the same as that of the Court of Appeal.

[29] Before embarking on the analysis, I will provide a brief overview of the principles that apply in characterizing provisions that are alleged to be an integral part of a regulatory scheme. It is helpful to clarify the extent to which courts should analyze a law as a whole in order to characterize some of its provisions. The question is relevant in this case because the parties' disagreement at the characterization stage essentially stems from the emphasis they place, respectively, on the impugned provisions and on the provincial Act considered in its entirety. Mr. Murray-Hall focuses on the provisions themselves and criticizes the Court of Appeal for not truly considering the possibility that their purpose differs from that of the Act as a whole. The Attorney General of Quebec instead stresses the role played by the provisions in the scheme, endorsing the Court of Appeal's statement that [TRANSLATION] "their real purpose emerges only when they are analyzed in the overall context of the [provincial Act]" (para. 43).

[30] Where, as in this case, only very specific provisions are being challenged and not the entire law, certain principles apply. A court should begin by characterizing the provisions rather than considering the validity of the law as a whole, a principle articulated by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Attorney General of Canada v. Canadian National Transportation, Ltd., 1983 CanLII 36 (SCC), [1983] 2 SCR 206. However, Dickson J. added, this does not mean that the provisions must be read in isolation. A contextual analysis of the provisions is necessary when they are part of a regulatory scheme. […]

[33] I would also note that reading the impugned provisions in the context of the scheme into which they are integrated is crucial in distinguishing the purpose of the law from the means chosen to achieve it. Indeed, in Ward, McLachlin C.J. cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose" (para. 25).

[34] Bearing in mind the principles laid down in National Transportation and the note of caution sounded in Ward, I will now characterize ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act. I will consider the purpose of these provisions first and then their effects.

(c) Conclusion on Pith and Substance

[64] For the reasons given above, I conclude that the pith and substance of ss. 5 and 10 is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly on the sale of cannabis in order to protect the health and security of the public, and of young persons in particular, from the harm caused by this substance. Prohibiting the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants is not in itself the purpose of the impugned provisions, but rather a means of steering consumers to the only source of supply considered to be reliable and safe.

(3) Classification of the Impugned Provisions

[65] In this case, the question before us at the classification stage is whether the impugned provisions fall within the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 or within the powers conferred on the provinces over property and civil rights and matters of a merely local or private nature by s. 92(13) and (16), respectively. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are related to the provinces' powers and are therefore intra vires the Quebec legislature.

[67] In my view, even though ss. 5 and 10 seemingly have all the characteristics of criminal law, they should still not be classified under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. For the reasons that follow, I believe that the classification of the provisions challenged in this case cannot be determined simply on the basis of the correspondence between the three requirements set out in the Margarine Reference on the one hand and these provisions on the other.

[68] First, Parliament's decision to decriminalize conduct leaves the field clear for the provinces to enact their own prohibitions accompanied by penalties in relation to that conduct, as long as the prohibitions serve to enforce laws relating to matters within provincial jurisdiction (s. 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867). It follows that penal regulatory measures adopted by the provinces with regard to decriminalized activities are not necessarily attempts to legislate in criminal matters. This is why Major J. wrote in Siemens v. Manitoba (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 3, [2003] 1 SCR 6, that "[t]he mere presence of a prohibition and a penalty does not invalidate an otherwise acceptable use of provincial legislative power" (para. 25).

[69] Second, it is recognized that the provinces have jurisdiction to make laws in relation to several matters that touch on purposes that otherwise constitute valid criminal law purposes. In the Margarine Reference, Rand J. referred to "[p]ublic peace, order, security, health, morality" as the ordinary though not exclusive "ends" served by criminal law (p. 50). Although public peace, order, security, health and morality are classic criminal law purposes, the provinces may consider such imperatives in designing their own regulatory schemes. As explained in Siemens, "[t]he fact that some of th[e] considerations [taken into account by the provincial legislature] have a moral aspect does not invalidate an otherwise legitimate provincial law" (para. 30). Here, the mere fact that the Quebec legislature considered the real risk that cannabis consumption poses for certain vulnerable populations when it enacted legislation is not in itself an indication of encroachment on the field of criminal law.

[71] In this case, the partial decriminalization by Parliament of the possession, sale and distribution of cannabis and the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants opened the door to provincial legislative action. In prohibiting the possession and cultivation at home of cannabis plants, the Quebec legislature exercised the power conferred on it by s. 92(15) to enact penal measures in order to enforce an otherwise valid law. I found above that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act create a scheme that ensures the effectiveness of the state monopoly and that they in fact advance the objectives of public health and security. Characterized in this way, the impugned provisions are clearly related to the provincial heads of power in s. 92(13) and (16). This is because provincial legislative action in the field of public health is grounded primarily in broad and plenary jurisdiction over property and civil rights (s. 92(13)) and residual jurisdiction over matters of a merely local or private nature in the province (s. 92(16)) (Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 SCR 791, at para. 18).

[75] In light of the foregoing, ss. 5 and 10 therefore fall not within the sphere of the criminal law but rather within the provinces' general power to regulate health.

[76] While it is true that prohibitions similar to those set out in ss. 5 and 10 have been enacted by Parliament in the past under the federal criminal law power, this can be explained by the double aspect doctrine. This doctrine reflects the contemporary view of federalism and constitutional interpretation, which recognizes that overlapping powers are unavoidable (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 42). According to the double aspect doctrine, Parliament and the provincial legislatures may make laws in relation to matters that, by their very nature, have both a federal aspect and a provincial aspect (Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, [2019] 4 SCR 228, at para. 84). It will therefore be possible to apply the double aspect doctrine where each level of government has a "compelling" interest in enacting legislation on different aspects of the same activity or matter (para. 85). In practice, without creating concurrent jurisdiction over a matter, the double aspect doctrine "allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation" (Reference re Securities Act, at para. 66 (emphasis deleted)).

[77] This appeal is a textbook case for the application of the double aspect doctrine. The regulation of the use of drugs, including cannabis, has both federal and provincial aspects, which makes it conceivable that laws enacted by both levels of government will apply concurrently. This matter has a double aspect, since it may be addressed from two different perspectives: (1) that of the criminal law (under s. 91(27)), by suppressing some "evil" or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public; and (2) that of health or trade (under s. 92(13) and (16)), by regulating, among other things, the conditions of production, distribution and sale of the substance. Sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act regulate cannabis use from this second, normative perspective and are therefore within provincial jurisdiction.

[78] I conclude this section by emphasizing that the impugned provisions do not encroach on the federal criminal law power merely because they create absoluteprohibitions. The trial judge expressed the contrary view, explaining that [TRANSLATION] "the province has lost its jurisdiction by deciding to completely prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the cultivation of cannabis for personal purposes" (para.

> 86). That inference has no support in law and disregards the fact that many regulatory prohibitions are absolute in nature without being considered criminal law prohibitions. I need only refer, by way of example, to the prohibition against selling tobacco to minors set out, in Quebec law, in ss. 13 and 14.4 of the Tobacco Control Act, CQLR, c. L-6.2.
> [79] The presumption of constitutional validity of legislation remains a cardinal principle of our division of powers jurisprudence (Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, 1957 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1957] SCR 198, at p. 255; Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, 1978 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 662, at pp. 687-88; Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 453, at para. 162; Reference re Firearms Act, at para. 25). According to this presumption, every legislative provision is presumed to be intra vires the level of government that enacted it.
> [80] Here, the onus was on the appellant to show that, in pith and substance, ss. 5 and 10 are not related to one of the classes of subjects under provincial jurisdiction. He failed to do so. The matter of the impugned provisions is not the moral suppression of personal cannabis production. Rather, their pith and substance is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly on the sale of cannabis in order to protect the health and security of the public from the harm caused by this substance.
> [81] For the reasons stated above, I am of the view that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are a valid exercise by the Quebec legislature of the powers conferred on it by s. 92(13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and that the Court of Appeal therefore made no error in its review of the validity of the impugned provisions.

Wagner CJ went on to conclude that the there was no operational conflict between the federal and provincial acts. He further drew an analogy to the Rothmans case [see Chapter 6, Part 7.4] and concluded that the provincial act did not frustrate the purpose of the federal act. The Chief Justice held, at para 97, that "the making of exceptions or exemptions under a criminal law scheme cannot serve to confer positive rights to engage in the activities covered by those exceptions or exemptions. That is an important point in case like the one before us. The provinces can legitimately undertake regulatory initiatives to provide a framework for decriminalized activities without thereby frustrating a purpose—the creation of positive rights—that by definition is outside the scope of the federal criminal law power."

For an argument that the Murray-Hall constrains the criminal law power in ways that are consistent with the demands of cooperative federalism, see Yashoda Ranganthan and Hera Evans, "Murray-Hall v. Quebec (Attorney General)-Reconciling the Criminal Law Power with Cooperative Federalism" (2025) 5 SCLR (3d) 289.

Chapter 9: S 91(2), The Federal Trade and Commerce Power

By Ian Lee

1 Introduction

Head 2 of Section 91 of the Constitution Act 1867 authorizes the Parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to "the regulation of trade and commerce." Strikingly absent from s. 91(2) is limiting language such as that found in the analogous provision of the U.S. Constitution, which explicitly confines federal legislative jurisdiction to "Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes" (U.S. Const., Art. I, Sec. 8, Cl. 3). One might have supposed that the framers of s. 91(2) intended to confer broader economic regulatory power on the federal Parliament than is conferred by the U.S. Constitution on the Congress. However, s. 91(2) has, in fact, received a more circumscribed interpretation than its wording would permit.

However in contrast to the most of the powers granted to the American Congress , under the U.S. Constitution, the powers granted to the Canadian Parliament under s. 91, like the powers granted to the provincial legislatures under s. 92, are "exclusive," according to the introductory language of the two provisions. The interpretation of themutually exclusive federal and provincial spheres of authority is a zero-sum game. Accordingly, the courts, have interpreted s. 91(2) cautiously, conscious that an unduly expansive interpretation of s. 91(2) would, to borrow a metaphor from the Supreme Court's 2011 Securities Reference, "sweep [provincial] powers out to sea," especially the crucially important power of the provinces to legislate in relation to "property and civil rights" (s. 92(13)).

This chapter begins with the interpretation of Parliament's legislative authority under s. 91(2) (Part 2). It then examines the constraints that s. 91(2), as an "exclusive" federal power, places on provincial legislative authority (Part 3). The final part of the chapter (Part 4) concerns s. 121 of the Constitution Act 1867. This provision is not part of the division of powers but is nevertheless relevant to the topic of trade and commerce because it provides that goods originating in one province "shall be admitted free" into each of the other provinces.

2.1 Overview

As discussed in a previous chapter, the Judicial Committee's principal contribution to the definition of the scope of s. 91(2) can be summarized in a negative proposition --- that laws regulating particular lines of business, or transactions taking place within a province, come within s. 92(13) rather than s. 91(2). Scarcely any federal laws were upheld by the JCPC under s. 91(2) during that body's tenure as the court of final appeal for Canada. At the end of the JCPC era, lawyers had a good idea of what Parliament could not do under s. 91(2) , but very little idea of what the provision enabled Parliament to do.

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in Citizens Insurance v. Parsons, [1881] UKPC 49 at par. 25, 7 App Cas 96 suggested in an obiter dicta that:

> … The words "regulation of trade and commerce" … would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion. Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the dominion parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade….

Today, the categories of legislation suggested by the Judicial Committee are reflected in case law of the the Supreme Court of Canada establishing that Parliament's authority under s. 91(2) extends to the enactment of legislation of two types:

- Laws that, in pith and substance, regulate international or interprovincial trade
- Laws that, based on certain criteria, can be characterized as the "general regulation of trade."

The key cases on each of these two "branches" of authority under s. 91(2) are excerpted in Parts 2.2 and 2.3 below.

2.2 Key cases: International and interprovincial trade

Murphy v CPR*, [1958] SCR 626, 1958 CanLII 1

[A BC farmer purchased grain in Manitoba and attempted to contract with the Canadian Pacific Railway to ship it to British Columbia. The railway refused to accept the shipment, on the ground that the shipment was prohibited by s. 32 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which gave to the Canadian Wheat Board (subject to exceptions) the exclusive power to export grain or to transport it or cause it to be transported interprovincially. The farmer argued that this legislation was ultra vires the federal government and so could not be enforced. His action against the railway was unsuccessful at trial and on appeal to the Manitoba Court of Appeal. He then appealed his case to the Supreme Court of Canada.]

LOCKE J: —

The constitutional issue was [whether] the Canadian Wheat Board Act was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada.… [The appellant] … asserted that the Act trenched upon the powers of the province as it interfered with property and civil rights in the Province. …

… It appears to me to be too clear for argument that the Canadian Wheat Board Act in so far as its provisions relate to the export of grain from the province for the purpose of sale is an Act in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce within the meaning of that expression in s. 91. As pointed out by the learned Chief Justice of Manitoba, it has been long since decided that the provinces cannot regulate or restrict the export of natural products such as grain beyond their borders

[T]he fact that of necessity [the Act] interferes with property and civil rights in the province of the nature referred to in head 13 of s. 92 is immaterial. For reasons which have been stated in a great number of cases decided in the Judicial Committee as well as in this Court, it has been decided that if a given subject-matter falls within any class of subjects enumerated in s. 91 it cannot be treated as covered by any of those in s. 92. ... It is, of course, obvious that it would be impossible for Parliament to fully exercise the exclusive jurisdiction assigned to it by head 2 and many others of the heads of s. 91 without interfering with property and civil rights in some or all of the provinces. ...

It is contended for the appellant that the power to regulate trade and commerce under head 2 does not enable Parliament to regulate a particular trade, but this is too broad a statement. The result of the cases in the Judicial Committee dealing with this question appear to me to be most clearly summarized in the judgment of Lord Atkin in Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board [1938 CanLII 250, [1938] AC 708 at 719], where it was said:

It is now well settled that [s 91(2)] does not give the powers to regulate for legitimate provincial purposes particular trades or businesses so far as the trade or business is confined to the province.

The Canadian Wheat Board Act controls and regulates not one trade or business but several, including the activities of the producer, the railroads, the elevators and flour and feed mills and, except to a very minor extent, these activities are directed to the export of grain or grain products from the province, activities which the province itself is powerless to control.

2.2.2 The Queen v Klassen

The Queen v Klassen*, 1959 CanLII 438, 20 DLR (2d) 406 (Man CA) (excerpt by Jodi Lazare)

Adamson C.J.M. :— […]

This is an appeal from that conviction by way of a stated case as follows:

1. The accused, Julius Klassen, is the manager and operator of a feed mill at the Village of Grunthal in Manitoba, known as the Grunthal Feed Mill and has operated the said mill for approximately 22 years at its present location. The said mill is the mill referred to as `Grunthal Feed Mill (J. Klasssen)' in the Schedule to the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

2. On or about the 12th of September, A.D. 1957, John P. Leppky, a producer within the meaning of the said Act and the holder of a Delivery Permit Book numbered 28011 issued by the Canadian Wheat Board […] delivered 296 bushels of wheat of the grade No. 5 into the feed mill operated by Julius Klassen under the firm name and style of Grunthal Feed Mill at Grunthal in Manitoba aforesaid.

3. At the time of the delivery of the said wheat into the said feed mill, the said delivery permit book was not produced by John P. Leppky to Julius Klassen, the operator of said feed mill, and at no time whether immediately upon the completion of the delivery of the said wheat or at any time did Julius Klassen, the operator of the said mill, record and enter the net weight in bushels after dockage of the grain so delivered in the permit book of the said John P. Leppky.

4. The said wheat was received into the said mill and purchased by the accused from the said John P. Leppky.

5. The said Julius Klassen, who at all material times was aware of the provisions of the said Section 16 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, states that he received delivery of and purchased the said wheat and failed to record and enter the delivery of said wheat as aforesaid as he had been advised by legal counsel that any provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act or regulations made thereunder which had the effect of restricting carrying on of the trade of a feed mill for purely provincial purposes were without effect.

6. The said wheat was processed and sold as an ingredient in prepared feeds sold by the said Julius Klassen to farmers and feeders in the neighbourhood of Grunthal in the Province of Manitoba; the said wheat having been produced, purchased, sold and used only within the Province of Manitoba. At no time material to the said delivery was there any agreement between the said Julius Klassen and the Canadian Wheat Board. The said feed mill purchases, processes and sells grain to the approximate value of $60,000.00 annually and is located 10 miles from the nearest railway. The wheat hereinbefore referred to was brought to the said feed mill by the said producer in a truck; the said prepared feed manufactured from the said wheat was shipped to its ultimate purchaser by the accused by truck. The accused has not at any time been engaged in interprovincial or export trade personally, nor so far as the accused is aware have the products of the said mill been used in interprovincial or export trade.

The counsel for the said appellant desires to question the validity of the said conviction on the ground that it is erroneous in point of law and the question submitted for the judgment of this Honourable Court being:

> 1. Whether sections 16 and 45 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act being chapter 44, R.S.C. 1952 and amendments thereto and the Schedule thereto are intra vires of the Parliament of Canada.

TRITSCHLER J.A. :— […]

The facts are stated in the reasons of the Chief Justice.

I would first consider whether s. 16 of Part II of the Act is intra vires.

There is no doubt that Part II "affects" property and civil rights in the Province. It is a serious interference with the intraprovincial business of (among others) the owners of grain and the operators of flour, feed and seedcleaning mills. These operators of flour, feed and seedcleaning mills who are not engaged in inter-provincial or export trade will for brevity herein be sometimes referred to simply as "millers". True, as submitted by the Crown, the controls of Part II do not apply to the contracts made by the owners of grain and these operators nor affect the ownership of the grain and are directed only at the movement of grain into the mills and the recording of same. Yet it is a plain interference with the right of a person to deliver grain to a miller, and the right of a miller to obtain grain, to forbid this delivery and receipt (except with the permission of the Board) unless the person is the "actual producer of, or is entitled as a producer to the grain", to whom has been issued by the Board a permit book under which he is-entitled to deliver that particular grain at that particular time at that "delivery point". Contracts between millers and "non-producers" are not possible. "Producers" who have permit books, and millers, may contract within "quotas" fixed by the Board. It must be concluded that "matters of a merely local or private nature in the Province" between owners of grain and millers are forbidden or affected.

But this interference of Part II may be justified if it is necessarily incidental to the other provisions of the Act dealing with the interprovincial and export trade in grain.

"It is within the competence of the Dominion Parliament to provide for matters which, though otherwise within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature, are necessarily incidental to effective legislation by the Parliament of the Dominion upon a subject of legislation expressly enumerated in s..91 […].

I think that since [1958], it has been settled that the principal purposes of the Act, i.e., the interprovincial and export marketing of certain grains by the Board and the regulation of interprovincial and export trade in such grains is legislation in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce. In [1958] Locke J. said […] "It appears to me to be too clear for argument that the Canadian Wheat Board Act insofar as its provisions relate to the export of grain from the Province for the purpose of sale is an Act in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce within the meaning of that expression in s. 91." Our enquiry must, therefore, be whether the questioned interference of Part II is necessarily incidental or ancillary to (in aid of) effective legislation in respect of the general marketing scheme set up for certain grains by the Act.

Applying the principle referred to by Duff (then) J. in Re Reciprocal Insurance Legislation […] and scrutinizing the Act in its entirety to determine the true nature and character of the controls of Part II and what it is that the Legislature is really doing, I am. of the opinion that Part II is not an attempt by Parliament to interfere with or control the business of flour, feed and seed mills within the Province as an end in itself but that the interference with property and civil rights which results under Part II is incidental and ancillary to the achievement of the purpose of the Act, the pith and substance of which is the provision of an export market for surplus grains, a matter which has undoubtedly assumed a national importance.

The "quota" controls which are established by Part II, and which are the real subject-matter under appeal, have several objects. They regulate the intake of grain into all channels of the marketing system so that currently marketable grains can be received when needed and grain for which there is no present market kept out of the system. The saleable grain must be at the right place at the right time. If the channels become clogged with unmarketable grains the scheme set up by the Act would become unworkable. This necessary interference with the right of individuals to deliver and receive grain into the marketing system must be made to fall as evenly as possible on all and justice demands that delivery opportunity be rationed as equitably as is possible among producers. The scheme ensures this.

But the opponents of the scheme object that these considerations cease to be valid when applied to mills which are turning grains into flour, feed and seed in purely intraprovincial transactions and particularly so where the mill has little or even no storage space. How, it is argued, can such transactions clog the channels of the marketing system. This submission ignores the other but equally essential feature of the controls, the equitable rationing of delivery opportunity and the ensuring that as nearly as may be all producers whose freedom to trade is interfered with by the scheme will get the same price at the same time for the like kind and quantity of grain. If a producer might sell a portion of his crop to a mill for flour, feed or seed and not have it noted on his permit book he would be able to deliver to the other channels of the marketing system grain up to his quota, and thus achieve an advantage over less fortunate producers who were not able to get their grains into the local flour, feed and seed outlets. Equality of delivery opportunity is a basic feature of the scheme. As was said […] in the Murphy case, supra, "The Act operates on the individual by keeping him in effect in a queue" […]. If this be disturbed then, whether or not the channels of the system are clogged, injustice must result and the public acceptance of the scheme endangered. The quotas allowed are not, as was submitted by counsel for the appellant, "for interprovincial and export purposes" but they fix the quantity of grain a producer may deliver into the market system anywhere. […]

It is admitted that the appellant personally has not been engaged in interprovincial or export trade and that so far as he is aware the products of his mill have not been used in such trade. No one can say that the products of his mill will not be so used. If intra-provincial transactions are beyond the control of the Act so far as he is concerned so should they be in respect of every other miller, but there are obvious difficulties about letting into the marketing system even grains which can be proved to have an intraprovincial destination. This also would make the system unworkable. In short, it seems impractical if not impossible to draw distinctions between the appellant and all other handlers (or at least millers) of grain in respect of intraprovincial transactions.

Appellant's counsel has placed his greatest emphasis on the fact that appellant operates his feed mill in a purely local and provincial manner and does not engage in interprovincial or export trade. This is not relevant if it appears, as I think it does, that the Act is not legislation "in relation to" property and civil rights but is legislation which in pith and substance is in relation to trade and commerce and merely "affects" property and civil rights incidentally.

I would answer Q. 1 by saying that s. 16 is intra vires […].

2.2.3 Caloil Inc v Attorney General of Canada

Caloil Inc v Attorney General of Canada*, [1971] SCR 543, 1970 CanLII 194

PIGEON J (Fauteux CJ, Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, Spence, and Laskin JJ concurring): —

The appellant is an importer and distributor of petroleum products. In May 1970, it contracted for some 126,000,000 gallons of gasoline to be delivered in Canadian ports from Algesiras, Spain, by tankers. This gasoline was intended to be distributed in Quebec and in Ontario.

On May 7, 1970, [Regulations under the National Energy Board Act] were amended [to] … make all licences for the importation of "motor gasoline" subject to the condition that the importer shall not, without the consent of the National Energy Board, transport or caused to be transported, any "motor gasoline" [westward across a north-south line] running partly through Ontario and partly along the Ontario-Quebec border…, and shall not, without the Board's consent, sell or deliver to a third party any "motor gasoline" except on the condition that it is sold or delivered for consumption east of that line.

The appellant did not comply with the conditions of licences issued in accordance with the amended regulations and was refused a further licence. [The appellant sought and obtained a declaratory judgment in the Exchequer Court to the effect that the regulatory scheme was unconstitutional. Rather than appeal the judgment, the government amended the regulations. The amended regulations provide, in the relevant part:]

20. (2) Where the Board is of the opinion that importation of oil that is the subject of an application for a licence to import into Canada will be consistent with the development and utilization of Canadian indigenous oil resources, it may issue a licence to import oil for consumption in the area of Canada specified therein, in such quantities, at such times and at such points of entry into Canada as it may consider appropriate.

(3) Any licence issued by the Board pursuant to subsection (2) may be issued on the condition that the oil to be imported will be consumed in the area of Canada specified in the licence.

(4) Where the Board is not reasonably satisfied that the consumption of oil to be imported will be in the area of Canada specified in the application for a licence and that the terms of the licence to be issued will be complied with, it shall not issue a licence.

Under the amended regulations, the National Energy Board refused applications to import gasoline into some areas in Ontario and it also refused to issue licences for importation into other areas without a declaration specifying that the gasoline to be so imported would, in actual fact, be consumed in those areas. Thereupon, proceedings were again instituted in the Exchequer Court by way of a declaratory action against the Attorney General of Canada as defendant and the National Energy Board as mis-en-cause.

The appellant did not challenge federal authority over imports as such. The attack was exclusively directed against the regulation of trade in the imported commodity at the level of distribution for consumption….

In the present case, subs. 2 of s. 20(2) of the Regulations clearly shows that the policy intended to be implemented by the impugned enactment is a control of the imports of a given commodity to foster the development and utilization of Canadian oil resources. The restriction on the distribution of the imported product to a defined area is intended to reserve the market in other areas for the benefit of products from other Provinces of Canada. Therefore, the true character of the enactment appears to be an incident in the administration of an extra-provincial marketing scheme as in Murphy v. C.P.R. Under the circumstances, the interference with local trade restricted as it is to an imported commodity, is an integral part of the control of imports in the furtherance of an extraprovincial trade policy and cannot be termed "an unwarranted invasion of provincial jurisdiction." ...

2.2.4 Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec v Pelland, 2005 SCC 20 (CanLII), [2005] 1 SCR 292

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

1 ABELLA J. — Over 25 years ago, this Court decided that a federal-provincial scheme with respect to the production and marketing of eggs was constitutional. André Pelland, a Quebec chicken farmer whose production is subject to a similar scheme, seeks a review of the scheme's constitutionality.

Background

2 In a landmark 1978 case which has come to be known as the "Egg Reference" (Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act, 1978 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1198), this Court unanimously affirmed the constitutional validity of a national agricultural marketing scheme collaboratively crafted by Parliament and the provinces in response to the Court's evolving jurisprudence. The Egg Reference has since become the blueprint for federal-provincial marketing schemes.

3 After the release of the Egg Reference, the federal and provincial governments entered into the 1978 Federal-Provincial Agreement with respect to the establishment of a Comprehensive Chicken Marketing Program in Canada ("Federal-Provincial Agreement").

4 To ensure effective marketing and a dependable supply of chicken to Canadian consumers, the Federal-Provincial Agreement was designed to weave together the legislative jurisdiction of both levels of government in order to ensure a seamless regulatory scheme. The integration of the federal and provincial components of the scheme is achieved through s. 22(3) of the Farm Products Agencies Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-4. (The relevant provisions are attached as appendices to these reasons.) Section 22(3) enables a federal marketing agency to authorize a provincial body to perform any function relating to interprovincial or export trade in the regulated product that the federal agency is authorized to perform. Pursuant to the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency Quota Grant of Administrative Authority ("Grant of Authority"), P.C. 1991-1090, June 13, 1991, the federal marketing agency delegated its authority to Quebec's chicken marketing board, the Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec ("Fédération"). The Grant of Authority authorized the provincial body to allocate and administer federal quotas in accordance with both the federal Canadian Chicken Marketing Quota Regulations, 1990, SOR/90-556, and such relevant rules as were in force from time to time in the province.

5 Implementing its part of the terms of the Federal-Provincial Agreement, and pursuant to what is now s. 16(1) of the Farm Products Agencies Act, the federal government created a federal chicken marketing agency, then known as the Canadian Chicken Marketing Agency and now called the Chicken Farmers of Canada ("CFC"). It was expressly empowered by s. 22(1) of the Farm Products Agencies Act to implement a marketing plan and make such orders and regulations, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council, as were necessary for the execution of the plan.

6 The provincial component of the scheme in Quebec is the subject of the constitutional challenge before us and is embodied in An Act respecting the marketing of agricultural, food and fish products, R.S.Q., c. M-35.1, and the Règlement sur la production et la mise en marché du poulet, R.R.Q., c. M-35.1, r. 13.2. In 1971, the Plan conjoint des producteurs de volailles du Québec, R.R.Q., c. M-35, r. 126

("Plan"), was adopted pursuant to what is now s. 45 of the provincial legislation. The Plan is administered by the Fédération and governs all production and marketing of chicken within the province of Quebec.

7 The function of the federal body is to assess the national market and set a global production quota for each province. It assigns a marketing quota to each province representing that province's share of the national market.

8 Each provincial body then adopts as its intraprovincial production quota the exact share federally assigned to it. It agrees to authorize its local producers to globally produce and market no more chicken than the quantity fixed by the federal body as that province's share of the national marketing target. To produce and market chickens in Quebec, a farmer must receive a quota allocation from the Fédération and produce no more than his or her allocated quota for a given period. A producer in a province receives a single quota applicable to all of his or her production and marketing of chicken, regardless of intended destination.

9 In order to facilitate the integration of production and marketing quotas, the federal body delegates its authority to regulate the marketing of chickens in interprovincial and export trade to the provincial body, in this case the Fédération. Once producers obtain a production and marketing quota from the Fédération, they are free to decide where their product will be sold. Neither the federal nor the provincial body sets distinct intraprovincial or extraprovincial marketing quotas.

10 In this way, the federal-provincial scheme combines in one body, the Fédération, provincial jurisdiction over production and intraprovincial marketing, and federal jurisdiction over extraprovincial marketing. The federally and provincially assigned quotas dovetail so that the total quantity of chicken produced in Canada does not exceed the agreed-upon national marketing total.

11 Because Mr. Pelland produced 4,425,030 kg in excess of his allotted quota for the relevant periods, the Fédération, in accordance with the penalty provisions found in the provincial regulations, automatically reduced his quota to zero and imposed a monetary penalty in the amount of $2,433,766.50. In addition, it sought an interlocutory injunction.

12 Crôteau J. granted the injunction: [2001] Q.J. No. 5828 (QL). He found that Mr. Pelland produced and sold about 29 times his quota, representing almost 50 percent of the surplus produced in Quebec for the relevant periods.

13 In the Court of Appeal of Quebec, Rousseau-Houle J.A., writing for a unanimous court (Fish and Chamberland JJ.A.), dismissed Mr. Pelland's appeal on the grounds that this Court's decision in the Egg Reference was determinative of the constitutional issue raised by the appellant: [2003] Q.J. No. 3331 (QL).

14 After leave was granted in October 2003, McLachlin C.J. stated the following constitutional questions:

> 1. Can An Act respecting the marketing of agricultural, food and fish products, R.S.Q., c. M-35.1, and the Règlement sur la production et la mise en marché du poulet, R.R.Q., c. M-35.1, r. 13.2, constitutionally apply ex proprio vigore to limit the production of chickens destined exclusively to the interprovincial market?

15 In my view, the 1978 Federal-Provincial Agreement, like the scheme in the Egg Reference, both reflects and reifies Canadian federalism's constitutional creativity and cooperative flexibility. For the reasons that follow, and based largely on a generation of constitutional jurisprudence from this Court, I would dismiss the appeal.

Analysis

A. The Constitutional Validity of the Provincial Production and Marketing Legislation

16 Mr. Pelland does not dispute that he grossly exceeded his allocated quota. Rather, he challenges the interlocutory injunction obtained by the Fédération on the grounds that the entirety of his produce is exported to Ontario and not marketed in the province of Quebec. He argues that the provincial marketing Act and regulations can only apply to the production of chickens destined for Quebec markets, not those intended exclusively for interprovincial markets.

17 Mr. Pelland does not base his argument on the pith and substance of the provincial marketing Act and the provincial chicken regulation; instead, he urges the Court to conclude that placing quota restrictions on products destined for export is not a provincial matter. He does not challenge the validity of the provincial scheme, but argues that it cannot apply to the production of chicken destined solely for interprovincial markets. The scheme he proposes as an alternative would be bifurcated: a federal quota for export production and a provincial one for intraprovincial trade.

18 Mr. Pelland relies on Laskin C.J.'s statement in the Egg Reference that the provincial law and regulations at issue there would not be valid if they occurred "with a view to limiting interprovincial or export trade" (p. 1287). However, this comment was made in the context of considering whether the law and regulations were in pith and substance a provincial matter. Ultimately, as explained later in these reasons, Laskin C.J. found that they were. This comment, therefore, does not support the proposition that provincial laws found valid under a pith and substance analysis are inapplicable to export trade.

19 Contrary to Mr. Pelland's submissions, in my view the pith and substance of the provincial marketing Act and the provincial chicken regulations are at the heart of this appeal. In order to determine whether the provincial component of the scheme is unconstitutional because it intrudes into a federal head of power, it is necessary first to determine its core character.

> A pith and substance analysis looks at both (1) the purpose of the legislation as well as (2) its effect. First, to determine the purpose of the legislation, the Court may look at both intrinsic evidence, such as purpose clauses, or extrinsic evidence, such as Hansard or the minutes of parliamentary committees.
> Second, in looking at the effect of the legislation, the Court may consider both its legal effect and its practical effect. In other words, the Court looks to see, first, what effect flows directly from the provisions of the statute itself; then, second, what "side" effects flow from the application of the statute which are not direct effects of the provisions of the statute itself: see R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 S.C.R. 463, at pp. 482-83. Iacobucci J. provided some examples of how this would work in Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 494, 2000 SCC 21, at para. 23:
> > The effects of the legislation may also be relevant to the validity of the legislation in so far as they reveal its pith and substance. For example, in Saumur v. City of Quebec, 1953 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1953] 2 S.C.R. 299, the Court struck down a municipal by-law that prohibited leafleting because it had been applied so as to suppress the religious views of Jehovah's Witnesses. Similarly, in Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1938 CanLII 251 (UK JCPC), [1939]

> A.C. 117, the Privy Council struck down a law imposing a tax on banks because the effects of the tax were so severe that the true purpose of the law could only be in relation to banking, not taxation. However, merely incidental effects will not disturb the constitutionality of an otherwise intra vires law. [Emphasis added.]

21 The essential character of an analogous scheme was scrutinized in the Egg Reference. Under the scheme at issue in that case, the Canadian Egg Marketing Agency set overall quotas for each province. It was created as a result of an agreement between the federal Minister of Agriculture, the federal marketing agency, and their counterparts in all provinces. The goal was to establish a comprehensive national egg marketing scheme. The federal Agency was given authority to set overall provincial quotas and to impose levies or charges on the marketing of eggs by egg producers, to be collected on its behalf by the provincial egg marketing boards. In Ontario, the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Board was the provincial board setting individual egg production quotas for its producers based on the province's assigned quota. The Ontario legislation also prohibited egg production by anyone who did not have a quota.

22 In the Egg Reference, this Court confirmed that the regulation of agricultural production is essentially a local matter within provincial jurisdiction pursuant to s. 92(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Court reached the following relevant conclusions: although constitutional jurisdiction over marketing is divided, agricultural production is prima facie a local matter under provincial jurisdiction; the provincial scheme was not aimed at controlling extraprovincial trade, but was deemed to be coordinated and integrated with the regulations established under federal authority; and, most pertinently, producers could not claim exemption from provincial control over production by electing to devote their entire output to extraprovincial trade.

23 Any effect of the provincial egg marketing and production scheme on extraprovincial trade was found to be incidental to the constitutionally permissible purpose of controlling agricultural production within the context of a cooperative federal-provincial agreement.

24 While disagreeing about the exact scope of the relevant provincial head of power, Pigeon J., for the five-person majority, and Laskin C.J., in a minority concurring opinion, agreed that the provincial component of this marketing scheme was constitutional because its purpose did not extend beyond production and trade within the province. They also both accepted that if the true purpose of the provincial legislation had been to regulate interprovincial and export trade, it would have been ultra vires.

25 Pigeon J. held that because agricultural production is prima facie within provincial jurisdiction, production quotas could be imposed by a province on all its producers, regardless of the ultimate destination of the goods produced. A producer could not evade a province's jurisdictional authority over production by producing goods destined for an export or extraprovincial market:

> No operator can claim exemption from provincial control by electing to devote his entire output to extraprovincial trade. I can find no basis for the view that there must be a division of authority at the stage of production between what will be going into intraprovincial and what will be going into extraprovincial trade. [Emphasis added; p. 1295.]

26 This is the conclusion Mr. Pelland seeks to set aside, primarily on the basis of Laskin C.J.'s minority opinion expressing the concern that if the focus of the provincial legislation had been the regulation of extraprovincial interests, it would have been beyond the province's jurisdiction. The possibility that specifically caused Laskin C.J. to articulate a caveat to Pigeon J.'s opinion was that of a province using its regulatory jurisdiction over production to "choke off" interprovincial trade at its very source:

> It is true that a Province cannot limit the export of goods from the Province, and any provincial marketing legislation must yield to this. How then, it may be asked, can it be allowed to accomplish this forbidden end by choking off interprovincial trade at its very source, at the point of production? [p. 1286]

27 Based on this analysis, Mr. Pelland submits that this Court ought to reconsider the constitutionality of a marketing scheme like the one he is regulated by, find the provincial component of the scheme to be unconstitutional, and confine the jurisdiction of provincial marketing boards to production for provincial marketing only.

28 It seems to me that the impugned legislation is constitutionally valid whether the majority or minority opinion in the Egg Reference is applied. Pigeon J. did not dispute that provincial legislation which is aimed at regulating extraprovincial trade is ultra vires. He held only that agricultural production is prima facie a provincial matter:

> In my view, the control of production, whether agricultural or industrial, is prima facie a local matter, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. [p. 1293]

He qualified this position, however, by stating:

> This does not mean that such power is unlimited, a province cannot control extraprovincial trade, as was held in the Manitoba Egg Reference [1971 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 689] and in the Burns Foods case [1973 CanLII 194 (SCC), [1975] 1 S.C.R. 494]. However, "Marketing" does not include production and, therefore, provincial control of production is prima facie valid. In the instant case, the provincial regulation is not aimed at controlling the extraprovincial trade. In so far as it affects this trade, it is only complementary to the regulations established under federal authority. In my view this is perfectly legitimate, otherwise it would mean that our Constitution makes it impossible by federal-provincial cooperative action to arrive at any practical scheme for the orderly and efficient production and marketing of a commodity which all governments concerned agree requires regulation in both intraprovincial and extraprovincial trade. [Emphasis added; p. 1296.]

Laskin C.J. was in substantial agreement with this analysis:

> The primary object is to regulate marketing in intraprovincial trade. Although it would not be a valid regulation of such marketing to impose quotas on production with a view to limiting interprovincial or export trade, I am not persuaded that I should give s. 21*a*, seen in the context of the Ontario Farm Products Marketing Act of which it is part, that construction. [Emphasis added; pp. 1286-87.]

29 With respect, I have difficulty seeing how Laskin C.J.'s reasons in the Egg Reference assist Mr. Pelland or yield a fertile basis for reconsidering the constitutionality of the provincial component of the scheme in this case. In a passage of equal applicability to the present case, Laskin C.J. wrote that:

> It is clear that the intention was to mesh federal and provincial regulatory control so as to embrace both the producers who market their production in a particular Province and those who seek to export their production to another Province or beyond Canada. It was certainly open to the federal authorities to fix the respective provincial shares of Canadian egg production for the purpose of regulating the movement of eggs in interprovincial or export trade. The share so fixed for a particular Province would establish a limitation for that Province in respect of its own marketing policies. Hence, the fact that a Province has adopted the same share percentage does not per se rule out its connection with intraprovincial trade. The adoption provides no more than a reference point by which to measure the provincial approach to marketing quotas for producers in the Province. I do not think that the use of this reference point > amounts to an invasion of federal authority in relation to interprovincial trade. Rather, and the terms of the challenged Regulation so indicate, it is enacted under a recognition of that authority and an appreciation of the control of that trade under federal legislation. In short, it envisages that there will be interprovincial and export marketing by producers in Ontario. [Emphasis added; pp. 1282-83.]

30 As a substantive matter, neither judgment in the Egg Reference deviated from this Court's defining prior analysis in Carnation Co. v. Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board, 1968 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1968] S.C.R. 238. In Carnation, Martland J., writing for a unanimous Court, undertook a careful review of this Court's jurisprudence, including Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, 1957 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 198, and concluded that:

> The view of the four judges in the Ontario Reference was that the fact that a transaction took place wholly within a province did not necessarily mean that it was thereby subject solely to provincial control. The regulation of some such transactions relating to products destined for interprovincial trade could constitute a regulation of interprovincial trade and be beyond provincial control.
> While I agree with the view of the four judges in the Ontario Reference that a trade transaction, completed in a province, is not necessarily, by that fact alone, subject only to provincial control, I also hold the view that the fact that such a transaction incidentally has some effect upon a company engaged in interprovincial trade does not necessarily prevent its being subject to such control.
> I agree with the view of Abbott J., in the Ontario Reference, that each transaction and each regulation must be examined in relation to its own facts…They did not purport directly to control or to restrict such trade. There was no evidence that, in fact, they did control or restrict it. The most that can be said of them is that they had some effect upon the cost of doing business in Quebec of a company engaged in interprovincial trade, and that, by itself, is not sufficient to make them invalid. [Emphasis added; pp. 253-54.]

31 This analysis underlies the concern expressed by Laskin C.J. in the Egg Reference, and it arises whenever there is overlapping jurisdiction. Laws enacted under the jurisdiction of one level of government often overflow into or have incidental impact on the jurisdiction of the other governmental level. That is why a reviewing court is required to focus on the core character of the impugned legislation, as this Court did in Carnation; Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Manitoba Egg and Poultry Assn., 1971 CanLII 135 (SCC), [1971] S.C.R. 689; the Egg Reference; Canadian Industrial Gas & Oil Ltd. v. Government of Saskatchewan, 1977 CanLII 210 (SCC), [1978] 2 S.C.R. 545; and Central Canada Potash Co. v. Government of Saskatchewan, 1978 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1979] 1 S.C.R. 42.

32 Turning to an examination of the essence of the provincial component of the 1978 federal-provincial chicken marketing scheme, one observes at the outset that the scheme is functionally identical to Ontario's egg marketing and production legislation considered in the Egg Reference. Like that case, the parties agree that the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 engaged by the federal-provincial chicken marketing scheme at issue here are s. 91(2), which confers jurisdiction over trade and commerce to the federal government, and s. 92(10), which gives provincial governments jurisdiction over local works and undertakings.

33 As previously indicated, once the national quota for chicken production is divided among the provinces, a producer must be allotted an individual production quota in order to produce chicken in the province. Chicken producers within each province receive only one individual marketing and production quota.

34 The provincial chicken regulation expresses quotas in square meters of barn space, clearly tying quotas to physical production within Quebec. The quota assigned to each producer in a province does not distinguish between what can be marketed within the province and what can be marketed extraprovincially; rather, the decision whether to market internally or externally is up to each producer once he or she obtains the proper licences (Canadian Chicken Licensing Regulations, SOR/81-517). Quebec's chicken producers are free to market their products intraprovincially, extraprovincially or in some combination of the two, so long as they do not exceed their individual quotas.

35 The only requirements imposed on provincial producers wishing to export their product are that they obtain a marketing and production quota from the Fédération and a licence from the federal body. A producer may not engage in the marketing of chicken in interprovincial or export trade without the appropriate licence. The licensing requirement, however, is not onerous. On receipt of a valid application, the federal body is required to issue a licence. For its part, the producer is required to abide by the applicable laws and to make regular reports detailing its extraprovincial sales. The amount of chicken that a producer may export is not specified on the licence and is, in theory, limited solely by the quota amount assigned by the Fédération.

36 It is important to stress that in examining the provincial laws at issue in the Egg Reference, both Laskin C.J. and Pigeon J. agreed that they were constitutional because they did not purport to, nor did they in fact, directly control or restrict export trade. The same is true of the provincial scheme in this case.

37 The core character of the provincial legislative component of the federal-provincial chicken marketing scheme is not to set quotas or fix prices for exported goods or to attempt to regulate interprovincial or export trade. As in the Egg Reference, its purpose is to establish rules that allow for the organization of the production and marketing of chicken within Quebec and to control chicken production to fulfill provincial commitments under a cooperative federal-provincial agreement. Any impact of this legislation on extraprovincial trade is incidental.

38 With respect, I see no principled basis for disentangling what has proven to be a successful federal-provincial merger. Because provincial governments lack jurisdiction over extraprovincial trade in agricultural products, Parliament authorized the creation of federal marketing boards and the delegation to provincial marketing boards of regulatory jurisdiction over interprovincial and export trade. Each level of government enacted laws and regulations, based on their respective legislative competencies, to create a unified and coherent regulatory scheme. The quota system is an attempt to maintain an equilibrium between supply and demand and attenuate the inherent instability of the markets. To achieve this balance, it cannot exempt producers who seek to avoid production control limits by devoting all or any of their production to extraprovincial trade.

39 Mr. Pelland also suggested that the Court consider the analysis in Central Canada Potash as offering analagous guidance. With respect, however, that case is not applicable. It turned on "the true nature and character" of the operative provincial scheme (p. 75). In Central Canada Potash, in fact, Laskin C.J. affirmed the decision of this Court in the Egg Reference. At issue was the constitutional validity of provincial regulations in Saskatchewan whereby each producer's share of potash production was allocated based solely on production capacity. It was common ground that at the time the regulations were made, almost all Saskatchewan-produced potash was sold in interprovincial and export trade. The case was decided before s. 92A was added to the Constitution Act, 1867, enlarging provincial powers over non-renewable natural resources.

40 Laskin C.J. found that the purpose of the regulations was to regulate the marketing of potash through the fixing of a minimum selling price applicable to the permitted production quota. The only market for which the scheme had any significance was the export market. Citing the Egg Reference, he held that while it is true that production controls and conservation measures with respect to natural resources in a province are ordinarily matters within provincial authority, the situation may be different where a province establishes a marketing scheme with price fixing as its central feature. He found Saskatchewan's legislation to be ultra vires because it took direct aim at the production of potash destined for export and had the intended effect of regulating the export price.

42 At best, Mr. Pelland might argue that his production was effectively "choked off" by the reduction of his quota to zero through the penalty provisions of the provincial legislation. It is true that in his case the penalty provisions had this effect. But since the purpose of the provincial legislation is not to strangle export production, and since Mr. Pelland had been entitled, if he so chose, to export his entire quota of chickens, he cannot argue that the limits on his production and marketing contradict the purpose of the provincial legislation.

2.2.5 Questions

1. The validity of legislation is conventionally understood to depend on the legislation's "pith and substance," a summary of the law's "purpose" and "effects." To what extent is the purpose of the legislation relevant in Murphy, Klassen and Caloil?
2. Consider a federal law that imposes restrictions on the interprovincial movement of a commodity (its legal effect) for a purpose unrelated to crossborder trade. Does such a law come within s. 91(2)?

   For example, the Energy Efficiency Act, RSC 1985, c E-6.4, s 4(1), restricts crossborder transactions in specified products for a purpose related to environmental protection or energy conservation. S. 4(1) provides that:

   > "(1) No dealer shall, for the purpose of sale or lease, ship an energy-using product from one province to another province, or import an energy-using product into Canada, unless …
   > (a) the product complies with the energy efficiency standard [prescribed by the regulations]; and
   > (b) the product or its package is labelled in accordance with the regulations, if any."

   See also Manganese-Based Fuel Additives Act, RSC 1985, c M-0.5, s 4, and Motor Vehicle Fuel Consumption Standards Act, RSC 1985, c M-9, s 6(1).

2.3 Key cases: "General regulation of trade"

2.3.1 Macdonald v Vapor Canada

Macdonald v Vapor Canada*, [1977] 2 SCR 134, 1976 CanLII 181

LASKIN CJ: —

[The issue in the case is whether s. 7(e) of the federal Trade Marks Act, which provides that "no person shall … do any … act or adopt any … business practice contrary to honest industrial or commercial usage in Canada," is validly enacted under s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867.]

[…] I am quite prepared, in considering the scope of federal legislative power in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce, to look at the [Citizens Insurance v. Parsons] case in the widest aspects of its pronouncements on what that scope is. The attenuation of this broadly phrased power cannot be attributed to the Parsons case but to a sequential course of decision which, in my view, failed to redeem the promise of what the Parsons case said.

The Privy Council's assessment of the trade and commerce power in the Parsons case, … was expressed in the following words (at p. 113 of 7 App. Cas.):

> Construing therefore the words "regulation of trade and commerce" by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulations of trade affecting the whole dominion. Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the dominion parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade, such as the business of fire insurance in a single province, and therefore that its legislative authority does not in the present case conflict or compete with the power over property and civil rights assigned to the legislature of Ontario by No. 13 of sect. 92.

Lord Watson in the Local Prohibition case, Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General of Canada [[1896] A.C. 348.], at p. 363 was content to leave open the exact scope of the federal trade and commerce power, saying of the Parsons case that it was there decided "that in the absence of legislation upon the subject by the Canadian Parliament, the Legislature of Ontario had authority to impose conditions, as being matters of civil right, upon the business of fire insurance, which was admitted to be a trade, so long as those conditions only affected provincial trade". The truncation of the federal trade and commerce power appeared in the Insurance Reference case of 1916, Attorney-General of Canada v. Attorney- General of Alberta [1916 CanLII 424 (UK JCPC), [1916] 1 A.C. 588.], at p. 596, where Lord Haldane, making no specific reference to the Parsons case but to two other cases, Hodge v. The Queen [(1883),9 App. Cas. 117.], and to the unreported Privy Council decision in the McCarthy Act case (as to which see schedule to 1885 (Can.), c. 74), stated that "it must now be taken that the authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not extend to the regulation by a licensing system of a particular trade in which Canadians would otherwise be free to engage in the provinces".

The Parsons case, as already noted from the quotation therefrom, spoke of the contracts of a particular business or trade, and excluded these from regulation by the federal Parliament under s. 91(2). The process of truncation was continued in the Board of Commerce [1921 CanLII 399 (UK JCPC), [1922] 1 A.C. 191.] case, but was arrested in Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney-General of Canada [1931 CanLII 385 (UK JCPC), [1931] A.C. 310.]

I do not find anything in the case law on s. 91(2) that prevents this Court, even if it would retain a cautious concern for stare decisis, from taking the words of the Privy Council in the Parsons case, previously quoted, as providing the guide or lead to the issue of validity that arises here. [However, these criteria cannot] sustain s. 7(e). I repeat the relevant sentence in the Parsons case:

> The words "regulation of trade and commerce" ... would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulations of trade affecting the whole dominion.

It is the last mentioned category that is to be considered here.

The plain fact is that s. 7(e) is not a regulation, nor is it concerned with trade as a whole nor with general trade and commerce. In a loose sense every legal prescription is regulatory, even the prescriptions of the Criminal Code, but I do not read s. 91(2) as in itself authorizing federal legislation that merely creates a statutory tort, enforceable by private action, and applicable, as here, to the entire range of business relationships in any activity, whether the activity be itself within or beyond federal legislative authority. If there have been cases which appeared to go too far in diminution of the federal trade and commerce power, an affirmative conclusion here would, in my opinion, go even farther in the opposite direction.

One looks in vain for any regulatory scheme in s. 7, let alone s. 7(e). Its enforcement is left to the chance of private redress without public monitoring by the continuing oversight of a regulatory agency which would at least lend some colour to the alleged national or Canada-wide sweep of s. 7(e). The provision is not directed to trade but to the ethical conduct of persons engaged in trade or in business, and, in my view, such a detached provision cannot survive alone unconnected to a general regulatory scheme to govern trading relations going beyond merely local concern. Even on the footing of being concerned with practices in the conduct of trade, its private enforcement by civil action gives it a local cast because it is as applicable in its terms to local or intraprovincial competitors as it is to competitors in interprovincial trade.

2.3.2 Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v Attorney General of Canada

Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd v Attorney General of Canada*, [1980] 1 SCR 914, 1979 CanLII 190

ESTEY J (Martland, Dickson, Beetz JJ concurring): —

… The relevant facts are few. The product in question is one of the malt liquors described in regulations promulgated under the Act and has an alcohol content of 4 per cent. [The product, marketed under the name "Labatt Special Lite," did not comply with the restrictions on the maximum alcohol content of products marketed as "light beer" under s. B.02.134 of the Food and Drug Regulations, C.R.C., c. 870.] Section 6 of the [Food and Drug Act] states as follows:

> Where a standard has been prescribed for a food, no person shall label, package, sell or advertise any article in such a manner that it is likely to be mistaken for such food, unless the article complies with the prescribed standard.

[In] the Parsons case, ... the trade and commerce head was … described as consisting of two branches. The first in the words of the judgment includes "political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of Parliament, regulation of trade in matters of interprovincial concern…". The second branch is said to "…include general regulation of trade affecting the whole Dominion."

[Regarding the first branch, the] impugned regulations in and under the Food and Drugs Act are not concerned with the control and guidance of the flow of articles of commerce through the distribution channels, but rather with the production and local sale of the specified products of the brewing industry. There is no demonstration by the proponent of these isolated provisions in the Food and Drugs Act and its regulations of any interprovincial aspect of this industry. The labels in the record reveal that the appellant produces these beverages in all provinces but Quebec and Prince Edward Island. From the nature of the beverage, it is apparent, without demonstration, that transportation to distant markets would be expensive, and hence the local nature of the production operation.

[Regarding the second branch under Parsons,] what clearly is not of general national concern is the regulation of a single trade or industry. ... [I]t is clear that neither national ownership of a trade or undertaking or even national advertising of its products will alone suffice to authorize the imposition of federal trade and commerce legislation.

…. [T]he trade and commerce head cannot be applied to the regulation of a single trade, even though it be on a [Page 942] national basis, and in the Board of Commerce disposition, supra, the invocation of the trade and commerce head of federal jurisdiction is forbidden in the regulation of elements of commerce such as contracts, in an individual trade or concern even though the control was imposed in a series of separate regulatory codes each purporting to regulate a separate trade or industry….

Nowhere are the impugned statutory regulations or provisions concerned with the control or regulation of the extraprovincial distribution of these products or their movement through any channels of trade. On the contrary, their main purpose is the regulation of the brewing process itself by means of a "legal recipe", as counsel for the appellant put it. Indeed, if the industry is substantially local in character, as seems to be the case from the sparse record before the court (as noted above), the regulations are, in fact, confined to the regulation of a trade within a province.

In the end, the effort of the respondent here is simply to build into these regulations a validity essentially founded upon the embryonic definition of the application of the trade and commerce heading in the Citizens Insurance case, supra. That observation and the subsequent references thereto are all predicated upon the requirement that the purported trade and commerce legislation affected industry and commerce at large or in a sweeping, general sense. In the context of the Food and Drugs Act, it follows that even if this statute [Page 944] were to cover a substantial portion of Canadian economic activity, one industry or trade at a time, by a varying array of regulations or trade codes applicable to each individual sector, there would not, in the result, be at law a regulation of trade and commerce in the sweeping general sense contemplated in the Citizens Insurance case, supra. That, in my view, is the heart and core of the problem confronting the respondent in this appeal.

LASKIN CJ, dissenting:—

… [Parliament] should be able to fix standards that are common to all manufacturers of foods, including beer, drugs, cosmetics and therapeutic devices, at least to equalize competitive advantages in the carrying on of businesses concerned with such products. I find some reinforcement in this view of the scope of the federal trade and commerce power in s. 121 of the British North America Act which precludes interprovincial tariffs, marking Canada [Page 922] as a whole as an economic union.

The operations of Labatt Breweries and of other brewers of beer extend throughout Canada, and I would not attenuate the federal trade and commerce power any further than has already been manifested in judicial decisions by denying Parliament authority to address itself to uniform prescriptions for the manufacture of food, drugs, cosmetics, therapeutic devices in the way, in the case of beer, of standards for its production and distribution according to various alcoholic strengths under labels appropriate to the governing regulations.

2.3.3 Attorney General of Canada v Canadian National Transportation Ltd

Attorney General of Canada v Canadian National Transportation Ltd*, [1983] 2 SCR 206, 1983 CanLII 36

DICKSON J., concurring: —

Is the Attorney General of Canada constitutionally competent to prefer indictments and conduct proceedings in respect of alleged violations of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, as amended? …

[The respondent accused challenged the proceedings brought against it by the A.G. Canada, arguing that] s. 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act was criminal law and that pursuant to s. 92(14) of the British North America Act, 1867 (now the Constitution Act, 1867) only a provincial Attorney General could conduct prosecutions. …

The appellant [Attorney General of Canada] submits that s. 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act is not constitutionally [Page 250] dependent only on the s. 91(27) criminal law power, but is also supportable under head 91(2), trade and commerce ….

… In Parsons the Privy Council identified international and inter-provincial trade as coming within the ambit of s. 91(2) and much of the subsequent jurisprudence on the federal trade and commerce power has been devoted to a consideration of just how much or how little intraprovincial commerce could be validly swept into the flow of the interprovincial trade affected by a given enactment. In the present case, however, even on the most generous definition, s. 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act cannot be seen as a regulation of interprovincial trade and commerce. The appellant Attorney General of Canada concedes that if it is to be justified under s. 91(2), this enactment must fall within what has been called the "second branch" of the Parsons classification, namely the "general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion".

[Attempts by the federal government to rely on this second branch have, over the years, met with a] conspicuous lack of success…. [One reason for this is that if] every economic issue that could be characterized as a "question of general interest throughout the Dominion" were to fall under federal competence by virtue of s. 91(2), then the extent of the power would hardly be narrower than it would on a literal reading of the words "regulation of trade and commerce" alone. There is hardly an economic issue which, if only by virtue of its recurrence in locations around the country, could not be characterized as a matter of general interest throughout the Dominion.

Although the Privy Council in Parsons was unwilling to consider in detail the boundary between ss. 91(2) and 92(13) it did go as far as holding that "regulation of trade and commerce" could not include "the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade". … [More recently,] in the Labatt case, supra, after confirming that the proper test under the second branch of the trade and commerce power is still whether the legislation deals with a question of general interest throughout the Dominion, Estey J. went on at p. 940 to state, "What clearly is not [Page 266] of general national concern is the regulation of a single trade or industry", a proposition which he extended to hold true even if the regulation were on a national basis. I concurred in Estey J.'s judgment in Labatt and I agree with this statement of what is to be subtracted from the notion of "a question of general interest throughout the Dominion". … I do not, however, believe that any of this leads necessarily to the … conclusion propounded by the respondent and the intervenant Attorneys General that the relevant legislation in the present case cannot validly depend on the federal trade and commerce power….

Every general enactment will necessarily have some local impact and if it is true that an overly literal conception of "general interest" will endanger the very idea of the local, there are equal dangers of swinging the telescope the other way around. The forest is no less a forest for being made up of individual trees. Whatever the constitutional flaws in the Board of Commerce Act and Combines and Fair Prices Act, they cannot be attributed, as Duff J seems to contend, to the fact that any individual order made by the board would have its effect on a business or trade in the province. Were that the test then no economic legislation could ever qualify under the general trade and commerce power. Such a conception is merely the obverse of the equally unacceptable proposition that economic legislation qualifies under the general trade and commerce rubric merely because it applies equally and uniformly throughout the country.

The reason why the regulation of a single trade or business in the province cannot be a question of general interest throughout the Dominion, is that it lies at the very heart of the local autonomy envisaged in the Constitution Act, 1867. That a federal enactment purports to carry out such regulation in the same way in all the provinces or in association with other regulatory codes dealing with other trades or businesses does not change the fact that what is being created is an exact overlapping and hence a nullification of a jurisdiction conceded to the provinces by the Constitution. A different situation obtains, however, when what is at issue is general legislation aimed at the economy as a single integrated national unit rather than as a collection of separate local enterprises. Such legislation is qualitatively different from anything that could practically or constitutionally be enacted by the individual provinces either separately or in combination. The focus of such legislation is on the general, though its results will obviously be manifested in particular local effects any one of which may touch upon "Property and Civil Rights in the Province." Nevertheless, in pith and substance such legislation will be addressed to questions of general interest throughout the Dominion. The line of demarcation is clear between measures validly directed at a general regulation of the national economy and those merely aimed at centralized control over a large number of economic entities. The regulations in the Labatt case were probably close to the line. It may also well be that, given the state of the economy in 1920 and the actual mechanics of the legislation, the Board of Commerce Act and the Combines and Fair Prices Act amounted simply to an attempt to authorize the issuance of an uncoordinated series of local orders and prohibitions.

In approaching this difficult problem of characterization it is useful to note the remarks of the Chief Justice in MacDonald v. Vapor Canada Ltd., … in which he cites as possible indicia for a valid exercise of the general trade and commerce power the presence of a national regulatory scheme, the oversight of a regulatory agency and a concern with trade in general rather the with an aspect of a particular business. To this list I would add what to my mind would be even stronger indications of valid general regulation trade and commerce, namely (i) that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of passing such an enactment and (ii) that failure to include one or more provinces or local ties would jeopardize successful operation in other parts of the country.

The above does not purport to be an exhaustive list, nor is the presence of any or all of these indicia necessarily decisive. The proper approach to the characterization is still the one suggested in Parsons, a careful case by case assessment. Nevertheless, the presence of such factors does at least make it far more probable that what is being addressed in a federal enactment is genuinely national economic concern and not just a collection of local ones.

General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing*, [1989] 1 SCR 641, 1989 CanLII 133 (excerpt by Howard Kislowicz)

THE CHIEF JUSTICE -- The principal issue in this appeal is the constitutional validity of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23. Section 31.1 creates a civil cause of action for certain infractions of the Combines Investigation Act. It is this fact which makes the section constitutionally suspect: a civil cause of action is within the domain of the provinces to create. The essential question raised by this appeal is whether s. 31.1 can, nevertheless, be upheld as constitutionally valid by virtue of its relationship with the Combines Investigation Act. Answering this question requires addressing two issues: first, is the Act valid under the federal trade and commerce power, expressed in s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867; and second, is s. 31.1 integrated with the Act in such a way that it too is intra vires under s. 91(2).

Facts

General Motors of Canada Ltd. ("GM") manufactures automobiles and trucks. City National Leasing ("CNL") leases across Canada fleets of automobiles and trucks in competition with other national fleet leasing companies. CNL purchases the majority of its vehicles from franchised GM dealers, but does not purchase from GM directly. To finance purchases of GM vehicles between 1970 and 1980, CNL received interest rate support through a program offered by General Motors Acceptance Corporation ("GMAC"). CNL alleges that during that time GM, directly or indirectly, had been paying "preferential" interest rate support to competitors of CNL in respect of competitors' purchases of GM manufactured automobiles and trucks, in addition to the interest rate support available to CNL. It is further alleged that the exclusion of CNL from the preferential interest rate support program from 1970 to 1980 was a practice of price discrimination contrary to s. 34(1)(a) of the Act, giving CNL an action under s. 31.1. CNL claims that it lost profits equivalent to monies saved by its competitors, and that it is entitled to recover from GM damages equivalent to the lost profits and compound interest thereon. CNL also sued GM for breach of contract for damages arising after March 1980.

The General Trade and Commerce Power

The leading case of Citizens' Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 7 App. Cas. 96, sets out the most frequently quoted statement of the scope of s. 91(2). Speaking for the Privy Council, Sir Montague Smith noted at p. 112 that if the words trade and commerce were given their ordinary meaning, s. 91(2) conceivably granted very wide-ranging powers to the federal government:

> The words "regulation of trade and commerce," in their unlimited sense are sufficiently wide, if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the Act, to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to trade with foreign governments, requiring the sanction of parliament, down to minute rules for regulating particular trades.

To limit the breadth of a literal interpretation of s. 91(2), Sir Montague Smith settled upon the following construction, at p. 113:

> Construing therefore the words "regulation of trade and commerce" by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion.

> Having taken this view of the present case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question how far the general power to make regulations of trade and commerce, when competently exercised by the dominion parliament, might legally modify or affect property and civil rights in the provinces, or the legislative power of the provincial legislatures in relation to those subjects . . . .

In Canadian National Transportation, supra, at p. 258, I suggested that Parsons had established three important propositions with regard to the federal trade and commerce power:

> . . . (i) it does not correspond to the literal meaning of the words "regulation of trade and commerce"; (ii) it includes not only arrangements with regard to international and interprovincial trade but "it may be that . . . (it) would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion"; (iii) it does not extend to regulating the contracts of a particular business or trade.

Since Parsons, the jurisprudence on s. 91(2) has largely been an elaboration on the boundaries of the two aspects or "branches" of federal power: (1) the power over international and interprovincial trade and commerce; and (2) the power over general trade and commerce affecting Canada as a whole. The first branch has been the subject of considerable constitutional challenge and judicial scrutiny. The second branch, in contrast, has remained largely unexplored, terra incognita. In this appeal, however, it is under this second branch of s. 91(2) that CNL and the Attorney General of Canada seek to uphold s. 31.1.

Aside from… two cases, at least until of late, the general trade and commerce power met with consistent rejection by the courts. Professor Hogg in the second edition of his work Constitutional Law of Canada, at pp. 447-48, notes that the courts refused to accept it as the basis for regulation of the insurance industry in the Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Alberta (Insurance Reference), 1916 CanLII 424 (UK JCPC), [1916] 1 A.C. 588; prices and profits in In re the Board of Commerce Act, 1919, and the Combines and Fair Prices Act, 1919 (the Board of Commerce case), 1921 CanLII 399 (UK JCPC), [1922] 1 A.C. 191; labour relations in Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, 1925 CanLII 331 (UK JCPC), [1925] A.C. 396; marketing in The King v. Eastern Terminal Elevator Co., 1925 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1925] S.C.R. 434, and Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Attorney-General for Canada (Natural Products Marketing Reference), 1937 CanLII 364 (UK JCPC), [1937] A.C. 377; and the prohibition of margarine in Canadian Federation of Agriculture v. Attorney-General for Quebec (The Margarine Reference), 1950 CanLII 342 (UK JCPC), [1951] A.C. 179.

The treatment of the general trade and commerce power in the cases just mentioned was no doubt strongly influenced by earlier Privy Council decisions on s. 91(2) and in particular what Anglin C.J. referred to in The King v. Eastern Terminal Elevator Co., supra, at p. 441, as ". . . their Lordships' emphatic and reiterated allocation of `the regulation of trade and commerce' to . . . [a] subordinate and wholly auxiliary function . . . ."

Since 1949 and the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council, the trade and commerce power has, I think it fair to say, enjoyed an enhanced importance …

> In examining cases which have considered s. 91(2), it is evident that courts have been sensitive to the need to reconcile the general trade and commerce power of the federal government with the provincial power over property and civil rights. Balancing has not been easy.

This Court took the first step towards delineating more specific principles of validity for legislation enacted under the general trade and commerce power in Vapor Canada, supra. …

Chief Justice Laskin, speaking for five members of the Court, proposed three hallmarks of validity for legislation under the second branch of the trade and commerce power. First, the impugned legislation must be part of a general regulatory scheme. Second, the scheme must be monitored by the continuing oversight of a regulatory agency. Third, the legislation must be concerned with trade as a whole rather than with a particular industry. Each of these requirements is evidence of a concern that federal authority under the second branch of the trade and commerce power does not encroach on provincial jurisdiction. By limiting the means which federal legislators may employ to that of a regulatory scheme overseen by a regulatory agency, and by limiting the object of federal legislation to trade as a whole, these requirements attempt to maintain a delicate balance between federal and provincial power. On the basis of these criteria, Laskin C.J. then rejected the general trade and commerce power as the constitutional foundation for s. 7(e).

Three members of the Court affirmed the Vapor Canada criteria in Canadian National Transportation. At issue in Canadian National Transportation was the authority of the Attorney General of Canada to conduct prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act. Four members of the Court held that provincial authority over the administration of justice in s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, did not preclude the federal government from conducting prosecutions of criminal offences. I was of the view that s. 92(14) did preclude the federal government from prosecuting criminal offences -- unless the offences could be upheld under a head of power other than s. 91(27). I then took the further position, in which Beetz and Lamer JJ. agreed in substance, that the section could be sustained as legislation relating to the general trade and commerce power and thus the federal government was competent to prosecute a violation of s. 32(1) of the Combines Investigation Act.

In reaching the conclusion that s. 32(1)(c) of the Combines Investigation Act was within the scope of the general trade and commerce power, and writing for the minority of the Court, I adopted Laskin C.J.'s three criteria in Vapor Canada, supra, but added two factors that I considered indicia of the valid exercise of the general trade and commerce power: (i) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (ii) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. These two requirements, like Laskin C.J.'s three criteria, serve to ensure that federal legislation does not upset the balance of power between federal and provincial governments. In total, the five factors provide a preliminary check-list of characteristics, the presence of which in legislation is an indication of validity under the trade and commerce power. These indicia do not, however, represent an exhaustive list of traits that will tend to characterize general trade and commerce legislation. Nor is the presence or absence of any of these five criteria necessarily determinative. …

On any occasion where the general trade and commerce power is advanced as a ground of constitutional validity, a careful case by case analysis remains appropriate. The five factors articulated in Canadian National Transportation merely represent a principled way to begin the difficult task of distinguishing between matters relating to trade and commerce and those of a more local nature.

The Presence of a Regulatory Scheme in the Combines Investigation Act

The second step in determining the validity of s. 31.1 is to establish whether the Act contains a regulatory scheme. The presence of a well-orchestrated scheme of economic regulation is immediately apparent on examination of the Combines Investigation Act. The existence of a regulatory scheme is in evidence throughout the entire Act.

The Combines Investigation Act is divided into eight parts. Part I creates the Director of Investigation and Research, whose role is to investigate the possibility that companies are engaging in certain forms of anti-competitive conduct specifically proscribed by later parts of the Act. The Director has the power to require the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, created by Part II of the Act, to conduct hearings into suspected violations of the Act. The Director is also in charge of enforcing the criminal provisions of the Act (Part V) by referring the matter to the Attorney General of Canada, and of enforcing the provisions relating to the civil violations of the Act by the exclusive right to apply to the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission for a remedial order (Part IV.1).

Part II establishes the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The role of the Commission is to conduct hearings into alleged violations of the criminal provisions of the Act, upon request of the Director. At the conclusion of the proceedings, the Commission is required to submit a written report to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The report must include an appraisal of the effect on the public interest of arrangements and practices disclosed in the evidence as well as recommendations on potential remedies. Part III contains general provisions regarding the conduct of inquiries and proceedings and the remuneration of staff.

Parts IV and IV.1 contain the remedial provisions of the Combines Investigation Act. Part IV, entitled Special Remedies, is, as its name implies, a list of remedies for anti-competitive conduct defined in the Act, including the reduction or removal of customs duties (s. 28), orders of the Federal Court to prevent the use of patents as a method of restraining trade (s. 29), interim injunctions against conduct proscribed under Part V of the Act (s. 29.1), prohibition orders on repetition of conduct where a person has been convicted of an offence under Part V (s. 30), and the civil damages action at issue in this appeal (s. 31.1). Part IV.1 of the Act is entitled Matters Reviewable by the Commission. It grants the Commission the authority to issue remedial orders against a number of trade practices including exclusive dealing, market restriction and tied selling.

The penal provisions of the Act are enumerated in Parts V and VI. Part V proscribes as criminal certain practices including conspiracies to lessen competition (s. 32), bid-rigging (s. 32.2), assisting in the formation of a merger or monopoly (s. 33), illegal trade practices (s. 34), misleading advertising (s. 36), false representations of product performance tests and testimonials (s. 36.1) double ticketing (s. 36.2), and pyramid selling (s. 36.3). Part VI of the Act creates a number of offences for obstructing or failing to comply with an inquiry and establishes the enforcement procedure for the criminal provisions of the Act. Finally, Part VII contains general provisions of the investigation of monopolistic situations.

From this overview of the Combines Investigation Act I have no difficulty in concluding that the Act as a whole embodies a complex scheme of economic regulation. The purpose of the Act is to eliminate activities that reduce competition in the market-place. The entire Act is geared to achieving this objective. The Act identifies and defines anti-competitive conduct. It establishes an investigatory mechanism for revealing prohibited activities and provides an extensive range of criminal and administrative redress against companies engaging in behaviour that tends to reduce competition. In my view, these three components, elucidation of prohibited conduct, creation of an investigatory procedure, and the establishment of a remedial mechanism, constitute a well-integrated scheme of regulation designed to discourage forms of commercial behaviour viewed as detrimental to Canada and the Canadian economy.

The Validity of the Regulatory Scheme

Having discerned the presence of a regulatory scheme in the Combines Investigation Act, it is necessary to consider the validity of the scheme under the general trade and commerce power in light of the criteria established in Canadian National Transportation, supra. Four criteria remain to be examined: (1) whether the regulatory scheme operates under the oversight of an agency, (2) whether the Act is concerned with trade in general, (3) whether the provinces would be constitutionally capable of enacting combines legislation, and finally, (4) whether the failure to include one or more provinces or localities would jeopardize the successful operation of the Combines Investigation Act.

The foregoing review of the Combines Investigation Act leaves no doubt that the scheme regulating anti-competitive activities operates under the watchful gaze of a regulatory agency. The regulatory mechanism is carefully controlled by the Director of Investigation and Research and to a lesser degree by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission. The authority to launch an inquiry into suspected anti-competitive conduct lies with the Director. The Director is required to initiate an inquiry whenever there is reason to believe either that a person has failed to comply with an order of the Commission or where an offence proscribed by the Act has been or is about to be committed, whenever the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs so directs, and on application of six residents of Canada over the age of eighteen. The inquiry is conducted by the Director and his or her staff. If the Director concludes that there has been a violation of Part V of the Act, the Director may refer the matter to the Commission whose role is to hold proceedings and to report the outcome, including any remedial recommendations, to the Minister. It is clear that the Director exercises a significant degree of control over the operation of the Combines Investigation Act. In my view, the control over the entire process exercised by the Director and the Commission satisfies the requirement that there be vigilant oversight of the administration of a regulatory scheme.

I am also of the view that the Combines Investigation Act meets the remaining three indicia of Canadian National Transportation. These criteria share a common theme: all three are indications that the scheme of regulation is national in scope and that local regulation would be inadequate. The Act is quite clearly concerned with the regulation of trade in general, rather than with the regulation of a particular industry or commodity…

This generality of application distinguishes the Act from the legislation which was found ultra vires in Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, 1979 CanLII 190 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 914. In that case the legislation regulated a single trade or industry. As I noted earlier, the purpose of the Act is to ensure the existence of a healthy level of competition in the Canadian economy. The deleterious effects of anti-competitive practices transcend provincial boundaries. Competition is not an issue of purely local concern but one of crucial importance for the national economy.

Various factors underlie the need for national regulation of competition in the economy. Professors Hogg and Grover, in "The Constitutionality of the Competition Bill" (1976), 1 Can. Bus. L.J. 197, at pp. 199-200 (an abridged version of a paper written for the federal government's Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) provide a useful discussion of the diverse economic, geographical, and political factors which make it essential that competition be regulated on the federal level:

> It is surely obvious that major regulation of the Canadian economy has to be national. Goods and services, and the cash or credit which purchases them, flow freely from one part of the country to another without regard for provincial boundaries. Indeed, a basic concept of the federation is that it must be an economic union. An over-all national policy is the key to efficiency in the production of goods and services. Each province of the country is differently endowed with national resources, capital, labour and access to consumers. The result is that each province will be able to produce some products or services more efficiently than others. The introduction of an effective competition policy can be seen as one method to ensure that these differing regional advantages will accrue to the nation as a whole in terms of lower prices, better quality and variety and increased opportunities for Canadians. Any attempt to achieve an optimal distribution of economic activity must transcend provincial boundaries, for, in many respects, Canada is one huge marketplace . . . .
> The relative unimportance of provincial boundaries has become progressively more obvious as industry has tended to become more concentrated. Improved communications and transportation have increased the mobility of labour, capital and technology, as well as raw materials and the finished product . . . .
> With respect to businesses which are confined to Canada, with few exceptions, any individual or corporation, including a provincially incorporated corporation, has the capacity to "walk across" provincial boundaries in order to buy or sell, lend or borrow, hire or fire. In the absence of artificial impediments, therefore, the market for goods and services is competitive on a national basis, and provincial legislation cannot be an effective regulator.

It is evident from this discussion that competition cannot be effectively regulated unless it is regulated nationally. As I have said, in my view combines legislation fulfills the three indicia of national scope as described in Canadian National Transportation: it is legislation "aimed at the economy as a single integrated national unit rather than as a collection of separate local enterprises", it is legislation "that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of passing" and "failure to include one or more provinces or localities would jeopardize successful operation" of the legislation "in other parts of the country".

The above arguments also answer the claim of the Attorney General of Quebec that the regulation of competition does not fall within federal jurisdiction in its intraprovincial dimension and thus the Act should be read down so that s. 31.1 only applies to interprovincial trade. Quebec relies on two points to support its position. First, in the Interim Report on Competition Policy of the Canadian Economic Council, the Report which the federal government relies on to show that competition is exclusively federal, there is a passage at p. 108 that recognizes that the provinces have an important role to play in local competition laws…

The second point is that provincial law, both Civil Code and common law, already provides some remedies for unfair competition, as in the Quebec Ready Mix case where the suit was brought under art. 1053 of the Civil Code, as well as s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act. Quebec points out that in the United States, forty-three states have adopted competition acts to combat local restraints on trade, in co-ordination with the federal government.

The arguments made above offer a response to these points. They make it clear that not only is the Act meant to cover intraprovincial trade, but that it must do so if it is to be effective. Because regulation of competition is so clearly of national interest and because competition cannot be successfully regulated by federal legislation which is restricted to interprovincial trade, the Quebec argument must fail. I also note that, contrary to the view of Marceau J. in the Trial Division of the Federal Court in Quebec Ready Mix, supra, at p. 208, that the presence of an already existing action in Quebec law does not argue for invalidating federal legislation. I would repeat what I said at p. 175 of Multiple Access, supra, (which words were also quoted by MacGuigan J. in the Court of Appeal's judgment in Attorney General of Canada v. Québec Ready Mix, supra, at p. 78): "The validity of the federal legislation must be determined without heed to the . . . [provincial] legislation".

On the other hand, competition is not a single matter, any more than inflation or pollution. The provinces too, may deal with competition in the exercise of their legislative powers in such fields as consumer protection, labour relations, marketing and the like. The point is, however, that Parliament also has the constitutional power to regulate intraprovincial aspects of competition.

In sum, the Combines Investigation Act is a complex scheme of competition regulation aimed at improving the economic welfare of the nation as a whole. It operates under a regulatory agency. It is designed to control an aspect of the economy that must be regulated nationally if it is to be successfully regulated at all…

Appeal dismissed.

2.3.5 Kirkbi AG v Ritvik Holdings Inc

Kirkbi AG v Ritvik Holdings Inc*, 2005 SCC 65

LEBEL J: —

[Upon the expiry of LEGO patents in Canada, a Canadian toy manufacturer (Ritvik) began manufacturing similar construction toy sets using the same system of interlocking studs and tubes. Kirkbi, the manufacturer of LEGO construction sets, brought an action under s. 7(b) of the Trademarks Act, RSC 1985, c T-13. The action] seeks to prevent Ritvik from marketing its competing products without a proper disclaimer that its building blocks are not LEGO bricks and are not supplied by Kirkbi. Absent such a warning to consumers, the appellant argues, confusion arises and there are grounds for a passing-off action under s. 7(b). In this Court, for the first time in these proceedings, Ritvik challenged the constitutionality of s. 7(b) and argued that it is ultra vires the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada.

The first stage of the analysis requires a characterization of the impugned provision in isolation from the rest of the statute. We look to its purpose and its effect to determine whether the provision encroaches on provincial powers, and if so, to what extent: City National Leasing, at p. 674; Kitkatla, at para. 59. Section 7(b) creates a civil cause of action that essentially codifies the common law tort of passing off: Vapor Canada, at p. 147; Asbjorn Horgard A/S (F.C.T.D.), at p. 241. Standing alone it appears to encroach on provincial power, namely property and civil rights in the province (s. 92(13)). …

In City National Leasing, this Court found that the intrusion of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, into provincial jurisdiction was minimal. In coming to this conclusion Dickson C.J. highlighted the following three factors: (i) the provision was remedial and was not in itself a substantive part of the Act; the provision did not create a general cause of action; (ii) its application was limited by the provisions of the Act; and (iii) Parliament was not constitutionally precluded from creating rights of civil action where such measures are shown to be warranted (p. 673).

These factors apply equally to s. 7(b) of the Trade-marks Act. First, s. 7(b) is remedial; its purpose is to enforce the substantive aspects of the Trade-marks Act relating to unregistered trade-marks:

> The tort of passing off is in many respects the equivalent cause of action for unregistered trade-marks as infringement [s. 20 of the Act] is to registered trade-marks. The overall legislative scheme of the Trade-marks Act is the protection, identification, and registration of trade-marks, whether registered or unregistered.

Second, the passing-off action protects unregistered trade-marks and goodwill enjoyed by the trade-marks. Section 7(b) is therefore limited by the provisions of the Trade-marks Act: it does not expand the federal jurisdiction in relation to trade-marks and trade-names but merely rounds out an otherwise incomplete trade-mark scheme (Asbjorn Horgard A/S (F.C.T.D.), at p. 237). Unlike s. 7(e), which was found to be ultra vires Parliament because it did not have any connection with the enforcement of trademarks or trade-names (Asbjorn Horgard A/S (F.C.T.D.), at p. 242) and was significantly broader in application, the creation of a statutory action for passing off in s. 7(b) is limited in its application.

[Regarding the validity of the Trademarks Act, the Court's reasons (at para 28) were extremely brief.]

In the second stage of the analysis, the Court must determine whether the Trade-marks Act is a valid exercise of Parliament's general trade and commerce power. The analysis is guided by the five indicia of validity set out above. In [Asbjorn Horgard A/S v Gibbs/Nortac Industries, [1987] 3 FC 544, 1987 CanLII 5269], MacGuigan J.A. of the Federal Court of Appeal noted that:

> All of the criteria of Chief Justice Dickson are verified in the Act: a national regulatory scheme, the oversight of the Registrar of Trade Marks, a concern with trade in general rather than with an aspect of a particular business, the incapability of the provinces to establish such a scheme and the necessity for national coverage. [p. 559]

The parties do not dispute Parliament's constitutional power to regulate registered trade-marks. Rather, it is Parliament's right to create a civil remedy in relation to an unregistered trade-mark that is in issue. The respondent's position is that the only regulatory scheme in the Trade-marks Act is the scheme governing registered trade-marks. In my view this is an incorrect characterization of the Act. The Trade-marks Act establishes a regulatory scheme for both registered and unregistered trade-marks.

The protection of unregistered trade-marks is integral to the legitimacy, legal standards and efficacy of registered trade-marks. The Trade-marks Act is clearly concerned with trade as a whole, as opposed to within a particular industry. There is no question that trade-marks apply across and between industries in different provinces. Divided provincial and federal jurisdiction could mean that the provincial law could be changed by each provincial legislature. This could result in unregistered trade-marks that were more strongly protected than registered trade-marks, undermining the efficacy and integrity of the federal Parliament's Trade-marks Act. The lack of a civil remedy integrated into the scheme of the Act, applicable to all marks, registered or unregistered, might also lead to duplicative or conflicting and hence inefficient enforcement procedures

The final step in the analysis is to determine whether the provision is sufficiently integrated into the otherwise valid statute. [Section 7(b)] plays a clear role in the federal scheme [because without] this provision there would be a gap in the legislative protection of trade-marks. This would create inconsistencies in the protection of registered and unregistered trade-marks and lead to uncertainty. Section 7(b) is sufficiently integrated into the federal scheme and, in this respect, is significantly different from s. 7(e) [the provision that was held to be invalid in Vapor Canada]. I conclude that s. 7(b) lies within the federal government's legislative competence.

2.3.6 Reference re Securities Act

For an excerpt of Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, see Part 1.3 of Chapter 10 on the Property and Civil Rights power.

2.3.7 Reference Re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation

Reference Re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation*, 2018 SCC 48

THE COURT:—

[1] A number of attempts to develop and implement a national system for the regulation of Canadian capital markets in a manner that is compatible with the country's federal structure have been made since the 1930s. At issue in these appeals is the constitutionality of a recent proposal by the federal government and the governments of Ontario, British Columbia, Saskatchewan, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Yukon to implement a national cooperative capital markets regulatory system ("Cooperative System").

[2] The structure of the Cooperative System builds on the guidance provided by this Court in Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837. Its main components include a model provincial and territorial statute known as the Capital Markets Act ("Model Provincial Act") that deals primarily with the day-to-day aspects of the securities trade, a federal statute known as the Capital Markets Stability Act ("Draft Federal Act") that is aimed at preventing and managing systemic risk and which establishes criminal offences relating to financial markets, and a national securities regulator that is to be overseen by the federal Minister of Finance and the ministers responsible for capital markets regulation in the participating provinces ("Authority").

[95] [U]nlike the proposed legislation that was at issue in Reference re Securities Act, the Draft Federal Act does not purport "to regulate, on an exclusive basis, all aspects of securities trading in Canada" (Reference re Securities Act, at para. 106). It does not contain provisions that go to the day-to-day regulation of all aspects of securities trading, like requirements for the registration of dealers, prospectus filing and disclosure obligations. The extent to which the statutory powers under the Draft Federal Act permit the regulation of these matters remains circumscribed by the requirement of systemic risk, which is a significant threshold that must be met before those powers can be exercised (A.F. (Canada), at para. 94). The management of risk which falls below this threshold — that is, risk that does not pose a threat to the Canadian economy as a whole — lies outside the scope of the Draft Federal Act.

[96] Properly understood, therefore, the intention is not that the Draft Federal Act will displace provincial and territorial securities legislation. It was instead designed to complement these statutes by addressing economic objectives that are considered to be national in character.

[97] When the Draft Federal Act is viewed as a whole, its pith and substance clearly does not relate, as Quebec suggests, to regulation of the trade in securities generally (R.F., paras. 111-16). Rather, its subject matter accords with its stated purposes: "to promote and protect the stability of Canada's financial system through the management of systemic risk related to capital markets" (s. 4(a)), and "to protect capital markets, investors and others from financial crimes" (s. 4(b)).

[The Court concluded that the legislation satisfied the GM indicia and, in particular, "with its carefully tailored scope" (par. 113), constituted a response to the provincial incapacity, identified in the Securities Reference, to effectively manage systemic risk.]

2.3.8 Questions

1. In GM, the Court analyzes the validity of the Combines Investigation Act without first determining what the "pith and substance" of the Act is. By contrast, in Reference Re Securities Act, the first step in the validity analysis is to characterize the "pith and substance" of the challenged legislation (par. 93-106); only afterwards does the Court ask whether the GM indicia are satisfied. What role does the analysis of pith and substance play in explaining the outcome of the Securities Act? Is the omission of this step in GM significant?
2. What should we make of the fact that, in GM, the fourth and fifth indicia are analyzed holistically rather than individually? Is there significance in the Court's choice in Reference Re Securities Act to analyze the indicia separately? Is it significant that they are called "indicia" rather than "criteria"?
3. Some commentators read the fourth and fifth indicia in GM as calling for an assessment of whether federal or provincial jurisdiction over a particular matter would be more "efficient," and criticized the decision as affording undue weight to this value at the expense of diversity. See, for example, N. Karazivan and J.F. Gaudreault-DesBiens, "On Polyphony and Paradoxes in the Regulation of Securities within the Canadian Federation" (2010), 49 C.B.L.J. 1; Jean Leclair, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity" (2003), 28 Queen's L.J. 411. What basis is there in the Court's reasons in GM for this interpretation? To what extent does the decision in Reference Re Securities Act lend itself to the same, or a different interpretation?

3 Constraints resulting from s. 91(2) on provincial authority to implement trade barriers

3.1 Overview

In a series of cases, the Supreme Court of Canada has dealt with challenges brought against provincial legislation regulating the marketing of products that, at some point, moved in international or interprovincial trade. In these cases, the issue is whether the provincial legislation is ultra vires because it impermissibly regulates international or interprovincial trade.

3.2 Key cases

3.2.1 Carnation Company Limited v Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board

Carnation Company Limited v. Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board et al.*, 1968 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1968] SCR 238

MARTLAND J.:— The question in issue before this Court is as to whether, in making [certain] orders, the [Quebec Agricultural] Marketing Board had infringed on the exclusive legislative powers of Parliament under s. 91(2) of the British North America Act to regulate trade and commerce. …

The Marketing Board was created as a corporation by the provisions of the Quebec Agricultural Marketing Act, 4-5 Eliz. II, 1955-56 (Que.), c. 37. It was empowered, inter alia, to approve joint marketing plans, and to arbitrate any dispute arising in the course of carrying out a joint marketing plan. The Act provided that ten or more producers of agricultural products in any territory in Quebec could apply to the Marketing Board for approval of a joint plan for the marketing of one or more classes of farm products in such territory, if such plan was supported by a vote of at least 75 per cent in number and value of all producers concerned.

On July 25, 1957, the Marketing Board approved The Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Plan. The administration of the Plan was entrusted to The Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Board. The Plan bound all bona fide milk producers shipping milk and dairy products to any of the plants of the appellant in Quebec. The Producers' Board had power to negotiate with the buyer (the appellant) for the marketing and sale to it of milk and dairy products from the farms of producers bound by the Plan. The Plan provided for a board of arbitration, which might be the Marketing Board, to decide conflicts in the event of a failure to agree with the appellant in the negotiation or execution of a convention.

Agreement was not reached as to the purchase price of milk to be purchased by the appellant from the producers, pursuant to the Plan. The matter was arbitrated by the Marketing Board which, after hearing evidence for both sides, wrote extensive reasons, and determined a price of $3.07 per hundred pounds, on December 18, 1958. Subsequently, on June 11, 1962, after a further arbitration, the Marketing Board decided on a price of $2.78 per hundred pounds.

It is these three orders of the Marketing Board, which approved the Plan, and which determined the price to be paid by the appellant for milk purchased from producers subject to the Plan, which are the subject of the appellant's attack.

The appellant was incorporated under the Canadian Companies Act, and has its head office in Toronto. It operates, in Quebec, an evaporated milk plant at Sherbrooke and a receiving station at Waterloo.

During the period concerned, it purchased raw milk from approximately 2,000 farmers, situated mostly in the Eastern Townships. At the Sherbrooke plant it processes raw milk into evaporated milk. The major part of such production is shipped and sold outside Quebec. Milk received at the Waterloo receiving station, during the relevant period, was either sent to the Sherbrooke plant, for processing, or else, skimmed, the butterfat being sold to other manufacturers, and the skim milk being sent to appellant's plant at Alexandria, Ontario, to be processed into skim milk powder.

The appellant, during the relevant period, was the only evaporated milk manufacturer in Quebec, with the exception of the Granby Co-operative, which, as a co-operative, was not subject to the provisions of the Quebec Agricultural Marketing Act.

The evidence showed that, since December 18, 1958, the date of the first arbitration award, prices paid by the appellant were about 10 to 25 cents per hundred pounds higher than those paid by other purchasers of raw milk in the same area.

The position taken by the appellant is that the three orders of the Marketing Board are invalid because they enable it to set a price to be paid by the appellant for a product the major portion of which, after processing, will be used by it for export out of Quebec. This, it is contended, constitutes the regulation of trade and commerce within the meaning of s. 91(2) of the British North America Act, a field reserved to the Parliament of Canada.

The validity of provincial legislation governing the marketing of agricultural products was before this Court in Lawson v. Interior Tree Fruit and Vegetable Committee of Direction[6] which concerned the Produce Marketing Act of British Columbia, 1926-27 (B.C.), c. 54. In holding that Act to be ultra vires of the Legislature of British Columbia, Duff J. (as he then was) said, at p. 364:

> Coming now to the first ground of attack, namely, that the statute constitutes an attempt to regulate trade within the meaning of head no. 2 of s. 91. To repeat the general language of s. 10(1), the functions of the Committee are for the purpose of controlling and regulating the marketing of any product within its authority, and for that purpose the Committee is empowered to determine whether or not and at what time, and in what quantity and from and to what places and at what price and on what terms the product may be marketed and delivered.

As I have said, the respondent Committee has attempted (in professed exercise of this authority) and in this litigation asserts its right to do so—to regulate the marketing of products into parts of Canada outside British Columbia. It claims the right under the statute to control (as in fact it does), the sale of such products for shipment into the prairie provinces as well as the shipment of them into those provinces for sale or storage. The moment his product reaches a state in which it becomes a possible article of commerce, the shipper is (under the Committee's interpretation of its powers), subject to the Committee's dictation as to the quantity of it which he may dispose of, as to the places from which, and the places to which he may ship, as to the route of transport, as to the price, as to all the terms of sale. I ought to refer also to the provision of the statute which prohibits anybody becoming a licensed shipper who has not, for six months immediately preceding his application for a licence, been a resident of the province, unless he is the registered owner of the land on which he carries on business as shipper. In a statute which deals with trade that is largely interprovincial, this is a significant feature. It is an attempt to control the manner in which traders in other provinces, who send their agents into British Columbia to make arrangements for the shipment of goods to their principals, shall carry out their interprovincial transactions. I am unable to convince myself that these matters are all, or chiefly, matters of merely British Columbia concern, in the sense that they are not also directly and substantially the concern of the other provinces,

In 1938, the Privy Council dealt with the validity of a British Columbia statute, The Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act, 1936, in Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board[9]. This Act enabled the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to set up a central British Columbia Marketing Board, to establish or approve schemes for the control and regulation within the Province of the transportation, packing, storage and marketing of any natural products, to constitute Marketing Boards to administer such schemes, and to vest in those Boards any powers considered necessary or advisable to exercise those functions.

It was held that this statute was, in pith and substance, an Act to regulate particular businesses, entirely within the Province, and was intra vires of the Provincial Legislature under s. 92(13) of the British North America Act. In dealing with the contention that this Act encroached upon s. 91(2) of the British North America Act, Lord Atkin said, at p. 718:

> It is sufficient to say upon the first ground that it is apparent that the legislation in question is confined to regulating transactions that take place wholly within the Province, and are therefore within the sovereign powers granted to the Legislature in that respect by s. 92 of the British North America Act. Their Lordships do not accept the view that natural products as defined in the Act are confined to natural products produced in British Columbia. There is no such restriction in the Act, and the limited construction would probably cause difficulty if it were sought at some future time to co-operate with a valid Dominion scheme. But the Act is clearly confined to dealings with such products as are situate within the Province. It was suggested that "transportation" would cover the carriage of goods in transit from one Province to another, or overseas. The answer is that on the construction of the Act as a whole it is plain that "transportation" is confined to the passage of goods whose transport begins within the Province to a destination also within the Province. It is now well settled that the enumeration in s. 91 of "the regulation of trade and commerce" as a class of subject over which the Dominion has exclusive legislative powers does not give the power to regulate for legitimate Provincial purposes particular trades or businesses so far as the trade or business is confined to the Province: Citizens Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons, 7 App. Cas. 96; Reference re The Natural Products Marketing Act, 1934, and Its Amending Act, 1935, (1936) Can. S.C.R. 398; (1937) 1937 CanLII 364 (UK JCPC), A.C. 377. And it follows that to the extent that the Dominion is forbidden to regulate within the Province, the Province itself has the right under its legislative powers over property and civil rights within the Province.

It is now necessary to consider, in the light of these decisions, the validity of the three orders which are under attack in the present case. The first order, which created

The Quebec Carnation Company Milk Producers' Board and empowered it to negotiate, on behalf of the milk producers, for the sale of their products to the appellant, is somewhat analogous to the creation of a collective bargaining agency in the field of labour relations. The purpose of the order was to regulate, on behalf of a particular group of Quebec producers, their trade with the appellant for the sale to it, in Quebec, of their milk. Its object was to improve their bargaining position.

The Producers' Board then undertook, with the appellant, negotiations for the sale to it of that milk. The order provided a machinery whereby the price of milk could be determined by arbitration if agreement could not be reached. In this respect it differs from most provincial legislation governing labour disputes, but there would seem to be no doubt that provincial labour legislation incorporating compulsory arbitration of disputes would be constitutional, unless objectionable on some other ground.

The two subsequent orders of the Marketing Board, under attack, contained the decisions which it reached in determining the proper price to be paid to the producers for milk purchased by the appellant.

Are these orders invalid because the milk purchased by the appellant was processed by it and, as to a major portion of its product, exported from the province? Because of that fact, do they constitute an attempt to regulate trade in matters of interprovincial concern?

That the price determined by the orders may have a bearing upon the appellant's export trade is unquestionable. It affects the cost of doing business. But so, also, do labour costs affect the cost of doing business of any company which may be engaged in export trade and yet there would seem to be little doubt as to the power of a province to regulate wage rates payable within a province, save as to an undertaking falling within the exceptions listed in s. 92(10) of the British North America Act. It is not the possibility that these orders might "affect" the appellants interprovincial trade which should determine their validity, but, rather, whether they were made "in relation to" the regulation of trade and commerce. This was a test applied, in another connection, by Duff J. (as he then was) in Gold Seal Limited v. Attorney-General for Alberta...

Thus, as Kerwin C.J. said in the Ontario Reference, in the passage previously quoted: "Once a statute aims at 'regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern' it is beyond the competence of a Provincial Legislature."

I am not prepared to agree that, in determining that aim, the fact that these orders may have some impact upon the appellant's interprovincial trade necessarily means that they constitute a regulation of trade and commerce within s. 91(2) and thus renders them invalid. The fact of such impact is a matter which may be relevant in determining their true aim and purpose, but it is not conclusive.

In the Lawson case, where the provincial legislation was found to be unconstitutional, the Committee created by the statute was enabled and purported to exercise a large measure of direct and immediate control over the movement of trade in commodities between a province and other provinces. That is not this case.

On the other hand, in the Shannon case the regulatory statute was upheld, as it was confined to the regulation of transactions taking place wholly within the province. It was held that s. 91(2) was not applicable to the regulation for legitimate provincial purposes of particular trades or businesses confined to the province.

The view of the four judges in the Ontario Reference was that the fact that a transaction took place wholly within a province did not necessarily mean that it was thereby subject solely to provincial control. The regulation of some such transactions relating to products destined for interprovincial trade could constitute a regulation of interprovincial trade and be beyond provincial control.

While I agree with the view of the four judges in the Ontario Reference that a trade transaction, completed in a province, is not necessarily, by that fact alone, subject only to provincial control, I also hold the view that the fact that such a transaction incidentally has some effect upon a company engaged in interprovincial trade does not necessarily prevent its being subject to such control.

I agree with the view of Abbott J., in the Ontario Reference, that each transaction and each regulation must be examined in relation to its own facts. In the present case, the orders under question were not, in my opinion, directed at the regulation of interprovincial trade. They did not purport directly to control or to restrict such trade. There was no evidence that, in fact, they did control or restrict it. The most that can be said of them is that they had some effect upon the cost of doing business in Quebec of a company engaged in interprovincial trade, and that, by itself, is not sufficient to make them invalid.

For these reasons, I would dismiss this appeal with costs. There should be no costs payable by or to the intervenants.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

3.2.2 Attorney-General for Manitoba v Manitoba Egg and Poultry Association

Attorney-General for Manitoba v Manitoba Egg and Poultry Association*, [1971] SCR 698, 1971 CanLII 135

[The context of the litigation was an interprovincial trade conflict in which producers of chickens in Quebec and eggs in Ontario lobbied their respective provincial governments for the enactment of schemes providing for the controlled marketing, at fixed prices, of all chickens sold in Ontario and all eggs sold in Quebec. The aim of these schemes was to prevent the flooding of each provincial market by surplus products from the other province. A side-effect of the schemes was to harm producers from other provinces, as the schemes had the effect of limiting those producers' access to Ontario and Quebec markets. Manitoba devised a strategy for challenging the constitutionality of the schemes: in the words of Paul Weiler, Manitoba "manufactured a controversy by initiating a carbon copy of the Quebec scheme, a proposed Order-in-Council which provided for Manitoba control of the marketing of extraprovincial eggs in Manitoba. It then referred these regulations to the Manitoba Court of Appeal for a decision about their constitutionality. … When the Manitoba Court of Appeal decided against the constitutional validity of the scheme, the Manitoba government was entitled as of right to appeal this 'loss' to the Supreme Court of Canada. In this way, it could achieve a binding decision as to all such schemes which would be authoritative in all the provinces." See Paul C Weiler, In the Last Resort (Toronto: Carswell, 1974) at 156-57.]

MARTLAND J: (Fauteux CJ and Abbott, Judson, Ritchie and Spence JJ concurring) —

The Regulation referred to in the Order-in-Council is described as "a Regulation providing for A Plan to Control and Regulate the Marketing of eggs in the Province of Manitoba", such Plan to be known as "The Manitoba Egg Producers' Marketing Plan."

Section 3(a) and (c) provides that the purpose of the Plan is: "To obtain for producers the most advantageous marketing conditions for the regulated product" and also that its purpose is to regulate production to "avoid over-production thereof."

Section 4(1) [establishes] "a producer board to be known as The Manitoba Egg Producers' Marketing Board" [which, under s. 4(2),] "shall be made up of 6 members, all of whom shall be actively engaged in the production of the regulated product, to be elected by the producers as provided in a regulation to be enacted hereafter…".

The Plan contemplates that it shall be applicable to all eggs marketed in Manitoba, whether or not they are produced in that province. While the provincial Legislature could not control, or permit the Producer Board (hereinafter referred to as "the Board") to control the production of eggs in another province, the terms of the Plan are applicable to the produce of another province once it is within Manitoba and available for marketing.

The [Act's] provisions make it clear that the Plan is intended to apply, not only to eggs produced by Manitoba producers, but to any eggs in Manitoba, wherever they may have been produced. This intent is placed beyond doubt by the provisions of ss. 12, 14 and 15 of the Order, which require the regulated product to be packed in containers, provided by the Board, which shall carry an inscription showing the place of origin of the regulated product and indicating whether such place of origin was in Manitoba, in another country, or in another province.

Complete control of the marketing of all eggs in Manitoba is vested in the Board. It is only through the Board, as selling agent, that any eggs may be sold or offered for sale. It has the authority, as already noted, to impose marketing quotas and to prohibit the offering for sale of a particular regulated product to ensure the orderly marketing of the regulated product. No eggs can be sold or offered for sale unless graded, packed and marked by a grading or packing station under contract with the Board. All eggs must be offered for sale to distributors, under contract with the Board, at prices set, from time to time, by the Board.

The Board, to which the Plan proposes to grant these broad powers, is not one which is to be appointed by the Manitoba Government, but is to be elected by the Manitoba producers. Its members must be actively engaged in the production of eggs. The main purpose of the Plan, to be achieved through the Board, is "to obtain for producers the most advantageous marketing conditions for the regulated product."

We have, therefore, a Plan which is intended to govern the sale in Manitoba of all eggs, wherever produced, which is to be operated by and for the benefit of the egg producers of Manitoba, to be carried out by a Board armed with the power to control the sale of eggs in Manitoba, brought in from outside Manitoba, by means of quotas, or even outright prohibition.

The issue which has to be considered in this appeal is as to whether the Plan is ultra vires of the Manitoba Legislature because it trespasses upon the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada to legislate on the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce conferred by s. 91(2) of The British North America Act.

When the Privy Council first addressed itself to the meaning of that provision it was stated that it included "regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern" (Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons [(1881), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 4 SCR 215, 7 App Cas 96 at 113 (UKJCPC)]. That proposition has not since been challenged. However, the case went on to hold that the provision did not include the regulation of the contracts of a particular business or trade in a single province.

This limitation on the federal power was reiterated in subsequent decisions of the Privy Council, the effect of which is summarized in Shannon v. Lower Mainland Dairy Products Board:

> It is now well settled that the enumeration in s. 91 of "the regulation of trade and commerce" as a class of subject over which the Dominion has exclusive legislative powers does not give the power to regulate for legitimate Provincial purposes particular trades or businesses so far as the trade or business is confined to the Province.

In that case the Natural Products Marketing (British Columbia) Act, 1936, was held to be intra vires of the Provincial Legislature because it was confined to dealings with such products as were situate within the province, even though not necessarily produced there. The basis of this decision was that "The pith and substance of this Act is that it is an Act to regulate particular businesses entirely within the Province…" (at p. 720).

Similarly, this Court upheld, in Home Oil Distributors Limited v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, provincial legislation authorizing the fixing of wholesale or retail prices for coal or petroleum products sold in British Columbia for use in that province. This judgment was based upon the decision in the Shannon case.

The power of a provincial legislature to forbid generally the possession and sale of intoxicating liquor within the province had been previously declared in the case of R. v. Nat Bell Liquors, Limited.

The earlier authorities on the matter of provincial marketing regulation were considered by various members of this Court in the Reference Respecting The Farm Products Marketing Act, which case, as well as some of those authorities, was reviewed in the judgment of this Court in Carnation Company Limited v. The Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board. It was said, in that case, at p. 253:

> While I agree with the view of the four judges in the Ontario Reference that a trade transaction, completed in a province, is not necessarily, by that fact alone, subject only to provincial control, I also hold the view that the fact that such a transaction incidentally has some effect upon a company engaged in interprovincial trade does not necessarily prevent its being subject to such control.

Our conclusion was that each transaction and regulation had to be examined in relation to its own facts, and that, in determining the validity of the regulatory legislation in issue in that appeal, the issue was not as to whether it might affect the inter-provincial trade of the appellant company, but whether it was made in relation to the regulation of inter-provincial trade and commerce. There was cited the following passage from the reasons of Kerwin C.J. in the Ontario Reference (at p. 204):

> Once a statute aims at "regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern" it is beyond the competence of a Provincial Legislature.

It is my opinion that the Plan now in issue not only affects inter-provincial trade in eggs, but that it aims at the regulation of such trade. It is an essential part of this scheme, the purpose of which is to obtain for Manitoba producers the most advantageous marketing conditions for eggs, specifically to control and regulate the sale in Manitoba of imported eggs. It is designed to restrict or limit the free flow of trade between provinces as such. Because of that, it constitutes an invasion of the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada over the matter of the regulation of trade and commerce.

That being so, I would hold that the Regulation and Order are not ones which are within the legislative competence of the Manitoba Legislature to authorize …

LASKIN J.—The utility of the Reference as a vehicle for determining whether actual or proposed legislation is competent under the allocations of power made by the British North America Act is seriously affected in the present case because there is no factual underpinning for the issues that are raised by the Order of Reference. …

As it is, I know nothing of the nature of the market for eggs in Manitoba or outside of it, nothing of the production of eggs in that province, nothing of the uses to which the production is put, nothing of the number of producers in Manitoba, nothing of any problems that may have been created in relation to quality, price or otherwise by the entry of out-of-province eggs. I know only, and then in the broad terms set out in the first two recitals in the Order of Reference (and of which matters I could, in any event, have taken judicial notice) that (to quote them) "many Provinces of Canada, including the Province of Manitoba, have enacted legislation pertaining to the regulation and control of marketing of agricultural products" and "certain of the marketing agencies established under the afore-mentioned legislation in some of the Provinces assert the right to prohibit, regulate and control the marketing within a Province of agricultural products produced outside that Province".

A knowledge of the market in Manitoba, the extent to which it is supplied by Manitoba producers, and of the competition among them as it is reflected in supply, quality and price, would be of assistance in determining the application of the proposed legislative scheme. Thus, if out-of-province eggs were, to put an example, insignificant in the Manitoba market, this would be a factor bearing on a construction of the scheme as operative only in respect of Manitoba producers, retailers and consumers in production, distribution and consumption in Manitoba. Conversely, if such eggs were significant in the Manitoba market, the legislative scheme, not being expressly confined to production distribution and consumption in Manitoba, could properly be regarded as directed to the out-of-province eggs. In this respect, the issue would be one of its validity or invalidity, and not one of construing it to be applicable only to the distribution and consumption within the province of eggs produced in the province.

The absence of what I regard as relevant data leaves the position as one where, on the face of the legislative scheme and in the light of the arguments thereon addressed to the court, the contemplated regulations and order purport to embrace out-of-province eggs sent or brought into the province. Moreover, the embrace would extend to out-of-province eggs of whatever quantity, and to whatever extent they might engulf the Manitoba retailer and consumer market. On this view of the situation, there is the naked constitutional question to be faced, namely; there being no federal regulatory legislation in force with the same thrust, is the proposed scheme offensive to the legislative power of Parliament in relation to "the regulation of trade and commerce" under s. 91 (2) of the B.N.A. Act; and, if not or if so, is it, in any event offensive to the prescriptions of s. 121 of that Act?

The stage of dealing at which the regulation is imposed and its purpose, on which economic data would be relevant, are important considerations in assessing provincial competence. This emerges clearly from Carnation Milk Company Ltd. v. Quebec Agricultural Marketing Board, supra, where this court rejected a contention that the regulatory scheme, as reflected in three challenged orders, constituted an unlawful invasion of federal power in relation to export. What was there involved was the fixing of prices, by arbitration if agreement could not otherwise be reached, at which milk and dairy products produced in the province were to be sold by provincial producers, operating under a joint marketing plan, to a distributor and processor in the province. The fact that the processed products were largely distributed and sold outside the province did not react upon the validity of the scheme whose purpose was to improve the bargaining position in the province of provincial producers in their dealings with manufacturers or processors in the province. The regulatory scheme under attack did not involve a marketing control which extended through the various stages of production, distribution and consumption.

What was raised in the Carnation Milk case was the meaning, for constitutional purposes, of an intraprovincial transaction where the issue was seen in the context of goods leaving the province. The present Reference raises this question in the context of goods entering the province and their subjection, in consequence, to the same regulatory scheme that operates upon like goods produced in the province. …

[The scheme at issue in this case] … has the following elements:

(1) A Producer Board is established through which all eggs to be marketed in Manitoba must be sold.

(2) All such eggs must go to grading and packing stations which are to be operated by persons under contract with the Board.

(3) All such eggs must be graded, packed and marked in the grading and packing stations.

(4) They are to be packed in containers provided by the Board which are to bear inscriptions of the grade, station number, grading date, place of origin of the eggs and the Board trade mark.

(5) Only authorized collectors may take delivery of eggs from a producer.

(6) Production and marketing quotas may be allotted to producers by the Board.

(7) The Board may establish quotas for production and sale and also fix the time and place of marketing and, equally, may prohibit marketing otherwise or in violation of established quotas or standards.

(8) The Board may contract with distributors as its intermediaries in sales to retailers.

(9) Weekly prices for each grade of egg are to be set by the Board and distributors are entiltled to buy at those prices.

Although the emphasis is on control of the Manitoba producers and distributors in order (as stated in the proposed measures) "to obtain for producers the most advantageous marketing conditions" and "to avoid overproduction", the scheme brings into its grasp "persons" as well as producers, that is, those outside the province who are either producers or distributors seeking to enter the Manitoba market, or those inside the province who are not themselves producers but who bring in out-of-province eggs for disposition in Manitoba. This view is reinforced by the provision for indicating the origin of eggs, including eggs other than those produced in Manitoba.

There may be a variety of reasons which impel a province to enact regulatory legislation for the marketing of various products. For example, it may wish to secure the health of the inhabitants by establishing quality standards; it may wish to protect consumers against exorbitant prices; it may wish to equalize the bargaining or competitive position of producers or distributors or retailers, or all three classes; it may wish to ensure an adequate supply of certain products. These objects may not all nor always be realizable through legislation which fastens on the regulated product as being within the province. That is no longer, if it ever was, the test of validity. Just as the province may not, as a general rule, prohibit an owner of goods from sending them outside the province, so it may not be able to subject goods to a regulatory scheme upon their entry into the province. This is not to say that goods that have come into a province may not, thereafter, be subject to the same controls in, for example, retail distribution to consumers as apply to similar goods produced in the province.

Assuming such controls to be open to a province, the scheme before this court is not so limited. It embraces products which are in the current of interprovincial trade and, as noted at the beginning of these reasons, it embraces them in whatever degree they seek to enter the provincial market. It begs the question to say that out-of-province producers who come in voluntarily (certainly they cannot be compelled by Manitoba) must not expect to be treated differently from local producers. I do not reach the question of discriminatory standards applied to out-of-province producers or distributors (that is, the question of a possibly illegal administration of the scheme as bearing on its validity) because I am of opinion that the scheme is on its face an invasion of federal power in relation to s. 91 (2).

There are several grounds upon which I base this conclusion. The proposed scheme has as a direct object the regulation of the importation of eggs, and it is not saved by the fact that the local market is under the same regime. Anglin J. said in Gold Seal Ltd. v. Dominion Express Co. that "it is common ground that the prohibition of importation is beyond the legislative jurisdiction of the province". Conversely, the general limitation upon provincial authority to exercise of its powers within or in the province precludes it from intercepting either goods moving into the province or goods moving out, subject to possible exceptions, as in the case of danger to life or health. Again, the Manitoba scheme cannot be considered in isolation from similar schemes in other provinces; and to permit each province to seek its own advantage, so to speak, through a figurative sealing of its borders to entry of goods from others would be to deny one of the objects of Confederation, evidenced by the catalogue of federal powers and by s. 121, namely, to form an economic unit of the whole of Canada: see the Lawson case. The existence of egg marketing schemes in more than one province, with objectives similar to the proposed Manitoba scheme, makes it clear that interprovincial trade in eggs is being struck at by the provincial barriers to their movement into various provincial markets. If it be thought necessary or desirable to arrest such movement at any provincial border then the aid of the Parliament of Canada must be sought, as was done through Part V of the Canada Temperance Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 30, in respect of provincial regulation of the sale of intoxicating liquor.

I would dismiss the appeal.

3.2.3 Reference Re Agricultural Products Marketing

Reference Re Agricultural Products Marketing*, [1978] 2 SCR 1198, 1978 CanLII 10

[As part of a scheme of interlocking federal and provincial legislation, interprovincial egg marketing quotas were allocated to each province by a federal agency; boards established by provincial legislation imposed corresponding quotas on the producers within their respective provinces.

The impugned Ontario rules were summarized by Chief Justice Laskin in his concurring judgment: "In short, the overall scheme was to assign to each Province a share of the national market and to relate the quotas of producers in each Province to the particular share. Ontario went further by placing all laying hens on a quota basis and prohibiting possession of laying hens by persons without a quota. This was done by Board Regulation 2-75 of June 5, 1975, which was authorized by Ontario Regulation 434/75 of May 8, 1975, which in turn rested on the authority of s. 21a of The Farm Products Marketing Act, enacted by 1975 (Ont.), c. 6. The appellants take an objection to the Regulation as embracing the possession of laying hens whose production is solely for the interprovincial or export trade and, beyond this, attack the validity of s. 21a. The attack on the section is the subject of question 9 herein."]

Questions 8 and 9 concern the validity of the egg producers quota regulations. In my view, the control of production, whether agricultural or industrial, is prima facie a local matter, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. Egg farms, if I may use this expression to designate the kind of factories in which feed is converted into eggs and fowl, are local undertakings subject to provincial jurisdiction under section 92(10) B.N.A. Act, unless they are considered as within the scope of "agriculture" in which case, by virtue of s. 95, the jurisdiction is provincial subject to the overriding authority of Parliament. In my view the Carnation case is conclusive in favour of provincial jurisdiction over undertakings where primary agricultural products are transformed into other food products. In that case, the major portion of the production was shipped outside the province (1968 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1968] SCR 238, at p. 242). In view of the reasons given, the conclusion could not be different even if the whole production had been going into extraprovincial trade.

No operator can claim exemption from provincial control by electing to devote his entire output to extraprovincial trade. I can find no basis for the view that there must be a division of authority at the stage of production between what will be going into intraprovincial and what will be going into extraprovincial trade. As I read it, the Eastern Terminal Elevator case stands squarely against such a contention. Eggs are a commodity like grain and they are treated in trade as fungible things. As a rule the person who is obliged to deliver grain of a given grade is not obliged to deliver any identified grain. (See Canada Grain Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. G-16, ss. 111, 115.) He satisfies his obligation by delivering the required quantity of proper grade. One of the purposes of the grading is precisely that goods of the same grade may be considered interchangeable. This holds true for eggs as for grain. The consequence is that any workable control scheme has to be effective with respect to all eggs irrespective of intended disposition….

This does not mean that such power is unlimited, a province cannot control extraprovincial trade, as was held in the Manitoba Egg Reference and in the Burns Foods case. However, "Marketing" does not include production and, therefore, provincial control of production is prima facie valid. In the instant case, the provincial regulation is not aimed at controlling the extraprovincial trade. In so far as it affects this trade, it is only complementary to the regulations established under federal authority. In my view this is perfectly legitimate, otherwise it would mean that our Constitution makes it impossible by federal-provincial cooperative action to arrive at any practical scheme for the orderly and efficient production and marketing of a commodity which all governments concerned agree requires regulation in both intraprovincial and extraprovincial trade. … While I adhere to the view that provinces may not make use of their control over local undertakings to affect extraprovincial marketing, this does not, in my view, prevent the use of provincial control to complement federal regulation of extraprovincial trade.

3.2.4 Question

Does "pith and substance" play the same role in these cases, where the impugned legislation is provincial, as it does in the cases in Part 2 of this chapter, where the impugned legislation is federal?

4 Section 121 and impediments to interprovincial trade

4.1 Overview

Section 121 of the Constitution Act 1867 provides that "all articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any one of the Provinces shall … be admitted free into each of the other Provinces." What is the effect of this provision? Does it prevent governments from impeding the movement of goods from one province to another (require that they be "admitted"), or only prevent them from imposing charges akin to interprovincial customs duties (require that their admission be "free")?

In Gold Seal v Alberta (1921) 1921 CanLII 25 (SCC), 62 SCR 424, the Supreme Court of Canada took the latter view, in rejecting a challenge to provisions of the Canada Temperance Act that prohibited the importation of liquor into provinces in which local prohibition was in effect. Gold Seal remained the leading case on the interpretation of s. 121 until the Supreme Court's decision in R v Comeau, 2018 SCC 15, also a challenge to restrictions on the interprovincial transportation of liquor. Without overruling Gold Seal, the Court, in obiter dicta, offered a different interpretation of s. 121. In Steam Whistle Brewing Inc v Alberta, 2019 ABCA 468, the Alberta Court of Appeal applied Comeau to invalidate a differential provincial liquor pricing policy that, the Court's view, was "tariff-like" (par. 112) and had as its purpose the favouring of in-province producers over their extraprovincial competitors.

4.2.1 Gold Seal v Alberta

Gold Seal Ltd v Alberta (A.G.)*, 1921 CanLII 25 (SCC), 62 SCR 424

[The proceedings arose as a result of the refusal by a transportation company to accept for carriage a consignment of liquor on the ground that the transportation of the goods, from British Columbia to Alberta, violated the Canada Temperance Act. That Act, as amended in 1919, prohibited the importation of liquor into any province in which provincial law prohibits its sale. The consignor, a federally incorporated company engaged in the business of buying and selling liquor, challenged the refusal on various grounds, including the ground that the Act was inconsistent with s. 121 of the Constitution Act 1867.]

IDINGTON J. (dissenting): ---

[Section 121] has not, so far as I know, received anything but a casual consideration by any of the courts having to deal with such questions as are involved herein. [The] question arises whether or not this section does not render ultra vires any effort by either local legislatures or parliament to override the said provision.

I incline to hold that it does unless in the possible case of an enactment by Parliament in the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction over criminal law.

Certainly no single province, nor all combined, can override the plain meaning of the language used.

And when we turn to the "Regulation of Trade and Commerce," I think there are many decisions shewing that the powers to be exercised thereby are not applicable to anything that is likely to be involved in the meddling with this provision.

There may be, however, times when the products of a province may be infected with, for example, some contagious disease rendering it absolutely necessary, as matter of public safety, to forbid transportation across the lines bounding a province or a district therein.

It seems to me that the true and only remedy for such a condition of things would be the exercise by Parliament of its powers resting in its jurisdiction over criminal law and procedure in criminal matters.

The section, in my opinion, adds to the difficulties in the way of any provincial legislature seeking to bar the importation of liquor … from one province where manufactured into another….

DUFF J:--

… I am unable to accept the [argument for invalidity of the federal legislation] founded upon section 121 of the B.N.A. Act; the phraseology adopted, when the context is considered in which this section is found, shews, I think, that the real object of the clause is to prohibit the establishment of customs duties affecting inter-provincial trade in the products of any province of the Union….

ANGLIN J:--

…Neither is the legislation under consideration in my opinion obnoxious to s. 121 of the B.N.A. Act. The purpose of that section is to ensure that articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any province shall not be subjected to any customs duty when carried into any other province. Prohibition of import in aid of temperance legislation is not within the purview of the section….

MIGNAULT:--

I take it that the validity of the "Canada Temperance Act" having been affirmed by the Judicial Committee in Russell v. The Queen, the amendment of 1919, 10 Geo. V., ch. 8, being legislation of the same character, cannot be assailed as transcending the powers of Parliament.

Nor do I think that any argument can be based on sec 121 of the British North America Act….

This section, which so far as I know has never been judicially construed, is in Part VIII of the Act, bearing the heading "Revenues, Debts, Assets, Taxation," and is followed by two sections which deal with customs and excise laws and custom duties[.]

In the United States constitution, to which reference may be made for purposes of comparison, there is a somewhat similar provision (art. 1, sec. 9 par. 5 and 6). the language of which, however, is much clearer than that of sec. 121. It says:—

> No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state.
> No preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one state over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear or pay duties to another.

I think that, like the enactment I have just quoted, the object of section 121 was not to decree that all articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of any of the provinces should be admitted into the others, but merely to secure that they should be admitted "free," that is to say without any tax or duty imposed as a condition of their admission. The essential word here is "free" and what is prohibited is the levying of custom duties or other charges of a like nature in matters of interprovincial trade….

R v Comeau, 2018 SCC 15 (excerpt by Richard Moon)

The following is the judgment delivered by

The Court —

[2] The respondent, Mr. Gerard Comeau, contends that s. 121 is essentially a free trade provision — in his view, no barriers can be erected to impede the passage of goods across provincial boundaries. On the other side of the debate, the appellant, Her Majesty the Queen in Right of New Brunswick ("the Crown"), argues that s. 121 was only intended to dismantle the power to impose tariffs or tariff-like charges at provincial boundaries. The trial judge agreed with Mr. Comeau. The question before us is whether he erred in doing so. What does it mean for articles to be "admitted free" as stated in s. 121? How does that requirement constrain state action? Fundamentally, does s. 121 constitutionalize some particular form of economic union? These questions lie at the core of this appeal.

[3] The answers to these questions have broad implications. If to be "admitted free" is understood as a constitutional guarantee of free trade, the potential reach of s. 121 is vast. Agricultural supply management schemes, public health-driven prohibitions, environmental controls, and innumerable comparable regulatory measures that incidentally impede the passage of goods crossing provincial borders may be invalid.

II. Factual History

[9] The respondent Mr. Comeau is a resident of the Tracadie-Sheila region on the Acadian Peninsula in northeastern New Brunswick. On October 6, 2012, Mr. Comeau drove to Campbellton in the northwest of the province, crossed the Restigouche River, and entered Quebec. Mr. Comeau did what many Canadians who live tantalizingly close to cheaper alcohol prices across provincial boundaries probably do. He visited three different stores and stocked up.

[10] Mr. Comeau was being watched. The Campbellton RCMP had become concerned with the frequency by which enterprising New Brunswick residents were sourcing large quantities of alcohol in Quebec in contravention of the law. In response, the RCMP started monitoring New Brunswick visitors to commonly frequented liquor stores on the Quebec side. Officers in Quebec would record visitors' information and pass it on to their New Brunswick colleagues, who were waiting across the border. During his October 6, 2012 trip, Mr. Comeau was so tracked.

[11] Returning from Quebec to New Brunswick, Mr. Comeau was stopped by the RCMP. The police found a large quantity of beer and some bottles of spirits in his vehicle. It is not in dispute that Mr. Comeau purchased quantities of alcohol in excess of the applicable limit prescribed by s. 43(c) of the Liquor Control Act. Mr. Comeau was charged under s. 134(b) and consequently issued a fine in the amount of $240 plus administrative fees and the victim surcharge levy.

[12] Mr. Comeau challenged the charge on the basis that s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 renders s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act unconstitutional and therefore of no force and effect. It is not controversial that the beer and liquor at issue in this case are the "Articles of the Growth, Produce, or Manufacture" of a Canadian province — that is, they were produced in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada. The question of whether s. 121 concerns non-Canadian goods imported into one province and then shipped across the country either intact or as inputs in new manufactured goods is not before the Court and therefore we do not address it.

IV. Issues

[22] The main issue is whether s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act infringes s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This raises the following subsidiary issues:

V. Analysis

B. What Is the Proper Interpretation of Section 121?

(1) "Admitted Free": the Competing Interpretations

[46] Section 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867, provides:

All Articles of the Growth, Produce, or Manufacture of any one of the Provinces shall, from and after the Union, be admitted free into each of the other Provinces.

[47] Section 121 is found in Part VIII of the Constitution Act, 1867, which deals with how revenues, debts, property, and fiscal authority were to be transferred between existing legislatures and the new federal government upon Confederation. The scheme specifically provides for the power to levy border tariffs to be transferred from the former colonies to the new Dominion, as described in ss. 122 and 123.

[48] The appellant Crown submits that "admitted free" in s. 121 should be read as prohibiting laws that, like tariffs, place burdens on the price of goods crossing interprovincial boundaries. There are two versions of this position, one slightly broader than the other, which we will discuss in due course. At this point it suffices to note that on either version, Mr. Comeau would not succeed. Even on the second broader version of this position — that s. 121 prohibits laws that in essence and purpose impede the passage of goods across provincial borders (see Murphy, per Rand J.) — s. 134(b) would stand, because it is part of a comprehensive scheme to control liquor in the province of New Brunswick and is not directed to impeding interprovincial trade in both essence and purpose.

[49] Mr. Comeau does not quibble about the fine points of precisely what kind of charge or burden is caught by s. 121 on the basis of the jurisprudence. He advances a new and much more radical proposition — that "admitted free" in s. 121 means that provincial laws cannot do anything that impedes, or makes more difficult, the flow of goods across provincial borders, directly or indirectly. In his view, s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act impedes the flow of goods across the New Brunswick border by prohibiting New Brunswickers from stocking liquor from other provinces at home. Therefore, it violates s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[50] Mr. Comeau essentially contends that s. 121 is a "free trade" provision that bars any impediment to interprovincial commerce. The purpose of s. 121, he says, was to foster the full unimpeded economic integration of the new federation.

[51] The implications of these competing interpretations of s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are significant. If Mr. Comeau's broad interpretation of s. 121 is correct, federal and provincial legislative schemes of many types — environmental, health, commercial, social — may be invalid. If a narrower interpretation is correct, the legal force of s. 121 is circumscribed to tariffs, or their functional equivalents.

[53] … [W]e conclude — as detailed below — that the interpretation of "admitted free" proposed by Mr. Comeau should be rejected. Section 121 does not impose absolute free trade across Canada. We further conclude that s. 121 prohibits governments from levying tariffs or tariff-like measures (measures that in essence and purpose burden the passage of goods across a provincial border); but, s. 121 does not prohibit governments from adopting laws and regulatory schemes directed to other goals that have incidental effects on the passage of goods across provincial borders.

(2) Text

[54] The introductory words of s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are broad; the phrase "All Articles of Growth, Produce, or Manufacture of any one of the Provinces" comprehensively covers all articles of trade of Canadian origin. (We need not decide in this case whether s. 121 applies to articles coming into Canada and then moved around the country.) This text on its own does not answer the question of how "admitted free" should be interpreted. That phrase remains ambiguous, and falls to be interpreted on the basis of the historical, legislative and constitutional contexts.

(3) Historical Context

[63] Excerpts from speeches given by political leaders at the time of Confederation provide a sense of their vision of economic union as the new nation was forged. In some passages, leaders refer to abolishing customs houses that existed on provincial boundaries pre-Confederation: trial reasons, at paras. 97-98. Other passages, however, indicate concern for impediments on interprovincial trade beyond formal tariffs: trial reasons, at para. 93. Still other passages refer more generally to unencumbered trade across boundaries: trial reasons, at paras. 92, 96 and 100.

[65] What light does this history shed on the question that divides Mr. Comeau and the Crown? Was s. 121 conceived to eradicate all impediments on trade at provincial borders, direct and indirect, as Mr. Comeau contends? Or was it conceived as a provision to eradicate tariffs and charges at provincial borders, and to otherwise allow the adoption of valid laws that may have the incidental effect of impeding trade across interprovincial boundaries, as the Crown argues?

[67] We conclude that the historical context supports the view that, at a minimum, s. 121 prohibits the imposition of charges on goods crossing provincial boundaries — tariffs and tariff-like measures. At the same time, the historical evidence nowhere suggests that provinces, for example, would lose their power to legislate under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 for the benefit of their constituents even if that might have impacts on interprovincial trade. The historical evidence, at best, provides only limited support for the view that "admitted free" in s. 121 was meant as an absolute guarantee of trade free of all barriers.

(4) Legislative Context

[In determining how s. 121 should be interpreted the Court considers other relevant or related provisions in the Constitution Act, 1867].

[73] We conclude that the legislative context of s. 121 indicates that it was part of a scheme that enabled the shifting of customs, excise, and similar levies from the former colonies to the Dominion; that it should be interpreted as applying to measures that increase the price of goods when they cross a provincial border; and that it should not be read so expansively that it would impinge on legislative powers under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. …

(5) Foundational Principles

[77] In Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 32, this Court held that foundational principles underlying the Constitution may aid in its interpretation. Three of these — the federalism principle, the democratic principle and the protection of minorities principle — were raised in this case. The latter two do not shed much light on how s. 121 should be interpreted, in our view. However, the federalism principle is vital.

[82] For our purposes, it suffices to state that the federalism principle reminds us of the careful and complex balance of interests captured in constitutional texts. An interpretation that disregards regional autonomy is as problematic as an interpretation that underestimates the scope of the federal government's jurisdiction. We agree with Professor Scott that "[t]he Canadian constitution cannot be understood if it is approached with some preconceived theory of what federalism is or should be": F. R. Scott, "Centralization and Decentralization in Canadian Federalism" (1951), 29 Can. Bar Rev. 1095, at p. 1095; see also P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, "Canadian Federalism, the Privy Council and the Supreme Court: Reflections on the Debate about Canadian Federalism" (2005), 38 U.B.C. L. Rev. 329, at p. 350.

[83] Thus, the federalism principle does not impose a particular vision of the economy that courts must apply. It does not allow a court to say "This would be good for the country, therefore we should interpret the Constitution to support it." Instead, it posits a framework premised on jurisdictional balance that helps courts identify the range of economic mechanisms that are constitutionally acceptable. The question for a court is squarely constitutional compliance, not policy desirability: see, e.g., Reference re Securities Act, at para. 90; Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at pp. 471-72, per Wilson J.; Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 373, at pp. 424-25, per Laskin C.J. Similarly, the living tree doctrine is not an open invitation for litigants to ask a court to constitutionalize a specific policy outcome. It simply asks that courts be alert to evolutions in, for example, how we understand jurisdictional balance and the considerations that animate it.

[85] We begin with Mr. Comeau's submission that the principle of federalism supports full economic integration. We cannot accept this submission. The federalism principle emphasizes balance and the ability of each level of government to achieve its goals in the exercise of its powers under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Full economic integration would "curtail the freedom of action — indeed, the sovereignty — of governments, especially at the provincial level": K. Swinton, "Courting Our Way to Economic Integration: Judicial Review and the Canadian Economic Union" (1995), 25 Can. Bus. L.J. 280, at p. 291; see also D. Schneiderman, "Economic Citizenship and Deliberative Democracy: An Inquiry into Constitutional Limitations on Economic Regulation" (1995), 21 Queen's L.J. 125, at p. 152. Reading s. 121 to require full economic integration would significantly undermine the shape of Canadian federalism, which is built upon regional diversity within a single nation: Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 57-58; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 22. A key facet of this regional diversity is that the Canadian federation provides space to each province to regulate the economy in a manner that reflects local concerns...

[88] We cannot therefore accept either the arguments of Mr. Comeau or the Crown on the principle of federalism. This does not mean, however, that the principle is unhelpful to the interpretation of s. 121. The need to maintain balance embodied in the federalism principle supports an interpretation of s. 121 that prohibits laws directed at curtailing the passage of goods over interprovincial borders, but allows legislatures to pass laws to achieve other goals within their powers, even though the laws may have the incidental effect of impeding the passage of goods over interprovincial borders.

(6) Defining the Ambit of Section 121: The Jurisprudence

[89] We have established in the preceding sections that the text, historical context, legislative context, and underlying constitutional principles do not support Mr. Comeau's contention that s. 121 should be interpreted as prohibiting any and all burdens on the passage of goods over provincial boundaries, essentially imposing an absolute free trade regime within Canada. Rather, these considerations support a flexible, purposive view of s. 121 — one that respects an appropriate balance between federal and provincial powers and allows legislatures room to achieve policy objectives that may have the incidental effect of burdening the passage of goods across provincial boundaries.

[90] This established, the next question to be answered is: What does s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 actually prohibit? Before us, the debate was framed as a conflict between two lines of authority — the Gold Seal line of authority, which is said to confine s. 121 to the prohibition of tariffs, and the line of authority based on the judgment of Rand J. in Murphy, which sets out the view that s. 121 prohibits not only tariffs, but extends to laws that in essence and purpose are directed to impeding the passage of goods across provincial boundaries.

[106] We conclude that a purposive approach to s. 121 leads to the following conclusion: s. 121 prohibits laws that in essence and purpose restrict trade across provincial boundaries. Laws that only have the incidental effect of restricting trade across provincial boundaries because they are part of broader schemes not aimed at impeding trade do not offend s. 121 because the purpose of such laws is to support the relevant scheme, not to restrict interprovincial trade. While Gold Seal did not undertake a purposive analysis of s. 121 and hence did not describe the ambit of s. 121 precisely in these terms, it is entirely consistent with it. The earlier jurisprudence of this Court on s. 121 and the broader articulation adopted by Rand J. stand as different moments on a progressive jurisprudential continuum, all consistent with the text of s. 121, its historical and legislative contexts, and the principle of federalism.

[109] The additional cost need not be a charge physically levied at the border, nor must it take the form of an actual surcharge; all that is required is that the law impose a cost burden on goods crossing a provincial border. A law that provides that "rum produced in the Maritime provinces will be subject to a 50% surcharge upon entering Newfoundland" has the same effect, in principle, as a law that states that "any person who brings rum produced in the Maritime provinces into Newfoundland is guilty of an offence and liable to a fine". Both laws impose a burden on the cost of goods that cross a provincial boundary.

[111] If the law does not in essence restrict the trade of goods across a provincial border, the inquiry is over and s. 121 is not engaged. If it does, the claimant must also establish that the primary purpose of the law is to restrict trade. A law may have more than one purpose. But impeding trade must be its primary purpose to engage s. 121. The inquiry is objective, based on the wording of the law, the legislative context in which it was enacted (i.e. if it is one element of a broader regulatory scheme), and all of the law's discernable effects (which can include much more than its trade-impeding effect). If the purpose of the law aligns with purposes traditionally served by tariffs, such as exploiting the passage of goods across a border solely as a way to collect funds, protecting local industry or punishing another province, this may, depending on other factors, support the contention that the primary purpose of the law is to restrict trade: see, e.g., Murphy, at pp. 638-39, per Rand J.; Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act, at p. 1268, per Laskin C.J.; D. Hill, ed., National Trade and Tariff Service (loose-leaf), at §1.3; Black's Law Dictionary (9th ed. 2009), at pp. 1593-94.

[112] Stand-alone laws that have the effect of restricting trade across provincial boundaries will not violate s. 121 if their primary purpose is not to impede trade, but some other purpose. Thus a law that prohibits liquor crossing a provincial boundary for the primary purpose of protecting the health and welfare of the people in the province would not violate s. 121. More commonly, however, the primary purpose requirement of s. 121 fails because the law's restriction on trade is merely an incidental effect of its role in a scheme with a different purpose. The primary purpose of such a law is not to restrict trade across a provincial boundary, but to achieve the goals of the regulatory scheme.

[113] However, a law that in essence and purpose impedes cross-border trade cannot be rendered constitutional under s. 121 solely by inserting it into a broader regulatory scheme. If the primary purpose of the broader scheme is to impede trade, or if the impugned law is not connected in a rational way to the scheme's objective, the law will violate s. 121. A rational connection between the impugned measure and the broader objective of the regulatory scheme exists where, as a matter of reason or logic, the former can be said to serve the latter: see, e.g., RJR-

MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, at para. 153, per McLachlin J. (as she then was), and at para. 184, per Iacobucci J. The scheme may be purely provincial, or a mixed federal-provincial scheme: Gold Seal; see also Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act.

[114] In summary, two things are required for s. 121 to be violated. The law must impact the interprovincial movement of goods like a tariff, which, in the extreme, could be an outright prohibition. And, restriction of cross-border trade must be the primary purpose of the law, thereby excluding laws enacted for other purposes, such as laws that form rational parts of broader legislative schemes with purposes unrelated to impeding interprovincial trade.

[115] The decided cases, while not numerous, illustrate how the essence and purpose test works. In Gold Seal, a federal law aimed at assisting dry provinces in keeping liquor out of their territories was held not to infringe s. 121. The law did not impede the flow of goods across provincial boundaries as its primary purpose; rather, it was part of a larger federal-provincial scheme to facilitate provinces' decisions, as informed by local referendums, to impose temperance to avoid harms associated with alcohol consumption. Therefore, it did not violate s. 121. Similarly, in Murphy, a federal law prohibiting farmers from shipping grain across provincial boundaries was held not to violate s. 121 because it was part of a larger marketing scheme to enable the distribution of grain. The impugned tax in Atlantic Smoke Shops failed because it did not distinguish between local and extra-provincial tobacco. In other words, it was not in essence tariff-like.

[116] There is debate about whether s. 121 applies equally to provincial and federal laws. While this Court has in previous decisions proceeded on the basis that federal laws may engage s. 121 (see, e.g., Gold Seal and Murphy), no federal law is properly at issue in the present appeal and so the question need not be resolved here. We agree with Laskin C.J.'s statement in Reference re Agricultural Products Marketing Act, at p. 1267, that "the application of s. 121 may be different according to whether it is provincial or federal legislation that is involved because what may amount to a tariff or customs duty under a provincial regulatory statute may not have that character at all under a federal regulatory statute".

VI. Application

[117] Does s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act contravene s. 121? We conclude that it does not. To reiterate, s. 134(b) provides:

> 134 Except as provided by this Act or the regulations, no person, within the Province, by himself, his clerk, employee, servant or agent shall
> . . .
> (b) have or keep liquor,
> not purchased from the Corporation.

[124] The objective of the New Brunswick scheme is not to restrict trade across a provincial boundary, but to enable public supervision of the production, movement, sale, and use of alcohol within New Brunswick. It is common ground that provinces are able to enact schemes to manage the supply of and demand for liquor within their borders: Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), 1997 CanLII 361 (SCC), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 581, at para. 55, citing R. v. Gautreau (1978), 1978 CanLII 2114 (NB CA), 21 N.B.R. (2d) 701 (S.C. (App. Div.)). Governments manage liquor prices, storage and distribution with a view to diverse internal policy objectives. Although the Crown conceded that New Brunswick generates revenue from its legislative scheme, this is not the primary purpose of the scheme, but an offshoot of it. Finally, s. 134(b) is not divorced from the objective of the larger scheme. It plainly serves New Brunswick's choice to control the supply and use of liquor within the province.

VII. Conclusion

[127] For the foregoing reasons, the Crown's appeal is allowed. The Court answers the appellant's constitutional question as follows:

Does s. 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (U.K.), 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3, render unconstitutional s. 134(b) of the Liquor Control Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. L-10, which along with s. 3 of the Importation of Intoxicating Liquors Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-3, establishes a federal-provincial regulatory scheme in respect of intoxicating liquor?

Answer: No.

4.2.3 Steam Whistle Brewing Inc v Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission

Steam Whistle Brewing Inc v Alberta Gaming and Liquor Commission*, 2019 ABCA 468

GRECKOL JA (Martin JA and Strekaf JA concurring):--

I. Introduction

[1] In 1993, the province of Alberta privatized liquor stores throughout the province, ending its involvement in the retail market but becoming the wholesale hub for all sales of alcohol….

[4] The Alberta Gaming, Liquor and Cannabis Commission (the "Commission"), a Crown agent, controls the distribution and sale of liquor to private retailers in Alberta pursuant to the Gaming, Liquor and Cannabis Act, RSA 2000, c G-1 (the "GLCA"). The Commission applies Mark-ups to the price at which it sells liquor to retailers. In basic terms, subject to certain qualifications, the Mark-up is the difference between the price paid by the Commission to producers and the price it charges to retailers (the "Mark-up")….

[6] In 2015, the Commission implemented a new Mark-up regime (the "2015 Mark-up") which provided for favorable treatment to beer brewers from Alberta, British Columbia and Saskatchewan (the "New West Partnership"). Steam Whistle, an Ontario company, sued the Commission claiming the 2015 Mark-up was unconstitutional.

[7] In 2016, the Commission implemented a new Mark-up regime to charge all beer brewers the same rate (the "2016 Mark-up"). However, a complementary grant program was implemented at the same time, which gave certain Alberta craft beer brewers grants equivalent to the difference between the amounts payable by them under 2015 and 2016 Mark-ups. Great Western, a Saskatchewan company, sued the Commission claiming the 2016 Mark-up and grant program … violated s 121 as a barrier to interprovincial trade. Steam Whistle also challenged the 2016 Mark-up.

[8] The trial judge … found that the 2015 Mark-up scheme that privileged the three western provinces contravened s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as did the 2016 Mark-up scheme when combined with the grant program. She declared the 2015 Mark-up and the 2016 Mark-up invalid….

II. Background

A. 2015 Mark-up

[21] Prior to October 28, 2015, the Commission imposed a Mark-up rate on all craft beer produced anywhere in Canada, varying according to the production levels of the brewer.

[22] On October 28, 2015, [at the Minister's direction,] the Commission implemented [a new] Mark-up adjustment…. It applied the small brewer mark up (which varied between $0.10 per litre and $1.25 per litre depending on the producer's annual worldwide volume) on sales of beer manufactured within the New West Partnership region, while it applied a standard Mark-up of $1.25 per litre on sales of beer manufactured outside the region. The crucial point is that the Commission applied different Mark-ups on sales of beer to retailers depending on the provenance of the beer.

B. 2016 Mark-up and grant program

[26] On August 5, 2016, the Commission implemented the new 2016 Mark-up scheme charging the same rate on all beer sold to retailers, whether produced inside or outside the province. All beer with less than or equal to 11.9% alcohol by volume was subject to a Mark-up of $1.25 per litre.

[28] The Minister's briefing note of June 8, 2016 characterized the grant program as "an offsetting grant for Alberta's small brewers based on production and sales in Alberta." The trial judge found that the grant provided to Alberta craft brewers was an amount identical to the difference between the amounts payable under the 2015 and 2016 Mark-ups. The economic effect of the grant program was that Alberta small brewers were unaffected by the increased 2016 Mark-up.

VII. Do the Mark-ups contravene s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867?

[54] This … appeal raises two issues: (1) whether the Mark-ups are subject to s 121 at all; and (2) if so, whether they contravene it.

A. Are the Mark-ups imposed by the Commission subject to s 121?

[55] The Commission is a corporate agent of the Crown: ss 2 and 4(1) of the GLCA. It imposed the 2015 Mark-up and the 2016 Mark-up as part of the price it charged retailers in contracts for the sale of beer. Alberta argues that s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 does not regulate the imposition of charges through the mechanism of contract of sale.

[56] It submits that the application of s 121 is restricted in two ways. First, it only applies to legislation which imposes a barrier to interprovincial trade, whether through imposing monetary charges on commodities or an outright prohibition. In this case, the putative barrier to trade is a price term in a contract, not a provision in legislation. Second, Alberta argues that the Constitution in general, and s 121 of the Constitution Act, 1867 in particular, do not bind governmental bodies' exercise of their "natural-person" powers. Like a natural person, the Commission has the power to enter into contracts. Alberta contends that when the Commission contracted to sell beer to retailers at a price which included the 2015 and 2016 Mark-ups, the Commission was exercising the power of a natural person to enter into contracts. Hence, it was not bound by s 121.

[57] Ultimately, we reject both submissions. We deal with each in turn.

1. Section 121 applies to governmental actions apart from laws

[58] The proposition that s 121 only applies to legislation that restricts interprovincial trade is unsupported by the text of s 121, the authorities or principle.

[59] The text of s 121 is silent about which mechanisms that restrict the entry of extra-provincial commodities into the province are caught by the section. It does not purport to single out statutes and exclude other governmental acts….

[60] It is true that in the leading case on s 121, Comeau, the Supreme Court frequently referred to "laws" as the object of scrutiny under s 121. That was to be expected given the issue in the case was whether a provision in the Liquor Control Act, RSNB 1973, c L-10, which created an offence of having more than a prescribed quantity of alcohol brought from private retailers, contravened s 121.

[64] Finally, if s 121 only applied to tariffs and tariff-like barriers to interprovincial trade imposed by legislation, it would be relatively simple for the provinces to avoid its application altogether. They could delegate the authority to impose the tariff, or tariff-like measure, to a Crown agent. Or, under a more complicated scheme similar to the one at issue in this appeal, provinces could create a Crown agent with the exclusive right to buy and sell a commodity at the wholesale level and confer on it the power and the duty to charge a greater "mark-up" on commodities produced by extra-provincial producers.

B. Do the 2015 and 2016 Mark-ups imposed by the Commission contravene s 121?

[79] Given that s 121 applies to the facts of this case, the next question is whether the trial judge made any reviewable errors in finding that the 2015 Mark-up and the 2016 Mark-up (together with the grant program) violate it. In its written materials, Alberta focused solely on whether the 2016 Mark-up and grant program violates s 121 but in oral argument, it clarified that it was also challenging the trial judge's conclusion about the 2015 Mark-up based on substantially the same arguments.

[81] Comeau has established a two-part test to determine whether a law or other government action violates s 121. First, the essence of the law (or other government action) must be to limit the free flow of goods across a provincial border. Second, the primary purpose of the law (or other government action) must be to restrict trade across a provincial border.

[83] At the second stage of the inquiry, regarding whether the primary purpose is to restrict trade, the Supreme Court noted that if the purpose of the law (or other government action) is similar to the traditional purposes of tariffs – collecting funds from goods passing the border, protecting local industry or harming another province – that is a strong (though not necessarily conclusive) indicator that the primary purpose is to restrict trade. The inquiry into the primary purpose of the law (or other government action) is objective, based on the language of the law, the legislative context in which it was enacted and its discernable effects.

[84] Laws (or other governmental actions) that have only incidental effects on trade, as part of broader regulatory schemes not aimed at impeding trade, do not have the purpose of restricting interprovincial trade and hence do not violate s 121. Such laws (or government acts) must be rationally connected to the broader objective of the scheme. A law (or government act) whose effect and primary purpose is to restrict interprovincial trade cannot be saved by being part of a wider regulatory scheme. Nor can a law (or government act) whose effect is to restrict trade and which is part a broader scheme aimed at impeding interprovincial trade.

[85] The facts of Comeau provide a useful example. There a statutory provision prohibited anyone from possessing alcohol exceeding a certain quantity that had not been purchased from the New Brunswick Liquor Corporation. The Supreme Court held that the prohibition functioned like a tariff but found that its primary purpose was to restrict access to any non-Corporation alcohol, not just alcohol brought in from other provinces: Comeau at para 122. Put another way, the primary purpose of the provision was to "enable public supervision of the production, movement, sale and use of alcohol in New Brunswick" and, therefore, it did not violate s 121: Comeau at para 124.

1. Is the essence or character of the Mark-ups to restrict or prohibit trade across a provincial border?

[86] The trial judge found that both the 2015 Mark-up and the 2016 Mark-up create a trade barrier related to a provincial boundary by imposing additional costs on the sale of beer produced outside the province or, in the case of the 2015 Mark-up, outside the New West Partnership provinces.

[92] [Regarding the 2016 Mark-up, the question is more complex.] If one takes the 2016 Mark-up on its own, the apparent conclusion is that it does not restrict trade across a provincial border. This is because the 2016 Mark-up applies the same rate to all sales of craft beer, regardless of where the beer was produced, and its apparent effect is to raise revenue for the province, not to impose an economic barrier to extra-provincial goods. Similarly, if the grant program is viewed in isolation, it appears to be a policy of supporting small craft brewers by issuing monetary grants based on the volume of beer sold in Alberta. It is quite unlike a tariff on extra-provincial goods.

[93] However, the trial judge found that the 2016 Mark-up and the grant program were aspects of a single policy, and must therefore be considered together. …

[94] Having found that the 2016 Mark-up and grant program should be analyzed as a single policy, the trial judge had no difficulty in finding that they operated to create a trade barrier related to a provincial boundary. … The 2016 Mark-up and grant program together created a competitive advantage for Alberta small brewers; this manifested itself in non-local craft brewers like Great Western increasing their prices to cover the costs of the greater Mark-up whereas those Alberta small brewers who benefitted from the offsetting grant did not have to do so. Accordingly, the trial judge found that the "essence" of the 2016 Mark-up and grant program was to restrict trade.

[100] [There is no reviewable error in these findings of the trial judge.]

2. Is the primary purpose of the 2015 and 2016 Mark-ups to restrict trade?

[101] The trial judge found that (1) the primary purpose of the 2015 Mark-up was "to raise funds, but to do so in such a way as to not prejudice Alberta craft brewers" and (2) the primary purpose of the 2016 Mark-up and grant program was "to increase revenue while continuing to protect Alberta craft brewers": Decision at paras 87, 95. In other words, the primary purpose of both Mark-ups was to promote Alberta craft brewers by giving them a competitive advantage over extra-provincial brewers, while also raising funds for the province.

[104] One argument [advanced by Alberta] is that the primary purpose of the 2015 Mark-up was to generate revenue for the province and that burdening extra-provincial trade was merely incidental to that purpose. In our view, this argument must fail because it cannot explain the actual operation of the 2015 Mark-up, nor the evidence about its purpose. The 2015 Mark-up was not a flat-rate Mark-up imposed on all sales of beer from the Commission to retailers, which served to increase government revenue. It was a differential Mark-up imposing greater costs on sales of beer for producers outside the New West Partnership than inside the New West Partnership. The evidence demonstrates the purpose of the 2015 Mark-up was not just to raise revenue but primarily, or at least equally, to promote the competitive position of the New West Partnership craft brewers.

[105] Another argument is that even if the primary purpose of the 2015 Mark-up is to enhance the competitive position of Alberta craft brewers, that is a constitutionally legitimate purpose. [In our view, however,] the distinction between intending to benefit Alberta craft brewers and intending to impose a competitive disadvantage on craft brewers from other provinces is illusory when the mechanism for benefitting local producers is a Mark-up scheme imposing lower costs on sales of their product and higher costs on sales of non-local product. There is no real doubt that the primary purpose of the 2015 Mark-up is to protect local industry, and that it does so by imposing a tariff-like burden on extra-provincial producers.

[109] [Regarding the 2016 scheme, when] both elements of the scheme are kept in view, the submission that the primary purpose of the grant program was to provide a benefit to Alberta small brewers, but not to disadvantage extra-provincial brewers, is unsustainable. Promoting some of Alberta's craft brewers by issuing grants to offset part of the 2016 Mark-up necessarily detracts from the competitiveness of non-Alberta craft brewers whose beer must be sold at a price which includes the full 2016 Mark-up. An intention to promote some Alberta craft brewers by, in effect, imposing a lower Mark-up rate on sales of their beer than is imposed on sales of beer by non-Alberta brewers amounts to an intention to burden non-local-brewers. Under such a scheme, an intention to benefit local brewers necessarily involves the intention to disadvantage non-local ones.

[110] In short, the primary purpose of the 2016 Mark-up and grant program is to protect local industry, a purpose traditionally served by tariffs, and achieved this purpose by imposing a greater cost on the sale of craft beer produced extra-provincially than is imposed on the sale of craft beer produced in Alberta.

[112] This judgment should not be understood as holding that a grant program instituted for the primary purpose of promoting the local beer industry violates s 121. Promoting local industry may be a constitutionally permissible purpose in some circumstances but not when it is implemented by tariff-like measures on goods produced outside the province. Most grant programs designed to promote local industry are too unlike a tariff to run afoul of s 121. However, the Mark-up schemes in this case, which impose additional costs on beer produced outside the province for the primary purpose of promoting the local beer industry, do violate s 121.

Chapter 10: S 92(13), Property and Civil Rights in the Province

By Eric M. Adams

Section 92(13) is the most important head of provincial authority in the division of powers, often joined with s. 92(16) – "Generally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province" – as a counterweight to the broad heads of federal authority over "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce" (s. 91(2)), "the Criminal Law" (s. 91(27)), and peace, order, and good government.

The phrase, "property and civil rights" is older than Canada. It first appeared in The Quebec Act, 1774 guaranteeing that matters of "Property and Civil Rights" would be governed by local French law even as the British claimed sovereignty over the territory. In the debates leading to Confederation, the retention of local jurisdiction concerning matters of property and civil rights was uncontroversial, especially given the province of Quebec's needs to maintain its distinctive legal system in the new federation.

The division of powers set out in the Constitution Act, 1867 reflected this consensus. Section 92(13) grants jurisdiction to provincial legislatures to "exclusively make Laws in relation to" "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". Modern readers may imagine the term "civil rights" in light of the twentieth-century American experience of the civil rights movement and the fight for racial equality. In s. 92(13), however, the drafters of Canada's Constitution had in mind the older definition of civil rights as arising from the rights and obligations created by private law. In effect, the provincial jurisdiction over civil rights is the authority to regulate relations involving contract, tort (or in current Quebec civil law terminology, extra-contractual liability), and property.

The term "Property and Civil Rights" also appears in s. 94 of the Constitution Act, 1867. That section assists to underscore the meaning of s. 92(13). Section 94 enables Parliament to unify "the Laws relative to Property and Civil Rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick" – the three common law provinces at Confederation – with the consent of those provinces. Quebec's absence from s. 94 ensured its unique private law based on the civilian tradition would remain distinct and firmly under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. As it happened, no federal unification of the laws of property and civil rights ever occurred among the common law provinces despite the centralizing hopes of some of the framers.

The most important constitutional question following Confederation involved the boundaries between federal authority and s. 92(13), especially in relation to economic regulation. Most laws, federal and provincial alike, touch upon property and civil rights in one form or another. Just where did federal jurisdiction end and provincial authority begin and how to draw the line between them? Those questions were among Canada's most important early constitutional issues, and arguably remain so to this day.

1 Trade and Commerce v Property and Civil Rights in the Province

The greatest of constitutional cases often begins in the most everyday of circumstances. In 1876, Ontario enacted legislation regulating fire insurance policies. Was that a law in relation to "Trade and Commerce" or "Property and Civil Rights in the Province"? The judicial answer provided in Parsons established a lasting cornerstone of Canadian federalism and indelibly shaped the future of economic and professional regulation in Canada.

1.1 Citizens' and The Queen Insurance Cos v Parsons (1880), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 4 SCR 215

The Supreme Court of Canada decision

Ritchie CJ:

I think the power of the Dominion parliament to regulate trade and commerce ought not to be held to be necessarily inconsistent with those of the local legislatures to regulate property and civil rights in respect to all matters of a merely local and private nature, such as matters connected with the enjoyment and preservation of property in the province, or matters of contract between parties in relation to their property or dealings, although the exercise by the local legislatures of such powers may be said remotely to affect matters connected with trade and commerce, unless, indeed, the laws of the provincial legislatures should conflict with those of the Dominion parliament passed for the general regulation of trade and commerce. I do not think the local legislatures are to be deprived of all power to deal with property and civil rights, because parliament, in the plenary exercise of its power to regulate trade and commerce, may possibly pass laws inconsistent with the exercise by the local legislatures of their powers—the exercise of the powers of the local legislatures being in such a case subject to such regulations as the Dominion may lawfully prescribe. …

GWYNNE, J.: (dissenting) —

The contention in support of the claim that the Act is within the jurisdiction of the local legislature, is that the subject matter of the Act comes within item 13 of sec. 92 of the B.N.A. Act, namely, "Property and Civil Rights in the province."

…[W]hat is vested in the local legislatures by item 13 of sec. 92, is only jurisdiction over so much of property and civil rights as may remain, after deducting so much of jurisdiction over those subjects as may be deemed necessary for securing to the parliament exclusive control over every one of the subjects enumerated in sec. 91…

The only question, therefore, before us substantially is: Are or are not joint stock companies, which are incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of Fire Insurance, Traders? And is the business which they carry on a trade?

If this question must be answered in the affirmative, the Act under consideration must be ultra vires of the provincial legislature…

There can, therefore, in my judgment, be no doubt that in the contemplation of the B.N.A. Act, all insurance, whether of lives, or of real or personal property, and whether against risk by fire on land or on sea, or by storm on land or sea, or by any other casualty, must be equally regarded as branches of trade and commerce, and must all alike be under the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament. There can, I think, be no doubt that the object of the B.N.A. Act, in placing "all matters coming within" the term "regulation of trade and commerce" under the exclusive control of the Dominion parliament, Was to secure a perfect uniformity in all the provinces of the Dominion, as to all matters whatsoever affecting all trades, as an essential condition to the prosperous carrying on of trade, and to prevent all possible interference or intermeddling with any trade, which diverse local views entertained in the different provinces of the Dominion might be disposed to attempt, if the subject was placed under local jurisdiction, whether by prescribing a particular form of contract and prohibiting any other being used, or by prescribing a particular mode of execution of the contract, or by assuming to dictate in any other manner as to the manner in which, or the terms subject to which trading companies or other persons engaged in any particular trade, should be permitted to carry on such trade….

…Now the provinces of the Dominion of Canada, by the wise precaution of the founders of our constitution, are not invested with any attribute of National Sovereignty; The framers of our constitution, having before their eyes the experience of the United States of America, have taken care that the B.N.A. Act should leave no doubt upon the subject….The object of the B.N.A. Act was to lay in the Dominion Constitution the foundations of a nation, and not to give to provinces carved out of, and subordinated to, the Dominion, anything of the nature of a national or quasi national existence.

1.2 Parsons v. Citizens' Insurance Co. of Canada, (1881) L.R. 7 App. Cas. 96

The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council Decision

Sir Montague Smith:

The scheme of [the Constitution Act, 1867], as expressed in the first branch of s. 91 is to give to the dominion parliament authority to make laws for the good government of Canada in all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislature….

Notwithstanding this endeavour to give pre-eminence to the dominion parliament in cases of a conflict of powers, it is obvious that in some cases where this apparent conflict exists, the legislature could not have intended that the powers exclusively assigned to the provincial legislature should be absorbed in those given to the dominion parliament. Take as one instance the subject "marriage and divorce," contained in the enumeration of subjects in section 91; it is evident that solemnization of marriage would come within this general description; yet "solemnization of marriage in the province" is enumerated among the classes of subjects in s. 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of s. 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the legislatures of the provinces." …. [I]t obviously could not have been intended that … the general power should override the particular one. With regard to certain classes of subjects, therefore, generally described in s. 91, legislative power may reside as to some matters failing within the general description of these subjects in the legislatures of the provinces. In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree, and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective powers. It could not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and, in order to prevent such a result, the two sections must be read together, and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified, by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain, and give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty, it will be a wise course for those on whom it is thrown, to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand.

The main contention on the part of the Respondent was that the Ontario Act in question had relation to matters coming within the class of subjects described in No. 13 of Section 92, viz., "Property and Civil Rights in the Province." The Act deals with policies of insurance entered into or in force in the Province of Ontario for insuring property situate therein against fire, and prescribes certain conditions which are to form part of such contracts. These contracts, and the rights arising from them, it was argued, came legitimately within the class of subject, "Property and Civil Rights."…. The words are sufficiently large to embrace, in their fair and ordinary meaning, rights arising from contract, and such rights are not included in any of the enumerated classes of subjects in Section 91.

In looking at Section 91, it will be found not only that there is no class including, generally, contracts and the rights arising from them, but that one class of contracts is mentioned and enumerated, viz., "18. bills of exchange and promissory notes," which it would have been unnecessary to specify if authority over all contracts and the rights arising from them had belonged to the Dominion Parliament.

By [section s. 94 of the Constitution Act, 1867] the parliament of Canada is empowered to make provision for the uniformity of any laws relative to "property and civil rights" in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick … if the provincial legislatures choose to adopt the provisions so made. The province of Quebec is omitted from this section for the obvious reason that the law which governs property and civil rights in Quebec is in the main the French law …. The words "property and civil rights" are obviously used in the same sense in this section as in No. 13 of Section 92, and there seems no reason for presuming that contracts and the rights arising from them were not intended to be included in this provision for uniformity. If, however, the narrow construction of the words "civil rights," contended for by the Appellants, were to prevail, the Dominion Parliament could, under its general power, legislate in regard to contracts in all and each of the provinces, and, as a consequence of this, the Province of Quebec, though now governed by its own Civil Code, founded on the French law, as regards contracts and their incidents, would be subject to have its law on that subject altered by the dominion legislature, and brought into uniformity with the English law prevailing in the other three provinces, notwithstanding that Quebec has been carefully left out of the uniformity section of the [Constitution Act, 1867].

The words "regulation of trade and commerce," in their unlimited sense, are sufficiently wide, if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the [Constitution Act, 1867], to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to trade with foreign Governments, requiring the sanction of Parliament, down to minute rules for regulating particular trades. But a consideration of the [Constitution Act, 1867] shows that the words were not used in this unlimited sense. In the first place, the collocation of No. 2 with classes of subjects of national and general concern affords an indication that regulations relating to general trade and commerce were in the mind of the Legislature, when conferring this power on the Dominion Parliament. If the words had been intended to have the full scope of which in their literal meaning they are susceptible, the specific mention of several of the other classes of subjects enumerated in Section 91 would have been unnecessary; as, 15, banking; 17, weights and measures; 18, bills of exchange and promissory notes; 19, interest; and even 21, bankruptcy and insolvency.

…Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the dominion parliament….It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade, such as the business of fire insurance, in a single province, and therefore that its legislative authority does not in the present case conflict or compete with the power over property and civil rights assigned to the Legislature of Ontario by No. 13 of Section 92.

The Court —

[1] This reference under s. 53 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, requires the Court to determine whether the proposed Securities Act set out in Order in Council P.C. 2010-667 falls within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

[2] The proposed Securities Act represents a comprehensive foray by Parliament into the realm of securities regulation. If validly adopted, it will create a single scheme governing the trade of securities throughout Canada subject to the oversight of a single national securities regulator.

[3] The government of Canada ("Canada"), supported by the Attorney General of Ontario ("Ontario") and other interveners, argues that the entirety of the Act can be sustained as a proper exercise of the general branch of Parliament's legislative power to regulate trade and commerce, grounded in s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The Attorney General of Alberta, the Attorney General of Quebec and other provincial attorneys general and interveners oppose the Act, arguing that securities regulation is a matter falling within s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act,

1867, which gives the provinces legislative jurisdiction over property and civil rights within their borders. Certain opponents of the Act also submit that securities regulation relates to provincial jurisdiction over matters of a merely local or private nature, under s. 92(16) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[6] Canada has shown that aspects of the securities market are national in scope and affect the country as a whole. However, considered in its entirety, the proposed Act is chiefly directed at protecting investors and ensuring the fairness of capital markets through the day-to-day regulation of issuers and other participants in the securities market. These matters have long been considered local concerns subject to provincial legislative competence over property and civil rights within the province. Canada has not shown that the securities market has so changed that the regulation of all aspects of securities now falls within the general branch of Parliament's power over trade and commerce under s. 91(2). Applying the settled test, we conclude that the proposed Act does not fall within the general trade and commerce power.

[7] It is a fundamental principle of federalism that both federal and provincial powers must be respected, and one power may not be used in a manner that effectively eviscerates another. Rather, federalism demands that a balance be struck, a balance that allows both the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures to act effectively in their respective spheres. Accepting Canada's interpretation of the general trade and commerce power would disrupt rather than maintain that balance. Parliament cannot regulate the whole of the securities system simply because aspects of it have a national dimension.

[9] It is open to the federal government and the provinces to exercise their respective powers over securities harmoniously, in the spirit of cooperative federalism. The experience of other federations in the field of securities regulation, while a function of their own constitutional requirements, suggests that a cooperative approach might usefully be explored, should our legislators so choose, to ensure that each level of government properly discharges its responsibility to the public in a coordinated fashion.

[10] At this juncture, it is important to stress that this advisory opinion does not address the question of what constitutes the optimal model for regulating the securities market. While the parties presented evidence and arguments on the relative merits of federal and provincial regulation of securities, the policy question of whether a single national securities scheme is preferable to multiple provincial regimes is not one for the courts to decide. Accordingly, our answer to the reference question is dictated solely by the text of the Constitution, fundamental constitutional principles and the relevant case law.

[29] The preamble of the proposed Act states that its immediate purpose is to create a single Canadian securities regulator. More broadly, s. 9 states that the underlying purposes of the Act are to provide investor protection, to foster fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and to contribute to the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system.

[31] The Act, as proposed, does not seek to unilaterally impose a unified system of securities regulation for the whole of Canada. Rather, it permits provinces to opt in, if and when they choose to do so. The hope is that, eventually, all or most provinces will opt in, creating an effective unified national securities regulation system for Canada. If this were to occur, it would represent a dramatic realignment in the manner in which securities have been regulated in this country.

[41] Every province and territory has its own securities laws and regulatory agency. These agencies exercise a variety of responsibilities, including prospectus review and clearance; oversight of disclosure requirements; takeover bids and insider trading; registration and regulation of market intermediaries; enforcement of compliance with the regime; recognition and supervision of exchanges and other self-regulated organizations; and public education.

[43] Provinces have jurisdiction to regulate securities within their boundaries (intraprovincial jurisdiction) as a matter of property and civil rights, pursuant to s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. As Lord Atkin stated in Lymburn v. Mayland, 1932 CanLII 311 (UK JCPC), [1932] A.C. 318 (P.C.), "If [a company] is formed to trade in securities there appears no reason why it should not be subject to the competent laws of the Province as to the business of all persons who trade in securities" (p. 324).

[44] More recently, this Court, in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, per Dickson J. (as he then was), confirmed:

> It is well established that the provinces have the power, as a matter of property and civil rights, to regulate the trade in corporate securities in the province, provided the statute does not single out federal companies for special treatment or discriminate against them in any way. . . . Since the decision of the Privy Council in Lymburn v. Mayland, 1932 CanLII 311 (UK JCPC), [1932] A.C. 318 the provisions of provincial securities acts have been given a wide constitutional recognition. [p. 183]

[46] The Constitution gives Parliament powers that enable it to pass laws that affect aspects of securities regulation and, more broadly, to promote the integrity and stability of the Canadian financial system. These include Parliament's power to enact laws relating to criminal law (s. 91(27)), banks (s. 91(15)), bankruptcy (s. 91(21)), telecommunications (ss. 91 and 92(10)(a)), and peace, order and good government (s. 91)

[54] Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 divide legislative powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. This division remains the "primary textual expression of the principle of federalism in our Constitution, agreed upon at Confederation" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 47).

[55] Inherent in a federal system is the need for an impartial arbiter of jurisdictional disputes over the boundaries of federal and provincial powers (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3, at para. 124). That impartial arbiter is the judiciary, charged with "control[ling] the limits of the respective sovereignties" (Northern Telecom Canada Ltd. v. Communication Workers of Canada, 1983 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 733, at p. 741). Courts are guided in this task by foundational constitutional principles, which assist in the delineation of spheres of jurisdiction. Among these, the principle of federalism "has exercised a role of considerable importance in the interpretation of the written provisions of our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 57).

[56] The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which was the final arbiter of Canada's Constitution until 1949, tended to favour an exclusive powers approach. Thus, Lord Atkin in 1937 famously described the respective powers of Parliament and the provincial legislatures as "watertight compartments" (Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, 1937 CanLII 362 (UK JCPC), [1937] A.C. 326, at p. 354). However, the Judicial Committee recognized that particular matters might have both federal and provincial aspects and overlap (Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117). Privy Council jurisprudence also recognized that the Constitution must be viewed as a "living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits" (Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124, at p. 136, per Lord Sankey). This metaphor has endured as the preferred approach in constitutional interpretation, ensuring "that Confederation can be adapted to new social realities" (Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, [2005] 2 SCR 669, at para. 9, per Deschamps J.).

[57] The Supreme Court of Canada, as final arbiter of constitutional disputes since 1949, moved toward a more flexible view of federalism that accommodates overlapping jurisdiction and encourages intergovernmental cooperation — an approach that can be described as the "dominant tide" of modern federalism (OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 18)….

[59] Dickson C.J., in concurring reasons in OPSEU, summarized the situation aptly:

> The history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers. It is true that doctrines like interjurisdictional and Crown immunity and concepts like "watertight compartments" qualify the extent of that interplay. But it must be recognized that these doctrines and concepts have not been the dominant tide of constitutional doctrines; rather they have been an undertow against the strong pull of pith and substance, the aspect doctrine and, in recent years, a very restrained approach to concurrency and paramountcy issues. [p. 18]

[60] As Dickson C.J. pointed out, a restrained approach to doctrines like federal paramountcy is warranted. This point was reiterated by Binnie and LeBel JJ. in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, where the Court said:

> The [constitutional] doctrines [developed by the courts] must also be designed to reconcile the legitimate diversity of regional experimentation with the need for national unity [and] they must include a recognition that the task of maintaining the balance of powers in practice falls primarily to governments, and constitutional doctrine must facilitate, not undermine what this Court has called "co-operative federalism" …

[61] While flexibility and cooperation are important to federalism, they cannot override or modify the separation of powers. The Secession Reference affirmed federalism as an underlying constitutional principle that demands respect for the constitutional division of powers and the maintenance of a constitutional balance between federal and provincial powers.

[62] In summary, notwithstanding the Court's promotion of cooperative and flexible federalism, the constitutional boundaries that underlie the division of powers must be respected. The "dominant tide" of flexible federalism, however strong its pull may be, cannot sweep designated powers out to sea, nor erode the constitutional balance inherent in the Canadian federal state.

[65] After analyzing the legislation's purpose and its effects to determine its main thrust, the inquiry turns to whether the legislation so characterized falls under the head of power said to support it — the classification stage (Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783, at para. 15). This may require interpretation of the scope of the power. If the main thrust of the legislation is properly classified as falling under a head of power assigned to the adopting level of government, the legislation is intra vires and valid.

[66] Canadian constitutional law has long recognized that the same subject or "matter" may possess both federal and provincial aspects. This means that a federal law may govern a matter from one perspective and a provincial law from another. The federal law pursues an objective that in pith and substance falls within Parliament's jurisdiction, while the provincial law pursues a different objective that falls within provincial jurisdiction (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 30). This concept, known as the double aspect doctrine, allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, but it does not create concurrent jurisdiction over a matter (in the way, for example, s. 95 of the Constitution Act, 1867 does for agriculture and immigration).

[93] The first step in the pith and substance analysis is to ascertain the purpose and effects of the Act, viewed as a single, comprehensive scheme.

[94] The task at this stage is not to determine conclusively whether the legislation is provincial or federal in nature — that is the ultimate question of the division of powers analysis — but only to ascertain its main thrust. …

[95] Turning first to purpose, the Act's preamble states that Canada intends to create a single Canadian securities regulator. This is consistent with previous proposals for such a body. As discussed earlier, the idea of a single Canadian securities regulator has been percolating for more than 50 years. The Act represents the culmination of sustained efforts towards unification of the provincial securities regulatory regimes. Section 9 of the proposed Act reveals the legislation's broader, underlying purposes: to provide investor protection, to foster fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and to contribute to the integrity and stability of Canada's financial system.

[99] The direct effect of the proposed Act is to establish a federal securities regulation scheme. If implemented as contemplated, all provinces and territories will eventually join the scheme. This will produce follow-through effects. Once a sufficient number of jurisdictions opt in, the current provincial and territorial securities regulation schemes will be effectively displaced. Indeed, in order to be included in the comprehensive regulatory scheme created by the Act, provinces and territories must suspend their own securities laws. The follow-through effects of the proposed Act will therefore be to subsume the existing provincial and territorial legislative schemes governing securities under the federal regulation scheme.

[100] A detailed look at the provisions of the Act confirms that once in place, it will regulate many matters which Canada concedes also fall within the provincial power over property and civil rights under s. 92(13).…

[106] Against this background, we return to the question at hand: What is the main thrust of the proposed Securities Act? The purpose of the proposed Act, we have seen, is to implement a comprehensive Canadian regime for the regulation of securities with a view to investor protection, the promotion of fair, efficient and competitive capital markets and ensuring the integrity and stability of the financial system. The effects of the proposed Act would be to duplicate and displace the existing provincial and territorial securities regimes, replacing them with a new federal regulatory scheme. Thus, the main thrust of the Act is to regulate, on an exclusive basis, all aspects of securities trading in Canada, including the trades and occupations related to securities in each of the provinces.

[126] The conclusion that the Act's attempt to take over regulation of the entirety of the securities trade in Canada exceeds the general branch of the trade and commerce power is also supported by the tenor of the case law. While the jurisprudence acknowledges that securities regulation may possess federal aspects, it has generally viewed basic securities regulation within the provinces as a local matter of property and civil rights…

[132] It is not for the Court to suggest to the governments of Canada and the provinces the way forward by, in effect, conferring in advance an opinion on the constitutionality on this or that alternative scheme. Yet we may appropriately note the growing practice of resolving the complex governance problems that arise in federations, not by the bare logic of either/or, but by seeking cooperative solutions that meet the needs of the country as a whole as well as its constituent parts.

2 Property and Civil Rights in the Province and the Criminal Law

In addition to dealing with the interaction between federal and provincial jurisdiction in relation to the economy, Canadian courts frequently confronted the dividing lines between federal jurisdiction under the criminal law in s. 91(27) and provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(13).

From the outset, courts recognized that many valid federal laws, including criminal laws, would involve property in various incidental ways. The question to determine the validity of federal criminal laws was not whether such a law involved or touched upon property in some fashion, but whether the Act's true nature and character and form (determined by application of what became the 3p test) fell within the criminal law power.

Similarly, courts widely accept the validity of an array of provincial laws with prohibitions and penalties covering areas of shared criminal law concern so long as the Act's dominant purpose falls within the broad conception of provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights or matters of a local and private nature. The resulting case law leans heavily on the double aspect doctrine and acceptance of overlapping applications of federal and provincial laws. There is no specific test courts apply to determine validity under s. 92(13), unlike some other broad heads of power in the division of powers. Instead, courts primarily rely on the pith and substance doctrine to assess whether the provincial legislation has a dominant purpose in relation to property and civil rights in the province.

2.1 Chatterjee v Ontario (Attorney General), 2009 SCC 19 (CanLII)

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] BINNIE J. — The question raised on this appeal is whether the Ontario Remedies for Organized Crime and Other Unlawful Activities Act, 2001, S.O. 2001, c. 28 (otherwise known as Civil Remedies Act, 2001 or CRA), which authorizes the forfeiture of proceeds of unlawful activity, is ultra vires Ontario because it encroaches on the federal criminal law power. In my view, the CRA is valid provincial legislation.

[2] The argument that the CRA is ultra vires is based in this case on an exaggerated view of the immunity of federal jurisdiction in relation to matters that may, in another aspect, be the subject of provincial legislation. Resort to a federalist concept of proliferating jurisdictional enclaves (or "interjurisdictional immunities") was discouraged by this Court's decisions in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, and British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 SCR 86, and should not now be given a new lease on life. As stated in Canadian Western Bank, "a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (para. 37 (emphasis in original)).

[3] The present appeal provides an opportunity to apply the principles of federalism affirmed in those recent cases. The CRA was enacted to deter crime and to compensate its victims. The former purpose is broad enough that both the federal government (in relation to criminal law) and the provincial governments (in relation to property and civil rights) can validly pursue it. The latter purpose falls squarely within provincial competence. Crime imposes substantial costs on provincial treasuries. Those costs impact many provincial interests, including health, policing resources, community stability and family welfare. It would be out of step with modern realities to conclude that a province must shoulder the costs to the community of criminal behaviour but cannot use deterrence to suppress it.

[4] Moreover, the CRA method of attack on crime is to authorize in rem forfeiture of its proceeds and differs from both the traditional criminal law which ordinarily couples a prohibition with a penalty (see Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783) and criminal procedure which in general refers to the means by which an allegation of a particular criminal offence is proven against a particular offender…. It is true that forfeiture may have de facto punitive effects in some cases, but its dominant purpose is to make crime in general unprofitable, to capture resources tainted by crime so as to make them unavailable to fund future crime and to help compensate private individuals and public institutions for the costs of past crime. These are valid provincial objects. There is no operational conflict between the forfeiture provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, and the CRA. It cannot reasonably be said that the CRA amounts to colourable criminal legislation. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.

[5] The appellant was stopped by York Regional Police on March 27, 2003, because his car had no front licence plate. A computer search showed the police that he was in breach of his recognizance, which required him to reside in Ottawa, some 400 kilometres away. When the appellant acknowledged that he was then living in Thornhill, just north of Toronto, the officers arrested him and, incidental to the arrest, searched his car. They discovered $29,020 in cash, as well as an exhaust fan, a light ballast and a light socket. According to police, all of these items smelled of marijuana, although no marijuana was found.

[6] The appellant was never charged with any offence in relation to the money, items, or any drug related activity. However, on May 13, 2003, the Attorney General of Ontario brought an interlocutory motion under ss. 4 and 9 of the CRA to preserve the seized money and equipment. A preservation order was granted.

[7] On May 16, 2003, the Attorney General brought an application under ss. 3 and 8 of the CRA for forfeiture of the seized money as proceeds of unlawful activity and of the items as instruments of unlawful activity. In response, the appellant challenged the CRA's constitutionality: that challenge eventually led to this appeal.

[15] Crime imposes significant costs at every level of government: federal, provincial and municipal. Impaired driving is a Criminal Code offence but carnage on the roads touches numerous matters within provincial jurisdiction including health, highways, automobile insurance and property damage. The cost associated with drug abuse is another example. Each level of government bears a portion of the costs of criminality and each level of government therefore has an interest in its suppression. …

> The purpose of this Act is to provide civil remedies that will assist in,
> (a) compensating persons who suffer pecuniary or non-pecuniary losses as a result of unlawful activities;
> (b) preventing persons who engage in unlawful activities and others from keeping property that was acquired as a result of unlawful activities;
> (c) preventing property, including vehicles as defined in Part III.1, from being used to engage in certain unlawful activities [added in 2007, c. 13, s. 26]; and
> (d) preventing injury to the public that may result from conspiracies to engage in unlawful activities.

While the Court is not bound by a purpose clause when considering the constitutional validity of an enactment, a statement of legislative intent is often a useful tool, particularly where it is apparent, as in this case, that the machinery created by the CRA corresponds to what is required to achieve the stated purposes. Purposes (a) and (b) contemplate the re-distribution of property tainted by crime. (Purpose (c) relates to the instruments of crime and is not before us.) Purpose (d) is directed to the prevention of crime-related injuries. It is suggested that the reference to "conspiracies" in (d) indicates a focus on combatting organized crime, and the appellant cites some extracts from Hansard to that effect. This, he says, entangles the CRA in criminal law. However, the province has good reason to deter organized crime, provided it stays within areas of provincial competence. There is nothing in the provisions of the CRA that are before us on this appeal that go beyond the redistribution of property tainted by crime, including federal crimes of all descriptions.

[18] The internal evidence of purpose thus suggests a credible intent to recover from the proceeds of crime found in Ontario the costs to victims and to the public of criminality that would otherwise fall on the provincial treasury. Forfeiture is the transfer of property from the owner to the Crown. Forfeiture does not result in the conviction of anybody for any offence. On its face, therefore, the CRA targets property rights.

[19] In terms of the effects of the CRA, the Court in determining its pith and substance will look at "how the legislation as a whole affects the rights and liabilities of those subject to its terms" (R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463, at p. 482). When appropriate, as well, a reviewing court will look beyond the legal effect — beyond the statute's "four corners" — to examine "the actual or predicted practical effect of the legislation in operation" (Morgentaler, at p. 483). The record shows that as of August 2007 approximately $3.6 million in property has been ordered forfeited under the CRA of which approximately $1 million had been paid out to direct victims, $900,000 had been paid in grants to various bodies on victims' issues, including the Peel Police Internet Child Exploitation Unit, leaving $1.7 million in special CRA accounts. Forfeited property included approximately $500,000 in property involved in marijuana grow operations, a Hamilton crack house (the ownership of which was then transferred to the City), vehicles involved in street racing contrary to the Highway Traffic Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. H.8, and approximately $1 million in cash involved in fraud or money laundering: Civil Forfeiture in Ontario 2007: An Update on the Civil Remedies Act, 2001 (2007).

[20] Criminal "taint" of property has many sources. Section 2 of the CRA defines "unlawful activity" as "an act or omission that . . . is an offence under an Act of Canada, Ontario or another province or territory". The definition also extends to offences in jurisdictions outside Canada provided the conduct there would be an offence if committed in Ontario. It is significant that the CRA throws its "crime" net so widely. There is no singling out of offences in any particular jurisdiction, including federal offences in Canada. This suggests the province was concerned with the deleterious effects of crime in general rather than attempting in a colourable way to tack a penalty onto the federal criminal sentencing process.

[23] In essence, therefore, the CRA creates a property-based authority to seize money and other things shown on a balance of probabilities to be tainted by crime and thereafter to allocate the proceeds to compensating victims of and remedying the societal effects of criminality. The practical (and intended) effect is also to take the profit out of crime and to deter its present and would-be perpetrators.

[24] Once the "pith and substance" is ascertained, it is necessary to classify that essential character of the law by reference to the provincial and federal "classes of subjects" listed in ss. 91 and 92 (or, in an appropriate case, ss. 93, 94A and 95) to determine if the law comes within the jurisdiction of the enacting legislature. Clearly, the CRA relates to property but, of course, much of the Criminal Code is dedicated to offences involving property. To characterize a provincial law as being in pith and substance related to property is therefore just a starting point. A good deal of overlap in measures taken to suppress crime is inevitable …

[25] As stated, the CRA fits neatly into the provincial competence in relation to Property and Civil Rights in the Province (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92(13)) or Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province (s. 92(16))…

[26] Our jurisprudence offers many examples of the interplay between provincial legislative jurisdiction over property and civil rights and federal legislative jurisdiction over criminal law and procedure. In Bédard v. Dawson, 1923 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1923] SCR 681, for example, the Court upheld the validity of a provincial law that authorized a judge to close a "disorderly hous[e]" for up to one year. The Court held that the law was directed to the enjoyment of property rights not criminal law. Duff J. (later C.J.C.) held that "[t]he legislation impugned seems to be aimed at suppressing conditions calculated to favour the development of crime rather than at the punishment of crime" (p. 684). Idington J., in words relevant to the disposition of the present appeal, said that:

> As to the argument addressed to us that the local legislatures cannot legislate to prevent crime, I cannot assent thereto for in a very wide sense it is the duty of the legislature to do the utmost it can within its power to anticipate and remove, so far as practicable, whatever is likely to tend to produce crime; . . . [Emphasis added; p. 684.]

[27] In Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] SCR 285, this Court struck down a Quebec law providing for the closure of houses in which socialism or bolshevism were said to be propagated (known popularly as the "Padlock law"). Kerwin C.J. and Nolan and Cartwright JJ. distinguished Bédard. Unlike in Bédard, the impugned statute in Switzman was only superficially concerned with the control and enjoyment of property; in their view its dominant purpose was to criminalize and punish the propagation of communism. By contrast, the CRA does not define a new offence or clearly take aim at any particular category of criminal conduct. …

[29] The question, however, is at what point does a provincial measure designed to "suppress" crime become itself "criminal law"? There will often be a degree of overlap between measures enacted pursuant to the provincial power (property and civil rights) and measures taken pursuant to the federal power (criminal law and procedure). In such cases it is necessary for the Court to identify the "dominant feature" of an impugned measure. If, as is argued by the Attorneys General here, the dominant feature of the CRA is property and civil rights, it will not be invalidated because of an "incidental" intrusion into the field of criminal law.

[30] For the reasons that follow I agree that the CRA was enacted "in relation to" property and civil rights and may incidentally "affect" criminal law and procedure without doing violence to the division of powers. As noted by Dickson C.J. in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at p. 670, "[b]oth provincial and federal governments have equal ability to legislate in ways that may incidentally affect the other government's sphere of power."

[32] …Co-operative federalism recognizes that overlaps between provincial and federal laws are inevitable:

> Matters, however, which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within the jurisdiction of a province over the subjects designated by one or more of the heads of s. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose, be proper subjects of legislation under s. 91, and in particular under head 27.

The mere existence of a valid federal law bearing some similarities to the challenged provincial law does not, without more, demonstrate the invalidity of the latter.

[36] If the dominant purpose of the provincial enactment is in relation to provincial objects, the law will be valid, and if the enactments of both levels of government can generally function without operational conflict they will be permitted to do so. In factual situations where operational conflict does occur, the conflict will be resolved by the restrained view of federal paramountcy …

[40] The Constitution permits a province to enact measures to deter criminality and to deal with its financial consequences so long as those measures are taken in relation to a head of provincial competence and do not compromise the proper functioning of the Criminal Code including the sentencing provisions. In Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan, 1941 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1941] SCR 396, it was held that a province could validly impose automatic suspension of a provincial driver's licence after conviction for impaired driving under the Criminal Code. In Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5, the Court upheld the automatic provincial licence suspension following a conviction for impaired driving even though the sentencing judge in the criminal case had purported to allow Ross to continue to drive on an intermittent basis.

There is no general bar to a province's enacting civil consequences to criminal acts provided the province does so for its own purposes in relation to provincial heads of legislative power.

2.2 Murray-Hall v Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10 (CanLII)

THE CHIEF JUSTICE –

[1] A few years ago, the federal Parliament passed legislation relating to cannabis. Under that legislation, it is prohibited for an individual to possess or cultivate more than four cannabis plants in the individual's home. The provinces and territories subsequently passed their own legislation to regulate such practical matters as the manner in which cannabis was to be sold and stored. Through a broad legislative initiative that included the creation of a monopoly on the sale of cannabis, the Quebec legislature, for its part, enacted provisions that completely prohibit the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants at home, regardless of the number of plants. What must be determined in this appeal is whether the Quebec provisions are constitutionally valid in light of the division of powers and, if so, whether they are operative under the doctrine of federal paramountcy. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the impugned provisions are a valid exercise by the Quebec legislature of the powers conferred on it by s. 92(13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867. I also conclude that the impugned provisions do not frustrate the purpose of the federal legislation and are therefore operative.

[5] The enactment of the federal Act represents a paradigm shift in the Canadian legal landscape. Canada has moved from a suppression-based approach to a scheme that gives the provinces responsibility for determining the framework for the sale and distribution of cannabis within their borders. In other words, the provinces are being called upon to make laws, within their fields of jurisdiction, concerning a substance that was previously subject to criminal prohibitions for nearly a century. The statutes and regulations passed by the provinces in parallel with the federal Act primarily establish rules governing the sale of the substance, for example with regard to the location, operation and staff of the stores where the various cannabis products are sold. Much of the provincial legislation also sets out additional restrictions that supplement the federal legislative framework, including with respect to the minimum age required to purchase cannabis, the applicable limit on the possession of this substance and the places where it may be consumed in public.

[6] On June 12, 2018, the Quebec legislature introduced its own scheme to regulate cannabis when it passed Bill 157, An Act to constitute the Société québécoise du cannabis, to enact the Cannabis Regulation Act and to amend various highway safety-related provisions, 1st Sess., 41st Leg. The creation of the Société québécoise du cannabis ("SQDC"), a subsidiary of the Société des alcools du Québec with a monopoly on the sale of cannabis in Quebec, was one of the most important measures. The enactment of the Cannabis Regulation Act, CQLR, c. C-5.3 ("provincial Act"), was another. The provincial Act contains a broad range of provisions concerning the possession, cultivation, use, transportation, storage, sale and promotion of cannabis in Quebec. The specific provisions of the provincial Act being challenged in this case are ss. 5 and 10, which completely prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the cultivation of such plants for personal purposes in a dwelling-house. These prohibitions are accompanied by fines of between $250 and $750, which are doubled for a subsequent offence

[22] To decide whether a law or some of its provisions are constitutionally valid under the division of powers, courts must first characterize the law or provisions and then, on that basis, classify them by reference to the heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 …

[23] At the characterization stage, what must be determined is the pith and substance of the law …. In its jurisprudence, the Court has described the aim of this exercise as being to identify the "dominant purpose" of the law … its "dominant or most important characteristic" … or its "leading feature or true character" …. At the classification stage, in turn, what must be determined is whether the pith and substance thereby defined comes within one of the heads of power of the enacting legislature …

[28] In my view, the pith and substance of the impugned provisions is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly in order to protect the health and security of the public, and of young persons in particular, from cannabis harm. It follows that the prohibitions against the possession of cannabis plants and their cultivation at home set out in ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are a means of serving the public health and security objectives pursued by that Act. …

[29] Before embarking on the analysis, I will provide a brief overview of the principles that apply in characterizing provisions that are alleged to be an integral part of a regulatory scheme. It is helpful to clarify the extent to which courts should analyze a law as a whole in order to characterize some of its provisions. The question is relevant in this case because the parties' disagreement at the characterization stage essentially stems from the emphasis they place, respectively, on the impugned provisions and on the provincial Act considered in its entirety. Mr. Murray-Hall focuses on the provisions themselves and criticizes the Court of Appeal for not truly considering the possibility that their purpose differs from that of the Act as a whole. The Attorney General of Quebec instead stresses the role played by the provisions in the scheme, endorsing the Court of Appeal's statement that [TRANSLATION] "their real purpose emerges only when they are analyzed in the overall context of the [provincial Act]" (para. 43).

[30] Where, as in this case, only very specific provisions are being challenged and not the entire law, certain principles apply. A court should begin by characterizing the provisions rather than considering the validity of the law as a whole, a principle articulated by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Attorney General of Canada v. Canadian National Transportation, Ltd., 1983 CanLII 36 (SCC), [1983] 2 SCR 206. However, Dickson J. added, this does not mean that the provisions must be read in isolation. A contextual analysis of the provisions is necessary when they are part of a regulatory scheme. Dickson J.'s remarks in this regard are as follows:

> It is obvious at the outset that a constitutionally invalid provision will not be saved by being put into an otherwise valid statute, even if the statute comprises a regulatory scheme under the general trade and commerce branch of s. 91(2). The correct approach, where there is some doubt that the impugned provision has the same constitutional characterization as the Act in which it is found, is to start with the challenged section rather than with a demonstration of the validity of the statute as a whole. I do not think, however, this means that the section in question must be read in isolation. If the claim to constitutional validity is based on the contention that the impugned provision is part of a regulatory scheme it would seem necessary to read it in its context. If it can in fact be seen as part of such a scheme, attention will then shift to the constitutionality of the scheme as a whole. [Emphasis added; p. 270.]

[33] I would also note that reading the impugned provisions in the context of the scheme into which they are integrated is crucial in distinguishing the purpose of the law from the means chosen to achieve it. Indeed, in Ward, McLachlin C.J. cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose" (para. 25).

[35] Sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act set out absolute prohibitions against, respectively, the possession and the cultivation of cannabis plants in a dwelling-house, accompanied by fines of $250 to $750. If we simply focused on the wording of these provisions, as the appellant urges us to do, the concept of prohibition is what would stand out.

[37] It is also my view that the impugned provisions must not be read "separately" or "individually" on the pretext that they may relate to a very different matter than the rest of the provisions. As the Court of Appeal said, [TRANSLATION] "[t]he constitutionality of sections 5 and 10 of the [provincial Act] cannot properly be analyzed in isolation, separately from the [Act] as a whole" (para. 41). Of course, it is quite possible that some provisions of a law may be of "a completely different order" than its other provisions (Westendorp v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 43, at p. 51). But such a conclusion cannot be reached without a contextual analysis of the impugned provisions.

[38] An overview of the provincial Act reveals the scope of the regulatory scheme introduced by the Quebec legislature. Like the Court of Appeal, I see this undertaking as involving the creation of a state monopoly that oversees each step leading up to the purchase of cannabis by citizens in order to protect the health and security of the public. The prohibitions set out in ss. 5 and 10, along with the other controls put in place by the Act, are the machinery of this undertaking. Specifically, prohibiting the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants contributes to the effectiveness of the state monopoly by steering consumers to the only legally authorized source of supply, that is, the state-owned enterprise.

[41] [Sections] 5 and 10 are part of the monopolistic logic intended by the Quebec legislature, and the prohibitions they impose are a means of achieving the objectives of public health and security.

[42] In reality, the impossibility of possessing and cultivating cannabis plants at home without risking penal sanctions has the effect of steering Quebec consumers to the safe source of supply that is the SQDC. As a result, they receive quality-controlled products and advice from sales employees who have been trained on the risks associated with cannabis consumption … The fact that consumers buy from the SQDC also means that they are subject to a series of requirements, the most important of which seems to me to be the one setting a minimum age of 21 years for purchasing cannabis from the SQDC.

[44] …Even if it is accepted that the objective of protecting the health and security of the public could have been achieved by regulating home cannabis cultivation less strictly and not only by completely prohibiting it, this argument is far from being determinative in identifying the pith and substance of the impugned provisions. When two approaches are considered to be potentially effective, it falls to legislative bodies to choose the one that is most likely to further the intended objectives. Indeed, this Court has pointed out on several occasions that considerations relating to the efficacy or wisdom of the means chosen are not helpful at the characterization stage …

[58] The effects of the impugned provisions are clear, and I agree with the manner in which the Superior Court described them in its reasons:

> [TRANSLATION] . . . the practical consequence of applying ss. 5 and 10 is one, to prevent citizens from possessing and cultivating cannabis plants for personal purposes and two, to force consumers to purchase cannabis from the SQDC.
> The legal consequences of the provincial provisions are one, to prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the personal cultivation of cannabis and two, to impose penal sanctions for any violation. They also result in penal consequences for acts that were formerly criminal under federal legislation, the CDSA. [paras. 49-50]

[59] I would add, however, that while the impugned provisions do bring otherwise decriminalized conduct into the sphere of penal law, the consequences flowing from a contravention are very different from those arising under the provisions of the CDSA. Persons who contravene ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are liable to fines that could be said to be relatively modest, since they range from $250 to $750.

[60] Together, the legal and practical effects described above confirm the conclusion I reached earlier after analyzing the intrinsic and extrinsic evidence. The purpose of ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act is not to suppress possession and cultivation at home as such, but rather to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly in order to protect the health and security of the public from cannabis harm.

[65] In this case, the question before us at the classification stage is whether the impugned provisions fall within the federal criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867 or within the powers conferred on the provinces over property and civil rights and matters of a merely local or private nature by s. 92(13) and (16), respectively. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are related to the provinces' powers and are therefore intra vires the Quebec legislature.

[67] In my view, even though ss. 5 and 10 seemingly have all the characteristics of criminal law, they should still not be classified under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. For the reasons that follow, I believe that the classification of the provisions challenged in this case cannot be determined simply on the basis of the correspondence between the three requirements set out in the Margarine Reference on the one hand and these provisions on the other.

[68] First, Parliament's decision to decriminalize conduct leaves the field clear for the provinces to enact their own prohibitions accompanied by penalties in relation to that conduct, as long as the prohibitions serve to enforce laws relating to matters within provincial jurisdiction (s. 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867). It follows that penal regulatory measures adopted by the provinces with regard to decriminalized activities are not necessarily attempts to legislate in criminal matters. This is why Major J. wrote in Siemens v. Manitoba (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 3, [2003] 1 SCR 6, that "[t]he mere presence of a prohibition and a penalty does not invalidate an otherwise acceptable use of provincial legislative power" (para. 25).

[69] Second, it is recognized that the provinces have jurisdiction to make laws in relation to several matters that touch on purposes that otherwise constitute valid criminal law purposes. In the Margarine Reference, Rand J. referred to "[p]ublic peace, order, security, health, morality" as the ordinary though not exclusive "ends" served by criminal law (p. 50). Although public peace, order, security, health and morality are classic criminal law purposes, the provinces may consider such imperatives in designing their own regulatory schemes. As explained in Siemens, "[t]he fact that some of th[e] considerations [taken into account by the provincial legislature] have a moral aspect does not invalidate an otherwise legitimate provincial law" (para. 30). Here, the mere fact that the Quebec legislature considered the real risk that cannabis consumption poses for certain vulnerable populations when it enacted legislation is not in itself an indication of encroachment on the field of criminal law.

[71] In this case, the partial decriminalization by Parliament of the possession, sale and distribution of cannabis and the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants opened the door to provincial legislative action. In prohibiting the possession and cultivation at home of cannabis plants, the Quebec legislature exercised the power conferred on it by s. 92(15) to enact penal measures in order to enforce an otherwise valid law. I found above that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act create a scheme that ensures the effectiveness of the state monopoly and that they in fact advance the objectives of public health and security. Characterized in this way, the impugned provisions are clearly related to the provincial heads of power in s. 92(13) and (16). This is because provincial legislative action in the field of public health is grounded primarily in broad and plenary jurisdiction over property and civil rights (s. 92(13)) and residual jurisdiction over matters of a merely local or private nature in the province (s. 92 (16)) …

[73] With this clarified, I must now explain how the intent behind the Quebec legislature's action in the field of health in this case was to regulate, not to suppress a threat or an evil. This is important because health, as a matter not assigned in the Constitution Act, 1867, is an area of overlapping jurisdiction …. It is also well established that both levels of government have authority to make laws in relation to the production, distribution and sale of products that present a danger to public health, including tobacco and alcohol …

[76] While it is true that prohibitions similar to those set out in ss. 5 and 10 have been enacted by Parliament in the past under the federal criminal law power, this can be explained by the double aspect doctrine. This doctrine reflects the contemporary view of federalism and constitutional interpretation, which recognizes that overlapping powers are unavoidable …. According to the double aspect doctrine, Parliament and the provincial legislatures may make laws in relation to matters that, by their very nature, have both a federal aspect and a provincial aspect …

[77] This appeal is a textbook case for the application of the double aspect doctrine. The regulation of the use of drugs, including cannabis, has both federal and provincial aspects, which makes it conceivable that laws enacted by both levels of government will apply concurrently. This matter has a double aspect, since it may be addressed from two different perspectives: (1) that of the criminal law (under s. 91(27)), by suppressing some "evil" or injurious or undesirable effect upon the public; and (2) that of health or trade (under s. 92(13) and (16)), by regulating, among other things, the conditions of production, distribution and sale of the substance. Sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act regulate cannabis use from this second, normative perspective and are therefore within provincial jurisdiction.

Chapter 11: S 91(24), The Federal Power of "Indians and Lands Reserved for Indians"

By Robert Hamilton and Joshua Nichols

1 Introduction

Section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 grants Parliament legislative authority in relation to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians." Governments and courts have historically treated this power broadly and as capable of supporting a wide range of federal legislation directed at Indigenous peoples and their lands. The "core" of 91(24) has been interpreted as including matters related to Indigenous identity, law, and governance, among other things, that provincial laws cannot impair. The boundaries of this core, however, have shifted over time.

This chapter traces the doctrinal development of section 91(24) from Confederation to the present. It does so in two ways. First, it maps how courts have interpreted the provision over time, from early readings that emphasized plenary federal control over Indigenous peoples and lands to later decisions that begin to treat Indigenous peoples as constitutional actors entitled to self-government and emphasize the federal Crown's protective role. Second, it examines the internal structure of the provision, with attention to its two heads of power: one over "Indians," the other over "lands reserved for the Indians." The cases that follow explore many interpretive issues, such as whether the first head includes Inuit and Métis peoples, whether the second extends to Aboriginal title lands, how federal authority under s. 91(24) interacts with provincial law, and how the provision has been reshaped by doctrines that increasingly permit provincial involvement in matters touching on Indigenous rights and governance, including the evolving relationship between section 91(24) and section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The meaning, scope, and purpose of section 91(24) have long been contested. In Daniels v. Canada, 2016 SCC 12, the Supreme Court recognized two distinct purposes. First, the provision was enacted to carry forward the treaty-making authority, fiduciary obligations, and protective role that the imperial Crown had prior to Confederation. The federal government, that is, took on the responsibilities and obligations of the imperial Crown and s.91(24) incorporated the political relationships between the Crown and the Indigenous nations with whom the Crown was "connected", to use the term from the Royal Proclamation, 1763. The provision also had a contrary purpose, which was to serve the expansionist aims of the Dominion, to secure control over Indigenous peoples and Indigenous lands, and to "to civilize and assimilate" Indigenous peoples (Daniels, para 5). Section 91(24) thus acquired a dual character: it became both a tool for asserting control over Indigenous peoples and lands and the constitutional basis for the Crown's ongoing obligations to them. This duality, obligation and control, shaped the provision's early application as a means of centralizing authority and facilitating territorial consolidation.

Although section 91(24) confers exclusive federal jurisdiction "in relation to" Indigenous peoples, how that exclusivity operates where federal and provincial laws intersect has not always been clear and has shifted over time. As a matter of constitutional doctrine, the "core" of federal authority under any head of power is protected from provincial impairment (see Chapter 6, Part 6 on interjurisdictional immunity). In the case of s. 91(24), courts have historically understood that core to include matters closely tied to Indigeneity (relating to "Indianness" or "Indians qua Indians" as courts have framed it) such as Indian status under the Indian Act, family relationships or property on reserve, social and cultural identity, and the exercise of Aboriginal and treaty rights. It has also included reserve lands and Aboriginal title lands. Provincial laws that impair this core risk trenching on exclusive federal jurisdiction. Courts, however, increasingly permitted provincial laws to affect matters within this core, provided they are framed as laws of general application and do not create operational conflicts with federal law or protected rights. The trend has been toward the accommodation of provincial legislative authority rather than its exclusion.

This trend was slow, yet consistent. In Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1973 CanLII 980 (SCC), [1974] SCR 695, the Court confirmed that provincial laws could apply on Indian reserve lands if they did not affect matters at the heart of Indigeneity. In doing so, the majority rejected the "enclave" theory that would have limited the reach of provincial law. Dick v. La Reine, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309 clarified how provincial laws may apply to Indigenous peoples under this framework. Until that point, many courts had treated section 88 of the Indian Act, which incorporates provincial laws and makes them applicable to Indigenous peoples, as the exclusive means for provincial laws to operate in Indigenous contexts. Dick rejected that assumption. The Court held that most provincial laws of general application apply of their own force unless they impair the protected core of s. 91(24). The decision marked a doctrinal shift toward a more integrated model of federalism, one that expanded provincial reach while leaving core protections intact.

Subsequent cases extended this approach. In Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, the Court narrowed the "singling out" test, holding that provincial laws may apply to Indigenous peoples and lands even when they regulate culturally significant Indigenous practices, so long as the law is general in form and pursues a legitimate or ameliorative purpose. In NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45, the Court upheld the application of provincial labour law to an Indigenous child and family services agency, emphasizing the organization's function over its cultural mandate. These cases reflect the Court's increasing embrace of cooperative federalism, even in areas closely tied to Indigenous identity and governance; in this regard, the interpretation of s.91(24) has followed broader trends in constitutional interpretation. The protective force of s. 91(24), once enforced through interjurisdictional immunity, was progressively displaced. The court gradually articulated a model where section 35, rather than s. 91(24), became the main constraint on provincial authority.

This was made explicit in Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, and Grassy Narrows First Nation v. Ontario (Natural Resources), 2014 SCC 48. In Tsilhqot'in, the Court confirmed that provincial laws may apply to Aboriginal title lands and held that Aboriginal rights, including title, no longer fall within the constitutionally protected core of s. 91(24). In Grassy Narrows, the Court confirmed that provinces may "take up" land under treaty and affect treaty rights, provided they meet their obligations to consult and justify infringements. These decisions framed Aboriginal and treaty rights under s.35 as limits on government action but removed at least some of the protections afforded those rights through the division of powers: rights were protected through s.35, not s.91(24).

Yet, despite the gradual increase in provincial power, the Court has also begun to revive the protective function of s. 91(24) as a source of Crown obligations. Beginning with R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075, the Court emphasized that the honour of the Crown imposes constitutional duties favouring Indigenous peoples, particularly in relation to their rights and governance. In Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010, the Court confirmed that Aboriginal title lands fall under the "lands reserved" head and described s. 91(24) as the basis of Parliament's "primary constitutional responsibility" for securing the welfare of Indigenous peoples. In Daniels, it extended federal jurisdiction to Métis and non-status Indians, affirming a broad scope of the "Indians" head and extending federal responsibility. These cases interpret s. 91(24) not as primarily supporting federal control, but as linking historical obligations to contemporary legislative authority. In Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34 the Court characterized the honour of the Crown as a sui generis unwritten constitutional principle and noted that while they did not decide whether it was capable of invalidating inconsistent legislation they noted that "if it is, it is unique in this regard" (at para 62).

This interpretation was given further support in Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5, where the Court upheld federal legislation enacted under s. 91(24) to support Indigenous law-making in the field of child and family services. The decision frames the head of power as relational, grounding federal authority in constitutional obligations and the broader project of legislative reconciliation. It affirms that Indigenous legal orders can be recognized through federal legislation and operate alongside existing Canadian law. It can also be paramount over inconsistent provincial law. Rather than treating Indigenous governance as a delegation of power, the Court acknowledged its constitutional status and affirmed Parliament's ability to support Indigenous self-determination through legislative incorporation consistent with section 35 and Canada's commitments under UNDRIP.

This chapter proceeds in four parts, each reflecting a distinctive doctrinal era and shift in constitutional logic.

Part I surveys the early jurisprudence, including St. Catherine's Milling and the Reference re Eskimos, to explore how s. 91(24) was conceived as a mechanism for centralized federal control. These cases grounded the federal head of power in assumptions of racial classification and administrative necessity, setting the stage for a century of paternalistic governance.

Part II turns to the rejection of the enclave theory and the emergence of interjurisdictional immunity as a tool for protecting a constitutionally insulated "core of Indianness." Cases such as Cardinal, Natural Parents, and Dick introduced and refined this doctrine. Delgamuukw showed how interjurisdictional immunity could protect Indigenous interests in holding that provinces did not have the constitutional authority to extinguish aboriginal rights or title. Yet the Court's later decisions in Kitkatla, Paul, and NIL/TU,O reflect the limits of this framework, as provincial authority was increasingly allowed to operate, even in matters deeply connected to Indigenous lands and culture.

Part III traces the decline of interjurisdictional immunity, the rise of cooperative federalism, and how this impacted the interpretation of s.91(24). In Tsilhqot'in and Grassy Narrows, the Court definitively rejected the use of interjurisdictional immunity to protect section 35 rights emphasizing that such infringements must instead be dealt with under the section 35 framework.

Part IV concludes with Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5, in which the Supreme Court affirmed Parliament's authority to give effect to Indigenous rights of self-government by incorporating Indigenous laws as federal law. The decision frames s. 91(24) as a site of relational obligation, capable of supporting Indigenous jurisdiction and advancing the project of legislative reconciliation in line with both section 35 and Canada's commitments under the UN Declaration. In this, it reconnects s. 91(24) with the obligations that the federal Crown inherited from the imperial Crown, viewing Indigenous–Crown relations as continuous and constitutionally entrenched rather than discretionary.

These materials and commentary invite reflection on how section 91(24) has evolved, from an instrument of centralized control to a potential foundation for a constitutional order that incorporates Indigenous peoples as distinct political communities and constitutional partners. They also prompt broader questions about the structure of Canadian federalism and the possibilities of Indigenous jurisdictional regeneration in a renewed constitutional framework. There are, of course, other ways one might organize these materials. Our hope here is that this structure provides the reader a way to see the development of the doctrine in its broad sweep, such that better sense might be made of some of the many matters addressed in the case law.

2 Founding interpretations and the architecture of control

This Part traces the origins of section 91(24) within the broader constitutional design of 1867 and examines how early courts understood federal jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians."

The initial jurisprudence treated Indigenous peoples as subjects of a centralized administrative regime, empowering Parliament to exercise plenary authority over Indigenous persons and lands in the interest of national development and legal uniformity. In St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Company v. The Queen, 1888 CanLII 209 (UK JCPC), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council embedded this view by characterizing Aboriginal land interests as non-proprietary, confirming that the Crown acquired radical or underlying title upon asserting sovereignty, and interpreting s. 91(24) as authorizing federal oversight of "Indian affairs generally." In Reference as to whether "Indians" includes in s. 91 (24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo in habitants of the Province of Quebec, 1939 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1939] SCR 104 the Court extended the personal reach of the "Indians" head to include Inuit peoples, reinforcing the idea that s. 91(24) was a vehicle for federal control, not constitutional recognition.

The cases in this Part illustrate how early interpretations of s. 91(24) rested on racialized and assimilationist assumptions that justified federal intervention while denying the existence of Indigenous law, governance, and autonomy. At the same time, they reveal how doctrine was used to exclude provinces from this domain, consolidating federal power without acknowledging federal obligation. This foundational period helped entrench the logic of central control that would continue to structure later developments in both federalism and Aboriginal law.

2.1 Reference as to whether "Indians" includes in s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo in habitants of the Province of Quebec

Reference as to whether "Indians" includes in s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo in habitants of the Province of Quebec*, 1939 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1939] SCR 104

The judgment of the Chief Justice and Davis and Hudson JJ. (Crocket J. concurring) was delivered by

The Chief Justice—

The reference with which we are concerned arises out of a controversy between the Dominion and the province of Quebec touching the question whether the Eskimo inhabitants of that province are "Indians" within the contemplation of head no. 24 of section 91 of the British North America Act which is in these words, "Indians and Lands Reserved for Indians"; and under the reference we are to pronounce upon that question.

Among the inhabitants of the three provinces, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Canada that, by the immediate operation of the British North America Act, became subject to the constitutional enactments of that statute there were few, if any, Eskimo. But the British North America Act contemplated the eventual admission into the Union of other parts of British North America as is explicitly declared in the preamble and for which provision is made by section 146 thereof.

Evidence as to subsequent official usage is adduced in a letter of 1824 from the Advocate General of Canada to the Assistant Civil Secretary on some matter of a criminal prosecution in which "Esquimaux Indians" are concerned; and in a report of 1869 by Judge Pinsent of the Court of Labrador to the Governor of Newfoundland in which this sentence occurs:

> In this number about 300 Indians and half-breeds of the Esquimaux and Mountaineer races are included.

Reports from missionaries and clergymen are significant. I refer particularly to two. There is a communication in 1821 by the Unitas Fratrum sent to Admiral Hamilton, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Newfoundland and Labrador, on a visit by H.M.S. Clinker to their settlements. In this the Eskimo are mentioned as "Esquimaux Indians" and "Esquimaux Tribes" and the report concludes with a table giving the numbers of "Esquimaux Indians who have embraced the Christian religion" at the various stations.

In 1849, a report from the Bishop of Newfoundland was printed and published in London for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel by the Bishop of London with a prefatory letter and seems to have been put into circulation through Rivingtons and other booksellers. Extracts from this report, which describes a visit to Labrador, are produced in the Quebec case, and … these passages exemplify in a remarkable way the use of the term Indian, as designating the Eskimo inhabitants of Labrador as well as other classes of Indians there.

Having regard to the well established usage of designating the Esquimaux of Labrador as Indians or Esquimaux Indians, evidenced by the Proclamations of the Governors of Newfoundland, and other official and unofficial documents, one finds little difficulty in appreciating the significance of the phraseology of the correspondence, in 1879, between Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Hector Langevin on the subject of the Eskimo on the north shore of the St. Lawrence. The phrase "Esquimaux Indians" is employed in this correspondence as it had been employed for a hundred years in official and other documents to designate the Labrador Esquimaux. In 1882, three years after the date of this correspondence, the sale of intoxicating liquors to "Esquimaux Indians" was prohibited by an Act of the Legislature of Newfoundland.

Newfoundland, including the territory inhabited by these Labrador Eskimo was, as already pointed out, one of the British North American colonies the union of which with Canada was contemplated by the British North America Act. Thus it appears that, through all the territories of British North America in which there were Eskimo, the term "Indian" was employed by well established usage as including these as well as the other aborigines;' and I repeat the British North America Act, in so far as it deals with the subject of Indians, must, in my opinion, be taken to contemplate the Indians of British North America as a whole.

As against this evidence, the Dominion appeals to the Royal Proclamation of 1763 as furnishing the clue to the true meaning and application of the term "Indians" in section 91. The Indians therein referred to are said to be > the same type of aborigines as are described in that Proclamation as "the several nations or tribes of Indian with whom We are connected and who live under Our protection."

First, it is said that the terms "nation" and "tribe" are not employed in relation to the Eskimo. That is a proposition which finds no support in the documents produced dealing with the Labrador Eskimo; and, as regards the Eskimo inhabiting the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, they, as already pointed out, are (in the tables in the margin of the Hudson's Bay Company's aboriginal map) included in the statement of "Indian tribes" in those territories and they are in the list of "Indian nations" once dwelling east of the Mississippi.

Then it is said they were never "connected" with the British Crown or "under the protection" of the Crown. I find some difficulty in affirming that the Eskimo and other Indians ruled by the Hudson's Bay Company, under either charter or licence from the Crown, were never under the protection of the Crown, and in understanding how, especially in view of the Proclamations cited, that can be affirmed of the Esquimaux of northeastern Labrador. I cannot give my adherence to the principle of interpretation of the British North America Act which, in face of the ample evidence of the broad denotation of the term "Indian" as employed to designate the aborigines of Labrador and the Hudson's Bay territories as evidenced by the documents referred to, would impose upon that term in the British North America Act a narrower interpretation by reference to the recitals of and the events leading up to the Proclamation of 1763. For analogous reasons I am unable to accept the list of Indian tribes attached to the instructions to Sir Guy Carleton as controlling the scope of the term "Indians" in the British North America Act. Here it may be observed parenthetically that if this list of tribes does not include Eskimo, as apparently it does not, neither does it appear to include the Montagnais Indians inhabiting the north shore of the St. Lawrence east of the Saguenay or the Blackfeet or the Cree or the Indians of the Pacific Coast.

Another argument advanced by counsel for the Crown is based upon the supposed contrast between the language used in Articles 31 and 32 of the Instructions to Sir Guy Carleton and that used in relation to the Eskimo in Article 37. It has already been pointed out that, in the official documents relating to the Labrador Eskimo, the words "savages" and "Indians" are used convertibly; that in General Murray's Report in 1762 the Montagnais, the Hurons and the Eskimo are all spoken of as "savages"; and in Article 31 of Sir Guy Carleton's Instructions, the term "savages" is applied to the Indians of Illinois, the straits of Detroit, Michilimackinac and Gaspe; and, in Article 32, the term "savages" is applied to the Indians affected by the Royal Proclamation in 1763 and within the scope of the plan of 1764. I can find nothing in the language of these instructions which militates against the inference which, as already explained, seems to me to arise from the documents mentioned above having relation to the Labrador Eskimo.

Nor do I think that the fact that British policy in relation to the Indians, as evidenced in the Instructions to Sir Guy Carleton and the Royal Proclamation of 1763, did not contemplate the Eskimo (along with many other tribes and nations of British North American aborigines) as within the scope of that policy is either conclusive or very useful in determining the question before us. For that purpose, for construing the term "Indians" in the British North America Act in order to ascertain the scope of the provisions of that Act defining the powers of the Parliament of Canada, the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons in 1857 and the documents relating to the Labrador Eskimo are, in my opinion, far more trustworthy guides.

Nor can I agree that the context (in head no. 24) has the effect of restricting the term "Indians." If "Indians" standing alone in its application to British North America denotes the aborigines, then the fact that there were aborigines for whom lands had not been reserved seems to afford no good reason for limiting the scope of the term "Indians" itself.

For these reasons I think the question referred to us should be answered in the affirmative.

2.2 St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co v The Queen

St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co v The Queen*, 1888 CanLII 209 (UK JCPC)

Had its Indian inhabitants been the owners in fee simple of the territory which they surrendered by the treaty of 1873, Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mercer, 8 App. Cas. 767, might have been an authority for holding that the Province of Ontario could derive no benefit from the cession, in respect that the land was not vested in the Crown at the time of the union. But that was not the character of the Indian interest. The Crown has all along had a present proprietary estate in the land, upon which the Indian title was a mere burden. The ceded territory was at the time of the union, land vested in the Crown, subject to "an interest other than that of the Province in the same," within the meaning of sec. 109; and must now belong to Ontario in terms of that clause, unless its rights have been taken away by some provision of the Act of 1867 other than those already noticed.

In the course of the argument the claim of the Dominion to the ceded territory was rested upon the provisions of sec. 91(24), which in express terms confer upon the Parliament of Canada power to make laws for "Indians, and lands reserved for the Indians." It was urged that the exclusive power of legislation and administration carried with it, by necessary implication, any patrimonial interest which the Crown might have had in the reserved lands. In reply to that reasoning, counsel for Ontario referred us to a series of provincial statutes prior in date to the Act of 1867, for the purpose of showing that the expression "Indian reserves" was used in legislative language to designate certain lands in which the Indians had, after the royal proclamation of 1763, acquired a special interest, by treaty or otherwise, and did not apply to land occupied by them in virtue of the proclamation. The argument might have deserved consideration if the expression had been adopted by the British Parliament in 1867, but it does not occur in sec. 91(24), and the words actually used are, according to their natural meaning, sufficient to include all lands reserved, upon any terms or conditions, for Indian occupation. It appears to be the plain policy of the Act that, in order to ensure uniformity of administration, all such lands, and Indian affairs generally, shall be under the legislative control of one central authority.

Their Lordships are, however, unable to assent to the argument for the Dominion founded on sec. 91(24). There can be no a priori probability that the British Legislature, in a branch of the statute which professes to deal only with the distribution of legislative power, intended to deprive the Province of rights which are expressly given them in that branch of it which relates to the distribution of revenues and assets. The fact that the power of legislating for Indians, and for lands which are reserved to their use, has been entrusted to the Parliament of the Dominion is not in the least degree inconsistent with the right of the Provinces to them as a source of revenue whenever the estate of the Crown is disencumbered of the Indian title.

By the treaty of 1873 the Indian inhabitants ceded and released the territory in dispute, in order that it might be opened up for settlement, immigration, and such other purposes as to Her Majesty might seem fit, "to the Government of the Dominion of Canada," for the Queen and Her successors for ever. It was argued that a cession in these terms was in effect a conveyance to the Dominion Government of the whole rights of the Indians, with the consent of the Crown. That is not the natural import of the language of the treaty, which purports to be from beginning to end a transaction between the Indians and the Crown. Even if its language had been more favourable to the argument of the Dominion upon this point, it is abundantly clear that the commissioners who represented Her Majesty, whilst they had full authority to accept a surrender to the Crown, had neither authority nor power to take away from Ontario the interest which had been assigned to the province by the Imperial Statute of 1867.

These considerations appear to their Lordships to be sufficient for the disposal of this appeal. The treaty leaves the Indians no right whatever to the timber growing upon the lands which they gave up, which is now fully vested in the Crown, all revenues derivable from the sale of such portions of it as are situate within the boundaries of Ontario being the property of that Province. The fact, that it still possesses exclusive power to regulate the Indian's privilege of hunting and fishing, cannot confer upon the Dominion power to dispose, by issuing permits or otherwise, of that beneficial interest in the timber which has now passed to Ontario. Seeing that the benefit of the surrender accrues to her, Ontario must, of course, relieve the Crown, and the Dominion, of all obligations involving the payment of money which were undertaken by Her Majesty, and which are said to have been in part fulfilled by the Dominion Government. There may be other questions behind, with respect to the right to determine to what extent, and at what periods, the disputed territory, over which the Indians still exercise their avocations of hunting and fishing, is to be taken up for settlement or other purposes, but none of these questions are raised for decision in the present suit.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada ought to be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed. It appears to them that there ought to be no costs of the appeal.

3 The core of Indianness and the rejection of the enclave theory

This Part examines how Canadian courts, beginning in the 1970s, developed a more functional framework for determining when provincial laws apply to Indigenous peoples and lands. Rejecting the enclave model, the courts adopted a purpose-and-effect approach that allowed provincial laws of general application to operate, so long as they did not impair the protected "core" of federal jurisdiction under section 91(24).

In Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1973 CanLII 980 (SCC), [1974] SCR 695, the Court confirmed that provincial laws could apply on reserve if they did not affect matters at the heart of Indigeneity. In Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare et al., 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751, the Court suggested that aspects of Indigenous life, such as family relationships and cultural continuity, might be constitutionally insulated. Though the "core" was not yet explicitly defined, the case suggested limits on how deeply provincial laws could reach into matters central to Indigenous identity. Yet, in Four B Manufacturing v. United Garment Workers, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031 a provincial labour law was found to apply to a business operated on reserve. Together, these decisions suggested that while federal jurisdiction remained primary, the "core" of s.91(24) would be limited to matters pertaining to "Indians qua Indians" and the section would not operate as a strong jurisdictional shield.

That framework was clarified in Dick v. La Reine, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309, where the Court set out a two path analysis: provincial laws of general application apply of their own force (ex proprio vigore) unless they impair the protected core. Section 88 of the Indian Act plays a secondary role, reviving provincial laws only where they touch the core but do not conflict with federal legislation or treaty rights.

Any promise of constitutional protection, however, proved narrow. In Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, the Court upheld a provincial heritage statute that affected Indigenous burial and spiritual sites. It found that even provisions directly regulating Indigenous cultural materials did not impair the core of s. 91(24) so long as they were cast as laws of general application and aimed at broader public purposes. The Court narrowed the doctrine of "singling out," holding that a law does not single out Indigenous peoples merely because it addresses their interests explicitly. What mattered was whether the law balanced those interests in a way the Court deemed proportionate. In effect, the decision shrank the scope of exclusive federal jurisdiction and confirmed that most provincial regulation touching on Indigenous matters could fall under a double aspect.

That trajectory continued in NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45, which involved two Indigenous child welfare agencies whose employees sought to unionize. One agency served on-reserve communities, the other worked with urban Indigenous families. The issue was whether provincial or federal labour law applied. The Court unanimously found that jurisdiction over labour relations presumptively lies with the provinces. The court did not consider whether Indigenous communities might exercise jurisdiction over child welfare or labour relations, or why such authority might matter. As Abella J. put it for the majority: "There is no reason why, as a matter of principle, the jurisdiction of an entity's labour relations should be approached differently when s. 91(24) is at issue. The fundamental nature of the inquiry is - and should be - the same as for any other head of power" (NIL/TU,O, at para 20). The decision confirmed the Court's willingness to normalize provincial involvement even in areas deeply tied to Indigenous culture and governance.

The cases in this Part illustrate the ambivalence of this transitional period. Courts attempted to recognize a constitutional space for Indigenous cultural distinctiveness but did so within a legal structure that treated section 91(24) as discretionary and permitted significant provincial involvement. The "core of Indianness" doctrine insulated narrow aspects of identity but left Indigenous self-government and jurisdictional authority conceptually undeveloped.

3.1.1 Majority

Cardinal v Attorney General of Alberta*, 1973 CanLII 980 (SCC), [1974] SCR 695

The judgment of Fauteux C.J. and of Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie and Pigeon JJ. was delivered by

MARTLAND J.—

On December 8, 1970, the appellant, a treaty Indian, at his home on an Indian Reserve, in the Province of Alberta, sold a piece of moose meat to a non-Indian. He was charged with a breach of s. 37 of the Wildlife Act, R.S.A. 1970, c. 391, which provides:

37. No person shall traffic in any big game or any game bird except as is expressly permitted by this Act or by the regulations.

The trial judge found that the appellant had trafficked in big game within the meaning of this section. The appellant was acquitted on the ground that the Wildlife Act is ultra vires of the Alberta Legislature in its application to the appellant as an Indian on an Indian Reserve. A case was stated on this legal issue, which was considered by a judge of the Supreme Court of Alberta, who held that the decision was correct. An appeal was taken to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta, which allowed the appeal and overruled the judgment of the Court below. The present appeal is brought, with leave, to this Court.

Section 91(24) of the British North America Act, 1867, gives to the Parliament of Canada exclusive authority to legislate in respect of:

24. Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians.

An agreement was made between the Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta, dated December 14, 1929, hereinafter referred to as "the Agreement", for the transfer by the former to the latter of the interest of the Crown in all Crown lands, mines and minerals within the Province of Alberta, and the provisions of the Alberta Act were modified as in the Agreement set out.

The submission of the appellant is that the Parliament of Canada has exclusive legislative authority to legislate to control the administration of Indian Reserves and that Provincial laws cannot apply on such a Reserve unless referentially introduced through Federal legislation.

As indicated earlier, the appellant starts from the proposition that, prior to the making of the Agreement, Indian Reserves were enclaves which were withdrawn from the application of Provincial legislation, save by way of reference by virtue of Federal legislation. On this premise it is contended that s. 12 should not be construed so as to make Provincial game legislation applicable within Indian Reserves.

I am not prepared to accept this initial premise. Section 91(24) of the British North America Act, 1867, gave exclusive legislative authority to the Canadian Parliament in respect of Indians and over lands reserved for the Indians. Section 92 gave to each Province, in such Province, exclusive legislative power over the subjects therein defined. It is well established, as illustrated in Union Colliery Company v. Bryden, that a Province cannot legislate in relation to a subject matter exclusively assigned to the Federal Parliament by s. 91. But it is also well established that Provincial legislation enacted under a heading of s. 92 does not necessarily become invalid because it affects something which is subject to Federal legislation.

A Provincial Legislature could not enact legislation in relation to Indians, or in relation to Indian Reserves, but this is far from saying that the effect of s. 91(24) of the British North America Act, 1867, was to create enclaves within a Province within the boundaries of which Provincial legislation could have no application. In my opinion, the test as to the application of Provincial legislation within a Reserve is the same as with respect to its application within the Province and that is that it must be within the authority of s. 92 and must not be in relation to a subject-matter assigned exclusively to the Canadian Parliament under s. 91. Two of those subjects are Indians and Indian Reserves, but if Provincial legislation within the limits of s. 92 is not construed as being legislation in relation to those classes of subjects (or any other subject under s. 91) it is applicable anywhere in the Province, including Indian Reserves, even though Indians or Indian Reserves might be affected by it. My point is that s. 91(24) enumerates classes of subjects over which the Federal Parliament has the exclusive power to legislate, but it does not purport to define areas within a Province within which the power of a Province to enact legislation, otherwise within its powers, is to be excluded.

Cardinal v Attorney General of Alberta*, 1973 CanLII 980 (SCC), [1974] SCR 695

LASKIN J. (dissenting)—This appeal raises, for the first time in this Court, the question whether provincial game laws apply to a Treaty Indian on an Indian Reserve so as to make him liable to their penalties for engaging on the Reserve in activities prohibited by the provincial legislation. Although the issue in this case involves Alberta legislation, and hence requires a consideration of the Natural Resources Agreement between Canada and Alberta, as approved respectively by 1930 (Can.), c. 3 and 1930 (Alta.), c. 21 and confirmed by the British North America Act, 1930 (U.K.), c. 26, it eddies out to sister western Provinces which have like agreements with Canada and, in my opinion, is of equal import to Treaty Indians living on Reserves in Provinces east of Manitoba.

The Alberta Natural Resources Agreement is part of the constitutional order under which Canada and its respective Provinces exist, and the question arises whether and to what extent it affects and is affected by the distribution of legislative power under ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act. The issue in the present case engages, therefore, not only the relevant terms of the Alberta Natural Resources Agreement but also the exclusive federal power under s. 91(24) in relation to "Indians, and lands reserved for the Indians". In my opinion, there are parallel questions here of the extent, if any, to which provincial game laws may apply to Indians on a Reserve either in the face of the Alberta Natural Resources Agreement (or the Manitoba Natural Resources Agreement or the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Agreement, which have like provisions on the matter in issue) or in the face of unexercised federal legislative power under s. 91(24). In this latter respect, I repeat time-tested words from Union Colliery Co. v. Bryden, which express what is now a constitutional axiom:

The abstinence of the Dominion Parliament from legislating to the full limit of its powers, could not have the effect of transferring to any provincial legislature the legislative power which had been assigned to the Dominion by s. 91 of the Act of 1867.

I propose to deal first with the effect of s. 91(24) upon the reach of provincial game laws. Apart entirely from the exclusive power vested in the Parliament of Canada to legislate in relation to Indians, its exclusive power in relation also to Indian Reserves puts such tracts of land, albeit they are physically in a Province, beyond provincial competence to regulate their use or to control resources thereon. This is not because of any title vested in the Parliament of Canada or in the Crown in right of Canada, but because regardless of ultimate title, it is only Parliament that may legislate in relation to Reserves once they have been recognized or set aside as such.

Where land in a Province is, as in the present case, an admitted Indian Reserve, its administration and the law applicable thereto, so far at least as Indians thereon are concerned, depend on federal legislation. Indian Reserves are enclaves which, so long as they exist as Reserves, are withdrawn from provincial regulatory power. If provincial legislation is applicable at all, it is only by referential incorporation through adoption by the Parliament of Canada. This is seen in the Indian Act, with which I will deal later in these reasons.

The significance of the allocation of exclusive legislative power to Parliament in relation to Indian Reserves merits emphasis in terms of the kind of enclave that a Reserve is. It is a social and economic community unit, with its own political structure as well according to the prescriptions of the Indian Act. The underlying title (that is, upon surrender) may well be in the Province, but during its existence as such a Reserve, in my opinion, is no more subject to provincial legislation than is federal Crown property; and it is no more subject to provincial regulatory authority than is any other enterprise falling within exclusive federal competence.

I do not wish to overdraw analogies. It would strike me as quite strange, however, that when provincial competence is denied in relation to land held by the Crown in right of Canada (see Spooner Oils Ltd. v. Turner Valley Gas Conservation Board), or in relation to land upon which a federal service is operated (see Reference re Saskatchewan Minimum Wage Act), or in relation to land integral to the operation of a private enterprise that is within exclusive federal competence (see Campbell-Bennett Ltd. v. Comstock Midwestern Ltd.), there should be any doubt about the want of provincial competence in relation to lands that are within s. 91(24). There is, in my opinion, nothing in such cases as C.P.R. v. Notre Dame de Bonsecours that shake this view since that case dealt with the application of provincial legislation to a railway within federal jurisdiction in a matter not integral to its operation.

> Nor need I in this case consider whether, in the absence of federal legislation, provincial legislation touching the personal status and relationships of persons on a Reserve, as for example, respecting marriage or custody or adoption of children, is validly applicable; or, similarly, whether provincial commercial law would apply, absent federal legislation. The present case concerns the regulation and administration of the resources of land comprised in a Reserve, and I can conceive of nothing more integral to that land as such. If the federal power given by s. 91(24) does not preclude the application of such provincial legislation to Indian Reserves, the power will have lost the exclusiveness which is ordained by the Constitution.
> I think it is important here, no less than in relation to other heads of federal power, to scotch any notion that s. 91(24) exists by subtraction from some larger head of provincial authority, e.g. property and civil rights in the Province, and hence is of limited scope, leaving an area of competence to the Province where there has been no federal legislation. My brother Judson dealt with this very point in another context in Nykorak v. Attorney-General of Canada.
> Since federal power in relation to "lands reserved for the Indians" is independent and exclusive, its content must embrace administrative control and regulatory authority over Indian Reserves. Hence, not only provincial game laws but other provincial regulatory legislation can have no application, of its own force, to such Reserves, at least where it is sought to subject Indians thereon to such legislation.
> I would allow the appeal and restore the order of Sinclair J. who answered favourably to the accused the point of law which was the subject of a stated case.

3.2 Natural Parents v Superintendent of Child Welfare et al.

The rejection of the enclave theory in Cardinal marked a doctrinal turning point. Rather than treating reserves as constitutionally immune spaces, the Court accepted that provincial laws of general application could apply on reserve, provided they did not impair federal jurisdiction. This reoriented the analysis from geography to function and signaled a willingness to accommodate provincial authority.

Yet Cardinal left unresolved a deeper question: could provincial laws be barred not only because they applied to reserve lands, but because they touched the heart of Indigenous identity? That possibility was considered in Natural Parents. The Court turned to the cultural and familial dimensions of Indigeneity. Although the decision did not articulate a "core of Indianness" doctrine in express terms, it suggested that certain aspects of Indigenous life might attract constitutional protection from provincial interference.

> The question in this appeal concerns the validity of an adoption order made in respect of a male Indian child in favour of a non-Indian couple who had provided a foster home for the child. The child's natural parents, who were registered members of a band under the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, he too being entitled to registration thereunder, objected to the adoption, but it was held at first instance that their consent should be dispensed with. No objection is taken to the regularity of the adoption proceedings, but a constitutional question was raised in respect of the Adoption Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 4 and, more particularly, in respect of that Act as amended by the addition thereto of s. 10(4a) by 1973 (B.C.) (2nd sess.), c. 95, s. 1. Connected to this question is the effect of s. 88 of the Indian Act.

> I do not, however, agree with the British Columbia Court of Appeal that there was no referential incorporation in this case. Whether there was or was not depends not only on the meaning and scope of the phrase "all laws of general application from time to time in force in any province" in s. 88 of the Indian Act, but, as well and preliminarily, on the relation between so-called provincial laws of general application and federal legislative powers in relation to matters that, absent federal legislation, are alleged to be governed by those provincial laws in some of their aspects. In this connection I draw attention to the judgment of this Court in The Queen v. George, in which Martland J. pointed out at pp. 280-281 that the now s. 88 (it was then s. 87) in speaking of "laws of general application from time to time in force in any province" referred to "those rules of law in a province which are provincial in scope", including laws of England adopted as part of provincial law.
> There was no challenge in this Court to the general and long-established proposition found in Union Colliery Co. of British Columbia Ltd. v. Bryden, at p. 588 that "the abstinence of the Dominion Parliament from legislating to the full limit of its powers could not have the effect of transferring to any provincial legislature the legislative power which had been assigned to the Dominion by s. 91 of the Act of 1867". It cannot be said therefore that because a provincial statute is general in its operation, in the sense that its terms are not expressly restricted to matters within provincial competence, it may embrace matters within exclusive federal competence.
> Ex facie, and apart from the amendment of 1973 introducing s. 10(4a), the Adoption Act did not purport to extend to areas of exclusive federal competence, e.g. Indians. It could only embrace them if the operation of the Act did not deal with what was integral to that head of federal legislative power, there being no express federal legislation respecting adoption of Indians. It appears to me to be unquestionable that for the provincial Adoption Act to apply to the adoption of Indian children of registered Indians, who could be compelled thereunder to surrender them to adopting non-Indian parents, would be to touch "Indianness", to strike at a relationship integral to a matter outside of provincial competence. This is entirely apart from the question whether, if referentially incorporated, the Adoption Act could have any force in the face of various provisions of the Indian Act, securing certain benefits for Indians.
> Counsel for the respondents cited a number of cases holding Indians to be subject to provincial legislation. Among them was Rex v. Hill and Rex v. Martin. These, and other like cases, are simply illustrative of the amenability of Indians off their reservations to provincial regulatory legislation, legislation which, like traffic legislation, does not touch their "Indianness". Such provincial legislation is of a different class than adoption legislation which would, if applicable as provincial legislation simpliciter, constitute a serious intrusion into the Indian family relationship. It is difficult to conceive what would be left of exclusive federal power in relation to Indians if such provincial legislation was held to apply to Indians. Certainly, if it was applicable because of its so-called general application, it would be equally applicable by expressly embracing Indians. Exclusive federal authority would then be limited to a registration system and to regulation of life on a reserve.

It is contended, however, that, notwithstanding the absence of federal legislation on the subject, to the extent that the Adoption Act might purport to govern the adoption of Indian children it would constitute an encroachment upon the exclusive federal jurisdiction, under s. 91(24) of the British North America Act, to legislate on the subject of "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians."

Subsection (24) of s. 91 is unlike the other subsections of that section (other than subs. 25) in that it confers legislative jurisdiction on the Parliament of Canada in relation to a specified group of people. The ambit of that authority is uncertain, in that it has not been positively defined by the Courts. Within certain limits this includes the power to define Indian status, and this power has been exercised by Parliament by the enactment of the Indian Act. In my opinion it does not mean that Parliament alone can enact legislation which may affect Indians. It does not mean that Indians are totally exempted from the application of provincial laws. A number of cases dealing with the application of provincial laws to Indians were mentioned in the judgment of this Court in Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta. The extent to which provincial legislation could apply to Indians was stated to be that the legislation must be within the authority of s. 92 of the British North America Act and that the legislation must not be enacted in relation to Indians. Such legislation, generally applicable throughout the province, could affect Indians.

In the present case we have provincial social legislation, applicable throughout British Columbia, dealing with the subject of the adoption of children. Is the scope of s. 91(24) such that it makes it impossible for an Indian child to be adopted under the provisions of the Adoption Act? In support of the proposition that subs. (24) has that effect it is argued that the Adoption Act can compel Indian parents to surrender their child to non-Indian parents. But, under the provisions of the Adoption Act, no Indian child could be adopted by anyone without the parents' consent unless the child had been made a permanent ward of the Superintendent of Child Welfare, or of a children's aid society, or unless consent of the parents is dispensed with because the child has been abandoned or deserted, or because of failure to contribute to the child's support, or because the parent is a person whose consent, in the opinion of the Court, in all the circumstances of the case, ought to be dispensed with.

These exceptions to the general rule requiring the consent of a child's natural parents to an adoption are all cases in which the child is in need of protection.

The Protection of Children Act, R.S.B.C. 1960, c. 303, as amended, makes provision for the committal of children in need of protection to the custody of the Superintendent of Child Welfare or to a children's aid society, and for the placement of such children in a foster home. The Indian child in the present case was a ward of the Superintendent of Child Welfare and had been placed in the custody of the petitioners on an official foster home basis.

Both the Protection of Children Act and the Adoption Act are designed for the protection, custody and care of children in the Province of British Columbia. In my opinion the power given to Parliament, under s. 91(24), to legislate on the subject matter of "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" does not make such legislation inapplicable to Indian children, in the absence of federal legislation dealing with the matter, merely because the designated authorities under those statutes might consider it appropriate, in certain circumstances, in the child's interest, to entrust custody of such child to a foster home, or to parents by adoption, who were not themselves Indians. I do not interpret s. 91(24) as manifesting an intention to maintain a segregation of Indians from the rest of the community in matters of this kind, and, accordingly, it is my view that the application of the Adoption Act to Indian children will only be prevented if Parliament, in the exercise of its powers under that subsection, has legislated in a manner which would preclude its application.

3.3 Four B Manufacturing v United Garment Workers

While Natural Parents suggested that section 91(24) might shield certain familial and cultural relationships from provincial intrusion, it left open how such protection would operate alongside broader provincial regulatory regimes. The Court offered no doctrinal test for identifying the limits of provincial authority, and the judgments made only passing reference to section 88 of the Indian Act, leaving its function largely unsettled. Nor did the Court address how its reasoning might apply beyond child welfare, to economic activity, governance, or other dimensions of Indigenous life.

Shortly afterward, in Four B, the Court signaled a flexible approach. The case involved union certification for a business operating on reserve. Rather than invoking interjurisdictional immunity or identity-based concerns, the Court applied the double aspect doctrine (see Chapter 6, Part 3) to uphold provincial labour law. It treated the enterprise as functionally indistinct from other provincially regulated employers and made no reference to the cultural or constitutional character of the nation.

The juxtaposition of these cases reveals a tension in the doctrine. Natural Parents gestured toward a protective reading of s. 91(24), grounded in Indigenous identity and cultural continuity. Four B, by contrast, reflected a federalism logic geared toward administrative coherence. This unresolved tension, between constitutional protection rooted in identity and a model of jurisdiction based on regulatory functionality, would continue to shape and constrain the doctrine in the decades that followed.

3.3.1 Majority

Four B Manufacturing v United Garment Workers*, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031

The judgment of Martland, Pigeon, Dickson, Beetz, Estey, Pratte and McIntyre JJ. was delivered by

BEETZ J.—

This is an appeal from an order of the Ontario Court of Appeal dismissing an appeal by the Appellant, (Four B) from an order of the Divisional Court for the Province of Ontario dismissing an application for judicial review of two decisions of the Ontario Labour Relations Board, (the Board). The application for judicial review sought inter alia (1) an order quashing an order of the Board certifying the United Garment Workers of America as the bargaining agent for the employees of Four B at its plant on the Tyendinaga Indian Reserve No. 38; (2) an order quashing another decision of the Board directing Four B to reinstate four of its employees; and (3) a declaration that the Board was without jurisdiction to make the said decisions or to apply the provisions of The Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 232, to the activities of Four B or its employees on the Reserve.

The facts do not appear to be in dispute.

Four B was incorporated pursuant to the laws of Ontario to carry on business as a manufacturer of shoes on the Tyendinaga Indian Reserve No. 38, a reserve set aside for the Band of Indians known as the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinte. All of the issued shares of Four B are held by four brothers named Brant, all of whom are members of the Band.

The business or operation of Four B consists entirely in the sewing of uppers on contract for the Bata North Star Jogger, a shoe manufactured by the Bata Shoe Company.

Four B is in no way owned or controlled by the Band Council which will have no share in its profits. It had first been contemplated that the plant be owned and operated by the Band, but the majority of the Band voted against this project, apparently for some fiscal reasons; it was at that point that the Brant brothers decided to own and operate the plant privately, originally under the corporate name of Tyendinaga Mohawk

Limited. However the Band Council took the view that the use of this name would not be in the best interest of the Reserve and it was changed for the present one.

Four B occupies premises upon the Reserve pursuant to a three year renewable permit issued by Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada with the approval of the Band Council. The permit, which creates no tenancy and can be cancelled at the discretion of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, provides in part as follows:

> That the Permittee will give preference in employment to local people for work in the permit area, however, if there are not sufficient applications from local area, the Permittee shall have the right to request assistance from Canada Manpower to fill the staff requirements from the surrounding districts.

Four B has received from the Government of Canada a total of $284,000 of which $51,000 represents a grant and the remainder borrowed funds. These monies were advanced pursuant to programs of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, designed to promote co-operation between Indian and non-Indian businessmen in order to assist Indians in developing and expanding viable businesses and to create jobs for Indians, on and off reserves.

At the relevant time, Four B employed 68 persons, of whom 48 were Band members, 10 were former Band members and 10 were non-Indians.

The issue is whether The Labour Relations Act applies to the activities of Four B and its employees and the Board had jurisdiction to make the two decisions under review.

In my view the established principles relevant to this issue can be summarized very briefly. With respect to labour relations, exclusive provincial legislative competence is the rule, exclusive federal competence is the exception. The exception comprises, in the main, labour relations in undertakings, services and businesses which, having regard to the functional test of the nature of their operations and their normal activities, can be characterized as federal undertakings, services or businesses:

There is nothing about the business or operation of Four B which might allow it to be considered as a federal business: the sewing of uppers on sport shoes is an ordinary industrial activity which clearly comes under provincial legislative authority for the purposes of labour relations. Neither the ownership of the business by Indian shareholders, nor the employment by that business of a majority of Indian employees, nor the carrying on of that business on an Indian reserve under a federal permit, nor the federal loan and subsidies, taken separately or together, can have any effect on the operational nature of that business. By the traditional and functional test, therefore, The Labour Relations Act applies to the facts of this case, and the Board has jurisdiction.

What is submitted on behalf of appellant is that the matter to be regulated in the case at bar is the civil rights of Indians on a reserve; that this matter falls under the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament to make laws relating to "Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians" pursuant to s. 91.24 of the British North America Act, 1867; that provincial law is inapplicable to this matter even in the absence of relevant federal law; and, alternatively, that the field is occupied by the paramount provisions of the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1. It is argued that the functional test is inappropriate and ought to be disregarded where legislative competence is conferred not in terms relating to physical objects, things or systems, but to persons or groups of persons such as Indians or aliens.

I cannot agree with these submissions.

The functional test is a particular method of applying a more general rule namely, that exclusive federal jurisdiction over labour relations arises only if it can be shown that such jurisdiction forms an integral part of primary federal jurisdiction over some other federal object: the Stevedoring case.

I think it is an oversimplification to say that the matter which falls to be regulated in the case at bar is the civil rights of Indians. The matter is broader and more complex: it involves the rights of Indians and non-Indians to associate with one another for labour relations purposes, purposes which are not related to "Indianness"; it involves their relationship with the United Garment Workers of America or some other trade union about which there is nothing inherently Indian; it finally involves their collective bargaining with an employer who happens to be an Ontario corporation, privately owned by Indians, but about which there is nothing specifically Indian either, the operation of which the Band has expressly refused to assume and from which it has elected to withdraw its name.

But even if the situation is considered from the sole point of view of Indian employees and as if the employer were an Indian, neither Indian status is at stake nor rights so closely connected with Indian status that they should be regarded as necessary incidents of status such for instance as registrability, membership in a band, the right to participate in the election of Chiefs and Band Councils, reserve privileges, etc. For this reason, I come to the conclusion that the power to regulate the labour relations in issue does not form an integral part of primary federal jurisdiction over Indians or Lands reserved for the Indians. Whether Parliament could regulate them in the exercise of its ancillary powers is a question we do not have to resolve any more than it is desirable to determine in the abstract the ultimate reach of potential federal paramountcy.

The conferring upon Parliament of exclusive legislative competence to make laws relating to certain classes of persons does not mean that the totality of these persons' rights and duties comes under primary federal competence to the exclusion of provincial laws of general application. In Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden, the British Columbia Coal Mines Regulations Act, 1890 provided that "no boy under the age of twelve years, and no woman and girl of any age shall be employed in or allowed to be for the purpose of employment in any mine to which the Act applies, below ground". The provision was amended by the insertion of the words "and no Chinaman" after the words "and no woman and girl of any age". The amendment was held to be ultra vires of the Province as relating to naturalization and aliens. But it was never suggested that the general prohibition to employ boys under the age of twelve years and women and girls of any age in any mine was not applicable to naturalized persons and aliens including persons of Chinese extraction.

A similar reasoning must prevail with respect to the application of provincial laws to Indians, as long as such laws do not single out Indians nor purport to regulate them qua Indians, and as long also as they are not superseded by valid federal law.

Counsel for appellant has also stressed that the civil rights in issue are not only the civil rights of Indians, but Indian civil rights exercised on a reserve. The import of this submission, as I understand it, is that the exclusive character of federal jurisdiction is somehow reinforced because it is derived from two related heads of federal authority instead of one, federal authority over Indians and over Lands reserved for the Indians.

In my view, this submission is an attempt to revive the enclave theory of the reserves in a modified version: provincial laws would not apply to Indians on reserves although they might apply to others. The enclave theory has been rejected by this Court in Cardinal v. Attorney General for Alberta and I see no reason to revive it even in a limited form. Section 91.24 of the British North America Act, 1867 assigns jurisdiction to Parliament over two distinct subject matters, Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians, not Indians on Lands reserved for the Indians. The power of Parliament to make laws in relation to Indians is the same whether Indians are on a reserve or off a reserve. It is not reinforced because it is exercised over Indians on a reserve any more than it is weakened because it is exercised over Indians off a reserve.

Under functional test Four B is not a federal work, undertaking or business, within the meaning of the Canada Labour Code. But should we have to solve the problem on the basis suggested by appellant, that is on the basis that Indians are "federal persons", I would adopt the following reason of Morden J. in the Divisional Court:

> Section 108 of the Code, by its language, is directed at federal activities, operations or functions and not at the position of individuals, or a class of individuals, who might be considered to be "federal" persons or at their relationships. The latter is not the subject matter of the section, (Contrast the method of defining the application of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-35, which is applicable to "all portions of the Public Service" (s. 3), and, also, the provisions of s. 109 of the Code applicable "in respect of any corporation established to perform any function or duty on behalf of the Government of Canada and in respect of employees of any such corporation").

The appeal should be dismissed with costs to the respondents, but there should be no order as to costs to or against the intervenors.

3.3.2 Dissent

Four B Manufacturing v United Garment Workers*, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)—The appellant is an incorporated Ontario company which operates a factory on a designated portion of an Indian reserve, pursuant to a permit for use and occupation of the area given by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development under s. 28(2) of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6. The Reserve is one set apart for the use and benefit of the Mohawks of the Bay of Quinte Band of Indians.

In my opinion, if the Band Council or any Indians, members of the Band, were to carry on a business on the Reserve, which would have to be with the consent of the Minister and the Band Council, as provided by ss. 18 and 28 of the Indian Act, and were to employ only Indians on the Reserve as employees, it would be beyond question that provincial labour relations legislation could not constitutionally be applicable to the employees and their employer. It would not matter in such a case if there was no federal legislation which could be invoked by the employees to form a trade union to seek certification on their behalf. The reason for this conclusion is simply that the activity involves only Indians on a reserve, as employees and employer, and is conducted by them on the Reserve. Nothing either in Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta or in Natural Parents et al. v. Superintendent of Child Welfare militates against this conclusion.

This brings me to consider whether the incorporation of the appellant company under Ontario legislation changes the situation. In my opinion, the incorporation does no more than give the Brant brothers, who are the only shareholders of the appellant company, a convenient method of carrying on a business which is a business operated by Indians for the benefit of Indians: cf. Re Kinookimaw Beach Association and Board of Revenue Commissioners. Of course, the company, qua company in respect of its corporate structure, is governed by Ontario legislation, but that does not mean that its business is also subject to provincial legislation as, for example, in respect of labour relations.

The proper inquiry in this case is not whether the Ontario Labour Relations Act applies to the enterprise of the appellant company and to the employees thereof, but rather whether Part V of the Canada Labour Code applies to them. In my opinion, however general be the application of the Ontario Labour Relations Act to businesses in the Province and to the employees thereof, it must give way in respect of businesses which are within federal regulatory authority and to federal legislation such as Part V of the Canada Labour Code embracing such businesses.

The combination of circumstances which govern the operation of the factory in the present case bring it, in my opinion, squarely within ss. 2 and 108(1) of the Canada Labour Code. There is the fact that the factory is operated by Indians and for Indians; it is operated on a reserve in a building leased from the Band Council; it is operated under a revocable licence issued by the responsible federal Minister with the approval of the Band Council and under terms set out in the licence or permit; it is financed by federal funds provided under the special Indian Economic Development Fund pursuant to four agreements of September 9, 1974, October 11, 1974, and two on July 8, 1976 for the stated purpose "of employing members of the Band in all positions possible and...for the benefit of the Band as a whole to improve their economic position and provide continuing employment for Band members"; and it is operated under the detailed provisions in the Indian Act and under the approvals therein prescribed.

These circumstances bring the appellant enterprise squarely within the opening words of s. 2 aforesaid, as being "an undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada". Consequently, in the words of s. 2(i), it is an undertaking or business outside the exclusive legislative authority of provincial legislatures. Section 108 applies to the employees of the appellant company since they are employed in connection with the operation of the appellant company's factory on the Reserve. It follows, therefore, that certification to enable a trade union to represent the employees of the appellant company must be sought under the Canada Labour Code.

I would, accordingly, allow the appeal, set aside the judgments below and quash the certification order made by the Ontario Labour Relations Board. The appellant company has not asked for costs and there will, therefore, be no order as to costs as between the parties and there will be no costs to or against any of the interveners.

3.4 Dick v La Reine

The Court's reasoning in Four B left open how courts should address provincial laws that intersect more directly with Indigenous practices, governance, or cultural expression. The method for identifying constitutional limits on provincial authority in such cases remained unclear.

The tension between the reach of provincial regulation and the protection of Indigenous identity was at issue in Dick. Unlike Four B, which concerned labour law applied to a business on reserve, Dick involved a provincial hunting regulation that directly affected Indigenous cultural practices. The Court responded by refining the analytical structure. It articulated the idea of a constitutionally protected "core of Indianness" and introduced a two-step inquiry: first, whether the provincial law impairs the core of federal jurisdiction under section 91(24); and second whether it could nonetheless apply through section 88 of the Indian Act, so long as it did not conflict with federal statutes or treaty rights. This framework formalized a doctrinal space for provincial involvement while offering limited protection for aspects of Indigenous life most closely tied to identity and culture.

Dick v La Reine*, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309

1. BEETZ J. —

I The facts

2. The facts are not in dispute. They are summarized by Lambert J.A., dissenting in the British Columbia Court of Appeal whose reasons for judgment are reported: R v. Dick (1982), 1982 CanLII 496 (BC CA), 3 C.C.C. (3d) 481. At pages 484-85, Lambert J.A. related the facts:

> Arthur Dick is a member of the Alkali Lake Band of the Shuswap people. He lives on the Alkali Lake Reserve in the Chilcotin District of the County of Cariboo. He is a non-treaty Indian.
> The Alkali Lake Band is comprised of about 10 families, or approximately 350 people, all told. They subsist in large measure by foraging. They catch fish for food and they kill deer and moose for food and other uses.
> The Shuswap word for May is "Pellcwewlemten". It means "time to go fishing". In response to this imperative Arthur Dick and two other band members, with two members of the Canoe Creek Band, set off on May 4, 1980, for Gustafsen Creek, where they intended to catch fish. On the way they passed Holdon Lake. There Arthur Dick killed a deer with a rifle. His purpose was to provide food for the members of the foraging party and for other band members. The carcass, cut up in pieces, was taken on to Gustafsen Creek where a provincial conservation officer and four R.C.M.P. constables found the five Indians in possession of dip nets, a number of rainbow trout, and the deer meat.

6. Appellant and respondent appear to agree in substance as to the issues raised by this appeal, save one. But they express them differently and I find it preferable to rephrase them as follows:

> 1. Is the practice of year-round foraging for food so central to the Indian way of life of the Alkali Lake Shuswap that it cannot be restricted by ss. 3(1) and 8(1) of the Wildlife Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 433, without impairment of their status and capacity as Indians, and invasion of the federal field under s. 91 (24) of the Constitution Act, 1867*?*
> 2. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative and, consequently, the Wildlife Act cannot apply ex proprio vigore to the appellant, then is this Act a law of general application referentially incorporated into federal law by s. 88 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6
> 3. Does this appeal raise a question of law alone for the purpose of s. 114 of the Offence Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 305?

7. The third issue was raised only by respondent.

8. In addition, a constitutional question was stated by the Chief Justice:

> Are ss. 3(1)(c) and 8(1) of the Wildlife Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 433, constitutionally inapplicable in the circumstances of this case on the ground that the restriction imposed by such sections affects the appellant qua Indian and therefore may only be enacted by the Parliament of Canada pursuant to s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867?

III The first issue

12. Appellant's main submission which was apparently presented in the Court of Appeal as an alternative argument, is that the Wildlife Act strikes at the core of Indianness, that the question stated in the first issue should accordingly be answered in the affirmative and that the Wildlife Act, while valid legislation, should be read down so as not to apply to appellant in the circumstances of the case at bar.

21. In Cardinal v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1973 CanLII 980 (SCC), [1974] SCR 695 at p. 706, it had already been held, apart from any evidence, that provincial game laws do not relate to Indians qua Indians. In the case at bar, there was considerable evidence capable of supporting the conclusions of Lambert J.A. to the effect that the Wildlife Act did impair the Indianness of the Alkali Lake Band, as well as the opposite conclusions of the courts below.

IV The second issue

25. In holding that the tests adopted by this Court in Kruger to determine whether a law is one of general application are the same tests which should be applied to determine whether the application of the Wildlife Act to appellant would regulate him in his Indianness, Lambert J.A. fell into error, in my respectful opinion. And this error resulted from a misapprehension of what was decided in Kruger as to the nature of a law of general application.

31. With all due deference, it seems to me that the correct view is the reverse one and that what Dickson J., as he then was, referred to in Kruger when he mentioned laws which had crossed the line of general application were laws which, either overtly or colourably, single out Indians for special treatment and impair their status as Indians. Effect and intent are both relevant. Effect can evidence intent. But in order to determine whether a law is not one of general application, the intent, purpose or policy of the legislation can certainly not be ignored: they form an essential ingredient of a law which discriminates between various classes of persons, as opposed to a law of general application.

35. It has already been held in Kruger that on its face, and in form, the Wildlife Act is a law of general application. In the previous chapter, I have assumed that its application to appellant would have the effect of regulating the latter qua Indian. However, it has not been demonstrated, in my view, that this particular impact has been intended by the provincial legislator. While it is assumed that the Wildlife Act impairs the status or capacity of appellant, it has not been established that the legislative policy of the Wildlife Act singles out Indians for special treatment or discriminates against them in any way.

36. I accordingly conclude that the Wildlife Act is a law of general application within the meaning of s. 88 of the Indian Act.

37. It remains to decide whether the Wildlife Act has been referentially incorporated to federal laws by s. 88 of the Indian Act.

45. I accordingly conclude that, in view of s. 88 of the Indian Act, the Wildlife Act applies to appellant even if, as I have assumed, it has the effect of regulating him qua Indian.

VI The constitutional question

54. I would answer the constitutional question as follows:

Sections 3(1) and 8(1) of the Wildlife Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 433, being laws of general application in the Province of British Columbia, are applicable to the appellant either by referential incorporation under s. 88 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, or of their own force.

3.5 Delgamuukw v British Columbia

Dick brought clarity to the interaction between provincial laws and Indigenous peoples. It did not contemplate Indigenous law-making authority or a federal obligation to protect Indigenous governance or culture. A decade later, in Delgamuukw v British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010, the Court deepened and expanded the meaning of the "core." It held that Aboriginal rights, including those recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), fall within the core of s. 91(24) and lie beyond the legislative competence of the provinces. That core, the Court explained, encompasses both land-based rights and practices not tied to territory, grounded respectively in the "lands reserved" and "Indians" heads of power. Aboriginal title fell squarely within federal jurisdiction and only the federal government could have extinguished it.

Crucially, the Court linked federal jurisdiction to the protection of Indigenous land and identity, not merely their regulation. It warned that separating federal authority over Indigenous peoples from authority over their lands would undermine the federal government's "primary constitutional responsibility for securing the welfare of Canada's aboriginal peoples" (para 176). This marked a subtle but important shift: s. 91(24) was no longer framed only as a basis for administrative authority, but as the constitutional mechanism through which the Crown was obliged to protect core Indigenous interests. Though the decision did not resolve the question of Indigenous self-government, it foreshadowed the re-emergence of the "obligation" conception of federal jurisdiction that would be considered more fully in later jurisprudence.

3.5.1 Majority

Delgamuukw v British Columbia*, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010

The judgment of Lamer C.J. and Cory and Major JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE—

I. Introduction

1 This appeal is the latest in a series of cases in which it has fallen to this Court to interpret and apply the guarantee of existing aboriginal rights found in s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Although that line of decisions, commencing with R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075, proceeding through the Van der Peet trilogy (R. v. Van der Peet, 1996 CanLII 216 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 507, R. v. N.T.C. Smokehouse Ltd., 1996 CanLII 159 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 672, and R. v. Gladstone, 1996 CanLII 160 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 723), and ending in R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 821, R. v. Adams, 1996 CanLII 169 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 101, and R. v. Côté, 1996 CanLII 170 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 139, have laid down the jurisprudential framework for s. 35(1), this appeal raises a set of interrelated and novel questions which revolve around a single issue -- the nature and scope of the constitutional protection afforded by s. 35(1) to common law aboriginal title.

4 Finally, given the existence of aboriginal title in British Columbia, this Court must address, on cross-appeal, the question of whether the province of British Columbia, from the time it joined Confederation in 1871, until the entrenchment of s. 35(1) in 1982, had jurisdiction to extinguish the rights of aboriginal peoples, including aboriginal title, in that province. Moreover, if the province was without this jurisdiction, a further question arises – whether provincial laws of general application that would otherwise be inapplicable to Indians and Indian lands could nevertheless extinguish aboriginal rights through the operation of s. 88 of the Indian Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-5.

IV. Issues

72 The following are the principal issues which must be addressed in this appeal. As will become apparent in my analysis, some of these issues in turn raise a number of sub-issues which I will address as well:

A. Do the pleadings preclude the Court from entertaining claims for aboriginal title and self-government?

B. What is the ability of this Court to interfere with the factual findings made by the trial judge?

C. What is the content of aboriginal title, how is it protected by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and what is required for its proof?

D. Has a claim to self-government been made out by the appellants?

E. Did the province have the power to extinguish aboriginal rights after 1871, either under its own jurisdiction or through the operation of s. 88 of the Indian Act?

E. Did the province have the power to extinguish aboriginal rights after 1871, either under its own jurisdiction or through the operation of s. 88 of the Indian Act?

(1) Introduction

172 For aboriginal rights to be recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), they must have existed in 1982. Rights which were extinguished by the sovereign before that time are not revived by the provision. In a federal system such as Canada's, the need to determine whether aboriginal rights have been extinguished raises the question of which level of government has jurisdiction to do so. In the context of this appeal, that general question becomes three specific ones. First, there is the question whether the province of British Columbia, from the time it joined Confederation in 1871, until the entrenchment of s. 35(1) in 1982, had the jurisdiction to extinguish the rights of aboriginal peoples, including aboriginal title, in that province. Second, if the province was without such jurisdiction, another question arises -- whether provincial laws which were not in pith and substance aimed at the extinguishment of aboriginal rights could have done so nevertheless if they were laws of general application. The third and final question is whether a provincial law, which could otherwise not extinguish aboriginal rights, be given that effect through referential incorporation by s. 88 of the Indian Act.

(2) Primary Jurisdiction

173 Since 1871, the exclusive power to legislate in relation to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" has been vested with the federal government by virtue of s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. That head of jurisdiction, in my opinion, encompasses within it the exclusive power to extinguish aboriginal rights, including aboriginal title.

"Lands reserved for the Indians"

174 I consider the second part of this provision first, which confers jurisdiction to the federal government over "Lands reserved for the Indians". The debate between the parties centred on whether that part of s. 91(24) confers jurisdiction to legislate with respect to aboriginal title. The province's principal submission is that "Lands reserved for the Indians" are lands which have been specifically set aside or designated for Indian occupation, such as reserves. However, I must reject that submission, because it flies in the face of the judgment of the Privy Council in St. Catherine's Milling. One of the issues in that appeal was the federal jurisdiction to accept the surrender of lands held pursuant to aboriginal title. It was argued that the federal government, at most, had jurisdiction over "Indian Reserves". Lord Watson, speaking for the Privy Council, rejected this argument, stating that had the intention been to restrict s. 91(24) in this way, specific language to this effect would have been used. He accordingly held that (at p. 59):

> . . . the words actually used are, according to their natural meaning, sufficient to include all lands reserved, upon any terms or conditions, for Indian occupation.

Lord Watson's reference to "all lands" encompasses not only reserve lands, but lands held pursuant to aboriginal title as well. Section 91(24), in other words, carries with it the jurisdiction to legislate in relation to aboriginal title. It follows, by implication, that it also confers the jurisdiction to extinguish that title.

175 The province responds by pointing to the fact that underlying title to lands held pursuant to aboriginal title vested with the provincial Crown pursuant to s. 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In its submission, this right of ownership carried with it the right to grant fee simples which, by implication, extinguish aboriginal title, and so by negative implication excludes aboriginal title from the scope of s. 91(24). The difficulty with the province's submission is that it fails to take account of the language of s. 109, which states in part that:

> 109. All Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada . . . at the Union . . . shall belong to the several Provinces . . . subject to any Trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any Interest other than that of the Province in the same.

Although that provision vests underlying title in provincial Crowns, it qualifies provincial ownership by making it subject to the "any Interest other than that of the Province in the same". In St. Catherine's Milling, the Privy Council held that aboriginal title was such an interest, and rejected the argument that provincial ownership operated as a limit on federal jurisdiction. The net effect of that decision, therefore, was to separate the ownership of lands held pursuant to aboriginal title from jurisdiction over those lands. Thus, although on surrender of aboriginal title the province would take absolute title, jurisdiction to accept surrenders lies with the federal government. The same can be said of extinguishment – although on extinguishment of aboriginal title, the province would take complete title to the land, the jurisdiction to extinguish lies with the federal government.

176 I conclude with two remarks. First, even if the point were not settled, I would have come to the same conclusion. The judges in the court below noted that separating federal jurisdiction over Indians from jurisdiction over their lands would have a most unfortunate result -- the government vested with primary constitutional responsibility for securing the welfare of Canada's aboriginal peoples would find itself unable to safeguard one of the most central of native interests — their interest in their lands. Second, although the submissions of the parties and my analysis have focussed on the question of jurisdiction over aboriginal title, in my opinion, the same reasoning applies to jurisdiction over any aboriginal right which relates to land. As I explained earlier, Adams clearly establishes that aboriginal rights may be tied to land but nevertheless fall short of title. Those relationships with the land, however, may be equally fundamental to aboriginal peoples and, for the same reason that jurisdiction over aboriginal title must vest with the federal government, so too must the power to legislate in relation to other aboriginal rights in relation to land.

"Indians"

177 The extent of federal jurisdiction over Indians has not been definitively addressed by this Court. We have not needed to do so because the vires of federal legislation with respect to Indians, under the division of powers, has never been at issue. The cases which have come before the Court under s. 91(24) have implicated the question of jurisdiction over Indians from the other direction -- whether provincial laws which on their face apply to Indians intrude on federal jurisdiction and are inapplicable to Indians to the extent of that intrusion. As I explain below, the Court has held that s. 91(24) protects a "core" of Indianness from provincial intrusion, through the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

178 It follows, at the very least, that this core falls within the scope of federal jurisdiction over Indians. That core, for reasons I will develop, encompasses aboriginal rights, including the rights that are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1). Laws which purport to extinguish those rights therefore touch the core of Indianness which lies at the heart of s. 91(24), and are beyond the legislative competence of the provinces to enact. The core of Indianness encompasses the whole range of aboriginal rights that are protected by s. 35(1). Those rights include rights in relation to land; that part of the core derives from s. 91(24)'s reference to "Lands reserved for the Indians". But those rights also encompass practices, customs and traditions which are not tied to land as well; that part of the core can be traced to federal jurisdiction over "Indians". Provincial governments are prevented from legislating in relation to both types of aboriginal rights.

(3) Provincial Laws of General Application

179 The vesting of exclusive jurisdiction with the federal government over Indians and Indian lands under s. 91(24), operates to preclude provincial laws in relation to those matters. Thus, provincial laws which single out Indians for special treatment are ultra vires, because they are in relation to Indians and therefore invade federal jurisdiction: see R. v. Sutherland, 1980 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1980] 2 SCR 451. However, it is a well-established principle that (Four B Manufacturing Ltd., supra, at p. 1048):

> The conferring upon Parliament of exclusive legislative competence to make laws relating to certain classes of persons does not mean that the totality of these persons' rights and duties comes under primary federal competence to the exclusion of provincial laws of general application.

In other words, notwithstanding s. 91(24), provincial laws of general application apply proprio vigore to Indians and Indian lands. Thus, this Court has held that provincial labour relations legislation (Four B) and motor vehicle laws (R. v. Francis, 1988 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 1025), which purport to apply to all persons in the province, also apply to Indians living on reserves.

180 What must be answered, however, is whether the same principle allows provincial laws of general application to extinguish aboriginal rights. I have come to the conclusion that a provincial law of general application could not have this effect, for two reasons. First, a law of general application cannot, by definition, meet the standard which has been set by this Court for the extinguishment of aboriginal rights without being ultra vires the province. That standard was laid down in Sparrow, supra, at p. 1099, as one of "clear and plain" intent. In that decision, the Court drew a distinction between laws which extinguished aboriginal rights, and those which merely regulated them. Although the latter types of laws may have been "necessarily inconsistent" with the continued exercise of aboriginal rights, they could not extinguish those rights. While the requirement of clear and plain intent does not, perhaps, require that the Crown "use language which refers expressly to its extinguishment of aboriginal rights" (Gladstone, supra, at para. 34), the standard is still quite high. My concern is that the only laws with the sufficiently clear and plain intention to extinguish aboriginal rights would be laws in relation to Indians and Indian lands. As a result, a provincial law could never, proprio vigore, extinguish aboriginal rights, because the intention to do so would take the law outside provincial jurisdiction.

181 Second, as I mentioned earlier, s. 91(24) protects a core of federal jurisdiction even from provincial laws of general application, through the operation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. That core has been described as matters touching on "Indianness" or the "core of Indianness" (Dick, supra, at pp. 326 and 315; also see Four B, supra, at p. 1047 and Francis, supra, at pp. 1028-29). The core of Indianness at the heart of s. 91(24) has been defined in both negative and positive terms. Negatively, it has been held to not include labour relations (Four B) and the driving of motor vehicles (Francis). The only positive formulation of Indianness was offered in Dick. Speaking for the Court, Beetz J. assumed, but did not decide, that a provincial hunting law did not apply proprio vigore to the members of an Indian band to hunt and because those activities were "at the centre of what they do and what they are" (at p. 320). But in Van der Peet, I described and defined the aboriginal rights that are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) in a similar fashion, as protecting the occupation of land and the activities which are integral to the distinctive aboriginal culture of the group claiming the right. It follows that aboriginal rights are part of the core of Indianness at the heart of s. 91(24). Prior to 1982, as a result, they could not be extinguished by provincial laws of general application

(4) Section 88 of the Indian Act

182 Provincial laws which would otherwise not apply to Indians proprio vigore, however, are allowed to do so by s. 88 of the Indian Act, which incorporates by reference provincial laws of general application: Dick, supra, at pp. 326-27; Derrickson v. Derrickson, 1986 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 285, at p. 297; Francis, supra, at pp. 1030-31. However, it is important to note, in Professor Hogg's words, that s. 88 does not "invigorate" provincial laws which are invalid because they are in relation to Indians and Indian lands (Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), at p. 676; also see Dick, supra, at p. 322). What this means is that s. 88 extends the effect of provincial laws of general application which cannot apply to Indians and Indian lands because they touch on the Indianness at the core of s. 91(24). For example, a provincial law which regulated hunting may very well touch on this core. Although such a law would not apply to aboriginal people proprio vigore, it would still apply through s. 88 of the Indian Act, being a law of general application. Such laws are enacted to conserve game and for the safety of all.

> 88. Subject to the terms of any treaty and any other Act of Parliament, all laws of general application from time to time in force in any province are applicable to and in respect of Indians in the province, except to the extent that those laws are inconsistent with this Act or any order, rule, regulation or by-law made thereunder, and except to the extent that those laws make provision for any matter for which provision is made by or under this Act.

I see nothing in the language of the provision which even suggests the intention to extinguish aboriginal rights. Indeed, the explicit reference to treaty rights in s. 88 suggests that the provision was clearly not intended to undermine aboriginal rights.

3.5.2 Minority (concurring in part)

Delgamuukw v British Columbia*, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010

187 LA FOREST J.—

206 As for the issue raised on the cross-appeal, I agree with the Chief Justice's conclusion. The respondent province had no authority to extinguish aboriginal rights either under the Constitution Act, 1867 or by virtue of s. 88 of the Indian Act.

3.6 Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture)

If Delgamuukw opened the door to a broader reading of s. 91(24), one that grounded federal jurisdiction in the protection of Aboriginal title and the constitutional salience of Indigenous relationships to land, then Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, marked a reassertion of provincial authority. Rather than building on Delgamuukw's recognition that federal jurisdiction involves the protection Indigenous land interests, the Court emphasized the constitutional applicability of provincial regulation, even where laws directly affect Indigenous cultural and spiritual values.

At issue was a provincial heritage conservation statute that authorized permits for activities that might damage sacred sites, including burial grounds. The Kitkatla Band argued that the law intruded on the protected core of s. 91(24), targeting matters of cultural significance and spiritual identity. The Court disagreed. It upheld the statute as a law of general application and found that its ameliorative purpose did not impair federal jurisdiction. Importantly, the decision narrowed the scope of the "singling out" doctrine: a law could now directly reference Indigenous matters without triggering constitutional concern, so long as it appeared to balance Indigenous and non-Indigenous interests in a proportionate way.

Kitkatla confirmed the Court's growing preference for cooperative federalism. It moved away from exclusivity toward a model that tolerates provincial-federal overlap, even in areas touching on Indigenous culture, law, and governance. The result was a doctrinal narrowing of federal jurisdiction and a shift away from the obligation-based reading of s. 91(24) that Delgamuukw had outlined.

Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture)*, 2002 SCC 31

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LEBEL J.—

I. Introduction

1 This case concerns a constitutional challenge to the application of provincial legislation on the protection of cultural heritage property. The dispute relates to culturally modified trees or CMTs. These trees have often been altered by aboriginal people as part of their traditional use and have cultural, historical and scientific importance for a number of First Nations in British Columbia. In the opinion of the appellants, legislation authorizing the removal or modification of these cultural objects would fall beyond the scope of provincial legislative powers. Hence, the Heritage Conservation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 187 ("the Act"), should be struck down in part to the extent that it allows for the alteration and destruction of native cultural objects. For the reasons which are set out below, I am of the view that this appeal should fail because the impugned legislation falls within the provincial jurisdiction on property and civil rights within the province, as the British Columbia Court of Appeal held.

VI. The Issues

A. Position of the Parties

31 All parties agree that legislation concerning the protection of heritage or cultural property falls under provincial legislative jurisdiction as being a law relating to property and civil rights within the province, under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The intervener, the Attorney General of Canada, agrees, with one caveat. She points out that some cultural properties may fall under federal jurisdiction or that the application of unspecified federal heads of power may affect them. In the present case, the Attorney General of Canada supports the validity of the legislation challenged by the appellants. The respondents and all the interveners take the same position.

32 The appellants concede that the province may legislate in respect of cultural properties, but challenge the validity and applicability of the Act to the CMTs found in the Kumealon region. In substance, the appellants submit that legislative provisions allowing for the alteration or destruction of native heritage property fall outside provincial legislative powers, even if provinces may validly legislate in respect of other cultural objects. They submit that ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2)(c), which authorize the Minister to grant permits to alter, destroy or remove native heritage property impact on federal legislative powers in respect of Indian affairs. The impugned provisions affect objects and sites which stand at or near the core of aboriginal identity. For these reasons, the impugned provisions fall beyond the scope of provincial legislative authority. Moreover, even if the legislation is intra vires under a pure division of powers analysis, aboriginal objects would be immunized from its effects. The interjurisdictional immunity doctrine, which immunizes core federal competencies from the effect of otherwise valid provincial laws, would apply and render site alteration permits issued by the Minister ineffective.

33 At this point, the appellants acknowledge that, sometimes, s. 88 of the Indian Act tempers the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in respect of provincial laws of general application. They argue, though, that s. 88 would not save the legislation in this case, because the Act is not a law of general application. It singles out Indian aboriginal objects and sites for special treatment. It amounts to discriminatory legislation. Section 88 should be read in such a way as to avoid incorporating discriminatory laws which have a differential impact on First Nations. Section 88 should be applied in a manner consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights, R.S.C. 1985, App. III. This approach would introduce a method analogous to a s. 15 Charter analysis in the interpretation of s. 88 of the Indian Act.

B. Respondents' Position

34 The main argument of the respondents is directed at the division of powers question. They submit that the impugned provisions form part of a comprehensive scheme which, in pith and substance, remains legislation in relation to property and civil rights in a province. The respondents point out that the site alteration permits do not apply to areas included within any Indian reserve and that no Indian title had been established in the Kumealon at the time of the litigation.

35 The primary legal effect of the impugned provisions is to regulate, through the s. 12 permit process, the actions of any person which may damage heritage property protected under s. 13(2). The heritage objects at issue are culturally modified trees.

36 The respondents argue that the impugned provisions of the Act are provincial laws of general application, which do not single out Indians for special treatment. There is no doubt that the Act applies uniformly to all persons throughout the province. The Act does not lose its status as a law of general application by the inclusion of heritage objects of importance to aboriginal people. Neither in purpose nor in effect do the impugned provisions of the Act single out Indians for unique treatment. The impugned provisions apply to all persons in the province whether aboriginal or non-aboriginal and to all heritage objects and heritage sites as enumerated in s. 13(2) of the Act. The respondents submit that the province has the legislative authority to regulate the protection of heritage sites and objects within the province, including heritage sites and objects of aboriginal origin. The right to regulate must include the right to impose limits on that protection. In the absence of any prohibited singling out of Indians, ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2)(c) and (d) must fall within the same head of legislative authority as the rest of the Heritage Conservation Act, namely, "Property and Civil Rights in the Province".

38 The respondents submit that the core federal jurisdiction does not extend to the regulation of heritage sites or objects in British Columbia. Provincial law which regulates all heritage objects cannot be said to be aimed at affecting an integral part of primary federal jurisdiction over Indians and lands reserved for the Indians. In this case, the impugned provisions do not, as a matter of application or legal effect, regulate the Band in the exercise of any aboriginal right or in respect of their Indianness. A determination by this Court that the impugned legislation is intra vires the province does not preclude the appellants from advancing a claim of aboriginal rights or title in respect of the trees or the lands where they are situated.

39 The respondents submit that, in the alternative, if this Court finds the impugned provisions affect the appellants in their Indianness, ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2) of the Act would apply as federal law by operation of s. 88 of the Indian Act. Section 88 incorporates as federal law those provincial laws of general application which touch upon the essential core of federal jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and which would otherwise be inapplicable to Indians by virtue of the doctrine of the interjurisdictional immunity. Indeed, the appellants' test for discrimination would substantially restrict the operation of s. 88 and would shift the test for laws of general application from a division of powers analysis to a rights-based analysis. Such a test ought not to be adopted because it confuses the tests applicable to determining the scope of constitutionally protected rights with those which apply to a division of powers analysis.

40 The respondents then turn to a subsidiary argument on s. 88. They note that this provision serves a jurisdictional purpose in allowing those provincial laws which otherwise would not be applicable to Indians because they affect Indianness to apply to Indians. There is no evidence before the Court that the impugned provisions represent a colourable attempt by the province to single out heritage sites or objects of aboriginal origin for special treatment. The appellants' test contravenes the well established principle that the fact that a law may have different impacts on the persons to whom it applies does not, in itself, prevent it from operating as a law of general application. Even if it could be said that s. 12(2)(a) of the Act affects aboriginal rights, or aboriginal rights in cultural property, it still retains its character as a provincial law of general application applicable to Indians by virtue of s. 88 of the Indian Act.

41 Thus, the main issues have been clearly framed by the parties and in the constitutional questions. The Court must first consider the pith and substance of the legislation. Three sub-questions must be discussed in this respect. First, do ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2)(c) and (d) intrude into a federal head of power, and to what extent? Then, if they do intrude, are they nevertheless part of a valid legislative scheme? At the next step of the analysis, it should be considered whether the impugned provisions are sufficiently integrated with the scheme. If the answer is yes, we may turn to consider the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity and, if need be, s. 88 of the Indian Act. Before I move on to these, I will review the heritage conservation scheme adopted by the province of British Columbia and discuss some evidentiary issues relevant to the rights claimed by the appellants.

65 Given this analysis of the purpose and effect of the legislation in order to characterize the impugned provisions, the Court must then determine whether the pith and substance of ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2)(c) and (d) fall within a provincial head of power or if, rather, they fall within a federal head of power. If the Court characterizes these provisions as a heritage conservation measure that is designed to strike a balance between the need to preserve the past while also allowing the exploitation of natural resources today, then they would fall squarely within the provincial head of power in s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867 with respect to property and civil rights in the province.

67 Second, it is clear that legislation which singles out aboriginal people for special treatment is ultra vires the province: see Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031. For example, a law which purported to affect the Indian status of adopted children was held to be ultra vires the province: see Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare, 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751. Similarly, laws which purported to define the extent of Indian access to land for the purpose of hunting were ultra vires the provinces because they singled out Indians: see Sutherland, supra; Moosehunter v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 13 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 282. Further, provincial laws must not impair the status or capacity of Indians: see Kruger v. The Queen, 1977 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1978] 1 SCR 104, at p. 110; Dick, supra, at pp. 323-24.

68 Nevertheless, "singling out" should not be confused with disproportionate effect. Dickson J. said in Kruger, at p. 110, that "the fact that a law may have graver consequence to one person than to another does not, on that account alone, make the law other than one of general application".

69 In the present case, the impugned provisions cannot be said to single out aboriginal peoples, at least from one point of view. The provisions prohibit everyone, not just aboriginal peoples, from the named acts, and require everyone, not just aboriginal peoples, to seek permission of the Minister to commit the prohibited acts. In that respect, the impugned provisions treat everyone the same. The impugned provisions' disproportionate effects can be attributed to the fact that aboriginal peoples have produced by far the largest number of heritage objects in British Columbia. These peoples have been resident in British Columbia for thousands of years; other British Columbians arrived in the last two hundred years.

70 A more serious objection is raised with respect to the issue of whether permitting the destruction of aboriginal heritage objects impairs the status or capacity of Indians. The appellants' submission seeks to situate these cultural interests, along with aboriginal rights, at the "core of Indianness", Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 181. However, as pointed out above, little evidence has been offered by the appellants with respect to the relationship between the CMTs and Kitkatla culture in this area. The appellants argue that aboriginal heritage objects constitute a major portion of their identity and culture in a way that non-aboriginal heritage objects do not go to the centre of non-aboriginal identity. Consequently, they argue, aboriginal people are singled out for more severe treatment. I would reject this argument. Because British Columbia's history is dominated by aboriginal culture, fewer non-aboriginal objects and sites receive protection than aboriginal objects and sites. The Act provides a shield, in the guise of the permit process, against the destruction or alteration of heritage property. When one considers the relative protection afforded aboriginal and non-aboriginal heritage objects, the treatment received by both groups is the same, and indeed is more favourable, in one sense to aboriginal peoples.

71 In any case, it should be remembered that the Act cannot apply to any aboriginal heritage object or site which is the subject of an established aboriginal right or title, by operation of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and by operation of s. 8 of the Heritage Conservation Act (and, by implication, s. 12(7) of that Act which states that a permit does not grant a right to alter or remove an object without the consent of the party which has title to the object or site on which the object is situated). The Act is tailored, whether by design or by operation of constitutional law, to not affect the established rights of aboriginal peoples, a protection that is not extended to any other group. On the whole, then, I am of the opinion that ss. 12(2)(a) and 13(2)(c) and (d) of the Act are valid provincial law and that they do not single out aboriginal peoples or impair their status or condition as Indians.

J. Paramountcy and Federal Powers

74 The doctrine of paramountcy does not appear applicable in this case, as no valid federal legislation occupies the same field. There are provisions in the Indian Act with respect to aboriginal heritage conservation, but they are confined to objects on reserve lands. As I noted above, the Heritage Conservation Act does not apply to aboriginal heritage objects or sites which are the subject of an established aboriginal right or title by virtue both of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and s. 8 of the Act itself, which is declaratory of that fact. In any case, the CMTs in question in this case are not located on an Indian reserve but on Crown land.

75 I thus find that there is no intrusion on a federal head of power. It has not been established that these provisions affect the essential and distinctive core values of Indianness which would engage the federal power over native affairs and First Nations in Canada. They are part of a valid provincial legislative scheme. The legislature has made them a closely integrated part of this scheme. The provisions now protect native interests in situations where, before, land owners and business undertakings might have disregarded them, absent evidence of a constitutional right.

76 The Act purports to give the provincial government a means of protecting heritage objects while retaining the ability to make exceptions where economic development or other values outweigh the heritage value of the objects. In the British Columbia context, this generally means that the provincial government must balance the need to exploit the province's natural resources, particularly its rich abundance of lumber, in order to maintain a viable economy that can sustain the province's population, with the need to preserve all types of cultural and historical heritage objects and sites within the province. Given the overwhelming prevalence of aboriginal heritage objects in the province and, in this particular case, the ubiquitous nature of CMTs, legislation which sought to permit the striking of this balance but which did not attempt to extend this to aboriginal heritage objects and sites would inevitably fall very far short of its goal, if in fact it would not in most respects gut the purposes of the Act.

77 Given this conclusion, it will not be useful to discuss the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. It would apply only if the provincial legislation went to the core of the federal power. (See Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437, at para. 81; Delgamuukw, supra, at paras. 177-78, per Lamer C.J.) In these circumstances, no discussion of the principle governing the application of s. 88 of the Indian Act would be warranted.

VII. Conclusion and Disposition

78 Heritage properties and sites may certainly, in some cases, turn out to be a key part of the collective identity of people. In some future case, it might very well happen that some component of the cultural heritage of a First Nation would go to the core of its identity in such a way that it would affect the federal power over native affairs and the applicability of provincial legislation. This appeal does not raise such issues, based on the weak evidentiary record and the relevant principles governing the division of powers in Canada. In the circumstances of this case, the overall effect of the provision is to improve the protection of native cultural heritage and, indeed, to safeguard the presence and the memory of the cultural objects involved in this litigation, without jeopardizing the core values defining the identity of the appellants as Indians. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal, without costs.

3.7 Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission)

The Court's willingness in Kitkatla to uphold provincial legislation affecting sacred sites signaled a reluctance to treat s. 91(24) as a substantive constraint on provincial regulation. The decision left unanswered whether provincial administrative bodies could exercise adjudicative authority over matters involving Indigenous rights or reserve lands.

That question arose in Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), 2003 SCC 55, where an Indigenous logger challenged the jurisdiction of a provincial tribunal to adjudicate a dispute involving harvesting rights on reserve. He argued that such matters were constitutionally immune from provincial oversight. The Court rejected that claim. It held that neither the involvement of reserve lands nor the presence of an Indigenous claimant was sufficient to oust provincial jurisdiction. Interjurisdictional immunity would apply only where a law or tribunal impaired the protected core of federal authority, not merely because it touched it.

Paul reinforced the court's commitment to cooperative federalism. It confirmed that provincial adjudicative systems may operate in contexts involving Indigenous rights or reserve lands, so long as those systems do not impair the core of s. 91(24). In doing so, it further narrowed the scope of federal exclusivity and signaled the Court's continued shift toward a model of overlapping, rather than insulated, jurisdictions.

BASTARACHE J. —

I. Overview

1 These are the reasons following the decision of the Court on June 11, 2003 to allow the appeal. In August 1995, an official in the British Columbia Ministry of Forestry seized four logs in the possession of Thomas Paul, a registered Indian. Mr. Paul had cut three trees and found the fourth, and planned to use the wood to build a deck on his home. Mr. Paul asserted that he had an aboriginal right to cut timber for house modification, and accordingly that s. 96 of the Forest Practices Code of British Columbia Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 159 ("Code"), a general prohibition against cutting Crown timber, did not apply to him. Both the District Manager and the Administrative Review Panel agreed that Mr. Paul had contravened s. 96. Mr. Paul then appealed to the Forest Appeals Commission ("Commission"). No one disputes these facts.

2 The issue in dispute is whether the Commission has jurisdiction to hear Mr. Paul's defence that he cut the trees and possessed the logs in the exercise of his aboriginal rights. To this point, Mr. Paul has asserted his right but never attempted to prove it. The issue is not whether provincial legislation can override an aboriginal right recognized and affirmed by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. As the submissions by the parties and the interveners show, the question is of great significance both to aboriginal persons and to provincial governments, which enable administrative tribunals to address a vast diversity of issues that may encompass s. 35 rights.

5 There are two prongs to the respondent's challenge to the jurisdiction of the Commission. The first is that the Legislature of British Columbia cannot give the Commission the power to adjudicate questions relating to aboriginal rights, on the basis that doing so would encroach on the federal power under s. 91(24). This is the constitutional argument. The majority of the Court of Appeal had also determined, as an alternative approach, that the Code ran afoul of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. The Court of Appeal reasoned that, since the existence and extent of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights come within the essential core of "Indianness" (Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010), a law granting quasi-judicial jurisdiction to determine matters of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights intrudes upon the core of Indianness and is therefore inapplicable to Indians. Furthermore, held the majority, s. 88 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, which makes provincial laws of general application apply to Indians, fails to invigorate the relevant portions of the Code, since s. 88 incorporates laws respecting Indians, not land.

6 With respect, I think that the majority of the Court of Appeal misunderstood the scope of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. The doctrine relates to the exercise of legislative powers, that is, the power of a province to apply its valid legislation that affects matters under federal competence. As the parties conceded, the Code is constitutional. The majority of the Court of Appeal applied the doctrine in the context of an adjudicative, not legislative, function. The effect of the Code is not to alter the substance of any federal rule or aboriginal right, but rather to prescribe that Indians charged under the Code will first raise an aboriginal rights defence before the Commission, as opposed to before a superior court judge. This effect has not been shown to have a substantial impact upon Indians qua Indians. There is therefore no need to consider s. 88; the Code applies ex proprio vigore.

7 The second prong of Mr. Paul's challenge deals with the Commission's statutory jurisdiction. The respondent argued that the enabling provisions of the Code were insufficient to empower the Commission to decide the existence of aboriginal rights or title. Mr. Paul argues that the Legislature would need to confer the power to determine such questions, even ones arising incidentally to forestry matters, upon the Commission expressly. I note that the appellants agree with the respondent that the particular provisions of the Code fail to confer such power on the Commission. Only the Commission itself, intervening, believes it has been so empowered. Since the majority of the Court of Appeal believed that granting the Commission power to determine questions of aboriginal law would be unconstitutional, it did not examine the statutory interpretation question in detail. Nevertheless, the majority believed that practical considerations militated against a finding that the Code conferred jurisdiction on the Commission. In his brief concurring reasons, Donald J.A. referred to Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 1996 CanLII 152 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 854, as authority for the importance of practical considerations in seeking out implied jurisdiction (paras. 92-109). This prong of the challenge is the administrative law question of interpretation of a tribunal's enabling statute.

A. Division of Powers: Can the Province Empower the Commission to Hear and Determine Section 35 Questions?

(1) The Scope of the Constitutional Challenge

10 It is important to indicate precisely which provisions of the Code are under discussion at this point. The challenge is to the notion that ss. 130 to 141, which provide that a person may appeal the decision of the Administrative Review Panel to the Commission, permit the Commission to hear and rule upon a defence of aboriginal rights. In contrast, there is no challenge to the substantive prohibition, which appears in s. 96(1):

96 (1) A person must not cut, remove, damage or destroy Crown timber unless authorized to do so

Nor, I should note, do the appellants take the position that s. 96(1) would prevail in a conflict with a demonstrated aboriginal right affirmed by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Once an aboriginal right is proven, s. 96(1) would be of no effect to the extent that it was inconsistent with that right, unless that inconsistency could be justified according to the test in R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075. On this, there is no dispute.

(2) The Validity and Application of the Code

11 As I noted above, at the hearing the parties conceded that the Code is in its entirety valid provincial legislation. In any case, it is clear to me that the Code is legislation in relation to development, conservation and management of forestry resources in the province, under s. 92A(1)(b) of the Constitution Act, 1867. There was no argument made that the entire Code, or that portion treating appeals before the Commission, has as its true meaning, essential character, or core matters relating to Indians and lands reserved for the Indians (s. 91(24)) or to any other federal head of power. More specifically, there was no suggestion that, in operation, the law's effects on Indians are so significant as to reveal a pith and substance that is a matter under exclusive federal competence: Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), [2002] 2 SCR 146, 2002 SCC 31, at para. 54; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), [2000] 1 SCR 783, 2000 SCC 31, at para. 18.

12 As a law of general application, the Code applies ex proprio vigore to Indians, to the extent that it does not touch on the "core of Indianness" and is not unjustifiably inconsistent with s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. There is no need to consider whether s. 88 of the Indian Act would revive the statute and render it applicable.

13 In the classic federalism cases, the vires of legislation is challenged: Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), supra; Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), [2000] 1 SCR 494, 2000 SCC 21. Here the question is the relationship between valid provincial legislation and matters under the federal competence to legislate under s. 91(24).

(3) Incidental Effects

14 The doctrine of incidental effects holds that where there is a valid provincial law of general application, the provincial law applies if its effects upon matters within federal legislative competence are "merely incidental, irrelevant for constitutional purposes": P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 1, at p. 15-8, quoted in Global Securities, supra, at para. 22. See also General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at p. 670. In other words, as Iacobucci and Major JJ. put it in Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437, at para. 81, "it is constitutionally permissible for a validly enacted provincial statute of general application to affect matters coming within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament". Since all relevant provisions of the Code are valid provincial legislation, it follows that by virtue of the doctrine of incidental effects, any impact of the Code upon aboriginals is irrelevant for classification purposes. It remains to be seen, however, whether the law's application to specific factual contexts can be put in issue.

(4) Interjurisdictional Immunity

15 The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is engaged when a provincial statute trenches, either in its entirety or in its application to specific factual contexts, upon a head of exclusive federal power. The doctrine provides that, where the general language of a provincial statute can be read to trench upon exclusive federal power in its application to specific factual contexts, the statute must be read down so as not to apply to those situations: Grail, supra, at para. 81. The doctrine has limited the application of a provincial statute to a matter of exclusive federal power in numerous contexts…

16 The question, then, is whether, in a valid law of general application, provisions that empower a provincially constituted administrative tribunal to hear and rule upon arguments relating to aboriginal rights as they arise in execution of its provincial mandate trench upon the core of Indianness. If so, those provisions will be inapplicable to Indians.

(5) Application: Adjudication Versus Legislation

17 Lambert J.A., in the British Columbia Court of Appeal, concluded that such provisions would touch the core of Indianness. The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity would, accordingly, render those enabling provisions inapplicable to questions of aboriginal law. It is helpful to review the heart of his reasoning on this point, at para. 72:

> The existence and extent of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights has been held in Delgamuukw to come within the essential core of Indianness. That being so, I cannot imagine that a law granting quasi-judicial jurisdiction to determine matters of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights could be anything other than equally and co-extensively within the core of Indianness. As such it fulfils the conditions for application of the principle of interjurisdictional immunity . . . .

18 This short passage reveals the fundamental error in the analysis of the majority of the Court of Appeal. It equates legislation respecting the "existence and extent of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights" (a legislative or regulatory function) with legislation enabling a board "to determine matters of aboriginal title and aboriginal rights" (an adjudicative function) (emphasis added). The respondent made the same error, stating in his factum that "the province's power to enact the jurisdiction-granting sections of the Code cannot extend to matters that are not within the province's legislative competence" (respondent's factum, at para. 105).

19 Legislation that triggers the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity purports to regulate indirectly matters within exclusive federal competence, that is, to alter rights and obligations. Such inapplicable legislation may purport to "supplement" existing federal rules, as in Grail, supra. It may purport to "regulate" the essential parts of federal undertakings, as in Bell, supra. To my knowledge, none of the authorities applying the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has done so in respect of an adjudicative function. The function at issue in this appeal is one of identifying where existing aboriginal rights affirmed by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 prevail over provisions in the Code. The Commission's enabling provisions do not attempt to supplement or amend the constitutional and federal rules respecting aboriginal rights. Indeed, the question is whether the legislature may empower the Commission to take cognizance of existing constitutional rights and rights under federal rules, not to alter or supplant them. In my view, as I shall explain, there is no reason under the Constitution that the legislature may not so empower the Commission.

20 The respondent cites Professor Hogg's discussion of the rationale for the conferral upon Parliament by the founders of Confederation of legislative power over Indians. Professor Hogg writes that the main reason "seems to have been a concern for the protection of the Indians against local settlers" (Hogg, supra, at p. 27-2). Once adjudicative and legislative functions are separated, however, it becomes clear that neither s. 91(24) itself nor Professor Hogg's discussion refers to adjudication. The passage is therefore unhelpful in this context.

21 The conclusion that a provincial board may adjudicate matters within federal legislative competence fits comfortably within the general constitutional and judicial architecture of Canada. In determining, incidentally, a question of aboriginal rights, a provincially constituted board would be applying constitutional or federal law in the same way as a provincial court, which of course is also a creature of provincial legislation. At the hearing all parties agreed that a provincial court may determine s. 35 issues.

24 Further reasons persuade me to reject the respondent's general position that questions relating to aboriginal rights are untouchable by a provincially created tribunal by virtue of their falling within federal legislative competence. It is necessary to examine side by side two provisions in the Constitution. The one on which the respondent relies heavily is s. 91(24), which empowers Parliament to legislate in relation to "Indians, and Land reserved for the Indians". The other is s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Unless otherwise specified, such as official language rights in the Charter particular to New Brunswick, every right in the Constitution Act, 1982 applies to every province as well as to the federal government. Section 35 therefore applies to both provinces and the federal government. It is also established that one part of the Constitution cannot abrogate another: Adler v. Ontario, 1996 CanLII 148 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 609. By virtue of s. 35, then, laws of the province of British Columbia that conflict with protected aboriginal rights do not apply so as to limit those rights, unless the limitation is justifiable according to the test in Sparrow, supra. I find it difficult to think that the Province cannot, when administering a provincial regulatory scheme, attempt to respect its constitutional obligation by empowering an administrative tribunal to hear a defence of aboriginal rights.

25 Sparrow stands for the proposition that government regulation, including provincial regulation, may, by legislation, infringe an aboriginal right if that infringement is justified. Though this is not the basis of the Commission's jurisdiction, where legislation justifiably infringing rights is possible, surely adjudication by the Commission, which simply takes existing rights into account, must be permissible. This conclusion follows from the distinction between legislation and adjudication and the nature of their impact upon rights.

26 I rely considerably on this distinction. I wish, therefore, to address an argument made by the respondent that, in practical terms in the aboriginal rights context, the two are insufficiently distinguishable.

28 I wish to reiterate a point acknowledged by the respondent himself, namely that a province lacks the constitutional capacity to extinguish aboriginal rights and aboriginal title. This is because the clear and plain intent necessary to extinguish an aboriginal right would make a law one in relation to Indians and Indian lands and thus ultra vires the province: Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 180. I will now explain why, in two important respects, a determination by an administrative tribunal, such as the Commission, is very different from both the extinguishment of a right and legislation in relation to Indians or aboriginal rights.

29 First, and most important, any adjudicator, whether a judge or a tribunal, does not create, amend or extinguish aboriginal rights. Rather, on the basis of the evidence, a judicial or administrative decision maker may recognize the continued existence of an aboriginal right, including its content and scope, or observe that the right has been properly extinguished by a competent legislative authority. Of course the decision maker may also conclude on the evidence that the aboriginal right simply has not been proven at all.

30 Admittedly, within the administrative state, the line between adjudication and legislation is sometimes blurred. Administrative tribunals that develop and implement policy while adjudicating disputes, such as the Competition Tribunal and a provincial Securities Commission, come to mind. Indeed, this Court's standard of review jurisprudence is sensitive to the deference that may be appropriate where an expert tribunal is simultaneously adjudicating and developing policy, which may sometimes be viewed as a legislative function: Canada (Deputy Minister of National Revenue) v. Mattel Canada Inc., [2001] 2 SCR 100, 2001 SCC 36, at para. 28; Pushpanathan v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1998 CanLII 778 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 982, at para. 48. There is, however, a crucial distinction between a board that has been empowered by valid legislation to make policy within an area that is intra vires the enabling legislator, and a provincial board that is called upon, in executing its mandate, to answer incidentally a legal question relating to the Constitution or to federal law. No one has suggested that the Legislature has the constitutional power to enable a board to determine questions of aboriginal law on the basis of policy considerations favourable to the Province.

31 Second, while both provincially constituted courts and provincially constituted tribunals may consider the Constitution and federal laws, there is nevertheless one important distinction between them that the respondent overlooked. Unlike the judgments of a court, the Commission's decisions do not constitute legally binding precedents, nor will their collective weight over time amount to an authoritative body of common law. They could not be declaratory of the validity of any law. Moreover, as constitutional determinations respecting s. 91(24) or s. 35, the Commission's rulings would be reviewable, on a correctness basis, in a superior court on judicial review: Westcoast Energy Inc. v. Canada (National Energy Board), 1998 CanLII 813 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 322, at para. 40; Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. Matsqui Indian Band, 1995 CanLII 145 (SCC), [1995] 1 SCR 3, at para. 23; Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Assn. v. Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 570. To avoid judicial review, the Commission would have to identify, interpret, and apply correctly the relevant constitutional and federal rules and judicial precedents. As a result of the contrast between the general application of a provincial law by a court and the specific, non-binding effect of a board's particular decision, there is a substantial difference.

(6) The Present Role of the Commission and the Core of Indianness

32 The preceding point brings me to consider the role of the Commission in this case. Recall that the general prohibition against cutting Crown timber appears in s. 96(1) of the Code, and is not attacked in this appeal. The question, then, is not whether that prohibition unjustifiably infringes an aboriginal right. The question is whether provisions that would enable the Commission to hear a defence of aboriginal right are unconstitutional. I have already noted that the determinations of the Commission respecting aboriginal rights would be reviewable on a correctness standard. Provincial officials cannot initiate any inquiry into aboriginal rights before the Commission. Instead, a question of aboriginal law will arise only when a respondent raises an aboriginal right before the Commission in seeking relief from a general prohibition or other regulatory provision in the Code. I do not see how, by raising a defence of aboriginal right, a respondent should be able to alter the primary jurisdiction of the Commission or halt its proceedings. The nature of a particular defence should be seen as secondary to the Commission's primary jurisdiction. A person accused of violating the Code should not be able to oust the Commission's jurisdiction relating to forestry simply by raising a particular defence and thereby highlighting a constitutional dimension of the main issue. In any event, constitutional law doctrines aside, I think it would be most convenient for aboriginal persons to seek the relief afforded by their constitutionally protected rights as early as possible within the mechanisms of the administrative and judicial apparatus.

33 The respondent has failed to grasp the distinction between adjudication by a provincially created tribunal, on the one hand, and limits on regulation by a province of a matter under federal competence, on the other. Taking this distinction into account, I cannot see how the ability to hear a defence based on s. 35 would constitute an indirect intrusion on the defining elements of "Indianness". The "core" of Indianness has not been exhaustively defined. It encompasses the whole range of aboriginal rights that are protected by s. 35(1): Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 178. For present purposes, it is perhaps more easily defined negatively than positively. The core has been held not to include labour relations (Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031) and highway traffic regulation on reserves (R. v. Francis, 1988 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 1025). On the evidence adduced in Kitkatla Band, supra, at para. 70, the status or capacity of Indians was found not to be impaired by the impugned Heritage Conservation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 187.

Given that these substantive matters were held not to go to the core of Indianness, I cannot see how the procedural question in this appeal can. The respondent has failed to demonstrate that the procedural right to raise at first instance a defence of aboriginal rights in a superior court, as opposed to before a provincially constituted tribunal, such as the Commission, goes to the core of Indianness.

34 I conclude, therefore, primarily on the basis that adjudication is distinct from legislation, that the Legislature of British Columbia has the constitutional power to enable the Commission to determine questions relative to aboriginal rights as they arise in the execution of its valid provincial mandate respecting forestry. I turn now to the question of whether the provisions of the Code in force at the time of this appeal's events actually gave such a power to the Commission.

III. Conclusion

46 For the reasons given above, I would allow the appeal. The province of British Columbia has legislative competence to endow an administrative tribunal with the capacity to consider a question of aboriginal rights in the course of carrying out its valid provincial mandate. More specifically, the Commission, by virtue of its power to determine legal questions, is competent to hear Mr. Paul's defence of his aboriginal right to harvest logs for renovation of his home.

47 My conclusions mean that the Commission has jurisdiction to continue hearing all aspects of the matter of Mr. Paul's four seized logs. Unless he moves in the Supreme Court of British Columbia for a declaration respecting his aboriginal rights, Mr. Paul must present the evidence of his ancestral right to the Commission. As yet he has merely asserted his defence. If he is unsatisfied with the Commission's determination of the relationship between his s. 35 rights and the prohibition against cutting trees in s. 96 of the Code, he can move for judicial review in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. The standard of review for the Commission's determinations concerning aboriginal law will be correctness.

3.8 Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta

The logic of Paul, that provincial institutions may adjudicate Indigenous rights claims so long as they do not impair the federal core, was reaffirmed four years later in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22. Though the case did not concern s. 91(24) directly, the Court cited Paul and related jurisprudence to support its approach to interjurisdictional immunity. It emphasized that federal exclusivity under s. 91(24) protects only a "basic, minimum and unassailable content," and that valid provincial laws may apply to Indigenous peoples in their capacity as citizens, not just as "Indians" under federal law. Where provincial legislation affects general economic or regulatory matters, even on reserve lands, federal exclusivity will not apply unless a vital or indispensable federal interest is at stake. The effect was to reinforce a restrictive reading of s. 91(24)'s core and to affirm that most provincial laws may operate even in Indigenous contexts. The Court in Western Bank highlighted that the core of 91(24) protected matters that matters that "could be considered absolutely indispensable and essential to [Indigenous peoples'] cultural survival."

(4) The Indian Cases

60 The appellants relied on certain observations about interjurisdictional immunity in Paul v. British Columbia (Forest Appeals Commission), [2003] 2 SCR 585, 2003 SCC 55, but of course the actual holding in that case was that notwithstanding exclusive federal jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians", a provincial Forest Appeals Commission could properly consider questions relating to aboriginal rights arising in the execution of its valid provincial mandate respecting forestry resources. In Kitkatla Band, our Court held that a provincial law relating to the preservation of heritage objects applied because its application did not affect aboriginal rights or title. These cases further demonstrate that the Court has taken a strict view of the "basic, minimum and unassailable content" of the federal power in relation to "Indians" who are, in limited respects, federal "persons", and to that extent these cases undermine rather than advance the banks' argument.

61 In some cases, it is true, the Court has found a vital or essential federal interest to justify federal exclusivity because of the special position of aboriginal peoples in Canadian society or, as Gonthier J. put it in the National Battlefields Commission case mentioned earlier, "the fundamental federal responsibility for a thing or person" (p. 853). Thus, in Natural Parents, Laskin C.J. held the provincial Adoption Act to be inapplicable to Indian children on a reserve because to compel the surrender of Indian children to non-Indian parents "would be to touch 'Indianness', to strike at a relationship integral to a matter outside of provincial competence" (pp. 760-61). Similarly, in Derrickson, the Court held that the provisions of the British Columbia Family Relations Act dealing with the division of family property were not applicable to lands reserved for Indians because "[t]he right to possession of lands on an Indian reserve is manifestly of the very essence of the federal exclusive legislative power under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867" (p. 296). In Paul v. Paul, 1986 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 306, our Court held that provincial family law could not govern disposition of the matrimonial home on a reserve. In these cases, what was at issue was relationships within Indian families and reserve communities, matters that could be considered absolutely indispensable and essential to their cultural survival. On the other hand, in Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031, this Court held that a non-Indian business on a reserve that was partly owned and operated by Indians (but not the band) was subject to provincial labour regulation. The Court could not discern a need for federal exclusivity in a matter so remote from its special responsibilities for aboriginal peoples. In other words, in their federal aspect ("Indianness"), Indian people are governed by federal law exclusively, but in their activities as citizens of a province, they remain subject to provincial laws of general application. As it is with Indians, so it must be with chartered banks.

3.9 NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union

Following Paul and Canadian Western Bank, the Court continued to narrow the reach of federal exclusivity under s. 91(24). In NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45, it applied that framing to Indigenous institutions themselves. The case involved two Indigenous child welfare agencies, one serving on-reserve and the other urban Indigenous communities. The question was whether provincial or federal labour law governed their employees. The Court held that provincial jurisdiction presumptively applied. Crucially, the Court made no reference to Indigenous perspectives or jurisdiction in child welfare or labour relations. The reasoning treated the agencies as functionally equivalent to other provincially regulated service providers. As Abella J. put it for the majority: "There is no reason why, as a matter of principle, the jurisdiction of an entity's labour relations should be approached differently when s. 91(24) is at issue. The fundamental nature of the inquiry is - and should be - the same as for any other head of power" (NIL/TU,O, at para 20). With that, the Court extended the logic of cooperative federalism into areas at the core of Indigenous cultural life.

3.9.1 Majority

NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union*, 2010 SCC 45

The judgment of LeBel, Deschamps, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. was delivered by

[1] ABELLA J. — NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society ("NIL/TU,O") provides child welfare services to certain First Nations children and families in British Columbia. It has a unique institutional structure, combining provincial accountability, federal funding, and a measure of operational independence.

[2] None of the parties dispute that child welfare is a matter within provincial legislative competence under the Constitution Act, 1867. NIL/TU,O does not challenge the constitutional validity of the Child, Family and Community Service Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 46, as it applies to Aboriginal people. Nor is the issue whether the federal government can enact labour relations legislation dealing with "Indians". It clearly can. The issue in this appeal is whether NIL/TU,O's labour relations nonetheless fall within federal jurisdiction over Indians under s. 91(24) because its services are designed for First Nations children and families.

[3] For the last 85 years, this Court has consistently endorsed and applied a distinct legal test for determining the jurisdiction of labour relations on federalism grounds. This legal framework, set out most comprehensively in Northern Telecom Ltd. v. Communications Workers of Canada, 1979 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 115 and Four B Manufacturing Ltd. v. United Garment Workers of America, 1979 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 1031, and applied most recently in Consolidated Fastfrate Inc. v. Western Canada Council of Teamsters, 2009 SCC 53, [2009] 3 SCR 407, is used regardless of the specific head of federal power engaged in a particular case. It calls for an inquiry into the nature, habitual activities and daily operations of the entity in question to determine whether it constitutes a federal undertaking. This inquiry is known as the "functional test". Only if this test is inconclusive as to whether a particular undertaking is "federal", does the court go on to consider whether provincial regulation of that entity's labour relations would impair the "core" of the federal head of power.

Background

[5] In 1997, seven First Nations collectively incorporated NIL/TU,O under British Columbia's Society Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 433, to establish a child welfare agency that would provide "culturally appropriate" services to their children and families. NIL/TU,O operates out of offices on the Tsawout reserve and provides its services to the members of the "Collective First Nations", currently comprised of the Beecher Bay, Pacheedaht, Pauquachin, Songhees, T'Sou-ke, Tsartlip and Tsawout First Nations.

[6] In 2005, the British Columbia Government and Service Employees' Union applied to the British Columbia Labour Relations Board to be certified as the bargaining agent for all employees of NIL/TU,O, excluding the executive director. NIL/TU,O objected, arguing that its labour relations fell under federal jurisdiction.

[7] The Board dismissed NIL/TU,O's objection. NIL/TU,O was, in the Board's view, an "'Indian' organization" ((2006), 122 C.L.R.B.R. (2d) 174, at para. 47). However, without some connection to the exercise of federal legislative power, that "'Indian' content" did not attract federal jurisdiction over labour relations (para. 47). The Board accordingly certified the Union under the B.C. Labour Relations Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 244. A three-member panel of the Board subsequently dismissed NIL/TU,O's request for reconsideration ((2006), 127 C.L.R.B.R. (2d) 137).

[8] On judicial review, Cullen J. of the Supreme Court of British Columbia granted the application on the grounds that NIL/TU,O's labour relations fell under federal jurisdiction and were therefore not within the Board's authority (2007 BCSC 1080, 76 B.C.L.R. (4th) 322). He found that NIL/TU,O's operations and activities had a federal dimension and, even though those operations served provincial ends, they did so by uniquely Aboriginal means. Cullen J. accordingly overturned the Board's certification order.

[9] The Union then sought and obtained certification from the Canada Industrial Relations Board under the Canada Labour Code. Despite its federal certification, the Union appealed Cullen J.'s decision to the British Columbia Court of Appeal where Groberman J.A., writing for a unanimous court, concluded that NIL/TU,O's operations — and therefore its labour relations — fell under provincial jurisdiction (2008 BCCA 333, 81 B.C.L.R. (4th) 318). In his view, nothing in the Child, Family and Community Service Act, the design of NIL/TU,O's operations or the nature of NIL/TU,O's services took NIL/TU,O outside provincial jurisdiction. Primary provincial jurisdiction over labour relations was not "ousted" simply because NIL/TU,O's operations "engage[d] the interests of [A]boriginal groups" or because NIL/TU,O provided services in a "culturally sensitive" manner (para. 62).

[10] For somewhat different reasons, I agree with the conclusion of the British Columbia Court of Appeal and the British Columbia Labour Relations Board that NIL/TU,O's labour relations fall under provincial jurisdiction and are therefore subject to the British Columbia Labour Relations Code. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

Analysis

[11] Jurisdiction over labour relations is not delegated to either the provincial or federal governments under s. 91 or s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. But since Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, 1925 CanLII 331 (UK JCPC), [1925] A.C. 396 (P.C.), Canadian courts have recognized that labour relations are presumptively a provincial matter, and that the federal government has jurisdiction over labour relations only by way of exception. This exception has always been narrowly interpreted [citations removed].

[12] The approach to determining whether an entity's labour relations are federally or provincially regulated is a distinct one and, notably, entails a completely different analysis from that used to determine whether a particular statute is intra or ultra vires the constitutional authority of the enabling government. Because the regulation of labour relations falls presumptively within the jurisdiction of the provinces, the narrow question when dealing with cases raising the jurisdiction of labour relations is whether a particular entity is a "federal work, undertaking or business" for purposes of triggering the jurisdiction of the Canada Labour Code.

[14] He then set out a "functional test" for determining whether an entity is "federal" for purposes of triggering federal labour relations jurisdiction.

[15] Four B, decided the same year as Northern Telecom, also adopted the principles from Construction Montcalm, and again found the functional test, which examined the "normal or habitual activities" of the entity, to be determinative. The issue in Four B was whether provincial labour legislation applied to a provincially incorporated manufacturing operation that was owned by four Aboriginal band members, employed mostly band members, and operated on reserve land pursuant to a federal permit. Beetz J., for the majority, set out the governing principles and concluded that the "operational nature" of the business was provincial:

> In my view the established principles relevant to this issue can be summarized very briefly. With respect to labour relations, exclusive provincial legislative competence is the rule, exclusive federal competence is the exception. The exception comprises, in the main, labour relations in undertakings, services and businesses which, having regard to the functional test of the nature of their operations and their normal activities, can be characterized as federal undertakings, services or businesses . . . .
> There is nothing about the business or operation of Four B which might allow it to be considered as a federal business: the sewing of uppers on sport shoes is an ordinary industrial activity which clearly comes under provincial legislative authority for the purposes of labour relations. Neither the ownership of the business by Indian shareholders, nor the employment by that business of a majority of Indian employees, nor the carrying on of that business on an Indian reserve under a federal permit, nor the federal loan and subsidies, taken separately or together, can have any effect on the operational nature of that business. By the traditional and functional test, therefore, The Labour Relations Act applies to the facts of this case, and the Board has jurisdiction. [Emphasis added; pp. 1045-46.]

Beetz J. was satisfied that the functional test was conclusive and that Four B was a provincial undertaking.

[16] At no point, in discussing the functional test, does Beetz J. mention the "core" of s. 91(24) or its content. In fact, he makes it clear that only if the functional test is inconclusive as to whether a particular undertaking is "federal", should a court consider whether provincial regulation of labour relations would impair the "core" of whatever federal regulation governed the entity.

[17] He went on to discuss, in obiter, whether this conclusion would have been different if the functional test had been inconclusive:

> The functional test is a particular method of applying a more general rule namely, that exclusive federal jurisdiction over labour relations arises only if it can be shown that such jurisdiction forms an integral part of primary federal jurisdiction over some other federal object: the Stevedoring case.
> Given this general rule, and assuming for the sake of argument that the functional test is not conclusive for the purposes of this case, the first question which must be answered . . . is whether the power to regulate the labour relations in issue forms an integral part of primary federal jurisdiction over Indians and Lands reserved for the Indians. The second question is whether Parliament has occupied the field by the provisions of the Canada Labour Code. [Emphasis added; p. 1047.]

[18] In other words, in determining whether an entity's labour relations will be federally regulated, thereby displacing the operative presumption of provincial jurisdiction, Four B requires that a court first apply the functional test, that is, examine the nature, operations and habitual activities of the entity to see if it is a federal undertaking. If so, its labour relations will be federally regulated. Only if this inquiry is inconclusive should a court proceed to an examination of whether provincial regulation of the entity's labour relations would impair the core of the federal head of power at issue.

[20] There is no reason why, as a matter of principle, the jurisdiction of an entity's labour relations should be approached differently when s. 91(24) is at issue. The fundamental nature of the inquiry is — and should be — the same as for any other head of power. It is an inquiry with two distinct steps, the first being the functional test. A court should proceed to the second step only when this first test is inconclusive. If it is, the question is not whether the entity's operations lie at the "core" of the federal head of power; it is whether the provincial regulation of that entity's labour relations would impair the "core" of that head of power. Collapsing the two steps into a single inquiry, as the trial judge and the Court of Appeal did, and as the Chief Justice and Fish J. do in their concurring reasons, transforms the traditional labour relations test into a different test: the one used for determining whether a statute is "inapplicable" under the traditional interjurisdictional immunity doctrine. The two-step inquiry preserves the integrity of the unique labour relations test; the single-step approach extinguishes it.

[22] The difference between these two approaches is significant. The "core" of a federal head of power might not capture the scope or potential reach of federal legislative jurisdiction, as the Court held in Canadian Western Bank. Additionally, it is possible for an entity to be federally regulated in part and provincially regulated in part. To the extent that the functional test is inconclusive as to jurisdiction over the labour relations of an entity, the presumption of provincial jurisdiction will apply in such a case unless the core of the federal head of power would be impaired by provincial regulation of the entity's labour relations. It is only in this circumstance of an inconclusive finding about the application of the functional test that this narrow analysis of the "core" of the federal power will be engaged.

[23] This brings us to the application of the Four B test to the circumstances of this case. The delivery of child welfare services in British Columbia is governed by the Child, Family and Community Service Act. The Act sets out a detailed child protection regime for the province that is administered by "directors" appointed by the Minister for Child and Family Development (s. 91).

[36] What, then, does all this tell us about the nature of NIL/TU,O's operations? Clearly NIL/TU,O is regulated exclusively by the province, and its employees exercise exclusively provincial delegated authority. This complex operational scheme was undoubtedly created for the benefit of the Collective First Nations. The child welfare services that NIL/TU,O offers are provided primarily by Aboriginal employees to Aboriginal clients and are designed to protect, preserve and benefit the distinct cultural, physical and emotional needs of the children and families of the Collective First Nations. NIL/TU,O serves as the child welfare agency for this community.

[37] NIL/TU,O argues that this distinctively Aboriginal component of its service delivery methodology alters the nature of its operations and activities such that it is a federal undertaking, service or business for the purpose of allocating labour relations jurisdiction. In my view, it does not.

[38] Provincial competence over child welfare is exercised in British Columbia through the Child, Family and Community Service Act, and NIL/TU,O's operations are wholly regulated by it. NIL/TU,O is a fully integrated part of this provincial regulatory regime, pursuant to authority that is delegated, circumscribed and supervised by provincial officials. As an organization, it is directly subject to the province's oversight, and NIL/TU,O's employees are directly accountable to the provincial directors, who are empowered to intervene when necessary to ensure statutory compliance. Provincial child welfare workers are, in fact, required to step in when one of NIL/TU,O's cases involves child protection issues since NIL/TU,O's employees are not authorized to provide protection services. Moreover, NIL/TU,O's Constitution and the 2004 Agreement recognize the Act as the statutory authority governing the Society's primary task, namely providing statutory child welfare services. When fulfilling this task, NIL/TU,O must always operate with the Act's two paramount considerations in mind — the safety and well-being of children — and must always comply with the Act as a whole. The province, therefore, retains ultimate decision-making control over NIL/TU,O's operations.

[39] None of this detracts from NIL/TU,O's distinct character as a child welfare organization for Aboriginal communities. But the fact that it serves these communities cannot take away from its essential character as a child welfare agency that is in all respects regulated by the province. Neither the cultural identity of NIL/TU,O's clients and employees, nor its mandate to provide culturally-appropriate services to Aboriginal clients, displaces the operating presumption that labour relations are provincially regulated. As the Court of Appeal pointed out, social services must, in order to be effective, be geared to the target clientele. This attempt to provide meaningful services to a particular community, however, cannot oust primary provincial jurisdiction over the service providers' labour relations. NIL/TU,O's function is unquestionably a provincial one.

[40] And while it is true that NIL/TU,O receives federal funds pursuant to a federal funding directive, an intergovernmental memorandum of understanding and the 2004 Agreement, this does not rise to the level of federal operational involvement necessary to demonstrate that NIL/TU,O is a federal undertaking, service or business. As in Four B, where the Court found that federal loans and subsidies did not convert the shoe manufacturing business into a federal activity, federal funding in this case does not change the nature of NIL/TU,O's operations from provincial to federal hands.

[41] In my view, British Columbia's Child, Family and Community Service Act, by expressly recognizing, affirming and giving practical meaning to the unique rights and status of Aboriginal people in the child welfare context, and by expressly respecting Aboriginal culture and heritage, represents a commendable, constitutionally mandated exercise of legislative power. The very fact that the delivery of child welfare services is delegated to First Nations agencies marks, significantly and positively, public recognition of the particular needs of Aboriginal children and families. It seems to me that this is a development to be encouraged in the provincial sphere, not obstructed.

[43] NIL/TU,O's operational features are painted with the same co-operative brush. The agency exists because of a sophisticated and collaborative effort by the Collective First Nations, the government of British Columbia and the federal government to respond to the particular needs of the Collective First Nations' children and families. This effort has resulted in a detailed and integrated operational matrix comprised of NIL/TU,O's Constitution and by-laws, a tripartite delegation agreement, an intergovernmental memorandum of understanding, a set of Aboriginal practice standards, a federal funding directive and provincial legislation, all of which govern the provision of child welfare services by NIL/TU,O in a manner that respects and protects the Collective First Nations' traditional values.

[44] By virtue of the memorandum of understanding and the tripartite agreement, the federal government actively endorsed the province's oversight of the delivery of child welfare services to Aboriginal children in the province, including those services provided by NIL/TU,O to the Collective First Nations. I see this neither as an abdication of regulatory responsibility by the federal government nor an inappropriate usurpation by the provincial one. It is, instead, an example of flexible and co-operative federalism at work and at its best.

[45] The essential nature of NIL/TU,O's operation is to provide child and family services, a matter within the provincial sphere. Neither the presence of federal funding, nor the fact that NIL/TU,O's services are provided in a culturally sensitive manner, in my respectful view, displaces the overridingly provincial nature of this entity. The community for whom NIL/TU,O operates as a child welfare agency does not change what it does, namely, deliver child welfare services. The designated beneficiaries may and undoubtedly should affect how those services are delivered, but they do not change the fact that the delivery of child welfare services, a provincial undertaking, is what it essentially does.

[46] And neither the nature of NIL/TU,O's operation nor the jurisprudence calls for an inquiry into the "core of Indianness" in this appeal. The Northern Telecom/Four B principles clearly and conclusively confirm that NIL/TU,O is a provincial undertaking. The past 85 years of labour jurisprudence confirms that no further or alternate analysis is required. The presumption in favour of provincial jurisdiction over labour relations, therefore, remains operative in this case.

[47] I would therefore dismiss the appeal with costs.

4 Cooperative federalism and the limits of exclusivity

This Part traces the further erosion of federal exclusivity in matters involving Indigenous peoples and the rise of cooperative federalism as the dominant constitutional framework. Over time, the Court has narrowed the scope of interjurisdictional immunity by removing Aboriginal and treaty rights from the protected core of section 91(24). These rights, previously shielded through federal jurisdiction, are now governed by the justificatory standards of section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The result is a shift in where constitutional protection resides, moving the limits on provincial authority from the division of powers to s.35.

At the same time, interjurisdictional immunity has not been abandoned altogether. It continues to apply to other aspects of the federal core under s. 91(24), such as reserve lands, Indian status, and matters tied more directly to Indigenous legal identity. The jurisprudence now draws a distinction between these institutional or status-based elements and s. 35 rights.

In Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, the Court held that interjurisdictional immunity could no longer be invoked to protect Aboriginal title. Under this model, provincial laws may apply to Aboriginal title lands if the Crown can meet its justificatory burden. The court explicitly held the interjurisdictional immunity has no role to play where s.35 rights are concerned, effectively removing those rights from the constitutional core of s. 91(24), despite the fact that those rights are, by definition, integral to the distinctive cultures of Indigenous peoples and, as such, cannot sensibly be distinguished from previous explanations of the subject matters at the core.

This doctrinal move created a structural inconsistency. In Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, the Court had affirmed that the core of s. 91(24) protects "relationships within Indian families and reserve communities" and matters "absolutely indispensable and essential to [Indigenous] cultural survival." Yet many of the very practices now excluded from that core are the same ones that are protected under s. 35 precisely because they relate to Indigenous cultural integrity. The result is a doctrine that affirms the cultural centrality of constitutional rights, while simultaneously declining to treat them as constitutionally immune from provincial regulation. It is worth noting as well that s.35 rights are still clearly within the scope of s.91(24), meaning that the federal government can legislate about these rights and, in so doing, trigger paramountcy over inconsistent provincial laws. Thus, even where IJI cannot be relied on to protect s.35 rights, they can be given legislative protection through paramountcy. This is discussed in Part IV.

Daniels v. Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development), 2016 SCC 12, illustrated the shifting doctrinal terrain of s.91(24) following Tsilhqot'in. The Court confirmed that Métis and non-status Indians fall within the personal scope of s. 91(24), extending federal jurisdiction to previously excluded groups. Yet Daniels also reflects the dual character of s. 91(24) as incorporating both obligations and control. The re-introduction of the language of obligation suggests that s. 91(24) grounds a constitutional duty to recognize and respond to the needs of Indigenous peoples. That tension, between control and obligation, runs through this doctrinal moment.

What emerges in this Part is a subtle but consequential shift. As the Court dismantled barriers to provincial regulation, it cast s. 91(24) not as a zone of exclusive federal authority, but as part of a shared constitutional space, one where federal, provincial, and Indigenous jurisdictions increasingly interact. Yet this transformation raises a structural problem: with interjurisdictional immunity no longer available to protect s. 35 rights, what constitutional mechanism remains to affirm Indigenous jurisdiction? And what role, if any, can s. 91(24) still play in expressing the Crown's constitutional obligations?

The cases that follow suggest an interpretation of s. 91(24) not as a grant of plenary control, but as a platform for intergovernmental coordination, one shaped by evolving Indigenous rights jurisprudence and the imperatives of reconciliation. Yet in this period, those imperatives often appear to widen the reach of provincial law rather than constrain it.

4.1 Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia

Tsilhqot'in Nation v British Columbia*, 2014 SCC 44

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

I. Introduction

[1] What is the test for Aboriginal title to land? If title is established, what rights does it confer? Does the British Columbia Forest Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 157, apply to land covered by Aboriginal title? What are the constitutional constraints on provincial regulation of land under Aboriginal title? Finally, how are broader public interests to be reconciled with the rights conferred by Aboriginal title? These are among the important questions raised by this appeal.

[2] These reasons conclude:

- Aboriginal title flows from occupation in the sense of regular and exclusive use of land.
- In this case, Aboriginal title is established over the area designated by the trial judge.
- Aboriginal title confers the right to use and control the land and to reap the benefits flowing from it.
- Where title is asserted, but has not yet been established, s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 requires the Crown to consult with the group asserting title and, if appropriate, accommodate its interests.
- Once Aboriginal title is established, s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 permits incursions on it only with the consent of the Aboriginal group or if they are justified by a compelling and substantial public purpose and are not inconsistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty to the Aboriginal group; for purposes of determining the validity of provincial legislative incursions on lands held under Aboriginal title, this framework displaces the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.
- In this case, the Province's land use planning and forestry authorizations were inconsistent with its duties owed to the Tsilhqot'in people.

VIII. Provincial Laws and Aboriginal Title

[98] As discussed, I have concluded that the Province breached its duty to consult and accommodate the Tsilhqot'in interest in the land. This is sufficient to dispose of the appeal.

[99] However, the parties made extensive submissions on the application of the Forest Act to Aboriginal title land. This issue was dealt with by the courts below and is of pressing importance to the Tsilhqot'in people and other Aboriginal groups in British Columbia and elsewhere. It is therefore appropriate that we deal with it.

[100] The following questions arise: (1) Do provincial laws of general application apply to land held under Aboriginal title and, if so, how? (2) Does the British Columbia Forest Act on its face apply to land held under Aboriginal title? and (3) If the Forest Act on its face applies, is its application ousted by the operation of the Constitution of Canada? I will discuss each of these questions in turn.

A. Do Provincial Laws of General Application Apply to Land Held Under Aboriginal Title?

[101] Broadly put, provincial laws of general application apply to lands held under Aboriginal title. However, as we shall see, there are important constitutional limits on this proposition.

[102] As a general proposition, provincial governments have the power to regulate land use within the province. This applies to all lands, whether held by the Crown, by private owners, or by the holders of Aboriginal title. The foundation for this power lies in s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives the provinces the power to legislate with respect to property and civil rights in the province.

[104] This Court suggested in Sparrow that the following factors will be relevant in determining whether a law of general application results in a meaningful diminution of an Aboriginal right, giving rise to breach: (1) whether the limitation imposed by the legislation is unreasonable; (2) whether the legislation imposes undue hardship; and (3) whether the legislation denies the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising the right (p. 1112). All three factors must be considered; for example, even if laws of general application are found to be reasonable or not to cause undue hardship, this does not mean that there can be no infringement of Aboriginal title. As stated in Gladstone:

> Simply because one of [the Sparrow] questions is answered in the negative will not prohibit a finding by a court that a prima facie infringement has taken place; it will just be one factor for a court to consider in its determination of whether there has been a prima facie infringement. [para. 43]

[105] It may be predicted that laws and regulations of general application aimed at protecting the environment or assuring the continued health of the forests of British Columbia will usually be reasonable, not impose an undue hardship either directly or indirectly, and not interfere with the Aboriginal group's preferred method of exercising their right. And it is to be hoped that Aboriginal groups and the provincial government will work cooperatively to sustain the natural environment so important to them both. This said, when conflicts arise, the foregoing template serves to resolve them.

[117] The next question is whether the provincial legislature lacks the constitutional power to legislate with respect to forests on Aboriginal title land. Currently, the Forest Act applies to lands under claim, but not to lands over which Aboriginal title has been confirmed. However, the provincial legislature could amend the Act so as to explicitly apply to lands over which title has been confirmed. This raises the question of whether provincial forestry legislation that on its face purports to apply to Aboriginal title lands is ousted by the Constitution.

1. Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982

[see Chapter 12, Part 5.3 on s. 35]

2. The Division of Powers

[128] The starting point, as noted, is that, as a general matter, the regulation of forestry within the Province falls under its power over property and civil rights under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. To put it in constitutional terms, regulation of forestry is in "pith and substance" a provincial matter. Thus, the Forest Act is consistent with the division of powers unless it is ousted by a competing federal power, even though it may incidentally affect matters under federal jurisdiction.

[130] First, the doctrine of paramountcy applies where there is conflict or inconsistency between provincial and federal law, in the sense of impossibility of dual compliance or frustration of federal purpose. In the case of such conflict or inconsistency, the federal law prevails. Therefore, if the application of valid provincial legislation, such as the Forest Act, conflicts with valid federal legislation enacted pursuant to Parliament's power over "Indians", the latter would trump the former. No such inconsistency is alleged in this case.

[136] In R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 666 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 533, this Court suggested that interjurisdictional immunity did not apply where provincial legislation conflicted with treaty rights. Rather, the s. 35 Sparrow framework was the appropriate tool with which to resolve the conflict:

> …the federal and provincial governments [have the authority] within their respective legislative fields to regulate the exercise of the treaty right subject to the constitutional requirement that restraints on the exercise of the treaty right have to be justified on the basis of conservation or other compelling and substantial public objectives … . [para. 24]

[138] Beyond this, the jurisprudence does not directly address the relationship between interjurisdictional immunity and s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The ambiguous state of the jurisprudence has created unpredictability. It is clear that where valid federal law interferes with an Aboriginal or treaty right, the s. 35 Sparrow framework governs the law's applicability. It is less clear, however, that it is so where valid provincial law interferes with an Aboriginal or treaty right. The jurisprudence leaves the following questions unanswered. Does interjurisdictional immunity prevent provincial governments from ever limiting Aboriginal rights even if a particular infringement would be justified under the Sparrow framework? Is provincial interference with Aboriginal rights treated differently than treaty rights? And, are commercial Aboriginal rights treated differently than non-commercial Aboriginal rights? No case has addressed these questions explicitly, as I propose to do now.

[139] As discussed, s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 imposes limits on how both the federal and provincial governments can deal with land under Aboriginal title. Neither level of government is permitted to legislate in a way that results in a meaningful diminution of an Aboriginal or treaty right, unless such an infringement is justified in the broader public interest and is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty owed to the Aboriginal group. The result is to protect Aboriginal and treaty rights while also allowing the reconciliation of Aboriginal interests with those of the broader society.

[144] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is designed to deal with conflicts between provincial powers and federal powers; it does so by carving out areas of exclusive jurisdiction for each level of government. But the problem in cases such as this is not competing provincial and federal powers, but rather tension between the right of the Aboriginal title holders to use their land as they choose and the province which seeks to regulate it, like all other land in the province.

[147] Second, in this case, applying the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to exclude provincial regulation of forests on Aboriginal title lands would produce uneven, undesirable results and may lead to legislative vacuums. The result would be patchwork regulation of forests — some areas of the province regulated under provincial legislation, and other areas under federal legislation or no legislation at all. This might make it difficult, if not impossible, to deal effectively with problems such as pests and fires, a situation desired by neither level of government.

[149] This Court has recently stressed the limits of interjurisdictional immunity. "[C]onstitutional doctrine must facilitate, not undermine what this Court has called 'co-operative federalism'" and as such "a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, at paras. 24 and 37 (emphasis deleted)). Because of this, interjurisdictional immunity is of "limited application" and should be applied "with restraint" (paras. 67 and 77). These propositions have been confirmed in more recent decisions: Marine Services International Ltd. v. Ryan Estate, 2013 SCC 44, [2013] 3 SCR 53; Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 SCR 134.

[150] Morris, on which the trial judge relied, was decided prior to this Court's articulation of the modern approach to interjurisdictional immunity in Canadian Western Bank and Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, and so is of limited precedential value on this subject as a result (see Marine Services, at para. 64). To the extent that Morris stands for the proposition that provincial governments are categorically barred from regulating the exercise of Aboriginal rights, it should no longer be followed. I find that, consistent with the statements in Sparrow and Delgamuukw, provincial regulation of general application will apply to exercises of Aboriginal rights, including Aboriginal title land, subject to the s. 35 infringement and justification framework. This carefully calibrated test attempts to reconcile general legislation with Aboriginal rights in a sensitive way as required by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and is fairer and more practical from a policy perspective than the blanket inapplicability imposed by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

[151] For these reasons, I conclude that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should not be applied in cases where lands are held under Aboriginal title. Rather, the s. 35 Sparrow approach should govern. Provincial laws of general application, including the Forest Act, should apply unless they are unreasonable, impose a hardship or deny the title holders their preferred means of exercising their rights, and such restrictions cannot be justified pursuant to the justification framework outlined above. The result is a balance that preserves the Aboriginal right while permitting effective regulation of forests by the province, as required by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[152] The s. 35 framework applies to exercises of both provincial and federal power: Sparrow; Delgamuukw. As such, it provides a complete and rational way of confining provincial legislation affecting Aboriginal title land within appropriate constitutional bounds. The issue in cases such as this is not at base one of conflict between the federal and provincial levels of government — an issue appropriately dealt with by the doctrines of paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity where precedent supports this — but rather how far the provincial government can go in regulating land that is subject to Aboriginal title or claims for Aboriginal title. The appropriate constitutional lens through which to view the matter is s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which directly addresses the requirement that these interests must be respected by the government, unless the government can justify incursion on them for a compelling purpose and in conformity with its fiduciary duty to affected Aboriginal groups.

4.2 Grassy Narrows First Nation v. Ontario (Natural Resources)

The logic of Tsilhqot'in, that provincial laws may apply to Aboriginal title lands if justified under section 35, was extended just months later in Grassy Narrows First Nation v. Ontario (Natural Resources), 2014 SCC 48. There, the Court applied the same framework to treaty rights. It held that Ontario, as the province with underlying title, could "take up" lands under Treaty 3 without federal approval, even where doing so would affect the treaty harvesting rights of First Nations. As in Tsilhqot'in, the Court rejected the relevance of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity and confirmed that provincial legislation affecting constitutionally protected Indigenous rights must be assessed through the lens of justification, not federal exclusivity.

At the same time, the Court affirmed that both federal and provincial levels of government bear constitutional obligations under treaties. Treaty rights are not simply federal matters; they bind the Crown in right of each jurisdiction.

The Chief Justice —

I. Overview

[1] In the early 1870s, Canada was a young country looking to promote Western expansion and Confederation. Settlers travelled west along an immigrant travel route called the Dawson Route, and British Columbia agreed to join Confederation on the condition that Canada build a transcontinental railway. But the immigrant travel route and the prospective railway to the west ran through traditional Ojibway land in what is now Northwestern Ontario and Eastern Manitoba. Canada was concerned about the security of immigrant travellers and surveyors preparing for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway ("CPR"), and feared that it may need to station troops in the area. Securing a safe route through the Ojibway lands was critical for the addition of British Columbia to Confederation and to the development of the West. It was against this historical backdrop that Treaty 3, which is at the heart of this case, was negotiated.

[2] In 1873, Treaty 3 was signed by treaty commissioners acting on behalf of the Dominion of Canada and Chiefs of the Ojibway. The Ojibway yielded ownership of their territory, except for certain lands reserved to them. In return, the Ojibway received annuity payments, goods, and the right to harvest the non-reserve lands surrendered by them until such time as they were "taken up" for settlement, mining, lumbering, or other purposes by the Government of the Dominion of Canada.

[3] The Treaty 3 lands include the Keewatin area. At the time Treaty 3 was concluded, the Keewatin area was under the exclusive control of Canada. In 1912, it was annexed to Ontario through The Ontario Boundaries Extension Act, S.C. 1912, c. 40 ("1912 Legislation"), and since that time, Ontario has issued licences for the development of lands in the Keewatin area. In 2005, the Grassy Narrows First Nation, descendents of the Ojibway signatories of Treaty 3, commenced an action challenging a forestry licence for lands that fell within the Keewatin area. The legal issue in this case is whether Ontario can "take up" lands in the Keewatin area under Treaty 3 so as to limit the harvesting rights under the treaty, or whether it needs federal authorization to do so.

[4] I conclude that Ontario has the authority to take up lands in the Keewatin area so as to limit the harvesting rights set out in Treaty 3. By virtue of ss. 109, 92A, and 92(5) of the Constitution Act, 1867, Ontario alone has the ability to take up Treaty 3 land and regulate it in accordance with the treaty and its obligations under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. A two-step process involving federal approval for provincial taking up was not contemplated by Treaty 3.

[35] The promises made in Treaty 3 were promises of the Crown, not those of Canada. Both levels of government are responsible for fulfilling these promises when acting within the division of powers under the Constitution Act, 1867. Thus, when the lands covered by the treaty were determined to belong to the Province of Ontario, the Province became responsible for their governance with respect to matters falling under its jurisdiction by virtue of ss. 109, 92(5) and 92A of the Constitution Act, 1867, subject to the terms of the treaty. It follows that the Province is entitled to take up lands under the treaty for forestry purposes.

[36] The appellants further argue that s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 grants Canada a residual and continuing role in respect of the taking up of Treaty 3 lands. Section 91(24) provides that Canada has jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians". Thus, the appellants submit that the trial judge's two-step process is merely a restatement of the double aspect doctrine: to the extent that any taking up displaces or limits the federally promised treaty rights, both aspects of the land or resource must be addressed — the provincial aspect of the land qua proprietary rights and the federal aspect of the land as subject to a treaty right (Grassy Narrows' factum, at para. 66).

B. Does the Doctrine of Interjurisdictional Immunity Preclude Ontario From Justifying Infringement of Treaty 3 Rights?

[53] I have concluded that Ontario has the power to take up lands in the Keewatin area under Treaty 3, without federal approval or supervision. Provided it does so in a manner that respects the requirements set out in Mikisew, doing this does not breach Treaty 3 harvesting rights. If Ontario's taking up of Keewatin lands amounts to an infringement of the treaty, the Sparrow/Badger analysis under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 will determine whether the infringement is justified (R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075; R. v. Badger, 1996 CanLII 236 (SCC), [1996] 1 SCR 771). The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity does not preclude the Province from justifiably infringing treaty rights (Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 SCR 256). While it is unnecessary to consider this issue, this Court's decision in Tsilhqot'in Nation is a full answer.

VII. Conclusion

[54] I would dismiss this appeal.

4.3 Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)

Together, Tsilhqot'in and Grassy Narrows confirmed a major doctrinal shift. With the retreat from interjurisdictional immunity, the Court held that both federal and provincial governments could justifiably infringe those rights, provided they met their constitutional obligations under the honour of the Crown.

In Daniels, the Court turned from land to people. It resolved a long-standing ambiguity by confirming that Métis and non-status Indians fall within the first head of power in section 91(24). While the decision did not confer specific rights or entitlements, it extended the personal scope of federal jurisdiction and reinforced the idea that section 91(24) carries constitutional responsibility, not merely legislative authority.

Daniels v Canada (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)*, 2016 SCC 12

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] Abella J. — As the curtain opens wider and wider on the history of Canada's relationship with its Indigenous peoples, inequities are increasingly revealed and remedies urgently sought. Many revelations have resulted in good faith policy and legislative responses, but the list of disadvantages remains robust. This case represents another chapter in the pursuit of reconciliation and redress in that relationship.

[4] The trial judge, Phelan J., made a number of key factual findings in his thoughtful and thorough reasons. As early as 1818, the government used "Indian" as a general term to refer to communities of mixed Aboriginal and European background. The federal government considered Métis to be "Indians" in various treaties and pre-Confederation statutes, and considered Métis to be "Indians" under s. 91(24) in various statutes and policy initiatives spanning from Confederation to modern day. Moreover, the purpose of s. 91(24) was closely related to the expansionist goals of Confederation. The historical and legislative evidence shows that expanding the country across the West was one of the primary goals of Confederation. Building a national railway was a key component of this plan.

[5] Accordingly, the purposes of s. 91(24) were "to control Native people and communities where necessary to facilitate development of the Dominion; to honour the obligations to Natives that the Dominion inherited from Britain . . . [and] eventually to civilize and assimilate Native people": para. 353. Since much of the North-Western Territory was occupied by Métis, only a definition of "Indians" in s. 91(24) that included "a broad range of people sharing a Native hereditary base" (para. 566) would give Parliament the necessary authority to pursue its agenda.

[7] He found that since neither the federal nor provincial governments acknowledged that they had jurisdiction over Métis and non-status Indians, the declaration would alleviate the constitutional uncertainty and the resulting denial of material benefits. There was therefore practical utility to the first declaration being granted, namely, that Métis and non-status Indians are included in what is meant by "Indians" in s. 91(24). He did not restrict the definition of either group.

[13] Both federal and provincial governments have, alternately, denied having legislative authority over non-status Indians and Métis. As the trial judge found, when Métis and non-status Indians have asked the federal government to assume legislative authority over them, it tended to respond that it was precluded from doing so by s. 91(24). And when Métis and non-status Indians turned to provincial governments, they were often refused on the basis that the issue was a federal one.

[14] This results in these Indigenous communities being in a jurisdictional wasteland with significant and obvious disadvantaging consequences, as was recognized by Phelan J.:

> One of the results of the positions taken by the federal and provincial governments and the "political football — buck passing" practices is that financially [Métis and non-status Indians] have been deprived of significant funding for their affairs… .
> …the political/policy wrangling between the federal and provincial governments has produced a large population of collaterally damaged [Métis and non-status Indians]. They are deprived of programs, services and intangible benefits recognized by all governments as needed. [paras. 107-8]

See also Lovelace v. Ontario, 2000 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2000] 1 SCR 950, at para. 70.

[15] With federal and provincial governments refusing to acknowledge jurisdiction over them, Métis and non-status Indians have no one to hold accountable for an inadequate status quo. The Crown's argument, however, was that since a finding of jurisdiction under s. 91(24) does not create a duty to legislate, it is inappropriate to answer a jurisdictional question in a legislative vacuum. It is true that finding Métis and non-status Indians to be "Indians" under s. 91(24) does not create a duty to legislate, but it has the undeniably salutary benefit of ending a jurisdictional tug-of-war in which these groups were left wondering about where to turn for policy redress. The existence of a legislative vacuum is self-evidently a reflection of the fact that neither level of government has acknowledged constitutional responsibility. A declaration would guarantee both certainty and accountability, thereby easily reaching the required jurisprudential threshold of offering the tangible practical utility of the resolution of a longstanding jurisdictional dispute.

[17] There is no consensus on who is considered Métis or a non-status Indian, nor need there be. Cultural and ethnic labels do not lend themselves to neat boundaries. 'Métis' can refer to the historic Métis community in Manitoba's Red River Settlement or it can be used as a general term for anyone with mixed European and Aboriginal heritage. Some mixed-ancestry communities identify as Métis, others as Indian:

> There is no one exclusive Metis People in Canada, anymore than there is no one exclusive Indian people in Canada. The Metis of eastern Canada and northern Canada are as distinct from Red River Metis as any two peoples can be. . . . As early as 1650, a distinct Metis community developed in LeHeve [sic], Nova Scotia, separate from Acadians and Micmac Indians. All Metis are aboriginal people. All have Indian ancestry.
> (R. E. Gaffney, G. P. Gould and A. J. Semple, Broken Promises: The Aboriginal Constitutional Conferences (1984), at p. 62, quoted in Catherine Bell, "Who Are The Metis People in Section 35(2)?" (1991), 29 Alta. L. Rev. 351, at p. 356.)

[18] The definitional contours of 'non-status Indian' are also imprecise. Status Indians are those who are recognized by the federal government as registered under the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5. Non-status Indians, on the other hand, can refer to Indians who no longer have status under the Indian Act, or to members of mixed communities who have never been recognized as Indians by the federal government.

Some closely identify with their Indian heritage, while others feel that the term Métis is more reflective of their mixed origins.

[19] These definitional ambiguities do not preclude a determination into whether the two groups, however they are defined, are within the scope of s. 91(24). I agree with the trial judge and Federal Court of Appeal that the historical, philosophical, and linguistic contexts establish that "Indians" in s. 91(24) includes all Aboriginal peoples, including non-status Indians and Métis.

[23] In fact, "Indians" has long been used as a general term referring to all Indigenous peoples, including mixed-ancestry communities like the Métis. The term was created by European settlers and applied to Canada's Aboriginal peoples without making any distinction between them. As author Thomas King explains in The Inconvenient Indian:

> No one really believed that there was only one Indian. No one ever said there was only one Indian. But as North America began to experiment with its "Indian programs," it did so with a "one size fits all" mindset. Rather than see tribes as an arrangement of separate nation states in the style of the Old World, North America imagined that Indians were basically the same. [p. 83]

[24] Before and after Confederation, the government frequently classified Aboriginal peoples with mixed European and Aboriginal heritage as Indians. Métis were considered "Indians" for pre-Confederation treaties such as the Robinson Treaties of 1850. Many post-Confederation statutes considered Métis to be "Indians", including the 1868 statute entitled An Act providing for the organisation of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, and for the management of Indian and Ordnance Lands, S.C. 1868, c. 42.

[25] Historically, the purpose of s. 91(24) in relation to the broader goals of Confederation also indicates that since 1867, "Indians" meant all Aboriginal peoples, including Métis. The trial judge found that expanding British North America across Rupert's Land and the North-West Territories was a major goal of Confederation and that building a national railway was a key component of this plan. At the time, that land was occupied by a large and diverse Aboriginal population, including many Métis. A good relationship with all Aboriginal groups was required to realize the goal of building "the railway and other measures which the federal government would have to take." With jurisdiction over Aboriginal peoples, the new federal government could "protect the railway from attack" and ensure that they did not resist settlement or interfere with construction of the railway. Only by having authority over all Aboriginal peoples could the westward expansion of the Dominion be facilitated.

[35] The term "Indian" or "Indians" in the constitutional context, therefore, has two meanings: a broad meaning, as used in s. 91(24), that includes both Métis and Inuit and can be equated with the term "aboriginal peoples of Canada" used in s. 35, and a narrower meaning that distinguishes Indian bands from other Aboriginal peoples. As will be noted later in these reasons, this Court in Reference as to whether "Indians" in s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act includes Eskimo inhabitants of the Province of Quebec, 1939 CanLII 22 (SCC), [1939] SCR 104 ("Re Eskimo"), held that s. 91(24) includes the Inuit. Since the federal government concedes that s. 91(24) includes non-status Indians, it would be constitutionally anomalous, as the Crown also conceded, for the Métis to be the only Aboriginal people to be recognized and included in s. 35 yet excluded from the constitutional scope of s. 91(24).

[36] The Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, released in 1996, stressed the importance of rebuilding the Crown's relationship with Aboriginal peoples in Canada, including the Métis: see vol. 3, Gathering Strength. The Report called on the federal government to "recognize that Métis people . . . are included in the federal responsibilities set out in section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867": vol. 2, Restructuring the Relationship, at p. 66. The importance of this reconstruction was also recognized in the final report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada: Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (2015), at p. 183; see also Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69 (CanLII), [2005] 3 SCR 388, at para. 1, and Lax Kw'alaams Indian Band v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 56 (CanLII), [2011] 3 SCR 535, at para. 12.

[37] The constitutional changes, the apologies for historic wrongs, a growing appreciation that Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people are partners in Confederation, the Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, and the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada, all indicate that reconciliation with all of Canada's Aboriginal peoples is Parliament's goal.

[38] The jurisprudence also supports the conclusion that Métis are "Indians" under s. 91(24). There is no case directly on point, but by identifying which groups have already been recognized as "Indians" under this head of power and by establishing principles governing who can be considered "Indians", the existing cases provide guidance.

[46] A broad understanding of "Indians" under s. 91(24) as meaning 'Aboriginal peoples', resolves the definitional concerns raised by the parties in this case. Since s. 91(24) includes all Aboriginal peoples, including Métis and non-status Indians, there is no need to delineate which mixed-ancestry communities are Métis and which are non-status Indians. They are all "Indians" under s. 91(24) by virtue of the fact that they are all Aboriginal peoples.

[47] Determining whether particular individuals or communities are non-status Indians or Métis and therefore "Indians" under s. 91(24), is a fact-driven question to be decided on a case-by-case basis in the future, but it brings us to whether, for purposes of s. 91(24), Métis should be restricted to the definitional criteria set out in Powley in accordance with the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal, or whether, as the appellants and some of the interveners urged, the membership base should be broader.

[48] The issue in Powley was who is Métis under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The case involved two Métis hunters who were charged with violating the Game and Fish Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. G.1. They claimed that the Métis had an Aboriginal right to hunt for food under s. 35(1). The Court agreed and suggested three criteria for defining who qualifies as Métis for purposes of s. 35(1):

a. Self-identification as Métis;

b. An ancestral connection to an historic Métis community; and

c. Acceptance by the modern Métis community.

[49] The third criterion — community acceptance — raises particular concerns in the context of this case. The criteria in Powley were developed specifically for purposes of applying s. 35, which is about protecting historic community-held rights: para. 13. That is why acceptance by the community was found to be, for purposes of who is included as Métis under s. 35, a prerequisite to holding those rights. Section 91(24) serves a very different constitutional purpose. It is about the federal government's relationship with Canada's Aboriginal peoples. This includes people who may no longer be accepted by their communities because they were separated from them as a result, for example, of government policies such as Indian Residential Schools. There is no principled reason for presumptively and arbitrarily excluding them from Parliament's protective authority on the basis of a "community acceptance" test.

[51] But federal jurisdiction over Métis and non-status Indians does not mean that all provincial legislation pertaining to Métis and non-status Indians is inherently ultra vires. This Court has recognized that courts "should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government": Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22 (CanLII), [2007] 2 SCR 3, at para. 37 (emphasis in original). Moreover, this Court has been clear that federal authority under s. 91(24) does not bar valid provincial schemes that do not impair the core of the "Indian" power: NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45 (CanLII), [2010] 2 SCR 696, at para. 3.

5 Indigenous peoples as peoples – toward legislative reconciliation

This final Part considers the most recent transformation in the interpretation of section 91(24). In Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a federal statute that recognizes Indigenous jurisdiction over child and family services. The decision marks a doctrinal and conceptual shift in emphasis from treating s. 91(24) as a tool of federal control over "Indians" to understanding it as a basis for federal responsibility toward Indigenous peoples as Indigenous peoples: that is, as distinct legal and political communities.

The Court affirmed that Parliament may recognize the inherent right of self-government in specific domains and give legal effect to Indigenous laws through incorporation. Once incorporated, those laws have the force of federal law and prevail over inconsistent provincial statutes by operation of federal paramountcy. This restores a protective function to s. 91(24), not by excluding provincial jurisdiction, but by empowering Parliament to support Indigenous governance through valid federal legislation. Although the Court declined to declare that s.35 protects a right of self-government, it endorsed Parliament's authority to bind itself and the Crown to act as if the right exists.

This approach revives a thread from Delgamuukw v British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010, where the Court warned that separating federal jurisdiction over Indigenous peoples from jurisdiction over their lands would leave the Crown unable to safeguard their most vital interests. In both decisions, s. 91(24) supports not only the power to legislate, but also a constitutional obligation to protect Indigenous law and landholding. Section 91(24) begins to function not as a colonial power over Indigenous peoples and lands, but as an instrument of legislative support and an obligation in relation to those subjects.

The decision aligns with the theory of legislative reconciliation, which holds that Parliament plays an active role in implementing section 35. When legislation is co-developed with Indigenous governments and grounded in Indigenous law and the UN Declaration, it becomes a central means of advancing reconciliation. This Part invites reflection on how federal power under s. 91(24) might evolve if used consistently to support Indigenous jurisdiction across a broader range of fields, not only child welfare, but also health, education, land governance, and justice.

The case that follows points toward a new direction in Canadian federalism, one that supports legal pluralism, gives meaningful effect to Indigenous law, and reframes s. 91(24) as a source of constitutional renewal grounded in obligation, rather than an instrument of colonial control.

THE COURT —

[1] In an order in council made on December 18, 2019, the Government of Quebec gave the province's Attorney General a mandate to challenge, through a reference to the Court of Appeal, the constitutionality of the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 ("Act"), on the ground that it exceeds the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. Stating that the federal statute [TRANSLATION] "raises fundamental constitutional issues with regard particularly to the division of legislative powers and the constitutional architecture of Canada", the government referred the following constitutional question to the Quebec Court of Appeal:

> [TRANSLATION] Is the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families ultra vires the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada under the Constitution of Canada?
> (Order in council 1288-2019, (2020) 152 G.O. II, 154, at p. 155)

In answer to this question, the Court of Appeal held that the Act is constitutionally valid except for ss. 21 and 22(3), provisions that give the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples priority over provincial laws and, as a result, exceed Parliament's jurisdiction.

[2] With the same question before it, this Court is of the opinion that the Act as a whole is constitutionally valid. It falls within Parliament's legislative jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Since it concerns relationships within Indigenous families and the control exercised by Indigenous communities over Indigenous children, the impugned Act relates first and foremost to what is called Indigeneity or "Indianness", that is, Indigenous peoples as Indigenous peoples, which requires its classification under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[5] The Act challenged in this reference is therefore directly in keeping with Canada's commitment to "implementing the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples", as the first recital of its preamble confirms. The preamble to the Act also refers to the calls to action of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada asking governments to "implement the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples as the framework for reconciliation" (Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (2015), at p. 191, call to action No. 43). This echoes one of the calls for justice of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (see Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (2019), vol. 1b, at pp. 167-218). At the centre of this process of reconciliation, the Act specifically addresses the harm caused to Indigenous children and their families. Its preamble states that "Parliament recognizes the legacy of residential schools and the harm, including intergenerational trauma, caused to Indigenous peoples by colonial policies and practices". In the preamble, Parliament also recognizes the "disruption" that Indigenous women and girls have experienced in their lives in relation to child services and "the importance of reuniting Indigenous children with their families and communities from whom they were separated in the context of the provision of child and family services". To achieve these aims, Parliament affirms the need "to respect the diversity of all Indigenous peoples, including the diversity of their laws", and "to eliminate the over-representation of Indigenous children in child and family services systems".

[6] Parliament embarked on this process of legislative reconciliation in favour of Indigenous children by taking an [TRANSLATION] "unusual" approach, as the Court of Appeal put it (2022 QCCA 185, at para. 515 (CanLII)). Section 8 sets out the three elements of the Act's purpose, which are all distinct legal avenues that are combined into an organic whole and have the same reconciliatory purpose: the affirmation for Canada, made by Parliament and binding on the Crown, of the vitality of Indigenous peoples' legislative authority in relation to child and family services, and the provision of such services on the basis of national standards. First, the Act's purpose is to "affirm the inherent right of self-government, which includes jurisdiction in relation to child and family services" (s. 8(a)). This affirmation relates to what the Act calls the "laws" of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples, and it expresses the idea that these would be the most appropriate laws to govern the situation of Indigenous children and families. Second — and somewhat in counterpoint to the first purpose mentioned — the Act sets out "principles applicable, on a national level, to the provision of child and family services in relation to Indigenous children" (s. 8(b)). The development by Parliament of national legislative standards to protect Indigenous children is a direct response to the fourth call to action made by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Third, the Act's purpose is also to "contribute to the implementation of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples" (s. 8(c)). Again, this purpose responds to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's call for the Government of Canada to develop an action plan and other concrete measures to achieve the objectives of the Declaration.

[7] The three elements of the purpose set out in s. 8 reflect Parliament's openness to using three different types of legal norms that will be interwoven in this framework for reconciliation to ensure the well-being of Indigenous children: the legislative authority of Indigenous peoples in relation to child and family services, the legislative provisions enacted by Parliament to establish national standards, and the international standards referred to in the Declaration. The metaphor of "braiding" together these three types of norms has been helpfully proposed to explain how the Declaration should be implemented in Canada, so as to "work out how state law and Indigenous law could be interwoven, with guidance from international law, to form a single, strong rope" (G. Christie, "Indigenous Legal Orders, Canadian Law and UNDRIP", in UNDRIP Implementation: Braiding International, Domestic and Indigenous Laws (2017), 48, at p. 48; see also O. Fitzgerald and R. Schwartz, "Introduction", ibid., 1, at p. 3).

[8] Announced in s. 8 and carried out by the Act as a whole, Parliament's effort to braid this "rope" with three strands constitutes the specific framework for reconciliation when it comes to Indigenous child and family services, in the spirit of the Declaration. Canada's commitment to implementing the Declaration and responding to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's call to action is thus met immediately; this avoids the uncertainties of constitutional negotiations, the slowness of treaty settlements entered into on a piecemeal basis by the Crown and each of the various Indigenous communities concerned, and the inevitable conflicts associated with court settlements (on this point, see the explanations given by K. Wilkins, "Strategizing UNDRIP Implementation: Some Fundamentals", in J. Borrows et al., eds., Braiding Legal Orders: Implementing the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2019), 177).

[16] The call for lawmakers to pass legislation affirming self-government for Indigenous peoples and facilitating the exercise of these rights has been echoed in other contexts. Internationally, for example, the importance of such measures has been repeatedly pointed out (see, e.g., UNDRIP, art. 38; United Nations, General Assembly, Report of the Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights and fundamental freedoms of indigenous people, S. James Anaya, U.N. Doc. A/HRC/9/9, August 11, 2008; United Nations, Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, Statement upon conclusion of the visit to Canada by the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights of indigenous peoples, James Anaya, October 15, 2013 (online)).

[17] Taking legislative measures of this kind has been described as being part of a process that some have termed "legislative reconciliation", that is, the enactment of legislation "to respect, promote, protect, and accommodate inherent rights through mechanisms or frameworks elaborated upon within the statute" (see N. S. W. Metallic, "Aboriginal Rights, Legislative Reconciliation, and Constitutionalism" (2023), 27:2 Rev. Const. Stud. 1, at p. 5). In other words, legislation of this kind does not purport to be the source of the rights in question, but rather proceeds on the premise that these rights exist. Similar initiatives have also been described as "recognition legislation", including in the Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 2, Restructuring the Relationship (1996), at p. 314 (see also S. Grammond, "Recognizing Indigenous Law: A Conceptual Framework" (2022), 100 Can. Bar Rev. 1, at pp. 20-21).

VII. Analysis

[37] There are two stages in determining the constitutional validity of a law: identifying its pith and substance and then classifying it by reference to the heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Murray-Hall v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10, at para. 22, citing Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, [2020] 2 SCR 283, at para. 26).

[38] The following analysis concerns the Act as a whole. This means that, in determining the Act's constitutional validity, we are not distinguishing between what the attorneys general have called Part I (ss. 1 to 17, except s. 8(a)) and Part II (ss. 8(a) and 18 to 26). Given that the question referred to the Quebec Court of Appeal did not relate to any specific provision of the Act, it is therefore the Act in its entirety that must be first characterized and then classified.

A. Characterization: What Is the Pith and Substance of the Act?

[39] At the first stage of the analysis, which involves characterizing the law, a court identifies the purpose and effects of the law in order to determine its main thrust or dominant characteristic.

(2) Pith and Substance of the Act

[41] In our view, the Act protects the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families by promoting the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services and, in so doing, advances the process of reconciliation with Indigenous peoples. This is the Act's pith and substance, which flows from the purpose and effects of this legislation.

(a) Purpose of the Act

(i) Intrinsic Evidence

[47] Taken as a whole, the intrinsic evidence suggests that the purpose of the Act is to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families. This overarching purpose has three elements: affirming Indigenous communities' jurisdiction in relation to child and family services; establishing national standards applicable across Canada; and implementing aspects of the UNDRIP in Canadian law. As the extrinsic evidence of Parliament's intention makes plain, however, these three elements are interwoven.

(ii) Extrinsic Evidence

[48] The purpose identified from the intrinsic evidence is confirmed by the extrinsic evidence, including various excerpts from Hansard. These excerpts first point to the seriousness of the problem of overrepresentation of Indigenous children in child and family services systems, a problem that many described as a "humanitarian crisis" during the debates

[49] The debates also clarify how the fundamental purpose of the Act — promoting the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families — is closely linked to the three aims identified from the intrinsic evidence.

[53] The extrinsic evidence thus reveals that the various elements of the Act's purpose were considered to be interwoven. Affirming the legislative authority of Indigenous groups, communities and peoples and adopting national standards were viewed as an integral part of implementing aspects of the UNDRIP. Similarly, the affirmation of Indigenous legislative authority was also seen to sit comfortably alongside the national standards articulated by Parliament, because Indigenous communities had been participants in formulating the standards and were expected to be participants in implementing them thereafter. Thus, each of the three elements of the Act's purpose set out in s. 8 is bound up in the other two. They are aims that are mutually reinforcing to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families. The section that follows examines the legal and practical effects of the Act in the pursuit of these interwoven aims.

(b) Effects of the Act

(i) Legal Effects

[54] A law's legal effects are discerned from its provisions by asking "how the legislation as a whole affects the rights and liabilities of those subject to its terms" (Greenhouse Gas References, at para. 70, quoting Morgentaler, at p. 482).

[55] In this case, the Act's provisions may be loosely grouped into three categories, which are necessarily interrelated: (1) provisions affirming the right of self-government; (2) provisions establishing national standards; and (3) provisions setting out concrete implementation measures. Taken together, the provisions in these three categories create a uniform national scheme for protecting the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families.

(c) Conclusion on the Pith and Substance of the Act

[91] In sum, the purpose of the Act is to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families in three interwoven ways: affirming Indigenous communities' jurisdiction in relation to child and family services; establishing national standards applicable across Canada; and implementing aspects of the UNDRIP in Canadian law. The legal effect of the Act is to establish a uniform scheme for protecting the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families through the affirmation of Indigenous legislative authority, through national standards and through concrete implementation measures. Practically speaking, the Act may reasonably be expected to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families and to advance reconciliation with Indigenous peoples. The pith and substance of the Act flows from the examination of these aims and effects.

[92] In our view, these factors imply that the essential matter addressed by the Act involves protecting the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families by promoting the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services and, in so doing, advancing the process of reconciliation with Indigenous peoples. The affirmation of Indigenous legislative authority, the national standards and the concrete measures to implement aspects of the UNDRIP are all integral parts of this unified whole.

B. Classification Under Section 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867

[93] The Act falls squarely within s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Binding the federal government to the affirmation set out in s. 18(1), establishing national standards and facilitating the implementation of the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples are all measures that are within Parliament's powers under s. 91(24).

[95] The foregoing is sufficient to conclude that the Act is intra vires Parliament under its jurisdiction over "Indians". However, the Attorney General of Quebec has raised other objections to the constitutional validity of the Act, which we reject for the reasons that follow.

(1) Sections 1 to 17 of the Act Need Not Be Classified Under Section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867

[96] The Attorney General of Quebec argues that the pith and substance of ss. 1 to 17 of the Act is to determine, through the adoption of minimum national standards, how provincial jurisdiction over youth protection is to be exercised in relation to Indigenous children. He also contends that these standards interfere with the work of the provincial public service, whose independence is essential to the existence of two levels of government that are coordinate, with no subordination of one to the other. Essentially, he argues, the provinces are being told how they must provide child services to Indigenous peoples within their borders. For the reasons that follow, the Attorney General of Quebec's position cannot be accepted.

[97] It is trite law that Parliament can bind the Crown in right of the provinces (see, e.g., Attorney-General for British Columbia v. Canadian Pacific Railway, [1906] A.C. 204 (P.C.); see also Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at paras. IX.95-IX.96; Hogg and Wright, at § 10:21). However, Parliament can do so only within areas of federal jurisdiction.

[98] The minimum national standards are within federal jurisdiction and can accordingly be binding on the provincial governments. The double aspect doctrine allows for "the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation" in relation to the "same fact situation" (Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837, at para. 66 (emphasis in original); Greenhouse Gas References, at para. 129). Youth protection in the Indigenous context has a double aspect, since it can be approached from two different perspectives: protection of the ties between Indigenous families and communities, in a spirit of cultural survival, under s. 91(24) (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 61; see also Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare, 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751, at p. 787, per Beetz J.); or child and family services and youth protection, under s. 92(13) and (16) (NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45, [2010] 2 SCR 696, at paras. 36-40, per Abella J., and at paras. 74-78, per McLachlin C.J. and Fish J., concurring; see also J. Woodward, Aboriginal Law in Canada (loose-leaf), at § 4:16). While the provinces are generally "the keeper[s] of constitutional authority over child welfare" (NIL/TU,O, at para. 24), the federal government also has jurisdiction to legislate in relation to child and family services for Indigenous children. As Professors Hogg and Wright have noted, "[i]f s. 91(24) merely authorized Parliament to make laws for Indians which it could make for non-Indians, then the provision would be unnecessary" (§ 28:2).

[99] Child welfare in the Indigenous context is not only a field in which Parliament and the provinces can act, but also one in which concerted action by them is necessary. The importance of cooperation in this area between these two levels of government is illustrated, for example, by Jordan's Principle, according to which intergovernmental disputes may not interfere with the right of Indigenous children to access the same services as other children in Canada. With regard to such disputes, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission noted that the federal government and the provincial governments have historically tended to shift responsibility for Indigenous child welfare services to one another (Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future, at pp. 142-43). However, today it is recognized that providing such services is the responsibility of both levels of government, which must act in a concerted fashion (House of Commons Debates, vol. 142, No. 31, 2nd Sess., 39th Parl., December 5, 2007, at p. 1780 (S. Blaney)). Since there is overlapping federal and provincial jurisdiction with respect to Indigenous children, it was entirely open to Parliament to legislate as it did (see, e.g., Grammond (2018), at pp. 137-38).

[100] We would add that while the provinces are validly bound by the national standards, these standards are not so precise and inflexible that they regulate all aspects of the provision of child and family services in the Indigenous context. Given the degree of generality with which these standards have been formulated, provincial public servants retain significant discretion in making decisions concerning Indigenous children. Moreover, the national standards apply to all service providers, whether they are provincial public servants or not. Finally, far from interfering with provincial initiatives, the national standards appear to be largely complementary to them. Indeed, the example of the Youth Protection Act, CQLR, c. P-34.1 ("YPA"), many of whose provisions bear a striking similarity to the national standards, is instructive in this regard.

[103] It follows from all of the foregoing that the national standards have only "incidental" effects on the provinces' exercise of their powers, including on the work of their public servants. As this Court has reiterated many times, effects of this kind have no impact on the constitutional validity of the legislation from which they arise (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 28, quoting Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2000 SCC 21, [2000] 1 SCR 494, at para. 23).

(2) Sections 8(a) and 18(1) and the Associated Provisions Do Not Purport to Amend the Constitution

[104] In this reference, the Attorney General of Quebec also submits that the Act is ultra vires because Parliament cannot itself, through legislation, establish the existence of an Indigenous right under s. 35, determine its scope or define its content. The Attorney General maintains that, to have full effect, the affirmations found in various places in the Act require either an amendment to the Constitution or prior judicial recognition. In this regard, the Quebec Court of Appeal was of the view that the Act is based expressly on the premise that Indigenous peoples' right of self-government is recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), and that this right includes child and family services. According to the Court of Appeal, given that such a right does indeed exist, the Act is thus constitutionally valid, subject to the provisions on the incorporation of laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples into federal law and on federal paramountcy.

[106] It is, of course, true that Parliament does not have the power to amend s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 unilaterally. On this point, it should be noted that s. 35.1 commits the federal and provincial governments to the principle that any amendment to s. 35 (among other provisions) will be preceded by a first ministers' conference convened by the Prime Minister of Canada (s. 35.1(a)). Further, representatives of the Indigenous peoples of Canada will be invited to participate in the discussions on agenda items related to any proposed amendment (s. 35.1(b)). More generally, Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 sets out the amending formulas that apply in respect of different aspects of the Constitution. Only s. 44 provides for the possibility of unilateral amendments by Parliament, which must be "in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons". But even with regard to the bodies referred to in s. 44, Parliament's power to amend unilaterally is not without limits (Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 SCR 704, at para. 48). Moreover, as in other contexts, Parliament acting alone cannot shield a constitutional amendment from the requirements of the Constitution by asserting that the amending provision is declaratory (Reference re Supreme Court Act, ss. 5 and 6, 2014 SCC 21, [2014] 1 SCR 433, at paras. 105-6). Thus, it is evident that Parliament cannot amend s. 35 unilaterally.

[107] However, in this case, Parliament is not unilaterally amending s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Rather, it is stating in the Act, through affirmations that are binding on the Crown (s. 7), its position on the content of this constitutional provision. Section 8(a) provides that the purpose of the Act is to "affirm the inherent right of self-government, which includes jurisdiction in relation to child and family services". Likewise, under the heading "Affirmation", s. 18(1) states that the "inherent right of self-government recognized and affirmed by section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 includes jurisdiction in relation to child and family services". The words "affirm" and "includes" in ss. 8(a) and 18(1) do not convey any intention to amend s. 35, nor could they have this effect. Instead, they "state as a fact" (Canadian Oxford Dictionary (2nd ed. 2004), sub verbo "affirm") Parliament's position on the scope of s. 35. The affirmations take this position [TRANSLATION] "as true" (Le Grand Robert de la langue française (electronic version), sub verbo "affirmer"), without any need for an amendment. Thus, the effect of these provisions is to affirm, not to amend.

[110] Here, Parliament has affirmed its position on the content of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. It is clear that, in this case, this affirmation is set out not in the Constitution but in an ordinary statute. The division of powers and the separation of powers provided for in the Constitution — between Parliament and the legislatures, in the former case, and between legislative bodies and the judiciary, in the latter — do not prevent Parliament from acting in this manner. Parliament, like the legislatures, can enact legislation that affirms its position on the meaning of the Constitution. As mentioned above, it is for the courts to interpret the Constitution where a case so requires

[112] It should be noted that the Attorney General of Canada, as well as a number of the interveners before this Court, argued that s. 35(1) protects Indigenous peoples' inherent right of self-government "in relation to child and family services", as the very wording of the Act affirms. This Court has not yet addressed the question, and it is unnecessary for it to do so in this case to provide the requested opinion on the constitutionality of the Act. The Court has noted that rights of self-government, insofar as they exist, "cannot be framed in excessively general terms" and cannot extend to a matter — for example, the regulation of gambling — that is not an integral part of the distinctive culture of the First Nations in question (see Delgamuukw, at para. 170; see also R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 821, at paras. 27-28). But the Court has never had to consider a matter as fundamental to the culture and identity of Indigenous peoples as the field of child and family services. While it has not discussed the question from the standpoint of an Aboriginal right of self-government, the Court has nonetheless referred to the collective dimension of the exercise of certain rights held by Indigenous communities, including: their right to enter into treaties (R. v. Sioui, 1990 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1025, at p. 1056); their rights incidental to Aboriginal title (Delgamuukw, at paras. 115 and 166; Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 SCR 257, at para. 75); and their Aboriginal rights, such as the right to fish (R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 666 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 533, at para. 17; R. v. Nikal, 1996 CanLII 245 (SCC), [1996] 1 SCR 1013, at para. 104) or the right to harvest wood (R. v. Sappier, 2006 SCC 54, [2006] 2 SCR 686, at para. 46). For its part, Parliament has declared — through a legislative affirmation — that it considers such a right to be recognized in relation to child and family services. This affirmation is part of the ongoing dialogue on the question among Parliament, the legislatures, Indigenous peoples and the courts (see P. W. Hogg and A. A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75, at pp. 79-80).

[113] This Court's jurisprudence recognizes the close link that exists between "cultural continuity" for Indigenous peoples, a principle to which the Act expressly refers in s. 9(2), and keeping Indigenous children in their community. As the Court stated in Canadian Western Bank with respect to s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, "relationships within Indian families and reserve communities [can] be considered absolutely indispensable and essential to their cultural survival" (para. 61). These relationships are "at the centre of what they do and what they are" (Delgamuukw, at para. 181, quoting Dick v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309, at p. 320). Indeed, the Crown has always clearly understood the role played by family in the survival of Indigenous culture. It is no coincidence that the Crown targeted Indigenous children when, at the height of its imperialism, it was seeking to destroy Indigenous cultures (see C.A. reasons, at para. 85).

(3) The Incorporation Provisions in Section 21 Do Not Alter the Architecture of the Constitution

[119] The Attorney General of Quebec argues that ss. 21 and 22(3) of the Act alter the architecture of the Constitution (R.F., at para. 26). The Court of Appeal reached the same conclusion, holding that these provisions purport to extend the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy to the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples in relation to child and family services and are therefore ultra vires s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 (paras. 537, 540-42 and 571). The Court of Appeal stated that the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples are not federal laws enacted under s. 91(24) but rather Indigenous laws that serve Indigenous imperatives (para. 540).

[120] In our view, given that this Court has not yet addressed the question of whether the right described in s. 18(1) has been proved, neither s. 21 nor s. 22(3) of the Act alters the architecture of the Constitution; both of these provisions were validly enacted under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[122] Section 21 of the Act is simply an incorporation by reference provision. It incorporates by reference the laws adopted by an Indigenous group, community or people and gives them the force of law as federal law. Moreover, because such laws may be amended, s. 21 incorporates the amendments that may be made to them in the future, on an anticipatory basis. Such an anticipatory incorporation by reference provision is constitutional.

[124] Legislative bodies have broad power to referentially incorporate provisions adopted by other entities, including other legislative bodies or non-governmental bodies. For example, Parliament can incorporate by reference a law enacted by a province (Coughlin v. Ontario Highway Transport Board, 1968 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1968] SCR 569, at p. 575; R. v. Smith, 1971 CanLII 171 (SCC), [1972] SCR 359, at p. 366; Dick, at p. 328; Wewaykum Indian Band v. Canada, 2002 SCC 79, [2002] 4 SCR 245, at paras. 114 and 136; Fédération des producteurs de volailles du Québec v. Pelland, 2005 SCC 20, [2005] 1 SCR 292, at paras. 53 and 61). This Court has also upheld the validity of a provincial legislature's incorporation by reference of laws made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom (Attorney General for Ontario v. Scott, 1955 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1956] SCR 137, at p. 152). Parliament may also referentially incorporate standards set by a non-governmental body (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1992 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 212, at pp. 230 and 234). Once Parliament has incorporated by reference provisions adopted by another entity, the "relevant provisions apply as federal law" (Wewaykum Indian Band, at para. 114). There is no doubt about the constitutionality of the drafting technique of incorporation by reference.

[127] One commentator has expressed doubts about the possibility that the incorporation by reference of the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples could be invalid, "since Parliament could easily adopt them piecemeal as they arise without violating subsection 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867" (Leclair, at p. 98 (footnote omitted)). We agree. Here, s. 21(1) of the Act validly incorporates by reference the laws in relation to child and family services, as amended from time to time, of an Indigenous group, community or people referred to in s. 20(3). As concluded above, Parliament has independent legislative authority to enact such laws pursuant to its jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians" under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. To answer the reference question before the Court, it suffices to say that the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples derive force of law from s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and from compliance with the requirements set out in ss. 20 and 21 of the Act. That being said, the Court is taking care not to exclude the possibility that the right of self-government has a distinct constitutional source. In particular, our conclusion certainly does not negate the possibility that such a right of self-government may be recognized under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This remains an open question.

[128] Parliament has also used appropriate language to incorporate by reference the laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples as they may be amended from time to time. Section 21(1) of the Act provides that such laws "ha[ve] . . . the force of law as federal law" once they have come into force. They apply as federal law from the time they are incorporated (Wewaykum Indian Band, at para. 114). Section 21(1) operates in tandem with s. 20(3), which conditions the application of s. 21 on the Indigenous governing body in question having entered into a coordination agreement or made reasonable efforts to do so. These mechanisms effect a valid anticipatory incorporation by reference.

(4) The Section 22(3) Paramountcy Provision Does Not Alter the Architecture of the Constitution

[131] The Attorney General of Quebec argues that s. 22(3) of the Act, the paramountcy provision, alters the architecture of the Constitution. In our view, this is not the case. Section 22(3) provides as follows: "For greater certainty, if there is a conflict or inconsistency between a provision respecting child and family services that is in a law of an Indigenous group, community or people and a provision respecting child and family services that is in a provincial Act or regulation, the provision that is in the law of the Indigenous group, community or people prevails to the extent of the conflict or inconsistency." The laws of Indigenous groups, communities or peoples that are incorporated by reference will have the force of law as federal law: laws incorporated into federal law apply as federal law (Wewaykum Indian Band, at para. 114). Section 22(3) is simply a legislative restatement of the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

VIII. Conclusion

[134] Developed in cooperation with Indigenous peoples, the Act represents a significant step forward on the path to reconciliation. It forms part of the implementation of the UNDRIP by Parliament. It also responds to call to action No. 4 made by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, which calls upon the federal government to establish national standards and to affirm the role of Indigenous governments in the area of child and family services. The Act creates space for Indigenous groups, communities and peoples to exercise their jurisdiction to care for their children. The recognition of this jurisdiction invites Indigenous communities to work with the Crown to weave together Indigenous, national and international laws in order to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families.

[135] The pith and substance of the Act, taken in its entirety, is to protect the well-being of Indigenous children, youth and families by promoting the delivery of culturally appropriate child and family services and, in so doing, to advance the process of reconciliation with Indigenous peoples. This important legislative initiative falls squarely within Parliament's legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[136] For these reasons, the following reference question:

> Is the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families ultra vires the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada under the Constitution of Canada?

is answered as follows:

> No.

[137] Accordingly, we dismiss the appeal of the Attorney General of Quebec and allow the appeal of the Attorney General of Canada.

Chapter 12: Section 35: Aboriginal Rights and Title

With contributions from Naiomi Metallic, Jodi Lazare and John Borrows

1 Introduction

When lawyers speak about "Indigenous law," they generally mean the law internal to a particular Indigenous nation: the rules according to which that group settles legal questions. "Aboriginal law," on the other hand, generally refers to the specialized body of Canadian state law that has come to apply to Indigenous populations in Canada. This set of materials deals with the latter body of law.

2 Aboriginal Rights

The Constitution Act, 1982 refers to Aboriginal rights three times. Most significantly, s 35 gives constitutional recognition and affirmation to the "existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada," which latter are defined as including "the Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada." This has had the effect of limiting legislation that interferes with those rights, and some of the foundational cases are excerpted below. The Act also provides that Aboriginal rights are not subject to limitation by Charter rights (s 25), and makes a commitment in principle to consultation with Indigenous representatives prior to any constitutional amendment (s 35.1).

In the sections that follow, consider how the SCC has interpreted the language of s 35, starting in 1990's case, R v Sparrow, in which the Court provided some general guidance and elaborated on the notions of extinguishment, and also developed a framework for justifying the infringement of Aboriginal rights. Notably, Section 35 is not part of the Charter, and so is not subject to the reasonable limits clause (s 1) or the override clause (s 33), but the SCC determined that no constitutional right is absolute. In R v Van der Peet, the Court added considerable detail to the test of proving the existence of an Aboriginal right. It adapted this test further in Gladstone to account for commercial Aboriginal rights.

2.1 R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

The Chief Justice and La Forest J. -- This appeal requires this Court to explore for the first time the scope of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and to indicate its strength as a promise to the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Section 35(1) is found in Part II of that Act, entitled "Rights of the Aboriginal Peoples of Canada", and provides as follows:

> 35. (1) The existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed.

The context of this appeal is the alleged violation of the terms of the Musqueam food fishing licence which are dictated by the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, and the regulations under that Act. The issue is whether Parliament's power to regulate fishing is now limited by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and, more specifically, whether the net length restriction in the licence is inconsistent with that provision.

Facts

The appellant, a member of the Musqueam Indian Band, was charged under s. 61(1) of the Fisheries Act of the offence of fishing with a drift net longer than that permitted by the terms of the Band's Indian food fishing licence. The fishing which gave rise to the charge took place on May 25, 1984 in Canoe Passage which is part of the area subject to the Band's licence. The licence, which had been issued for a one-year period beginning March 31, 1984, set out a number of restrictions including one that drift nets were to be limited to 25 fathoms in length. The appellant was caught with a net which was 45 fathoms in length. He has throughout admitted the facts alleged to constitute the offence, but has defended the charge on the basis that he was exercising an existing aboriginal right to fish and that the net length restriction contained in the Band's licence is inconsistent with s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and therefore invalid.

Analysis

We will address first the meaning of "existing" aboriginal rights and the content and scope of the Musqueam right to fish. We will then turn to the meaning of "recognized and affirmed", and the impact of s. 35(1) on the regulatory power of Parliament.

"Existing"

The word "existing" makes it clear that the rights to which s. 35(1) applies are those that were in existence when the Constitution Act, 1982 came into effect. This means that extinguished rights are not revived by the Constitution Act, 1982. …

Further, an existing aboriginal right cannot be read so as to incorporate the specific manner in which it was regulated before 1982. The notion of freezing existing rights would incorporate into the Constitution a crazy patchwork of regulations. …

Professor Slattery, "Understanding Aboriginal Rights" (1987), 66 Can. Bar Rev. 727, at pp. 781-82, has observed the following about reading regulations into the rights:

> This approach reads into the Constitution the myriad regulations affecting the exercise of aboriginal rights, regulations that differed considerably from place to place across the country. It does not permit differentiation between regulations of long-term significance and those enacted to deal with temporary conditions, or between reasonable and unreasonable restrictions. Moreover, it might require that a constitutional amendment be enacted to implement regulations more stringent than those in existence on 17 April 1982. This solution seems unsatisfactory.

The arbitrariness of such an approach can be seen if one considers the recent history of the federal regulation in the context of the present case and the fishing industry. If the Constitution Act, 1982 had been enacted a few years earlier, any right held by the Musqueam Band, on this approach, would have been constitutionally subjected to the restrictive regime of personal licences that had existed since 1917. Under that regime, the Musqueam catch had by 1969 become minor or non-existent. In 1978 a system of band licences was introduced on an experimental basis which permitted the Musqueam to fish with a 75 fathom net for a greater number of days than other people. Under this regime, from 1977 to 1984, the number of Band members who fished for food increased from 19 persons using 15 boats, to 64 persons using 38 boats, while 10 other members of the Band fished under commercial licences. Before this regime, the Band's food fish requirement had basically been provided by Band members who were licensed for commercial fishing. Since the regime introduced in 1978 was in force in 1982, then, under this approach, the scope and content of an aboriginal right to fish would be determined by the details of the Band's 1978 licence.

The unsuitability of the approach can also be seen from another perspective. Ninety-one other tribes of Indians, comprising over 20,000 people (compared with 540 Musqueam on the reserve and 100 others off the reserve) obtain their food fish from the Fraser River. Some or all of these bands may have an aboriginal right to fish there. A constitutional patchwork quilt would be created if the constitutional right of these bands were to be determined by the specific regime available to each of those bands in 1982.

Far from being defined according to the regulatory scheme in place in 1982, the phrase "existing aboriginal rights" must be interpreted flexibly so as to permit their evolution over time. To use Professor Slattery's expression, in "Understanding Aboriginal Rights," supra, at p. 782, the word "existing" suggests that those rights are "affirmed in a contemporary form rather than in their primeval simplicity and vigour". Clearly, then, an approach to the constitutional guarantee embodied in s. 35(1) which would incorporate "frozen rights" must be rejected.

The Aboriginal Right

We turn now to the aboriginal right at stake in this appeal. The Musqueam Indian Reserve is located on the north shore of the Fraser River close to the mouth of that river and within the limits of the City of Vancouver. There has been a Musqueam village there for hundreds of years. This appeal does not directly concern the reserve or the adjacent waters, but arises out of the Band's right to fish in another area of the Fraser River estuary known as Canoe Passage in the South Arm of the river, some 16 kilometres (about 10 miles) from the reserve. The reserve and those waters are separated by the Vancouver International Airport and the Municipality of Richmond.

The evidence reveals that the Musqueam have lived in the area as an organized society long before the coming of European settlers, and that the taking of salmon was an integral part of their lives and remains so to this day. Much of the evidence of an aboriginal right to fish was given by Dr. Suttles, an anthropologist, supported by that of Mr. Grant, the Band administrator. The Court of Appeal thus summarized Dr. Suttles' evidence, at pp. 307-308:

> Dr. Suttles was qualified as having particular qualifications in respect of the ethnography of the Coast Salish Indian people of which the Musqueams were one of several tribes. He thought that the Musqueam had lived in their historic territory, which includes the Fraser River estuary, for at least 1,500 years. That historic territory extended from the north shore of Burrard Inlet to the south shore of the main channel of the Fraser River, including the waters of the three channels by which that river reaches the ocean. As part of the Salish people, the Musqueam were part of a regional social network covering a much larger area but, as a tribe, were themselves an organized social group with their own name, territory and resources. Between the tribes there was a flow of people, wealth and food. No tribe was wholly self-sufficient or occupied its territory to the complete exclusion of others.
> Dr. Suttles described the special position occupied by the salmon fishery in that society. The salmon was not only an important source of food but played an important part in the system of beliefs of the Salish people, and in their ceremonies. The salmon were held to be a race of beings that had, in "myth times", established a bond with human beings requiring the salmon to come each year to give their bodies to the humans who, in turn, treated them with respect shown by performance of the proper ritual. Toward the salmon, as toward other creatures, there was an attitude of caution and respect which resulted in effective conservation of the various species.

While the trial for a violation of a penal prohibition may not be the most appropriate setting in which to determine the existence of an aboriginal right, and the evidence was not extensive, the correctness of the finding of fact of the trial judge "that Mr. Sparrow was fishing in ancient tribal territory where his ancestors had fished from time immemorial in that part of the mouth of the Fraser River for salmon" is supported by the evidence and was not contested. The existence of the right, the Court of Appeal tells us, was "not the subject of serious dispute". It is not surprising, then, that, taken with other circumstances, that court should find, at p. 320, that "the judgment appealed from was wrong in . . . failing to hold that Sparrow at the relevant time was exercising an existing aboriginal right".

In this Court, however, the respondent contested the Court of Appeal's finding, contending that the evidence was insufficient to discharge the appellant's burden of proof upon the issue. It is true that for the period from 1867 to 1961 the evidence is scanty. But the evidence was not disputed or contradicted in the courts below and there is evidence of sufficient continuity of the right to support the Court of Appeal's finding, and we would not disturb it.

What the Crown really insisted on, both in this Court and the courts below, was that the Musqueam Band's aboriginal right to fish had been extinguished by regulations under the Fisheries Act.

It is [the] progressive restriction and detailed regulation of the fisheries which, respondent's counsel maintained, have had the effect of extinguishing any aboriginal right to fish. The extinguishment need not be express, he argued, but may take place where the sovereign authority is exercised in a manner "necessarily inconsistent" with the continued enjoyment of aboriginal rights… The consent to its extinguishment before the Constitution Act, 1982 was not required; the intent of the Sovereign could be effected not only by statute but by valid regulations. Here, in his view, the regulations had entirely displaced any aboriginal right. There is, he submitted, a fundamental inconsistency between the communal right to fish embodied in the aboriginal right, and fishing under a special licence or permit issued to individual Indians (as was the case until 1977) in the discretion of the Minister and subject to terms and conditions which, if breached, may result in cancellation of the licence. The Fisheries Act and its regulations were, he argued, intended to constitute a complete code inconsistent with the continued existence of an aboriginal right.

At bottom, the respondent's argument confuses regulation with extinguishment. That the right is controlled in great detail by the regulations does not mean that the right is thereby extinguished….

The test of extinguishment to be adopted, in our opinion, is that the Sovereign's intention must be clear and plain if it is to extinguish an aboriginal right.

There is nothing in the Fisheries Act or its detailed regulations that demonstrates a clear and plain intention to extinguish the Indian aboriginal right to fish. The fact that express provision permitting the Indians to fish for food may have applied to all Indians and that for an extended period permits were discretionary and issued on an individual rather than a communal basis in no way shows a clear intention to extinguish. These permits were simply a manner of controlling the fisheries, not defining underlying rights.

We would conclude then that the Crown has failed to discharge its burden of proving extinguishment…

The scope of the existing Musqueam right to fish must now be delineated. The anthropological evidence relied on to establish the existence of the right suggests that, for the Musqueam, the salmon fishery has always constituted an integral part of their distinctive culture. Its significant role involved not only consumption for subsistence purposes, but also consumption of salmon on ceremonial and social occasions. The Musqueam have always fished for reasons connected to their cultural and physical survival. As we stated earlier, the right to do so may be exercised in a contemporary manner.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal in this case held that the aboriginal right was to fish for food purposes, but that purpose was not to be confined to mere subsistence. Rather, the right was found to extend to fish consumed for social and ceremonial activities…

The Court of Appeal's position was attacked from both sides. The respondent for its part, argued that, if an aboriginal right to fish does exist, it does not include the right to take fish for the ceremonial and social activities of the Band. The appellant, on the other hand, attacked the Court of Appeal's restriction of the right to a right to fish for food. He argued that the principle that the holders of aboriginal rights may exercise those rights according to their own discretion has been recognized by this Court in the context of the protection of treaty hunting rights (Simon v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 387) and that it should be applied in this case such that the right is defined as a right to fish for any purpose and by any non-dangerous method.

In relation to this submission, it was contended before this Court that the aboriginal right extends to commercial fishing. While no commercial fishery existed prior to the arrival of European settlers, it is contended that the Musqueam practice of bartering in early society may be revived as a modern right to fish for commercial purposes. …

Government regulations governing the exercise of the Musqueam right to fish, as described above, have only recognized the right to fish for food for over a hundred years. This may have reflected the existing position. However, historical policy on the part of the Crown is not only incapable of extinguishing the existing aboriginal right without clear intention, but is also incapable of, in itself, delineating that right. The nature of government regulations cannot be determinative of the content and scope of an existing aboriginal right. Government policy can however regulate the exercise of that right, but such regulation must be in keeping with s. 35(1).

In the courts below, the case at bar was not presented on the footing of an aboriginal right to fish for commercial or livelihood purposes. Rather, the focus was and continues to be on the validity of a net length restriction affecting the appellant's food fishing licence. We therefore adopt the Court of Appeal's characterization of the right for the purpose of this appeal, and confine our reasons to the meaning of the constitutional recognition and affirmation of the existing aboriginal right to fish for food and social and ceremonial purposes.

"Recognized and Affirmed"

We now turn to the impact of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 on the regulatory power of Parliament and on the outcome of this appeal specifically.

Counsel for the appellant argued that the effect of s. 35(1) is to deny Parliament's power to restrictively regulate aboriginal fishing rights under s. 91(24) ("Indians and Lands Reserved for the Indians"), and s. 91(12) ("Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries"). The essence of this submission, supported by the intervener, the National Indian Brotherhood / Assembly of First Nations, is that the right to regulate is part of the right to use the resource in the Band's discretion. Section 35(1) is not subject to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms nor to legislative override under s. 33. The appellant submitted that, if the regulatory power continued, the limits on its extent are set by the word "inconsistent" in s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and the protective and remedial purposes of s. 35(1). This means that aboriginal title entails a right to fish by any non-dangerous method chosen by the aboriginals engaged in fishing. Any continuing governmental power of regulation would have to be exceptional and strictly limited to regulation that is clearly not inconsistent with the protective and remedial purposes of s. 35(1). Thus, counsel for the appellant speculated, "in certain circumstances, necessary and reasonable conservation measures might qualify" (emphasis added) -- where for example such measures were necessary to prevent serious impairment of the aboriginal rights of present and future generations, where conservation could only be achieved by restricting the right and not by restricting fishing by other users, and where the aboriginal group concerned was unwilling to implement necessary conservation measures. The onus of proving a justification for restrictive regulations would lie with the government by analogy with s. 1 of the Charter.

In response to these submissions and in finding the appropriate interpretive framework for s. 35(1), we start by looking at the background of s. 35(1).

It is worth recalling that while British policy towards the native population was based on respect for their right to occupy their traditional lands, a proposition to which the Royal Proclamation of 1763 bears witness, there was from the outset never any doubt that sovereignty and legislative power, and indeed the underlying title, to such lands vested in the Crown… And there can be no doubt that over the years the rights of the Indians were often honoured in the breach…

For many years, the rights of the Indians to their aboriginal lands -- certainly as legal rights -- were virtually ignored. The leading cases defining Indian rights in the early part of the century were directed at claims supported by the Royal Proclamation or other legal instruments, and even these cases were essentially concerned with settling legislative jurisdiction or the rights of commercial enterprises. For fifty years after the publication of Clement's The Law of the Canadian Constitution (3rd ed. 1916), there was a virtual absence of discussion of any kind of Indian rights to land even in academic literature. By the late 1960s, aboriginal claims were not even recognized by the federal government as having any legal status. Thus the Statement of the Government of Canada on Indian Policy (1969), although well meaning, contained the assertion (at p. 11) that "aboriginal claims to land . . . are so general and undefined that it is not realistic to think of them as specific claims capable of remedy except through a policy and program that will end injustice to the Indians as members of the Canadian community". In the same general period, the James Bay development by Quebec Hydro was originally initiated without regard to the rights of the Indians who lived there, even though these were expressly protected by a constitutional instrument… It took a number of judicial decisions and notably the Calder case in this Court (1973) to prompt a reassessment of the position being taken by government.

In the light of its reassessment of Indian claims following Calder, the federal Government on August 8, 1973 issued "a statement of policy" regarding Indian lands. By it, it sought to "signify the Government's recognition and acceptance of its continuing responsibility under the British North America Act for Indians and lands reserved for Indians", which it regarded "as an historic evolution dating back to the Royal Proclamation of 1763, which, whatever differences there may be about its judicial interpretation, stands as a basic declaration of the Indian people's interests in land in this country". (Emphasis added.) See Statement made by the Honourable Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on Claims of Indian and Inuit People, August 8, 1973. The remarks about these lands were intended "as an expression of acknowledged responsibility". But the statement went on to express, for the first time, the government's willingness to negotiate regarding claims of aboriginal title, specifically in British Columbia, Northern Quebec, and the Territories, and this without regard to formal supporting documents. "The Government", it stated, "is now ready to negotiate with authorized representatives of these native peoples on the basis that where their traditional interest in the lands concerned can be established, an agreed form of compensation or benefit will be provided to native peoples in return for their interest."

It is obvious from its terms that the approach taken towards aboriginal claims in the 1973 statement constituted an expression of a policy, rather than a legal position… As recently as Guerin v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, the federal government argued in this Court that any federal obligation was of a political character.

It is clear, then, that s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, represents the culmination of a long and difficult struggle in both the political forum and the courts for the constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights. The strong representations of native associations and other groups concerned with the welfare of Canada's aboriginal peoples made the adoption of s. 35(1) possible and it is important to note that the provision applies to the Indians, the Inuit and the Métis. Section 35(1), at the least, provides a solid constitutional base upon which subsequent negotiations can take place. It also affords aboriginal peoples constitutional protection against provincial legislative power. …

In our opinion, the significance of s. 35(1) extends beyond these fundamental effects. Professor Lyon in "An Essay on Constitutional Interpretation" (1988), 26 Osgoode Hall L.J. 95, says the following about s. 35(1), at p. 100:

> . . . the context of 1982 is surely enough to tell us that this is not just a codification of the case law on aboriginal rights that had accumulated by 1982. Section 35 calls for a just settlement for aboriginal peoples. It renounces the old rules of the game under which the Crown established courts of law and denied those courts the authority to question sovereign claims made by the Crown.

The approach to be taken with respect to interpreting the meaning of s. 35(1) is derived from general principles of constitutional interpretation, principles relating to aboriginal rights, and the purposes behind the constitutional provision itself. Here, we will sketch the framework for an interpretation of "recognized and affirmed" that, in our opinion, gives appropriate weight to the constitutional nature of these words.

The nature of s. 35(1) itself suggests that it be construed in a purposive way. When the purposes of the affirmation of aboriginal rights are considered, it is clear that a generous, liberal interpretation of the words in the constitutional provision is demanded…

In Guerin, supra, the Musqueam Band surrendered reserve lands to the Crown for lease to a golf club. The terms obtained by the Crown were much less favourable than those approved by the Band at the surrender meeting. This Court found that the Crown owed a fiduciary obligation to the Indians with respect to the lands. The sui generis nature of Indian title, and the historic powers and responsibility assumed by the Crown constituted the source of such a fiduciary obligation. In our opinion, Guerin, together with R. v. Taylor and Williams (1981), 1981 CanLII 1657 (ON CA), 34 O.R. (2d) 360, ground a general guiding principle for s. 35(1). That is, the Government has the responsibility to act in a fiduciary capacity with respect to aboriginal peoples. The relationship between the Government and aboriginals is trust-like, rather than adversarial, and contemporary recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights must be defined in light of this historic relationship.

We agree with both the British Columbia Court of Appeal below and the Ontario Court of Appeal that the principles outlined above … As commentators have noted, s. 35(1) is a solemn commitment that must be given meaningful content …

In response to the appellant's submission that s. 35(1) rights are more securely protected than the rights guaranteed by the Charter, it is true that s. 35(1) is not subject to s. 1 of the Charter. In our opinion, this does not mean that any law or regulation affecting aboriginal rights will automatically be of no force or effect by the operation of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Legislation that affects the exercise of aboriginal rights will nonetheless be valid, if it meets the test for justifying an interference with a right recognized and affirmed under s. 35(1).

There is no explicit language in the provision that authorizes this Court or any court to assess the legitimacy of any government legislation that restricts aboriginal rights. Yet, we find that the words "recognition and affirmation" incorporate the fiduciary relationship referred to earlier and so import some restraint on the exercise of sovereign power. Rights that are recognized and affirmed are not absolute. Federal legislative powers continue, including, of course, the right to legislate with respect to Indians pursuant to s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. These powers must, however, now be read together with s. 35(1). In other words, federal power must be reconciled with federal duty and the best way to achieve that reconciliation is to demand the justification of any government regulation that infringes upon or denies aboriginal rights. Such scrutiny is in keeping with the liberal interpretive principle enunciated in Nowegijick, supra, and the concept of holding the Crown to a high standard of honourable dealing with respect to the aboriginal peoples of Canada as suggested by Guerin v. The Queen, supra.

We refer to Professor Slattery's "Understanding Aboriginal Rights", supra, with respect to the task of envisioning a s. 35(1) justificatory process. Professor Slattery, at p. 782, points out that a justificatory process is required as a compromise between a "patchwork" characterization of aboriginal rights whereby past regulations would be read into a definition of the rights, and a characterization that would guarantee aboriginal rights in their original form unrestricted by subsequent regulation. We agree with him that these two extreme positions must be rejected in favour of a justificatory scheme.

Section 35(1) suggests that while regulation affecting aboriginal rights is not precluded, such regulation must be enacted according to a valid objective. Our history has shown, unfortunately all too well, that Canada's aboriginal peoples are justified in worrying about government objectives that may be superficially neutral but which constitute de facto threats to the existence of aboriginal rights and interests. By giving aboriginal rights constitutional status and priority, Parliament and the provinces have sanctioned challenges to social and economic policy objectives embodied in legislation to the extent that aboriginal rights are affected. Implicit in this constitutional scheme is the obligation of the legislature to satisfy the test of justification. The way in which a legislative objective is to be attained must uphold the honour of the Crown and must be in keeping with the unique contemporary relationship, grounded in history and policy, between the Crown and Canada's aboriginal peoples. The extent of legislative or regulatory impact on an existing aboriginal right may be scrutinized so as to ensure recognition and affirmation.

The constitutional recognition afforded by the provision therefore gives a measure of control over government conduct and a strong check on legislative power. While it does not promise immunity from government regulation in a society that, in the twentieth century, is increasingly more complex, interdependent and sophisticated, and where exhaustible resources need protection and management, it does hold the Crown to a substantive promise. The government is required to bear the burden of justifying any legislation that has some negative effect on any aboriginal right protected under s. 35(1).

In these reasons, we will outline the appropriate analysis under s. 35(1) in the context of a regulation made pursuant to the Fisheries Act. We wish to emphasize the importance of context and a case-by-case approach to s. 35(1). Given the generality of the text of the constitutional provision, and especially in light of the complexities of aboriginal history, society and rights, the contours of a justificatory standard must be defined in the specific factual context of each case.

Section 35(1) and the Regulation of the Fisheries

Taking the above framework as guidance, we propose to set out the test for prima facie interference with an existing aboriginal right and for the justification of such an interference…

The first question to be asked is whether the legislation in question has the effect of interfering with an existing aboriginal right. If it does have such an effect, it represents a prima facie infringement of s. 35(1). Parliament is not expected to act in a manner contrary to the rights and interests of aboriginals, and, indeed, may be barred from doing so by the second stage of s. 35(1) analysis. The inquiry with respect to interference begins with a reference to the characteristics or incidents of the right at stake. Our earlier observations regarding the scope of the aboriginal right to fish are relevant here. Fishing rights are not traditional property rights. They are rights held by a collective and are in keeping with the culture and existence of that group. Courts must be careful, then, to avoid the application of traditional common law concepts of property as they develop their understanding of what the reasons for judgment in Guerin, supra, at p. 382, referred to as the "sui generis" nature of aboriginal rights. (See also Little Bear, "A Concept of Native Title," [1982] 5 Can. Legal Aid Bul. 99.)

While it is impossible to give an easy definition of fishing rights, it is possible, and, indeed, crucial, to be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective itself on the meaning of the rights at stake. For example, it would be artificial to try to create a hard distinction between the right to fish and the particular manner in which that right is exercised.

To determine whether the fishing rights have been interfered with such as to constitute a prima facie infringement of s. 35(1), certain questions must be asked. First, is the limitation unreasonable? Second, does the regulation impose undue hardship? Third, does the regulation deny to the holders of the right their preferred means of exercising that right? The onus of proving a prima facie infringement lies on the individual or group challenging the legislation. In relation to the facts of this appeal, the regulation would be found to be a prima facie interference if it were found to be an adverse restriction on the Musqueam exercise of their right to fish for food. We wish to note here that the issue does not merely require looking at whether the fish catch has been reduced below that needed for the reasonable food and ceremonial needs of the Musqueam Indians. Rather the test involves asking whether either the purpose or the effect of the restriction on net length unnecessarily infringes the interests protected by the fishing right. If, for example, the Musqueam were forced to spend undue time and money per fish caught or if the net length reduction resulted in a hardship to the Musqueam in catching fish, then the first branch of the s. 35(1) analysis would be met.

If a prima facie interference is found, the analysis moves to the issue of justification. This is the test that addresses the question of what constitutes legitimate regulation of a constitutional aboriginal right. The justification analysis would proceed as follows. First, is there a valid legislative objective? Here the court would inquire into whether the objective of Parliament in authorizing the department to enact regulations regarding fisheries is valid. The objective of the department in setting out the particular regulations would also be scrutinized. An objective aimed at preserving s. 35(1) rights by conserving and managing a natural resource, for example, would be valid. Also valid would be objectives purporting to prevent the exercise of s. 35(1) rights that would cause harm to the general populace or to aboriginal peoples themselves, or other objectives found to be compelling and substantial.

The Court of Appeal below held, at p. 331, that regulations could be valid if reasonably justified as "necessary for the proper management and conservation of the resource or in the public interest". (Emphasis added.) We find the "public interest" justification to be so vague as to provide no meaningful guidance and so broad as to be unworkable as a test for the justification of a limitation on constitutional rights.

The justification of conservation and resource management, on the other hand, is surely uncontroversial…

…it is clear that the value of conservation purposes for government legislation and action has long been recognized. Further, the conservation and management of our resources is consistent with aboriginal beliefs and practices, and, indeed, with the enhancement of aboriginal rights.

If a valid legislative objective is found, the analysis proceeds to the second part of the justification issue. Here, we refer back to the guiding interpretive principle [that] the honour of the Crown is at stake in dealings with aboriginal peoples. The special trust relationship and the responsibility of the government vis-à-vis aboriginals must be the first consideration in determining whether the legislation or action in question can be justified.

The problem that arises in assessing the legislation in light of its objective and the responsibility of the Crown is that the pursuit of conservation in a heavily used modern fishery inevitably blurs with the efficient allocation and management of this scarce and valued resource. The nature of the constitutional protection afforded by s. 35(1) in this context demands that there be a link between the question of justification and the allocation of priorities in the fishery. The constitutional recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights may give rise to conflict with the interests of others given the limited nature of the resource. There is a clear need for guidelines that will resolve the allocational problems that arise regarding the fisheries. We refer to the reasons of Dickson J., as he then was, in Jack v. The Queen, supra, for such guidelines.

In Jack, the appellants' defence to a charge of fishing for salmon in certain rivers during a prohibited period was based on the alleged constitutional incapacity of Parliament to legislate such as to deny the Indians their right to fish for food. They argued that art. 13 of the British Columbia Terms of Union imposed a constitutional limitation on the federal power to regulate. While we recognize that the finding that such a limitation had been imposed was not adopted by the majority of this Court, we point out that this case concerns a different constitutional promise that asks this Court to give a meaningful interpretation to recognition and affirmation. That task requires equally meaningful guidelines responsive to the constitutional priority accorded aboriginal rights. …

The constitutional nature of the Musqueam food fishing rights means that any allocation of priorities after valid conservation measures have been implemented must give top priority to Indian food fishing. If the objective pertained to conservation, the conservation plan would be scrutinized to assess priorities. While the detailed allocation of maritime resources is a task that must be left to those having expertise in the area, the Indians' food requirements must be met first when that allocation is established. The significance of giving the aboriginal right to fish for food top priority can be described as follows. If, in a given year, conservation needs required a reduction in the number of fish to be caught such that the number equalled the number required for food by the Indians, then all the fish available after conservation would go to the Indians according to the constitutional nature of their fishing right. If, more realistically, there were still fish after the Indian food requirements were met, then the brunt of conservation measures would be borne by the practices of sport fishing and commercial fishing.

We acknowledge the fact that the justificatory standard to be met may place a heavy burden on the Crown. However, government policy with respect to the British Columbia fishery, regardless of s. 35(1), already dictates that, in allocating the right to take fish, Indian food fishing is to be given priority over the interests of other user groups. The constitutional entitlement embodied in s. 35(1) requires the Crown to ensure that its regulations are in keeping with that allocation of priority. The objective of this requirement is not to undermine Parliament's ability and responsibility with respect to creating and administering overall conservation and management plans regarding the salmon fishery. The objective is rather to guarantee that those plans treat aboriginal peoples in a way ensuring that their rights are taken seriously.

Within the analysis of justification, there are further questions to be addressed, depending on the circumstances of the inquiry. These include the questions of whether there has been as little infringement as possible in order to effect the desired result; whether, in a situation of expropriation, fair compensation is available; and, whether the aboriginal group in question has been consulted with respect to the conservation measures being implemented. The aboriginal peoples, with their history of conservation-consciousness and interdependence with natural resources, would surely be expected, at the least, to be informed regarding the determination of an appropriate scheme for the regulation of the fisheries.

We would not wish to set out an exhaustive list of the factors to be considered in the assessment of justification. Suffice it to say that recognition and affirmation require sensitivity to and respect for the rights of aboriginal peoples on behalf of the government, courts and indeed all Canadians.

Application to this Case -- Is the Net Length Restriction Valid?

The Court of Appeal below found that there was not sufficient evidence in this case to proceed with an analysis of s. 35(1) with respect to the right to fish for food. In reviewing the competing expert evidence, and recognizing that fish stock management is an uncertain science, it decided that the issues at stake in this appeal were not well adapted to being resolved at the appellate court level.

According to the Court of Appeal, the findings of fact were insufficient to lead to an acquittal. There was no more evidence before this Court. We also would order a re-trial which would allow findings of fact according to the tests set out in these reasons.

The appellant would bear the burden of showing that the net length restriction constituted a prima facie infringement of the collective aboriginal right to fish for food. If an infringement were found, the onus would shift to the Crown which would have to demonstrate that the regulation is justifiable. To that end, the Crown would have to show that there is no underlying unconstitutional objective such as shifting more of the resource to a user group that ranks below the Musqueam. Further, it would have to show that the regulation sought to be imposed is required to accomplish the needed limitation. In trying to show that the restriction is necessary in the circumstances of the Fraser River fishery, the Crown could use facts pertaining to fishing by other Fraser River Indians.

In conclusion, we would dismiss the appeal and the cross-appeal and affirm the Court of Appeal's setting aside of the conviction. We would accordingly affirm the order for a new trial on the questions of infringement and whether any infringement is nonetheless consistent with s. 35(1), in accordance with the interpretation set out here.

What do you make of the Court's introduction of a limitations test for s 35 that resembles the Oakes test? Does this approach to justification provide sufficient protection to Aboriginal and treaty rights?

THE CHIEF JUSTICE --

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal… raises the issue left unresolved by this Court in its judgment in R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075: How are the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 to be defined?

[2] In Sparrow, Dickson C.J. and La Forest J., writing for a unanimous Court, outlined the framework for analyzing s. 35(1) claims. First, a court must determine whether an applicant has demonstrated that he or she was acting pursuant to an aboriginal right. Second, a court must determine whether that right has been extinguished. Third, a court must determine whether that right has been infringed. Finally, a court must determine whether the infringement is justified. In Sparrow, however, it was not seriously disputed that the Musqueam had an aboriginal right to fish for food, with the result that it was unnecessary for the Court to answer the question of how the rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) are to be defined. It is this question and, in particular, the question of whether s. 35(1) recognizes and affirms the right of the Sto:lo to sell fish, which must now be answered by this Court.

[3] In order to define the scope of aboriginal rights, it will be necessary first to articulate the purposes which underpin s. 35(1), specifically the reasons underlying its recognition and affirmation of the unique constitutional status of aboriginal peoples in Canada. Until it is understood why aboriginal rights exist, and are constitutionally protected, no definition of those rights is possible. As Dickson J. (as he then was) said in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 344, a constitutional provision must be understood "in the light of the interests it was meant to protect". This principle, articulated in relation to the rights protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, applies equally to the interpretation of s. 35(1).

II. Statement of Facts

[5] The appellant Dorothy Van der Peet was charged under s. 61(1) of the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, with the offence of selling fish caught under the authority of an Indian food fish licence, contrary to s. 27(5) of the British Columbia Fishery (General) Regulations, SOR/84-248. At the time at which the appellant was charged s. 27(5) read:

27 (5) No person shall sell, barter or offer to sell or barter any fish caught under the authority of an Indian food fish licence.

[6] The charges arose out of the sale by the appellant of 10 salmon on September 11, 1987. The salmon had been caught by Steven and Charles Jimmy under the authority of an Indian food fish licence. Charles Jimmy is the common law spouse of the appellant. The appellant, a member of the Sto:lo, has not contested these facts at any time, instead defending the charges against her on the basis that in selling the fish she was exercising an existing aboriginal right to sell fish. The appellant has based her defence on the position that the restrictions imposed by s. 27(5) of the Regulations infringe her existing aboriginal right to sell fish and are therefore invalid on the basis that they violate s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

V. Analysis

Introduction

[15] I now turn to the question which, as I have already suggested, lies at the heart of this appeal: How should the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 be defined?

[16] In her factum the appellant argued that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred because it defined the rights in s. 35(1) in a fashion which "converted a Right into a Relic"; such an approach, the appellant argued, is inconsistent with the fact that the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) are rights and not simply aboriginal practices. The appellant acknowledged that aboriginal rights are based in aboriginal societies and cultures, but argued that the majority of the Court of Appeal erred because it defined aboriginal rights through the identification of pre-contact activities instead of as pre-existing legal rights.

[17] While the appellant is correct to suggest that the mere existence of an activity in a particular aboriginal community prior to contact with Europeans is not, in itself, sufficient foundation for the definition of aboriginal rights, the position she would have this Court adopt takes s. 35(1) too far from that which the provision is intended to protect. Section 35(1), it is true, recognizes and affirms existing aboriginal rights, but it must not be forgotten that the rights it recognizes and affirms are aboriginal.

[18] In the liberal enlightenment view, reflected in the American Bill of Rights and, more indirectly, in the Charter, rights are held by all people in society because each person is entitled to dignity and respect. Rights are general and universal; they are the way in which the "inherent dignity" of each individual in society is respected: R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, at p. 136; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 336.

[19] Aboriginal rights cannot, however, be defined on the basis of the philosophical precepts of the liberal enlightenment. Although equal in importance and significance to the rights enshrined in the Charter, aboriginal rights must be viewed differently from Charter rights because they are rights held only by aboriginal members of Canadian society. They arise from the fact that aboriginal people are aboriginal…

[20] The task of this Court is to define aboriginal rights in a manner which recognizes that aboriginal rights are rights but which does so without losing sight of the fact that they are rights held by aboriginal people because they are aboriginal. The Court must neither lose sight of the generalized constitutional status of what s. 35(1) protects, nor can it ignore the necessary specificity which comes from granting special constitutional protection to one part of Canadian society. The Court must define the scope of s. 35(1) in a way which captures both the aboriginal and the rights in aboriginal rights.

[21] The way to accomplish this task is, as was noted at the outset, through a purposive approach to s. 35(1). It is through identifying the interests that s. 35(1) was intended to protect that the dual nature of aboriginal rights will be comprehended. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, Dickson J. explained the rationale for a purposive approach to constitutional documents. Courts should take a purposive approach to the Constitution because constitutions are, by their very nature, documents aimed at a country's future as well as its present; the Constitution must be interpreted in a manner which renders it "capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers": Hunter, supra, at p. 155. A purposive approach to s. 35(1), because ensuring that the provision is not viewed as static and only relevant to current circumstances, will ensure that the recognition and affirmation it offers are consistent with the fact that what it is recognizing and affirming are "rights". Further, because it requires the court to analyze a given constitutional provision "in the light of the interests it was meant to protect"(Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 344), a purposive approach to s. 35(1) will ensure that that which is found to fall within the provision is related to the provision's intended focus: aboriginal people and their rights in relation to Canadian society as a whole.

General Principles Applicable to Legal Disputes Between Aboriginal Peoples and the Crown

[23] Before turning to a purposive analysis of s. 35(1), however, it should be noted that such analysis must take place in light of the general principles which apply to the legal relationship between the Crown and aboriginal peoples. In Sparrow, supra, this Court held at p. 1106 that s. 35(1) should be given a generous and liberal interpretation in favour of aboriginal peoples…

[24] This interpretive principle, articulated first in the context of treaty rights … arises from the nature of the relationship between the Crown and aboriginal peoples. The Crown has a fiduciary obligation to aboriginal peoples with the result that in dealings between the government and aboriginals the honour of the Crown is at stake. Because of this fiduciary relationship, and its implication of the honour of the Crown, treaties, s. 35(1), and other statutory and constitutional provisions protecting the interests of aboriginal peoples, must be given a generous and liberal interpretation: R. v. George, 1966 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1966] S.C.R. 267, at p. 279. This general principle must inform the Court's analysis of the purposes underlying s. 35(1), and of that provision's definition and scope.

[25] The fiduciary relationship of the Crown and aboriginal peoples also means that where there is any doubt or ambiguity with regards to what falls within the scope and definition of s. 35(1), such doubt or ambiguity must be resolved in favour of aboriginal peoples…

[28] In identifying the basis for the recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights it must be remembered that s. 35(1) did not create the legal doctrine of aboriginal rights; aboriginal rights existed and were recognized under the common law: Calder v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, 1973 CanLII 4 (SCC), [1973] S.C.R. 313. At common law aboriginal rights did not, of course, have constitutional status, with the result that Parliament could, at any time, extinguish or regulate those rights… Subsequent to s. 35(1) aboriginal rights cannot be extinguished and can only be regulated or infringed consistent with the justificatory test laid out by this Court in Sparrow, supra.

[30] In my view, the doctrine of aboriginal rights exists, and is recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), because of one simple fact: when Europeans arrived in North America, aboriginal peoples were already here, living in communities on the land, and participating in distinctive cultures, as they had done for centuries. It is this fact, and this fact above all others, which separates aboriginal peoples from all other minority groups in Canadian society and which mandates their special legal, and now constitutional, status.

[31] More specifically, what s. 35(1) does is provide the constitutional framework through which the fact that aboriginals lived on the land in distinctive societies, with their own practices, traditions and cultures, is acknowledged and reconciled with the sovereignty of the Crown. The substantive rights which fall within the provision must be defined in light of this purpose; the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) must be directed towards the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown.

[32] That the purpose of s. 35(1) lies in its recognition of the prior occupation of North America by aboriginal peoples is suggested by the French version of the text. For the English "existing aboriginal and treaty rights" the French text reads "[l]es droits existants -- ancestraux ou issus de traités". The term "ancestral", which Le Petit Robert 1 (1990) dictionary defines as "[q]ui a appartenu aux ancêtres, qu'on tient des ancêtres", suggests that the rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) must be temporally rooted in the historical presence -- the ancestry -- of aboriginal peoples in North America.

[33] This approach to s. 35(1) is also supported by the prior jurisprudence of this Court. [A brief discussion of pre-1982 Aboriginal title cases follows, cited for the purpose of basing Aboriginal rights in Indigenous societies' prior occupation of the territory].

[35] The view of aboriginal rights as based in the prior occupation of North America by distinctive aboriginal societies, finds support in the early American decisions of Marshall C.J. …

[36] In Johnson v. M'Intosh, 21 U.S. (8 Wheat.) 543 (1823), the first of the Marshall decisions on aboriginal title, the Supreme Court held that Indian land could only be alienated by the U.S. government, not by the Indians themselves. In the course of his decision (written for the court), Marshall C.J. outlined the history of the exploration of North America by the countries of Europe and the relationship between this exploration and aboriginal title. In his view, aboriginal title is the right of aboriginal people to land arising from the intersection of their pre-existing occupation of the land with the assertion of sovereignty over that land by various European nations. The substance and nature of aboriginal rights to land are determined by this intersection…

It is, similarly, the reconciliation of pre-existing aboriginal claims to the territory that now constitutes Canada, with the assertion of British sovereignty over that territory, to which the recognition and affirmation of aboriginal rights in s. 35(1) is directed.

[38] The High Court of Australia has also considered the question of the basis and nature of aboriginal rights. Like that of the United States, Australia's aboriginal law differs in significant respects from that of Canada… Despite these relevant differences, the analysis of the basis of aboriginal title in the landmark decision of the High Court in Mabo v. Queensland [No. 2] (1992), 175 C.L.R. 1, is persuasive in the Canadian context.

[39] The Mabo judgment resolved the dispute between the Meriam people and the Crown regarding who had title to the Murray Islands. The islands had been annexed to Queensland in 1879 but were reserved for the native inhabitants (the Meriam) in 1882. The Crown argued that this annexation was sufficient to vest absolute ownership of the lands in the Crown. The High Court disagreed, holding that while the annexation did vest radical title in the Crown, it was insufficient to eliminate a claim for native title; the court held at pp. 50-51 that native title can exist as a burden on the radical title of the Crown: "there is no reason why land within the Crown's territory should not continue to be subject to native title. It is only the fallacy of equating sovereignty and beneficial ownership of land that gives rise to the notion that native title is extinguished by the acquisition of sovereignty".

[40] From this premise, Brennan J., writing for a majority of the Court, went on at p. 58 to consider the nature and basis of aboriginal title:

> Native title has its origin in and is given its content by the traditional laws acknowledged by and the traditional customs observed by the indigenous inhabitants of a territory. …

This position is the same as that being adopted here. "Traditional laws" and "traditional customs" are those things passed down, and arising, from the pre-existing culture and customs of aboriginal peoples. The very meaning of the word "tradition" -- that which is "handed down [from ancestors] to posterity", The Concise Oxford Dictionary (9th ed. 1995), -- implies these origins for the customs and laws that the Australian

High Court in Mabo is asserting to be relevant for the determination of the existence of aboriginal title. To base aboriginal title in traditional laws and customs, as was done in Mabo, is, therefore, to base that title in the pre-existing societies of aboriginal peoples. This is the same basis as that asserted here for aboriginal rights.

[41] Academic commentators have also been consistent in identifying the basis and foundation of the s. 35(1) claims of aboriginal peoples in aboriginal occupation of North America prior to the arrival of Europeans…

[42] I would note that the legal literature also supports the position that s. 35(1) provides the constitutional framework for reconciliation of the pre-existence of distinctive aboriginal societies occupying the land with Crown sovereignty…

[43] The Canadian, American and Australian jurisprudence thus supports the basic proposition put forward at the beginning of this section: the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) are best understood as, first, the means by which the Constitution recognizes the fact that prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America the land was already occupied by distinctive aboriginal societies, and as, second, the means by which that prior occupation is reconciled with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over Canadian territory. The content of aboriginal rights must be directed at fulfilling both of these purposes; the next section of the judgment, as well as that which follows it, will attempt to accomplish this task.

The Test for Identifying Aboriginal Rights in Section 35(1)

[44] In order to fulfil the purpose underlying s. 35(1) -- i.e., the protection and reconciliation of the interests which arise from the fact that prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America aboriginal peoples lived on the land in distinctive societies, with their own practices, customs and traditions -- the test for identifying the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) must be directed at identifying the crucial elements of those pre-existing distinctive societies. It must, in other words, aim at identifying the practices, traditions and customs central to the aboriginal societies that existed in North America prior to contact with the Europeans.

[46] In light of … the purposes underlying s. 35(1), the following test should be used to identify whether an applicant has established an aboriginal right protected by s. 35(1): in order to be an aboriginal right an activity must be an element of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right.

Factors to be Considered in Application of the Integral to a Distinctive Culture Test

Courts must take into account the perspective of aboriginal peoples themselves

[49] In assessing a claim for the existence of an aboriginal right, a court must take into account the perspective of the aboriginal people claiming the right. In Sparrow, supra, Dickson C.J. and La Forest J. held, at p. 1112, that it is "crucial to be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective itself on the meaning of the rights at stake". It must also be recognized, however, that that perspective must be framed in terms cognizable to the Canadian legal and constitutional structure. As has already been noted, one of the fundamental purposes of s. 35(1) is the reconciliation of the pre-existence of distinctive aboriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty. Courts adjudicating aboriginal rights claims must, therefore, be sensitive to the aboriginal perspective, but they must also be aware that aboriginal rights exist within the general legal system of Canada. To quote again Walters, at p. 413: "a morally and politically defensible conception of aboriginal rights will incorporate both [aboriginal and non-aboriginal] legal perspectives". The definition of an aboriginal right must, if it is truly to reconcile the prior occupation of Canadian territory by aboriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over that territory, take into account the aboriginal perspective, yet do so in terms which are cognizable to the non-aboriginal legal system.

[50] It is possible, of course, that the Court could be said to be "reconciling" the prior occupation of Canada by aboriginal peoples with Crown sovereignty through either a narrow or broad conception of aboriginal rights; the notion of "reconciliation" does not, in the abstract, mandate a particular content for aboriginal rights. However, the only fair and just reconciliation is, as Walters suggests, one which takes into account the aboriginal perspective while at the same time taking into account the perspective of the common law. True reconciliation will, equally, place weight on each.

Courts must identify precisely the nature of the claim being made in determining whether an aboriginal claimant has demonstrated the existence of an aboriginal right [51] Related to this is the fact that in assessing a claim to an aboriginal right a court must first identify the nature of the right being claimed; in order to determine whether a claim meets the test of being integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right, the court must first correctly determine what it is that is being claimed. The correct characterization of the appellant's claim is of importance because whether or not the evidence supports the appellant's claim will depend, in significant part, on what, exactly, that evidence is being called to support.

[52] I would note here by way of illustration that, in my view, both the majority and the dissenting judges in the Court of Appeal erred with respect to this aspect of the inquiry. The majority held that the appellant's claim was that the practice of selling fish "on a commercial basis" constituted an aboriginal right and, in part, rejected her claim on the basis that the evidence did not support the existence of such a right. With respect, this characterization of the appellant's claim is in error; the appellant's claim was that the practice of selling fish was an aboriginal right, not that selling fish "on a commercial basis" was. It was however, equally incorrect to adopt, as Lambert J.A. did, a "social" test for the identification of the practice, tradition or custom constituting the aboriginal right. The social test casts the aboriginal right in terms that are too broad and in a manner which distracts the court from what should be its main focus -- the nature of the aboriginal community's practices, customs or traditions themselves. The nature of an applicant's claim must be delineated in terms of the particular practice, custom or tradition under which it is claimed; the significance of the practice, custom or tradition to the aboriginal community is a factor to be considered in determining whether the practice, custom or tradition is integral to the distinctive culture, but the significance of a practice, custom or tradition cannot, itself, constitute an aboriginal right.

[53] To characterize an applicant's claim correctly, a court should consider such factors as the nature of the action which the applicant is claiming was done pursuant to an aboriginal right, the nature of the governmental regulation, statute or action being impugned, and the practice, custom or tradition being relied upon to establish the right. In this case, therefore, the Court will consider the actions which led to the appellant's being charged, the fishery regulation under which she was charged and the practices, customs and traditions she invokes in support of her claim.

[54] It should be acknowledged that a characterization of the nature of the appellant's claim from the actions which led to her being charged must be undertaken with some caution. In order to inform the court's analysis the activities must be considered at a general rather than at a specific level. Moreover, the court must bear in mind that the activities may be the exercise in a modern form of a practice, custom or tradition that existed prior to contact, and should vary its characterization of the claim accordingly.

In order to be integral a practice, custom or tradition must be of central significance to the aboriginal society in question

[55] To satisfy the integral to a distinctive culture test the aboriginal claimant must do more than demonstrate that a practice, custom or tradition was an aspect of, or took place in, the aboriginal society of which he or she is a part. The claimant must demonstrate that the practice, custom or tradition was a central and significant part of the society's distinctive culture. He or she must demonstrate, in other words, that the practice, custom or tradition was one of the things which made the culture of the society distinctive -- that it was one of the things that truly made the society what it was.

[56] This aspect of the integral to a distinctive culture test arises from fact that aboriginal rights have their basis in the prior occupation of Canada by distinctive aboriginal societies. To recognize and affirm the prior occupation of Canada by distinctive aboriginal societies it is to what makes those societies distinctive that the court must look in identifying aboriginal rights. The court cannot look at those aspects of the aboriginal society that are true of every human society (e.g., eating to survive), nor can it look at those aspects of the aboriginal society that are only incidental or occasional to that society; the court must look instead to the defining and central attributes of the aboriginal society in question. It is only by focusing on the aspects of the aboriginal society that make that society distinctive that the definition of aboriginal rights will accomplish the purpose underlying s. 35(1).

[57] Moreover, the aboriginal rights protected by s. 35(1) have been said to have the purpose of reconciling pre-existing aboriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over Canada. To reconcile aboriginal societies with Crown sovereignty it is necessary to identify the distinctive features of those societies; it is precisely those distinctive features which need to be acknowledged and reconciled with the sovereignty of the Crown.

[59] A practical way of thinking about this problem is to ask whether, without this practice, custom or tradition, the culture in question would be fundamentally altered or other than what it is. One must ask, to put the question affirmatively, whether or not a practice, custom or tradition is a defining feature of the culture in question.

The practices, customs and traditions which constitute aboriginal rights are those which have continuity with the practices, customs and traditions that existed prior to contact

[60] The time period that a court should consider in identifying whether the right claimed meets the standard of being integral to the aboriginal community claiming the right is the period prior to contact between aboriginal and European societies. Because it is the fact that distinctive aboriginal societies lived on the land prior to the arrival of Europeans that underlies the aboriginal rights protected by s. 35(1), it is to that pre-contact period that the courts must look in identifying aboriginal rights.

[61] The fact that the doctrine of aboriginal rights functions to reconcile the existence of pre-existing aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown does not alter this position. Although it is the sovereignty of the Crown that the pre-existing aboriginal societies are being reconciled with, it is to those pre-existing societies that the court must look in defining aboriginal rights. It is not the fact that aboriginal societies existed prior to Crown sovereignty that is relevant; it is the fact that they existed prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America. As such, the relevant time period is the period prior to the arrival of Europeans, not the period prior to the assertion of sovereignty by the Crown.

[64] The concept of continuity is also the primary means through which the definition and identification of aboriginal rights will be consistent with the admonition in Sparrow, supra, at p. 1093, that "the phrase ‘existing aboriginal rights’ must be interpreted flexibly so as to permit their evolution over time". The concept of continuity is, in other words, the means by which a "frozen rights" approach to s. 35(1) will be avoided. Because the practices, customs and traditions protected by s. 35(1) are ones that exist today, subject only to the requirement that they be demonstrated to have continuity with the practices, customs and traditions which existed pre-contact, the definition of aboriginal rights will be one that, on its own terms, prevents those rights from being frozen in pre-contact times. The evolution of practices, customs and traditions into modern forms will not, provided that continuity with pre-contact practices, customs and traditions is demonstrated, prevent their protection as aboriginal rights.

[65] I would note that the concept of continuity does not require aboriginal groups to provide evidence of an unbroken chain of continuity between their current practices, customs and traditions, and those which existed prior to contact. It may be that for a period of time an aboriginal group, for some reason, ceased to engage in a practice, custom or tradition which existed prior to contact, but then resumed the practice, custom or tradition at a later date. Such an interruption will not preclude the establishment of an aboriginal right. Trial judges should adopt the same flexibility regarding the establishment of continuity that, as is discussed, infra, they are to adopt with regards to the evidence presented to establish the prior-to-contact practices, customs and traditions of the aboriginal group making the claim to an aboriginal right.

[66] Further, I would note that basing the identification of aboriginal rights in the period prior to contact is not inconsistent with the fact that s. 35(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 includes within the definition of "aboriginal peoples of Canada" the Métis people of Canada.

[67] Although s. 35 includes the Métis within its definition of “aboriginal peoples of Canada”, and thus seems to link their claims to those of other aboriginal peoples under the general heading of “aboriginal rights”, the history of the Métis, and the reasons underlying their inclusion in the protection given by s. 35, are quite distinct from those of other aboriginal peoples in Canada. As such, the manner in which the aboriginal rights of other aboriginal peoples are defined is not necessarily determinative of the manner in which the aboriginal rights of the Métis are defined. At the time when this Court is presented with a Métis claim under s. 35 it will then, with the benefit of the arguments of counsel, a factual context and a specific Métis claim, be able to explore the question of the purposes underlying s. 35's protection of the aboriginal rights of Métis people, and answer the question of the kinds of claims which fall within s. 35(1)’s scope when the claimants are Métis. The fact that, for other aboriginal peoples, the protection granted by s. 35 goes to the practices, customs and traditions of aboriginal peoples prior to contact, is not necessarily relevant to the answer which will be given to that question. It may, or it may not, be the case that the claims of the Métis are determined on the basis of the pre-contact practices, customs and traditions of their aboriginal ancestors; whether that is so must await determination in a case in which the issue arises.

Courts must approach the rules of evidence in light of the evidentiary difficulties inherent in adjudicating aboriginal claims [68] In determining whether an aboriginal claimant has produced evidence sufficient to demonstrate that her activity is an aspect of a practice, custom or tradition integral to a distinctive aboriginal culture, a court should approach the rules of evidence, and interpret the evidence that exists, with a consciousness of the special nature of aboriginal claims, and of the evidentiary difficulties in proving a right which originates in times where there were no written records of the practices, customs and traditions engaged in. The courts must not undervalue the evidence presented by aboriginal claimants simply because that evidence does not conform precisely with the evidentiary standards that would be applied in, for example, a private law torts case.

Claims to aboriginal rights must be adjudicated on a specific rather than general basis

[69] Courts considering a claim to the existence of an aboriginal right must focus specifically on the practices, customs and traditions of the particular aboriginal group claiming the right… the existence of an aboriginal right will depend entirely on the practices, customs and traditions of the particular aboriginal community claiming the right. As has already been suggested, aboriginal rights are constitutional rights, but that does not negate the central fact that the interests aboriginal rights are intended to protect relate to the specific history of the group claiming the right. Aboriginal rights are not general and universal; their scope and content must be determined on a case-by-case basis. The fact that one group of aboriginal people has an aboriginal right to do a particular thing will not be, without something more, sufficient to demonstrate that another aboriginal community has the same aboriginal right. The existence of the right will be specific to each aboriginal community.

For a practice, custom or tradition to constitute an aboriginal right it must be of independent significance to the aboriginal culture in which it exists [70] In identifying those practices, customs and traditions that constitute the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), a court must ensure that the practice, custom or tradition relied upon in a particular case is independently significant to the aboriginal community claiming the right. The practice, custom or tradition cannot exist simply as an incident to another practice, custom or tradition but must rather be itself of integral significance to the aboriginal society. Where two customs exist, but one is merely incidental to the other, the custom which is integral to the aboriginal community in question will qualify as an aboriginal right, but the custom that is merely incidental will not. Incidental practices, customs and traditions cannot qualify as aboriginal rights through a process of piggybacking on integral practices, customs and traditions.

The integral to a distinctive culture test requires that a practice, custom or tradition be distinctive; it does not require that that practice, custom or tradition be distinct [71] The standard which a practice, custom or tradition must meet in order to be recognized as an aboriginal right is not that it be distinct to the aboriginal culture in question; the aboriginal claimants must simply demonstrate that the practice, custom or tradition is distinctive. A tradition or custom that is distinct is one that is unique -- "different in kind or quality; unlike" (Concise Oxford Dictionary, supra). A culture with a distinct tradition must claim that in having such a tradition it is different from other cultures; a claim of distinctness is, by its very nature, a claim relative to other cultures or traditions. By contrast, a culture that claims that a practice, custom or tradition is distinctive -- "distinguishing, characteristic" -- makes a claim that is not relative; the claim is rather one about the culture's own practices, customs or traditions considered apart from the practices, customs or traditions of any other culture. It is a claim that this tradition or custom makes the culture what it is, not that the practice, custom or tradition is different from the practices, customs or traditions of another culture. The person or community claiming the existence of an aboriginal right protected by s. 35(1) need only show that the particular practice, custom or tradition which it is claiming to be an aboriginal right is distinctive, not that it is distinct.

[72] That the standard an aboriginal community must meet is distinctiveness, not distinctness, arises from the recognition in Sparrow, supra, of an aboriginal right to fish for food. Certainly, no aboriginal group in Canada could claim that its culture is "distinct" or unique in fishing for food; fishing for food is something done by many different cultures and societies around the world. What the Musqueam claimed in Sparrow, supra, was rather that it was fishing for food which, in part, made Musqueam culture what it is; fishing for food was characteristic of Musqueam culture and, therefore, a distinctive part of that culture. Since it was so it constituted an aboriginal right under s. 35(1).

The influence of European culture will only be relevant to the inquiry if it is demonstrated that the practice, custom or tradition is only integral because of that influence.

[73] The fact that Europeans in North America engaged in the same practices, customs or traditions as those under which an aboriginal right is claimed will only be relevant to the aboriginal claim if the practice, custom or tradition in question can only be said to exist because of the influence of European culture. If the practice, custom or tradition was an integral part of the aboriginal community's culture prior to contact with Europeans, the fact that that practice, custom or tradition continued after the arrival of Europeans, and adapted in response to their arrival, is not relevant to determination of the claim; European arrival and influence cannot be used to deprive an aboriginal group of an otherwise valid claim to an aboriginal right. On the other hand, where the practice, custom or tradition arose solely as a response to European influences then that practice, custom or tradition will not meet the standard for recognition of an aboriginal right.

Courts must take into account both the relationship of aboriginal peoples to the land and the distinctive societies and cultures of aboriginal peoples

[74] As was noted in the discussion of the purposes of s. 35(1), aboriginal rights and aboriginal title are related concepts; aboriginal title is a sub-category of aboriginal rights which deals solely with claims of rights to land. The relationship between aboriginal title and aboriginal rights must not, however, confuse the analysis of what constitutes an aboriginal right. Aboriginal rights arise from the prior occupation of land, but they also arise from the prior social organization and distinctive cultures of aboriginal peoples on that land. In considering whether a claim to an aboriginal right has been made out, courts must look at both the relationship of an aboriginal claimant to the land and at the practices, customs and traditions arising from the claimant's distinctive culture and society. Courts must not focus so entirely on the relationship of aboriginal peoples with the land that they lose sight of the other factors relevant to the identification and definition of aboriginal rights.

Application of the Integral to a Distinctive Culture Test to the Appellant's Claim

[76] The first step in the application of the integral to a distinctive culture test requires the court to identify the precise nature of the appellant's claim to have been exercising an aboriginal right. In this case the most accurate characterization of the appellant's position is that she is claiming an aboriginal right to exchange fish for money or for other goods. She is claiming, in other words, that the practices, customs and traditions of the Sto:lo include as an integral part the exchange of fish for money or other goods.

[77] That this is the nature of the appellant's claim can be seen through both the specific acts which led to her being charged and through the regulation under which she was charged. Mrs. Van der Peet sold 10 salmon for $50. Such a sale, especially given the absence of evidence that the appellant had sold salmon on other occasions or on a regular basis, cannot be said to constitute a sale on a "commercial" or market basis. These actions are instead best characterized in the simple terms of an exchange of fish for money. It follows from this that the aboriginal right pursuant to which the appellant is arguing that her actions were taken is, like the actions themselves, best characterized as an aboriginal right to exchange fish for money or other goods.

[78] Moreover, the regulations under which the appellant was charged prohibit all sale or trade of fish caught pursuant to an Indian food fish licence. As such, to argue that those regulations implicate the appellant's aboriginal right requires no more of her than that she demonstrate an aboriginal right to the exchange of fish for money (sale) or other goods (trade). She does not need to demonstrate an aboriginal right to sell fish commercially.

[79] The appellant herself characterizes her claim as based on a right "to sufficient fish to provide for a moderate livelihood". In so doing the appellant relies on the "social" test adopted by Lambert J.A. at the British Columbia Court of Appeal. As has already been noted, however, a claim to an aboriginal right cannot be based on the significance of an aboriginal practice, custom or tradition to the aboriginal community in question. The definition of aboriginal rights is determined through the process of determining whether a particular practice, custom or tradition is integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group. The significance of the practice, custom or tradition is relevant to the determination of whether that practice, custom or tradition is integral, but cannot itself constitute the claim to an aboriginal right. As such, the appellant's claim cannot be characterized as based on an assertion that the Sto:lo's use of the fishery, and the practices, customs and traditions surrounding that use, had the significance of providing the Sto:lo with a moderate livelihood. It must instead be based on the actual practices, customs and traditions related to the fishery, here the custom of exchanging fish for money or other goods.

[80] Having thus identified the nature of the appellant's claim, I turn to the fundamental question of the integral to a distinctive culture test: Was the practice of exchanging fish for money or other goods an integral part of the specific distinctive culture of the Sto:lo prior to contact with Europeans? …

[81] It is a well-settled principle of law that when an appellate court reviews the decision of a trial judge that court must give considerable deference to the trial judge's findings of fact, particularly where those findings of fact are based on the trial judge's assessment of the testimony and credibility of witnesses. …

[82] In the case at bar, Scarlett Prov. Ct. J., the trial judge, made findings of fact based on the testimony and evidence before him, and then proceeded to make a determination as to whether those findings of fact supported the appellant's claim to the existence of an aboriginal right…

[84] Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. carefully considered all of the testimony presented by the various witnesses with regards to the nature of Sto:lo society and came to the following conclusions at p. 160:

> Clearly, the Sto:lo fish for food and ceremonial purposes. Evidence presented did not establish a regularized market system in the exchange of fish. Such fish as were exchanged through individual trade, gift, or barter were fish surplus from time to time. Natives did not fish to supply a market, there being no regularized trading system, nor were they able to preserve and store fish for extended periods of time. A market as such for salmon was not present but created by European traders, primarily the Hudson's Bay Company. At Fort Langley the Sto:lo were able to catch and deliver fresh salmon to the traders where it was salted and exported. This use was clearly different in nature and quantity from aboriginal activity. Trade in dried salmon with the fort was clearly dependent upon Sto:lo first satisfying their own requirements for food and ceremony.
> This court was not satisfied upon the evidence that aboriginal trade in salmon took place in any regularized or market sense. Oral evidence demonstrated that trade was incidental to fishing for food purposes. Anthropological and archaeological evidence was in conflict. This Court accepts the evidence of Dr. Stryd and John Dewhurst [sic] in preference to Dr. Daly and therefore, accepts that the Sto:lo were a band culture as opposed to tribal. While bands were guided by siem or prominent families, no regularized trade in salmon existed in aboriginal times. Such trade as took place was either for ceremonial purposes or opportunistic exchanges taking place on a casual basis. Such trade as did take place was incidental only. Evidence led by the Crown that the Sto:lo had no access to salt for food preservation is accepted.
> Exchange of fish was subject to local conditions of availability, transportation and preservation. It was the establishment by the Hudson's Bay Company at the fort at Langley that created the market and trade in fresh salmon. Trade in dried salmon in aboriginal times was, as stated, minimal and opportunistic.

I would add to Scarlett Prov. Ct. J.'s summation of his findings only the observation, which does not contradict any of his specific findings, that the testimony of the experts appearing before him indicated that such limited exchanges of salmon as took place in Sto:lo society were primarily linked to the kinship and family relationships on which Sto:lo society was based…

[85] The facts as found by Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. do not support the appellant's claim that the exchange of salmon for money or other goods was an integral part of the distinctive culture of the Sto:lo. As has already been noted, in order to be recognized as an aboriginal right, an activity must be of central significance to the culture in question -- it must be something which makes that culture what it is. The findings of fact made by Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. suggest that the exchange of salmon for money or other goods, while certainly taking place in Sto:lo society prior to contact, was not a significant, integral or defining feature of that society.

[86] First, Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. found that, prior to contact, exchanges of fish were only "incidental" to fishing for food purposes. As was noted above, to constitute an aboriginal right, a custom must itself be integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal community in question; it cannot be simply incidental to an integral custom. Thus, while the evidence clearly demonstrated that fishing for food and ceremonial purposes was a significant and defining feature of the Sto:lo culture, this is not sufficient, absent a demonstration that the exchange of salmon was itself a significant and defining feature of Sto:lo society, to demonstrate that the exchange of salmon is an integral part of Sto:lo culture.

[87] For similar reasons, the evidence linking the exchange of salmon to the maintenance of kinship and family relations does not support the appellant's claim to the existence of an aboriginal right. Exchange of salmon as part of the interaction of kin and family is not of an independent significance sufficient to ground a claim for an aboriginal right to the exchange of fish for money or other goods.

[88] Second, Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. found that there was no "regularized trading system" amongst the Sto:lo prior to contact. The inference drawn from this fact by Scarlett Prov. Ct. J., and by Macfarlane J.A. at the British Columbia Court of Appeal, was that the absence of a market means that the appellant could not be said to have been acting pursuant to an aboriginal right because it suggests that there is no aboriginal right to fish commercially. This inference is incorrect because, as has already been suggested, the appellant in this case has only claimed a right to exchange fish for money or other goods, not a right to sell fish in the commercial marketplace; the significance of the absence of regularized trading systems amongst the Sto:lo arises instead from the fact that it indicates that the exchange of salmon was not widespread in Sto:lo society. Given that the exchange of salmon was not widespread it cannot be said that, prior to contact, Sto:lo culture was defined by trade in salmon; trade or exchange of salmon took place, but the absence of a market demonstrates that this exchange did not take place on a basis widespread enough to suggest that the exchange was a defining feature of Sto:lo society.

[89] Third, the trade engaged in between the Sto:lo and the Hudson's Bay Company, while certainly of significance to the Sto:lo society of the time, was found by the trial judge to be qualitatively different from that which was typical of the Sto:lo culture prior to contact. As such, it does not provide an evidentiary basis for holding that the exchange of salmon was an integral part of Sto:lo culture. As was emphasized in listing the criteria to be considered in applying the "integral to" test, the time relevant for the identification of aboriginal rights is prior to contact with European societies. Unless a post-contact practice, custom or tradition can be shown to have continuity with pre-contact practices, customs or traditions, it will not be held to be an aboriginal right. The trade of salmon between the Sto:lo and the Hudson's Bay Company does not have the necessary continuity with Sto:lo culture pre-contact to support a claim to an aboriginal right to trade salmon. Further, the exchange of salmon between the Sto:lo and the Hudson's Bay Company can be seen as central or significant to the Sto:lo primarily as a result of European influences; activities which become central or significant because of the influence of European culture cannot be said to be aboriginal rights.

[90] Finally, Scarlett Prov. Ct. J. found that the Sto:lo were at a band level of social organization rather than at a tribal level. As noted by the various experts, one of the central distinctions between a band society and a tribal society relates to specialization and division of labour. In a tribal society there tends to be specialization of labour -- for example, specialization in the gathering and trade of fish -- whereas in a band society division of labour tends to occur only on the basis of gender or age. The absence of specialization in the exploitation of the fishery is suggestive, in the same way that the absence of regularized trade or a market is suggestive, that the exchange of fish was not a central part of Sto:lo culture. I would note here as well Scarlett Prov. Ct. J.'s finding that the Sto:lo did not have the means for preserving fish for extended periods of time, something which is also suggestive that the exchange or trade of fish was not central to the Sto:lo way of life.

[91] For these reasons, then, I would conclude that the appellant has failed to demonstrate that the exchange of fish for money or other goods was an integral part of the distinctive Sto:lo society which existed prior to contact. The exchange of fish took place, but was not a central, significant or defining feature of Sto:lo society. The appellant has thus failed to demonstrate that the exchange of salmon for money or other goods by the Sto:lo is an aboriginal right recognized and affirmed under s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

2.2.2 Dissent

Both Justices L'Heureux-Dubé and McLachlin (as she then was) dissented in Van der Peet. For L'Heureux-Dubé J, Aboriginal rights should be analyzed "from a certain level of abstraction and generality." Instead of yielding a "catalogue of individualized practices, traditions or customs," a result she attributed to the majority's approach, she held that s 35(1) should protect the "the 'distinctive culture' of which aboriginal activities are manifestations" (see paras 155-157).

For her part, Justice McLachlin would have preferred a more "pragmatic" or "empirical approach." She described both the majority and Justice L'Heureux-Dubé's approaches as "reasoning from first principles," defining in the abstract the kinds of things that could be Aboriginal rights (see paras. 261-262). In her view, the common law's general approach of "reasoning from the experience of decided cases and recognized rights" was more appropriate here. Applying that approach to this case, she held (at para 278):

> If the aboriginal people show that they traditionally sustained themselves from the river or sea, then they have a prima facie right to continue to do so, absent a treaty exchanging that right for other consideration. At its base, the right is not the right to trade, but the right to continue to use the resource in the traditional way to provide for the traditional needs, albeit in their modern form. However, if the people demonstrate that trade is the only way of using the resource to provide the modern equivalent of what they traditionally took, it follows that the people should be permitted to trade in the resource to the extent necessary to provide the replacement goods and amenities. In this context, trade is but the mode or practice by which the more fundamental right of drawing sustenance from the resource is exercised.

Which approach, in your view, best meets the purpose of s. 35(1) and the ongoing challenges of Canada's relationship with Indigenous groups? Why?

2.3 R. v. Gladstone, 1996 CanLII 160 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 723

THE CHIEF JUSTICE --

I. Facts

[1] Donald and William Gladstone, the appellants, are members of the Heiltsuk Band. The appellants were charged under s. 61(1) of the Fisheries Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. F-14, with the offences of offering to sell herring spawn on kelp caught under the authority of an Indian food fish licence, contrary to s. 27(5) of the British Columbia Fishery (General) Regulations, SOR/84-248 and of attempting to sell herring spawn on kelp not caught under the authority of a Category J herring spawn on kelp licence, contrary to s. 20(3) of the Pacific Herring Fishery Regulations, SOR/84-324. Only the charges arising under s. 20(3) of the Pacific Herring Fishery Regulations are still at issue in this appeal.

[2] The charges arose out of events taking place in April of 1988. On approximately April 27, 1988 the appellants shipped 4,200 pounds of herring spawn on kelp from Bella Bella to Richmond, a suburb of Vancouver. On April 28, 1988, the appellants took a pail containing approximately 35 pounds of herring spawn on kelp to Seaborn Enterprises Ltd., a fish store in Vancouver. At Seaborn Enterprises Ltd. the appellants had a conversation with Mr. Katsu Hirose, the owner of the store, in which they asked Mr. Hirose if he was "interested" in herring spawn on kelp. Mr. Hirose informed the appellants that he did not purchase herring spawn on kelp from Native Indians. Upon leaving Seaborn Enterprises Ltd. the appellants, who had been under surveillance by fisheries officers throughout these events, were arrested and the entire 4,200 pounds of herring spawn on kelp was seized. Upon arrest the appellant William Gladstone produced an Indian food fish licence permitting him to harvest 500 pounds of herring spawn on kelp.

> 20. . . .
> (3) No person shall buy, sell, barter or attempt to buy, sell, or barter herring spawn on kelp other than herring spawn on kelp taken or collected under the authority of a Category J licence.

[4] The appellants have not disputed the essential facts of the case. The essence of the appellants' defence is that, in these circumstances, the regulations violated the appellants' aboriginal rights as recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 with the result that, by operation of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the regulations are of no force or effect with respect to the appellants. The appellants also take the position that the facts related to the shipment of the herring spawn on kelp, and the conversation with Mr. Hirose, are insufficient to constitute an "attempt to sell" in law.

[23] The first step in applying the Van der Peet test is the determination of the precise nature of the claim being made, taking into account such factors as the nature of the action said to have been taken pursuant to an aboriginal right, the government regulation argued to infringe the right, and the practice, custom or tradition relied upon to establish the right. At this stage of the analysis the Court is, in essence, determining what the appellants will have to demonstrate to be an aboriginal right in order for the activities they were engaged in to be encompassed by s. 35(1). There is no point in the appellants' being shown to have an aboriginal right unless that aboriginal right includes the actual activity they were engaged in; this stage of the Van der Peet analysis ensures that the Court's inquiry is tailored to the actual activity of the appellants.

[24] This case… potentially creates problems at the characterization stage. The actions of the appellants… appear to be best characterized as the commercial exploitation of herring spawn on kelp. By contrast, the regulations under which the appellants were charged… prohibit all sale or trade in herring spawn on kelp without a Category J licence, appear, therefore, to be best characterized as aimed at the exchange of herring spawn on kelp for money or other goods, regardless of whether the extent or scale of that sale or trade could reasonably be characterized as commercial in nature. The means to resolve this difficulty in characterization… is by addressing both possible characterizations of the appellants' claim. This judgment will thus consider first, whether the appellants can demonstrate that the Heiltsuk Band has an aboriginal right to exchange herring spawn on kelp for money or other goods and will then go on to consider, second, whether the appellants have demonstrated the further aboriginal right of the Heiltsuk Band to sell herring spawn on kelp to the commercial market.

[25] The second step in the Van der Peet test requires the Court to determine whether the practice, custom or tradition claimed to be an aboriginal right was, prior to contact with Europeans, an integral part of the distinctive aboriginal society of the particular aboriginal people in question. The Court must thus, as has just been noted, determine in this case whether the exchange of herring spawn on kelp for money or other goods, and/or the sale or trade of herring spawn on kelp in the commercial marketplace, were, prior to contact, defining features of the distinctive culture of the Heiltsuk.

[26] The facts as found by the trial judge, and the evidence on which he relied, support the appellants' claim that exchange of herring spawn on kelp for money or other goods was a central, significant and defining feature of the culture of the Heiltsuk prior to contact. Moreover, those facts support the appellants' further claim that the exchange of herring spawn on kelp on a scale best characterized as commercial was an integral part of the distinctive culture of the Heiltsuk. In his reasons Lemiski Prov. Ct. J. summarized his findings of fact as follows:

> It cannot be disputed that hundreds of years ago, the Heiltsuk Indians regularly harvested herring spawn on kelp as a food source. The historical/anthropological records readily bear this out.
> I am also satisfied that this Band engaged in inter-tribal trading and barter of herring spawn on kelp. The exhibited Journal of Alexander McKenzie [sic] dated 1793 refers to this trade and the defence lead [sic] evidence of several other references to such trade.
> The Crown conceded that there may have been some incidental local trade but questions its extent and importance. The very fact that early explorers and visitors to the Bella Bella region noted this trading has to enhance its significance. All the various descriptions of this trading activity are in accord with common sense expectations. Obviously, one would not expect to see balance sheets and statistics in so primitive a time and setting. [Emphasis added.]

[28] In Van der Peet, at para. 62, this Court held that a claimant to an aboriginal right need not provide direct evidence of pre-contact activities to support his or her claim, but need only provide evidence which is "directed at demonstrating which aspects of the aboriginal community and society have their origins pre-contact. It is those practices, customs and traditions that can be rooted in the pre-contact societies of the aboriginal community in question that will constitute aboriginal rights". In Van der Peet this was described as the requirement of "continuity" -- the requirement that a practice, custom or tradition which is integral to the aboriginal community now be shown to have continuity with the practices, customs or traditions which existed prior to contact. The evidence presented in this case, accepted by the trial judge and summarized above, is precisely the type of evidence which satisfies this requirement. The appellants have provided clear evidence from which it can be inferred that, prior to contact, Heiltsuk society was, in significant part, based on such trade. The Heiltsuk were, both before and after contact, traders of herring spawn on kelp. Moreover, while to describe this activity as "commercial" prior to contact would be inaccurate given the link between the notion of commerce and the introduction of European culture, the extent and scope of the trading activities of the Heiltsuk support the claim that, for the purposes of s. 35(1) analysis, the Heiltsuk have demonstrated an aboriginal right to sell herring spawn on kelp to an extent best described as commercial. The evidence of Dr. Lane, and the diary of Dr. Tolmie, point to trade of herring spawn on kelp in "tons". While this evidence relates to trade post-contact, the diary of Alexander Mackenzie provides the link with pre-contact times; in essence, the sum of the evidence supports the claim of the appellants that commercial trade in herring spawn on kelp was an integral part of the distinctive culture of the Heiltsuk prior to contact.

[29] I would note that the significant difference between the situation of the appellants in this case, and the appellants in Van der Peet … lies in the fact that for the Heiltsuk Band trading in herring spawn on kelp was not an activity taking place as an incident to the social and ceremonial activities of the community; rather, trading in herring spawn on kelp was, in itself, a central and significant feature of Heiltsuk society…

Infringement

[40] At the infringement stage, the primary distinction between the factual context of Sparrow, and the context of this appeal, is that the regulation impugned in Sparrow -- a net length restriction -- was challenged independently of the broader fisheries management scheme of which it was a part. In this case, while the appellants' constitutional challenge is focused on a single regulation -- s. 20(3) of the Pacific Herring Fishery Regulations -- the scope of the challenge is much broader than the terms of s. 20(3). The appellants' arguments on the points of infringement and justification effectively impugn the entire approach taken by the Crown to the management of the herring spawn on kelp fishery.

43 The Sparrow test for infringement might seem, at first glance, to be internally contradictory. On the one hand, the test states that the appellants need simply show that there has been a prima facie interference with their rights in order to demonstrate that those rights have been infringed, suggesting thereby that any meaningful diminution of the appellants' rights will constitute an infringement for the purpose of this analysis. On the other hand, the questions the test directs courts to answer in determining whether an infringement has taken place incorporate ideas such as unreasonableness and "undue" hardship, ideas which suggest that something more than meaningful diminution is required to demonstrate infringement. This internal contradiction is, however, more apparent than real. The questions asked by the Court in Sparrow do not define the concept of prima facie infringement; they only point to factors which will indicate that such an infringement has taken place. Simply because one of those questions is answered in the negative will not prohibit a finding by a court that a prima facie infringement has taken place; it will just be one factor for a court to consider in its determination of whether there has been a prima facie infringement.

[46] From the time of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans' policy shift in the early 1970s, until 1982, the Department regulated the herring stock through the measurement of spawn escapement (the calculation of the number of eggs spawned in a given year). In 1982, this means for measuring and controlling the herring stock was modified; at that time the Department adopted a policy of estimating the size of the herring stock in each year and of setting the allowable catch at 20 per cent of that stock. The 1982 stock measurement and allotment policy has been subject to only one amendment since its adoption: in 1988 the Department of Fisheries and Oceans qualified the constant harvest rate of 20 per cent so as to allow for minimum spawn escapement.

[50] In 1988, the year relevant to this appeal, the herring stock was estimated at 350,000 tons, of which 160,000 tons were "fishable". The total allocation for the herring fishery was 40,000 tons, of which 2,275 tons was allotted to the herring spawn on kelp fishery. Of that 2,275 tons, 224 tons was allotted to Category J licence holders. There were 28 such licences issued in 1988, each with an 8-ton quota. Of those 28 licences 16 were held by Native Indian bands. One was held by the Heiltsuk Band.

[51] To summarize, the government's scheme for regulating the herring spawn on kelp fishery can be divided into four constituent parts: (1) the government determines the amount of the herring stock that will be harvested in a given year; (2) the government allots the herring stock to the different herring fisheries (herring roe, herring spawn on kelp and other herring fisheries); (3) the government allots the herring spawn on kelp fishery to various user groups (commercial users and the Indian food fishery); and, (4) the government allots the commercial herring spawn on kelp licences.

[52] Because each of these constituent parts has a different objective, and each involves a different pattern of government action, at the stage of justification it will be necessary to consider them separately; however, at the infringement stage the government scheme can be considered as a whole. The reason for this is that at the infringement stage it is the cumulative effect on the appellants' rights from the operation of the regulatory scheme that the court is concerned with…

[53] In light of the questions posed by this Court in Sparrow, it seems clear that the appellants have discharged their burden of demonstrating a prima facie interference with their aboriginal rights. Prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America, the Heiltsuk could harvest herring spawn on kelp to the extent they themselves desired, subject only to such limitations as were imposed by any difficulties in transportation, preservation and resource availability, as well as those limitations that they thought advisable to impose for the purposes of conservation; subsequent to the enactment of the regulatory scheme described above the Heiltsuk can harvest herring spawn on kelp for commercial purposes only to the limited extent allowed by the government. To use the language of Cory J. in R. v. Nikal, supra, at para. 104, the government's regulatory scheme "clearly impinge[s]" upon the rights of the appellant and, as such, must be held to constitute a prima facie infringement of those rights.

Justification

[57] Two points of variation [from Sparrow] are of particular significance. First, the right recognized and affirmed in this case -- to sell herring spawn on kelp commercially -- differs significantly from the right recognized and affirmed in Sparrow -- the right to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes. That difference lies in the fact that the right at issue in Sparrow has an inherent limitation which the right recognized and affirmed in this appeal lacks. The food, social and ceremonial needs for fish of any given band of aboriginal people are internally limited -- at a certain point the band will have sufficient fish to meet these needs. The commercial sale of the herring spawn on kelp, on the other hand, has no such internal limitation; the only limits on the Heiltsuk's need for herring spawn on kelp for commercial sale are the external constraints of the demand of the market and the availability of the resource. This is particularly so in this case where the evidence supports a right to exchange fish on a genuinely commercial basis; the evidence in this case does not justify limiting the right to harvest herring spawn on kelp on a commercial basis to, for example, the sale of herring spawn on kelp for the purposes of obtaining a "moderate livelihood"…

[58] The significance of this difference for the Sparrow test relates to the position taken in that case that, subject to the limits of conservation, aboriginal rights holders must be given priority in the fishery. In a situation where the aboriginal right is internally limited, so that it is clear when that right has been satisfied and other users can be allowed to participate in the fishery, the notion of priority, as articulated in Sparrow, makes sense. In that situation it is understandable that in an exceptional year, when conservation concerns are severe, it will be possible for aboriginal rights holders to be alone allowed to participate in the fishery, while in more ordinary years other users will be allowed to participate in the fishery after the aboriginal rights to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes have been met.

[60] In my view, such a result was not the intention of Sparrow. The only circumstance contemplated by Sparrow was where the aboriginal right was internally limited; the judgment simply does not consider how the priority standard should be applied in circumstances where the right has no such internal limitation…

[61] The basic insight of Sparrow -- that aboriginal rights holders have priority in the fishery -- is a valid and important one; however, the articulation in that case of what priority means, and its suggestion that it can mean exclusivity under certain limited circumstances, must be refined to take into account the varying circumstances which arise when the aboriginal right in question has no internal limitations.

[62] Where the aboriginal right is one that has no internal limitation then the doctrine of priority does not require that, after conservation goals have been met, the government allocate the fishery so that those holding an aboriginal right to exploit that fishery on a commercial basis are given an exclusive right to do so. Instead, the doctrine of priority requires that the government demonstrate that, in allocating the resource, it has taken account of the existence of aboriginal rights and allocated the resource in a manner respectful of the fact that those rights have priority over the exploitation of the fishery by other users. This right is at once both procedural and substantive; at the stage of justification the government must demonstrate both that the process by which it allocated the resource and the actual allocation of the resource which results from that process reflect the prior interest of aboriginal rights holders in the fishery.

[64] That no blanket requirement is imposed under the priority doctrine should not suggest, however, that no guidance is possible in this area, or that the government's actions will not be subject to scrutiny. Questions relevant to the determination of whether the government has granted priority to aboriginal rights holders are those enumerated in Sparrow relating to consultation and compensation, as well as questions such as whether the government has accommodated the exercise of the aboriginal right to participate in the fishery (through reduced licence fees, for example), whether the government's objectives in enacting a particular regulatory scheme reflect the need to take into account the priority of aboriginal rights holders, the extent of the participation in the fishery of aboriginal rights holders relative to their percentage of the population, how the government has accommodated different aboriginal rights in a particular fishery (food versus commercial rights, for example), how important the fishery is to the economic and material well-being of the band in question, and the criteria taken into account by the government in, for example, allocating commercial licences amongst different users. These questions, like those in Sparrow, do not represent an exhaustive list of the factors that may be taken into account in determining whether the government can be said to have given priority to aboriginal rights holders; they give some indication, however, of what such an inquiry should look like.

[65] Before turning to the second relevant difference between this case and Sparrow, I would note one or two points in favour of the interpretation of priority just adopted. As was emphasized in this Court's decision in Van der Peet, aboriginal rights are highly fact specific -- the existence of an aboriginal right is determined through consideration of the particular distinctive culture, and hence of the specific practices, customs and traditions, of the aboriginal group claiming the right. The rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) are not rights held uniformly by all aboriginal peoples in Canada; the nature and existence of aboriginal rights vary in accordance with the variety of aboriginal cultures and traditions which exist in this country. As a result, governments must not only make decisions about how to allocate fish between aboriginal rights holders and those who do not enjoy such rights, but must also make decisions as to how to allocate fish both between different groups of aboriginal rights holders and between different aboriginal rights. The government must, for example, make decisions as to how to allocate fish between those aboriginal peoples with the aboriginal right to fish for food, social and ceremonial purposes, and those aboriginal peoples who have aboriginal rights to sell fish commercially; it must also decide, where more than one aboriginal group has a right to sell fish commercially, how much fish each group will have access to.

[69] I now turn to the second significant difference between this case and Sparrow. In Sparrow, while the Court recognized at p. 1113 that, beyond conservation, there could be other "compelling and substantial" objectives pursuant to which the government could act in accordance with the first branch of the justification test, the Court was not required to delineate what those objectives might be. Further, in delineating the priority requirement, and the relationship between aboriginal rights-holders and other users of the fishery, the only objective considered by the Court was conservation. This limited focus made sense in Sparrow because the net-length restriction at issue in that case was argued by the Crown to have been necessary as a conservation measure (whether it was necessary as such was not actually decided in that case); in this case, however, while some aspects of the government's regulatory scheme arguably relate to conservation -- setting the total allowable catch at 20 per cent of the estimated herring stock, requiring the herring roe fishery to bear the brunt of variations in the herring stock because it is more environmentally destructive -- other aspects of the government's regulatory scheme bear little or no relation to issues of conservation. Once the overall level of the herring catch has been established, and allocated to the different herring fisheries, it makes no difference in terms of conservation who is allowed to catch the fish. Conservation of the fishery is simply not affected once, after the herring spawn on kelp fishery is set at 2,275 tons, 224 tons or 2,275 tons is allocated to the commercial fishery or to some other use. This is not to suggest that these decisions are unimportant or made pursuant to unimportant objectives, but simply that, whatever objectives the government is pursuing in making such decisions, conservation is not (or is only marginally) one of them. As such, it is necessary in this case to consider what, if any, objectives the government may pursue, other than conservation, which will be sufficient to satisfy the first branch of the Sparrow justification standard.

[71] …Although the aboriginal rights recognized by s. 35(1) are, as was noted in Van der Peet, fundamentally different from the rights in the Charter, the same basic principle -- that the purposes underlying the rights must inform not only the definition of the rights but also the identification of those limits on the rights which are justifiable -- applies equally to the justification analysis under s. 35(1).

[73] Aboriginal rights are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) in order to reconcile the existence of distinctive aboriginal societies prior to the arrival of Europeans in North America with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over that territory; they are the means by which the critical and integral aspects of those societies are maintained. Because, however, distinctive aboriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community, over which the Crown is sovereign, there are circumstances in which, in order to pursue objectives of compelling and substantial importance to that community as a whole (taking into account the fact that aboriginal societies are a part of that community), some limitation of those rights will be justifiable. Aboriginal rights are a necessary part of the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the broader political community of which they are part; limits placed on those rights are, where the objectives furthered by those limits are of sufficient importance to the broader community as a whole, equally a necessary part of that reconciliation.

[74] The recognition of conservation as a compelling and substantial goal demonstrates this point. Given the integral role the fishery has played in the distinctive cultures of many aboriginal peoples, conservation can be said to be something the pursuit of which can be linked to the recognition of the existence of such distinctive cultures. Moreover, because conservation is of such overwhelming importance to Canadian society as a whole, including aboriginal members of that society, it is a goal the pursuit of which is consistent with the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the larger Canadian society of which they are a part. In this way, conservation can be said to be a compelling and substantial objective which, provided the rest of the Sparrow justification standard is met, will justify governmental infringement of aboriginal rights.

[75] Although by no means making a definitive statement on this issue, I would suggest that with regards to the distribution of the fisheries resource after conservation goals have been met, objectives such as the pursuit of economic and regional fairness, and the recognition of the historical reliance upon, and participation in, the fishery by non-aboriginal groups, are the type of objectives which can (at least in the right circumstances) satisfy this standard. In the right circumstances, such objectives are in the interest of all Canadians and, more importantly, the reconciliation of aboriginal societies with the rest of Canadian society may well depend on their successful attainment.

> [76] I now turn to the application of the Sparrow justification test to the government regulatory scheme challenged in this case. As has already been noted, the government's regulatory scheme has four constituent parts, which, for ease of reference, I will reiterate here: (1) the government determines the amount of the herring stock that will be harvested in a given year; (2) the government allots the herring stock to the different herring fisheries (herring roe, herring spawn on kelp and other herring fisheries); (3) the government allots the herring spawn on kelp fishery to various user groups (commercial users and the Indian food fishery); and, (4) the government allots the commercial herring spawn on kelp licences.
> [77] Other than with regards to the first aspect of the government's regulatory scheme, the evidence and testimony presented in this case is insufficient for this Court to make a determination as to whether the government's regulatory scheme is justified. The trial in this case concluded on May 7, 1990, several weeks prior to the release of this Court's judgment in Sparrow. Perhaps as a result of this fact, the testimony, evidence and argument presented at the trial simply do not contain the information that is necessary for this Court to assess whether, in allocating the 40,000 tons of herring allotted to the herring fishery, the government has either acted pursuant to a compelling and substantial objective or has acted in a manner consistent with the fiduciary obligation it owes to aboriginal peoples. It is not that the Crown has failed to discharge its burden of demonstrating that the scheme for allocating the 20 per cent of the herring stock was justified; it is simply that the question of whether or not that scheme of allocation was justified was not addressed at trial, at least in the sense necessary for this Court to decide the question of whether, under the Sparrow test, it was justified.
> [82] Obviously a new trial will not necessarily provide complete and definitive answers to all of these questions; however, given that the parties simply did not address the justifiability of the government scheme, other than the setting of the herring catch at 20 per cent of the total herring stock, a new trial will almost certainly provide the court with better information than currently exists. Prior to Sparrow it was not clear what the government, or parties challenging government action, had to demonstrate in order to succeed in s. 35(1) cases; this lack of clarity undoubtedly contributed to the deficiency of the evidentiary record in this case. A new trial on the question of justification will remedy this deficiency.
> [83] A new trial is not, however, necessary with regards to the first aspect of the government's scheme; the evidentiary record clearly demonstrates that this aspect of the government's scheme was justified. …
> [84] Although the evidence regarding consultation is somewhat scanty, and more will hopefully be presented at a new trial on the justification issue, there is some evidence to suggest that the government was cognizant of the views of aboriginal groups with regards to the herring fishery. The correspondence between the Native Brotherhood and the Department is indicative of the existence of such consultation. Finally, the setting of the herring catch at 20 per cent of the fishable herring stock, because aimed at conservation, and not affecting the priority of aboriginal versus non-aboriginal users of the fishery, is consistent with the priority scheme as laid out in Sparrow and as elaborated in this judgment.
> V. Disposition
> [85] In the result, the appeal is allowed and a new trial directed on the issue of guilt or innocence and, with regards to the constitutionality of s. 20(3), on the issue of the justifiability of the government's allocation of herring.

Since Van der Peet, the majority's test for an Aboriginal right has been criticized as narrowly restricting what can be found to be an Aboriginal right by focusing on 'integral' pre-contact practices. See for example, John Borrows, "Frozen Rights in Canada: Constitutional Interpretation and the Trickster," (1997), 22:1 Am Ind LR 37 and Bradford Morse, "Permafrost Rights: Aboriginal Self-Government and the Supreme Court in *R. v. Pamajewo*n" (1997), 42 McGill LJ 1011.

In its 2006 decision in R v Sappier; R v Gray the Court attempted to make the test more flexible by telling us what is meant by 'culture' "is really an inquiry into the pre-contact way of life of a particular aboriginal community, including their means of survival, their socialization methods, their legal systems, and, potentially, their trading habits" (para. 45). The Court also warned about treading unwittingly into "reducing an entire people's culture to specific anthropological curiosities and, potentially, racialized aboriginal stereotypes" (para. 46). This was about the harvesting of wood by members of the Mi'kmaq and Wolastoqey nations in New Brunswick to constructing dwellings and making furniture. The Court found they had an Aboriginal right to harvest wood for 'domestic use.'

However, the Court sent mixed messages on the extent to which R v Sappier; R v Gray changed anything in its 2011 decision Lax Kw'alaams Indian Band v. Canada (Attorney General), stating:

> [54] The Lax Kw'alaams place reliance on references to "way of life" in Sappier, at paras. 24 and 40. However, the reference in Sappier to a pre-contact "way of life" should not be read as departing from the "distinctive culture" test set out in Van der Peet…

This case was initiated by the Lax Kw'alaams and other First Nations living along he northwest coast of British Columbia between the estuaries of the Nass and lower Skeena rivers. They sought a declaration of an Aboriginal right to commercially harvest and sell "all species of fish" within their traditional waters. However, the trial judge found that harvesting and consumption of salmon, halibut, herring spawn, seaweed, shellfish, and eulachon were integral to its distinctive culture, but trade in fish or fish products other than the grease derived from the smelt-like species called the eulachon or candle fish (because when dried it could be burned like a candle) was not integral to the distinctive culture of the pre-contact society. The Supreme Court agreed with the trial judge, noting that Sappier had not changed the test.

2.4 Métis Rights

Recall that in Van der Peet the Court acknowledge that the test it developed for proving Aboriginal rights would be ill-suited for Métis rights, but left addressing that issue to another day. In the next case, we see the Court modify the Van der Peet test to accommodate Métis Aboriginal rights claims, including altering the time period in which Métis Aboriginal rights have to be proven and adding on additional requirements to the Van der Peet test to permit Métis claimants to establish they are s. 35 rights-holders. Up to this point in the Supreme Court's Aboriginal rights case law, all the cases that made their way before the Court involved First Nations people with status under the Indian Act. In these situations, the Court took for granted that these claimants were section 35 rights-holders. The Métis context, the Court admitted, presented a new challenge: "determining membership in the Métis community might not be as simple as verifying membership in, for example, an Indian band". (However, even in the First Nations context, owing to ongoing control exercised by the federal government of 'Indian status' and exclusionary rules it continues to apply, such as the secondary cut-off rule, membership in a community may not be so easy to verify.) This case points to challenging issues of who are rights-holders and who determines who are s. 35 rights holders.

For discussion of these exclusionary rules, see: Sébastian Grammond, "Discrimination in the Rules of Indian Status and the McIvor Case" (2009) 35:1 Queen's LJ 421-432 .

2.4.1 R. v. Powley, 2003 SCC 43 (CanLII), [2003] 2 SCR 207

> THE COURT —

I. Introduction

[1] This case raises the issue of whether members of the Métis community in and around Sault Ste. Marie enjoy a constitutionally protected right to hunt for food under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. We conclude that they do.

[2] On the morning of October 22, 1993, Steve Powley and his son, Roddy, set out hunting. They headed north from their residence in Sault Ste. Marie, and at about 9 a.m., they shot and killed a bull moose near Old Goulais Bay Road.

[6] The facts are not in dispute. The Powleys freely admit that they shot, killed, and took possession of a bull moose without a hunting licence. However, they argue that, as Métis, they have an aboriginal right to hunt for food in the Sault Ste. Marie area that cannot be infringed by the Ontario government without proper justification. Because the Ontario government denies the existence of any special Métis right to hunt for food, the Powleys argue that subjecting them to the moose hunting provisions of the Game and Fish Act violates their rights under s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, and cannot be justified.

[10] The term "Métis" in s. 35 does not encompass all individuals with mixed Indian and European heritage; rather, it refers to distinctive peoples who, in addition to their mixed ancestry, developed their own customs, way of life, and recognizable group identity separate from their Indian or Inuit and European forebears. Métis communities evolved and flourished prior to the entrenchment of European control, when the influence of European settlers and political institutions became pre-eminent. The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples describes this evolution as follows:

> Intermarriage between First Nations and Inuit women and European fur traders and fishermen produced children, but the birth of new Aboriginal cultures took longer. At first, the children of mixed unions were brought up in the traditions of their mothers or (less often) their fathers. Gradually, however, distinct Métis cultures emerged, combining European and First Nations or Inuit heritages in unique ways. Economics played a major role in this process. The special qualities and skills of the Métis population made them indispensable members of Aboriginal/non-Aboriginal economic partnerships, and that association contributed to the shaping of their cultures. . . . As interpreters, diplomats, guides, couriers, freighters, traders and suppliers, the early Métis people contributed massively to European penetration of North America.
> The French referred to the fur trade Métis as coureurs de bois (forest runners) and bois brulés (burnt-wood people) in recognition of their wilderness occupations and their dark complexions. The Labrador Métis (whose culture had early roots) were originally called "livyers" or "settlers", those who remained in the fishing settlements year-round rather than returning periodically to Europe or Newfoundland. The Cree people expressed the Métis character in the term Otepayemsuak, meaning the "independent ones". (Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples: Perspectives and Realities, vol. 4, at pp. 199-200 ("RCAP Report"))

The Métis developed separate and distinct identities, not reducible to the mere fact of their mixed ancestry: "What distinguishes Métis people from everyone else is that they associate themselves with a culture that is distinctly Métis" (RCAP Report, vol. 4, at p. 202).

[11] The Métis of Canada share the common experience of having forged a new culture and a distinctive group identity from their Indian or Inuit and European roots. This enables us to speak in general terms of "the Métis". However, particularly given the vast territory of what is now Canada, we should not be surprised to find that different groups of Métis exhibit their own distinctive traits and traditions. This diversity among groups of Métis may enable us to speak of Métis "peoples", a possibility left open by the language of s. 35(2), which speaks of the "Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada".

[12] We would not purport to enumerate the various Métis peoples that may exist. Because the Métis are explicitly included in s. 35, it is only necessary for our purposes to verify that the claimants belong to an identifiable Métis community with a sufficient degree of continuity and stability to support a site-specific aboriginal right. A Métis community can be defined as a group of Métis with a distinctive collective identity, living together in the same geographic area and sharing a common way of life. The respondents here claim membership in the Métis community centred in and around Sault Ste. Marie. It is not necessary for us to decide, and we did not receive submissions on, whether this community is also a Métis "people", or whether it forms part of a larger Métis people that extends over a wider area such as the Upper Great Lakes.

[13] Our evaluation of the respondents' claim takes place against this historical and cultural backdrop. The overarching interpretive principle for our legal analysis is a purposive reading of s. 35. The inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 is based on a commitment to recognizing the Métis and enhancing their survival as distinctive communities. The purpose and the promise of s. 35 is to protect practices that were historically important features of these distinctive communities and that persist in the present day as integral elements of their Métis culture.

[14] For the reasons elaborated below, we uphold the basic elements of the Van der Peet test … and apply these to the respondents' claim. However, we modify certain elements of the pre-contact test to reflect the distinctive history and post-contact ethnogenesis of the Métis, and the resulting differences between Indian claims and Métis claims.

A. The Van der Peet Test

[16] The emphasis on prior occupation as the primary justification for the special protection accorded aboriginal rights led the majority in Van der Peet to endorse a pre-contact test for identifying which customs, practices or traditions were integral to a particular aboriginal culture, and therefore entitled to constitutional protection. However, the majority recognized that the pre-contact test might prove inadequate to capture the range of Métis customs, practices or traditions that are entitled to protection, since Métis cultures by definition post-date European contact. For this reason, Lamer C.J. explicitly reserved the question of how to define Métis aboriginal rights for another day. …

[17] As indicated above, the inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 is not traceable to their pre-contact occupation of Canadian territory. The purpose of s. 35 as it relates to the Métis is therefore different from that which relates to the Indians or the Inuit. The constitutionally significant feature of the Métis is their special status as peoples that emerged between first contact and the effective imposition of European control. The inclusion of the Métis in s. 35 represents Canada's commitment to recognize and value the distinctive Métis cultures, which grew up in areas not yet open to colonization, and which the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognized can only survive if the Métis are protected along with other aboriginal communities.

[18] With this in mind, we proceed to the issue of the correct test to determine the entitlements of the Métis under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The appropriate test must then be applied to the findings of fact of the trial judge. We accept Van der Peet as the template for this discussion. However, we modify the pre-contact focus of the Van der Peet test when the claimants are Métis to account for the important differences between Indian and Métis claims. Section 35 requires that we recognize and protect those customs and traditions that were historically important features of Métis communities prior to the time of effective European control, and that persist in the present day. This modification is required to account for the unique post-contact emergence of Métis communities, and the post-contact foundation of their aboriginal rights.

(1) Characterization of the Right

[19] The first step is to characterize the right being claimed: Van der Peet, supra, at para. 76. Aboriginal hunting rights, including Métis rights, are contextual and site-specific. The respondents shot a bull moose near Old Goulais Bay Road, in the environs of Sault Ste. Marie, within the traditional hunting grounds of that Métis community. They made a point of documenting that the moose was intended to provide meat for the winter. The trial judge determined that they were hunting for food, and there is no reason to overturn this finding. The right being claimed can therefore be characterized as the right to hunt for food in the environs of Sault Ste. Marie.

[20] We agree with the trial judge that the periodic scarcity of moose does not in itself undermine the respondents' claim. The relevant right is not to hunt moose but to hunt for food in the designated territory.

(2) Identification of the Historic Rights-Bearing Community

[21] The trial judge found that a distinctive Métis community emerged in the Upper Great Lakes region in the mid-17th century, and peaked around 1850. We find no reviewable error in the trial judge's findings on this matter, which were confirmed by the Court of Appeal. The record indicates the following: In the mid-17th century, the Jesuits established a mission at Sainte-Marie-du-Sault, in an area characterized by heavy competition among fur traders. In 1750, the French established a fixed trading post on the south bank of the Saint Mary's River. The Sault Ste. Marie post attracted settlement by Métis — the children of unions between European traders and Indian women, and their descendants (A. J. Ray, "An Economic History of the Robinson Treaties Area Before 1860" (1998) ("Ray Report"), at p. 17). According to Dr. Ray, by the early 19th century, "[t]he settlement at Sault Ste. Marie was one of the oldest and most important [Métis settlements] in the upper lakes area" (Ray Report, at p. 47). The Hudson Bay Company operated the Sault Ste. Marie's post primarily as a depot from 1821 onwards (Ray Report, at p. 51). Although Dr. Ray characterized the Company's records for this post as "scanty" (Ray Report, at p. 51), he was able to piece together a portrait of the community from existing records, including the 1824-25 and 1827-28 post journals of HBC Chief Factor Bethune, and the 1846 report of a government surveyor, Alexander Vidal (Ray Report, at pp. 52-53).

[22] Dr. Ray's report indicates that the individuals named in the post journals "were overwhelmingly Métis", and that Vidal's report "provide[s] a crude indication of the rate of growth of the community and highlights the continuing dominance of Métis in it" (Ray Report, at p. 53). Dr. Victor P. Lytwyn characterized the Vidal report and accompanying map as "clear evidence of a distinct and cohesive Métis community at Sault Ste. Marie" (V. P. Lytwyn, "Historical Report on the Métis Community at Sault Ste. Marie" (1998) ("Lytwyn Report"), at p. 2) while Dr. Ray elaborated: "By the time of Vidal's visit to the Sault Ste. Marie area, the people of mixed ancestry living there had developed a distinctive sense of identity and Indians and Whites recognized them as being a separate people" (Ray Report, at p. 56).

[23] In addition to demographic evidence, proof of shared customs, traditions, and a collective identity is required to demonstrate the existence of a Métis community that can support a claim to site-specific aboriginal rights. We recognize that different groups of Métis have often lacked political structures and have experienced shifts in their members' self-identification. However, the existence of an identifiable Métis community must be demonstrated with some degree of continuity and stability in order to support a site-specific aboriginal rights claim. Here, we find no basis for overturning the trial judge's finding of a historic Métis community at Sault Ste. Marie. This finding is supported by the record and must be upheld.

(3) Identification of the Contemporary Rights-Bearing Community

[24] Aboriginal rights are communal rights: They must be grounded in the existence of a historic and present community, and they may only be exercised by virtue of an individual's ancestrally based membership in the present community. The trial judge found that a Métis community has persisted in and around Sault Ste. Marie despite its decrease in visibility after the signing of the Robinson-Huron Treaty in 1850…

> [T]he Métis continued to live in the Sault Ste. Marie region. Some drifted into the Indian Reserves which had been set apart by the 1850 Treaty. Others lived in areas outside of the town, or in back concessions. The Métis continued to live in much the same manner as they had in the past — fishing, hunting, trapping and harvesting other resources for their livelihood. (Lytwyn Report, at p. 31 (emphasis added); see also J. Morrison, "The Robinson Treaties of 1850: A Case Study,"at p. 201.)

[26] The advent of European control over this area thus interfered with, but did not eliminate, the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community and its traditional practices, as evidenced by census data from the 1860s through the 1890s. Dr. Lytwyn concluded from this census data that "[a]lthough the Métis lost much of their traditional land base at Sault Ste. Marie, they continued to live in the region and gain their livelihood from the resources of the land and waters" (Lytwyn Report, at p. 32). He also noted a tendency for underreporting and lack of information about the Métis during this period because of their "removal to the peripheries of the town", and "their own disinclination to be identified as Métis" in the wake of the Riel rebellions and the turning of Ontario public opinion against Métis rights through government actions and the media (Lytwyn Report, at p. 33).

[27] We conclude that the evidence supports the trial judge's finding that the community's lack of visibility was explained and does not negate the existence of the contemporary community. There was never a lapse; the Métis community went underground, so to speak, but it continued. Moreover, as indicated below, the "continuity" requirement puts the focus on the continuing practices of members of the community, rather than more generally on the community itself, as indicated below.

[28] The trial judge's finding of a contemporary Métis community in and around Sault Ste. Marie is supported by the evidence and must be upheld.

(4) Verification of the Claimant's Membership in the Relevant Contemporary Community

[29] While determining membership in the Métis community might not be as simple as verifying membership in, for example, an Indian band, this does not detract from the status of Métis people as full-fledged rights-bearers. As Métis communities continue to organize themselves more formally and to assert their constitutional rights, it is imperative that membership requirements become more standardized so that legitimate rights-holders can be identified. In the meantime, courts faced with Métis claims will have to ascertain Métis identity on a case-by-case basis. The inquiry must take into account both the value of community self-definition, and the need for the process of identification to be objectively verifiable. In addition, the criteria for Métis identity under s. 35 must reflect the purpose of this constitutional guarantee: to recognize and affirm the rights of the Métis held by virtue of their direct relationship to this country's original inhabitants and by virtue of the continuity between their customs and traditions and those of their Métis predecessors. This is not an insurmountable task.

[30] We emphasize that we have not been asked, and we do not purport, to set down a comprehensive definition of who is Métis for the purpose of asserting a claim under s. 35. We therefore limit ourselves to indicating the important components of a future definition, while affirming that the creation of appropriate membership tests before disputes arise is an urgent priority… we would look to three broad factors as indicia of Métis identity for the purpose of claiming Métis rights under s. 35: self-identification, ancestral connection, and community acceptance.

[31] First, the claimant must self-identify as a member of a Métis community. This self-identification should not be of recent vintage: While an individual's self-identification need not be static or monolithic, claims that are made belatedly in order to benefit from a s. 35 right will not satisfy the self-identification requirement.

[32] Second, the claimant must present evidence of an ancestral connection to a historic Métis community. This objective requirement ensures that beneficiaries of s. 35 rights have a real link to the historic community whose practices ground the right being claimed. We would not require a minimum "blood quantum", but we would require some proof that the claimant's ancestors belonged to the historic Métis community by birth, adoption, or other means. Like the trial judge, we would abstain from further defining this requirement in the absence of more extensive argument by the parties in a case where this issue is determinative. In this case, the Powleys' Métis ancestry is not disputed.

[33] Third, the claimant must demonstrate that he or she is accepted by the modern community whose continuity with the historic community provides the legal foundation for the right being claimed. Membership in a Métis political organization may be relevant to the question of community acceptance, but it is not sufficient in the absence of a contextual understanding of the membership requirements of the organization and its role in the Métis community. The core of community acceptance is past and ongoing participation in a shared culture, in the customs and traditions that constitute a Métis community's identity and distinguish it from other groups. This is what the community membership criterion is all about. Other indicia of community acceptance might include evidence of participation in community activities and testimony from other members about the claimant's connection to the community and its culture. The range of acceptable forms of evidence does not attenuate the need for an objective demonstration of a solid bond of past and present mutual identification and recognition of common belonging between the claimant and other members of the rights-bearing community.

[34] It is important to remember that, no matter how a contemporary community defines membership, only those members with a demonstrable ancestral connection to the historic community can claim a s. 35 right. Verifying membership is crucial, since individuals are only entitled to exercise Métis aboriginal rights by virtue of their ancestral connection to and current membership in a Métis community.

[35] In this case, there is no reason to overturn the trial judge's finding that the Powleys are members of the Métis community that arose and still exists in and around Sault Ste. Marie. We agree with the Court of Appeal that, in the circumstances of this case, the fact that the Powleys' ancestors lived on an Indian reserve for a period of time does not negate the Powleys' Métis identity… We emphasize that the individual decision by a Métis person's ancestors to take treaty benefits does not necessarily extinguish that person's claim to Métis rights. It will depend, in part, on whether there was a collective adhesion by the Métis community to the treaty. Based on the record, it was open to the trial judge to conclude that the rights of the Powleys' ancestors did not merge into those of the Indian band.

(5) Identification of the Relevant Time Frame

[36] As indicated above, the pre-contact aspect of the Van der Peet test requires adjustment in order to take account of the post-contact ethnogenesis of the Métis and the purpose of s. 35 in protecting the historically important customs and traditions of these distinctive peoples. While the fact of prior occupation grounds aboriginal rights claims for the Inuit and the Indians, the recognition of Métis rights in s. 35 is not reducible to the Métis' Indian ancestry. The unique status of the Métis as an Aboriginal people with post-contact origins requires an adaptation of the pre-contact approach to meet the distinctive historical circumstances surrounding the evolution of Métis communities.

[37] The pre-contact test in Van der Peet is based on the constitutional affirmation that aboriginal communities are entitled to continue those practices, customs and traditions that are integral to their distinctive existence or relationship to the land. By analogy, the test for Métis practices should focus on identifying those practices, customs and traditions that are integral to the Métis community's distinctive existence and relationship to the land. This unique history can most appropriately be accommodated by a post-contact but pre-control test that identifies the time when Europeans effectively established political and legal control in a particular area. The focus should be on the period after a particular Métis community arose and before it came under the effective control of European laws and customs. This pre-control test enables us to identify those practices, customs and traditions that predate the imposition of European laws and customs on the Métis.

[40] The historical record indicates that the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community thrived largely unaffected by European laws and customs until colonial policy shifted from one of discouraging settlement to one of negotiating treaties and encouraging settlement in the mid-19th century. The trial judge found, and the parties agreed in their pleadings before the lower courts, that "effective control [of the Upper Great Lakes area] passed from the Aboriginal peoples of the area (Ojibway and Metis) to European control" in the period between 1815 and 1850 (para. 90). The record fully supports the finding that the period just prior to 1850 is the appropriate date for finding effective control in this geographic area, which the Crown agreed was the critical date in its pleadings below.

(6) Determination of Whether the Practice is Integral to the Claimants' Distinctive Culture

[41] The practice of subsistence hunting and fishing was a constant in the Métis community, even though the availability of particular species might have waxed and waned. The evidence indicates that subsistence hunting was an important aspect of Métis life and a defining feature of their special relationship to the land (Peterson, supra, at p. 41; Lytwyn Report, supra, at p. 6). A major part of subsistence was the practice at issue here, hunting for food.

[44] [The] evidence supports the trial judge's finding that hunting for food was integral to the Métis way of life at Sault Ste. Marie in the period just prior to 1850.

(7) Establishment of Continuity Between the Historic Practice and the Contemporary Right Asserted

> [45] Although s. 35 protects "existing" rights, it is more than a mere codification of the common law. Section 35 reflects a new promise: a constitutional commitment to protecting practices that were historically important features of particular aboriginal communities. A certain margin of flexibility might be required to ensure that aboriginal practices can evolve and develop over time, but it is not necessary to define or to rely on that margin in this case. Hunting for food was an important feature of the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community, and the practice has been continuous to the present. Steve and Roddy Powley claim a Métis aboriginal right to hunt for food. The right claimed by the Powleys falls squarely within the bounds of the historical practice grounding the right.
> (8) Determination of Whether or Not the Right Was Extinguished
> [46] The doctrine of extinguishment applies equally to Métis and to First Nations claims. There is no evidence of extinguishment here, as determined by the trial judge. The Crown's argument for extinguishment is based largely on the Robinson-Huron Treaty of 1850, from which the Métis as a group were explicitly excluded.
> (9) If There Is a Right, Determination of Whether There Is an Infringement
> [47] Ontario currently does not recognize any Métis right to hunt for food, or any "special access rights to natural resources" for the Métis whatsoever (appellant's record, at p. 1029). This lack of recognition, and the consequent application of the challenged provisions to the Powleys, infringe their aboriginal right to hunt for food as a continuation of the protected historical practices of the Sault Ste. Marie Métis community.
> (10) Determination of Whether the Infringement Is Justified
> [48] The main justification advanced by the appellant is that of conservation. Although conservation is clearly a very important concern, we agree with the trial judge that the record here does not support this justification. If the moose population in this part of Ontario were under threat, and there was no evidence that it is, the Métis would still be entitled to a priority allocation to satisfy their subsistence needs … While preventative measures might be required for conservation purposes in the future, we have not been presented with evidence to support such measures here. The Ontario authorities can make out a case for regulation of the aboriginal right to hunt moose for food if and when the need arises. On the available evidence and given the current licensing system, Ontario's blanket denial of any Métis right to hunt for food cannot be justified.
> [49] The appellant advances a subsidiary argument for justification based on the alleged difficulty of identifying who is Métis. As discussed, the Métis identity of a particular claimant should be determined on proof of self-identification, ancestral connection, and community acceptance. The development of a more systematic method of identifying Métis rights-holders for the purpose of enforcing hunting regulations is an urgent priority. That said, the difficulty of identifying members of the Métis community must not be exaggerated as a basis for defeating their rights under the Constitution of Canada.
> III. Conclusion
> [53] Members of the Métis community in and around Sault Ste. Marie have an aboriginal right to hunt for food under s. 35(1). This is determined by their fulfillment of the requirements set out in Van der Peet, modified to fit the distinctive purpose of s. 35 in protecting the Métis.

2.5 Aboriginal Title

Until the mid-1970s, the leading decision in Canada on Aboriginal title was St. Catherine Milling & Lumber Co. v R. (1888), 14 App. Cas. 46 (JCPC) which denied that Indigenous peoples had any inherent right to their lands.

This case involved a challenge by the province of Ontario to a license to cut timber issued to a lumber company by the federal government over lands 'surrendered' by certain Anishinaabe tribes in Treaty 3 in 1873. The JCPC concluded that Canada had no jurisdiction over surrendered lands and the license was invalid. In resolving this issue, the JCPC opined upon the larger question of the nature of the treaty signatories' interest in the lands surrendered. The JCPC held that any Aboriginal title held by the Anishinaabe derived from a grant by the Crown through the Royal Proclamation of 1763 and that such title was not full ownership but a much lesser right and the Crown held the paramount estate:

> The capture of Québec in 1759, and the capitulation of Montréal in 1760, were followed in 1763 by the session to Great Britain of Canada and all its dependencies, with the sovereignty, property, and possession, and all other rights which had at any previous time been held or required by the Crown of France. A Royal proclamation was issued on 7 October, 1763…
> The territory in dispute has been an Indian occupation from the date of the proclamation until 1873. During that interval of time Indian affairs have been administered successively by the Crown, by the Provincial Governments, and (since the passing of the British North America Act, 1867), by the government of the Dominion. The policy of these administrations has been all along the same in this respect, that the Indian inhabitants have been precluded from entering into any transaction with a subject for the sale or transfer of their interest in the land, and have only been permitted to surrender their rights to the Crown by a formal contract, duly ratified in a meeting of their Chiefs or headman convened for the purpose. Whilst there have been changes in the administrative authority, there has been no change since the year 1763 in the character of the interest which its Indian inhabitants had in the lands surrendered by the treaty. There possession, such as it was, can only be ascribed to the general provisions made by the Royal proclamation in favour of all Indian tribes then living under the sovereignty and protection of the British Crown. It was suggested in the course of the argument for the Dominion, that inasmuch as the proclamation recites that the territories thereby reserved for Indians had never "been ceded to or purchased by" the Crown, the entire property of the land remained with them. That inference is however, at variance with the terms of the instrument, which shew that the tenure of the Indians was a personal and usufructuary right, dependent upon the goodwill of the sovereign. The lands reserved are expressly stated to be "parts of our Dominions and territories;" and it is declared to be the will and pleasure of the sovereign that, "for the present," the land shall be reserved for the use of the Indians, as their hunting grounds, under his protection and dominion. There was a great deal of learned discussion at the Bar with respect to the precise quality of the Indian right, but their Lordships do not consider it necessary to express any opinion upon the point. It appears to them to be sufficient for the purposes of this case that there has been all along vested in the Crown a substantial and paramount estate, underlying the Indian title, which became a plenum dominium whenever that title was surrendered or otherwise extinguished.

2.5.1 Calder v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1973 CanLII 4 (SCC), [1973] SCR 313

St. Catherine's was finally overturned in Calder v. British Columbia (Attorney General). The case involved Nisga'a elders suing the provincial government for a declaration of Nisga'a title to their lands. The case was a watershed decision because 6 of the 7 justices of the SCC held that Aboriginal title continued to exist at common law, thereby overruling St. Catherine's holding about the sole source of Aboriginal title being the Royal Proclamation. Judson J., for himself and 2 other justices, identified the source of Nisga'a title in their occupation of the land prior to the arrival of Europeans:

> There can be no doubt that the Privy Council found that the Proclamation of 1763 was the origin of the Indian title…
> I do not take these reasons to mean that the Proclamation was the exclusive source of Indian title. …
> Although I think that it is clear that Indian title in British Columbia cannot owe its origin to the Proclamation of 1763, the fact is that when the settlers came, the Indians were there, organized in societies and occupying the land as their forefathers had done for centuries. …

Hall J., for himself and 2 other justices, looked to American and Commonwealth cases on Aboriginal title, including Johnson v. M'Intosh:

> While the Nishga claim has not heretofore been litigated, there is a wealth of jurisprudence affirming common law recognition of aboriginal rights to possession and enjoyment of lands of aborigines precisely analogous to the Nishga situation here.
> The case most frequently quoted with approval dealing with the nature of aboriginal rights is Johnson v. McIntosh. It is the locus classicus of the principles governing aboriginal title.
> The dominant and recurring proposition stated by Chief Justice Marshall in Johnson v. McIntosh is that on discovery or on conquest the aborigines of newly-found lands were conceded to be the rightful occupants of the soil with a legal as well as a just claim to retain possession of it and to use it according to their own discretion, but their rights to complete sovereignty as independent nations were necessarily diminished and their power to dispose of the soil on their own will to whomsoever they pleased was denied by the original fundamental principle that discovery or conquest gave exclusive title to those who made it.
> The aboriginal Indian title does not depend on treaty, executive order or legislative enactment.

Although both Judson and Hall JJ. acknowledged the source of Aboriginal title as owing to Indigenous peoples' prior occupation, the judges disagreed on the nature of Aboriginal title. Judson J., while disagreeing with the language used in St. Catherine's, appears to accept Aboriginal title as a lesser interest that burdens the Crown's title:

> When the Colony of British Columbia was established in 1858, the Nishga territory became part of it. The fee was in the Crown in right of the Colony until July 20, 1871, when the Colony entered Confederation, and thereafter in the Crown in right of the Province of British Columbia, except only in respect of those lands transferred to the Dominion under the Terms of Union.
> … it does not help one in the solution of this problem [of Aboriginal title] to call it a "personal or usufructuary right". What they are asserting in this action is that they had a right to continue to live on their lands as their forefathers had lived and that this right has never been lawfully extinguished. There can be no question that this right was "dependent on the goodwill of the Sovereign".

Hall J., on the other hand, suggested that Aboriginal title was a right to ownership:

> Possession is of itself at common law proof of ownership…
> … the trial judge overlooked that possession is of itself proof of ownership. Prima facie, therefore, the Nishgas are the owners of the lands that have been in their possession from time immemorial and, therefore, the burden of establishing that their right has been extinguished rests squarely on the respondent.

The judges also split on the question of whether the Nisga'a title had been extinguished. Judson J. found that the colony and then provincial acts of legislating over the land effectively extinguished the Nisga'a title:

> It was the opinion of the British Columbia Courts that this right, if it ever existed, had been lawfully extinguished, that with two societies in competition for land—the white settlers demanding orderly settlement and the Indians demanding to be let alone—the proper authorities deliberately chose to set apart reserves for Indians in various parts of the territory and open up the rest for settlements. They held that this had been done when British Columbia entered Confederation in 1871 and that the Terms of Union recognized this fact.
> The reasons for judgment next deal with a series of proclamations by James Douglas as Governor of the Colony of British Columbia…. [These were proclamations and ordinances showing the province exercising legislative jurisdiction in a wide number of areas: land surveys; procedures for land sales; laws around mining; orders declaring that all lands in the province and all mines and minerals belong to the Crown fee; and laws affecting Crown lands.]
> In my opinion, in the present case, the sovereign authority elected to exercise complete dominion over the lands in question, adverse to any right of occupancy which the Nishga Tribe might have had, when, by legislation, it opened up such lands for settlement, subject to the reserves of land set aside for Indian occupation.

Justice Hall, while not disagreeing that Aboriginal title could be extinguished (based on 19th century case law dealing with Aboriginal title from other commonwealth countries like the US and New Zealand), held that the threshold for what constitutes extinguishment was not proven by the Crown. What was required to prove this was specific legislation evidencing "a "clear and plain indication" in the public records that the sovereign "intended to extinguish all of the (claimants') rights."" Based on the facts, Hall J. did not find in the various proclamations and ordinances evidence of a clear and plain intent to extinguish:

> If the Colony had intended extinguishing the Indian title to public lands as referred to in the foregoing letter, it could easily have said, "Indian title to public lands in the Colony is hereby extinguished". No such enactment or one with language to like effect was ever passed.

The seventh judge in the case, Pigeon J., would have dismissed the case on the procedural ground that the Nisga'a had not followed the correct procedure to bring a challenge against the title of the Crown in right of the province. His decision brought the total judges voting to dismiss the case to 4 over 3. While the case was significant for recognizing the common law right to Aboriginal title, it left the status of the continued existence of Aboriginal title in limbo given the split between the judges on whether provincial laws and ordinances over lands could serve to extinguish title.

2.5.2 Guerin v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 335

A majority of the SCC would eventually return to Calder in Guerin. Dickson J. grounded the existence of the fiduciary duty in both the nature of Aboriginal title and the role of the Crown in the surrender of reserve lands. This case did not revisit the question of evidence required to prove extinguishment but did reaffirm Aboriginal title's existence at common law (implying that Judson J.'s conclusion that provincial regulation of land could extinguish Aboriginal title was not accepted by a majority of the Court). In developing a theory of Aboriginal title, like Hall J. in Calder, Dickson CJ, in particular, drew on Marshall J.'s decision in Johnson v M'Intosh:

> In Calder…, this Court recognized aboriginal title as a legal right derived from the Indians' historic occupation and possession of their tribal lands.
> In recognizing that the Proclamation is not the sole source of Indian title the Calder decision went beyond the judgment of the Privy Council in St. Catherine's Milling … . In that case Lord Watson acknowledged the existence of aboriginal title but said it had its origin in the Royal Proclamation. In this respect Calder is consistent with the position of Chief Justice Marshall in the leading American cases of Johnson v. M'Intosh… (1823), and Worcester v. State of Georgia, … (1832), cited by Judson and Hall JJ. in their respective judgments.
> In Johnson v. M'Intosh, Marshall C.J., although he acknowledged the Proclamation of 1763 as one basis for recognition of Indian title, was nonetheless of opinion that the rights of Indians in the lands they traditionally occupied prior to European colonization both predated and survived the claims to sovereignty made by various European nations in the territories of the North American continent. The principle of discovery which justified these claims gave the ultimate title in the land in a particular area to the nation which had discovered and claimed it. In that respect at least the Indians' rights in the land were obviously diminished; but their rights of occupancy and possession remained unaffected.
> The principle that a change in sovereignty over a particular territory does not in general affect the presumptive title of the inhabitants was approved by the Privy Council in Amodu Tijani v. Southern Nigeria (Secretary), [1921] 2 A.C. 399. That principle supports the assumption implicit in Calder that Indian title is an independent legal right which, although recognized by the Royal Proclamation of 1763, nonetheless predates it. … [The Indians] interest in their lands is a pre-existing legal right not created by Royal Proclamation, by s. 18(1) of the Indian Act, or by any other executive order or legislative provision.
> It does not matter, in my opinion, that the present case is concerned with the interest of an Indian Band in a reserve rather than with unrecognized aboriginal title in traditional tribal lands. The Indian interest in the land is the same in both cases: see Attorney-General for Quebec v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1920 CanLII 956 (UK JCPC), [1921] 1 A.C. 401, at pp. 410-11 (the Star Chrome case). …

Dickson J. also opined on the nature of Aboriginal title, indicating that it was a lesser interest than ownership; that it was sui generis in nature and common law concepts were not apt to describe it:

> In the St. Catherine's Milling case, supra, the Privy Council held that the Indians had a "personal and usufructuary right" in the lands which they had traditionally occupied. …
> It is true that in contexts other than constitutional the characterization of Indian title as "a personal and usufructuary right" has sometimes been questioned. In Calder, supra, for example, Judson J. intimated at p. 328 that this characterization was not helpful in determining the nature of Indian title. …
> It appears to me that there is no real conflict between the cases which characterize Indian title as a beneficial interest of some sort, and those which characterize it a personal, usufructuary right. Any apparent inconsistency derives from the fact that in describing what constitutes a unique interest in land the courts have almost inevitably found themselves applying a somewhat inappropriate terminology drawn from general property law. There is a core of truth in the way that each of the two lines of authority has described native title, but an appearance of conflict has nonetheless arisen because in neither case is the categorization quite accurate.
> Indians have a legal right to occupy and possess certain lands, the ultimate title to which is in the Crown. While their interest does not, strictly speaking, amount to beneficial ownership, neither is its nature completely exhausted by the concept of a personal right. It is true that the sui generis interest which the Indians have in the land is personal in the sense that it cannot be transferred to a grantee, but it is also true, as will presently appear, that the interest gives rise upon surrender to a distinctive fiduciary obligation on the part of the Crown to deal with the land for the benefit of the surrendering Indians. These two aspects of Indian title go together, since the Crown's original purpose in declaring the Indians' interest to be inalienable otherwise than to the Crown was to facilitate the Crown's ability to represent the Indians in dealings with third parties. The nature of the Indians' interest is therefore best characterized by its general inalienability, coupled with the fact that the Crown is under an obligation to deal with the land on the Indians' behalf when the interest is surrendered. Any description of Indian title which goes beyond these two features is both unnecessary and potentially misleading.

2.5.3 Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010

The next SCC decision to discuss Aboriginal title was Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010. This arose from a lawsuit commenced by Gitksan and Wet'suwet'en hereditary chiefs in 1984, both individually and on behalf of their "Houses", claiming ownership and jurisdiction to over 58,000 km² of lands in British Columbia. The claimants presented significant evidence of their oral traditions, histories, territories and Indigenous laws in support of their claim. The trial judge did not accept the evidence of oral history of the claimant's attachment to the land. He rejected the plaintiffs' claims for ownership and jurisdiction and for Aboriginal rights in the territory, and instead granted a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to use unoccupied or vacant land subject to the general law of the province.

On appeal, the original claim was altered by replacing the claims for ownership and jurisdiction with claims for Aboriginal title and self-government, and amalgamating the individual claims into two collective claims, one for each nation. The SCC allowed the appeal, though did not rule on whether or not title had been established, but instead ordered a new trial. In its decisions, the SCC spoke at length about the nature of title and how it is to be proven, effectively setting the framework for establishing Aboriginal title under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

First, Lamer CJ, for the majority, addresses the trial judge's dismissive treatment of the oral history evidence led by the claimants, finding that the trial judge had made a "palpable and overriding error" in his assessment of this evidence:

> 78 … As a general rule, this Court has been extremely reluctant to interfere with the findings of fact made at trial … [u]nless there is a "palpable and overriding error", appellate courts should not substitute their own findings of fact for those of the trial judge.

> 80 … [A]ppellate intervention is … warranted by the failure of a trial court to appreciate the evidentiary difficulties inherent in adjudicating aboriginal claims when, first, applying the rules of evidence and, second, interpreting the evidence before it.
> 81 The justification for this special approach can be found in the nature of aboriginal rights themselves. I explained in Van der Peet that those rights are aimed at the reconciliation of the prior occupation of North America by distinctive aboriginal societies with the assertion of Crown sovereignty over Canadian territory. They attempt to achieve that reconciliation by "their bridging of aboriginal and non-aboriginal cultures" (at para. 42). Accordingly, "a court must take into account the perspective of the aboriginal people claiming the right. . . . while at the same time taking into account the perspective of the common law" such that "[t]rue reconciliation will, equally, place weight on each" (at paras. 49 and 50).
> 82 In other words, although the doctrine of aboriginal rights is a common law doctrine, aboriginal rights are truly sui generis, and demand a unique approach to the treatment of evidence which accords due weight to the perspective of aboriginal peoples. However, that accommodation must be done in a manner which does not strain "the Canadian legal and constitutional structure" (at para. 49). …
> 84 … In practical terms, this requires the courts to come to terms with the oral histories of aboriginal societies, which, for many aboriginal nations, are the only record of their past. …
> 86 Many features of oral histories would count against both their admissibility and their weight as evidence of prior events in a court that took a traditional approach to the rules of evidence. The most fundamental of these is their broad social role not only "as a repository of historical knowledge for a culture" but also as an expression of "the values and mores of [that] culture" … . Dickson J. (as he then was) recognized as much when he stated in Kruger v. The Queen, 1977 … that "[c]laims to aboriginal title are woven with history, legend, politics and moral obligations." The difficulty with these features of oral histories is that they are tangential to the ultimate purpose of the fact-finding process at trial -- the determination of the historical truth. Another feature of oral histories which creates difficulty is that they largely consist of out-of-court statements, passed on through an unbroken chain across the generations of a particular aboriginal nation to the present-day. These out-of-court statements are admitted for their truth and therefore conflict with the general rule against the admissibility of hearsay.
> 87 Notwithstanding the challenges created by the use of oral histories as proof of historical facts, the laws of evidence must be adapted in order that this type of evidence can be accommodated and placed on an equal footing with the types of historical evidence that courts are familiar with…
> 107 The trial judge's treatment of the various kinds of oral histories did not satisfy the principles I laid down in Van der Peet. These errors are particularly worrisome because oral histories were of critical importance to the appellants' case. They used those histories in an attempt to establish their occupation and use of the disputed territory, an essential requirement for aboriginal title. The trial judge, after refusing to admit, or giving no independent weight to these oral histories, reached the conclusion that the appellants had not demonstrated the requisite degree of occupation for "ownership". Had the trial judge assessed the oral histories correctly, his conclusions on these issues of fact might have been very different.

Lamer CJ then proceeds to talk about the source, nature and content of Aboriginal title. Regarding its source, he affirms the finding of Dickson CJ in Guerin, that the historic occupation and possession of tribal lands by Aboriginal groups is what gives rise to Aboriginal title. He also suggests a second source for Aboriginal title, namely "the relationship between common law and the pre-existing systems of aboriginal law" (at para. 114).

On the nature of Aboriginal title, consistent with St. Catherine's and Guerin, Lamer CJ finds that Aboriginal title is different than fee simple ownership and takes the approach of characterizing it as "sui generis" as Dickson CJ had in Guerin. He explains the concept to mean the following:

> 112 … Aboriginal title has been described as sui generis in order to distinguish it from "normal" proprietary interests, such as fee simple. However, as I will now develop, it is also sui generis in the sense that its characteristics cannot be completely explained by reference either to the common law rules of real property or to the rules of property found in aboriginal legal systems. As with other aboriginal rights, it must be understood by reference to both common law and aboriginal perspectives.

On this Lamer CJ further notes that "[w]hat makes aboriginal title sui generis is that it arises from possession before the assertion of British sovereignty, whereas normal estates, like fee simple, arise afterwards" (at para. 114).

Another dimension, according to Lamer CJ, that makes Aboriginal title sui generis is its inalienability, which he explains as follows:

> 113 … Lands held pursuant to aboriginal title cannot be transferred, sold or surrendered to anyone other than the Crown and, as a result, is inalienable to third parties. This Court has taken pains to clarify that aboriginal title is only "personal" in this sense, and does not mean that aboriginal title is a non-proprietary interest which amounts to no more than a licence to use and occupy the land and cannot compete on an equal footing with other proprietary interests… .

The fact that aboriginal title is held communally is the final dimension Lamer CJ notes that makes it sui generis:

> 115 … Aboriginal title cannot be held by individual aboriginal persons; it is a collective right to land held by all members of an aboriginal nation. Decisions with respect to that land are also made by that community. This is another feature of aboriginal title which is sui generis and distinguishes it from normal property interests.

As for the content of Aboriginal title, Lamer CJ explains it as follows:

> 110 … The appellants argue that aboriginal title is tantamount to an inalienable fee simple, which confers on aboriginal peoples the rights to use those lands as they choose and which has been constitutionalized by s. 35(1). The respondents offer two alternative formulations: first, that aboriginal title is no more than a bundle of rights to engage in activities which are themselves aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1), and that the Constitution Act, 1982, merely constitutionalizes those individual rights, not the bundle itself, because the latter has no independent content; and second, that aboriginal title, at most, encompasses the right to exclusive use and occupation of land in order to engage in those activities which are aboriginal rights themselves, and that s. 35(1) constitutionalizes this notion of exclusivity.
> 111 The content of aboriginal title, in fact, lies somewhere in between these positions. Aboriginal title is a right in land and, as such, is more than the right to engage in specific activities which may be themselves aboriginal rights. Rather, it confers the right to use land for a variety of activities, not all of which need be aspects of practices, customs and traditions which are integral to the distinctive cultures of aboriginal societies. Those activities do not constitute the right per se; rather, they are parasitic on the underlying title. However, that range of uses is subject to the limitation that they must not be irreconcilable with the nature of the attachment to the land which forms the basis of the particular group's aboriginal title. This inherent limit … flows from the definition of aboriginal title as a sui generis interest in land…

Lamer CJ comes to the conclusion that the Aboriginal title lands can be used for a variety of different purposes and not restricted to merely the exercise of Aboriginal rights on the lands by looking at the various ways reserve lands can be used (recall that in Guerin, the Court found that the interest in both was the same). He notes that the Indian Act does not restrict the use of reserve land to the exercise of customs and traditions but allows land to be used for a broad variety of purposes. Further, looking at the Indian Oil and Gas Act, bands have an interest in subsurface resources under their reserve land. Thus, Lamer CJ concludes that Aboriginal title also encompasses mineral rights and lands held pursuant to Aboriginal title should be capable of exploitation in the same way (see paras. 116-124).

On the inherent limitation that Aboriginal title lands cannot be used in ways that are irreconcilable with the nature of the groups' attachment to the land, Lamer CJ explains his basis for this finding as follows:

> 126 … As I discussed earlier, aboriginal title arises from the prior occupation of Canada by aboriginal peoples. That prior occupation is relevant in two different ways: first, because of the physical fact of occupation, and second, because aboriginal title originates in part from pre-existing systems of aboriginal law. However, the law of aboriginal title does not only seek to determine the historic rights of aboriginal peoples to land; it also seeks to afford legal protection to prior occupation in the present-day. Implicit in the protection of historic patterns of occupation is a recognition of the importance of the continuity of the relationship of an aboriginal community to its land over time.
> 127 I develop this point below with respect to the test for aboriginal title. The relevance of the continuity of the relationship of an aboriginal community with its land here is that it applies not only to the past, but to the future as well. That relationship should not be prevented from continuing into the future. As a result, uses of the lands that would threaten that future relationship are, by their very nature, excluded from the content of aboriginal title.
> 128 Accordingly, in my view, lands subject to aboriginal title cannot be put to such uses as may be irreconcilable with the nature of the occupation of that land and the relationship that the particular group has had with the land which together have given rise to aboriginal title in the first place. As discussed below, one of the critical elements in the determination of whether a particular aboriginal group has aboriginal title to certain lands is the matter of the occupancy of those lands. Occupancy is determined by reference to the activities that have taken place on the land and the uses to which the land has been put by the particular group. If lands are so occupied, there will exist a special bond between the group and the land in question such that the land will be part of the definition of the group's distinctive culture. It seems to me that these elements of aboriginal title create an inherent limitation on the uses to which the land, over which such title exists, may be put.

Lamer CJ goes on to explain that should a community wish to use its land in a way that is inconsistent with the inherent limit, the solution would be to surrender those lands to the Crown and convert them into nontitle lands to do so (see para. 131).

Finally, Lamer CJ lays out the test for proving Aboriginal title, noting that this requires a different test than proving Aboriginal rights under the Van der Peet test. On the relationship between Aboriginal title and Aboriginal rights, he indicates that Aboriginal rights fall along a spectrum and Aboriginal title is a special subset of Aboriginal rights:

> 138 … [T]he aboriginal rights which are recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) fall along a spectrum with respect to their degree of connection with the land. At the one end, there are those aboriginal rights which are practices, customs and traditions that are integral to the distinctive aboriginal culture of the group claiming the right. However, the "occupation and use of the land" where the activity is taking place is not "sufficient to support a claim of title to the land" (at para. 26 (emphasis in original)). Nevertheless, those activities receive constitutional protection. In the middle, there are activities which, out of necessity, take place on land and indeed, might be intimately related to a particular piece of land. Although an aboriginal group may not be able to demonstrate title to the land, it may nevertheless have a site-specific right to engage in a particular activity. … At the other end of the spectrum, there is aboriginal title itself.

He identifies the Aboriginal title test and its elements as follows:

> 143 In order to make out a claim for aboriginal title, the aboriginal group asserting title must satisfy the following criteria: (i) the land must have been occupied prior to sovereignty, (ii) if present occupation is relied on as proof of occupation pre-sovereignty, there must be a continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation, and (iii) at sovereignty, that occupation must have been exclusive.
> The land must have been occupied prior to sovereignty
> 144 In order to establish a claim to aboriginal title, the aboriginal group asserting the claim must establish that it occupied the lands in question at the time at which the Crown asserted sovereignty over the land subject to the title. …
> 145 [I]n the context of aboriginal title, sovereignty is the appropriate time period to consider for several reasons. First, from a theoretical standpoint, aboriginal title arises out of prior occupation of the land by aboriginal peoples and out of the relationship between the common law and pre-existing systems of aboriginal law. Aboriginal title is a burden on the Crown's underlying title. However, the Crown did not gain this title until it asserted sovereignty over the land in question. Because it does not make sense to speak of a burden on the underlying title before that title existed, aboriginal title crystallized at the time sovereignty was asserted. Second, aboriginal title does not raise the problem of distinguishing between distinctive, integral aboriginal practices, customs and traditions and those influenced or introduced by European contact. Under common law, the act of occupation or possession is sufficient to ground aboriginal title and it is not necessary to prove that the land was a distinctive or integral part of the aboriginal society before the arrival of Europeans. Finally, from a practical standpoint, it appears that the date of sovereignty is more certain than the date of first contact. It is often very difficult to determine the precise moment that each aboriginal group had first contact with European culture. … For these reasons, I conclude that aboriginals must establish occupation of the land from the date of the assertion of sovereignty in order to sustain a claim for aboriginal title. …
> 146 There was a consensus among the parties on appeal that proof of historic occupation was required to make out a claim to aboriginal title. However, the parties disagreed on how that occupancy could be proved. …
> 147 This debate over the proof of occupancy reflects two divergent views of the source of aboriginal title. The respondents argue, in essence, that aboriginal title arises from the physical reality at the time of sovereignty, whereas the Gitksan effectively take the position that aboriginal title arises from and should reflect the pattern of land holdings under aboriginal law. However, as I have explained above, the source of aboriginal title appears to be grounded both in the common law and in the aboriginal perspective on land; the latter includes, but is not limited to, their systems of law. It follows that both should be taken into account in establishing the proof of occupancy. …
> 148 … As a result, if, at the time of sovereignty, an aboriginal society had laws in relation to land, those laws would be relevant to establishing the occupation of lands which are the subject of a claim for aboriginal title. Relevant laws might include, but are not limited to, a land tenure system or laws governing land use.
> 149 However, the aboriginal perspective must be taken into account alongside the perspective of the common law. Professor McNeil has convincingly argued that at common law, the fact of physical occupation is proof of possession at law, which in turn will ground title to the land... Physical occupation may be established in a variety of ways, ranging from the construction of dwellings through cultivation and enclosure of fields to regular use of definite tracts of land for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting its resources... In considering whether occupation sufficient to ground title is established, "one must take into account the group's size, manner of life, material resources, and technological abilities, and the character of the lands claimed"…

If present occupation is relied on as proof of occupation pre-sovereignty, there must be a continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation

152 … Conclusive evidence of pre-sovereignty occupation may be difficult to come by. Instead, an aboriginal community may provide evidence of present occupation as proof of pre-sovereignty occupation in support of a claim to aboriginal title. What is required, in addition, is a continuity between present and pre-sovereignty occupation, because the relevant time for the determination of aboriginal title is at the time before sovereignty.

153 Needless to say, there is no need to establish "an unbroken chain of continuity" (Van der Peet, at para. 65) between present and prior occupation. The occupation and use of lands may have been disrupted for a time, perhaps as a result of the unwillingness of European colonizers to recognize aboriginal title. To impose the requirement of continuity too strictly would risk "undermining the very purpose of s. 35(1) by perpetuating the historical injustice suffered by aboriginal peoples at the hands of colonizers who failed to respect" aboriginal rights to land...

154 I should also note that there is a strong possibility that the precise nature of occupation will have changed between the time of sovereignty and the present. I would like to make it clear that the fact that the nature of occupation has changed would not ordinarily preclude a claim for aboriginal title, as long as a substantial connection between the people and the land is maintained…

At sovereignty, occupation must have been exclusive

155 Finally, at sovereignty, occupation must have been exclusive. The requirement for exclusivity flows from the definition of aboriginal title itself, because I have defined aboriginal title in terms of the right to exclusive use and occupation of land. Exclusivity, as an aspect of aboriginal title, vests in the aboriginal community which holds the ability to exclude others from the lands held pursuant to that title. The proof of title must, in this respect, mirror the content of the right. Were it possible to prove title without demonstrating exclusive occupation, the result would be absurd, because it would be possible for more than one aboriginal nation to have aboriginal title over the same piece of land, and then for all of them to attempt to assert the right to exclusive use and occupation over it.

156 … [T]he test required to establish exclusive occupation must take into account the context of the aboriginal society at the time of sovereignty. For example, it is important to note that exclusive occupation can be demonstrated even if other aboriginal groups were present, or frequented the claimed lands. Under those circumstances, exclusivity would be demonstrated by "the intention and capacity to retain exclusive control" ... Thus, an act of trespass, if isolated, would not undermine a general finding of exclusivity, if aboriginal groups intended to and attempted to enforce their exclusive occupation. Moreover, … the presence of other aboriginal groups might actually reinforce a finding of exclusivity. For example, "[w]here others were allowed access upon request, the very fact that permission was asked for and given would be further evidence of the group's exclusive control" (at p. 204).

157 A consideration of the aboriginal perspective may also lead to the conclusion that trespass by other aboriginal groups does not undermine, and that presence of those groups by permission may reinforce, the exclusive occupation of the aboriginal group asserting title. For example, the aboriginal group asserting the claim to aboriginal title may have trespass laws which are proof of exclusive occupation, such that the presence of trespassers does not count as evidence against exclusivity. As well, aboriginal laws under which permission may be granted to other aboriginal groups to use or reside even temporarily on land would reinforce the finding of exclusive occupation.

158 In their submissions, the appellants pressed the point that requiring proof of exclusive occupation might preclude a finding of joint title, which is shared between two or more aboriginal nations. … I would suggest that the requirement of exclusive occupancy and the possibility of joint title could be reconciled by recognizing that joint title could arise from shared exclusivity. …

Lamer CJ indicates that the Sparrow and Gladstone justification framework apply to infringement of Aboriginal title, although with some adaptation given the unique nature of Aboriginal title. It is worth noting, however, that Lamer CJ expanded broadly on the types of government activities that could potentially constitute a justified infringement:

165 The general principles governing justification laid down in Sparrow, and embellished by Gladstone, operate with respect to infringements of aboriginal title. In the wake of Gladstone, the range of legislative objectives that can justify the infringement of aboriginal title is fairly broad. Most of these objectives can be traced to the reconciliation of the prior occupation of North America by aboriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty, which entails the recognition that "distinctive aboriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community" (at para. 73). In my opinion, the development of agriculture, forestry, mining, and hydroelectric power, the general economic development of the interior of British Columbia, protection of the environment or endangered species, the building of infrastructure and the settlement of foreign populations to support those aims, are the kinds of objectives that are consistent with this purpose and, in principle, can justify the infringement of aboriginal title. Whether a particular measure or government act can be explained by reference to one of those objectives, however, is ultimately a question of fact that will have to be examined on a case-by-case basis. [Emphasis in original]

2.5.4 R. v. Marshall; R. v. Bernard, 2005 SCC 43 (CanLII), [2005] 2 SCR 220

The next case to consider Aboriginal title was the SCC's decision in R v Marshall; R v Bernard. The case consolidated two regulatory offence prosecutions involving Mi'kmaq people engaging in commercial logging. Marshall involved 35 Mi'kmaq men charged for logging without authorization at various places in the province of Nova Scotia. Bernard involved a Mi'kmaq man charged with unlawful possession of spruce logs he was hauling from a cutting site to a local sawmill around the Miramichi watershed in New Brunswick. In both cases, the cutting took place on Crown lands and the defendants put forward s. 35 defences based on Aboriginal title as well as treaty rights

In both cases, the trial courts entered convictions but these were reversed by both the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick courts of appeal. Both courts of appeal found that the trial judges took an inflexible approach to the test for Aboriginal title. The Court, however, sided with the trial judges and appeared to backtrack significantly from the directive of Lamer CJ in Delgamuukw that the Aboriginal perspective ought to be "accommodated and placed on an equal footing with the types of historical evidence that courts are familiar with." In particular, in applying the test for exclusive occupation, it appeared the Court expected the Mi'kmaq to show occupation approximating adverse possession, not accounting for Indigenous land-use patterns or laws:

48 The Court's task in evaluating a claim for an aboriginal right is to examine the pre-sovereignty aboriginal practice and translate that practice, as faithfully and objectively as it can, into a modern legal right. … The Court must consider the pre-sovereignty practice from the perspective of the aboriginal people. But in translating it to a common law right, the Court must also consider the European perspective; the nature of the right at common law must be examined to determine whether a particular aboriginal practice fits it. …

> 56 "Occupation" means "physical occupation". This "may be established in a variety of ways, ranging from the construction of dwellings through cultivation and enclosure of fields to regular use of definite tracts of land for hunting, fishing or otherwise exploiting its resources"…
> 58 It follows from the requirement of exclusive occupation that exploiting the land, rivers or seaside for hunting, fishing or other resources may translate into aboriginal title to the land if the activity was sufficiently regular and exclusive to comport with title at common law. …
> 72 The trial judge in each case applied the correct test to determine whether the respondents' claim to aboriginal title was established. In each case they required proof of sufficiently regular and exclusive use of the cutting sites by Mi'kmaq people at the time of assertion of sovereignty.
> 73 In Marshall, Curran Prov. Ct. J. reviewed the authorities and concluded that the line separating sufficient and insufficient occupancy for title is between irregular use of undefined lands on the one hand and regular use of defined lands on the other. "Settlements constitute regular use of defined lands, but they are only one instance of it" (para. 141).
> 74 In Bernard, Lordon Prov. Ct. J. likewise found that occasional visits to an area did not establish title; there must be "evidence of capacity to retain exclusive control" (para. 110) over the land claimed.
> 75 These tests correctly reflect the jurisprudence as discussed above.
> 76 Holding otherwise, Cromwell J.A. in Marshall held that this test was too strict and that it was sufficient to prove occasional entry and acts from which an intention to occupy the land could be inferred. Similarly, in Bernard, Daigle J.A. held that the trial judge erred in requiring proof of specific acts of occupation and regular use in order to ground aboriginal title. It was not in error to state, as Cromwell J.A. did, that acts from which intention to occupy the land could be inferred may ground a claim to common law title. However, as discussed above, this must be coupled with sufficiently regular and exclusive use in order to establish title in the common law sense.
> 77 Cromwell J.A. found that this additional requirement is not consistent with the semi-nomadic culture or lifestyle of the Mi'kmaq. With respect, this argument is circular. It starts with the premise that it would be unfair to deny the Mi'kmaq title. In order to avoid this result, it posits that the usual indicia of title at common law — possession of the land in the sense of exclusive right to control — should be diminished because the pre-sovereignty practices proved do not establish title on that test. As discussed, the task of the court is to sensitively assess the evidence and then find the equivalent modern common law right. The common law right to title is commensurate with exclusionary rights of control. That is what it means and has always meant. If the ancient aboriginal practices do not indicate that type of control, then title is not the appropriate right. To confer title in the absence of evidence of sufficiently regular and exclusive pre-sovereignty occupation, would transform the ancient right into a new and different right. It would also obliterate the distinction that this Court has consistently made between lesser aboriginal rights like the right to fish and the highest aboriginal right, the right to title to the land…

In concurring reasons, Lebel J., on behalf of himself and Fish J., was critical of the majority's decision for focusing too narrowly on property rights and for taking an approach to title that was fundamentally incompatible with the land use patterns of Indigenous peoples who were 'semi-nomadic'. Nonetheless, Lebel J. would have overturned the appeal, but only on the basis that the record in the courts below lacked the evidentiary foundation to make the necessary legal findings. He stressed that such a ruling should not represent a final determination on the issue of Aboriginal title in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. Lebel J. stressed that, although many Aboriginal rights cases came before the courts in this way, it was an inappropriate forum to litigate important Aboriginal and treaty rights cases as summary conviction offences in provincial courts. These forums do not provide the process and procedures like civil trials to ensure the appropriate evidentiary record gets before the trier of fact.

2.5.5 Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44

The next major decision on Aboriginal title is Tsilhqot'in. The Tsilhqot'in are a First Nation located in the interior of British Columbia. Following disputes with the province relating to it unilaterally issuing logging permits to Tsilhqot'in territory without the Nation's permission, the Tsilhqot'in brought civil proceedings in the 1990s. Unlike the summary proceedings in R v Marshall; R v Bernard, the trial spanned 339 days over a period of 5 years, with the trial judge issuing findings of title to significant parts of the claim area. The Tsilhqot'in presented significant evidence of their oral histories, laws, custom and traditions in support of their claim.

This decision was overturned on appeal in 2012 with the BCCA applying the decision in R v Marshall; R v Bernard to the required proof of site-specific occupation. The BCCA held that the trial judge's acceptance of regular and exclusive use of the wider territory based on Tsilhqot'in land use practices was in error. The case reached the SCC in 2014 and in a unanimous decision authored by McLachlin CJ, without explicitly overruling R v Marshall; R v Bernard, the Court agreed with the trial judge and affirmed Aboriginal title to 2,000 km² of Tsilhqot'in territory:

> [24] How should the courts determine whether a semi-nomadic indigenous group has title to lands? This Court has never directly answered this question. The courts below disagreed on the correct approach. We must now clarify the test.
> [25] As we have seen, the Delgamuukw test for Aboriginal title to land is based on "occupation" prior to assertion of European sovereignty. To ground Aboriginal title this occupation must possess three characteristics. It must be sufficient; it must be continuous (where present occupation is relied on); and it must be exclusive.
> [27] The trial judge in this case held that "occupation" was established for the purpose of proving title by showing regular and exclusive use of sites or territory. On this basis, he concluded that the Tsilhqot'in had established title not only to village sites and areas maintained for the harvesting of roots and berries, but to larger territories which their ancestors used regularly and exclusively for hunting, fishing and other activities.
> [28] The Court of Appeal disagreed and applied a narrower test for Aboriginal title — site-specific occupation. It held that to prove sufficient occupation for title to land, an Aboriginal group must prove that its ancestors intensively used a definite tract of land with reasonably defined boundaries at the time of European sovereignty.
> [29] For semi-nomadic Aboriginal groups like the Tsilhqot'in, the Court of Appeal's approach results in small islands of title surrounded by larger territories where the group possesses only Aboriginal rights to engage in activities like hunting and trapping. By contrast, on the trial judge's approach, the group would enjoy title to all the territory that their ancestors regularly and exclusively used at the time of assertion of European sovereignty.

> [32] …[T]he court must be careful not to lose or distort the Aboriginal perspective by forcing ancestral practices into the square boxes of common law concepts, thus frustrating the goal of faithfully translating pre-sovereignty Aboriginal interests into equivalent modern legal rights. Sufficiency, continuity and exclusivity are not ends in themselves, but inquiries that shed light on whether Aboriginal title is established.
> [35] The Aboriginal perspective focuses on laws, practices, customs and traditions of the group (Delgamuukw, at para. 148). In considering this perspective for the purpose of Aboriginal title, "one must take into account the group's size, manner of life, material resources, and technological abilities, and the character of the lands claimed"…
> [37] Sufficiency of occupation is a context-specific inquiry. … The intensity and frequency of the use may vary with the characteristics of the Aboriginal group asserting title and the character of the land over which title is asserted. …
> [38] To sufficiently occupy the land for purposes of title, the Aboriginal group in question must show that it has historically acted in a way that would communicate to third parties that it held the land for its own purposes. This standard does not demand notorious or visible use akin to proving a claim for adverse possession, but neither can the occupation be purely subjective or internal. There must be evidence of a strong presence on or over the land claimed, manifesting itself in acts of occupation that could reasonably be interpreted as demonstrating that the land in question belonged to, was controlled by, or was under the exclusive stewardship of the claimant group. As just discussed, the kinds of acts necessary to indicate a permanent presence and intention to hold and use the land for the group's purposes are dependent on the manner of life of the people and the nature of the land. Cultivated fields, constructed dwelling houses, invested labour, and a consistent presence on parts of the land may be sufficient, but are not essential to establish occupation. The notion of occupation must also reflect the way of life of the Aboriginal people, including those who were nomadic or semi-nomadic.
> [42] There is no suggestion in the jurisprudence or scholarship that Aboriginal title is confined to specific village sites or farms, as the Court of Appeal held. Rather, a culturally sensitive approach suggests that regular use of territories for hunting, fishing, trapping and foraging is "sufficient" use to ground Aboriginal title, provided that such use, on the facts of a particular case, evinces an intention on the part of the Aboriginal group to hold or possess the land in a manner comparable to what would be required to establish title at common law.
> [43] The Province argues that this Court in R. v. Marshall; R. v. Bernard, 2005 SCC 43, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 220, rejected a territorial approach to title... In fact, this Court in Marshall; Bernard did not reject a territorial approach, but held only (at para. 72) that there must be "proof of sufficiently regular and exclusive use" of the land in question, a requirement established in Delgamuukw.
> [44] The Court in Marshall; Bernard confirmed that nomadic and semi-nomadic groups could establish title to land, provided they establish sufficient physical possession, which is a question of fact. … While the issue was framed in terms of whether the common law test for possession was met, the Court did not resile from the need to consider the perspective of the Aboriginal group in question…

Beyond this important 'clarification' of Marshall; Bernard, the decision in Tsilhqot'in also clarified a couple of lingering issues from Delgamuukw. First, McLachlin CJ revisited the nature of Aboriginal title, providing additional clarity on the Crown's rights and obligations in relation to title lands:

> [69] The starting point in characterizing the legal nature of Aboriginal title is Dickson J.'s concurring judgment in Guerin, discussed earlier. At the time of assertion of European sovereignty, the Crown acquired radical or underlying title to all the land in the province. This Crown title, however, was burdened by the pre-existing legal rights of Aboriginal people who occupied and used the land prior to European arrival. The doctrine of terra nullius (that no one owned the land prior to European assertion of sovereignty) never applied in Canada, as confirmed by the Royal Proclamation of 1763. The Aboriginal interest in land that burdens the Crown's underlying title is an independent legal interest, which gives rise to a fiduciary duty on the part of the Crown.
> [70] The content of the Crown's underlying title is what is left when Aboriginal title is subtracted from it: ... As we have seen, Delgamuukw establishes that Aboriginal title gives "the right to exclusive use and occupation of the land . . . for a variety of purposes", not confined to traditional or "distinctive" uses (para. 117). In other words, Aboriginal title is a beneficial interest in the land: Guerin, at p. 382. In simple terms, the title holders have the right to the benefits associated with the land — to use it, enjoy it and profit from its economic development. As such, the Crown does not retain a beneficial interest in Aboriginal title land.
> [71] What remains, then, of the Crown's radical or underlying title to lands held under Aboriginal title? The authorities suggest two related elements — a fiduciary duty owed by the Crown to Aboriginal people when dealing with Aboriginal lands, and the right to encroach on Aboriginal title if the government can justify this in the broader public interest under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The Court in Delgamuukw referred to this as a process of reconciling Aboriginal interests with the broader public interests under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Recall that the Crown here includes both the federal and provincial governments. This is because the Court decided in this case that s. 35 rights are not the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government (e.g., they no longer go to the 'core of Indianness') and confirmed that both governments may justifiably infringe s. 35 rights.

Next, McLachlin CJ took the opportunity to address the uses and limitations on Aboriginal title, suggesting that the uses to which it can be put are similar to those associated with fee simple ownership, and suggesting that what is an 'irreconcilable use' would be highly fact-dependent:

> [73] Aboriginal title confers ownership rights similar to those associated with fee simple, including: the right to decide how the land will be used; the right of enjoyment and occupancy of the land; the right to possess the land; the right to the economic benefits of the land; and the right to pro-actively use and manage the land.
> [74] Aboriginal title, however, comes with an important restriction — it is collective title held not only for the present generation but for all succeeding generations. This means it cannot be alienated except to the Crown or encumbered in ways that would prevent future generations of the group from using and enjoying it. Nor can the land be developed or misused in a way that would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land. Some changes — even permanent changes — to the land may be possible. Whether a particular use is irreconcilable with the ability of succeeding generations to benefit from the land will be a matter to be determined when the issue arises.

2.6 Treaty Rights

Treaties are foundational documents in the history—and future—of Indigenous-Crown relations in Canada. On this, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission ("TRC") wrote in its final report, "It is important for all Canadians to understand that without Treaties, Canada would no legitimacy as a nation. Treaties between Indigenous nations and the Crown established the legal and constitutional foundation of this country" (Honouring the Truth, Reconciling for the Future: Summary of the Final Report of Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (Winnipeg: The Commission, 2015) at 249). In this regard, the TRC's report noted that while most Canadians now disavow assimilation of Indigenous peoples as an acceptable policy goal, remnants of such beliefs continue to influence laws and institutions in this country. The TRC linked these beliefs to the doctrines of discovery and terra nullius which continues to underlie Canadian state's claim to sovereignty. It is sometimes argued that it would be impossible for Canada to repudiate these doctrines as this would result in there being no legal basis for Canada's sovereignty, resulting in legal chaos. To the contrary, the TRC suggests that treaties are the optional means to allow for formal repudiation of the doctrines of discovery and terra nullius without leading to legal chaos, and this would further place Canadian sovereignty on a more legitimate and just footing.

2.6.1 Shot Both Sides v Canada, 2024 SCC 12

O'BONSAWIN J (Wagner CJ and Côté, Rowe, Martin, Kasirer, and Jamal JJ concurring):

I. Overview

[1] Treaties between the Crown and Indigenous peoples are fundamental to Canada's history and constitutional landscape. The promises and obligations enshrined in these fundamental agreements reflect a lasting commitment to maintaining a just relationship between the Crown and Indigenous peoples and were intended to be honoured by the Crown "so long as the sun rises and the river flows" (Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 2, Restructuring the Relationship (1996), at pp. 18-19, citing R. v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, [1982] 2 All E.R. 118 (C.A.), at p. 124, per Lord Denning).

[2] In this matter, Treaty No. 7 enshrines solemn promises and obligations exchanged between the Crown and the Kainai, also known as the "Aakainawa, the Tribe of Many Leaders" ("Blood Tribe"). Of particular importance to this appeal, Treaty No. 7 established Blood Tribe Reserve No. 148 ("Reserve"), which is the largest reserve in Canada and the home of the Blood Tribe. The Reserve's size was to be set in accordance with the treaty land entitlement ("TLE") provisions, based on a formula promising "one square mile for each family of five persons, or in that proportion for larger and smaller families" (Treaty No. 7 (1877), at p. 4; 2019 FC 789, [2020] 1 F.C.R. 22, at Appendix D).

[3] The Blood Tribe has long claimed that the Reserve did not accord with the promises enshrined in Treaty No. 7. After a lengthy procedural history, the Blood Tribe sought declarations to that effect, an order directing Canada to procure lands for addition to the Reserve, and monetary compensation for lost use, mineral royalties, and rents. The Federal Court found that Canada was in breach of the TLE formula in Treaty No. 7 and the size of the Reserve it had provided was 162.5 square miles too small. Before this Court, Canada concedes its breach of Treaty No. 7 with respect to the TLE but argues that the Blood Tribe's claim is statute-barred under Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act, R.S.A. 1970, c. 209, and the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7. Section 5(1)(g) of Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act sets out a six-year limitation period for "any other action not in [the] Act or any other Act specifically provided for"; pursuant to s. 39(1) of the Federal Courts Act, Alberta's limitations statute applies to Federal Court proceedings "in respect of any cause of action arising in that province".

[4] This appeal concerns whether the Blood Tribe's TLE claim is barred by the six-year limitation period in Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act. This inquiry turns on a narrow question: whether the breach of the TLE was actionable in Canadian courts prior to the coming into force of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The Blood Tribe argues that their claim cannot be statute-barred under Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act and the Federal Courts Act prior to there being a recognized action in law, which they allege was not the case for breach of treaty claims until the coming into force of s. 35(1). …

IV. Issues

[29] This Court must decide whether the Blood Tribe's TLE Claim is barred by Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act and s. 39(1) of the Federal Courts Act. This inquiry turns on two narrow issues raised by the Blood Tribe:

(1) Was a breach of the TLE actionable in Canadian courts prior to the coming into force of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982?

(2) Were the limitation periods in Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act effective to bar the Blood Tribe's TLE Claim prior to the coming into force of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982?

V. Analysis

[32] As explained below, s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 did not create a cause of action for breach of treaty rights. The Federal Court of Appeal appropriately recognized that "[t]reaty rights flow from the treaty, not the Constitution" (para. 205). Treaty rights were enforceable prior to 1982 and relief was available to the parties. The coming into force of s. 35(1) did not alter the commencement of the limitation period applicable to the Blood Tribe's TLE Claim. As concluded by the Federal Court of Appeal, the Blood Tribe's claim is thus statute-barred pursuant to s. 5(1)(g) of Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act and s. 39(1) of the Federal Courts Act. However, I find that declaratory relief is warranted given the Crown's dishonourable conduct towards the Blood Tribe.

B. Was a Breach of the TLE Actionable in Canadian Courts Prior to the Coming Into Force of Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982?

[36] Assessing whether a breach of Treaty No. 7 was actionable prior to 1982 requires an analysis of two issues: (i) the enforceability of Treaty No. 7 at common law, and (ii) the impact, if any, of the coming into force of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. If treaty rights were enforceable and actionable prior to 1982, then the limitation period applicable to the Blood Tribe's claim began to run when the claim was discoverable, more than 10 years before the coming into force of s. 35(1).

(1) The Enforceability of Treaty No. 7 at Common Law

[37] Treaties are enforceable from the date of execution. While the terminology surrounding the enforceability of treaties may have changed over time, claims seeking to give legal effect to treaty terms were brought before the coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1982. Long before 1982, courts recognized that treaties were not merely political promises and created enforceable obligations, including "contractual rights" (see, e.g., R. v. White (1964), 1964 CanLII 1270 (BC CA), 50 D.L.R. (2d) 613 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 618, aff'd (1965), 1965 CanLII 643 (SCC), 52 D.L.R. (2d) 481 (S.C.C.); J. Promislow, "Treaties in History and Law" (2014), 47 U.B.C. L. Rev. 1085, at pp. 1147-48). The Blood Tribe's approach to this litigation reflects the enforceability of treaties prior to 1982 since their claim was framed as a breach of contract and was brought in 1980.

[39] The enforceability of treaties from the date of execution is supported by the fundamental nature of the promises they enshrine. Courts, legislatures, and academic commentators have consistently acknowledged this significance: "treaties represent an Indian Magna Carta" (H. Cardinal, The Unjust Society: The Tragedy of Canada's Indians (1969), at p. 28); "treaties are vital, living instruments of relationship" (Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 1, Looking Forward, Looking Back (1996), at p. 128); and "a treaty represents an exchange of solemn promises between the Crown and the various Indian nations. It is an agreement whose nature is sacred" (Badger, at para. 41). In addition, the Crown is assumed to intend to fulfill these integral promises (para. 41; Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14, [2013] 1 S.C.R.623, at para. 79; Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at paras. 19-20).

[40] The Federal Court of Appeal reached the correct conclusion regarding the enforceability of treaties prior to 1982. As noted at para. 100 of its reasons, "[t]reaties were entered into with the intention to create legal obligations and how that obligation is characterized is of no consequence to the question [of] whether their terms are enforceable." Courts prior to 1982 clearly recognized the legal character of treaties: they create and embody enforceable obligations based on the mutual consent of the parties.

(2) The Impact of Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982

[52] The enforceability of Treaty No. 7 at common law is the heart of this appeal. Having established the Treaty's enforceability at common law above, it is necessary to consider whether the coming into force of s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 impacted this enforceability. …

[53] Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 accords constitutional status to existing Aboriginal and treaty rights and prevents them from abrogation by federal, provincial, or territorial law (Desautel, at para. 34; J. Woodward, Aboriginal Law in Canada (loose-leaf), at § 5:2). The coming into force of s. 35(1) constitutionally "entrenched" the Crown's obligation to respect existing treaty rights (Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 388, at para. 4; R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 666 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 533 ("Marshall (No. 2)"), at para. 6). As a result, s. 35(1) constitutionalizes existing rights so that they can no longer be abrogated by legislation. …

[54] Section 35(1) did not create treaty rights. Although treaty rights are protected by the Constitution Act, 1982, their existence and scope are determined by the terms of the treaty interpreted with the principles set out in R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 665 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456 ("Marshall (No. 1)"). The terms and limits of treaty rights do not stem from the language or purpose of s. 35(1), which recognizes and affirms existing rights (Badger, at para. 76; P. W. Hogg, "The Constitutional Basis of Aboriginal Rights", in P. Noreau and L. Rolland, eds., Mélanges Andrée Lajoie: Le droit, une variable dépendante (2008), 177, at p. 182; J. T. S. McCabe, The Honour of the Crown and its Fiduciary Duties to Aboriginal Peoples (2008), at p. 39).

[55] This Court has recognized that s. 35(1) was intended to "provide constitutional protection" to pre-existing Aboriginal and treaty rights (Badger, at para. 12; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 84). Furthermore, as stated clearly in Marshall (No. 1), at para. 48, the core impact of s. 35(1) was to prevent abrogation by legislation:

> Until enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, the treaty rights of aboriginal peoples could be overridden by competent legislation as easily as could the rights and liberties of other inhabitants. The hedge offered no special protection, as the aboriginal people learned in earlier hunting cases such as Sikyea v. The Queen, 1964 CanLII 62 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 642, and R. v. George, 1966 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1966] S.C.R. 267. On April 17, 1982, however, this particular type of "hedge" was converted by s. 35(1) into sterner stuff that could only be broken down when justified according to the test laid down in R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075, at pp. 1112 et seq., as adapted to apply to treaties in Badger, supra, per Cory J., at paras. 75 et seq.

C. Were the Limitation Periods in Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act Effective to Bar the Blood Tribe's TLE Claim Prior to the Coming Into Force of Section 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982?

[58] For the reasons above, the Blood Tribe's claim was actionable prior to the coming into force of s. 35(1) and thus the limitation period set out in Alberta's Limitation of Actions Act was effective to bar the claim prior to 1982. …

Appeal allowed in part.

O'Bonsawin J. went onto to hold in Shot Both Sides, that despite the application of the limitation period, the Blood Tribe would still be entitled to a remedy in the form of a declaration identifying the Crown's dishonourable conduct. The judge stressed that, as a non-coercive remedy, a declaration has a unique role to play in the Indigenous context because it can be "a means by which a court can promote reconciliation to restore the nation-to-nation relationship" (para 70). This is because declarations can provide "a clear statement on the legal rights of Indigenous parties, the duties placed on the Crown, and the Crown's conduct in relation to those sacred promises" (para 73).

In R v Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075, the Court itself acknowledged that treaty and other Aboriginal rights "were often honoured in the breach" prior to the entrenchment of s. 35. Does an admitted history of denial of Indigenous treaty and other rights for most of Confederation, as well as the Indian Act ban on First Nations hiring lawyers (discussed earlier in Section V), suggest that a different set of considerations should apply in cases of the application of limitations statutes to Indigenous claims? Is declaratory relief an adequate substitute? For further discussion on this issue, see K. McNeil and E. Thomas, "Procedural Injustice: Indigenous Claims, Limitation Periods, and Laches" (2022) Osgoode Digital Commons 336.

2.7 Treaty Interpretation Principles

In her dissenting reasons in R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 665 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 456 ("Marshall 1"), McLachlin CJC set out a list of the treaty interpretation principles that had found by the Court to that point (at para. 78). This codification, while not a part of the majority's judgment in Marshall 1 has been cited in many subsequent treaty cases:

> 2. Treaties should be liberally construed, and ambiguities or doubtful expressions should be resolved in favour of the aboriginal signatories: Simon, supra, at p. 402; Sioui, supra, at p. 1035; Badger, supra, at para. 52.
> 3. The goal of treaty interpretation is to choose from among the various possible interpretations of common intention the one which best reconciles the interests of both parties at the time the treaty was signed: Sioui, supra, at pp. 1068-69.
> 4. In searching for the common intention of the parties, the integrity and honour of the Crown is presumed: Badger, supra, at para. 41.
> 5. In determining the signatories' respective understanding and intentions, the court must be sensitive to the unique cultural and linguistic differences between the parties: Badger, supra, at paras. 52-54; R. v. Horseman, 1990 CanLII 96 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 901, at p. 907.
> 6. The words of the treaty must be given the sense which they would naturally have held for the parties at the time: Badger, supra, at paras. 53 et seq.; Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 36.

> 7. A technical or contractual interpretation of treaty wording should be avoided: Badger, supra; Horseman, supra; Nowegijick, supra.
> 8. While construing the language generously, courts cannot alter the terms of the treaty by exceeding what "is possible on the language" or realistic: Badger, supra, at para. 76; Sioui, supra, at p. 1069; Horseman, supra, at p. 908.
> 9. Treaty rights of aboriginal peoples must not be interpreted in a static or rigid way. They are not frozen at the date of signature. The interpreting court must update treaty rights to provide for their modern exercise. This involves determining what modern practices are reasonably incidental to the core treaty right in its modern context: Sundown, supra, at para. 32; Simon, supra, at p. 402.

On #9 in McLachlin CJC's list, there is, in fact, two principles there to unpack. The first is the principle that treaty rights (like other Aboriginal rights) can evolve. In Simon, the Mi'kmaq right to hunt with bows and arrows was found to evolve into a right to hunt using a gun. In R. v. Morris, 2006 SCC 59, hunting at night with torches became a right to hunt using guns, spotlights and motor vehicles. However, in R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 666 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 533 ("Marshall 2"), the Court cautioned that there be limits on what could be an evolution of the treaty right found in Marshall 1:

> 20 The September 17, 1999 majority judgment did not rule that the appellant had established a treaty right "to gather" anything and everything physically capable of being gathered. The issues were much narrower and the ruling was much narrower. No evidence was drawn to our attention, nor was any argument made in the course of this appeal, that trade in logging or minerals, or the exploitation of off-shore natural gas deposits, was in the contemplation of either or both parties to the 1760 treaty; nor was the argument made that exploitation of such resources could be considered a logical evolution of treaty rights to fish and wildlife or to the type of things traditionally "gathered" by the Mi'kmaq in a 1760 aboriginal lifestyle. …

Subsequent to this, in R v Marshall; R v Bernard (2006), the Court rejected the claim that commercial logging was a logical evolution of the right found in Marshall 1:

> [34] … As Curran Prov. Ct. J. observed, "[the Mi'kmaq] had no need to cut stands of trees for themselves. . . . Trees were readily available and Europeans could cut their own" (para. 92). The experts agreed that it was probably in the 1780s before the Mi'kmaq became involved in logging and then only in a limited fashion as part of British operations. Logging was not a traditional Mi'kmaq activity. Rather, it was a European activity, in which the Mi'kmaq began to participate only decades after the treaties of 1760-61. If anything, the evidence suggests that logging was inimical to the Mi'kmaq's traditional way of life, interfering with fishing which, as found in Marshall 1, was a traditional activity.

The second principle arising from point #9 above is that there can be included or 'incidental' rights to a treaty right. In Simon, the right to hunt was found to include the right to carry a gun). In a hunting case called R v Sundown, 1999 CanLII 673 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 393, the right to hunt was found to include the right to cut down trees and construct a log cabin to enable exercise of the hunting right. The test for this is to ask, "Would a reasonable person, fully apprised of the relevant manner of hunting or fishing, consider the activity in question reasonably related to the act of hunting or fishing?" (para 28). In Marshall 1, the right to trade was found to include the right to hunt and fish to acquire goods to trade.

We must add to McLachlin J.'s list the further principles that come from the majority decision in R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 665 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 456. At issue was the interpretation of a clause in the 1760-61 Treaty, signed between representatives of Mi'kmaq and Wolastoqey and the British Crown, regarding truckhouses (essentially shops where the First Nations could bring items to sell). An earlier 1752 Treaty promised to establish truckhouses and further recognized the Mi'kmaq having "free liberty to bring for Sale to Halifax or any other Settlement … Skins, feathers, fowl, fish or any other thing they shall have to sell…"). In the negotiations leading up to the 1760-61 Treaty, there was a specific request by the First Nations leaders for truckhouses "for the furnishing them with necessaries, in Exchange for their Peltry". However, the written document contained only the promise by the Mi'kmaq not to "Traffick, Barter or Exchange any Commodities in any manner but with such persons, or the Manager of such Truckhouses as shall be appointed or established by His majesty's Governor". In other words, it was framed in negative terms as a restraint on the ability of the Mi'kmaq to trade with non-government individuals. The lower courts did not find this wording gave rise to a positive right of the Mi'kmaq to bring the products of their hunting, fishing and gathering to a truckhouse to trade. The majority of the Supreme Court found that it was a positive right and, on this, Binnie J. said:

> 9 The Court of Appeal took a strict approach to the use of extrinsic evidence when interpreting the Treaties of 1760-61. … I think this approach should be rejected for at least three reasons.
> 10 Firstly, even in a modern commercial context, extrinsic evidence is available to show that a written document does not include all of the terms of an agreement. …
> 11 Secondly, even in the context of a treaty document that purports to contain all of the terms, this Court has made clear in recent cases that extrinsic evidence of the historical and cultural context of a treaty may be received even absent any ambiguity on the face of the treaty. MacKinnon A.C.J.O. laid down the principle in Taylor and Williams, supra, at p. 236:
> . . . if there is evidence by conduct or otherwise as to how the parties understood the terms of the treaty, then such understanding and practice is of assistance in giving content to the term or terms.
> 12 Thirdly, where a treaty was concluded verbally and afterwards written up by representatives of the Crown, it would be unconscionable for the Crown to ignore the oral terms while relying on the written terms…
> [Binnie J. then discusses how past cases have taken a flexible approach in proving treaty rights and distanced themselves from a 'strict' rule of treaty interpretation.]
> 14 "Generous" rules of interpretation should not be confused with a vague sense of after-the-fact largesse. The special rules are dictated by the special difficulties of ascertaining what in fact was agreed to. The Indian parties did not, for all practical purposes, have the opportunity to create their own written record of the negotiations. Certain assumptions are therefore made about the Crown's approach to treaty making (honourable) which the Court acts upon in its approach to treaty interpretation (flexible) as to the existence of a treaty (Sioui, supra, at p. 1049), the completeness of any written record (the use, e.g., of context and implied terms to make honourable sense of the treaty arrangement: Simon

> v. The Queen, … and R. v. Sundown…), and the interpretation of treaty terms once found to exist (Badger). The bottom line is the Court's obligation is to "choose from among the various possible interpretations of the common intention [at the time the treaty was made] the one which best reconciles" the Mi'kmaq interests and those of the British Crown…

Considering all the evidence and context, Binnie J. found the written provision in the treaty to be incomplete and found a Mi'kmaq right to fish and hunt for a moderate livelihood:

> 35 In my view, all of this evidence, reflected in the trial judgment, demonstrates the inadequacy and incompleteness of the written memorial of the treaty terms by selectively isolating the restrictive trade covenant. Indeed, the truckhouse system offered such advantageous terms that it hardly seems likely that Mi'kmaq traders had to be compelled to buy at lower prices and sell at higher prices. At a later date, they objected when truckhouses were abandoned. The trade clause would not have advanced British objectives (peaceful relations with a self-sufficient Mi'kmaq people) or Mi'kmaq objectives (access to the European "necessaries" on which they had come to rely) unless the Mi'kmaq were assured at the same time of continuing access, implicitly or explicitly, to wildlife to trade. This was confirmed by the expert historian called by the Crown, as set out below.
> 52 I do not think an interpretation of events that turns a positive Mi'kmaq trade demand into a negative Mi'kmaq covenant is consistent with the honour and integrity of the Crown. Nor is it consistent to conclude that the Lieutenant Governor, seeking in good faith to address the trade demands of the Mi'kmaq, accepted the Mi'kmaq suggestion of a trading facility while denying any treaty protection to Mi'kmaq access to the things that were to be traded, even though these things were identified and priced in the treaty negotiations. This was not a commercial contract. The trade arrangement must be interpreted in a manner which gives meaning and substance to the promises made by the Crown. In my view, with respect, the interpretation adopted by the courts below left the Mi'kmaq with an empty shell of a treaty promise.

He did find, however, there to be some internal limits on the treaty right:

> 59 The concept of "necessaries" is today equivalent to the concept of what Lambert J.A., in R. v. Van der Peet (1993), 1993 CanLII 4519 (BC CA), 80 B.C.L.R. (2d) 75, at p. 126, described as a "moderate livelihood". Bare subsistence has thankfully receded over the last couple of centuries as an appropriate standard of life for aboriginals and non-aboriginals alike. A moderate livelihood includes such basics as "food, clothing and housing, supplemented by a few amenities", but not the accumulation of wealth (Gladstone, supra, at para. 165). It addresses day-to-day needs. This was the common intention in 1760. It is fair that it be given this interpretation today.
> 61 Catch limits that could reasonably be expected to produce a moderate livelihood for individual Mi'kmaq families at present-day standards can be established by regulation and enforced without violating the treaty right. In that case, the regulations would accommodate the treaty right. Such regulations would not constitute an infringement that would have to be justified under the Badger standard.

Given these findings, Donald Marshall Jr.'s charges for fishing eels without a licence out of season were found to be an infringement of his treaty right. The Crown had not tried to justify the infringement and so the majority acquitted Marshall of the charges. The Court did note that the Crown could regulate aspects of the treaty right, subject to justification. In a decision rejecting the request for a rehearing by the West Nova Fishermen's Coalition (R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 666 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 533 or "Marshall 2"), the Court emphasized the case law on the Crown powers to justify infringement of treaty rights, as well as gave additional guidance on the analysis to taken in future cases involving the right to fish and hunt for a moderate livelihood (discuss further below).

Treaties between Indigenous peoples and the Crown raise issues of how Indigenous peoples legal perspectives should inform the court's interpretation. The following case consider Anishinaabe legal perspectives in an 1850 treaty promising annuities to communities on the north shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior in return for their engagement with the Crown.

2.7.1 Ontario (Attorney General) v. Restoule, 2024 SCC 27

> The judgment of the Court was delivered by Jamal J. —
> I. Introduction
> [1] These appeals test the Crown's commitment to reconciliation with the Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes after the Crown has dishonourably breached its sacred promises to them under the Robinson Treaties for almost 150 years.
> [2] The Robinson Treaties of 1850 comprise the Robinson-Huron Treaty and the Robinson-Superior Treaty. Under these treaties, the Anishinaabe of the northern shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior ceded their vast territories in exchange for, among other things, an annual payment in perpetuity. The annuities were to be increased over time under certain circumstances. However, for almost 150 years, the annuities have been frozen at a shocking $4 per person, after the first and only increase was made in 1875. Today, in what can only be described as a mockery of the Crown's treaty promise to the Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes, the annuities are distributed to individual treaty beneficiaries by giving them $4 each.
> [3] This is the second time that issues relating to the annuity payments under the pre-Confederation Robinson Treaties have come before this Court. The last time, shortly after Confederation, involved an exercise of finger-pointing by Canada and the provinces as to who had to pay the annuities (Province of Ontario v. Dominion of Canada (1895), 1895 CanLII 112 (SCC), 25 S.C.R. 434, aff'd Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, 1896 CanLII 225 (UK JCPC), [1897] A.C. 199 (J.C.P.C.) ("In re Indian Claims")). In the more than 125 years since then, Canada and Ontario have shown a persistent pattern of indifference to the Crown's treaty obligations. Belatedly, before this Court, neither Canada nor Ontario disputes that they are in longstanding breach of the annuity promises under the Robinson Treaties. Although the Anishinaabe have upheld their end of the treaty bargain, the Crown has failed to do the same. Remedying this failure and restoring the honour of the Crown requires returning to the foundations of the treaty relationship between the Anishinaabe and the Crown.
> [4] The Robinson Treaties built on a close relationship between the British and the Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes that existed long before 1850. That relationship was guided by the Covenant Chain alliance, dating back to the 17th century, which symbolized the close connection between the British Crown and Indigenous peoples, including the Anishinaabe. The British and the Anishinaabe maintained this connection in part through annual gift-giving around sacred "council fires" as expressions of mutual generosity and goodwill (see H. Bohaker, Doodem and Council Fire: Anishinaabe Governance through Alliance (2020), at pp. xxvi and 17-18). As European settlement increased, the Crown assured the Anishinaabe that their autonomy and title to land would be protected.

[5] By the mid-1800s, however, that assurance was jeopardized as the Crown began unilaterally granting mining licences to settlers along the northern shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior. The Anishinaabe demanded a treaty to provide them with compensation for the use of their traditional unceded territories. In September 1850, after significant negotiations between the Anishinaabe and the Crown's representative, William Benjamin Robinson, the Huron and Superior Anishinaabe entered into land cession treaties with the Crown around a council fire at Bawaating or Sault Ste. Marie.

[6] The two treaties are substantially the same, each promising a lump-sum payment of £2,000 in addition to an annual payment of £500 under the Robinson-Superior Treaty and £600 under the Robinson-Huron Treaty. These promises are accompanied by a clause in each treaty that provides for the augmentation of the annuities under certain circumstances ("Augmentation Clause"). The interpretation of that clause and the remedies for its breach are at the heart of these appeals…

[9] Ontario's appeals before this Court raise questions about the standard of review for historic treaty interpretation, the proper interpretation of the Augmentation Clause, the nature and content of the Crown's obligation to give effect to that clause and the appropriate remedy for a breach of that obligation, as well as limitations issues. The cross-appeals by the Huron and Superior plaintiffs ask this Court to reconsider whether the Crown has fiduciary duties under the Robinson Treaties.

[10] In what follows, I conclude that although a trial judge's findings of historical fact attract deference, the interpretation of historic Crown-Indigenous treaties is reviewable for correctness. Correctness review is mandated for treaty interpretation because of the precedential and constitutionally protected nature of treaty rights and because treaties engage the honour of the Crown. Applying this standard of review, along with the treaty interpretation principles articulated by this Court, the Crown has a duty to consider, from time to time, whether it can increase the annuities without incurring loss. If the Crown can increase the annuities without incurring loss, it must exercise its discretion and decide whether to increase the annuities and, if so, by how much. This discretion is not unfettered; it is to be exercised liberally, justly, and in accordance with the honour of the Crown. The frequency with which the Crown must consider whether it can increase the annuities must also be consistent with the honour of the Crown. Although the Augmentation Clause is not in itself a promise to pay the Anishinaabe a certain sum of money, no party doubts that the Crown was able to increase the annuities beyond $4 per person without incurring loss, and that it should have exercised its discretion to do so. Thus, in my view, the Crown must increase the annuity under the Robinson Treaties beyond $4 per person retrospectively, from 1875 to the present. It would be patently dishonourable not to do so. I further conclude, as both courts below did, that the plaintiffs' breach of treaty claims are not statute-barred by Ontario's limitations legislation. Finally, although no specific fiduciary duties apply in respect of the Augmentation Clause, the honour of the Crown requires the Crown to diligently fulfill this promise. The Crown's ongoing breach of its augmentation promise, in the circumstances, is also a breach of the treaties themselves.

[12] Given this direction, Stage Three, if required, must be modified in accordance with these reasons and would function as a review by the courts of the Crown's process in determining the amount of compensation, and of the amount determined, both of which must be just and honourable. If the court finds that the amount determined by the Crown is not honourable, it may require the Crown to redetermine the amount or set the amount to be paid by the Crown, lest the Crown continue to undermine the very object and purpose of the treaty promise.

[13] At the end of the oral submissions before this Court, Ontario's counsel stated: ". . . I accept I am facing [a] 150 year history where the Crown in the broad sense has failed to engage on this, but we are here and we are listening and you are going to tell us how to approach this" (transcript, day 2, at p. 109). In the reasons that follow, it should be clear that Ontario and Canada must act now to respect their treaty promises to the Anishinaabe, and to help restore the honour of the Crown and the nation-to-nation alliance that the treaties represent. Doing so will require each party, but especially the Crown, to recall the purposes behind the treaty promises. The Robinson Treaties are not merely transactional instruments about the exchange of money for a tract of land. They are living agreements embodying a relationship nurtured over many years before 1850 and requiring ongoing renewal into the future. It is time for the parties to return to the council fire and rekindle the perpetual relationship that the Robinson Treaties envision. Nothing less will demonstrate the Crown's commitment to reconciliation.

II. Facts

[14] The essential historical facts are not materially in dispute before this Court. They were helpfully summarized in the reasons of the Court of Appeal, from which the following summary is drawn. Understanding almost 300 years of evolution in the relevant Crown-Indigenous relationship is a daunting task, but a necessary one. The historical setting provides valuable context for understanding the Robinson Treaties and what the honour of the Crown requires in their implementation.

A. The Anishinaabe of the Upper Great Lakes

[15] The Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes are members of several First Nations who historically inhabited and continue to inhabit the northern shores of Lake Huron and Lake Superior. The Anishinaabe were organized in bands, each occupying and harvesting discrete territories considered as communal property, and each speaking dialects of their Indigenous language, Anishinaabemowin.

[16] The lands subject to the Robinson Treaties exceed 100,000 square kilometres, including the current communities of Thunder Bay, North Bay, Sault Ste. Marie, and Sudbury. At the time the treaties were signed in 1850, there were 1,422 individual beneficiaries of the Robinson-Huron Treaty and 1,240 beneficiaries of the Robinson-Superior Treaty. Although the number of current beneficiaries has yet to be determined definitively, evidence at trial suggested that in September 2017 there were 29,926 beneficiaries of the Robinson-Huron Treaty and 13,546 beneficiaries of the Robinson-Superior Treaty, living both on- and off-reserve.

B. The Anishinaabe's System of Law and Governance

[17] The Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes have a longstanding system of law and governance that informed, and continues to inform, their perspectives on the Robinson Treaties. Two key organizing principles of Anishinaabe law and governance are pimaatiziwin, the principle that everything is alive and sacred, and gizhewaadiziwin, the way of the Creator, which encompasses sacred laws of creation. When the treaties were signed, decision making in Anishinaabe society was deliberative and consensus-based. Anishinaabe Ogimaa (Chiefs or leaders) worked to achieve agreement among their people and were expected to provide generously for their communities. Ogimaa would host "council fires" where community decisions and agreements were made.

[18] The Anishinaabe's system of governance and their relationship with the Crown have always been based on the values of respect, responsibility, reciprocity, and renewal. The Anishinaabe sought respect for their jurisdiction and their authority to conclude agreements to share their territory. They acted with a sense of responsibility to ensure their people could continue to depend on the land for sustenance, shelter, medicines, and spiritual well-being. Reciprocity, essential to the formation of alliances, meant that a gift would attract a reciprocal gift of commensurate value, based on the idea of mutual interdependence. This value reflects the notion that people must rely on one another to survive, not simply as an economic necessity, but also as a moral imperative. Renewal invoked the idea that relationships, such as the treaty relationship with the Crown, are ongoing and must be renewed continually.

C. The Historical Context of Anishinaabe-Crown Relations

(1) The Covenant Chain Alliance

[19] At the end of the Seven Years' War (1756-1763) between the British and the French, the British sought to secure the neutrality of various Indigenous nations, including the Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes, who had fought alongside the French. They did so by extending to them an alliance, known as the Covenant Chain, which dated back to the early 17th century and was a symbol of the close connection between British settlers and Indigenous peoples. The alliance was originally between the British and the Haudenosaunee Confederacy, and was later extended to others, including the Anishinaabe of the upper Great Lakes.

[20] The Covenant Chain alliance was symbolized by a ship tied to a tree with an iron chain to signal the interdependence of the British settlers and Indigenous nations. As the trial judge noted, "[t]he metaphor associated with the chain was that if one party was in need, they only had to 'tug on the rope' to give the signal that something was amiss, and 'all would be restored'" (2018 ONSC 7701, 431 D.L.R. (4th) 32 ("Stage One reasons"), at para. 65 (footnote omitted)). The trial judge described the Covenant Chain alliance as exemplifying the kind of "cross-cultural merging of diplomatic protocols and legal orders" that was common in the decades leading up to the signing of the Robinson Treaties (para. 89).

(2) The Royal Proclamation, 1763

[21] In response to an uprising against the British by various Indigenous nations, including Anishinaabe warriors, the British Crown issued the Royal Proclamation, 1763 (G.B.), 3 Geo. 3 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1). This became a defining moment in Canadian history and provided the impetus for the Robinson Treaties. In the Proclamation, the Crown unilaterally asserted sovereignty over what is now Canada, but also affirmed pre-existing Aboriginal title and ownership of unpurchased lands. The Proclamation created special rules for the purchase and sale of "Lands of the Indians" to prevent fraud and abuse, prohibited private parties from purchasing such lands, and stipulated that they could only be surrendered to the Crown.

(3) The Council at Niagara (1764)

[22] The year after the Proclamation, at a Council at Niagara attended by over 1,700 Indigenous people, including Anishinaabe leaders, the Crown again assured the Indigenous attendees of their autonomy and stated that the Crown would maintain and protect their title to their lands. Gifts and wampum belts were exchanged, including the Great Covenant Chain Wampum and the 24 Nation Wampum. The trial judge described the Great Covenant Chain Wampum as an embodiment of the "merged symbols of diplomacy" between the two groups, visually represented on the belt by two figures holding hands as part of two links in a chain (Stage One reasons, at paras. 90 and 412).

(4) The War of 1812

[23] As part of the Covenant Chain alliance, Anishinaabe warriors fought alongside the British against the Americans and their Indigenous allies in the War of 1812 (1812-1815). One such warrior was Chief Shingwaukonse, who would play a key role at the Robinson Treaty Council. The military alliance between the Crown and the Anishinaabe was an important part of their ongoing relationship.

V. Analysis

A. The Interpretation of Historic Aboriginal Treaties

[67] I begin by reviewing the principles for interpreting historic Aboriginal treaties, which were correctly identified by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal. I will focus on four relevant features figuring prominently in the discussion of the standard of review that follows in the next section: the nature of treaties as sui generis agreements intended to promote reconciliation; the importance of interpreting treaty rights in accordance with the honour of the Crown; the differences between historic and modern treaties; and finally, the particular principles governing the interpretation of historic treaties and the two-step approach to interpretation set out in this Court's decision in R. v. Marshall, 1999 CanLII 665 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456.

(1) Treaties Are Sui Generis Agreements Intended To Advance Reconciliation

[68] Treaties have long been an important means of reconciling the interests of Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal peoples in Canada. Reconciliation is aimed at building a "mutually respectful long-term relationship" (Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, [2010] 3 S.C.R. 103, at para. 10; R. v. Desautel, 2021 SCC 17, [2021] 1 S.C.R. 533, at para. 30). It has been described as both "a first principle of Aboriginal law" (Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40, [2018] 2 S.C.R. 765 ("Mikisew Cree 2018"), at para. 22) and "the grand purpose of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982" (Little Salmon, at para. 10).

[69] As this Court explained in Little Salmon, at para. 8, per Binnie J.

> Historically, treaties were the means by which the Crown sought to reconcile the Aboriginal inhabitants of what is now Canada to the assertion of European sovereignty over the territories traditionally occupied by First Nations. The objective was not only to build alliances with First Nations but to keep the peace and to open up the major part of those territories to colonization and settlement.

[70] The Crown's assertion of sovereignty over Aboriginal societies gave rise to a distinctive or sui generis legal relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples (Desautel, at para. 25, citing R. v. Badger, 1996 CanLII 236 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 771, at para. 78). That distinctive legal relationship is reflected in treaties, which represent an exchange of "solemn promises" and are unique or sui generis agreements governed by special rules of interpretation (Simon v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1985] 2 S.C.R. 387, at pp. 404 and 410; R. v. Sioui, 1990 CanLII 103 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1025, at pp. 1038 and 1043; Badger, at para. 41). Treaties are sui generis because "they are the product of the special relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples that is aimed at achieving reconciliation" (P. W. Hogg and L. Dougan, "The Honour of the Crown: Reshaping Canada's Constitutional Law" (2016), 72 S.C.L.R. (2d) 291, at p. 311).

(2) Treaty Rights Must Be Interpreted in Accordance With the Honour of the Crown

[71] This Court has also affirmed that in order to promote reconciliation, treaty rights must be interpreted in accordance with the honour of the Crown, "the principle that servants of the Crown must conduct themselves with honour when acting on behalf of the sovereign" (Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14, [2013] 1 S.C.R. 623, at para. 65). The honour of the Crown imposes an "obligation of honourable dealing" with Aboriginal peoples (Little Salmon, at para. 42).

[72] The honour of the Crown is an ancient principle of common law dating back to pre-Norman England (Hogg and Dougan, at pp. 293-94, citing D. M. Arnot, "The Honour of the Crown" (1996), 60 Sask. L. Rev. 339). It was reflected in the Crown's promise in the Royal Proclamation, 1763 that it would protect the Aboriginal peoples inhabiting the British territories of North America from exploitation by non-Aboriginal peoples (Little Salmon, at para. 42). Because of its connection with s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the honour of the Crown has been called "a constitutional principle" and is now "an important anchor in this area of the law" (Little Salmon, at para. 42; see also Manitoba Metis, at para. 69; Mikisew Cree 2018, at para. 24).

[73] The honour of the Crown is "always at stake" in the Crown's dealings with Aboriginal peoples (Badger, at para. 41; Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 511, at para. 16; Mikisew Cree 2018, at para. 23). The making, interpretation, and implementation of treaties must be approached in a way that maintains the honour and integrity of the Crown (Badger, at para. 41; Haida Nation, at paras. 17 and 19; Manitoba Metis, at para. 73).

[74] I will return to the honour of the Crown later when discussing the Crown's obligation to implement the Augmentation Clause of the Robinson Treaties.

(3) Differences Between Historic and Modern Treaties

[75] Although all treaty rights must be interpreted in accordance with the honour of the Crown (Little Salmon, at para. 71; Hogg and Dougan, at pp. 314-16), there are important differences between historic and modern treaties. Historic treaties were negotiated between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples before 1921, while modern treaties were negotiated after 1973, in the wake of this Court's decision in Calder v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, 1973 CanLII 4 (SCC), [1973] S.C.R. 313. Calder recognized Aboriginal rights with respect to land and led the Government of Canada to negotiate modern treaties in those parts of Canada where there were no treaties (see P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at § 28:18; J. Jai, "Bargains Made in Bad Times: How Principles from Modern Treaties Can Reinvigorate Historic Treaties", in J. Borrows and M. Coyle, eds., The Right Relationship: Reimagining the Implementation of Historical Treaties (2017), 105, at p. 105; J. Jai, "The Interpretation of Modern Treaties and the Honour of the Crown: Why Modern Treaties Deserve Judicial Deference" (2010), 26 N.J.C.L. 25, at pp. 27-28; D. Newman, "Contractual and Covenantal Conceptions of Modern Treaty Interpretation" (2011), 54 S.C.L.R. (2d) 475, at pp. 475-77).

[76] The difference between historic and modern treaties is not primarily about the age of the document. As Binnie J. remarked in Little Salmon, at para. 54, "[t]oday's modern treaty will become tomorrow's historic treaty. The distinction lies in the relative precision and sophistication of the modern document." Historic and modern treaties were each negotiated under markedly different circumstances and often resulted in very different treaty texts. Historic treaties were often relatively brief, negotiated quickly, and intended to record oral promises made by the Crown to Indigenous signatories, who usually required translation and did not have the benefit of legal advice (Badger, at paras. 52-53; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Moses, 2010 SCC 17, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 557, at para. 7; Jai (2010), at p. 27). Such treaties were "typically expressed in lofty terms of high generality and were often ambiguous" (Little Salmon, at para. 12). As a result, "courts were obliged to resort to general principles (such as the honour of the Crown) to fill the gaps and achieve a fair outcome" (para. 12).

[77] Modern treaties, by contrast, are usually the "product of lengthy negotiations between well-resourced and sophisticated parties" (Little Salmon, at para. 9; First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun v. Yukon, 2017 SCC 58, [2017] 2 S.C.R. 576, at para. 36). They often consist of minutely detailed instruments, negotiated over the course of years, with the Indigenous signatories represented by lawyers and other experts (First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun, at para. 36; Moses, at para. 7; Hogg and Wright, at § 28:38). As a result, because "[c]ompared to their historic counterparts, modern treaties are detailed documents[,] deference to their text is warranted" (First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun, at para. 36).

(4) Principles Governing the Interpretation of Historic Treaties

[78] The legal principles governing the interpretation of historic treaties, such as the Robinson Treaties of 1850, are well established. The words in a treaty "must not be interpreted in their strict technical sense nor subjected to rigid modern rules of [interpretation]" (Badger, at para. 52, cited in Marshall, at para. 14). At the same time, as Binnie J. cautioned in Marshall, "'[g]enerous' rules of interpretation should not be confused with a vague sense of after-the-fact largesse" (para. 14):

> The special rules are dictated by the special difficulties of ascertaining what in fact was agreed to. The Indian parties did not, for all practical purposes, have the opportunity to create their own written record of the negotiations. Certain assumptions are therefore made about the Crown's approach to treaty making (honourable) which the Court acts upon in its approach to treaty interpretation (flexible) . . . . The bottom line is the Court's obligation is to "choose from among the various possible interpretations of the common intention [at the time the treaty was made] the one which best reconciles" the [Aboriginal] interests and those of the British Crown (Sioui, per Lamer J., at p. 1069 (emphasis added)). [para. 14]

> 2. Treaties should be liberally construed and ambiguities or doubtful expressions should be resolved in favour of the [A]boriginal signatories: Simon, supra, at p. 402; Sioui, supra, at p. 1035; Badger, supra, at para. 52.
> 3. The goal of treaty interpretation is to choose from among the various possible interpretations of common intention the one which best reconciles the interests of both parties at the time the treaty was signed: Sioui, supra, at pp. 1068-69.
> 4. In searching for the common intention of the parties, the integrity and honour of the Crown is presumed: Badger, supra, at para. 41.
> 5. In determining the signatories' respective understanding and intentions, the court must be sensitive to the unique cultural and linguistic differences between the parties: Badger, supra, at paras. 52-54; R. v. Horseman, 1990 CanLII 96 (SCC), [1990] 1 S.C.R. 901, at p. 907.
> 6. The words of the treaty must be given the sense which they would naturally have held for the parties at the time: Badger, supra, at paras. 53 et seq.; Nowegijick v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 29, at p. 36.
> 7. A technical or contractual interpretation of treaty wording should be avoided: Badger, supra; Horseman, supra; Nowegijick, supra.
> 8. While construing the language generously, courts cannot alter the terms of the treaty by exceeding what "is possible on the language" or realistic: Badger, supra, at para. 76; Sioui, supra, at p. 1069; Horseman, supra, at p. 908.

> 9. Treaty rights of [A]boriginal peoples must not be interpreted in a static or rigid way. They are not frozen at the date of signature. The interpreting court must update treaty rights to provide for their modern exercise. This involves determining what modern practices are reasonably incidental to the core treaty right in its modern context: Sundown, supra, at para. 32; Simon, supra, at p. 402.

[80] Justice McLachlin noted that because a court must consider both the words of a treaty and the historical and cultural context, it is useful to approach treaty interpretation in two steps. At the first step, the court focuses on the words of the treaty clause at issue and identifies the range of possible interpretations. At the second step, the court considers those interpretations against the treaty's historical and cultural backdrop. As McLachlin J. explained (at paras. 82-83):

> First, the words of the treaty clause at issue should be examined to determine their facial meaning, in so far as this can be ascertained, noting any patent ambiguities and misunderstandings that may have arisen from linguistic and cultural differences. This exercise will lead to one or more possible interpretations of the clause. As noted in Badger, supra, at para. 76, "the scope of treaty rights will be determined by their wording". The objective at this stage is to develop a preliminary, but not necessarily determinative, framework for the historical context inquiry, taking into account the need to avoid an unduly restrictive interpretation and the need to give effect to the principles of interpretation.
> At the second step, the meaning or different meanings which have arisen from the wording of the treaty right must be considered against the treaty's historical and cultural backdrop. A consideration of the historical background may suggest latent ambiguities or alternative interpretations not detected at first reading. Faced with a possible range of interpretations, courts must rely on the historical context to determine which comes closest to reflecting the parties' common intention. This determination requires choosing "from among the various possible interpretations of the common intention the one which best reconciles" the parties' interests: Sioui, supra, at p. 1069. Finally, if the court identifies a particular right which was intended to pass from generation to generation, the historical context may assist the court in determining the modern counterpart of that right: Simon, supra, at pp. 402-3; Sundown, supra, at paras. 30 and 33.

[81] Justice McLachlin's legal framework in Marshall reflects the current state of the law. It has been cited approvingly by this Court (R. v. Morris, 2006 SCC 59, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 915, at para. 18; Little Salmon, at para. 105, per Deschamps J., concurring) and by appeal courts across Canada (Beattie v. Canada, 2002 FCA 105, 288 N.R. 254, at para. 9; Horseman v. Canada, 2016 FCA 238, at para. 8 (CanLII); Canada v. Jim Shot Both Sides, 2022 FCA 20, 468 D.L.R. (4th) 98, at para. 170, rev'd in part 2024 SCC 12; West Moberly First Nations v. British Columbia, 2020 BCCA 138, [2021] 3 W.W.R. 561, at paras. 105-6, 149 and 277; Chingee v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 446, 261 D.L.R. (4th) 54, at para. 15; R. v. Morris, 2004 BCCA 121, 237 D.L.R. (4th) 693, at para. 39, rev'd 2006 SCC 59, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 915; Goodswimmer v. Canada (Attorney General), 2017 ABCA 365, 418 D.L.R. (4th) 157, at para. 50; Lac La Ronge Indian Band v. Canada, 2001 SKCA 109, 206 D.L.R. (4th) 638, at paras. 39 and 53; Newfoundland and Labrador v. Nunatsiavut Government, 2022 NLCA 19, at para. 20 (CanLII)). It was also cited and applied in the case under appeal by the trial judge (Stage One reasons, at paras. 324, 327-29 and 398-475) and the Court of Appeal for Ontario (para. 109, per Lauwers and Pardu JJ.A., and paras. 388 and 421, per Strathy C.J.O. and Brown J.A.).

[82] With these principles in mind, I now turn to the standard of appellate review for the interpretation of historic treaties. …

[104] As already noted, historic Crown-Indigenous treaties are sui generis agreements protected under s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The constitutional nature of treaty rights demands that appellate courts be given wide latitude to correct errors in their interpretation. Historic treaties "establish or reaffirm a fundamental and enduring relationship between the Crown and an [A]boriginal people" (B. Slattery, "Making Sense of Aboriginal and Treaty Rights" (2000), 79:2 Can. Bar Rev. 196, at p. 209). They are "an exchange of solemn promises between the Crown and the various Indian nations" (Badger, at para. 41). Since 1982, s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 has recognized and affirmed that existing treaty rights have constitutional status and attract related constitutional protections. …

[106] All the courts below recognized the constitutional character of treaty interpretation. The trial judge stated that s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 "informs the exercise of treaty interpretation", and noted that "[b]ecause treaty promises are analogous to constitutional provisions, they must be interpreted in a generous and liberal manner" (Stage One reasons, at para. 336). She acknowledged that the Robinson Treaties enumerate rights "protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982" (para. 463). She also recognized that "[t]reaties are part of the constitutional fabric of this country" (Stage Two reasons, at para. 151), a description later echoed by Hourigan J.A. in the Court of Appeal (C.A. reasons, at para. 634). Likewise, Strathy C.J.O. and Brown J.A. highlighted that, unlike ordinary contracts, treaties have a "broader public, political role as foundational documents that establish the bases of relations between Aboriginal peoples and the larger Canadian community" (para. 407, citing Newman, at p. 486).

[108] In this case, for example, this Court has to interpret the scope and content of constitutionally protected rights and obligations that embody the very conditions on which pre-existing Indigenous peoples agreed to share their most precious gift — the land itself — with newcomers. An appellate court must be able to correct errors in the interpretation of those rights when necessary, for Indigenous and non-Indigenous Canadians alike.

[Applying these principles the Court found that Crown "has a duty to consider, from time to time, whether it can increase the annuities without incurring loss. If the Crown can increase the annuities beyond $4 to each individual, it must exercise its discretion and decide whether to do so and, if so, by how much. This discretion is not unfettered; it must be exercised liberally, justly, and in accordance with the honour of the Crown. The frequency with which the Crown must consider whether it can increase the annuities must also be consistent with the honour of the Crown. …[G]iven the longstanding and egregious nature of the Crown's breach of the Augmentation Clause, the Crown must exercise its discretion and increase the annuities with respect to the past. Having already reached a negotiated settlement concerning past breaches with the Huron plaintiffs, the Crown is directed to engage in time-bound and honourable negotiation with the Superior plaintiffs about compensation for past breaches. Finally, although no specific fiduciary duties apply in respect of the augmentation promise, the honour of the Crown requires the Crown to diligently fulfill this promise." Case in Brief Restoule v. Canada: https://www.scc-csc.ca/judgments-jugements/cb/2024/40024/

In coming to this conclusion the Court wrote:]

[262] I cannot accept Ontario's submission that a purely procedural duty — by which the Crown is simply required to "consider" or "turn its mind" to discretionary increases to the annuities from time to time — would maintain the honour of the Crown or effect reconciliation between the parties. Since 1875, when the first and only increase to the annuities was made, the Crown has failed to consider whether it can increase the annuities without incurring loss and, if so, to exercise its discretion to determine whether and by how much to increase them. For well over a century, the Crown has shown itself to be a patently unreliable and untrustworthy treaty partner in relation to the augmentation promise. It has lost the moral authority to simply say "trust us". …

[278] In my view, a declaration is an appropriate remedy in that it will offer a definitive statement of the rights and obligations under the Augmentation Clause to guide the parties in negotiating compensation for past breaches and to encourage the renewal of the treaty relationship moving forward …

(4) A Declaration Is Appropriate, but Insufficient

[283] While a declaration is appropriate, I am of the view that a bare declaration, without more, is insufficient given the egregious and longstanding nature of the breaches at issue in these appeals. In these circumstances, a simple declaration would not adequately repair the treaty relationship or restore the honour of the Crown. It would not sufficiently vindicate the treaty rights or meaningfully advance reconciliation.

(5) Further Direction Is Needed

[301] …At this stage, a judicially calculated damages award would remove from the treaty implementation any exercise of Crown discretion and engagement between treaty partners — the very essence of the treaty promise respecting increases beyond $4. It would also fail to effectively renew the treaty relationship and restore the honour of the Crown.

[302] In my view, then, a court-calculated compensation award for past breaches in relation to the Superior plaintiffs is not yet an appropriate recourse. Instead, I would direct a narrow, time-bound window for negotiation, after which the Crown is (failing a settlement) required to exercise its discretion honourably in a manner consistent with these reasons and determine an amount of compensation. Such a remedy has greater potential to fulfill the purposes of the Augmentation Clause and hold the Crown to account for its breach of the treaty to date. This limited timeline for negotiation strikes a delicate balance between ensuring the Superior plaintiffs receive compensation without extensive delay and encouraging real restoration of the treaty relationship.

[303] Although I recognize that the augmentation promise does not expressly require the parties to negotiate and agree on an annuity increase, it is undeniable that negotiation and agreement outside the courts have better potential to renew the treaty relationship, advance reconciliation, and restore the honour of the Crown. After all, historic treaties represent the "establishment of a relationship of trust and mutual assistance" between Indigenous peoples and the Crown, but the details of that relationship "must be the object of permanent negotiations, in view of fleshing out the general principles governing the relations between the two peoples" (S. Grammond, Terms of Coexistence: Indigenous Peoples and Canadian Law (2013), at p. 286).

[304] Because of the considerations discussed above, I would declare the following:

1. Under the Augmentation Clause of the Robinson Treaties, the Crown has a duty to consider, from time to time, whether it can increase the annuities without incurring loss.

2. If the Crown can increase the annuities without incurring loss, it must exercise its discretion as to whether to increase the annuities and, if so, by how much.

3. In carrying out these duties and in exercising its discretion, the Crown must act in a manner consistent with the honour of the Crown, including the duty of diligent implementation.

4. The Crown's discretion must be exercised diligently, honourably, liberally, and justly. Its discretion is not unfettered and is subject to review by the courts.

5. The Crown dishonourably breached the Robinson Treaties by failing to diligently fulfill the Augmentation Clause.

6. The Crown is obliged to determine an amount of honourable compensation to the Superior plaintiffs for amounts owed under the annuities for the period between 1875 and the present.

VI. Disposition

[311] I would allow Ontario's appeals in part, dismiss the Huron and Superior plaintiffs' cross-appeals, grant a declaration as set out in para. 304 of these reasons, and provide the directions set out in paras. 305-10. I would grant the Huron and Superior plaintiffs their costs of the appeals and cross-appeals on a solicitor-client basis.

2.8 Notes

1. While the Court has said on several occasions that the 'Aboriginal perspective', including Indigenous peoples' legal traditions, ought to inform the proof of Aboriginal rights and title, as well as the common intention of the parties to a treaty, engagement with this guidance by the Court had been pretty limited (see for example, R. v. Marshall; R. v. Bernard, 2005 SCC 43 at paras 161-141, where Lebel and Fish JJ critique the majority's failure to consider the Aboriginal perspective in applying the test for Aboriginal title). However, the Court's decision in Restoule likely represents the most serious effort by the Court todate to incorporate Indigenous law into its decision. Nigel Bankes has lauded the decision as one of the Court's "most significant treaty cases" because of its robust engagement with Anishnaabe law:

   > … the decision is based on a deeply contextual reading of the 1850 treaties, which begins pre-contact with a consideration of the Anishinaabe's system of law and governance based on the values of respect, responsibility, reciprocity, and renewal (at paras 17-18) and continues with a discussion of the Covenant Chain (at paras 19-20). These are not mere recitations. Justice Jamal uses these references throughout his judgment [in Restoule] to justify his preferred interpretation of the augmentation promise, to inform the meaning of the honour of the Crown in this particular context, to emphasize the relational rather than transactional nature of historic treaties, and, perhaps most significantly, to inform his discussion of remedies. (See N. Bankes, "Restoule: Tugging on the Rope and the Duty of Diligent Implementation of Treaty Promises" (ABlawg, August 8, 2024).)

2. In Restoule, while Ontario had tried to argue that the claims for breach of the annuities clause was time-barred under limitation laws, the Court found these did not apply, seeming to adopt an interpretative approach requiring clear language evidencing an intention to apply a limitation period to s. 35 rights, which it found had not to be met. In part, this may serve to mitigate the effect of strict application of limitation statutes to Indigenous claims, as discussed earlier in a note after Shot Both Sides.

3. Restoule may also address a lingering concern from Shot Both Sides that bare declarations may be insufficient remedy for some breaches of treaty and other constitutional rights in cases of prolonged and serious Crown misconduct. We see this in Jamal J's emphasis that that not only declarations, but "the full range of remedies", can be available to address a breach of the honour of the Crown in Restoule. One uncertainty remains, however, about whether this statement extends to cases where limitations period have been found to apply, such as in Shot Both Sides. Should it or should the available remedies to First Nations in such situations be limited to bare declarations?

3 Duty to Consult

Consultation with Indigenous peoples about the impact of government activities on their s. 35 rights was first raised in Sparrow as part of the justification test. Dickson C.J. and La Forest J wrote that one of the factors in determining whether limits on the right were justified is "whether the aboriginal group in question has been consulted with respect to the conservation measures being implemented."

Before Haida (below), if an Indigenous group sought protection for an unproven Aboriginal right or title, the group would bring an action for declaration of the right paired with a request for an interlocutory injunction. In Haida, the Court offered a new administrative law remedy that provided some protection for unproven rights without requiring the Indigenous group to start an action for a declaration of rights (and having to lead all the evidence that such a claim would entail). The Haida test provides a way for the courts to review a government decision to ensure the decision-making processes took into account the impact on potential Aboriginal right(s) without having to go through a full process to establish the right.

As you read through Haida, consider whether the approach offered provides an effective alternative mechanism for achieving reconciliation in cases of alleged breach of s. 35 rights.

3.1 Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73 (CanLII), [2004] 3 SCR 511

I. Introduction

[1] To the west of the mainland of British Columbia lie the Queen Charlotte Islands, the traditional homeland of the Haida people. Haida Gwaii, as the inhabitants call it, consists of two large islands and a number of smaller islands. For more than 100 years, the Haida people have claimed title to all the lands of the Haida Gwaii and the waters surrounding it. That title is still in the claims process and has not yet been legally recognized.

[2] The islands of Haida Gwaii are heavily forested. Spruce, hemlock and cedar abound. The most important of these is the cedar which, since time immemorial, has played a central role in the economy and culture of the Haida people. It is from cedar that they made their ocean-going canoes, their clothing, their utensils and the totem poles that guarded their lodges. The cedar forest remains central to their life and their conception of themselves.

[3] The forests of Haida Gwaii have been logged since before the First World War. Portions of the island have been logged off. Other portions bear second-growth forest. In some areas, old-growth forests can still be found.

[4] The Province of British Columbia continues to issue licences to cut trees on Haida Gwaii to forestry companies. The modern name for these licenses are Tree Farm Licences, or T.F.L.'s. Such a licence is at the heart of this litigation. A large forestry firm, MacMillan Bloedel Limited acquired T.F.L. 39 in 1961, permitting it to harvest trees in an area designated as Block 6. In 1981, 1995 and 2000, the Minister replaced T.F.L. 39 pursuant to procedures set out in the Forest Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 157. In 1999, the Minister approved a transfer of T.F.L. 39 to Weyerhaeuser Company Limited ("Weyerhaeuser"). The Haida people challenged these replacements and the transfer, which were made without their consent and, since at least 1994, over their objections. Nevertheless, T.F.L. 39 continued.

[5] In January of 2000, the Haida people launched a lawsuit objecting to the three replacement decisions and the transfer of T.F.L. 39 to Weyerhaeuser and asking that they be set aside. They argued legal encumbrance, equitable encumbrance and breach of fiduciary duty, all grounded in their assertion of Aboriginal title.

[6] This brings us to the issue before this Court. The government holds legal title to the land. Exercising that legal title, it has granted Weyerhaeuser the right to harvest the forests in Block 6 of the land. But the Haida people also claim title to the land — title which they are in the process of trying to prove — and object to the harvesting of the forests on Block 6 as proposed in T.F.L. 39. In this situation, what duty if any does the government owe the Haida people? More concretely, is the government required to consult with them about decisions to harvest the forests and to accommodate their concerns about what if any forest in Block 6 should be harvested before they have proven their title to land and their Aboriginal rights?

[7] The stakes are huge. The Haida argue that absent consultation and accommodation, they will win their title but find themselves deprived of forests that are vital to their economy and their culture. Forests take generations to mature, they point out, and old-growth forests can never be replaced. The Haida's claim to title to Haida Gwaii is strong, as found by the chambers judge. But it is also complex and will take many years to prove. In the meantime, the Haida argue, their heritage will be irretrievably despoiled.

[8] The government, in turn, argues that it has the right and responsibility to manage the forest resource for the good of all British Columbians, and that until the Haida people formally prove their claim, they have no legal right to be consulted or have their needs and interests accommodated.

[10] I conclude that the government has a legal duty to consult with the Haida people about the harvest of timber from Block 6, including decisions to transfer or replace Tree Farm Licences. Good faith consultation may in turn lead to an obligation to accommodate Haida concerns in the harvesting of timber, although what accommodation if any may be required cannot at this time be ascertained. Consultation must be meaningful. There is no duty to reach agreement. The duty to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate cannot be discharged by delegation to Weyerhaeuser. Nor does Weyerhaeuser owe any independent duty to consult with or accommodate the Haida people's concerns, although the possibility remains that it could become liable for assumed obligations. It follows that I would dismiss the Crown's appeal and allow the appeal of Weyerhaeuser.

B. The Source of a Duty to Consult and Accommodate [16] The government's duty to consult with Aboriginal peoples and accommodate their interests is grounded in the honour of the Crown. The honour of the Crown is always at stake in its dealings with Aboriginal peoples… It is not a mere incantation, but rather a core precept that finds its application in concrete practices.

[17] The historical roots of the principle of the honour of the Crown suggest that it must be understood generously in order to reflect the underlying realities from which it stems. In all its dealings with Aboriginal peoples, from the assertion of sovereignty to the resolution of claims and the implementation of treaties, the Crown must act honourably. Nothing less is required if we are to achieve "the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown…"

[18] The honour of the Crown gives rise to different duties in different circumstances. Where the Crown has assumed discretionary control over specific Aboriginal interests, the honour of the Crown gives rise to a fiduciary duty… The content of the fiduciary duty may vary to take into account the Crown's other, broader obligations. However, the duty's fulfilment requires that the Crown act with reference to the Aboriginal group's best interest in exercising discretionary control over the specific Aboriginal interest at stake. As explained in Wewaykum, at para. 81, the term "fiduciary duty" does not connote a universal trust relationship encompassing all aspects of the relationship between the Crown and Aboriginal peoples:

> . . . "fiduciary duty" as a source of plenary Crown liability covering all aspects of the Crown-Indian band relationship . . . overshoots the mark. The fiduciary duty imposed on the Crown does not exist at large but in relation to specific Indian interests.

Here, Aboriginal rights and title have been asserted but have not been defined or proven. The Aboriginal interest in question is insufficiently specific for the honour of the Crown to mandate that the Crown act in the Aboriginal group's best interest, as a fiduciary, in exercising discretionary control over the subject of the right or title.

[19] The honour of the Crown also infuses the processes of treaty making and treaty interpretation. In making and applying treaties, the Crown must act with honour and integrity, avoiding even the appearance of "sharp dealing"…

[20] Where treaties remain to be concluded, the honour of the Crown requires negotiations leading to a just settlement of Aboriginal claims… Treaties serve to reconcile pre-existing Aboriginal sovereignty with assumed Crown sovereignty, and to define Aboriginal rights guaranteed by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Section 35 represents a promise of rights recognition, and "[i]t is always assumed that the Crown intends to fulfil its promises" (Badger, supra, at para. 41). This promise is realized and sovereignty claims reconciled through the process of honourable negotiation. It is a corollary of s. 35 that the Crown act honourably in defining the rights it guarantees and in reconciling them with other rights and interests. This, in turn, implies a duty to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate.

[24] The Court's seminal decision in Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 168, in the context of a claim for title to land and resources, confirmed and expanded on the duty to consult, suggesting the content of the duty varied with the circumstances: from a minimum "duty to discuss important decisions" where the "breach is less serious or relatively minor"; through the "significantly deeper than mere consultation" that is required in "most cases"; to "full consent of [the] aboriginal nation" on very serious issues. These words apply as much to unresolved claims as to intrusions on settled claims.

[25] Put simply, Canada's Aboriginal peoples were here when Europeans came, and were never conquered. Many bands reconciled their claims with the sovereignty of the Crown through negotiated treaties. Others, notably in British Columbia, have yet to do so. The potential rights embedded in these claims are protected by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The honour of the Crown requires that these rights be determined, recognized and respected. This, in turn, requires the Crown, acting honourably, to participate in processes of negotiation. While this process continues, the honour of the Crown may require it to consult and, where indicated, accommodate Aboriginal interests.

C. When the Duty to Consult and Accommodate Arises

[26] Honourable negotiation implies a duty to consult with Aboriginal claimants and conclude an honourable agreement reflecting the claimants' inherent rights. But proving rights may take time, sometimes a very long time. In the meantime, how are the interests under discussion to be treated? Underlying this question is the need to reconcile prior Aboriginal occupation of the land with the reality of Crown sovereignty. Is the Crown, under the aegis of its asserted sovereignty, entitled to use the resources at issue as it chooses, pending proof and resolution of the Aboriginal claim? Or must it adjust its conduct to reflect the as yet unresolved rights claimed by the Aboriginal claimants?

[27] The answer, once again, lies in the honour of the Crown. The Crown, acting honourably, cannot cavalierly run roughshod over Aboriginal interests where claims affecting these interests are being seriously pursued in the process of treaty negotiation and proof. It must respect these potential, but yet unproven, interests. The Crown is not rendered impotent. It may continue to manage the resource in question pending claims resolution. But, depending on the circumstances, discussed more fully below, the honour of the Crown may require it to consult with and reasonably accommodate Aboriginal interests pending resolution of the claim. To unilaterally exploit a claimed resource during the process of proving and resolving the Aboriginal claim to that resource, may be to deprive the Aboriginal claimants of some or all of the benefit of the resource. That is not honourable.

[28] The government argues that it is under no duty to consult and accommodate prior to final determination of the scope and content of the right. Prior to proof of the right, it is argued, there exists only a broad, common law "duty of fairness", based on the general rule that an administrative decision that affects the "rights, privileges or interests of an individual" triggers application of the duty of fairness… The government asserts that, beyond general administrative law obligations, a duty to consult and accommodate arises only where the government has taken on the obligation of protecting a specific Aboriginal interest or is seeking to limit an established Aboriginal interest. In the result, the government submits that there is no legal duty to consult and accommodate Haida interests at this stage, although it concedes there may be "sound practical and policy reasons" to do so.

[29] The government cites both authority and policy in support of its position. It relies on Sparrow, supra, at pp. 1110-13 and 1119, where the scope and content of the right were determined and infringement established, prior to consideration of whether infringement was justified…

[30] As for policy, the government points to practical difficulties in the enforcement of a duty to consult or accommodate unproven claims. If the duty to consult varies with the circumstances from a "mere" duty to notify and listen at one end of the spectrum to a requirement of Aboriginal consent at the other end, how, the government asks, are the parties to agree which level is appropriate in the face of contested claims and rights? And if they cannot agree, how are courts or tribunals to determine this? The government also suggests that it is impractical and unfair to require consultation before final claims determination because this amounts to giving a remedy before issues of infringement and justification are decided.

[32] The jurisprudence of this Court supports the view that the duty to consult and accommodate is part of a process of fair dealing and reconciliation that begins with the assertion of sovereignty and continues beyond formal claims resolution. Reconciliation is not a final legal remedy in the usual sense. Rather, it is a process flowing from rights guaranteed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. This process of reconciliation flows from the Crown's duty of honourable dealing toward Aboriginal peoples, which arises in turn from the Crown's assertion of sovereignty over an Aboriginal people and de facto control of land and resources that were formerly in the control of that people…

[34] The existence of a legal duty to consult prior to proof of claims is necessary to understand the language of cases like Sparrow, Nikal, and Gladstone, supra, where confirmation of the right and justification of an alleged infringement were litigated at the same time. For example, the reference in Sparrow to Crown behaviour in determining if any infringements were justified, is to behaviour before determination of the right. This negates the contention that a proven right is the trigger for a legal duty to consult and if appropriate accommodate even in the context of justification.

[35] But, when precisely does a duty to consult arise? The foundation of the duty in the Crown's honour and the goal of reconciliation suggest that the duty arises when the Crown has knowledge, real or constructive, of the potential existence of the Aboriginal right or title and contemplates conduct that might adversely affect it…

[36] This leaves the practical argument. It is said that before claims are resolved, the Crown cannot know that the rights exist, and hence can have no duty to consult or accommodate. This difficulty should not be denied or minimized… However, it will frequently be possible to reach an idea of the asserted rights and of their strength sufficient to trigger an obligation to consult and accommodate, short of final judicial determination or settlement. To facilitate this determination, claimants should outline their claims with clarity, focussing on the scope and nature of the Aboriginal rights they assert and on the alleged infringements. This is what happened here, where the chambers judge made a preliminary evidence-based assessment of the strength of the Haida claims to the lands and resources of Haida Gwaii, particularly Block 6.

[37] There is a distinction between knowledge sufficient to trigger a duty to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate, and the content or scope of the duty in a particular case. Knowledge of a credible but unproven claim suffices to trigger a duty to consult and accommodate. The content of the duty, however, varies with the circumstances, as discussed more fully below. A dubious or peripheral claim may attract a mere duty of notice, while a stronger claim may attract more stringent duties. The law is capable of differentiating between tenuous claims, claims possessing a strong prima facie case, and established claims. Parties can assess these matters, and if they cannot agree, tribunals and courts can assist. Difficulties associated with the absence of proof and definition of claims are addressed by assigning appropriate content to the duty, not by denying the existence of a duty.

[38] I conclude that consultation and accommodation before final claims resolution, while challenging, is not impossible, and indeed is an essential corollary to the honourable process of reconciliation that s. 35 demands. It preserves the Aboriginal interest pending claims resolution and fosters a relationship between the parties that makes possible negotiations, the preferred process for achieving ultimate reconciliation… Precisely what is required of the government may vary with the strength of the claim and the circumstances. But at a minimum, it must be consistent with the honour of the Crown.

D. The Scope and Content of the Duty to Consult and Accommodate [39] The content of the duty to consult and accommodate varies with the circumstances. Precisely what duties arise in different situations will be defined as the case law in this emerging area develops. In general terms, however, it may be asserted that the scope of the duty is proportionate to a preliminary assessment of the strength of the case supporting the existence of the right or title, and to the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the right or title claimed.

[41] … While it is not useful to classify situations into watertight compartments, different situations requiring different responses can be identified. In all cases, the honour of the Crown requires that the Crown act with good faith to provide meaningful consultation appropriate to the circumstances. In discharging this duty, regard may be had to the procedural safeguards of natural justice mandated by administrative law.

[42] At all stages, good faith on both sides is required. The common thread on the Crown's part must be "the intention of substantially addressing [Aboriginal] concerns" as they are raised… through a meaningful process of consultation. Sharp dealing is not permitted. However, there is no duty to agree; rather, the commitment is to a meaningful process of consultation. As for Aboriginal claimants, they must not frustrate the Crown's reasonable good faith attempts, nor should they take unreasonable positions to thwart government from making decisions or acting in cases where, despite meaningful consultation, agreement is not reached… Mere hard bargaining, however, will not offend an Aboriginal people's right to be consulted.

[43] Against this background, I turn to the kind of duties that may arise in different situations. In this respect, the concept of a spectrum may be helpful, not to suggest watertight legal compartments but rather to indicate what the honour of the Crown may require in particular circumstances. At one end of the spectrum lie cases where the claim to title is weak, the Aboriginal right limited, or the potential for infringement minor. In such cases, the only duty on the Crown may be to give notice, disclose information, and discuss any issues raised in response to the notice…

[45] Between these two extremes of the spectrum just described, will lie other situations. Every case must be approached individually. Each must also be approached flexibly, since the level of consultation required may change as the process goes on and new information comes to light. The controlling question in all situations is what is required to maintain the honour of the Crown and to effect reconciliation between the Crown and the Aboriginal peoples with respect to the interests at stake. Pending settlement, the Crown is bound by its honour to balance societal and Aboriginal interests in making decisions that may affect Aboriginal claims. The Crown may be required to make decisions in the face of disagreement as to the adequacy of its response to Aboriginal concerns. Balance and compromise will then be necessary.

[46] Meaningful consultation may oblige the Crown to make changes to its proposed action based on information obtained through consultations. The New Zealand Ministry of Justice's Guide for Consultation with Māori (1997) provides insight (at pp. 21 and 31):

> Consultation is not just a process of exchanging information. It also entails testing and being prepared to amend policy proposals in the light of information received, and providing feedback. Consultation therefore becomes a process which should ensure both parties are better informed . . .
> . . .
> . . . genuine consultation means a process that involves . . .:
> - gathering information to test policy proposals
> - putting forward proposals that are not yet finalised
> - seeking Mäori opinion on those proposals
> - informing Mäori of all relevant information upon which those proposals are based
> - not promoting but listening with an open mind to what Mäori have to say
> - being prepared to alter the original proposal
> - providing feedback both during the consultation process and after the decision-process.

[47] When the consultation process suggests amendment of Crown policy, we arrive at the stage of accommodation. Thus, the effect of good faith consultation may be to reveal a duty to accommodate. Where a strong prima facie case exists for the claim, and the consequences of the government's proposed decision may adversely affect it in a significant way, addressing the Aboriginal concerns may require taking steps to avoid irreparable harm or to minimize the effects of infringement, pending final resolution of the underlying claim. Accommodation is achieved through consultation, as this Court recognized in R. v. Marshall … : ". . . the process of accommodation of the treaty right may best be resolved by consultation and negotiation".

[48] This process does not give Aboriginal groups a veto over what can be done with land pending final proof of the claim. The Aboriginal "consent" spoken of in Delgamuukw is appropriate only in cases of established rights, and then by no means in every case. Rather, what is required is a process of balancing interests, of give and take.

[51] It is open to governments to set up regulatory schemes to address the procedural requirements appropriate to different problems at different stages, thereby strengthening the reconciliation process and reducing recourse to the courts. As noted in R. v. Adams, 1996 CanLII 169 (SCC), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 101, at para. 54, the government "may not simply adopt an unstructured discretionary administrative regime which risks infringing aboriginal rights in a substantial number of applications in the absence of some explicit guidance". It should be observed that, since October 2002, British Columbia has had a Provincial Policy for Consultation with First Nations to direct the terms of provincial ministries' and agencies' operational guidelines. Such a policy, while falling short of a regulatory scheme, may guard against unstructured discretion and provide a guide for decision-makers.

E. Do Third Parties Owe a Duty to Consult and Accommodate?

[52] The Court of Appeal found that Weyerhaeuser, the forestry contractor holding T.F.L. 39, owed the Haida people a duty to consult and accommodate. With respect, I cannot agree.

[53] It is suggested (per Lambert J.A.) that a third party's obligation to consult Aboriginal peoples may arise from the ability of the third party to rely on justification as a defence against infringement. However, the duty to consult and accommodate, as discussed above, flows from the Crown's assumption of sovereignty over lands and resources formerly held by the Aboriginal group. This theory provides no support for an obligation on third parties to consult or accommodate. The Crown alone remains legally responsible for the consequences of its actions and interactions with third parties, that affect Aboriginal interests. The Crown may delegate procedural aspects of consultation to industry proponents seeking a particular development; this is not infrequently done in environmental assessments. Similarly, the terms of T.F.L. 39 mandated Weyerhaeuser to specify measures that it would take to identify and consult with "aboriginal people claiming an aboriginal interest in or to the area" (Tree Farm Licence No. 39, Haida Tree Farm Licence, para. 2.09(g)(ii)). However, the ultimate legal responsibility for consultation and accommodation rests with the Crown. The honour of the Crown cannot be delegated.

[56] The fact that third parties are under no duty to consult or accommodate Aboriginal concerns does not mean that they can never be liable to Aboriginal peoples. If they act negligently in circumstances where they owe Aboriginal peoples a duty of care, or if they breach contracts with Aboriginal peoples or deal with them dishonestly, they may be held legally liable. But they cannot be held liable for failing to discharge the Crown's duty to consult and accommodate.

F. The Province's Duty

[57] The Province of British Columbia argues that any duty to consult or accommodate rests solely with the federal government. I cannot accept this argument.

[58] The Province's argument rests on s. 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provides that "[a]ll Lands, Mines, Minerals, and Royalties belonging to the several Provinces of Canada . . . at the Union . . . shall belong to the several Provinces." The Province argues that this gives it exclusive right to the land at issue. This right, it argues, cannot be limited by the protection for Aboriginal rights found in s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. To do so, it argues, would "undermine the balance of federalism" (Crown's factum, at para. 96).

[59] The answer to this argument is that the Provinces took their interest in land subject to "any Interest other than that of the Province in the same" (s. 109). The duty to consult and accommodate here at issue is grounded in the assertion of Crown sovereignty which pre-dated the Union. It follows that the Province took the lands subject to this duty. It cannot therefore claim that s. 35 deprives it of powers it would otherwise have enjoyed. As stated in St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1888), 14 App. Cas. 46 (P.C.), lands in the Province are "available to [the Province] as a source of revenue whenever the estate of the Crown is disencumbered of the Indian title" (p. 59). The Crown's argument on this point has been canvassed by this Court in Delgamuukw, supra, at para. 175, where Lamer C.J. reiterated the conclusions in St. Catherine's Milling, supra. There is therefore no foundation to the Province's argument on this point.

H. Application to the Facts

(1) Existence of the Duty

[64] The question is whether the Province had knowledge, real or constructive, of the potential existence of Aboriginal right or title and contemplated conduct that might adversely affect them. On the evidence before the Court in this matter, the answer must unequivocally be "yes".

(2) Scope of the Duty

[68] As discussed above, the scope of the consultation required will be proportionate to a preliminary assessment of the strength of the case supporting the existence of the right or title, and to the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the right or title claimed.

(i) Strength of the Case

[69] On the basis of evidence described as "voluminous", the chambers judge found, at para. 25, a number of conclusions to be "inescapable" regarding the Haida's claims. He found that the Haida had inhabited Haida Gwaii continuously since at least 1774, that they had never been conquered, never surrendered their rights by treaty, and that their rights had not been extinguished by federal legislation. Their culture has utilized red cedar from old-growth forests on both coastal and inland areas of what is now Block 6 of T.F.L. 39 since at least 1846.

[70] The chambers judge's thorough assessment of the evidence distinguishes between the various Haida claims relevant to Block 6. On the basis of a thorough survey of the evidence, he found, at para. 47:

> (1) a "reasonable probability" that the Haida may establish title to "at least some parts" of the coastal and inland areas of Haida Gwaii, including coastal areas of Block 6. There appears to be a "reasonable possibility" that these areas will include inland areas of Block 6;
> (2) a "substantial probability" that the Haida will be able to establish an aboriginal right to harvest old-growth red cedar trees from both coastal and inland areas of Block 6.

The chambers judge acknowledged that a final resolution would require a great deal of further evidence, but said he thought it "fair to say that the Haida claim goes far beyond the mere 'assertion' of Aboriginal title" (para. 50).

[71] The chambers judge's findings grounded the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the Haida claims to title and Aboriginal rights were "supported by a good prima facie case" (para. 49). The strength of the case goes to the extent of the duty that the Province was required to fulfill. In this case the evidence clearly supports a conclusion that, pending a final resolution, there was a prima facie case in support of Aboriginal title, and a strong prima facie case for the Aboriginal right to harvest red cedar.

(ii) Seriousness of the Potential Impact

[72] The evidence before the chambers judge indicated that red cedar has long been integral to Haida culture. The chambers judge considered that there was a "reasonable probability" that the Haida would be able to establish infringement of an Aboriginal right to harvest red cedar "by proof that old-growth cedar has been and will continue to be logged on Block 6, and that it is of limited supply" (para. 48). The prospect of continued logging of a resource in limited supply points to the potential impact on an Aboriginal right of the decision to replace T.F.L. 39.

[73] Tree Farm Licences are exclusive, long-term licences. T.F.L. 39 grants exclusive rights to Weyerhaeuser to harvest timber within an area constituting almost one quarter of the total land of Haida Gwaii. The chambers judge observed that "it [is] apparent that large areas of Block 6 have been logged off" (para. 59). This points to the potential impact on Aboriginal rights of the decision to replace T.F.L. 39.

[74] To the Province's credit, the terms of T.F.L. 39 impose requirements on Weyerhaeuser with respect to Aboriginal peoples. However, more was required. Where the government has knowledge of an asserted Aboriginal right or title, it must consult the Aboriginal peoples on how exploitation of the land should proceed.

[75] The next question is when does the duty to consult arise? Does it arise at the stage of granting a Tree Farm Licence, or only at the stage of granting cutting permits? The T.F.L. replacement does not itself authorize timber harvesting, which occurs only pursuant to cutting permits. T.F.L. replacements occur periodically, and a particular T.F.L. replacement decision may not result in the substance of the asserted right being destroyed. The Province argues that, although it did not consult the Haida prior to replacing the T.F.L., it "has consulted, and continues to consult with the Haida prior to authorizing any cutting permits or other operational plans" (Crown's factum, at para. 64).

[76] I conclude that the Province has a duty to consult and perhaps accommodate on T.F.L. decisions. The T.F.L. decision reflects the strategic planning for utilization of the resource. Decisions made during strategic planning may have potentially serious impacts on Aboriginal right and title. The holder of T.F.L. 39 must submit a management plan to the Chief Forester every five years, to include inventories of the licence area's resources, a timber supply analysis, and a "20-Year Plan" setting out a hypothetical sequence of cutblocks. The inventories and the timber supply analysis form the basis of the determination of the allowable annual cut ("A.A.C.") for the licence. The licensee thus develops the technical information based upon which the A.A.C. is calculated. Consultation at the operational level thus has little effect on the quantity of the annual allowable cut, which in turn determines cutting permit terms. If consultation is to be meaningful, it must take place at the stage of granting or renewing Tree Farm Licences.

[77] The last issue is whether the Crown's duty went beyond consultation on T.F.L. decisions, to accommodation. We cannot know, on the facts here, whether consultation would have led to a need for accommodation. However, the strength of the case for both the Haida title and the Haida right to harvest red cedar, coupled with the serious impact of incremental strategic decisions on those interests, suggest that the honour of the Crown may well require significant accommodation to preserve the Haida interest pending resolution of their claims.

(3) Did the Crown Fulfill its Duty?

[78] The Province did not consult with the Haida on the replacement of T.F.L. 39. … In both this Court and the courts below, the Province points to various measures and policies taken to address Aboriginal interests. At this Court, the Province argued that "[t]he Haida were and are consulted with respect to forest development plans and cutting permits. . . Through past consultations with the Haida, the Province has taken various steps to mitigate the effects of harvesting . . ." (Crown's factum, at para. 75). However, these measures and policies do not amount to and cannot substitute for consultation with respect to the decision to replace T.F.L. 39 and the setting of the licence's terms and conditions.

[79] It follows, therefore, that the Province failed to meet its duty to engage in something significantly deeper than mere consultation. It failed to engage in any meaningful consultation at all.

III. Conclusion

[80] The Crown's appeal is dismissed and Weyerhaeuser's appeal is allowed. The British Columbia Court of Appeal's order is varied so that the Crown's obligation to consult does not extend to Weyerhaeuser. The Crown has agreed to pay the costs of the respondents regarding the application for leave to appeal and the appeal. Weyerhaeuser shall be relieved of any obligation to pay the costs of the Haida in the courts below. It is not necessary to answer the constitutional question stated in this appeal.

3.2 Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44 (CanLII), [2014] 2 SCR 257

In Tsilhqot'in Nation, in the context of a claim for Aboriginal title, the SCC restated the test for justifying infringements of Aboriginal rights, integrating it with the duty to consult and accommodate. Do you think it modifies the Sparrow test?

[77] To justify overriding the Aboriginal title-holding group's wishes on the basis of the broader public good, the government must show: (1) that it discharged its procedural duty to consult and accommodate; (2) that its actions were backed by a compelling and substantial objective; and (3) that the governmental action is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary obligation to the group: Sparrow.

[78] The duty to consult is a procedural duty that arises from the honour of the Crown prior to confirmation of title. Where the Crown has real or constructive knowledge of the potential or actual existence of Aboriginal title, and contemplates conduct that might adversely affect it, the Crown is obliged to consult with the group asserting Aboriginal title and, if appropriate, accommodate the Aboriginal right. The duty to consult must be discharged prior to carrying out the action that could adversely affect the right.

[79] The degree of consultation and accommodation required lies on a spectrum as discussed in Haida. In general, the level of consultation and accommodation required is proportionate to the strength of the claim and to the seriousness of the adverse impact the contemplated governmental action would have on the claimed right. "A dubious or peripheral claim may attract a mere duty of notice, while a stronger claim may attract more stringent duties" (para. 37). The required level of consultation and accommodation is greatest where title has been established. Where consultation or accommodation is found to be inadequate, the government decision can be suspended or quashed.

[80] Where Aboriginal title is unproven, the Crown owes a procedural duty imposed by the honour of the Crown to consult and, if appropriate, accommodate the unproven Aboriginal interest. By contrast, where title has been established, the Crown must not only comply with its procedural duties, but must also ensure that the proposed government action is substantively consistent with the requirements of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This requires both a compelling and substantial governmental objective and that the government action is consistent with the fiduciary duty owed by the Crown to the Aboriginal group.

[81] I agree with the Court of Appeal that the compelling and substantial objective of the government must be considered from the Aboriginal perspective as well as from the perspective of the broader public. As stated in Gladstone, at para. 72:

> . . . the objectives which can be said to be compelling and substantial will be those directed at either the recognition of the prior occupation of North America by [A]boriginal peoples or — and at the level of justification it is this purpose which may well be most relevant — at the reconciliation of [A]boriginal prior occupation with the assertion of the sovereignty of the Crown. [Emphasis added.]

[82] As Delgamuukw explains, the process of reconciling Aboriginal interests with the broader interests of society as a whole is the raison d'être of the principle of justification. Aboriginals and non-Aboriginals are "all here to stay" and must of necessity move forward in a process of reconciliation (para. 186). To constitute a compelling and substantial objective, the broader public goal asserted by the government must further the goal of reconciliation, having regard to both the Aboriginal interest and the broader public objective.

[83] What interests are potentially capable of justifying an incursion on Aboriginal title? In Delgamuukw, this Court, per Lamer C.J., offered this:

> In the wake of Gladstone, the range of legislative objectives that can justify the infringement of [A]boriginal title is fairly broad. Most of these objectives can be traced to the reconciliation of the prior occupation of North America by [A]boriginal peoples with the assertion of Crown sovereignty, which entails the recognition that "distinctive [A]boriginal societies exist within, and are a part of, a broader social, political and economic community" (at para. 73). In my opinion, the development of agriculture, forestry, mining, and hydroelectric power, the general economic development of the interior of British Columbia, protection of the environment or endangered species, the building of infrastructure and the settlement of foreign populations to support those aims, are the kinds of objectives that are consistent with this purpose and, in principle, can justify the infringement of [A]boriginal title. Whether a particular measure or government act can be explained by reference to one of those objectives, however, is ultimately a question of fact that will have to be examined on a case-by-case basis. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted; para. 165.]

[84] If a compelling and substantial public purpose is established, the government must go on to show that the proposed incursion on the Aboriginal right is consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty towards Aboriginal people.

[85] The Crown's fiduciary duty in the context of justification merits further discussion. The Crown's underlying title in the land is held for the benefit of the Aboriginal group and constrained by the Crown's fiduciary or trust obligation to the group. This impacts the justification process in two ways.

[86] First, the Crown's fiduciary duty means that the government must act in a way that respects the fact that Aboriginal title is a group interest that inheres in present and future generations. The beneficial interest in the land held by the Aboriginal group vests communally in the title-holding group. This means that incursions on Aboriginal title cannot be justified if they would substantially deprive future generations of the benefit of the land.

[87] Second, the Crown's fiduciary duty infuses an obligation of proportionality into the justification process. Implicit in the Crown's fiduciary duty to the Aboriginal group is the requirement that the incursion is necessary to achieve the government's goal (rational connection); that the government go no further than necessary to achieve it (minimal impairment); and that the benefits that may be expected to flow from that goal are not outweighed by adverse effects on the Aboriginal interest (proportionality of impact). The requirement of proportionality is inherent in the Delgamuukw process of reconciliation and was echoed in Haida's insistence that the Crown's duty to consult and accommodate at the claims stage "is proportionate to a preliminary assessment of the strength of the case supporting the existence of the right or title, and to the seriousness of the potentially adverse effect upon the right or title claimed" (para. 39).

[88] In summary, Aboriginal title confers on the group that holds it the exclusive right to decide how the land is used and the right to benefit from those uses, subject to one carve-out — that the uses must be consistent with the group nature of the interest and the enjoyment of the land by future generations. Government incursions not consented to by the title-holding group must be undertaken in accordance with the Crown's procedural duty to consult and must also be justified on the basis of a compelling and substantial public interest, and must be consistent with the Crown's fiduciary duty to the Aboriginal group.

4 Indigenous Self-Government

For most Indigenous peoples, the right to self-government (the right to enforce their own rules, resolve disputes, problem-solve, and establish their own governing institutions to carry out these tasks right, according to their own laws, is a fundamentally important right, and one for which they have long sought recognition within Canada. Article 3 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples ("UNDRIP") recognizes the right to self-determination and states that "[b]y virtue of that right [Indigenous peoples may] freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development." Article 4 of UN Declaration states "in exercising their right to self-determination, [Indigenous peoples] have the right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs, as well as ways and means for financing their autonomous functions." Article 34 further states Indigenous peoples' rights to "promote, develop and maintain their institutional structures and their distinctive customs, spirituality, traditions, procedures, practices and … juridical systems or customs… ."

Canadian law's recognition of Indigenous peoples' right self-government to date, however, could be described as "tepid" at best. The primary vehicle for obtaining self-government in Canada is through negotiations under what is known as Canada's Inherent Rights Policy passed in 1995 after the failure of the Charlottetown Accord to amend the Constitution to explicitly recognize a right to self-government unilaterally exercisable by Indigenous peoples (after an initial five year waiting period). The Inherent Rights Policy authorizes negotiations between Canada, Indigenous groups and the provinces (on an Indigenous group's request) over the exercise of self-government over "matters that are internal to their communities, integral to their unique cultures, identities, traditions, languages and institutions, and with respect to their special relationship to their land and their resources." No unilateral exercise of jurisdiction is permitted under the Policy; all must be negotiated. Critics have pointed out that the requirement to negotiate appears inconsistent with calling these "inherent" rights.

Turning to the courts, whether section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 protects Aboriginal people's right to Indigenous self-government still remains an open question. In R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 821, the Supreme Court suggested that if the right to self-government does exist pursuant to section 35, it would have to be proven in the same was as any other Aboriginal right, pursuant to the framework set out in R v. Van der Peet.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE --

Introduction

[1] This appeal raises the question of whether the conduct of high stakes gambling by the Shawanaga and Eagle Lake First Nations falls within the scope of the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[2] The appeal was heard on February 26, 1996 and judgment was given dismissing the appeal. The following brief reasons will explain the basis for this decision.

II. Statement of Facts

Pamajewon and Jones

[3] The appellants Pamajewon and Jones are members of the Shawanaga First Nation. On March 29, 1993, both were found guilty of the offence of keeping a common gaming house contrary to s. 201(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46. Section 201(1) of the Criminal Code reads:

> 201. (1) Every one who keeps a common gaming house or common betting house is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years.

[4] The charges arose out of the high stakes bingo and other gambling activities which took place on the Shawanaga First Nation Reservation between September 11, 1987 and October 6, 1990. Throughout this period Jones was Chief of the Shawanaga First Nation and Pamajewon was a member of the Shawanaga Band Council

[6] The Shawanaga First Nation did not have a provincial licence authorizing its gambling activities. The band had met with the Ontario Lottery Corporation but had refused the Corporation's offer of a gambling licence on the basis that such a licence was unnecessary because the band had an inherent right of self-government.

[7] At trial the appellants Pamajewon and Jones were convicted. Their convictions were upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

Gardner, Pitchenese and Gardner

[8] The appellants Arnold Gardner, Jack Pitchenese and Allan Gardner are all members of the Eagle Lake First Nation. On November 19, 1993 they were found guilty of conducting a scheme for the purpose of determining the winners of property, contrary to s. 206(1)(d) of the Code. Section 206(1)(d) of the Code reads:

> 206. (1) Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years who
> . . .
> (d) conducts or manages any scheme, contrivance or operation of any kind for the purpose of determining who, or the holders of what lots, tickets, numbers or chances, are the winners of any property so proposed to be advanced, lent, given, sold or disposed of....

[9] At the time they were charged Arnold Gardner was Chief of the Eagle Lake Band and chairman of the bingo committee. Jack Pitchenese managed the bingo operations. Allan Gardner was the chief bingo caller.

[11] The Eagle Lake First Nation did not have a provincial licence authorizing its gambling operations; the band had refused to negotiate with the Ontario Lottery Commission, even though it was approached for this purpose by the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations. The band would not negotiate because it asserted the right to be self-regulating in its economic activities.

[12] The appellants Gardner, Pitchenese and Gardner were convicted at trial. Their convictions were upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

IV. Grounds of Appeal

[20] Leave to appeal to this Court was granted on June 1, 1995… On July 6, 1995, the following constitutional question was stated:

> Are s. 201, s. 206 or s. 207 of the Criminal Code, separately or in combination, of no force or effect with respect to the appellants, by virtue of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 in the circumstances of these proceedings, by reason of the aboriginal or treaty rights within the meaning of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 invoked by the appellants?

[21] The appellants appealed on the basis that the Court of Appeal erred in restricting aboriginal title to rights that are activity and site specific and in concluding that self-government only extends to those matters which were governed by ancient laws or customs. The appellant argued further that the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that the Code extinguished self-government regarding gaming and in not addressing whether the Code's gaming provisions unjustifiably interfered with the rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[23] The resolution of the appellants' claim in this case rests on the application of the test, laid out by this Court in R. v. Van der Peet, 1996 CanLII 216 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507, for determining the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. The appellants in this case are claiming that the gambling activities in which they took part, and their respective bands' regulation of those gambling activities, fell within the scope of the aboriginal rights recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1). Van der Peet, supra, lays out the test for determining the practices, customs and traditions which fall within s. 35(1) and, as such, provides the legal standard against which the appellants' claim must be measured.

[24] The appellants' claim involves the assertion that s. 35(1) encompasses the right of self-government, and that this right includes the right to regulate gambling activities on the reservation. Assuming without deciding that s. 35(1) includes self-government claims, the applicable legal standard is nonetheless that laid out in Van der Peet, supra. Assuming s. 35(1) encompasses claims to aboriginal self-government, such claims must be considered in light of the purposes underlying that provision and must, therefore, be considered against the test derived from consideration of those purposes. This is the test laid out in Van der Peet, supra. In so far as they can be made under s. 35(1), claims to self-government are no different from other claims to the enjoyment of aboriginal rights and must, as such, be measured against the same standard.

[25] In Van der Peet, supra, the test for identifying aboriginal rights was said to be as follows, at para. 46:

> . . . in order to be an aboriginal right an activity must be an element of a practice, custom or tradition integral to the distinctive culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right.

In applying this test, the Court must first identify the exact nature of the activity claimed to be a right and must then go on to determine whether, on the evidence presented to the trial judge, and on the facts as found by the trial judge, that activity could be said to be (Van der Peet, at para. 59) "a defining feature of the culture in question" prior to contact with Europeans.

[26] I now turn to the first part of the Van der Peet test, the characterization of the appellants' claim. In Van der Peet, supra, the Court held at para. 53 that:

> To characterize an applicant's claim correctly, a court should consider such factors as the nature of the action which the applicant is claiming was done pursuant to an aboriginal right, the nature of the governmental regulation, statute or action being impugned, and the practice, custom or tradition being relied upon to establish the right.

When these factors are considered in this case it can be seen that the correct characterization of the appellants' claim is that they are claiming the right to participate in, and to regulate, high stakes gambling activities on the reservation. The activity which the appellants organized, and which their bands regulated, was high stakes gambling. The statute which they argue violates those rights prohibits gambling subject only to a few very limited exceptions […]. Finally, the applicants rely in support of their claim on the fact that the "Ojibwa people ... had a long tradition of public games and sporting events, which pre-dated the arrival of Europeans". Thus, the activity in which the appellants were engaged and which their bands regulated, the statute they are impugning, and the historical evidence on which they rely, all relate to the conduct and regulation of gambling. As such, the most accurate characterization of the appellants' claim is that they are asserting that s. 35(1) recognizes and affirms the rights of the Shawanaga and Eagle Lake First Nations to participate in, and to regulate, gambling activities on their respective reserve lands.

[27] The appellants themselves would have this Court characterize their claim as to "a broad right to manage the use of their reserve lands". To so characterize the appellants' claim would be to cast the Court's inquiry at a level of excessive generality. Aboriginal rights, including any asserted right to self-government, must be looked at in light of the specific circumstances of each case and, in particular, in light of the specific history and culture of the aboriginal group claiming the right. The factors laid out in Van der Peet, and applied, supra, allow the Court to consider the appellants' claim at the appropriate level of specificity; the characterization put forward by the appellants would not allow the Court to do so.

[28] I now turn to the second branch of the Van der Peet test, the consideration of whether the participation in, and regulation of, gambling on the reserve lands was an integral part of the distinctive cultures of the Shawanaga or Eagle Lake First Nations. The evidence presented at both the Pamajewon and Gardner trials does not demonstrate that gambling, or that the regulation of gambling, was an integral part of the distinctive cultures of the Shawanaga or Eagle Lake First Nations. In fact, the only evidence presented at either trial dealing with the question of the importance of gambling was that of James Morrison, who testified at the Pamajewon trial with regards to the importance and prevalence of gaming in Ojibwa culture. While Mr. Morrison's evidence does demonstrate that the Ojibwa gambled, it does not demonstrate that gambling was of central significance to the Ojibwa people. Moreover, his evidence in no way addresses the extent to which this gambling was the subject of regulation by the Ojibwa community. His account is of informal gambling activities taking place on a small-scale; he does not describe large-scale activities, subject to community regulation, of the sort at issue in this appeal.

[29] I would note that neither of the trial judges in these cases relied upon findings of fact regarding the importance of gambling to the Ojibwa; however, upon review of the evidence I find myself in agreement with the conclusion arrived at by Osborne J.A. when he said first, at p. 400, that there "is no evidence to support a conclusion that gambling generally or high stakes gambling of the sort in issue here, were part of the First Nations' historic cultures and traditions, or an aspect of their use of their land" and, second, at p. 400, that "there is no evidence that gambling on the reserve lands generally was ever the subject matter of aboriginal regulation". I also agree with the observation made by Flaherty Prov. Ct. J. in the Gardner trial when he said that > commercial lotteries such as bingo are a twentieth century phenomena and nothing of the kind existed amongst aboriginal peoples and was never part of the means by which those societies were traditionally sustained or socialized.

> [30] Given this evidentiary record, it is clear that the appellants have failed to demonstrate that the gambling activities in which they were engaged, and their respective bands' regulation of those activities, took place pursuant to an aboriginal right recognized and affirmed by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Pamajewon still remains the leading Supreme Court of Canada case on the right to self-government under s 35(1). In fact, in Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010, decided the following year, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the approach in Pamajewon:

> 170 In the courts below, considerable attention was given to the question of whether s. 35(1) can protect a right to self-government, and if so, what the contours of that right are. The errors of fact made by the trial judge, and the resultant need for a new trial, make it impossible for this Court to determine whether the claim to self-government has been made out. Moreover, this is not the right case for the Court to lay down the legal principles to guide future litigation. The parties seem to have acknowledged this point, perhaps implicitly, by giving the arguments on self-government much less weight on appeal. One source of the decreased emphasis on the right to self-government on appeal is this Court's judgment Pamajewon. There, I held that rights to self-government, if they existed, cannot be framed in excessively general terms. The appellants did not have the benefit of my judgment at trial. Unsurprisingly, as counsel for the Wet'suwet'en specifically concedes, the appellants advanced the right to self-government in very broad terms, and therefore in a manner not cognizable under s. 35(1).
> 171 The broad nature of the claim at trial also led to a failure by the parties to address many of the difficult conceptual issues which surround the recognition of aboriginal self-government. The degree of complexity involved can be gleaned from the Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, which devotes 277 pages to the issue. That report describes different models of self-government, each differing with respect to their conception of territory, citizenship, jurisdiction, internal government organization, etc. We received little in the way of submissions that would help us to grapple with these difficult and central issues. Without assistance from the parties, it would be imprudent for the Court to step into the breach. In these circumstances, the issue of self-government will fall to be determined at trial.

The restrictions placed on the right of Aboriginal self-government in Pamajewon have been roundly criticized as unduly limiting First Nations' ability to self-govern by numerous scholars. For example, Peter Hogg and Wade Wright state in Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada, 2020), "[t]hese [Van der Peet] restrictions are very severe even for rights to hunt and fish, but they are singularly inappropriate for the right of self-government" (ch 28 at ss 28:20). Kent McNeil has argued that Pamajewon fails to "permit Aboriginal nations to govern themselves in the modern world in accordance with their current needs and priorities" and its requirement to prove every aspect of jurisdiction separately "places an impractical burden of proof and unreasonable costs upon them" ("The Jurisdiction of Inherent Right Aboriginal Governments" (Research Paper for the National Center for First Nations Governance, 11 October 2007) at 13-14. John Borrows puts in stark terms what can be at stake for an Indigenous group in self-government litigation. Using the example of a First Nation seeking to address domestic violence in its community, he emphasizes that Van der Peet requires a First Nation to provide "evidence that violence against women, its prevention, and the punishment of people who engage in it" was integral to its distinctive pre-contact culture of the group, such that the First Nation "would thus find itself spending millions of dollars on experts and legal fees to shame themselves before the courts with such evidence" ("Aboriginal and Treaty Rights and Violence Against Women" (2013) 50 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 699 at 723-725).

No Indigenous group has been able to successfully prove a right to self-government in the quarter-century since Pamajewon, though only a handful have dared to try: see Mississaugas of Scugog Island First Nation v National Automobile, Aerospace, Transportation and General Workers Union of Canada, 2007 ONCA 814; Acadia First Nation v Canada (National Revenue), 2007 FC 259, aff'd 2008 FCA 119; Conseil des Innus de Pessamit v Association des policiers et policières de Pessamit, 2010 FCA 306.

Developments since Pamajewon suggests that the Supreme Court of Canada's view on this topic could soon change.

In Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5, the Supreme Court of Canada referenced the fact that many of the interveners before the court were arguing that sections 35 includes an inherent right to self-government but that it was not necessarily to rule on that issue:

> It should be noted that the Attorney General of Canada, as well as a number of the interveners before this Court, argued that s. 35(1) protects Indigenous peoples' inherent right of self-government "in relation to child and family services", as the very wording of the Act affirms. This Court has not yet addressed the question, and it is unnecessary for it to do so in this case".

The Court went on to re-iterate the finding in Pamajewon but left the door open for the possibility that the court might re-examine the holding in this case in the future:

> …the fact that this Court has not yet recognized the existence under s. 35(1) of a right of self-government does not mean that Parliament lacks the means to deal with the question of Indigenous child and family services.
> … the Court is taking care not to exclude the possibility that the right of self-government has a distinct constitutional source. In particular, our conclusion certainly does not negate the possibility that such a right of self-government may be recognized under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. This remains an open question.[103]

In Dickson v Vuntun Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10, the Supreme Court of Canada confirmed that although the Court had yet to recognize an inherent right to self-government, this might need to be re-considered in light of Canada's commitments to UNDRIP:

> As a preliminary matter, we note that although this Court has yet to recognize an inherent right to Indigenous self-government as an Aboriginal right protected under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (see R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 821, at para. 24; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 171), an inherent right to Indigenous self-government has now been affirmed on the international plane by Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295, October 2, 2007. In 2016, the Canadian government supported the Declaration and committed to adopt and implement it in accordance with the Canadian Constitution. Recent federal legislation has affirmed the Declaration as "a universal international human rights instrument with application in Canadian law" and provides "a framework for the Government of Canada's implementation of the Declaration" (United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.C. 2021, c. 14 ("UNDRIP Act"), s. 4).[104]

5 Section 25

Section 25 of the Constitution Act, 1982 is part of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It provides:

> 25. The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including
> (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1763; and

(b) any rights or freedoms that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.

In Dickson, a majority of the Court confirmed that s. 25 has a protective purpose, ensuring that the rights identified in s. 25 are protected where application of individual Charter rights would otherwise unduly impact them.

5.1 Dickson v. Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10

Indigenous Self-Government and the Charter

[47] As a preliminary matter, we note that although this Court has yet to recognize an inherent right to Indigenous self-government as an Aboriginal right protected under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (see R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 S.C.R. 821, at para. 24; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010, at para. 171), an inherent right to Indigenous self-government has now been affirmed on the international plane by Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295, October 2, 2007. In 2016, the Canadian government supported the Declaration and committed to adopt and implement it in accordance with the Canadian Constitution. Recent federal legislation has affirmed the Declaration as "a universal international human rights instrument with application in Canadian law" and provides "a framework for the Government of Canada's implementation of the Declaration" (United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.C. 2021, c. 14 ("UNDRIP Act"), s. 4). For example, the Declaration has been implemented specifically in respect of the provision of Indigenous child and family services under the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 (see Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5).

[82] … [A]lthough (as the trial judge found) the Vuntut Gwitchin have been self-governing since time immemorial, and even if the VGFN has lawmaking authority under an inherent right to self-government, the VGFN is also recognized as a legal entity under the federal implementing legislation. To that extent, it derives at least some of its lawmaking authority under federal law. In other words, at least one source of the VGFN's lawmaking authority flows from Parliament, in that the VGFN exercises powers that Parliament otherwise would have exercised through its legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This of course is not to suggest that Indigenous self-government is necessarily an emanation of federal authority. Parliament can, as here, be a source of the self-government authority, and it is this fact that triggers the application of the Charter in this case. …

[91] We would also add that our conclusion that the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement adopted under the framework of the federal self-government legislation differs from — and is narrower than — the conclusions apparently reached by the trial judge and Court of Appeal. The trial judge (at para. 130) and the Court of Appeal (at para. 98) both appeared to decide that the Charter applies to the exercise of the VGFN's self-government powers, whether viewed as an exercise of the VGFN's inherent right of self-government or under the self-government agreements with the federal and Yukon governments, as implemented by federal and territorial legislation. We conclude that the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement only insofar as that requirement flows from an exercise of statutory power under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. We make no comment on whether an exercise of an inherent right of self-government untethered from federal legislation would be subject to the Charter, which in our view need not be decided in this case in view of the self-government arrangements in issue. …

Application of the Charter in the circumstances

[51] Shortly after the failure to ratify the 1992 Charlottetown Accord, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples extensively studied whether the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments exercising inherent self-government powers. The Royal Commission concluded that the Charter applies, but in accordance with s. 25, it should be "given a flexible interpretation that takes account of the distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices of Aboriginal peoples" [reference omitted]. … That perspective takes a broad view of the application of the Charter to Indigenous governments under s. 32(1), but also interprets the Charter under s. 25 with sensitivity to the collective rights of Indigenous peoples, to protect what the Royal Commission referred to as their "distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices" — or what Professor Patrick Macklem has encapsulated in the term "[I]ndigenous difference" (Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada (2001)). As we explain below, s. 25 was included in the Charter as a protection for the distinctive minority rights of Indigenous peoples that might be abrogated or derogated from by the application of individual Charter rights. …

[109] Consonant with the principle of the protection of Indigenous peoples as a distinct minority, the "other rights or freedoms" in s. 25 are limited to those that protect Indigenous difference. All the collective Indigenous rights and freedoms referred to in s. 25 must be upheld, even when they conflict with individual Charter rights, in order to ensure respect for minority rights as a constitutional value.

[110] The protection of Aboriginal, treaty, and other rights in s. 25 is not, however, absolute. Priority is given to collective Indigenous rights only when they conflict with an individual's Charter right. In any given case, the individual and collective rights referred to in s. 25 may not actually be in conflict. Some individual rights are part of Indigenous law and coexist with collective interests, as both the UNDRIP Act and the VGFN Constitution itself make plain … . In addition, s. 25 would not apply if the individual Charter right invoked conflicted with an Indigenous right that does not rest on Indigenous difference. In such circumstances, any limit on the individual right must be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. And like s. 35 rights, the primacy afforded to the collective rights under s. 25 is subject to the equality guarantee for "male and female persons" under s. 28 of the Charter and s. 35(4) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Proceeding to apply the Charter, Justice Kasirer and Justice Jamal determined that Ms. Dickson had succeeded in showing that the residency requirement constituted a prima facie (or, on its face) infringement of her right to equality under Section 15(1) of the Charter.

However, Justice Kasirer and Justice Jamal said that the residency requirement was an exercise of an "other" right or freedom that pertains to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada under Section 25 of the Charter. As they explained, the purpose of Section 25 is to uphold certain collective rights and freedoms of Indigenous peoples when those collective rights conflict with an individual's Charter rights. They declared that the residency requirement protects "Indigenous difference", understood as interests connected to Aboriginal cultural difference, Aboriginal prior occupancy, Aboriginal prior sovereignty, or Aboriginal participation in the treaty process. On this concept, the Court wrote:

> In the circumstances, the majority found VGFN's interests engaged Indigenous difference: "Requiring VGFN leaders to reside on settlement land helps preserve the leaders' connection to the land, which is deeply rooted in the VGFN's distinctive culture and governance practices. It also bolsters the VGFN's ability to resist the outside forces that pull citizens away from its settlement land […]. Such interests are associated with various aspects of Indigenous difference …" (para 217).

Justice Kasirer and Justice Jamal concluded that Ms. Dickson's claim based on her Section 15 right to equality abrogated or derogated from this "other" right under Section 25, which created an irreconcilable conflict between the two. As such, pursuant to Section 25 of the Charter, her claim could not be given effect. Neither ss. 28 or 35(4) were found to be engaged.

Justices Martin and O'Bonsawin, in dissent, gave a narrow purview to s. 25, based on their purposive approach of giving the Charter broad application and avoiding what they called "Charter-free zones." They would not extend s. 25 protection to the exercise of Indigenous self-government but limits its application "against non-Indigenous people making claims that would have the effect of taking away from Indigenous peoples what is rightly theirs precisely because they are Indigenous peoples" (para 235).

Justice Rowe did not apply s. 25 as he found that the Charter did not apply in the circumstances. He held that both the history and text of s. 32 prevent its application to the exercise of inherent self-government. Section 32 is about Canadian governments and their delegates, and it is s. 35 that addresses the place for Indigenous governance within contemporary Canada. Consequently, the VGFN's governance structures and internal decisions are rooted in their legal traditions and choices and do not attract Charter scrutiny under s. 32. Rowe J. also emphasized that imposing the Charter to Indigenous governments would be contrary to the objective reconciliation since the "philosophical underpinnings of the Charter may not necessarily be commensurate with some Indigenous worldviews…" (para 499).]

Note that it took a majority of the Court over 40 years to given substantive content to s. 25, and some scholars had pointed out its conspicuous absence from consideration in earlier cases involving s. 15 claims and Indigenous peoples: see Jennifer Koshan and Jonnette Watson Hamilton, "Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat – Whither Section 25 of the Charter?" (2016) 25:2 Constitutional Forum- Special Issue 39-44 . Why do you think that is? A majority of the Court had the opportunity to resolve the dispute in R v Kapp, 2008 SCC 41 on the basis of s. 25 (as opposed to s. 15(2)), but declined to do so. In lone reasons in that case, Bastarache J questioned this apparent reluctance to engage with s. 25, linking it to the complex interplay between the Charter and Indigenous jurisdiction, and criticizing the lack of engagement with s. 25: "I think it is unreasonable to suggest that a law should not be applied by this Court because it is too difficult. After all, s. 25 is the only provision in the Charter which makes express reference to aboriginal people, and the Charter is now 25 years old" (at para 100).

What do you make of the Court's effort to give space to s. 35 rights and Indigenous difference from Charter scrutiny in certain case? What types of values should be brought to bear in making such an assessment: reconciliation, self-determination, protection of individual rights, equality?

Both the majority and the dissenting reasons for Martin and O'Bonsawin relied on the United Nations Delcaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples ("UNDRIP") in the interpretation of s. 25. Here, the judges were building on the recognition of the Court in Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5, that one of the effects of the federal law implementing UNDRIP had been to "incorporated [UNDRIP] into the country's domestic positive law" (at paras 4 and 15). In the Reference, the Court cited several UNDRIP articles in support of the pith and substance of the legislation and finding the Act to be within Parliament's jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Beyond this, however, the Court did not provide clear guidance on what "incorporated into the country's domestic positive law" means. But in Dickson, the Court clearly used UNDRIP to interpret Canadian law. To that point, the Court had not used UNDRIP to interpret domestic law, including the Constitution, although some lower courts had. There was different views in the lower courts, however, about whether UNDRIP, as an international instrument, benefitted from the presumption of conformity with international law. (This is a judicial rule of interpretation providing that requires domestic law to be interpreted in conformity with Canada's obligations under international law, in the absence of statutory language to the contrary: see R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26 at paras 53-56.) Some had speculated that in light of guidelines set out by the Court in Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., 2020 SCC 32, on when international law can be used to interpret Charter rights, it was questionable whether UNDRIP could benefit from the presumption of conformity. The majority applied UNDRIP to its interpretation of s. 25 of the Charter without weighing in on this issue, while Justices Martin and O'Bonsawin affirmed their view that the presumption of conformity applies to UNDRIP:

> [317] International human rights law can be a helpful source of information and direction when interpreting Charter provisions. The presumption of conformity directs that the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a protection as that which is afforded by similar provisions in international documents that Canada has ratified (Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act, at p. 349, per Dickson C.J. and Wilson J., dissenting). Binding international instruments carry weight in the Charter interpretation exercise (Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Québec inc., 2020 SCC 32, [2020] 3 S.C.R. 426, at para. 38). In this case, UNDRIP is binding on Canada and therefore triggers the presumption of conformity.

Chapter 13: Charter Antecedents

By Adam Dodek

1 Introduction

When the British North America Act was enacted in 1867 (renamed the Constitution Act, 1867) there was no consideration given to including a written bill of rights. The preamble to the British North America Act stated that Canada was to have "a Constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom". This meant a largely unwritten constitution in which individual rights and freedoms were protected by Parliament and by the courts.

Between 1867 when the Dominion of Canada came into existence and 1982 when the Charter came into force, Canadian legislatures enacted many pieces of discriminatory legislation and other laws which restricted rights and freedoms. Few of these laws were ever challenged in court. When they were, Canadian courts and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council decided these cases based on the division of powers. For example, in 1899 the Privy Council struck down a British Columbia law that prohibited the hiring of "Chinamen" to work in coal mines on the basis the law was ultra vires (beyond the power) of the provincial legislature to enact such a law because the subject matter of "aliens and citizenship" lies with the federal Parliament: see Union Colliery Ltd. v. Bryden, [1899] AC 580, [1899] UKPC 58 (28 July 1899).

Laws like those in Union Colliery were common in western Canada in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Canadian courts generally found that accepted such discriminatory legislation fell within provincial powers, as seen in Quong Wing (1914) below or discriminatory action as in Christie v. York below.

A Note on Language: Some of the language used by the Supreme Court of Canada in the cases in this chapter (and elsewhere) is archaic or offensive. Such language is part of the legal history of this country and should not be erased or edited but rather considered, confronted and critiqued.

1.1 Quong Wing v. The King, 1914 CanLII 608 (SCC), 49 SCR 440.

Supreme Court of Canada, Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, C.J., Davies, ldington, Duff, and Anglin, JJ.

February 23, 1914.

FITZPATRICK, C.J. :-The appellant, a Chinaman and a naturalized Canadian citizen, was convicted of employing white female servants contrary to the provisions of chapter 17 of the statutes of Saskatchewan, 1912, and, for his defence, he contends that the Act in question is ultra vires of the provincial legislature.

It is urged that the aim of the Act is to deprive the defendant and the Chinese generally, whether naturalized or not, of the rights ordinarily enjoyed by the other inhabitants of the Province of Saskatchewan and that the subject-matter of the Act is within the exclusive legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

The Act in question reads as follows:-

1. No person shall employ in any capacity any white woman or girl or permit any white woman or girl to reside or lodge in or to work in or, save as a bona fide customer in a public apartment thereof only, to frequent any restaurant, laundry or other place of business or amusement owned, kept or managed by any Chinaman.
2. Any employer guilty of any contravention or violation of this Act, shall, upon summary conviction be liable to a penalty not exceed ing $100 and, in default of payment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two months.

In terms the section purports merely to regulate places of business and resorts owned and managed by Chinese, independent of nationality, in the interest of the morals of women and girls in Saskatchewan. There are many factory Acts passed by provincial legislatures to fix the age of employment and to pro vide for proper accommodation for workmen and the convenience of the sexes which are intended not only to safeguard the bodily health, but also the morals od: Canadian workers, and I fail to understand the difference in principle between that legislation and this.

It is also undoubted that the legislatures authorize the making by municipalities of disciplinary and police regulations to prevent disorders on Sundays and at night, and in that connection to compel tavern and saloon keepers to close their drinking places at certain hours. Why should those legislatures not have power to enact that women and girls should not be employed in certain industries or in certain places or by a certain class of people? This legislation may affect the civil rights of Chinamen, but it is primarily directed to the protection of children and girls.

The Chinaman is not deprived of the right to employ others, but the classes from which he may select his employees are limited. In certain factories women or children under a certain age are not ·permitted to work at all, and, in others, they may not be employed except subject to certain restrictions in the interest of the employee's bodily and moral welfare. The difference between the restrictions imposed on all Canadians by such legislation and those resulting from the Act in question is one of degree, not of kind.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

DAVIES, J. :

I think the pith and substance of the legislation now before us is entirely different: Its object and purpose is the protection of white women and girls; and the prohibition of their employment or residence, or lodging, or working, etc., in any place of business or amusement owned, kept or managed by any Chinaman is for the purpose o:f ensuring that protection. Such legislation does not, in my judgment, come within the class of legislation or regulation which the Judicial Committee held ultra vires of the provincial legislatures in the case of The Union Collieries v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580.

The right to employ white women in any capacity or in any class of business is a civil right, and legislation upon that subject is clearly within the powers of the provincial legislatures. 'l'he right to guarantee and ensure their protection from a moral standpoint is, in my opinion, within such provincial powers and, if the legislation is bona fide for that purpose, it will be upheld even though it may operate prejudicially to one class or race of people.

There is no doubt in my mind that the prohibition is a racial one and that it does not cease to operate because a Chinaman becomes naturalized. It extends and was intended to extend to all Chinamen as such, naturalized or aliens. Questions which might arise in cases of mixed blood do not arise here.

The Chinaman prosecuted in this case was found to have been born in China and of Chinese parents and, although, at the date of the offence ·charged, he had become a naturalized British subject, and had changed his political allegiance, he had not ceased to be a ''Chinaman'' within the meaning of that word as used in the statute. This would accord with the interpretation of the word "Chinaman" adopted by the judicial committee in the case of The Union Colliery Company v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580.

The prohibition against the employment of white women was not aimed at alien Chinamen simply or at Chinamen having any political affiliation. It was against "any Chinaman" whether owing allegiance to the rulers of the Chinese Empire, or the United States Republic, or the British Crown. In other words, it was not aimed at any class of Chinamen, or at the political status of Chinamen, but at Chinamen as men of a particular race or blood, and whether aliens or naturalized.

For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

lDINGTON, J. (dissenting) :-

The first question raised is whether or not the appellant, who is admitted to have been born in China, of Chinese parents but was at the time of the alleged offence a naturalized British subject, falls within the Act. It is quite clear that the term "any Chinaman'' may, in the plain, ordinary sense of the words, be so construed as to include naturalized British subjects. It is, to my mind, equally clear that, having regard to many considerations, to some of which I am about to advert, a proper and effective meaning may be given to this term without extending it to cover the naturalized British subject.

The Act, by its title, refers to female labour and then proceeds to deal with only the case of white women. In truth, its evident purpose is to curtail or restrict the rights of Chinamen. In view of the provisions of the Naturalization Act, under and pursuant to which the appellant, presumably, has become a naturalized British subject, one must have the gravest doubt if it ever was intended to apply such legislation to one so naturalized.

The political rights given any one, whether naturalized or natural-born British subjects, may in many respects be, limited and varied by the legislation of a province, even if discriminating in favour of one section or class as against another. Some political rights or limitations thereof may be obviously beyond the 'power of such legislature. But the '' other rights, powers and privileges" (if meaning anything) of natural-born British subjects to be shared by naturalized British subjects, do not so dearly fall within the powers of the legislatures to dis criminate with regard to as between classes or sections of the community.

It may well be argued that the highly prized gifts of equal freedom and equal opportunity before the law, are so characteristic of the tendency of all British modes of thinking and acting in relation thereto, that they are not to be impaired by the whims of a legislature; and that equality taken away unless and until forfeited for causes which civilized men recognize as valid. For example, is it competent for a legislature to create a system of slavery and, above all, such a system as applied to naturalized British subjects? This legislation is but a piece of the product of the mode of thought that begot and maintained slavery; not so long ago fiercely claimed to be a laudable system of governing those incapable of governing themselves.

The appellant having, under the Naturalization Act (as I think fair to infer) become a British subject, he has presumably been certified to as a man of good character and enjoying the assurance, conveyed in section thereof which I have quoted, of equal treatment with other British subjects, I shall not willingly impute an intention to the legislature to violate that assurance by this legislation specially aimed at his fellow-countrymen in origin. Indeed, in a piece of legislation alleged to have been promoted in the interests of morality, it would seem a strange thing to find it founded upon a breach of good faith which lies at the root of nearly all morality worth bothering one's head about.

Looked at from this point of view I am constrained to think that this Act must be construed as applicable only to those Chinamen who have not become naturalized British subjects, and ·is not applicable to the appellant who has become such.

Whether it is ultra vires or intra vires the alien Chinamen is a question with which, in this view, I have nothing to do.

I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

N.B. Leave to appeal was refused by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, May 19, 1914.

1.2 Christie v. The York Corporation, 1939 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1940] SCR 139.

Present: Duff C.J. and Rinfret, Crocket, Davis and Kerwin JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF KING'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

The judgment of the Chief Justice and of Rinfret, Crocket and Kerwin JJ. was delivered by Rinfret J.—The appellant, who is a negro, entered a tavern owned and operated by the respondent, in the city of Montreal, and asked to be served a glass of beer; but the waiters refused him for the sole reason that they had been instructed not to serve coloured persons. He claimed the sum of $200 for the humiliation he suffered.

The respondent alleged that in giving such instructions to its employees and in so refusing to serve the appellant it was well within its rights; that its business is a private enterprise for gain; and that, in acting as it did, the respondent was merely protecting its business interests.

It appears from the evidence that, in refusing to sell beer to the appellant, the respondent's employees did so quietly, politely and without causing any scene or commotion whatever. If any notice was attracted to the appellant on the occasion in question, it arose out of the fact that the appellant persisted in demanding beer after he had been so refused and went to the length of calling the police, which was entirely unwarranted by the circumstances.

The learned trial judge awarded the appellant the sum of $25 and costs of the action as brought. The only ground of the judgment was that the rule whereby the respondent refused to serve negroes in its tavern was "illegal," according to sections 19 and 33 of the Quebec Licence Act (Ch. 25 of R.S.P.Q., 1925).

In considering this case, we ought to start from the proposition that the general principle of the law of Quebec is that of complete freedom of commerce. Any merchant is free to deal as he may choose with any individual member of the public. It is not a question of motives or reasons for deciding to deal or not to deal; he is free to do either. The only restriction to this general principle would be the existence of a specific law, or, in the carrying out of the principle, the adoption of a rule contrary to good morals or public order. . . .

This principle was followed by the Court of King's Bench in the case of Loew's Montreal Theatres v. Reynolds (1919) Q.R. 30 K.B. 459, where the facts presented a great deal of similarity with those of the present case. The plaintiff, a coloured man, sued Loew's Theatres Ltd. in damages because he had been denied a seat in the orchestra at its theatre, on account of his colour, for the reason that the management had decided that no person belonging to that race would be admitted to the orchestra seats. The Court decided that the management of a theatre may impose restrictions and make rules of that character.

The only point to be examined therefore is whether sec. 33 of the Quebec Licence Act, upon which the learned trial judge relied in maintaining the appellant's action, applies to the present case.

The view of the majority of the Court of King's Bench was that it did not; and we agree with that interpretation.

Section 33 reads:

> No licensee for a restaurant may refuse, without reasonable cause, to give food to travellers.
> For the purpose of our decision, there are three words to be considered in that section: "restaurant," "food," and "travellers."
> The word "restaurant" is defined in the Act (sec. 19-2):
> > A "restaurant" is an establishment, provided with special space and accommodation, where, in consideration of payment, food (without lodging) is habitually furnished to travellers.
> The word "traveller" is also defined in the same section as follows:
> > A "traveller" is a person who, in consideration of a given price per day, or fraction of a day, on the American or European plan, or per meal, à table d'hôte or à la carte, is furnished by another person with food or lodging, or both.
> With the aid of those two definitions in the Act, we think it must be decided that, in this case, the appellant was not a traveller who was asking to be furnished with food in a restaurant.
> Perhaps, as stated by the learned trial judge, a glass of beer may, in certain cases, be considered as food. But we have no doubt that, in view of the definitions contained in the Act, the appellant was not a traveller asking for food in a restaurant within the meaning of the statute. . . .
> It will be seen therefore that the appellant cannot be brought within the terms of sec. 33 of the Quebec Licence Act. He was not a traveller asking for a meal in a restaurant. According to the definitions, he was only a person asking for a glass of beer in a tavern.
> As the case is not governed by any specific law or more particularly by sec. 33 of the Quebec Licence Act, it falls under the general principle of the freedom of commerce; and it must follow that, when refusing to serve the appellant, the respondent was strictly within its rights.
> . . .
> For these reasons, the appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

[Justice Henry Hague Davis wrote a strong dissent which is worth reading. He took a similar approach to the majority, engaging in statutory construction but reached the opposite result].

2 The Implied Bill of Rights

Despite the absence of a bill of rights, the Supreme Court of Canada found ways to protect rights and freedoms in certain circumstances. Building on the Privy Council's decision in Union Colliery, the Supreme Court of Canada used the division of powers to strike down provincial laws that restricted rights and freedoms. In a series of cases – many of them dealing with the repression of Jehovah's Witnesses in Quebec – the Supreme Court "implied" the existence of certain rights and freedoms from other parts of the Canadian Constitution. These cases have become known as "the implied bill of rights" cases.

The first case - the Alberta Press Case (also known as the Alberta Press Act Reference or the Reference re Alberta Statutes) -- involved a challenge to several statutes enacted by Alberta's Social Credit government in 1937 including the "Accurate News and Information Act" which imposed severe restrictions on freedom of the press, including requiring newspapers to print "clarifications" of stories that a government-appointed Board considered inaccurate and to reveal sources when demanded. The law also empowered the provincial government to prohibit the publication of any article or any newspaper.

2.1 Reference Re Alberta Statutes - The Bank Taxation Act; The Credit of Alberta Regulation Act; and the Accurate News and Information Act, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] SCR 100

> The judgment of Duff C.J. and Davis J. was delivered by
> THE CHIEF JUSTICE.
> . . .
> We now turn to Bill No. 9.
> This Bill contains two substantive provisions. Both of them impose duties upon newspapers published in Alberta which they are required to perform on the demand of " the Chairman," who is, by the interpretation clause, the Chairman of " the Board constituted by section 3 of The Alberta Social Credit Act."
> Under the constitution established by The British North America Act, legislative power for Canada is .vested in one Parliament consisting of the Sovereign, an upper house styled the Senate, and the House of Commons. Without entering in detail upon an. examination of the enactments of the Act relating to the House of Commons, it can be said that these provisions manifestly contemplate a House of Commons which is to be, as the name itself implies, a representative body; constituted, that is to say, by members elected by such of the population of the united provinces as may be qualified to vote. The preamble of the statute, moreover, shows plainly enough that the constitution of the Dominion is to be similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. The statute contemplates a parliament working under the influence of public opinion and public discussion. There can be no controversy that such institutions derive their efficacy from the free public discussion of affairs, from criticism and answer and counter-criticism, from attack upon policy and administration and defence and counter-attack; from the freest and fullest analysis and examination from every point of view of political proposals. This is signally true in respect of the discharge by Ministers of the Crown of their responsibility to Parliament, by members of Parliament of their duty to the electors, and by the electors themselves of their responsibilities in the election of their representatives.
> The right of public discussion is, of course, subject to legal restrictions; those based upon considerations of decency and public order, and others conceived for the protection of various private and public interests with which, for example, the laws of defamation and sedition are concerned.
> But this by no means exhausts the matter. Any attempt to abrogate this right of public debate or to suppress the traditional forms of the exercise of the right (in public meeting and through the press) would, in our opinion, be incompetent to the legislatures of the provinces, or to the legislature of any one of the provinces, as repugnant to the provisions of The British North America Act, by which the Parliament of Canada is established as the legislative organ of the people of Canada under the Crown, and Dominion legislation enacted pursuant to the legislative authority given by those provisions. The subject matter of such legislation could not be described as a provincial matter purely; as in substance exclusively a matter of property and civil rights within the province, or a matter private or local within the province.

The question, discussed in argument, of the validity of the legislation before us, considered as a wholly independent enactment having no relation to the Alberta Social Credit Act, presents no little difficulty. Some degree of regulation of newspapers everybody would concede to the provinces. Indeed, there is a very wide field in which the provinces undoubtedly are invested with legislative authority over newspapers; but the limit, in our opinion, is reached when the legislation effects such a curtailment of the exercise of the right of public discussion as substantially to interfere with the working of the parliamentary institutions of Canada as contemplated by the provisions of The British North America Act and the statutes of the Dominion of Canada. Such a limitation is necessary, in our opinion, "in order," to adapt the words quoted above from the judgment in Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (1887) 12 AC 575, "to afford scope " for the working of such parliamentary institutions. In this region of constitutional practice, it is not permitted to a provincial legislature to do indirectly what cannot be done directly (Great West Saddlery Co. v. The King, 1921 CanLII 408 (UK JCPC), [1921] 2 A.C. 91, at 100*).*

The legislation now under consideration manifestly places in the hands of the Chairman of the Social Credit Commission autocratic powers which, it may well be thought, could, if arbitrarily wielded, be employed to frustrate in Alberta these rights of the Crown and the people of Canada as a whole. We do not, however, find it necessary to express an opinion upon the concrete question whether or not this particular measure is invalid as exceeding the limits indicated above.

The answer to the question concerning this Bill is that it is ultra vires.

Justice Lawrence Cannon wrote a separate opinion in which he held that the Alberta press bill contravened the federal criminal law power (s 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867). The strategy of employing the federal criminal law power to strike down provincial legislation that infringed certain rights and freedoms continued to be used by the Supreme Court of Canada from time to time: see e.g. Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, 1978 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1978[2 SCR 662 (per Laskin CJ, dissenting); and R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 46.

Sometimes the implied bill of rights is more narrowly understood to mean what Justice Abbott suggested in the Alberta Press case – that no government, federal or provincial, could restrict free speech.

It was common for the Supreme Court well into the 1960s for each judge to write their own opinion. This practice was known as "seriatim" opinion writing and could often be quite confusing. In Roncarelli v. Duplessis (1959), there were seven separate opinions. The opinion of Justice Ivan Rand has had the most enduring impact, and it is excerpted below.

2.2 Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] SCR 121

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH, APPEAL SIDE, PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

PRESENT: Kerwin C.J. and Taschereau, Rand, Locke, Cartwright, Fauteux, Abbott, Martland and Judson JJ.

The judgment of Rand and Judson JJ. was delivered by RAND J. :-The material facts from which my conclusion is drawn are these. The appellant was the proprietor of a restaurant in a busy section of Montreal which in 1946 through its transmission to him from his father had been continuously licensed for the sale of liquor for approximately 34 years; he is of good education and repute and the restaurant was of a superior class. On December 4 of that year, while his application for annual renewal was before the Liquor Commission, the existing license was cancelled and his application for renewal rejected, to which was added a declaration by the respondent that no future license would ever issue to him. These primary facts took place in the following circumstances.

For some years the appellant had been an adherent of a rather militant 'Christian religious sect known as the Witnesses of Jehovah. Their ideology condemns the established church institutions and stresses the absolute and exclusive personal relation of the individual to the Deity without human intermediation or intervention.

The first impact of their proselytizing zeal upon the Roman Catholic church and community in Quebec, as might be expected, produced a violent reaction. Meetings were forcibly broken up, property damaged, individuals ordered out of communities, in one case out of the province, and generally, within the cities and towns, bitter controversy aroused. The work of the Witnesses was carried on both by word of mouth and by the distribution of printed matter, the latter including two periodicals known as "The Watch Tower" and "Awake", sold at a small price.

In 1945 the provincial authorities began to take steps to bring an end to what was considered insulting and offensive to the religious beliefs and feelings of the Roman Catholic population. Large scale arrests were made of young men and women, by whom the publications mentioned were being held out for sale, under local by-laws requiring a licence for peddling any kind of wares. Altogether almost one thousand of such charges were laid. The penalty involved in Montreal, where most of the arrests took place, was a fine of $40, and as the Witnesses disputed liability, bail was in all cases resorted to.

The appellant, being a person of some means, was accepted by the Recorder's 'Court as bail without question, and up to November 12, 1946, he had gone security in about 380 cases, some of the accused being involved in repeated offences. Up to this time there had been no suggestion of impropriety; the security of the appellant was taken as so satisfactory that at times, to avoid delay when he was absent from the city, recognizances were signed by him in blank and kept ready for completion by the Court officials. The reason for the accumulation of charges was the doubt that they could be sustained in law. Apparently the legal officers of Montreal, acting in concert with those of the Province, had come to an agreement with the attorney for the Witnesses to have a test case proceeded with. Pending that, however, there was no stoppage of the sale of the tracts and this became the annoying circumstance that produced the volume of proceedings.

On or about November 12 it was decided to require bail in cash for Witnesses so arrested and the sum set ranged from $100 to $300. No such bail was furnished by the appellant; his connection with giving security ended with this change of practice; and in the result, all of the charges in relation to which he had become surety were dismissed.

At no time did he take any part in the distribution of the tracts: he was an adherent of the group but nothing more. It was shown that he had leased to another member premises in Sherbrooke which were used as a hall for carrying on religious meetings: but it is unnecessary to do more than mention that fact to reject it as having no bearing on the issues raised. Beyond the giving of bail and being an adherent, the appellant is free from any relation that could be tortured into a badge of character pertinent to his fitness or unfitness to hold a liquor licence.

The mounting resistance that stopped the surety bail sought other means of crushing the propagandist invasion and among the circumstances looked into was the situation of the appellant. Admittedly an adherent, he was enabling these protagonists to be at large to carry on their campaign of publishing what they believed to be the Christian truth as revealed by the Bible; he was also the holder of a liquor licence, a "privilege" granted by the Province, the profits from which, as it was seen by the authorities, he was using to promote the disturbance of settled beliefs and arouse community disaffection generally. Following discussions between the then Mr. Archambault, as the personality of the Liquor Commission, and the chief prosecuting officer in Montreal, the former, on or about November 21, telephoned to the respondent, advised him of those facts, and queried what should be done. Mr. Duplessis answered that the matter was serious and that the identity of the person furnishing bail and the liquor licensee should be put beyond doubt. A few days later, that identity being established through a private investigator, Mr. Archambault again communicated with the respondent and, as a result of what passed between them, the licence, as of December 4, 1946, was revoked.

In the meantime, about November 25, 1946, a blasting answer had come from the Witnesses. In an issue of one of the periodicals, under the heading "Quebec's Burning Hate", was a searing denunciation of what was alleged to be the savage persecution of Christian believers. Immediately instructions were sent out from the department of the Attorney-General ordering the confiscation of the issue and proceedings were taken against one Boucher charging him with publication of a seditious libel.

It is then wholly as a private citizen, an adherent of a religious group, holding a liquor licence and furnishing bail to arrested persons for no other purpose than to enable them to be released from detention pending the determination of the charges against them, and with no other relevant considerations to be taken into account, that he is involved in the issues of this controversy.

The complementary state of things is equally free from doubt. From the evidence of Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Archambault alone, it appears that the action taken by the latter as the general manager and sole member of the Commission was dictated by Mr. Duplessis as Attorney-General and Prime Minister of the province; that that step was taken as a means of bringing to a halt the activities of the Witnesses, to punish the appellant for the part he had played not only by revoking the existing licence but in declaring him barred from one "forever", and to warn others that they similarly would be stripped of provincial "privileges" if they persisted in any activity directly or indirectly related to the Witnesses and to the objectionable campaign. The respondent felt that action to be his duty, something which his conscience demanded of him; and as representing the provincial government his decision became automatically that of Mr. Archambault and the Commission.

In these circumstances, when the de facto power of the Executive over its appointees at will to such a statutory public function is exercised deliberately and intentionally to destroy the vital business interests of a citizen, is there legal redress by him against the person so acting? This calls for an examination of the statutory provisions governing the issue, renewal and revocation of liquor licences and the scope of authority entrusted by law to the Attorney-General and the government in relation to the administration of the Act.

The provisions of the statute, which may be supplemented by detailed regulations, furnish a code for the complete administration of the sale and distribution of alcoholic liquors directed by the Commission as a public service, for all legitimate purposes of the populace. It recognizes the association of wines and liquors as embellishments of food and its ritual and as an interest of the public. As put in Macbeth, the "sauce to meat is ceremony", and so we have restaurants, cafés, hotels and other places of serving food, specifically provided for in that association.

At the same time the issue of permits has a complementary interest in those so catering to the public. The continuance of the permit over the years, as in this case, not only recognizes its virtual ncessity [sic] to a superior class restaurant but also its identification with the business carried on. The provisions for assignment of the permit are to this most pertinent and they were exemplified in the continuity of the business here. As its exercise continues, the economic life of the holder becomes progressively more deeply implicated with the privilege while at the same time his vocation becomes correspondingly dependent on it.

The field of licensed occupations and businesses of this nature is steadily becoming of greater concern to citizens generally. It is a matter of vital importance that a public administration that can refuse to allow a person to enter or continue a calling which, in the absence of regulation, would be free and legitimate, should be conducted with complete impartiality and integrity; and that the grounds for refusing or cancelling a permit should unquestionably be such and such only as are incompatible with the purposes envisaged by the statute: the duty of a Commission is to serve those purposes and those only. A decision to deny or cancel such a privilege lies within the "discretion" of the Commission; but that means that decision is to be based upon a weighing of considerations pertinent to the object of the administration.

In public regulation of this sort there is no such thing as absolute and untrammelled "discretion", that is that action can be taken on any ground or for any reason that can be suggested to the mind of the administrator; no legislative Act can, without express language, be taken to contemplate an unlimited arbitrary power exercisable for any purpose, however capricious or irrelevant, regardless of the nature or purpose of the statute. Fraud and corruption in the 'Commission may not be mentioned in such statutes but they are always implied as exceptions. "Discretion" necessarily implies good faith in discharging public duty; there is always a perspective within which a statute is intended to operate; and any clear departure from its lines or objects is just as objectionable as fraud or corruption. Could an applicant be refused a permit because he had been born in another province, or because of the colour of his hair? The ordinary language of the legislature cannot be so distorted.

To deny or revoke a permit because a citizen exercises an unchallengeable right totally irrelevant to the sale of liquor in a restaurant is equally beyond the scope of the discretion conferred. There was here not only revocation of the existing permit but a declaration of a future, definitive disqualification of the appellant to obtain one: it was to be "forever". This purports to divest his citizenship status of its incident of membership in the class of those of the public to whom such a privilege could be extended. Under the statutory language here, that is not competent to the Commission and a fortiori to the government or the respondent: McGillivray v. Kimber (1915), 1915 CanLII 608 (SCC), 52 SCR 146. There is here an administrative tribunal which, in certain respects, is to act in a judicial manner; and even on the view of the dissenting justices in McGillivray, there is liability: what could be more malicious than to punish this licensee for having done what he had an absolute right to do in a matter utterly irrelevant to the Liquor Act? Malice in the proper sense is simply acting for a reason and purpose knowingly foreign to the administration, to which was added here the element of intentional punishment by what was virtually vocation outlawry.

The act of the respondent through the instrumentality of the Commission brought about a breach of an implied public statutory duty toward the appellant; it was a gross abuse of legal power expressly intended to punish him for an act wholly irrelevant to the statute, a punishment which inflicted on him, as it was intended to do, the destruction of his economic life as a restaurant keeper within the province. Whatever may be the immunity of the Commission or its member from an action for damages, there is none in the respondent. He was under no duty in relation to the appellant and his act was an instrusion [sic!] upon the functions of a statutory body. The injury done by him was a, fault engaging liability within the principles of the underlying public law of Quebec: Mostyn v. Fabrigas, 98 E.R. 1021, and under art. 1053 of the Civil Code. That, in the presence of expanding administrative regulation of economic activities, such ,a step and its consequences are to be suffered by the victim without recourse or remedy, that an administration according to law is to be superseded by action dictated by and according to the arbitrary > likes, dislikes and irrelevant purposes of public officers acting beyond their duty, would signalize the beginning of disintegration of the rule of law as a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure. An administration of licences on the highest level of fair and impartial treatment to all may be forced to follow the practice of "first come, first served", which makes the strictest observance of equal responsibility to all of even greater importance; at this stage of developing government it would be a danger of high con-sequence to tolerate such a departure from good faith in executing the legislative purpose.

> I would therefore allow the appeals, set aside the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench and restore the judgment at trial modified by increasing the damages to the sum of $33,123.53. The appellant should have his costs in the Court of Queen's Bench and in this Court.

Roncarelli v. Duplessis was part of a quartet of cases involving Jehovah's Witnesses in Quebec decided by the Supreme Court in the 1950s that formed part of the implied bill of rights. In 1951, the Supreme Court had overturned a conviction for seditious libel against a Jehovah's Witness who had distributed pamphlets entitled "Quebec's Burning Hate for God and Christ and Freedom is the Shame of All Canada" which criticized the government of Quebec's suppression and persecution of Jehovah's Witnesses in the province: Boucher v. The King, 1950 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1951] SCR 265. A year later, the Supreme Court struck down a Quebec City by-law which prohibited the distribution of pamphlets in the streets without permission from the chief of police: Saumur v. The City of Quebec, 1953 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1953] 2 SCR 299. And in 1955, the high court allowed a homeowner who had hosted a Jehovah's Witnesses meeting that was broken up by police to sue the police for damages caused by them to his property in the raid: Chaput v. Romain, 1955 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1955] SCR 834. See also Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] SCR 285 (the Padlock Law case).

For a profile of Frank Roncarelli see the chapter in Adam Dodek et al., Constitutional Challengers: The Heroes, Villains, and Crusaders Behind Canada's Biggest Cases (Toronto: Dundurn, 2026).

There are many articles that have been written about Roncarelli v. Duplessis. See for example Eric M. Adams, "Building a Law of Human Rights: Roncarelli v. Duplessis in Canadian Constitutional Culture" (2010) 55:3 McGill Law Journal 437 and David Mullan, "Roncarelli v. Duplessis and Damages for Abuse of Power: For What Did it Stand in 1959 and For What Does it Stand in 2009?" (2010) 55:3 McGill Law Journal 587.

We should not exaggerate the impact of the "implied bill of rights" cases on the lives of Canadians before 1982. The implied bill of rights had next to no impact on some of the worst instances of deprivation of rights in Canadian history: the internment of Japanese-Canadians during World War II, their subsequent deportation to Japan after the war and discrimination against Indigenous Peoples in Canada, most notably Indian Residential Schools. See Eric M. Adams & Jordan Stanger-Ross, Challenging Exile: Japanese Canadians and the Wartime Constitution (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2025).

Moreover, despite the victory in the Persons Case, women achieved few victories for women's rights in the courts during these years. The recognition and advancement of women's rights in the first six decades of the 20th century was largely achieved in the political realm – through law reform – not through the courts.

Consider the circumstances where legislatures may be better suited than the courts to protect and advance rights and vice versa.

3 The Canadian Bill of Rights

3.1 Introduction

After World War II, revelations of the horrors of the Holocaust helped spur the development of an international human rights culture. In 1948, the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. At its core, the Universal Declaration recognized the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family. This idea that individuals had certain rights and were entitled to protection simply by virtue of being human and not because they were granted rights or protection by governments, leaders or states was a radical departure from past practice. Canadian leadership played an important role in the drafting and the adoption of the Universal Declaration.

In Canada, there was growing recognition of rights abuses that had taken place in our country; most notably the internment of Japanese-Canadians during World War II, discrimination against Chinese Canadians, repression against certain religious minorities, etc.

In 1960, the government of Progressive Conservative Prime Minister John Diefenbaker enacted the Canadian Bill of Rights. Diefenbaker hailed from Saskatchewan and he had experienced discrimination because of his German last name and in his criminal defence practice he defended many marginalized individuals who had been discriminated against.

The Canadian Bill of Rights was an important milestone in the history of rights-protection in Canada. However, its reach was limited. First, it was not part of the Constitution; it was a statutory bill of rights. One of the key issues that would arise was the extent to which "the Bill" (as it came to be called) prevailed over other statutes. Second, it only applied to federal laws and actions of the federal executive or federal bodies. It had no application to provincial laws or actions. Thus, the Bill would not have had any relevance to the "implied bill of rights" cases discussed above which all involved provincial statutes or provincial action. Finally, the Bill only protected a limited number of rights. The text of the Bill is short and it is reproduced in its entirety below.

3.2 Canadian Bill of Rights, S.C. 1960, c. 44

> An Act for the Recognition and Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms
> Preamble
> The Parliament of Canada, affirming that the Canadian Nation is founded upon principles that acknowledge the supremacy of God, the dignity and worth of the human person and the position of the family in a society of free men and free institutions;
> Affirming also that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon respect for moral and spiritual values and the rule of law;
> And being desirous of enshrining these principles and the human rights and fundamental freedoms derived from them, in a Bill of Rights which shall reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority and which shall ensure the protection of these rights and freedoms in Canada:
> Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:
> PART I Bill of Rights

Recognition and declaration of rights and freedoms

1 It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

Construction of law

2 Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to

(a) authorize or effect the arbitrary detention, imprisonment or exile of any person;

(b) impose or authorize the imposition of cruel and unusual treatment or punishment;

(c) deprive a person who has been arrested or detained

(i) of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention,

(f) deprive a person charged with a criminal offence of the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal, or of the right to reasonable bail without just cause; or

(g) deprive a person of the right to the assistance of an interpreter in any proceedings in which he is involved or in which he is a party or a witness, before a court, commission, board or other tribunal, if he does not understand or speak the language in which such proceedings are conducted.

Duties of Minister of Justice

3 (1) Subject to subsection (2), the Minister of Justice shall, in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council, examine every regulation transmitted to the Clerk of the Privy Council for registration pursuant to the Statutory Instruments Act and every Bill introduced in or presented to the House of Commons by a Minister of the Crown, in order to ascertain whether any of the provisions thereof are inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this Part and he shall report any such inconsistency to the House of Commons at the first convenient opportunity.

Exception

(2) A regulation need not be examined in accordance with subsection (1) if prior to being made it was examined as a proposed regulation in accordance with section 3 of the Statutory Instruments Act to ensure that it was not inconsistent with the purposes and provisions of this Part.

Short title

4 The provisions of this Part shall be known as the Canadian Bill of Rights.

Part II

Savings

5 (1) Nothing in Part I shall be construed to abrogate or abridge any human right or fundamental freedom not enumerated therein that may have existed in Canada at the commencement of this Act.

"Law of Canada" defined

(2) The expression "law of Canada" in Part I means an Act of the Parliament of Canada enacted before or after the coming into force of this Act, any order, rule or regulation thereunder, and any law in force in Canada or in any part of Canada at the commencement of this Act that is subject to be repealed, abolished or altered by the Parliament of Canada.

Jurisdiction of Parliament

(3) The provisions of Part I shall be construed as extending only to matters coming within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

3.3 Interpretation of the Bill of Rights

There was only one occasion where the Supreme Court declared a law inoperative because of its conflict with the Bill of Rights. This occurred in 1969 in R. v. Drybones, 1969 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1970] SCR 282. The impact of Drybones was seriously limited in Attorney General of Canada v. Lavell, 1973 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1974] SCR 1349.

3.3.1 The Queen v. Drybones, 1969 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1970] SCR 282

Present: Cartwright C.J. and Fauteux, Abbott, Mart-land, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, Spence and Pigeon JJ.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR THE NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

The judgment of Fauteux, Martland, Judson, Ritchie and Spence JJ. was delivered by

RITCHIE J.-This is an appeal brought with leave of this Court from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for the Northwest Territories dismissing an appeal by the Crown from a judgment of Mr. Justice W. G. Morrow of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories[1] by which he had acquitted Joseph Drybones of being "unlawfully intoxicated off a reserve" contrary to s. 94(b) of the Indian Act, R.S.C.1952, c. 149, after having heard an appeal by way of trial de novo from a judgment of Magistrate Anderson-Thompson who had convicted the respondent of this offence and sentenced him to be fined $10 and costs and in default to spend three days in custody. The full charge against Drybones was that he,

> On or about the 8th of April, 1967 at Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories, being an Indian, was unlawfully intoxicated off a reserve, contrary to s. 94(0 of the Indian Act.

The respondent is an Indian and he was indeed intoxicated on the evening of April 8, 1967, on the premises of the Old Stope Hotel in Yellowknife in the Northwest Territories where there is no "reserve" within the meaning of the Indian Act.

When he was first arraigned before Magistrate Anderson-Thompson, Drybones, who spoke no English, pleased guilty to this offence, but on appeal to the Territorial Court, Mr. Justice Morrow found that there was some serious doubt as to whether he fully appreciated his plea in the lower court and he was allowed to withdraw that plea whereafter the appeal proceeded as a trial de novo with a plea of not guilty. Section 94 of the Indian Act reads as follows:

> 94. An Indian who
> (a) has intoxicants in his possession,
> (b) is intoxicated, or
> (c) makes or manufactures intoxicants off a re-serve, is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine of not less than ten dollars and not more than fifty dollars or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months or to both fine and imprisonment.

The important question raised by this appeal has its origin in the fact that in the Northwest Territories it is not an offence for anyone except an Indian to be intoxicated otherwise than in a public place. The Liquor Ordinance which is of general application in the Territories, (R.O.N. W.T. 1957, c. 60, s. 19(1)) provides that:

> No person shall be in an intoxicated condition in a public place....

but unlike s. 94 of the Indian Act, there is no provision for a minimum fine and the maximum term of imprisonment is only 30 days as opposed to 3 months under the Indian Act.

The result is that an Indian who is intoxicated in his own home "off a reserve" is guilty of an offence and subject to a minimum fine of not less than $10 or a term of imprisonment not exceeding 3 months or both, whereas all other citizens in the Territories may, if they see fit, become intoxicated otherwise than in a public place without committing any offence at all….

The argument which was successfully advanced by the respondent before Mr. Justice Morrow and before the Court of Appeal was that because of this legislation, Indians in the Northwest Territories, by reason of their race, are denied "equality before the law" with their fellow Canadians, and that s. 94(b) of the Indian Act therefore authorizes the abrogation, abridgement or infringement of one of the human rights and fundamental freedoms recognized and declared as existing in Canada without discrimination by reason of race, pursuant to the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights, Statutes of Canada 8-9 Eliz. II, c. 44 (hereinafter sometimes referred to as "The Bill of Rights" or "The Bill") . . .

It seems to me that a more realistic meaning must be given to the words in question and they afford, in my view, the clearest indication that s. 2 [of the Bill] is intended to mean and does mean that if a law of Canada cannot be "sensibly construed and applied" so that it does not abrogate, abridge or infringe one of the rights and freedoms recognized and declared by the Bill, then such law is in-operative "unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights".

The right which is here at issue is "the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law". Mr. Justice Tysoe, who wrote the reasons for judgment on behalf of the majority of the Court of Appeal of British Columbia [in] the Gonzales case, supra, [Regina v. Gonzales (1962) 1962 CanLII 348 (BC CA)], expressed the opinion that as these words occur in the Bill of Rights they mean

> A right of every person to whom a particular law relates or extends, no matter what may be a person's race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, to stand on an equal footing with every other person to whom a particular law relates or extends and a right to the protection of the law.
> (The italics are Mr. Justice Tysoe's)

Like the members of the courts below, I cannot agree with this interpretation pursuant to which it seems to me that the most glaring discriminatory legislation against a racial group would have to be construed as recognizing the right of each of its individual members "to equality before the law", so long as all the other members are being discriminated against in the same way.

I think that the word "law" as used in s. 1(b) of the Bill of Rights is to be construed as meaning "the law of Canada" as defined in s. 5(2) (i.e. Acts of the Parliament of Canada and any orders, rules or regulations thereunder) and without attempting any exhaustive definition of "equality before the law" I think that s. 1(b) means at least that no individual or group of individuals is to be treated more harshly than another under that law, and I am therefore of opinion that an individual is denied equality be-fore the law if it is made an offence punishable at law, on account of his race, for him to do something which his fellow Canadians are free to do without having committed any offence or having been made subject to any penalty.

For all the above reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)-

There is no doubt that on the facts, the respondent was guilty of a breach of s. 94(b) of the Indian Act and the question to be decided is whether that provision is rendered inoperative by the terms of the Canadian Bill of Rights. . .

In approaching this question I will assume the correctness of the view that s. 94(b) infringes the right of the respondent to equality before the law declared by clause (b) of s. 1 of the Bill, in that because he is an Indian it renders him guilty of a punishable offence by reason of conduct which would not have been punishable if indulged in by any person who was not an Indian.

In the case at bar s. 94(b) of the Indian Act is expressed in plain and unequivocal words. It is not possible by the application of any rule of construction to give it a meaning other than that an Indian who is intoxicated off a reserve is guilty of an offence.

In these circumstances the choice open to us is to give effect to the section according to its plain meaning or to declare it inoperative, that is to say, to declare that the Indian Act is pro tanto repealed by the Bill.

The question is whether or not it is the intension of Parliament to confer the power and impose the responsibility upon the courts of declaring inoperative any provision in a Statute of Canada although expressed in clear and unequivocal terms, the meaning of which after calling in aid every rule of construction including that prescribed by s. 2 of the Bill is perfectly plain, if in the view of the court it infringes any of the rights or freedoms declared by s. 1 of the Bill.

In approaching this question it must not be forgotten that the responsibility mentioned above, if imposed at all, is imposed upon every justice of the peace, magistrate and judge of any court in the country who is called upon to apply a Statute of Canada or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

If it were intended that the question should be answered in the affirmative there would, in my opinion, have been added after the word "declared" in the seventh line of the opening paragraph of s. 2 of the Bill some such words as the following "and if any law of Canada cannot be so construed and applied it shall be regarded as inoperative or pro tanto repealed".

For these reasons I would dispose of the appeal as proposed by my brother Pigeon.

PIGEON J. (dissenting)-

There can be no doubt that in enacting legislation Parliament is presumed to be aware of the state of the law (Walker v. The King, 1939 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1939] SCR 214). A fortiori must it be so when the enactment itself has reference thereto. Where is the extent of existing human rights and fundamental freedoms to be ascertained if not by reference to the statute books and other legislative instruments as well as to the decisions of the courts?

It must also be considered that the rights and freedoms enumerated in s. 1 are not legal concepts of precise and invariable content. If those words were to be taken by themselves, a great deal would be left undefined. However, by declaring those rights and freedoms as they existed a large measure of precision was supplied. Is this not an important purpose of s. 1 and a very effective way of defining some key words of the enactment?

In the instant case, the question whether all existing legislation should be considered as in accordance with the non-discrimination principle cannot fail to come immediately to mind seeing that it arises directly out of head 24 of s. 91 of the B.N.A. Act whereby Parliament has exclusive legislative authority over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians". . . . this provision confers legislative authority over the Indians qua Indians and not otherwise. Its very object in so far as it relates to Indians, as opposed to Lands reserved for the Indians, is to enable the Parliament of Canada to make legislation applicable only to Indians as such and therefore not applicable to Canadian citizens generally. This legislative authority is obviously intended to be exercised over matters that are, as regards persons other than Indians, within the exclusive legislative authority of the Provinces. Complete uniformity in provincial legislation is clearly not to be expected, not to mention the fact that further diversity must also result from special legislation for the territories. Equality before the law in the sense in which it was understood in the Courts below would require the Indians to be subject in every province to the same rules of law as all others in every particular not merely on the question of drunkenness. Outside the territories, provincial jurisdiction over education and health facilities would make it very difficult for federal authorities to provide such facilities to Indians without "discrimination" as understood in the Courts below.

If one of the effects of the Canadian Bill of Rights is to render inoperative all legal pro-visions whereby Indians as such are not dealt with in the same way as the general public, the conclusion is inescapable that Parliament, by the enactment of the Bill, has not only fundamentally altered the status of the Indians in that indirect fashion but has also made any future use of federal legislative authority over them subject to the requirement of expressly declaring every time "that the law shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights". I find it very difficult to believe that Parliament so intended when enacting the Bill. If a virtual suppression of federal legislation over Indians as such was meant, one would have expected this important change to be made explicitly not surreptitiously so to speak.

I fail to see how it can be considered that by taking this to be the fundamental intention, the apparent character of the Bill is not fully recognized. I also fail to see how it can be said that to read s. 2 as little more than a rule of construction is to fail to give effect to the Bill. On what basis is it assumed that anything else was intended in an act that is not of a constitutional character?

That canons of construction are of less importance than constitutional rules does not mean that they are of minimal importance. For instance, in our legal system, the rule against retrospective operation of enactments as well as the principle that a criminal offence requires means rea are nothing more than canons of construction. It certainly does not mean that they are of secondary importance.

On the whole, I cannot find in the Canadian Bill of Rights anything clearly showing that Parliament intended to establish concerning human rights and fundamental freedoms some overriding general principles to be enforced by the courts against the clearly expressed will of Parliament in statutes existing at the time. In my opinion, Parliament did nothing more than instruct the courts to construe and apply those laws in accordance with the principles enunciated in the Bill on the basis that the recognized rights and freedoms did exist, not that they were to be brought into existence by the courts.

For those reasons I would allow the appeal, reverse the judgments of the Court of Appeal and of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories, and re-establish the conviction and sentence. In view of the terms of the order granting leave to appeal, it is presumed that suitable arrangements have been made for the costs of re-presentation of the respondent and therefore, no order requires to be made in that regard.

3.3.2 Attorney General of Canada v. Lavell, 1973 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1974] SCR 1349

Present: Fauteux C.J. and Abbott, Martland, Judson, Ritchie, Hall, Spence, Pigeon and Laskin JJ.

The judgment of Fauteux C.J., and Martland, Judson and Ritchie was delivered by

RITCHIE J.— . . .

These appeals, which were heard together, are from two judgments holding that the provisions of s. 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. I-6, are rendered inoperative by s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, 1960 (Can.), c. 44, as denying equality before the law to the two respondents.

Both respondents were registered Indians and "Band" members within the meaning of s. 11(b) of the Indian Act when they elected to marry non-Indians and thereby relinquished their status as Indians in conformity with the said s. 12(1)(b) which reads as follows:

> 12. (1) The following persons are not entitled to be registered, namely,
> (b) a woman who married a person who is not an Indian, unless that woman is subsequently the wife or widow of a person described in section 11.

It is contended on behalf of both respondents that s. 12(1)(b) of the Act should be held to be inoperative as discriminating between Indian men and women and as being in conflict with the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights and particularly s. 1 thereof which provides:

> 1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,…
> (b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;…

I think it desirable at the outset to outline the facts concerning the two respondents separately.

1. Mrs. Lavell—This woman was a member of the Wikwemikong Band of Indians who married a non-Indian and whose name was deleted from the Indian Register by the Registrar in charge thereof pursuant to the provisions of section 12(1)(b) of the Act. An appeal was taken from the Registrar's decision and was heard before His Honour Judge Grossberg . . . before whom evidence was taken which disclosed that at the time of the hearing and for some nine years before her marriage Mrs. Lavell had not lived on any Reserve except for sporadic visits to her family, and the learned judge declined to accept the suggestion that she could not visit her family on the Reserve whenever she wished. Mrs. Lavell did not claim to have been deprived of any property rights on the Reserve except those incidental to the right as a Band member.

Judge Grossberg having found that in his opinion section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act was not rendered inoperative by the Bill of Rights an appeal was taken from his judgment to the Federal Court of Appeal where a judgment was rendered by Mr. Justice Thurlow who concluded his opinion by saying of section 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act:

> These provisions are thus laws which abrogate, abridge and infringe the right of an individual Indian woman to equality with other Indians before the law. Though this is not a situation in which an act is made punishable at law on account of race or sex, it is one in which under the provisions here in question the consequences of the marriage of an Indian woman to a person who is not an Indian are worse for her than for other Indians who marry non-Indians and than for other Indians of her band who marry persons who are not Indians. In my opinion this offends the right of such an Indian woman as an individual to equality before the law and the Canadian Bill of Rights therefore applied to render the provisions in question inoperative.
> (The italics are my own.)

It is from this judgment that the Crown now appeals.

2. Mrs. Bédard—In this case the respondent sought an injunction restraining the members of the Six Nations Council from expelling her and her two infant children from the home she occupied on the Six Nations Indian Reserve in the County of Brant, and an order setting aside a resolution passed by the Council ordering her to dispose of such property. By agreement an additional claim was added for a declaratory judgment concerning the respective rights of the parties.

Mrs. Bédard was born on the Six Nations Indian Reserve of Indian parents and she married a non-Indian in May, 1964, by whom she had two children and with whom she resided off the Reserve until June 23, 1970 when, having separated from her husband, she returned to the Reserve to live in a house on a property to which her mother had held a Certificate of Possession under s. 20 of the Indian Act and which had been bequeathed to her under her mother's will which had been approved by the Council of the Six Nations and on behalf of the Minister of Indian Affairs as required by the Indian Act, (section 45(3)) on August 7, 1969.

When Mrs. Bédard returned to the Reserve with her children in 1970 to occupy her mother's house, the Council passed a series of resolutions giving her permission to reside on the Reserve for a period of six months during which she was to dispose of the property, and extending this permission for a further eight months, after which any further requests for her continued residence would be denied. In accordance with these resolutions this respondent conveyed her interest in the property in question to her brother who was a registered member of the Six Nations Band, and to whom a Certificate of Possession of the property was granted on March 15, 1971 by the Minister. Her brother, however, permitted Mrs. Bédard and her infant children to continue occupying the premises without rent, but the Band Council passed a further resolution on September 15, 1971 by which it was resolved that the Brant District Supervisor should be requested to serve a notice to quit the Reserve upon this respondent. It should be noted that the writ instituting this action was issued on September 14, 1971, more than a year after the brother had obtained his Certificate of Possession and that no notice to quit has been served on Mrs. Bédard pursuant to the resolution which was passed after the writ was issued.

Mrs. Bédard's case was heard by Mr. Justice Osler in the Supreme Court of Ontario where it was contended that the Council's request to the District Supervisor and any action taken by the Supervisor pursuant to such request, and the removal of her name from the Band list simply because of her marriage to a non-Indian, are actions that discriminate against her by reason of her race and sex and deny her "equality before the law". Mr. Justice Osler, basing his decision on the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal in the Lavell case, concluded that:

> Section 12(1)(b) of the Act is… inoperative and all acts of the Council Band and of the District Supervisor purporting to be based on the provisions of that section can be of no effect.

Leave to appeal from this judgment was granted by order of this Court on January 25, 1972.

The contention which formed the basis of the argument submitted by both respondents was that they had been denied equality before the law by reason of sex, and I propose to deal with the matter on this basis.

There cannot, in my view, be any doubt that whatever may have been achieved by the Bill of Rights, it is not effective to amend or in any way alter the terms of the British North America Act and it is clear from the third recital in the preamble that the Bill was intended to "reflect the respect of Parliament for its constitutional authority…" so that wherever any question arises as to the effect of any of the provisions of the Bill, it is to be resolved within the framework of the B.N.A. Act.

It follows, in my view, that the effect of the Bill of Rights on the Indian Act can only be considered in light of the provisions of s. 91(24) of the B.N.A. Act whereby the subject of "Indians and lands reserved for Indians" is assigned exclusively to the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada.

In my opinion the exclusive legislative authority vested in Parliament under s. 91(24) could not have been effectively exercised without enacting laws establishing the qualifications required to entitle persons to status as Indians and to the use and benefit of Crown "lands reserved for Indians". The legislation enacted to this end was, in my view, necessary for the implementation of the authority so vested in Parliament under the constitution.

To suggest that the provisions of the Bill of Rights have the effect of making the whole Indian Act inoperative as discriminatory is to assert that the Bill has rendered Parliament powerless to exercise the authority entrusted to it under the constitution of enacting legislation which treats Indians living on Reserves differently from other Canadians in relation to their property and civil rights. The proposition that such a wide effect is to be given to the Bill of Rights was expressly reserved by the majority of this Court in the case of The Queen v. Drybones, at 298, to which reference will hereafter be made, and I do not think that it can be sustained.

What is at issue here is whether the Bill of Rights is to be construed as rendering inoperative one of the conditions imposed by Parliament for the use and occupation of Crown lands reserved for Indians. These conditions were imposed as a necessary part of the structure created by Parliament for the internal administration of the life of Indians on Reserves and their entitlement to the use and benefit of Crown lands situate thereon, they were thus imposed in discharge of Parliament's constitutional function under s. 91(24) and in my view can only be changed by plain statutory language expressly enacted for the purpose. It does not appear to me that Parliament can be taken to have made or intended to make such a change by the use of broad general language directed at the statutory proclamation of the fundamental rights and freedoms enjoyed by all Canadians, and I am therefore of opinion that the Bill of Rights had no such effect.

It was stressed on behalf of the respondents that the provisions of s. 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act constituted "discrimination by reason of sex" and that the section could be declared inoperative on this ground alone even if such discrimination did not result in the infringement of any of the rights and freedoms specifically guaranteed by s. 1 of the Bill.

. . . in my view, [sections 1 and 2 of the Bill] cannot be invoked unless one of the enumerated rights and freedoms has been denied to an individual Canadian or group of Canadians. Section 2 of the Bill or Rights provides for the manner in which the rights and freedoms which are recognized and declared by s. 1 are to be enforced and the effect of this section is that every law of Canada shall "be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights and freedoms herein recognized and declared…" (i.e. by s. 1). There is no language anywhere in the Bill of Rights stipulating that the laws of Canada are to be construed without discrimination unless that discrimination involves the denial of one of the guaranteed rights and freedoms, but when, as in the case of The Queen v. Drybones, supra, denial of one of the enumerated rights is occasioned by reason of discrimination, then, as Mr. Justice Laskin has said, the discrimination affords an "additional lever to which federal legislation must respond."

The opening words of s. 2 of the Bill of Rights are, in my view, determinative of the test to be applied in deciding whether the section here impugned is to be declared inoperative. The words to which I refer are:

> 2. Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or authorize the abrogation, abridgement of infringement of the freedoms herein recognized and declared…

In the course of the reasons for judgment rendered on behalf of the majority of this Court in The Queen v. Drybones, supra, this language was interpreted in the following passage at p. 294:

> It seems to me that a more realistic meaning must be given to the words in question and they afford, in my view, the clearest indication that s. 2 is intended to mean and does mean that if a law of Canada cannot be 'sensibly construed and applied' so that it does not abrogate, abridge or infringe one of the rights and freedoms, recognized and declared by the Bill, then such law is inoperative 'unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights'.

Accordingly, in my opinion, the question to be determined in these appeals is confined to deciding whether the Parliament of Canada in defining the prerequisites of Indian status so as not to include women of Indian birth who have chosen to marry non-Indians, enacted a law which cannot be sensibly construed and applied without abrogating, abridging or infringing the rights of such women to equality before the law.

In my view the meaning to be given to the language employed in the Bill of Rights is the meaning which it bore in Canada at the time when the Bill was enacted, and it follows that the phrase "equality before the law" is to be construed in light of the law existing in Canada at that time.

In considering the meaning to be attached to "equality before the law" as those words occur in section 1(b) of the Bill, I think it important to point out that in my opinion this phrase is not effective to invoke the egalitarian concept exemplified by the 14th Amendment of the U.S. Constitution as interpreted by the courts of that country. (See Smythe v. The Queen per Fauteux C.J. at pp. 683 and 686). I think rather that, having regard to the language employed in the second paragraph of the preamble to the Bill of Rights, the phrase "equality before the law" as used in s. 1 is to be read in its context as a part of "the rule of law" to which overriding authority is accorded by the terms of that paragraph.

[Justice Ritchie referred to the classic understanding of the 'rule of law" in England, including "equality before the law or the equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land administered by the ordinary courts; the 'rule of law' in this sense excludes the idea of any exemption of officials or others from the duty of obedience to the law which governs other citizens or from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts." He cited discussion of Roncarelli v. Duplessis (1959) in support of this proposition].

The relevance of these quotations to the present circumstances is that "equality before the law" as recognized by Dicey as a segment of the rule of law, carries the meaning of equal subjection of all classes to the ordinary law of the land as administered by the ordinary courts, and in my opinion the phrase "equally before the law" as employed in section 1(b) of the Bill of Rights is to be treated as meaning equality in the administration or application of the law by the law enforcement authorities and the ordinary courts of the land. This construction is, in my view, supported by the provisions of subsections (a) to (g) of s. 2 of the Bill which clearly indicate to me that it was equality in the administration and enforcement of the law with which Parliament was concerned when it guaranteed the continued existence of "equality before the law".

It is thus apparent that the marital status of Indian women who marry non-Indians has been the same for at least one hundred years and that their loss of Band status on marriage to a member of another Band and acquisition of status in that Band, for which provision is made under s. 14 of the Indian Act, has been in effect for the same period.

The Drybones case can, in my opinion, have no application to the present appeals as it was in no way concerned with the internal regulation of the lives of Indians on Reserves or their right to the use and benefit of Crown lands thereon, but rather deals exclusively with the effect of the Bill of Rights on a section of the Indian Act creating a crime with attendant penalties for the conduct by Indians off a Reserve in an area where non-Indians, who were also governed by federal law, were not subject to any such restriction.

The fundamental distinction between the present case and that of Drybones, however, appears to me to be that the impugned section in the latter case could not be enforced without denying equality of treatment in the administration and enforcement of the law before the ordinary courts of the land to a racial group, whereas no such inequality of treatment between Indian men and women flows as a necessary result of the application of s. 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act.

I would allow the appeal of the Attorney General of Canada against J.V. Corbiere Lavell, reverse the judgment of the Federal Court of Appeal and restore the decision of Judge B.W. Grossberg. . . .

On the appeal of Richard Isaac and others v. Yvonne Bédard, . . . The appeal to this Court should be allowed, the judgment at trial should be reversed and the action dismissed.

ABBOTT J. (dissenting)—

Unless the words "without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex" used in s. 1 are to be treated as mere rhetorical window dressing, effect must be given to them in interpreting the section. I agree with Laskin J. that s. 1(b) must be read as if those words were recited therein.

In my view the Canadian Bill of Rights has substantially affected the doctrine of the supremacy of Parliament. Like any other statute it can of course be repealed or amended, or a particular law declared to be applicable notwithstanding the provisions of the Bill. In form the supremacy of Parliament is maintained but in practice I think that it has been substantially curtailed. In my opinion that result is undesirable, but that is a matter for consideration by Parliament not the courts.

Ritchie J. said in his reasons for judgment in Drybones that the implementation of the Bill of Rights by the courts can give rise to great difficulties and that statement has been borne out in subsequent litigation. Of one thing I am certain the Bill will continue to supply ample grist to the judicial mills for some time to come.

I would dismiss both appeals with costs.

The Judgment of Hall, Spence and Laskin JJ. was delivered by LASKIN J. (dissenting)— . . . In my opinion, unless we are to depart from what was said in Drybones, both appeals now before us must be dismissed. I have no disposition to reject what was decided in Drybones; and on the central issue of prohibited discrimination as catalogued in s. 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights, it is, in my opinion, impossible to distinguish Drybones from the two cases in appeal. If, as in Drybones, discrimination by reason of race makes certain statutory provisions inoperative, the same result must follow as to statutory provisions which exhibit discrimination by reason of sex.

The contentions of the appellants in both cases in appeal, stripped of their detail, amount to a submission that the Canadian Bill of Rights does not apply to Indians on a Reserve, nor to Indians in their relations to one another whether or not on a Reserve. This submission does not deny that the effect of s. 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act is to prescribe substantive discrimination by reason of sex, a differentiation in the treatment of Indian men and Indian women when they marry non-Indians, this differentiation being exhibited in the loss by the women of their status as Indians under the Act. It does, however, involve the assertion that the particular discrimination upon which the two appeals are focussed is not offensive to the relevant provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights; and it also involves the assertion that the Drybones case is distinguishable or, if not, that it has been overcome by the re-enactment of the Indian Act in the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, including the then s. 94 (now s. 95) which was in issue in that case. I regard this last-mentioned assertion, which is posited on the fact that the Canadian Bill of Rights was not so re-enacted, as simply an oblique appeal for the overruling of the Drybones case.

The Drybones case decided two things. It decided first—and this decision was a necessary basis for the second point in it—that the Canadian Bill of Rights was more than a mere interpretation statute whose terms would yield to a contrary intention; it had paramount force when a federal enactment conflicted with its terms, and it was the incompatible federal enactment which had to give way. This was the issue upon which the then Chief Justice of this Court, Chief Justice Cartwright, and Justices Abbott and Pigeon, dissented. . . . The second thing decided by Drybones was that the accused in that case, an Indian under the Indian Act, was denied equality before the law, under s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights, when it was made a punishable offence for him, on account of his race, to do something which his fellow Canadians were free to do without being liable to punishment for an offence. . . .

It would be unsupportable in principle to view the Drybones case as turning on the fact that the challenged s. 94 of the Indian Act created an offence visited by punishment. The gist of the judgment lay in the legal disability imposed upon a person by reason of his race when other persons were under no similar restraint. If for the words "on account of race" there are substituted the words "on account of sex" the result must surely be the same where a federal enactment imposes disabilities or prescribes disqualifications for members of the female sex which are not imposed upon members of the male sex in the same circumstances.

It is said, however, that although this may be so as between males and females in general, it does not follow where the distinction on the basis of sex is limited as here to members of the Indian race. This, it is said further, does not offend the guarantee of "equality before the law" upon which the Drybones case proceeded. . . .

It appears to me that the contention that a differentiation on the basis of sex is not offensive to the Canadian Bill of Rights where that differentiation operates only among Indians under the Indian Act is one that compounds racial inequality even beyond the point that the Drybones case found unacceptable. In any event, taking the Indian Act as it stands, as a law of Canada whose various provisions fall to be > assessed under the Canadian Bill of Rights, I am unable to appreciate upon what basis the command of the Canadian Bill of Rights, that laws of Canada shall operate without discrimination by reason of sex, can be ignored in the operation of the Indian Act.

> I do not think it is possible to leap over the telling words of s. 1, "without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex", in order to explain away any such discrimination by invoking the words "equality before the law" in clause (b) and attempting to make them alone the touchstone of reasonable classification. That was not done in the Drybones case; and this Court made it clear in Curr v. The Queen , that federal legislation, which might be compatible with the command of "equality before the law" taken alone, may nonetheless be inoperative if it manifests any of the prohibited forms of discrimination. In short, the proscribed discriminations in s. 1 have a force either independent of the subsequently enumerated clauses (a) to (f) or, if they are found in any federal legislation, they offend those clauses because each must be read as if the prohibited forms of discrimination were recited therein as a part thereof.

> I would dismiss both appeals with costs.
> Appeals allowed, ABBOTT, HALL, SPENCE and LASKIN JJ. dissenting.

The statement by Justice Ritchie that the rights in the Bill were to be "construed in light of the law existing in Canada at [the] time" the Bill was enacted came to be known as the "frozen rights theory", meaning that the Canadian Bill of Rights only protected rights that were in existence when the Bill came into effect in 1960. That approach became the governing framework for courts' approach to the Bill. The "frozen rights theory" is directly contrary to the "living tree doctrine" from the Persons Case (1929). Many academics and rights advocates were highly critical of the frozen rights theory. Why do you think judges of the Supreme Court adopted the frozen rights theory? Why did they not embrace the "living tree doctrine" from the Persons Case? Can you identify the strengths and weaknesses of each approach?

Lavell, along with Bliss v. Attorney General of Canada, 1978 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1979] 1 SCR 183, galvanized the women's movement to seek stronger legal protections for discrimination, especially for discrimination based on sex. In Bliss, a unanimous Supreme Court rejected a challenge brought Ms. Stella Bliss to the federal unemployment benefits law which imposed stricter requirements for maternity benefits than for ordinary unemployment benefits. The Court held that this did not infringe equality before the law under the Bill of Rights and concluded that "Any inequality between the sexes in this area is not created by legislation but by nature."

For the definitive reference on the Bill see Walter S. Tarnopolsky, The Canadian Bill of Rights (Toronto: McClelland & Stewart, 1975). Attorney General of Canada* : From Legal Defeat to Political Victory " (1986) 24 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 141.

4 Towards the Charter

The Canadian Bill of Rights was a stepping stone to the entrenchment of a constitutional bill of rights. When Pierre Trudeau became Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada in 1967, he announced his intention to enact a constitutional bill of rights for Canada. Trudeau became Prime Minister in 1968 and made the patriation of the Canadian Constitution with a domestic amending formula and a charter of rights a political priority. At that time, any amendments to the Canadian Constitution had to be made by the British Parliament and there was no set formula for amending the Canadian Constitution. Trudeau's quest became known as his "Magnificent Obsession".

The period between 1968 and 1982 when the Charter was enacted as part of Trudeau's package of constitutional reforms was a period of almost continuous constitutional discussions. Many of these took place at federal-provincial conferences of senior government officials and sometimes of Ministers of Justice or "first ministers" (the prime minister and provincial premiers). This process was known as "executive federalism".

Parliament was also involved in this process. In January 1970, a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada was established, It held public hearings and meetings in 47 cities and towns across the country, hearing from 1486 witnesses at meetings attended by 13,000 Canadians. The evidence totalled 8000 pages. While the Molgat-MacGuigan committee was touring the country hearing from Canadians, Trudeau, the premiers and their officials continued to try to hammer out a deal. In June 1971, they seemingly reached an agreement at Victoria. The "Victoria Charter" would have included a scaled-down version of a charter of rights. However, the agreement collapsed within a week as Quebec Premier Robert Bourassa returned to Quebec and withdrew his support in the face of internal opposition.

For the next several years, constitutional negotiations took a back burner to economic considerations as Canada was mired in a recession. However, things heated up again after the election of the Parti Québecois in November 1976. The election of the Parti Québecois led to much more popular interest in constitution making through conferences, meetings, etc.

Just after Canada Day in 1977, the federal government appointed the Task Force on Canadian Unity, known as "Pepin-Robarts" after its co-chairs former Quebec Liberal MP Jean-Luc Pepin and former Conservative Ontario Premier John Robarts. In June 1978, Prime Minister Trudeau released of a white paper on constitutional reform which was converted into Bill C-60, The Constitutional Amendment Bill. After Bill C-60 was introduced, Parliament created another Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution which reported back to Parliament at the end of October 1978.

The May 1979 federal election ousted Trudeau from power and Progressive Conservative Joe Clark headed a minority government. Clark had no interest in pursuing constitutional reform, but Pierre Trudeau returned to power after another federal election in February 1980.

Pierre Trudeau returned to 24 Sussex Drive in time to battle Parti Québécois Premier René Lévesque in the first Quebec Referendum in May 1980. Prior to the referendum, Trudeau had pledged a "renewed federalism" if the "NO" side won. After the defeat of the proposal for sovereignty-association on May 20, 1980, Trudeau launched back into a constitutional battle, leaving reform of the Senate aside. The proposed Charter of Rights and Freedoms quickly became the centrepiece of the federal government's plan for constitutional renewal during 1980 (see Roy J Romanow, John D Whyte & Howard A Leeson, Canada ... Notwithstanding : The Making of the Constitution 1976-1982 (Toronto: Carswell, 1984 at 43)).

The federal government's constitutional proposal was dubbed the "people's package". It included patriation, a charter of rights and freedoms, and an amending formula. It was meant to contrast with the "governments' package", indicative of the provinces' desire for greater legislative powers.

Parliament created another Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the Constitution which sat from November 1980 to February 1981. It held 106 meetings over 56 sitting days (including evenings and Saturdays) for a total of 267 sitting hours It spent more than 275 hours hearing over 100 witnesses and 90 hours debating amendments clause-by-clause. The Joint Committee was the first parliamentary committee ever to have its proceedings televised; Canadians watched them and the media followed progress closely.

The Joint Committee process served in large part as the forge which produced the Charter that Canadians cherish today. The Joint Committee marked the first time that ordinary Canadians became participants in constitutional change rather than mere observers or silent subjects of it. Civil liberties groups, legal organizations, religious groups, representatives of Indigenous peoples and women's groups were key participants in the process. They advocated for stronger protections in the Charter. The Lavell and Bliss cases were frequently invoked by witnesses as justifications for the need to entrench stronger equality protections in the Charter. These groups succeeded in getting the Joint Committee to accept significant changes to the proposed Charter.

Meanwhile, the provinces challenged Pierre Trudeau's attempt to unliterally patriate and amend the Constitution without their consent. Three challenges made their way to the Supreme Court in the spring of 1981 and in the fall of that year the Supreme Court decided the Patriation Reference, holding that while as a matter of law the federal government did have the power to proceed unilaterally, as a matter of constitutional convention, "substantial consent" from the provinces was required. This led to a last round of federal-provincial negotiations in November 1981 which produced an agreement between the federal government and nine of the ten provinces (Quebec did not join). Parliament enacted what became the constitutional changes and sent them to London for the final approval by the U.K. Parliament. On a rainy April 17, 1982, in Ottawa, Queen Elizabeth II signed the proclamation enacting the Constitution Act, 1982 with its Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This section is based on chapter 1 and 4 of Adam M. Dodek, The Charter Debates: The Special Joint Committee on the Constitution, 1980-81 and the Making of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2018).

5 Conclusion

While the Charter has dominated Canadian discourse and jurisprudence on rights protection since its enactment in 1982, it is important to remember that the Canadian Bill of Rights still remains in force. There are several instances where the Bill may provide protections that are not contained in the Charter. First, the Bill protects "the enjoyment of property" and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law (s 1(a)). Section 7 of the Charter was modelled on this provision of the Bill but "the enjoyment of property" was expressly excluded from the Charter. Second, section 2(e) provides that "no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to . . . deprive a person of the right to a fair hearing in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice for the determination of his rights and obligations". There is no provision of the Charter that is directly analogous to section 2(e).

The Canadian Bill of Rights played an important role in the early Charter decision Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, 1985 CanLII 65 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 177. The Bill was also at issue in Authorson v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 39 (CanLII), [2003] 2 SCR 40.

Chapter 14: Charter Interpretation

By Megan Pfiffer and Jacob Weinrib

1 Introduction

Constitutional rights have two basic features: scope and strength.

Scope consists in the protections that the right or freedom affords its bearers. What falls inside the scope of a right or freedom is constitutionally protected, while what falls outside remains subject to the exercise of legislative power. When we ask whether the expressive freedom guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter protects artistic expression, commercial expression, scientific expression, obscene expression, or violent forms of expression, our questions engage the scope of expressive freedom.

In contrast, strength concerns the power of a right or freedom to withstand some opposing legal norm. Accordingly, when we ask whether expressive freedom may be restricted to protect the privacy of others, the safety of consumers, national security, or the integrity of free and fair elections, our questions engage the strength of expressive freedom.

The present chapter introduces purposive interpretation, the method that Canadian courts employ to determine the scope of Charter rights and freedoms. In turn, Chapters 16 and 17 explore the method that courts employ to determine the strength that Charter rights and freedoms possess.

Purposive interpretation responds to a challenge posed by constitutional rights. Constitutional rights are necessarily stated in broad and abstract terms. Yet the cases in which litigants challenge government action on the basis of constitutional rights are particular and concrete. Purposive interpretation seeks to bridge this gap, determining whether the relevant facts of concrete cases fall within the scope of abstractly stated rights.

As you explore the materials that follow, ask yourself the following questions: What is purposive interpretation? How does purposive interpretation differ from other approaches to constitutional interpretation? How does the purposive interpretation of a constitution differ from statutory interpretation? What resources does purposive interpretation offer for distilling broadly formulated constitutional guarantees into concrete protections? How does one identify the purpose of a Charter right or freedom? How does one determine what that purpose of a right or freedom requires in the concrete setting of a constitutional dispute?

Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc.*, 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.--The Constitution of Canada, which includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the supreme law of Canada. Any law inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. Section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 so mandates. The constitutional question posed in this appeal is whether s. 10(3), and by implication s. 10(1), of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C- 23, (the "Act") are inconsistent with s. 8 of the Charter by reason of authorizing unreasonable searches and seizures and are therefore of no force and effect.

> …[T]he crux of this case is the meaning to be given to the term "unreasonable" in the s. 8 guarantee of freedom from unreasonable search or seizure. The guarantee is vague and open. The American courts have had the advantage of a number of specific prerequisites articulated in the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, as well as a history of colonial opposition to certain Crown investigatory practices from which to draw out the nature of the interests protected by that Amendment and the kinds of conduct it proscribes.
> [The Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution provides:
> > "The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."]
> There is none of this in s. 8. There is no specificity in the section beyond the bare guarantee of freedom from "unreasonable" search and seizure; nor is there any particular historical, political or philosophic context capable of providing an obvious gloss on the meaning of the guarantee.
> It is clear that the meaning of "unreasonable" cannot be determined by recourse to a dictionary, nor for that matter, by reference to the rules of statutory construction. The task of expounding a constitution is crucially different from that of construing a statute. A statute defines present rights and obligations. It is easily enacted and as easily repealed. A constitution, by contrast, is drafted with an eye to the future. Its function is to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power and, when joined by a Bill or a Charter of Rights, for the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties. Once enacted, its provisions cannot easily be repealed or amended. It must, therefore, be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers. The judiciary is the guardian of the constitution and must, in interpreting its provisions, bear these considerations in mind. Professor Paul Freund expressed this idea aptly when he admonished the American courts "not to read the provisions of the Constitution like a last will and testament lest it become one".
> The need for a broad perspective in approaching constitutional documents is…contained in Viscount Sankey's classic formulation in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124, at p. 136, cited and applied in countless Canadian cases:
> > "The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada .... Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board--it is certainly not their desire--to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation."
> More recently, in Minister of Home Affairs v. Fisher, [1980] A.C. 319, dealing with the Bermudian Constitution, Lord Wilberforce reiterated at p. 328 that a constitution is a document "sui generis, calling for principles of interpretation of its own, suitable to its character", and that as such, a constitution incorporating a Bill of Rights calls for:
> > "... a generous interpretation avoiding what has been called "the austerity of tabulated legalism," suitable to give individuals the full measure of the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to."
> Such a broad, purposive analysis, which interprets specific provisions of a constitutional document in the light of its larger objects is also consonant with the classical principles of American constitutional construction enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). It is, as well, the approach I intend to take in the present case.
> I begin with the obvious. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive document. Its purpose is to guarantee and to protect, within the limits of reason, the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms it enshrines. It is intended to constrain governmental action inconsistent with those rights and freedoms; it is not in itself an authorization for governmental action. In the present case this means… that in guaranteeing the right to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures, s. 8 acts as a limitation on whatever powers of search and seizure the federal or provincial governments already and otherwise possess. It does not in itself confer any powers, even of "reasonable" search and seizure, on these governments. This leads, in my view, to the further conclusion that an assessment of the constitutionality of a search and seizure, or of a statute authorizing a search or seizure, must focus on its "reasonable" or "unreasonable" impact on the subject of the search or the seizure, and not simply on its rationality in furthering some valid government objective.
> Since the proper approach to the interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive one, before it is possible to assess the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the impact of a search or of a statute authorizing a search, it is first necessary to specify the purpose underlying s. 8: in other words, to delineate the nature of the interests it is meant to protect.

Dickson J. (as he then was) went on to conclude, based on his analysis of the purpose for which security against unreasonable search and seizure is protected, that s. 8 protects an individual's reasonable expectation of privacy. Accordingly, he found invalid those provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c. C-23, s. 10(1), (3) that authorized the issuance of search warrants by officials whose functions were investigative, without any requirement for reasonable and probable grounds to believe that an offence had been committed and that the place of search would afford evidence of the commission of the offence.

3 Notes and questions

1. In Hunter, Dickson J. refers approvingly to "classical principles of American constitutional construction" articulated by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316, 406-7 (1819):

   > Among the enumerated powers [allotted to Federal Congress], we do not find that of establishing a bank or creating a corporation. But there is no phrase in [the Constitution] which, like the articles of confederation, excludes incidental or implied powers; and which requires that everything granted shall be expressly and minutely described. Even the 10th Amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, omits the word "expressly," and declares only that the powers "not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are reserved to the States or to the people," thus leaving the question whether the particular power which may become the subject of contest has been delegated to the one Government, or prohibited to the other, to depend on a fair construction of the whole instrument. The men who drew and adopted this amendment had experienced the embarrassments resulting from the insertion of this word in the articles of confederation, and probably omitted it to avoid those embarrassments. A constitution, to contain an accurate detail of all the subdivisions of which its great powers will admit, and of all the means by which they may be carried into execution, would partake of the prolixity of a legal code, and could scarcely be embraced by the human mind. It would probably never be understood by the public. Its nature, therefore, requires, that only its great outlines should be marked, its important objects designated, and the minor ingredients which compose those objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves. [W]e must never forget, that it is a constitution we are expounding.

2. In Hunter, Dickson J. also referred to Minister of Home Affairs v. Fisher, [1980] A.C. 319, an opinion of the Privy Council that set out the purposive approach for interpreting a bill of rights. The case came to the Privy Council on appeal from Bermuda:

   > …The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by LORD WILBERFORCE.
   > [Section 11 of the Constitution of Bermuda provided:

> "(5) For the purposes of this section, a person shall be deemed to belong to Bermuda if that person - (a) possesses Bermudian status;... (c) is the wife of a person to whom either of the foregoing paragraphs of this subsection applies not living apart from such person...; or (d) is under the age of 18 years and is the child, stepchild or child adopted in a manner recognized by law of a person to whom any of the foregoing paragraphs of this subsection applies."
> The Jamaican mother of four illegitimate children all born in Jamaica married a Bermudian in 1972. The mother and the children took up residence with the husband in Bermuda in 1975. At all material times the children were under 18. In 1976 the Minister of Labour and Immigration ordered the children to leave Bermuda. The mother and her husband applied to the Supreme Court to quash the order and for a declaration that the children were to be deemed to belong to Bermuda. The Supreme Court refused a declaration on the ground that the children were illegitimate. On appeal, it was held by a majority that the children belonged to Bermuda by reason of s. 11(5)(d) of the Bermudian Constitution. On appeal to the Privy Council, the Minister of Home Affairs argued that rules of statutory interpretation required that "child" be interpreted as denoting only legitimate children. After surveying the common law and statutory bases for this proposition, their Lordships turned to the proper methodology for interpreting a constitutional text:]
> So far the discussion has been related to Acts of Parliament concerned with specific subjects. Here…we are concerned with a Constitution, brought into force certainly by Act of Parliament, the Bermuda Constitution Act 1967 United Kingdom, but established by a self- contained document set out in Schedule 2 to the Bermuda Constitution Order 1968 (United Kingdom S.I. 1968 No. 182). It can be seen that this instrument has certain special characteristics. 1. It is, particularly in Chapter I, drafted in a broad and ample style which lays down principles of width and generality. 2. Chapter I is headed "Protection of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms of the Individual." It is known that this chapter. as similar portions of other constitutional instruments drafted in the post-colonial period, starting with the Constitution of Nigeria, and including the Constitutions of most Caribbean territories, was greatly influenced by the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1953) (Cmd. 8969). That Convention was signed and ratified by the United Kingdom and applied to dependent territories including Bermuda. It was in turn influenced by the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948. These antecedents, and the form of Chapter I itself, call for a generous interpretation avoiding what has been called "the austerity of tabulated legalism," suitable to give to individuals the full measure of the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to. 3. …It is thus to "have effect for the purpose of affording protection to the aforesaid rights and freedoms" subject only to such limitations contained in it "being limitations designed to ensure that the enjoyment of the said rights and freedoms by any individual does not prejudice... the public interest."
> When therefore it becomes necessary to interpret…Chapter I…the question must inevitably be asked whether the … premise…that these provisions are to be construed in the manner and according to the rules which apply to Acts of Parliament, is sound. In their Lordships' view there are two possible answers to this. The first would be to say that, recognizing the status of the Constitution as, in effect, an Act of Parliament, there is room for interpreting it with less rigidity, and greater generosity, than other Acts, such as those which are concerned with property, or succession, or citizenship. On the particular question this would require the court to accept as a starting point the general presumption that "child" means "legitimate child" but to recognize that this presumption may be more easily displaced. The second would be more radical: it would be to treat a constitutional instrument such as this as sui generis, calling for principles of interpretation of its own, suitable to its character as already described, without necessary acceptance of all the presumptions that are relevant to legislation of private law.
> …[T]heir Lordships prefer the second. This is in no way to say that there are no rules of law which should apply to the interpretation of a Constitution. A Constitution is a legal instrument giving rise, amongst other things, to individual rights capable of enforcement in a court of law. Respect must be paid to the language which has been used and to the traditions and usages which have given meaning to that language. It is quite consistent with this…to take as a point of departure for the process of interpretation a recognition of the character and origin of the instrument, and to be guided by the principle of giving full recognition and effect to those fundamental rights and freedoms with a statement of which the Constitution commences. …
> In their Lordships' opinion, paragraph 11(5) in its context amounts to a clear recognition of the unity of the family as a group and acceptance of the principle that young children should not be separated from a group which as a whole belongs to Bermuda. This would be fully in line with article 8 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (respect for family life), decisions on which have recognised the family unit and the right to protection of illegitimate children. Moreover the draftsman of the Constitution must have had in mind (a) the United Nations' Declaration of the Rights of the Child adopted by resolution (1386 (xiv)) on November 29, 1959, which contains the words in principle
> > "[the child] shall, wherever possible, grow up in the care and under the responsibility of his parents... a child of tender years shall not, save in exceptional circumstances, be separated from his mother."
> and (b) article 24 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1966 which guarantees protection to every child without any discrimination as to birth. Though these instruments at the date of the Constitution had no legal force, they can certainly not be disregarded as influences upon legislative policy.
> Their Lordships consider that the force of these arguments, based purely upon the Constitution itself, is such as to compel the conclusion that "child" bears an unrestricted meaning [that includes children born outside marriage]. …

3. Following Hunter, in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, Justice Dickson characterized purposive interpretation in these terms:

> …In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.
> In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore…be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts.

4. Purposive interpretation conceives of the Charter as a set of abstract standards that—by virtue of their status as supreme law—must be given effect, absent some constitutional basis for their restriction. The purposive interpretive method is often contrasted with originalism. Originalism maintains that the meaning of a constitutional text is determined at the historical moment of its enactment, according to the framer's intentions, their expected applications, or the public meaning of the text. Proponents of originalism suggest that judges and other interpreters are constrained by this fixed meaning. While the Supreme Court endorsed originalism in its interpretation of the Charter's statutory predecessor, the Canadian Bill of Rights, it emphatically rejected originalism in the early days of the Charter. The Court has remained consistent in its embrace of purposive interpretation despite a recent revival in interest in originalist methods amongst some Canadian scholars. As you read the following passages, ask yourself: What accounts for the rejection of originalism as a method for interpreting the Charter?

a. Article 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights stated:

1. It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,

(a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law;

(b) the right of the individual to equality before the law and the protection of the law;

(c) freedom of religion;

(d) freedom of speech;

(e) freedom of assembly and association; and

(f) freedom of the press.

b. In Robertson and Rosetanni v. The Queen, 1963 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1963] SCR 651, Justice Ritchie, writing for the majority, claimed that the text of the Canadian Bill of Rights demanded an originalist approach to its interpretation:

It is to be noted at the outset that the Canadian Bill of Rights is not concerned with "human rights and fundamental freedoms" in any abstract sense, but rather with such "rights and freedoms" as they existed in Canada immediately before the statute was enacted. (See also s. 5(1)). It is therefore the "religious freedom" then existing in this country that is safe-guarded by the provisions of s. 2 which read, in part, as follows:

> Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared...

It is accordingly of first importance to understand the concept of religious freedom which was recognized in this country before the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights and after the enactment of the Lord's Day Act in its present form…

It is against this background that the effect of the provisions of the Lord's Day Act on "religious freedom" as guaranteed by the Canadian Bill of Rights is to be considered. Section 4 of the Lord's Day Act reads as follows:

> It shall not be lawful for any person on the Lord's Day, except as provided herein, or in any provincial Act or law now or hereafter in force, to sell or offer for sale or purchase any goods, chattels, or other personal property, or any real estate, or to carry on or transact any business of his ordinary calling, or in connection with such calling, or for gain to do, or employ any other person to do, on that day, any work, business, or labour.

The italics are my own and indicate the offence with which the appellants were charged.

As has been indicated, legislation for the preservation of the sanctity of Sunday has existed in this country from the earliest times and has at least since 1903 been regarded as a part of the criminal law in its widest sense. Historically, such legislation has never been considered as an interference with the kind of "freedom of religion" guaranteed by the Canadian Bill of Rights.

c. In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, Dickson C.J. emphasized that originalism is inapplicable to the Charter:

It is not necessary to reopen the issue of the meaning of freedom of religion under the Canadian Bill of Rights, because whatever the situation under that document, it is certain that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms does not simply "recognize and declare" existing rights as they were circumscribed by legislation current at the time of the Charter's entrenchment. The language of the Charter is imperative. It avoids any reference to existing or continuing rights but rather proclaims in the ringing terms of s. 2 that:

> 2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> (a) Freedom of conscience and religion;

…[T]he Charter is intended to set a standard upon which present as well as future legislation is to be tested. Therefore the meaning of the concept of freedom of conscience and religion is not to be determined solely by the degree to which that right was enjoyed by Canadians prior to the proclamation of the Charter. For this reason, Robertson and Rosetanni, supra, cannot be determinative of the meaning of "freedom of conscience and religion" under the Charter. We must look, rather, to the distinctive principles of constitutional interpretation appropriate to expounding the supreme law of Canada.

d. For attempts to bring originalism into contact with the Charter, see Kerri Froc, "A Prayer for Original Meaning: A History of Section 15 and What It Should Mean for Equality" (2018) 38:1 National Journal of Constitutional Law 35; Leonid Sirota and Benjamin Oliphant, "Originalist Reasoning in Canadian Constitutional Jurisprudence" (2017) 50:2 UBC Law Review 505.

5. Purposive interpretation requires interpreters to approach the Charter systematically, assessing how the purpose of each provision relates to every other. Consider the following excerpts:

a. Dubois v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 350:

"Our constitutional Charter must be construed as a system where "Every component contributes to the meaning as a whole, and the whole gives meaning to its parts" (P. A. Côté writing about statutory interpretation in The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (1984), at p. 236). The courts must interpret each section of the Charter in relation to the others."

b. R. v. Lyons, 1987 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 309:

"[T]he rights and freedoms protected by the Charter are not insular and discrete…Rather, the Charter protects a complex of interacting values, each more or less fundamental to the free and democratic society that is Canada…and the particularization of rights and freedoms contained in the Charter thus represents a somewhat artificial, if necessary and intrinsically worthwhile attempt to structure and focus the judicial exposition of such rights and freedoms. The necessity of structuring the discussion should not, however, lead us to overlook the importance of appreciating the manner in which the amplification of the content of each enunciated right and freedom imbues and informs our understanding of the value structure sought to be protected by the Charter as a whole and, in particular, of the content of the other specific rights and freedoms it embodies."

c. R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30:

"We are invited…to consider the purpose of the Charter in general and of the right to liberty in particular. The Charter is predicated on a particular conception of the place of the individual in society. An individual is not a totally independent entity disconnected from the society in which he or she lives. Neither, however, is the individual a mere cog in an impersonal machine in which his or her values, goals and aspirations are subordinated to those of the collectivity. The individual is a bit of both. The Charter reflects this reality by leaving a wide range of activities and decisions open to legitimate government control while at the same time placing limits on the proper scope of that control. Thus, the rights guaranteed in the Charter erect around each individual, metaphorically speaking, an invisible fence over which the state will not be allowed to trespass. The role of the courts is to map out, piece by piece, the parameters of the fence…

The idea of human dignity finds expression in almost every right and freedom guaranteed in the Charter. Individuals are afforded the right to choose their own religion and their own philosophy of life, the right to choose with whom they will associate and how they will express themselves, the right to choose where they will live and what occupation they will pursue. These are all examples of the basic theory underlying the Charter, namely that the state will respect choices made by individuals and, to the greatest extent possible, will avoid subordinating these choices to any one conception of the good life.

Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty…[T]his right, properly construed, grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance."

6. In R. v. Hebert, 1990 CanLII 118 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 151, Wilson J. mapped the relationship between the idea of purposive interpretation and the two-stage model of constitutional adjudication under the Charter. As Wilson explains, the purpose of a right informs its scope, whereas the purposes that government may rely on to restrict a right inform its strength, as determined by the limitation analysis in s. 1:

I agree with my colleagues that the right to silence is a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that a person cannot therefore be deprived of his or her right to life, liberty or security of the person by violating that right.

I believe that the right must be given "a generous rather than a legalistic [interpretation] aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection": see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, per Dickson J. (as he then was), at p. 344. It is accordingly inappropriate to qualify it by balancing the interests of the state against it…

Section 7 confers on an accused the right to life, liberty and security of the person. It then provides that the accused may not be deprived of that right except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. In other words, he or she may be deprived of the s. 7 right provided the deprivation is effected without offending fundamental justice. In deciding whether or not the authorities have offended fundamental justice or not it is, in my view, essential to focus on the treatment of the accused and not on the objective of the state. It would, in my view, be quite contrary to a purposive approach to the s. 7 right to inject justificatory considerations for putting limits upon it into the ascertainment of its scope or content.

Under purposive interpretation, the scope of a constitutional right is determined in reference to its purpose rather than the reasons that support its restriction. Why does Justice Wilson insist that the reasons for restricting the right play no role in determining its scope?

7. The Court has held that this approach applies even when the reasons that support a right's restriction make reference to another right. Thus, conflicts between rights must be resolved under the analysis required by section 1 of the Charter, as a matter of strength rather than scope.

a. Consider Wilson J.'s analysis in Edmonton Journal v. Alberta (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 1326:

In my view, this case raises an important issue regarding the proper method of application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to individual cases and, because my reasons for finding s. 30(1) of the Alberta Judicature Act unconstitutional reflect one of two possible approaches to the Charter's application, I thought it might be appropriate at the outset to say a word or two about the different approaches.

Of the two possible approaches to the Charter's application one might be described as the abstract approach and the other the contextual approach. While the mechanics of application, i.e. the proper analytical steps to be taken are the same under each, which one is adopted may tend to affect the result of the balancing process called for under s. 1.

Under each approach it is necessary to ascertain the underlying value which the right alleged to be violated was designed to protect. This is achieved through a purposive interpretation of Charter rights. It is also necessary under each approach to ascertain the legislative objective sought to be advanced by the impugned legislation. This is done by ascertaining the intention of the legislator in enacting the particular piece of legislation. When both the underlying value and the legislative objective have been identified, and it becomes clear that the legislative objective cannot be achieved without some infringement of the right, it must then be determined whether the impugned legislation constitutes a reasonable limit on the right which can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

It seems to me that under the abstract approach the underlying value sought to be protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter is determined at large as my colleague Cory J. has done. He finds freedom of expression to have been fundamental to the historical development of our political, social and educational institutions in Canada. He emphasizes the seriousness of restricting the free exchange of ideas and opinions in a democratic form of society and concludes that it is difficult to imagine a more important right in a democracy than freedom of expression.

I do not disagree with my colleague that freedom of expression plays that vital role in a political democracy. The problem is that the values in conflict in the context of this particular case are the right of litigants to the protection of their privacy in matrimonial disputes and the right of the public to an open court process. Both cannot be fully respected. One must yield to the exigencies of the other. I ask myself therefore whether a contextual approach in balancing the right to privacy against freedom of the press under s. 1 is not more appropriate than an approach which assesses the relative importance of the competing values in the abstract or at large.

It is of interest to note in this connection that La Forest J. completely agrees with Cory J. about the importance of freedom of expression in the abstract. He acknowledges that it is fundamental in a democratic society. He sees the issue in the case, however, as being whether an open court process should prevail over the litigant's right to privacy. In other words, while not disputing the values which are protected by s. 2(b) as identified by Cory J., he takes a contextual approach to the definition of the conflict in this particular case. Notwithstanding the enormous importance of freedom of expression in a political context, he finds that it must yield in the context of this case to the litigant's right to privacy. The impugned legislation is accordingly, in his view, a reasonable limit on freedom of the press. Cory J. reaches the converse conclusion and the concern raised is whether the difference in result may be conditioned by the methodology adopted in assessing the importance of the values in conflict.

One thing seems clear and that is that one should not balance one value at large and the conflicting value in its context. To do so could well be to pre-judge the issue by placing more weight on the value developed at large than is appropriate in the context of the case. Nor should one, it seems to me, balance a private interest, i.e. litigant x's interest in his privacy against a public one, the public's interest in an open court process. Both interests must be seen as public interests, in this case the public interest in protecting the privacy of litigants generally in matrimonial cases against the public interest in an open court process…

One virtue of the contextual approach, it seems to me, is that it recognizes that a particular right or freedom may have a different value depending on the context. It may be, for example, that freedom of expression has greater value in a political context than it does in the context of disclosure of the details of a matrimonial dispute. The contextual approach attempts to bring into sharp relief the aspect of the right or freedom which is truly at stake in the case as well as the relevant aspects of any values in competition with it. It seems to be more sensitive to the reality of the dilemma posed by the particular facts and therefore more conducive to finding a fair and just compromise between the two competing values under s. 1.

It is my view that a right or freedom may have different meanings in different contexts. Security of the person, for example, might mean one thing when addressed to the issue of over-crowding in prisons and something quite different when addressed to the issue of noxious fumes from industrial smoke-stacks. It seems entirely probable that the value to be attached to it in different contexts for the purpose of the balancing under s. 1 might also be different. It is for this reason that I believe that the importance of the right or freedom must be assessed in context rather than in the abstract and that its purpose must be ascertained in context. This having been done, the right or freedom must then, in accordance with the dictates of this Court, be given a generous interpretation aimed at fulfilling that purpose and securing for the individual the full benefit of the guarantee.

b. In R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, Dickson C.J. endorsed Wilson J.'s approach to dealing with conflicts of rights:

The second matter which I wish to address before leaving the s. 2(b) inquiry concerns the relevance of other Charter provisions and international agreements to which Canada is a party in interpreting the coverage of the freedom of expression guarantee. It has been argued in support of excluding hate propaganda from the coverage of s. 2(b) that the use of ss. 15 and 27 of the Charter -- dealing respectively with equality and multiculturalism -- and Canada's acceptance of international agreements requiring the prohibition of racist statements make s. 319(2) incompatible with even a large and liberal definition of the freedom (see, e.g., I. Cotler, "Hate Literature", in R. S. Abella and M. L. Rothman, eds., Justice Beyond Orwell (1985), 117, at pp. 121-22). The general tenor of this argument is that these interpretative aids inextricably infuse each constitutional guarantee with values supporting equal societal participation and the security and dignity of all persons. Consequently, it is said that s. 2(b) must be curtailed so as not to extend to communications which seriously undermine the equality, security and dignity of others.

Because I will deal extensively with the impact of various Charter provisions and international agreements when considering whether s. 319(2) is a justifiable limit under s. 1, I will keep my comments here to a minimum. Suffice it to say that I agree with the general approach of Wilson J. in Edmonton Journal, supra, where she speaks of the danger of balancing competing values without the benefit of a context. This approach does not logically preclude the presence of balancing within s. 2(b) -- one could avoid the dangers of an overly abstract analysis simply by making sure that the circumstances surrounding both the use of the freedom and the legislative limit were carefully considered. I believe, however, that s. 1 of the Charter is especially well suited to the task of balancing, and consider this Court's previous freedom of expression decisions to support this belief. It is, in my opinion, inappropriate to attenuate the s. 2(b) freedom on the grounds that a particular context requires such; the large and liberal interpretation given the freedom of expression in Irwin Toy indicates that the preferable course is to weigh the various contextual values and factors in s. 1.

Wilson J. and Dickson C.J. both refer to the dangers of balancing competing rights at the stage in which interpreters determine a right's scope. What are these dangers? As you approach the section 1 analysis in Chapter 16, ask yourself: why is it that courts have preferred this method for resolving conflicts?

8. In Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34, the Court was tasked with determining the precise force of unwritten constitutional principles. The majority of the Court held that they could be used to assist in the interpretation of the Constitution's written provisions, including the rights articulated in the Charter. They could also be used to develop structural constitutional doctrines. However, they could not be relied upon to invalidate legislation:

The Constitution of Canada embodies written and unwritten norms. This Court has recognized that our Constitution describes an architecture of the institutions of state and of their relationship to citizens that connotes certain underlying principles... These principles, such as democracy and the rule of law, "infuse our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 50). Although not recorded outside of "oblique reference[s]" in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and to the Constitution Act, 1982 (para. 51), these principles are "foundational" (para. 49), without which "it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure" (para. 51). These principles have "full legal force" and may give rise to substantive legal obligations (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753, at p. 845). "[L]ike all principles of political morality, [they] can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches" (C.A. reasons, at para. 84, citing British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 SCR 473, at para. 52)…

Ultimately, what "full legal force" means is dependent on the particular context. Any legal instrument or device, such as a contract or a will or a rule, has "full legal force" within its proper ambit… [I]n our view, because they are unwritten, their "full legal force" is realized not in supplementing the written text of our Constitution as "provisions of the Constitution" with which no law may be inconsistent and remain of "force or effect" under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Unwritten constitutional principles are not "provisions of the Constitution". Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which our constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms — its provisions — are to be given effect. In practical terms, this means that unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions... When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing "the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, . . . the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, [and] the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 7, quoting Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344; see also R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, at para. 32).

Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. In this way, structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent, such as the doctrine of full faith and credit (Morguard Investments Ltd. v.

> De Savoye, 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 1077; Hunt v. T&N plc, 1993 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1993] 4 SCR 289); the doctrine of paramountcy (Huson v. The Township of South Norwich (1895), 1895 CanLII 1 (SCC), 24 SCR 145); the remedy of suspended declarations of invalidity (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 721); and the obligations to negotiate that would follow a declaration of secession by a province (Secession Reference).
> … Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.
> First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers (Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 53-54, 60 and 64-67; J. Leclair, "Canada's Unfathomable Unwritten Constitutional Principles" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 389, at pp. 427-32)…
> Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter — rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority — the concep[t] of democracy . . . ha[s] no canonical formulatio[n]" (C.A. reasons, at para. 85). Unlike the written text of the Constitution, then, which "promotes legal certainty and predictability" in the exercise of judicial review (Secession Reference, at para. 53), the nebulous nature of the unwritten principles makes them susceptible to be interpreted so as to "render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). Accordingly, there is good reason to insist that "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box" (para. 66). In our view, this statement should be understood as covering all possible bases for claims of right (i.e., "unjust or unfair" or otherwise normatively deficient).

The majority's conclusion that unwritten constitutional principles could not invalidate legislation was motivated, at least in large part, by a concern that to hold otherwise would render many of the Charter's written provisions redundant. Is this concern persuasive? Does the purposive method outlined in this chapter provide any resources to respond to it?

9. Under the heading "General", sections 25-31 of the Charter articulate norms that are relevant to its interpretation. For example, sections 27 and 28 state:

> Multicultural heritage
> 27 This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.
> Rights guaranteed equally to both sexes
> 28 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

Consistent both with their text and with the requirement that the Charter be interpreted systematically, these provisions provide lenses through which courts must view and assess their interpretations of all the other provisions in the Charter. For a discussion of whether these provisions merely assist in the interpretation of other provisions, or whether they are independently enforceable, see Chapter 15.

10. A long-standing principle of interpretation holds that Canadian statutes and the constitution should be interpreted presumptively in accordance with international law. This principle is thought to be particularly relevant to Charter interpretation because the Charter reflects a set of commitments about human rights that emerged as an international consensus following the atrocities of the Second World War. Yet there are several well-known objections to this practice. One worry is that it may distort a proper purposive interpretation of the Charter. On this view, the interpretative process should be focussed on the provisions contained in the Charter, rather than on sources of law outside of it. Another cluster of objections concern the authority of international law norms. Canada is a dualist system, and so international law is not enforceable in Canadian courts unless it is formally integrated into Canadian law. Some worry that by interpreting the Charter in accordance with international law, courts efface this important feature of our legal system. Canadian courts have also at times relied on international law sources that Canada is not a party to. Critics suggest that it is unjustified to treat these sources as authoritative given that Canada has not committed itself to them.

The precise role that international law should play in the process of Charter interpretation was the subject of debate in Quebec (Attorney General) v. 9147-0732 Quebec inc., 2020 SCC 32. The central issue in that case was whether corporations were protected by section 12 of the Charter, which states that "[e]veryone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment".

a. Writing for the majority, Brown and Rowe JJ. (Wagner C.J. and Moldaver and Côté JJ. concurring) aimed to articulate clear limits on the use courts can make of international law in Charter interpretation:

> As a constitutional document that was "made in Canada"… the Charter and its provisions are primarily interpreted with regards to Canadian law and history…
> While this Court has generally accepted that international norms can be considered when interpreting domestic norms, they have typically played a limited role of providing support or confirmation for the result reached by way of purposive interpretation. This makes sense, as Canadian courts interpreting the Charter are not bound by the content of international norms…
> Furthermore, even within that limited supporting or confirming role, the weight and persuasiveness of each of these international norms in the analysis depends on the nature of the source and its relationship to our Constitution. The reason for this is the necessity of preserving the integrity of the Canadian constitutional structure, and Canadian sovereignty. As this Court cautioned in Kazemi Estate v. Islamic Republic of Iran, 2014 SCC 62, [2014] 3 SCR 176, "[t]he interaction between domestic and international law must be managed carefully in light of the principles governing what remains a dualist system of application of international law and a constitutional and parliamentary democracy": para. 150…
> In all, courts must be careful not to indiscriminately agglomerate the traditional Big M Drug Mart factors with international and comparative law. The analysis must be dominated by the former and draw on the latter only as appropriate, accompanied by an explanation of why a non-binding source is being considered and how it is being used, including the persuasive weight being assigned to it.

b. Justice Abella (Karakatsanis and Martin JJ. concurring) defended a much more liberal approach to reliance on international law in Charter interpretation, fueled by a commitment to the Post World War II consensus, and a view of modern constitutional rights adjudication as part of an international dialogue. She wrote:

> World War II's shocking indifference to human dignity and the devastating human rights abuses it tolerated, resulted not only in responsive protections in international human rights instruments, but also in domestic rights guarantees such as the Canadian Bill of Rights and, ultimately, the constitutional protection of rights and freedoms in the Charter.

> Since Canada's rights protections emerged from the same chrysalis of outrage as other countries around the world, it is helpful to compare Canada's prohibition against cruel and unusual treatment or punishment with how courts around the world have interpreted the numerous international human rights instruments containing provisions that closely mirror the language of s. 12. As Professor Dodek points out, since courts face common problems, considering how other courts have addressed them can assist in determining how to exercise judicial discretion ("Comparative Law at the Supreme Court of Canada in 2008: Limited Engagement and Missed Opportunities" (2009), 47 S.C.L.R. (2d) 445, at p. 454). In other words, "the search for wisdom is not to be circumscribed by national boundaries" (Hogg, at s. 36.9(c))…
> Narrowing our approach by putting unnecessary barriers in the way of access to international and comparative sources gratuitously threatens to undermine Canada's leading voice internationally in constitutional adjudication, a role based on its willingness to go wide and deep in the global search for the best intellectual resources it can find…
> All of the relevant international sources in this case lead to the irrefutable inference that the prohibition against cruel and unusual punishment is about protecting human beings from the infliction of inhuman and degrading punishment. None of them include, or have been held to include, protection for corporations. While this international consensus does not dictate the outcome, it provides compelling and relevant interpretive support. It is part of the development of an international perspective on how rights should be protected, a perspective developed pursuant to the global commitment made in 1945 to internationalize those protections, and a perspective in whose promotion Canada's jurisprudence has played a leading role. Considering what and how laws and decisions have been applied on related questions by other countries and institutions, is part not only of an ongoing global judicial conversation, but of the epistemological package constitutional courts routinely rely on.

What divides Brown and Rowe JJ., and Abella J.? Who gets the better of the exchange? Does being faithful to the Charter require us to remain within its bounds when interpreting it? Are the worries about relying on international law attenuated by the claim that its authority is merely persuasive?

11. In the chapters that follow, you will encounter tests that the Supreme Court of Canada has formulated to determine whether the purpose of a particular right or freedom has been breached. With respect to each of these tests, ask yourself whether the test and its application respects or effaces the principles of purposive interpretation formulated in this chapter.

Chapter 15: The Charter's General Provisions

1 Section 27 of the Charter: Multicultural Heritage

By Natasha Bakht

1.1 The Text

Section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

> This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Section 27 of the Charter is an interpretive tool, rather than an independent right, that assists in interpreting the Charter's substantive rights and freedoms (Church of Atheism of Central Canada v Canada (National Revenue), 2019 FCA 296 para 15; Hak c Procureur général du Québec, 2021 QCCS 1466 at para 638). The provision uses the mandatory language of "shall", meaning that Canada's multicultural heritage must be considered in the interpretation of the other provisions in the Charter.

1.2 History and Purpose

Historically, section 27 was advocated for by European ethnic organizations seeking to express recognition of multiculturalism to counteract the dominance of English and French culture and language in the draft Charter (Matt James, Misrecognized Materialists: Social Movements in Canadian Constitutional Politics (Vancouver: UBC Press, 2006) at 78-80).

Section 27 has been used in combination with other Charter rights to protect the rights and interests of minority communities.

1.3 Scholarly interpretation of section 27's purpose

Several scholars have argued for a broad and liberal interpretation of the words "preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians" in section 27. Ayelet Shachar has argued that "multi" in multicultural means that the interpretation of the Charter must prioritize not the majority community, but the interests of nondominant minority communities and their members. Evelyn Kallen has argued that the cultural heritage and distinctiveness of minority communities invariably involves a history of human rights violations including collective experiences of defamation, racial and cultural persecution and incarceration (Evelyn Kallen, "Multiculturalism, Minorities, and Motherhood: A Social Scientific Critique of Section 27" in Canadian Human Rights Foundation, ed, Multiculturalism and the Charter: A Legal Perspective (Toronto: Carswell, 1987) 123). Faisal Bhabha contends that the section promotes the idea that diversity is itself a good, and part of a common heritage shared by all Canadians. Natasha Bakht has argued that because s 27 serves to add meaning to the various rights in the Charter, it can amplify the multiple dimensions of these rights through an intersectional approach.

1.4 Uses of Section 27

1.4.1 Uses of Section 27 – Religious Freedom

In R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, one of the first cases in which section 27 was invoked, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the federal Lord's Day Act, which prohibited commercial business's from operating on Sundays. In the Court's view:

> [T]o accept that Parliament retains the right to compel universal observance of the day of rest preferred by one religion is not consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. To do so is contrary to the expressed provisions of s. 27… R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 S.C.R 295 at para 99:

In R v Edwards Books and Art Ltd et al, 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, the Supreme Court of Canada drew on section 27 when determining that freedom of conscience and religion under section 2(a) prohibited indirect restrictions on religious practice. In her partly dissenting judgment in that case, Justice Wilson agreed with the majority that an Ontario law that prohibited retail operations on Sundays (in order to ensure a common pause day for workers in the province) breached s. 2(a) because it indirectly imposed an economic penalty on the religious observance of Jewish and other retailers who regarded Saturday as the Sabbath, and would either have to close their stores on both days of the weekend (which was commercially unviable) or open on Saturdays contrary to their religious beliefs. She found, with the assistance of section 27, that such a violation could not be saved by section 1 (at para 207):

> It seems to me that s. 3(4) of the Retail Business Holidays Act purports to recognize a group right, namely the right of those who close on Saturdays on religious grounds to stay open on Sundays because otherwise their s. 2(a) right would be violated. But it does not recognize the group right of all members of the group, only of some. Accordingly, the violation of the s. 2(a) right of the others has legislative sanction. Yet it seems to me that when the Charter protects group rights such as freedom of religion, it protects the rights of all members of the group. It does not make fish of some and fowl of the others. For, quite apart from considerations of equality, to do so is to introduce an invidious distinction into the group and sever the religious and cultural tie that binds them together. It is, in my opinion, an interpretation of the Charter expressly precluded by s. 27 which requires the Charter to be interpreted "in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians". Can it then be a reasonable limit under s. 1? In my opinion, it can not.

In Mouvement laïque québécois v Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 3 at para 74, the Supreme Court of Canada decided that s. 27 supported the recognition of a duty on the state to remain neutral in matters of religion:

> …[A] neutral public space free from coercion, pressure and judgment on the part of public authorities in matters of spirituality is intended to protect every person's freedom and dignity. The neutrality of the public space therefore helps preserve and promote the multicultural nature of Canadian society enshrined in s. 27 of the Canadian Charter. Section 27 requires that the state's duty of neutrality be interpreted not only in a manner consistent with the protective objectives of the Canadian Charter, but also with a view to promoting and enhancing diversity

Section 27 was also taken in to account by the Ontario Court of Appeal in a judgment about whether a sexual assault complainant could be permitted to wear a niqab while testifying at a criminal trial (R v NS, 2010 ONCA 670, aff'd, 2012 SCC 72 (CanLII), [2012] 3 SCR 726).

The Court of Appeal for Ontario noted in R v NS, 2010 ONCA 670 at para 79:

> Perhaps the most difficult aspect of the contextual analysis is that which requires the court to take into account other constitutional values and societal interests that may be affected by the judge's decision whether a witness should be required to remove her niqab. N.S. is a Muslim, a minority that many believe is unfairly maligned and stereotyped in contemporary Canada. A failure to give adequate consideration to N.S.'s religious beliefs would reflect and, to some extent, legitimize that negative stereotyping. Allowing her to wear a niqab could be seen as a recognition and acceptance of those minority beliefs and practices and, therefore, a reflection of the multicultural heritage of Canada recognized in s. 27 of the Charter. Permitting N.S. to wear her niqab would also broaden access to the justice system for those in the position of N.S., by indicating that participation in the justice system would not come at the cost of compromising one's religious beliefs.

The case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. While the majority judgment made no mention of section 27, Justice Lebel in a concurring opinion referred to section 27. However, he concluded that the right to a fair trial requires that the witness' face in a criminal case must be visible, with the consequence that the wearing of a niqab by a witness was prohibited (R v NS, 2012 SCC 72 at para 72):

> Dickson C.J. recognized in Oakes that the Charter is grounded in a long history and tradition. The "living tree" keeps growing, but always from its roots. Today, we may rightly say that, in s. 27 of the Charter, Canada accepts the importance of multiculturalism in its social life. In s. 27, Canada signals its acceptance that it's changing through every day of its history. At the same time, however, the recognition of multiculturalism takes place in the environment of the Constitution itself, and is rooted in its political and legal traditions. The Constitution requires an openness to new differences that appear within Canada, but also an acceptance of the principle that it remains connected with the roots of our contemporary democratic society.

1.4.2 Uses of section 27 – Equality

In Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 143 at para 34, the Supreme Court used s. 27 to support the view that the equality guarantee does not mandate identical treatment (that everyone be treated the same): "If the Charter was intended to eliminate all distinctions, then there would be no place for sections such as 27 (multicultural heritage) ... and other such provisions designed to safeguard certain distinctions."

1.4.3 Uses of section 27 – Due Process

Section 27 has supported substantive rights in due process cases.

The Supreme Court of Canada declined to create a general or prima facie privilege for a self-incriminating confession made by an accused to a minister or other religious advisor but said that the question of whether a religious communication should be treated as privileged should be decided on a case-by-case basis. Relying on section 27, the Court held that "the case-by-case analysis must begin with a 'non-denominational' approach" that is sensitive to the fact of Canada's multicultural heritage and that accordingly does not advantage "'confessional' communications." R v Gruenke, 1991 CanLII 40 (SCC), [1991] 3 SCR 263 at 291, 314.

The Supreme Court of Canada relied on s. 27 in extending the right (under s. 14) of a party or witness in a court proceeding to the assistance of an interpreter to languages other than just English and French:

> In so far as a multicultural heritage is necessarily a multilingual one, it follows that a multicultural society can only be preserved and fostered if those who speak languages other than English and French are given real and substantive access to the criminal justice system. R v Tran, 1994 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1994] 2 SCR 951 at para 37.

In R v Fiddler (1994), 1994 CanLII 7396 (ON SC), 22 CRR (2d) 82 at paras 111-112, the Ontario Court (Gen Div) held that section 27 did not assist the accused in his claim that the right to a fair trial requires that a jury be composed of individuals of his own race.

> [S]ection 27 of the Charter does not assist the applicant either. Quite simply, I do not accept the proposition urged by the applicant that his inability to have a jury of his cultural peers impairs his right to live on the Sandy Lake reserve; nor does it impair his right to preserve his native heritage.
> > The right of Indians to serve on a jury in a particular proportion is not a right encompassed under Section 25. Nor does Section 27, providing for interpretation of the Charter in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians, assist the appellant. On the contrary, it supports the position of the Crown that every qualified citizen is entitled to be called for jury duty [R v Kent, (1986) 1986 CanLII 4745 (MB CA), 27 C.C.C. (3d) 405 at 422 (Man CA)].
> In my respectful view, any significant shift in the law which holds out the deliberate prospect of uni-racial or uni-cultural juries has great potential to damage the administration of justice in the eyes of the public and is likely to harm, rather than preserve or enhance the diverse heritage of Canada. Courts should pause before they decide to act as instruments of change with respect to cultural rights [Societe des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick Inc v Association of Parents for Fairness in Education, 1986 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 549 at 578.]

However, section 27 did support the claim that a jury should be representative of the diversity in Canadian society (R v Brown (Application to prohibit Crown discrimination in peremptory challenges) [1999] OJ No 4867 (Ont Ct (Gen Div)):

> Section 27, provides that "(the) Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians". So, for example, if a jury already includes a number of black people, the challenging of another black person by the Crown Attorney on the basis of race for the purpose and with the effect of fostering the representativeness of the jury itself through the selection of other races may withstand judicial scrutiny under the Charter. It is the discriminatory use of the discretion that is not compatible with the Charter and is outside the ambit of the power given by s. 634 of the Code.

1.4.4 Uses of section 27 – Freedom of Expression

Section 27 has been used multiple times by the courts when considering the justification of limits on freedom of expression under section 1 of the Charter.

In R v Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697 at para 77, section 27 was used by the Supreme Court of Canada to support the limitation of freedom of expression to protect vulnerable groups from the harmful effects of hate speech:

> This Court has where possible taken account of s. 27 and its recognition that Canada possesses a multicultural society in which the diversity and richness of various cultural groups is a value to be protected and enhanced. Section 27 has therefore been used in a number of judgments of this Court, both as an aid in interpreting the definition of Charter rights and freedoms (see, e.g., Big M Drug Mart, supra, per Dickson J., at pp. 337-38, Edwards Books, supra, per Dickson C.J., at p. 758; and Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, supra, per McIntyre J., at p. 171) and as an element in the s. 1 analysis (see, e.g., Edwards Books, per La Forest J., at p. 804, and Wilson J., at p. 809).
> The value expressed in s. 27 cannot be casually dismissed in assessing the validity of s. 319(2) under s. 1, and I am of the belief that s. 27 and the commitment to a multicultural vision of our nation bear notice in emphasizing the acute importance of the objective of eradicating hate propaganda from society.

Similarly, the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Andrews 1990 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 870 at 880 held that section 27 supported the justification under section 1 of the criminal law ban on hate propaganda:

> It is our multicultural background that gives richness, depth and vibrance to Canadian society. The Charter has recognized and emphasized the importance of our background by providing that the Charter itself is to be interpreted so as to preserve and enhance our multicultural heritage. That clause in itself gives a very clear indication that s. 1 of the Charter should be applied in this case. The clause coupled with the Canadian multicultural heritage gives the strongest possible direction to apply s. 1.

In Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor, 1990 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 892 at para 45 the majority of the Supreme Court in applying the section 1 Oakes test to a human rights code restriction on hate speech, again found that the protection of minority groups from such speech was supported by both ss 15 and 27 and was sufficient to justify the limitation of freedom expression under section 2(b).

> That the values of equality and multiculturalism are enshrined in ss. 15 and 27 of the Charter further magnify the weightiness of Parliament's objective in enacting s. 13(1). These Charter provisions indicate that the guiding principles in undertaking the s. 1 inquiry include respect and concern for the dignity and equality of the individual and a recognition that one's concept of self may in large part be a function of membership in a particular cultural group. As the harm flowing from hate propaganda works in opposition to these linchpin Charter principles, the importance of taking steps to limit its pernicious effects becomes manifest.

In R v Zundel, 1992 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 731, the Supreme Court of Canada considered the constitutionality of section 181 of the Criminal Code, which prohibited anyone from publishing a statement that they knew was false and that was likely to cause injury to the public interest. The majority of the Court decided that the law breached section 2(b) of the Charter and that this infringement was not justified under section 1. In a dissenting opinion, Justices Iacobucci, Cory and Gonthier held that a court should consider ss. 7, 15 and 27 of the Charter when determining the scope of the term public interest. Their judgment at para 182 offered an extended analysis of constitutional multiculturalism:

> It is perhaps an indication of the genius of Canada and Canadians that the supreme law of the land would recognize the existence of multiculturalism in our country and encourage its enhancement. Our country has benefited from and has been enriched by the efforts and accomplishments of Canadians of many different races, religions and nationalities. The recognition of multiculturalism in the Charter is an attempt to achieve the epitome of democratic societies.

They continued at para 188,

> Section 27 of the Charter is not merely the reflection of a fleetingly popular concept. Rather it is a magnificent recognition of the history of Canada and of an essential precept for the achievement of those elusive goals of justice and true equality. People must be able to take pride in their roots, their religion and their culture. It is only then that people of every race, colour, religion and nationality can feel secure in the knowledge that they are truly equal to all other Canadians.

1.5 Limits of Section 27

Section 27 may be used to enhance and reinforce the special rights of constitutionally protected communities in Canada but not to extend these rights across multiple communities.

1.5.1 Limits of Section 27 - Language Rights

In Mahe v Alberta, [1990] 1 SCR 432, Chief Justice Brian Dickson when considering language rights under s. 23 of the Charter said the following:

> While I agree that it is often useful to consider the relationship between different sections of the Charter, in the interpretation of s. 23 I do not think it helpful in the present context to refer to either s. 15 or s. 27. Section 23 provides a comprehensive code for minority language educational rights; it has its own internal qualifications and its own method of internal balancing. A notion of equality between Canada's official language groups is obviously present in s. 23. Beyond this, however, the section is, if anything, an exception to the provisions of ss. 15 and 27 in that it accords these groups, the English and the French, special status in comparison to all other linguistic groups in Canada. As the Attorney General for Ontario observes, it would be totally incongruous to invoke in aid of the interpretation of a provision which grants special rights to a select group of individuals, the principle of equality intended to be universally applicable to "every individual".

1.5.2 Limits of Section 27 - Denominational Schools

In Adler v Ontario, 1996 CanLII 148 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 609 the Supreme Court of Canada held that because the 1867 constitution guaranteed public funding to separate (Roman Catholic) schools in Ontario, the province's exclusive funding of separate and public schools and its refusal to fund other religious schools did not breach s. 15 or s. 2(a) of the Charter. In reaching this conclusion the Court took account of s. 27:

> In applying s. 15 in the context of the denial of funding for education to those who cannot access it for religious reasons, s. 27 supports a finding that the interests at stake, the preservation and continuation of the communities in question, do form interests fundamental to the purposes of the Charter.

However, the infringement of section 2 (a) was justified under section 1 given the privileged place that Roman Catholic separate schools are given under s. 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

1.5.3 Section 27 can enhance rights of constitutionally protected communities

In Reference re Education Act of Ontario and Minority Language Rights (1984), 1984 CanLII 1832 (ON CA), 47 OR (2d) 1 (CA) at para 96, section 27 was used to enhance the language-education rights of the French -speaking community in Ontario:

> Section 27 is particularly pertinent to a provision such as s. 23 because, as the Symons Report expressed it at pp. 13-5 (app. "C", A.C.F.O., No. 5):
> > The French language school provides a setting within which the Francophone student will have a better opportunity to come to know and to understand and to strengthen and develop their own culture and heritage ... [t]he school occupies a central role in the cultural life of the linguistic community ... [t]he French language schools must truly be community schools and easily accessible to the general population of the linguistic group they exist to serve ... [t]his Commission shares the belief, which is widely held by Franco-Ontarians, that the establishment of French language schools in which the language of both communication and administration is French best meets this ... need to preserve the language, customs and culture of the Francophone student.
> In the light of s. 27, s. 23(3)(b) should be interpreted to mean that minority language children must receive their instruction in facilities in which the educational environment will be that of the linguistic minority. Only then can the facilities reasonably be said to reflect the minority culture and appertain to the minority.

Section 27 was also used in Lalonde v Ontario (Commission de restructuration des services de santé), (1999), 1999 CanLII 19910 (ON SCDC), 48 OR (3d) 50 (Div Ct) at paras 44-46 to reinforce the entitlements of the francophone community:

> First, the "minority protection" argument in this case is strengthened and fed by the reality that the minority in question is a francophone minority, whose culture and language hold a special place in the Canadian fabric as one of the founding cultural communities of Canada and as one of the two official language groups whose rights are entrenched in the Constitution.
> Section 27 of the Constitution Act, 1982 states:
> 27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.
> Thus, multiculturalism is in itself a value recognized and nurtured in the Constitution generally, as well as in the Charter which forms part of that Constitution. With its official language and founding culture status, the minority francophone culture occupies an enhanced multicultural status. English and French are accorded special status in comparison to other linguistic groups in Canada: see Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 342 at p. 369, 68 D.L.R. (4th) 69.

1.6 Questions

1. Has section 27 proven to be a mere "rhetorical flourish" as constitutional scholar Peter Hogg noted in 1981? (Peter Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada and Canada Act Annotated, 2nd ed (Toronto: Carswell, 1981) at 72)
2. Would you describe the impact of section 27 on constitutional jurisprudence as positive? Why or why not?
3. Why has section 27 not produced a larger body of case law given the mandatory language of the provision?
4. Sometimes courts refer to multiculturalism without referencing section 27 (see for example, Syndicat Northcrest v Amselem, 2004 SCC 47 at para 87, Multani v Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys 2006 SCC 6 at para 71, and Bruker v Marcovitz, 2007 SCC 54 at para 14). Why might this occur?

2 Section 28 of the Charter: Equal Rights for Male and Female Persons

By Kerri Froc

2.1 The Text

Section 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

> Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

Section 28 is a guarantee of equal rights to "male and female persons," rather than an equality guarantee based on grounds (i.e., sex and/or gender). Given the history in which women's rights were not given full recognition under the Canadian Bill of Rights and the American Bill of Rights, it was meant to ensure that women were able to equally enjoy and exercise all Charter rights and freedoms. Section 28 requires courts to employ a "gender lens" so that their interpretations further this purpose (G.(J)., Osolin). However, unlike section 27, section 28 does not contain words that suggest it is only an interpretive provision.

Section 28 depends on other rights and freedoms "referred to" in the Charter for its scope. However, the Supreme Court of Canada has yet to rule on whether the word "guaranteed" means that it contains a substantive right, particularly one that is different from the sex equality guarantee in section 15. If given such an interpretation, section 28 could become increasingly important given the doctrinal complexities in section 15 that continue to bedevil its application, with women winning their first sex discrimination case at the Supreme Court of Canada, Alliance, only in 2018.

The phrase, "Notwithstanding anything in this Charter" signals its primacy over other Charter provisions. However, there has been little jurisprudence interpreting section 28 and courts have not been consistent in deciding whether it has the power to limit the effect of all other Charter provisions (such as sections 1 and 33 – the "notwithstanding clause") to the extent that they would otherwise result in unequal rights. The British Columbia Court of Appeal has stated that "section 28 is a provision dealing with the interpretation of the Charter. It does not, by itself, purport to confer any rights, and therefore cannot be 'contravened'" (McIvor v Canada (Registrar, Indian and Northern Affairs)*, 2009 BCCA 153 para. 64). On the other hand, Justice Barry Strayer from the Federal Court earlier pronounced that section 28 "would preclude a section 1 limitation imposed on the… section 15 rights of men alone" (1987 CanLII 8948 (FC), [1988] 1 FC 369), a finding not addressed by the Federal Court of Appeal, nor by the Supreme Court of Canada when it reversed the decision on other grounds (1993 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 872).

2.2 Purpose and History

This section was drafted by and added to the Charter because of feminist advocacy during the constitutional negotiations. These advocates were part of a group called "Ad Hockers," and were named after a February 1981 "ad hoc" conference attended by approximately 1300 women across Canada to debate the changes that needed to be made to the draft Charter and to give instructions to a small group of women that would lobby for changes. Most notable was the need to include a sex equality "purpose clause," which ultimately became section 28. Ad Hockers were skeptical about the ability of section 15 alone to secure women's equality, particularly given the ability of governments to justify sex discrimination using section 1 (which advocates called "the Mack truck clause"). It was to reinforce gender equality as a pre-eminent Charter value, to preclude women's rights from being devalued in favour of supposed "collective" interests, and to ensure that other Charter provisions did not become new sources of inequality for women.

2.3 Scholarly interpretation of section 28

There is a dramatic divergence between how feminist scholars and others have interpreted section 28. Feminist scholars have argued for an interpretation of section 28 that not only provides an umbrella of gender equality over the entire Charter but functions as a substantive guarantee of equal rights that cannot be subjugated by other provisions. In this way, section 28 has distinct functions that do not replicate those of the sex equality guarantee in section 15(1).

Relying on the earlier work of Katherine de Jong, constitutional law professor Kerri A. Froc has argued that section 28 has three functions. First, it mandates a "gender lens" be employed over the entire Charter's interpretation; this includes requiring that sections 25 and 27 be read "through" section 28 so that they cannot be used to derogate from the equal rights guarantee. Second, it contains a substantive equal rights guarantee that is violated when governments unequally restrict or facilitate the exercise of a right as between "male and female persons." Third, it prohibits other Charter provisions becoming a new source of inequality for women (and thus acting as a "shield" against sections 1 and 33 to the extent that their application would result in unequal rights). Emmett Macfarlane has expressed agreement with section 28 having the latter function.

Professor Beverley Baines has described section 28 as rights bearing, or at the very least, "rights enhancing," in that it either preserves a Charter right or "alters the scope of a limit." Within that scope, section 28 performs a number of functions: it can provide justification for provisions that infringe men's formal equality rights but enhance women's substantive equality, limit governmental recourse to section 1 where women's equality would be violated, preclude resort to the section 33 "notwithstanding clause" to override women's rights, and ensure that section 27 does not derogate from the equality guarantee. Of course, the Supreme Court of Canada has already recognized that section 15's sex equality guarantee influences the interpretation of other rights (Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 143 at 185; New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 46 at para 112). However, Baines states that section 28 might perform a helpful, additional function in encouraging courts to adopt an intersectional analysis, by integrating an analysis of sex by virtue of section 28 with other ground(s) of discrimination claimed under section 15.

Scholar of statutory interpretation, Elmer Driedger famously wrote that section 28 was a "queer provision" that "means and accomplishes nothing." Peter Hogg's textbook, Constitutional Law of Canada, stated that section 28 had "very little work to do" as the other provisions would apply equally to male and female persons anyway. Quebec scholars Henri Brun and Guy Tremblay, in their text, state that section 28 means that "discrimination on grounds of sex would be prohibited absolutely," and that section 33 cannot apply to discrimination based on sex under s.15(1) Droit constitutionnel, 4th ed, (Cowansville, Éditions Yvon Blais, 2002) at 1079, as cited in Syndicat, below). This was a view shared by Dale Gibson (The Law of the Charter: Equality Rights (Agincourt, ON: Carswell, 1990) at 209) and Walter Tarnopolsky (W.S . Tarnopolsky, "The Equality Rights In The Canadian Charter Of Rights and Freedoms" (1983) 61 Can Bar Rev 242 at 259).

More recent commentators arguing against section 28 being a substantive provision, point to its dependence on other rights for its content and its inclusion under the "General" heading in the Charter, along with sections 25 (concerning Indigenous collective rights and thought until Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation 2024 SCC 10 to be merely interpretive), and section 27 (explicitly interpretive). Guillaume Rousseau, in fact, argues that section 28's "notwithstanding anything" relates only to section 27. As well, commentators like Maxime St-Hilaire and Gerard Kennedy, cite former Assistant Deputy Minister of Justice Barry Strayer's recollection in support of section 28's exclusively interpretive function – that its purpose was mainly to curtail the use of sections 25 and 27 in interpretation. Asher Honickman relies on a textualist analysis, arguing that "guaranteed" used elsewhere in the Charter refers only to an "assurance of possession" and not signaling a substantive right. Others, such as Geoffrey Sigalet, argue that once section 33 is invoked, it is as if ss.2 and 7-15 cease to exist for the purposes of the impugned law and therefore nothing is left to "equalize" under section 28's mandate. Many also point to the paucity of jurisprudence on section 28 as showing that it could not possibly be one of the most powerful sections in the Charter (if not subject to ss.1 or 33). As we will see below, the Quebec Court of Appeal's reasons in the Hak v Quebec are similar.

2.4 Section 28's Application in Case Law

Section 28 has not been central to any cases in the past forty years, beyond some very early cases that suggested section 28 precluded governments from being able to justify sex discrimination against men under under section 1 (Weatherall v Canada (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 8948 (FC), [1988] 1 FC 369, 11 FTR 279, (TD), varied, [1988] FCJ No. 593 (CA), aff'd 1993 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 872; R v Howell (1986), 1986 CanLII 4769 (NL SC), 57 Nfld & PEIR 198, 26 CCC (3d) 104 at 109 (Nfld Dist Ct); R v Paquette (1988), 1988 CanLII 3345 (BC SC), 40 CRR 137, 1988 CarswellBC 1330 at para 8 (BCSC)).) Many of the judges in these early cases conceived section 28 as containing a formalist version of equality that did not permit any sex-based distinctions under law, even those that might have ameliorated women's inequality.

Nevertheless, it has played a supporting role in shaping the outcome of key constitutional decisions:

- Sexual violence and Gender Equality: In R v Osolin, 1993 CanLII 54 (SCC), [1993] 4 SCR 595, Justice Cory for the majority stated both sections 15 and 28 should be taken into account in determining the reasonable limitations placed on cross-examination of a sexual assault complainant. In R v Hess and R v Nguyen, R v Nguyen, 1990 CanLII 89 (SCC), [1990] 2 S.C.R 906, Justice Wilson in her majority reasons indicated that section 28 meant that a government could not argue that either sex was undeserving of the full protection of section 7 rights (there, including the right not to be convicted if one is "morally innocent"). In R v Butler 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452, the Court found that the violation of free expression in the Criminal Code obscenity provision was justified under section 1. It accepted the reasons of the lower court that section 28 and sexual equality were of sufficient importance to support the restriction of violent pornography.
- Access to Justice: New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 46 imposed a positive duty of government under Charter section 7 to provide legal aid counsel in child apprehension proceedings where a parent cannot adequately represent herself. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé pairs section 28 with section 15 in deeming "principles of equality…a significant influence on interpreting the scope of protection offered by s.7."

- Reproductive Rights: While not explicitly invoked by Justice Wilson in R v Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, her influential concurring decision resonates with section 28's equal rights norm. Differing from the male judges finding of a violation of s.7 security of the person, she found that the s.252 Criminal Code abortion prohibition violates women's right to liberty in a fundamentally unjust way. She advocated for the expansion of the traditional conception of rights to include women's interests and concerns (including their fundamental personal decisions regarding abortion). She reflected on the unique circumstances of unwanted pregnancy for women, remarking that it was "probably impossible for a man to respond, even imaginatively" to the dilemma of whether to carry them to term.
- Indigenous Rights: For the first time, the Supreme Court in Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10 recognized Charter section 25 as more than merely interpretive. It indicated that in the case of an irreconcilable conflict between Charter rights and Indigenous collective rights under s. 35, section 25 acted as a "pop up shield" to limit Charter rights to the extent of the conflict. Echoing an earlier concurring decision by Justice Bastarache in R v Kapp, 2008 SCC 41 (CanLII), [2008] 2 SCR 483, the Court recognized section 28's function as a shield to the shield. Justice Jamal for the majority stated that the primacy of section 35 was subject to section 28, which thereby "ensure[s] that a right protected under s. 25 does not shelter gender-based discrimination."

Compare the following excerpt from Syndicat de la fonction publique c. Procureur général du Québec, [2004] J.Q. No. 21, [2004] R.J.Q. 524, in which Justice Carole Julien, discussed in obiter the interaction of sections 28 and 33, with that of Justice Blanchard in Organisation mondiale sikhe du Canada v Procureur général du Québec, 2024 QCCA 254 [the appeal of the above-mentioned Hak decision], deciding that section 28 did not have the power to shield women's equal right to freedom of expression from the "notwithstanding clause". Which do you find more persuasive?

2.4.1 Syndicat de la fonction publique du Québec inc. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [2004] R.J.Q. 524

[The case involved a section 15 challenge brought by numerous employee associations and unions, including those representing workers in Quebec's public service, health, education, and social services sectors. The challenge was directed at Chapter IX of Quebec's Pay Equity Act, which deemed employers who had begun or completed pay equity before the coming into force of the new Act, to have complied with the Act if their plans met a number of basic requirements rather than all of the requirements under the new Act. The overseeing body for pay equity, the Commission de l'équité salariale (CES) had no ability to assess whether, in fact, these pay equity plans were achieving the results of increased pay equity (unlike the companies under the regular requirements).

Chapter IX affected approximately 120 companies, including large employers such as Concordia University, Desjardins Group, and several insurance entities, as well as the Government of Quebec itself, which employed over 500,000 people. Most of these employers had more than 100 employees, which would otherwise place them in the group subject to the Act's most rigorous requirements.

The plaintiffs alleged that Chapter IX discriminated on the basis of sex contrary to section 15, creating a class of employees whose rights were diminished compared to those under the general regime. These employees had no guaranteed participation in the pay equity process, limited access to recourse or appeals, and were often locked into employer-dominated plans that lacked transparency and adequate mechanisms to address systemic gender discrimination. Expert evidence filed in the case highlighted persistent patterns of occupational segregation and wage disparities for women, as well as the failure of prior mechanisms—such as complaint-based remedies under the Quebec Charter—to effectively address wage discrimination.

The excerpt provided is an unofficial translation of the case assisted by a computer translation program. It concerns only her comments on section 28.]

Julien S.C.J.:

1397 The plaintiffs have the burden of proving infringement of the rights protected by the Canadian Charter by making a prima facie case. Such a demonstration affects the presumption of validity of the law and reverses the burden of proof. It is then up to the state wishing to avail itself of it to prove that the law meets the criteria of section 1 as discussed in the judgment Oakes. In the present case, as we know, the AG does not rely on section 1 of the Canadian Charter.

Gender equality

1406 We know that section 15 of the Canadian Charter enshrines the right to equality between the sexes. If so, why was section 28 introduced into the Canadian Charter ? What is its meaning? What is its scope?

1407 Recall the wording of sections 15(1) and 28:

> s. 15 (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination or discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.
> s. 28 Notwithstanding any other provision of this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to therein are guaranteed equally to persons of both sexes.

2.3.1 The Historical Context of Section 28 of the Canadian Charter

1408 According to the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, women have been pushing for the right to gender equality in the context of the advent of the Canadian Charter.

1409 They obtained the protection afforded by section 15. However, they were concerned about the scope of section 1 interpreted as restricting the rights protected by the Canadian Charter :

> s. 1 The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in the Charter. They can only be limited by law, within such reasonable limits as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

1411 The women wanted a declaration of intent guaranteeing men and women equally the rights and freedoms set out in the Canadian Charter.

1412 This guarantee was not incorporated into section 1. It appeared in the form of section 28 on 21 April 1981. It aims to ensure the equality of persons of both sexes independently of the other provisions of the Canadian Charter.

1413 Later, in November 1981, following a federal-provincial conference, section 33 was introduced in the Canadian Charter. This section allows provincial governments to override the obligations set out in the Canadian Charter, including the right to gender equality protected by sections 15 and 28.

1414 Women's groups mobilized again. On November 24, 1981, the federal and provincial governments agreed to remove the express reference to section 28 from the wording of section 33, which now reads as follows:

> s. 33 Parliament or the legislature of a province may enact any law expressly declaring that the Act or any provision of the Act has effect notwithstanding any provision of section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

1415 Thus, the Quebec legislature could, by section 33, expressly derogate from section 15. However, would the right to gender equality be an exception because of Article 28?

2.3.2 The Doctrinal and Jurisprudential Interpretation of Article 28 in Relation to Article 33

1416 In general, the authors agree that the protection of gender equality should be given primacy by section 28. Thus, although the principle of equality provided for in section 15 may be set aside by the legislator under Article 33, no law could even expressly make a distinction based on sex on pain of invalidity.

1417 The author, André Tremblay, expresses himself as follows:

> Section 15 sets out a four-part principle of equality…The preferred ground of discrimination is sex, since section 28 ensures the absolute equality of both sexes with respect to the rights and freedoms mentioned in the Charter. In other words, section 28 creates an irrebuttable presumption of invalidity for violations of gender equality, and this cannot be changed or diminished by neither section 1 nor by section 33 of the Charter. [Emphasis added]

1418 The education provided to lawyers in 1982 by the Continuing Education Department of the Barreau du Québec was along these lines:

> Section 15 must be read in conjunction with section 28 .... Let us say right away that equality rights are subject to the possible application of the notwithstanding clause in section 33. However, the equality of the two sexes is not covered by the notwithstanding clause. whereas section 28 begins with the words: "Notwithstanding anything in this Charter...". [Emphasis added]

1420 This position is followed by Gérald A. Beaudoin:

> This section 28 ensures that section 33, which applies to section 15, cannot, in our view, apply to the principle of equality of the two sexes; No legislator may, by using the "notwithstanding" clause, enact a measure violating equality between men and women. [Emphasis added]

1421 Author William F. Pentney is particularly eloquent:

> This would result in a higher status for gender equality under section 15 than other grounds of discrimination, and this would undoubtedly allow section 28 to achieve its purpose by making the equality guaranteed by section 15 more meaningful and effective. In my opinion, this is the minimum role that can be attributed to section 28. If it does not at least provide the strongest possible protection for gender equality under section 15, it will be a superfluous provision and its inclusion in the Charter will have been a cruel sham. [Emphasis added]

1422 Thus, according to the authors, because of the historical context of its enactment and the objectives pursued, section 28 would specifically protect the right to equality of the sexes. The legislator cannot not derogate from it by application of section 33.

1423 In 1984, the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal upheld this interpretation in Boudreau v. Lynch….:

> By doing so [article 28], the legislators have treated sexual discrimination as the most odious form of discrimination and taken away from legislative bodies the right to perpetrate it in the future. Other types of discrimination may, without reasons being given, be carried on under the legislative override provisions of s. 33.

2.3.3 The Doctrinal and Jurisprudential Interpretation of Article 28 in Relation to Articles 1 and 32

1424 The doctrine of the primacy of the right to equality between the sexes is controversial with regard to Articles 1 and 32. It should be noted that section 32 delayed the effect of section 15 for a period of three years…

1425 According to some, section 28 does not have a stand-alone existence of section 15 for the purposes of section 32. A different opinion was expressed in 1985. Some commentators believed that section 28 allowed section 32 to be circumvented. With respect to section 1, some decisions are of the view that section 28 takes precedence and others not. The authors disagree on this issue.

1426 The authors Brun and Tremblay propose the following solution:

> Section 28 provides that Charter rights are guaranteed equally to both sexes, independently of the other provisions of the Charter. In relation to Charter rights, discrimination on the basis of sex would therefore be absolutely prohibited. Thus, section 33, which provides for the possibility of express derogation from rights, could not apply to discrimination on the basis of sex prohibited by subsection 15(1): Boudreau v. Lynch (1985) 1984 CanLII 3055 (NS SC), 16 D.L.R. (4th) 610 (N.S.C.A.). It is difficult, however, to draw the conclusion that section 28 precludes the application of sections 1 and 15(2) of the Charter in the case of sex discrimination: this would mean that any positive intervention in favour of women, or possibly men, would be impossible. In our view, sections 1 and 15(2) apply to sex discrimination in the same way as to other kinds of discrimination prohibited by subsection 15(1), despite the wording of section 28, because they are essentially clauses designed to ensure a proper understanding of what the equality rights in subsection 15(1) mean. and not clauses intended to allow Article 15 to be set aside or circumvented. Section 28 gives gender equality primacy over other Charter rights, as they result from the set of provisions that contribute to their enunciation. Section 28 has also assisted the courts in concluding that some repression of pornographic expression may restrict 2(b) freedom of expression under section 1. See in this sense R. v. Red Hot Video, (1985) 1985 CanLII 633 (BC

SC), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 1 (B.C.C.A.). See also R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452. On the other hand, section 28 cannot compel the government to fund or consult with a women's group: Native Women's Association of Canada v. Canada, [1994] 3 SCR 627.[326] (Our Highlights)

2.3.4 Conclusions on the Scope of Section 28

1427 The scope of section 28 is a controversial issue, particularly with regard to the provisions of the Canadian Charter that would limit the right to equality between the sexes.

1428 This controversy concerns Articles 1 and 32 in particular. It is not for the Tribunal to resolve it in this judgment. Articles 1 and 32 have an objective of their own which is not at issue in the context of this judgment.

1429 That said, the prevailing view is in favour of the primacy of section 28 over section 33.

1430 This aspect is interesting. If the legislature cannot, even expressly by recourse to section 33, override the principle of the right to equality between the sexes by statute, much less can it do so indirectly and implicitly by the operation of a statute. This will be particularly the case when the Act expressly aims at the opposite, i.e. the implementation of the right to equality between the sexes.

1431 Thus, faced with the need to interpret the scope of the right to equality between the sexes provided for in section 15, the Tribunal will be particularly cautious in resolving any doubt raised by the facts or the Act in favour of the protection of that right. Section 28, if necessary, offers no alternative unless an attempt is made to justify it under section 1. Such a justification would be controversial because of section 28, but in any event none of the respondents or third parties attempt to do so.

1432 Section 28 strengthens the guarantee of equality between the sexes and affects the interpretation of section 15.

1433 In considering an allegation of discrimination on the basis of sex, the court must give greater weight to the right to gender equality than to the economic costs associated with achieving pay equity for employers who made efforts to achieve pay equity prior to the enactment of the Act.

[Justice Carole Julien agreed with the plaintiffs and found that Chapter IX violated section 15(1) by discriminating against employed women, who were the ones who needed pay equity. She emphasized that the decision-making framework in Chapter IX undermined the fundamental objectives of the Pay Equity Act and perpetuated systemic discrimination by allowing inadequate scrutiny of pre-existing employer-led pay equity plans.]

1532 The Canadian Charter protects the right to equality between the sexes in a specific way through section 28. The court must be particularly demanding when assessing the validity of a law which, by its effects, infringes on gender equality. Chapter IX does not constitute a distinction that respects the values of the Canadian Charter, such as affirmative action against a target group. Quite the contrary.

1546 The issue to be decided is the exercise of a fundamental right related to the right to equality. The legislature itself recognizes that this right is systematically and generally violated, since it imposes, in order to remedy it, a law of general application with a great deal of appeal to the dignity of women and to human rights.

1547 This case is important because it deals with an aspect of this fundamental right protected by the Canadian Constitution. It determines the economic life of these women, their ability to assume their financial responsibilities towards themselves and their loved ones.

2.4.2 World Sikh Organization of Canada, Amrit Kaur (Appellants - Intervenors) v. Attorney General of Quebec, 2024 QCCA 254

Per curiam:

[The Quebec Court of Appeal reviewed a Superior Court decision that had partially invalidated provisions of Quebec's Act respecting the laicity of the State, known as Bill 21. Bill 21 precludes certain government officials or employees, from daycare workers to members of the National Assembly, from wearing religious symbols while performing their duties (s.6) and bans religious face coverings while giving or receiving government services (s.8). Bill 21 invoked the "notwithstanding clause" so that it operated notwithstanding ss.2 and 7-15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Unlike previous Quebec laws, Bill 21 does not allow for affected individuals to request religious accommodation so that they may exempted from its application. The Superior Court had ruled that certain parts of the Act violated sections 3 (democratic rights) and 23 (minority language educational rights)—rendering them of no force or effect. Multiple parties appealed these findings, including the Attorney General of Quebec and various advocacy groups, both in support of and against the law. The Court of Appeal upheld much of the trial judge's reasoning but overturned the lower court's finding that the Act infringed section 23, concluding that the legislation does not violate minority language education rights. The following excerpt concerns the reasons of the Court of Appeal, upholding the trial judge's finding that Bill 21 did not violate section 28.]

I. PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS

11 That the Act is controversial obviously comes as no surprise. Indeed, it gives rise to a genuine and legitimate debate…

12 While there is heated public debate about the Act's impact on the freedoms of religion and expression, and about the very scope of these freedoms, the debate is just as heated regarding the right to equality, particularly sexual equality.

13 One can certainly have many different views on the Act and its appropriateness, whether from a political, sociological or moral perspective. This judgment, however, will evidently consider only the legal aspect of the debate. Like the Superior Court before it, the Court here is acting as part of a process — one initiated by various groups of litigants — to examine the legality of the Act, and it is not ruling on the wisdom of enacting it. The Court's scope of intervention is therefore limited.

51 To conclude this introduction to the Act, it is perhaps not inappropriate to note that the issue of state laicity has been the subject of a lengthy social and political conversation in Quebec. That conversation pre-dates the Quiet Revolution (although it effectively gained momentum in the 1960s) and led to the gradual laicization of a Quebec State that had long maintained a close, more or less formal, relationship with the Catholic Church (primarily), particularly in matters of education, where s. 93 of the CA 1867 offered a guarantee based on a religious division between Catholicism and Protestantism (a division that disappeared in 1997). This transformation of the relationship between the Quebec State and religions is well summarized in the report of the Consultation Commission on Accommodation Practices Related to Cultural Differences, which was co-chaired by Professors Gérard Bouchard and Charles Taylor.[59]

52 Indeed, it is relevant to mention this report, which was published in 2008, since the Act — or at least its broad strokes and terminology — was informed by it: the report uses the concept of "laïcité" (the terminology adopted in the Act), "understood in the context of the broader ideal of neutrality to which the State must aspire if it wishes to treat citizens fairly". The Bouchard-Taylor Commission, as it came to be known, was established in 2007 in the wake of a series of highly publicized events concerning religious accommodation practices, and it carried out a lengthy investigation at the end of which it proposed, among other things, an "open" state secularism,[62] based on four key principles: the moral equality of persons, freedom of conscience and religion, state neutrality towards religions, and the separation of church and state.[63] These are the four pillars of laicity as it is defined in s. 2 of the Act.

53 The Bouchard-Taylor Report also suggested that certain agents of the state who occupy "positions that strikingly exemplify State neutrality and whose incumbents exercise a power of coercion",[64] namely the "president and vice-president of the National Assembly, judges and Crown prosecutors, police officers and prison guards", abide by a "form of circumspection concerning the expression of their religious convictions" and refrain (or more precisely, be required to refrain) from wearing religious symbols. As we know, s. 6 of the Act takes up this recommendation, although it has expanded the list of those who must refrain from such religious display by adding a number of persons whom the legislature apparently views as embodying the state, exercising a state power, fulfilling an essentially state mission or being required to display exemplary neutrality in the exercise of their functions. These additions include public elementary and secondary school teachers, who, it would seem, are considered to embody one of the primary functions of the Quebec State. This inclusion was strongly criticized and was often at the heart of the debate (including in the case at bar, where the question of teaching staff has figured prominently, particularly in the evidence that was presented). In this respect, it should be noted that the Act departed from the Bouchard-Taylor Report, which did not recommend such a measure and even explicitly suggested the very opposite.

54 We know that after the Bouchard-Taylor Report, the socio-political discussion on state neutrality and laicity continued, at varying degrees of intensity depending on the era and the government, culminating in the adoption of the Act in June 2019.

Sexual equality

416 Section 28 of the Canadian Charter states:

> 28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.
> 28. Indépendamment des autres dispositions de la présente charte, les droits et libertés qui y sont mentionnés sont garantis également aux personnes des deux sexes.

427 The trial judge agreed with the view of the parties opposed to the Act regarding its prejudicial effect on women, primarily Muslim women, as compared with men, finding that it has that effect [TRANSLATION] "in the field of education only", as he stated in paragraph 876 of his judgment.

429 For the reasons set out in the following pages, the Court comes to the…conclusion [that] s. 28 of the Canadian Charter is an interpretative provision, one that cannot defeat s. 33, whether by conditioning its use, neutralizing its effect or excluding s. 15(1) from its scope in the case of discrimination between men and women.

b. Applicable interpretation principles

i. General comments on s. 28 of the Canadian Charter

430 Nearly 42 years after it came into force, s. 28 of the Canadian Charter — which was intended to remedy the "dismal ... record" of pre-1982 jurisprudence on the protection of women's rights, including under the Canadian Bill of Rights — remains a provision that is seldom used (if one relies on jurisprudence that, itself, barely deals with it, other than as a side issue) and is largely under-theorized, as noted in certain texts, even having been described as "astonishingly underdeveloped". Scholarly commentators have taken an interest in s. 28, hesitating or being divided on its nature, meaning, scope and usefulness: does it lay down an overriding principle or a rule of interpretation? Does it establish a standalone substantive right, or does it bind itself to the other rights and freedoms recognized by the Canadian Charter? Is it or is it not subject to s. 1 of that Charter, or can it influence its interpretation and application? How can it be reconciled with s. 33?

431 The context in which it was enacted does not allow one to answer these questions with confidence. Section 28 was included in the Canadian Charter as a result of repeated requests and proposals from women's groups, but it is uncertain whether their objectives coincided perfectly with the ultimate will of the framers (federal-provincial framers), whose preparatory work and debates are not necessarily very convincing. Certainly, one general impression can be drawn: parliamentarians wanted to ensure sexual equality and remedy the weaknesses of prior law in this respect. It is unlikely, however, that they envisaged all the potential legal effects of the text as finally enacted, much less the interpretative problems liable to arise.

432 The drafting history of s. 28 is perhaps more revealing, and we will return to this later. We will say, from the outset, however, that it does not provide an answer to all the questions raised here by the parties' respective claims concerning this provision.

Meaning and scope of s. 28 of the Canadian Charter

438 As one can see, the provision is divided into two segments: a main proposition, syntactically speaking, and an introductory statement that refines it. The following is the main proposition: "the rights and freedoms referred to in [the Canadian Charter] are guaranteed equally to male and female persons / les droits et libertés [mentionnés dans la Charte canadienne*] sont garantis également aux personnes des deux sexes*". The meaning of this proposition seems clear, at least at first glance: the framers wanted to ensure (and ensure for the benefit of every individual) that the rights and freedoms enumerated in the Canadian Charter are granted to and recognized in the same way for women and men, providing them both with equal protection. This means that, in accordance with this rule, the provisions of the Charter that recognize a right or freedom must be interpreted and applied without distinction between women and men. Of course, the existence of such a distinction must be gauged in light of the principle of substantive — rather than formal — equality. There may also be distinctions that help re-establish sexual equality. For its part, the introductory statement "[n]otwithstanding anything in this Charter / [i]ndépendamment des autres dispositions de la présente charte" establishes the supremacy of the structuring rule of interpretation laid down by the main proposition.

439 We will now take a closer look at the various elements having led to this conclusion.

2. Section 28: text, context and jurisprudence

440 Firstly, it should be noted that s. 28 does not set out, as such, the principle of equality of women and men, which is established in s. 15 under the aspects of equality before and under the law, equal protection of the law and equal benefit of the law, all without discrimination based on a list of prohibited (or analogous) grounds, including sex. Rather, s. 28 affirms that the rights and freedoms referred to in the Canadian Charter (“qui y sont mentionnés”) are “guaranteed equally / garantis également” to male and female persons (“personnes des deux sexes”), that is, without distinction between women and men. Section 28 is thus grafted onto the other provisions of the Charter that recognize rights and freedoms. As de Jong writes, s. 28 “is not a general anti-discrimination provision” and its effect is limited “to the rights and freedoms set out in the document in which the provisions are contained”, adding that “section 28 is limited to the rights referred to in the Charter“.

442 That said, what exactly does the main proposition of s. 28 contemplate when it mentions the rights and freedoms referred to (“droits et libertés ... mentionnés”) in the Canadian Charter?

443 At first glance, the text seems to clearly point to the rights and freedoms enumerated in ss. 2 to 23 of the Charter. This seems evident. Indeed, with the exception of ss. 4, 5 and 18, these provisions all use either the term “freedom / liberté” or the term “right / droit”, under the headings “FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS / LIBERTÉS FONDAMENTALES” (s. 2), “DEMOCRATIC RIGHTS / DROITS DÉMOCRATIQUES” (s. 3), “MOBILITY RIGHTS / LIBERTÉ DE CIRCULATION ET D'ÉTABLISSEMENT” (s. 6), “LEGAL RIGHTS / GARANTIES JURIDIQUES” (ss. 7 to 14), “EQUALITY RIGHTS / DROITS À L'ÉGALITÉ” (s. 15), “OFFICIAL LANGUAGES OF CANADA / LANGUES OFFICIELLES DU CANADA” (ss. 16 to 22[461]) and “MINORITY LANGUAGE EDUCATIONAL RIGHTS / DROITS À L'INSTRUCTION DANS LA LANGUE DE LA MINORITÉ” (s. 23). Their text, which it is not useful to reproduce here, expressly recognizes and affirms each of these rights and freedoms and, where necessary, defines their nature and conditions.

444 As for ss. 4 and 5, these provisions do not, strictly speaking, confer an individual right; rather, they protect a right that is essentially collective and is linked to the very organization of the state, a right that anyone may assert in the event of an alleged violation. They preserve Canada’s democratic system by limiting the maximum duration of the House of Commons and of the legislative assemblies, and by requiring the latter, like Parliament, to hold at least one sitting a year. Section 18 adds to the official languages provisions by providing that the statutes and records of Parliament and of the legislature of New Brunswick must be printed and published in English and French. It is difficult to see, a priori, how these three provisions could be interpreted or applied in such a way as to distinguish between women and men, but, in any event, since these are obligations owed by the state to the electorate in the case of ss. 4 and 5, and to everyone in the case of s. 18, the rule set out in s. 28 must apply to those provisions.

445 Logically, then, the “rights and freedoms / droits et libertés” mentioned in s. 28 are those of ss. 2 to 23. Moreover, this is consistent with the meaning of other provisions in which the framers have used similar expressions referring to the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter.

446 In this regard, s. 1 states that “[t]he Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it / [l]a Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés”, which certainly refers to the rights and freedoms in ss. 2 to 23 — and, indeed, it is to these rights and freedoms that s. 1 has been applied since the Charter came into force, such that, unless overridden in accordance with s. 33, each of these rights and freedoms is subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

447 Similarly, s. 24 speaks of the remedy available to any person “whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied / victime de violation ou de négation des droits et libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte”, which, again, refers to the protections offered by ss. 2 to 23.

448 Sections 25 and 26 use the expression “certain rights and freedoms / certains droits et libertés”, which, in context, again clearly refers to one or the other of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2 to 23. Thus, as s. 25 states, the fact that “certain rights and freedoms” — i.e., those in ss. 2 to 23 — are protected by the Charter must not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from “any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada” (“aux droits ou libertés — ancestraux, issus de traités ou autres — des peuples autochtones du Canada”). Similarly, according to s. 26, the fact that “certain rights and freedoms” — necessarily those of ss. 2 to 23 — are protected does not wipe out any other rights and freedoms (“les autres droits et libertés”) that exist in Canada: these other rights and freedoms survive, whether they emanate from the common law, the civil law or a statute (for example, the Quebec Charter, which guarantees several rights not included in the Canadian Charter).

449 In short, given this context, and considering the other provisions of the Canadian Charter that use similar language, one must conclude that when s. 28 mentions the “rights and freedoms referred to in it”, the provision is clearly referring to the rights and freedoms protected by ss. 2 to 23. It is these rights and freedoms that are “guaranteed equally to male and female persons / garantis également aux personnes des deux sexes” and the provisions that recognize and protect them must be read and applied in light of the rule set out in the main proposition of s. 28.

450 To put it briefly, the main proposition of s. 28 is intended to ensure the equality of women and men in the interpretation and application of the rights and freedoms protected by ss. 2 to 23 of the Canadian Charter, as if a reference to this guarantee of equality were appended to each of these provisions. Rather than using such a drafting technique, however, the framers opted for a general provision — s. 28 — which has the same effect as if it had been incorporated into each of ss. 2 to 23. It follows that these provisions must, in principle, be interpreted without distinction between women and men, since the rights and freedoms they guarantee must be qualitatively the same and have the same content and scope, regardless of the person’s sex, in a constant effort to achieve substantive equality.

451 In this sense, therefore, s. 28 has no standalone normative value and does not add a right distinct from those recognized by ss. 2 to 23 of the Charter. Instead, it conditions the interpretation — and hence the application — of these provisions. Moreover, to conclude otherwise would be to duplicate s. 15 of the Charter, which already enshrines, in various respects, the equality of individuals without distinction based on various grounds, including sex.

452 The interpretative purpose of s. 28 is confirmed by its placement within the Canadian Charter, under the heading “GENERAL / DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES”, which includes ss. 25 to 31. All of these provisions prescribe rules that serve to elucidate — or sometimes limit — the meaning and scope of ss. 2 to 23, as if the former provisions had been incorporated into the latter, and they act as interpretation guidelines. The same is true of ss. 25, 26, 27 and 29:

- Sections 25 and 29. Sections 25 and 29 reconcile the protection afforded to rights and freedoms under the Canadian Charter with that afforded to rights and freedoms under other constitutional provisions, which are themselves designed to safeguard the interests of certain groups. Section 25 affirms that the guarantees offered by the Charter “shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples / ne porte[nt] pas atteinte aux droits ou libertés — ancestraux, issus de traités ou autres — des peuples autochtones". It is an "interpretative [provision], and is aimed at preventing contestation of Aboriginal rights based on other provisions of the Canadian Charter". For its part, s. 29 states that the provisions of the Charter do not abrogate or derogate from any rights or privileges in respect of denominational, separate or dissentient schools, thereby referring to s. 93 of the CA 1867.

• Section 26. This provision ensures that the Charter, through the protection it affords to certain rights and freedoms (those in ss. 2 to 23), is not interpreted as denying or excluding the other rights and freedoms that individuals may enjoy under the law. These other rights and freedoms therefore survive.

• Section 27. According to the express wording of this provision, the interpretation of the Charter, and thus of the rights and freedoms enshrined therein, must take into account the "multicultural heritage of Canadians / patrimoine multiculturel des Canadiens".

455 In short, all the provisions immediately surrounding s. 28 and grouped under the same heading set out, in one way or another, interpretative instructions. It is logical to conclude that this is also the case for s. 28, which confirms the meaning already conveyed by the wording of its main proposition.

456 This does not mean, however, that s. 28 is a minor provision or one devoid of substance: indeed, it requires those interpreting the Canadian Charter to take (substantive) sexual equality into account when determining the meaning and scope of ss. 2 to 23 and applying them to a given situation. Its introductory statement ("Notwithstanding anything in this Charter / Indépendamment des autres dispositions de la présente charte"), which is just as important, even gives this rule of interpretation an imperative character and ensures its primacy over the other interpretative rules that are set out in the Charter and that cannot, themselves, legitimize the introduction in the rights and freedoms guaranteed by ss. 2 to 23 of distinctions between women and men. Thus, ss. 25, 27 and 29, to name but these, cannot be used to interpret the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter in a manner contrary to the principle of sexual equality. This means that recourse to these other rules, be it the protection of the rights of Aboriginal peoples (s. 25) or respect for multiculturalism (s. 27), for example, cannot justify a departure from the principle of sexual equality. Section 28 thus enshrines a fundamental value of Canadian society in ss. 2 to 23 and reinforces the guarantee of the rights and freedoms set out in the Canadian Charter. In other words, by virtue of s. 28, those interpreting ss. 2 to 23 must generally give these provisions a meaning and scope in keeping with the principle of substantive equality between women and men and cannot justify departing therefrom by invoking the other rules contained under the Charter's "GENERAL / DISPOSITIONS GÉNÉRALES" heading.

457 While we can draw these various conclusions from the text and context of s. 28, what does the case law relating to this provision have to say?

* * * * * *

458 As mentioned above there is very little case law on the subject. The Supreme Court has rarely had occasion to consider s. 28, although it does seem to have given it an interpretative function (a function the British Columbia Court of Appeal also recognized in McIvor v. Canada (Registrar of Indian and Northern Affairs)).

459 It was in Hess; Nguyen (a case dealing with the interpretation of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter) that the Supreme Court expounded most on the matter, as evidenced by the following excerpt from the reasons of Wilson J., writing for the majority:

> The appellants suggest that s. 28 of the Charter is relevant to these appeals. The section states that the rights and freedoms referred to in the Charter "are guaranteed equally to male and female persons". In my view, this provision does not prevent the legislature from creating an offence that as a matter of biological fact can only be committed by one sex. But it does mean that it is not open to the legislature to deny an accused who is charged with such an offence rights and freedoms guaranteed to all persons under the Charter.
> In the context of these appeals I think it clear that a male is as entitled to the protection of s. 7 as a female. It is not open to the government to suggest that a person should receive less than full Charter protection on account of his or her sex. Moreover, the government will not be able to justify an infringement of s. 7 under s. 1 of the Charter on the basis that because of an individual's sex he or she is not entitled to the same degree of Charter protection as persons of the other sex or that because of his or her sex the Charter violation is less serious. The justification for the infringement of a Charter right will have to be linked to considerations other than the sex of the party that has established an infringement of his or her Charter right. In these appeals, for example, one could not seek to justify the infringement of s. 7 by pointing to the accused's sex and by saying that because he is a man he is not entitled to the full protection of s. 7. It is no more open to the government to make this argument than it would be open to it to suggest that a woman procuring an abortion was not entitled to the full protection of s. 7 because she was a woman.
> There will, of course, be sex-related factors that may legitimately enter into a proportionality analysis conducted under s. 1 of the Charter. But such factors will have to be linked to the sex of persons other than the accused, e.g. the fact that the victim can become pregnant. Such an analysis would not seek to justify the infringement of a Charter right on the simple basis that the accused was of a given sex. Rather, it would point to considerations independent of the accused's sex that might be relevant to an assessment of the justification for restricting the accused's rights.
> [Underlining in the original]

460 In her dissent, McLachlin J. (as she then was), in discussing the discriminatory nature of the legislative provision at issue, emphasized that men are no less entitled than women to the protection provided by s. 15 of the Canadian Charter, adding that "[t]he Court [in the ruling in Turpin[473]] must be taken to have had in mind s. 28 of the Charter, which provides that notwithstanding any other provisions, the rights and freedoms referred to in the Charter are guaranteed equally to male and female persons".

461 In Seaboyer, both McLachlin, J. (as she then was) and L'Heureux-Dubé, J. noted the contribution of s. 28 to the interpretation of the right to a fair and full answer and defence within the meaning of ss. 7 or 11(d) of the Canadian Charter. In R. v. Osolin, which dealt with the right to a fair trial, including the right to cross-examine, Cory, J. pointed out that ss. 15 and 28 "should be taken into account in determining the reasonable limitations that should be placed upon the cross-examination of a complainant" (and therefore on the rights guaranteed by ss. 7 and 11(d)). In Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, a case that considered the scope of s. 2(b) of the Charter, Sopinka, J., writing for the majority, did not accept the argument based on s. 28, although he did not rule out the idea that this provision could be used to assist in the interpretation of freedom of expression. He was of the view, however, that the issue (which focused on whether the federal government had acted in accordance with the Canadian Charter by directly funding certain predominantly male Aboriginal organizations, but not the appellant association, for the purposes of a constitutional consultation[478]) "relate[d] more closely to an equality argument under s. 15 of the Charter".

462 In 1999, in New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), L'Heureux-Dubé, J. (with the endorsement of her colleagues Gonthier, J. and McLachlin, J. (as she then was)), commenting once again on s. 7 of the Charter, wrote that:

> 112 ... All Charter rights strengthen and support each other (see, for example, R. v. Lyons, 1987 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 309, at p. 326; R. v. Tran, 1994 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1994] 2 SCR 951, at p. 976) and s. 15 plays a particularly important role in that process. The interpretive lens of the equality guarantee should therefore influence the interpretation of other constitutional rights where applicable, and in my opinion, principles of equality, guaranteed by both s. 15 and s. 28, are a significant influence on interpreting the scope of protection offered by s. 7.
> 115 ... The rights in s. 7 must be interpreted through the lens of ss. 15 and 28, to recognize the importance of ensuring that our interpretation of the Constitution responds to the realities and needs of all members of society.

463 Lastly, in R. v. Kapp, Bastarache, J., in concurring reasons, mentioned s. 28, but in a way that added nothing to the debate before this Court.

464 It should be noted that in none of these judgments was s. 28 presented as spearheading the argument, nor was it examined in-depth, even in Hess; Nguyen, where Wilson, J. discussed it in greater detail. Nevertheless, it is apparent from the foregoing cases that the role of the provision is that of an interpretative guideline.

* * * * * *

465 At the end of this textual, contextual and jurisprudential examination of s. 28, we must agree that this provision [TRANSLATION] "makes sexual equality sort of ubiquitous, in the sense that it must be considered when interpreting the other rights enshrined in the Charter". Section 28, therefore, does not appear to be a provision guaranteeing a standalone right in addition to the other rights enshrined in the Charter: rather, it is a complementary provision that binds itself to ss. 2 to 23 of the Canadian Charter.

466 To speak of s. 28 as a complementary provision is not to deny or minimize its importance. The Oxford English Dictionary defines "complement" as "[s]omething which, when added, completes or makes up a whole; each of two parts which mutually complete each other, or supply each other's deficiencies". Recognizing that the principle of equality between women and men frames the interpretation of ss. 2 to 23 of the Canadian Charter, thereby giving s. 28 the force of an "interpretative injunction", is an affirmation that ensures that nothing essential is missing from the rights and freedoms enshrined therein.

467 That being so, if s. 28 can be used as an interpretative tool for purposes of ss. 2 to 23 of the Canadian Charter, is it liable to have a similar impact on s. 1 of the Charter and on the way in which this provision is to be understood and applied? The answer to this question is yes — but a qualified yes, as we will now see.

i. Sections 28 and 1 of the Canadian Charter

468 Although the Court need not rule on the application of s. 28 to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter, as the issue is not in dispute in the case at bar, a few observations on the matter are not superfluous insofar as they confirm the interpretative purpose of s. 28 and are useful in determining how to reconcile this provision with s. 33 of the Charter.

469 As we know, under certain conditions, s. 1 can justify a limit on any of the rights and freedoms enshrined in the Canadian Charter, including in matters of equality (i.e., when the rights protected by s. 15 are at stake). This general statement is no less true in matters of equality of women and men, as the rulings in Centrale des syndicats du Québec v. Quebec (Attorney General), Quebec (Attorney General) v. A and Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v. N.A.P.E. show.

470 In these three cases, which did not mention s. 28 (a fact that is not insignificant), the Supreme Court concluded that legislative provisions that prima facie contravened s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter, by making a distinction that was based on sex and was prejudicial to women, were nonetheless reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society within the meaning of s. 1. It can be inferred from these decisions that s. 28 alone cannot prevent a court applying the Oakes test from ruling that such a limit is reasonable in a free and democratic society. Thus, when a legislative provision that a priori violates s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter is saved by the effect of s. 1, it is difficult to see how it could nonetheless be contrary to s. 28.

471 This is not to say that s. 28 has nothing to do with s. 1 of the Charter. In this respect, it could be treated in the same way as R. v. Keegstra treated s. 27 of the Charter, as an element that must, "where possible", be part of the analysis carried out by the courts under s. 1…

472 We can conceivably transpose these remarks to s. 28 and say that it can be used "as an aid in interpreting the definition of Charter rights and freedoms ... and as an element in the s. 1 analysis" and that, in the latter case as in the former, it serves as an interpretative tool.

473 In short, s. 28 is an interpretative guideline that should, "where possible", permeate the way courts apply s. 1.

474 Moreover, given the wording of s. 28 (particularly its introductory statement), one might have thought that the level of justification required under s. 1, when dealing with a restriction on substantive equality between women and men, must be high, as it is, for example, in the case of an infringement of s. 7 of the Canadian Charter. Yet, this is not what emerges from the few rulings mentioned above, which, in applying s. 1, validated legislative rules limiting the sexual equality of women and men, without apparently raising the standard above the usual level.

ii. Sections 28 and 33 of the Canadian Charter

475 We turn now to the effects, if any, of s. 28 on s. 33 of the Canadian Charter, and vice versa…

477 The Court shares this point of view [of the trial judge]: s. 28 does not restrict s. 33, which can be used to exempt legislation from the application of s. 15 of the Canadian Charter, including in matters of sexual equality.

478 The text of s. 28 hardly lends itself to any other interpretation. Can s. 33 be included in the list of rights and freedoms contemplated by s. 28 of the Charter — i.e., "the rights and freedoms referred to in it / les droits et libertés qui y sont mentionnés"? Unless words not found in s. 28 are read into it, it is not possible to extend the scope of its terms to s. 33, a provision which neither confers nor enshrines any right or freedom. On the contrary, it allows the legislature to derogate (albeit temporarily) from some of the rights and freedoms otherwise recognized by the Charter, with the effects we examined earlier. It is therefore not possible to find that the text of s. 33 contains a guarantee of a right or freedom (other than the guarantee that the conditions for use of this provision will be respected, a condition litigants can insist on). The purpose of s. 33 is to allow an override of certain rights and freedoms — i.e., those set out in s. 2 and 7 to 15 — rights and freedoms that can no longer be invoked by the persons targeted or affected by the override.

479 The introductory statement of s. 28 does nothing to change this, since it cannot guarantee primacy to a guarantee — the equality of women and men — that is intimately tied to Charter provisions — ss. 2 or 7 to 15 — which, due to the use of s. 33, have been deprived of their effect.

480 No doubt, the circumstances surrounding the introduction of ss. 28 and 33 into the Canadian Charter and their drafting history may give a certain air of plausibility to the hypothesis that s. 28 has supremacy over s. 33, as the trial judge noted and as the parties opposed to the Act still argue. For the reasons that follow, however, that impression dissipates upon analysis, and the argument is ultimately unconvincing.

481 We know that s. 28, which was not part of the initial draft of the Charter, was added in April 1981, following a proposed amendment by the New Democratic Party, which was relaying the request of several women's groups. The text of the proposed amendment was identical to that of the current s. 28. At the same time, we also know that, in the fall of 1981, the constitutional reform project was in jeopardy, or at least fragile: on September 28, 1981, the Supreme Court of Canada had rendered its decision in the Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, after which the federal government convened a federal-provincial constitutional conference to promote the reform, including the Canadian Charter. These discussions bore fruit, leading to an important and decisive political compromise — the introduction of s. 33 in the Canadian Charter.

482 We find an initial answer to the question of how to combine s. 28 (which establishes the principle of equality between women and men) with s. 33 (which allows an override of certain provisions, including s. 15, a provision that prohibits sex-based discrimination) in the resolution presented to the House of Commons on November 30, 1981 ("Resolution Respecting Constitution Act, 1981"), which proposed the following texts:

> 28. Notwithstanding anything in this Charter except section 33, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.
> 33. (1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter, or section 28 of this Charter in its application to discrimination based on sex referred to in section 15.
> 28. Indépendamment des autres dispositions de la présente charte, exception faite de l'article 33, les droits et libertés qui y sont mentionnés sont garantis également aux personnes des deux sexes.
> 33. (1) Le Parlement ou la législature d'une province peut adopter une loi où il est expressément déclaré que celle-ci ou une de ses dispositions a effet indépendamment d'une disposition donnée de l'article 2 ou des articles 7 à 15 de la présente charte, ou de l'article 28 de cette charte dans son application à la discrimination fondée sur le sexe et mentionnée à l'article 15.

483 That same day, Progressive Conservative Party leader Joe Clark proposed an amendment to these provisions so they would read as follows (which corresponds to their current text) …

484 He explained his reasons for this motion:

> …The substance of our amendment guarantees that men and women will have equal access to the rights and freedoms set out in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms proposed in this resolution. Some of those rights and freedoms will already be limited by the application of Section 33. However, where they exist they will exist absolutely equally for women and for men…
> What that does is remove the non obstante clause from Section 28. It restores the guarantee of equality of male and female persons to the position enjoyed when the accord was tabled in this House of Commons by the Prime Minister of Canada after his meeting with the first ministers.
> [Underlining added]

485 This was a vigorous plea for equality between women and men, but one that nevertheless seemed to recognize that s. 28 will only apply where the legislature has not limited certain rights and freedoms — i.e., has not overridden them. At the very least, an ambiguity not dispelled by subsequent debates hangs over the statement, as everyone seems to have understood the proposed amendment in their own way. While no one questioned the importance of the principle of equality between women and men, it does not appear that there was any awareness of the interpretative difficulty arising from the coexistence and necessary combination of ss. 15 and 28 (as regards sex-based discrimination) and s. 33 of the Charter.

486 Whatever the perceptions and opinions of parliamentarians (or of the provincial premiers who participated in the November 1981 agreement, or of the members of their respective legislatures), it appears that some authors, apparently on the basis of this drafting history, have rallied around the view that s. 33 does not permit a derogation from the principle of sexual equality, and consequently, does not permit an override of s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter in that regard.

487 For instance, Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet write that, because of s. 28, [TRANSLATION] "s. 33, which provides for the possibility of expressly overriding rights, cannot apply to the sex-based discrimination prohibited by s. 15(1) ...".Does this mean that although s. 33 generally allows an override of s. 15, it cannot validly be used in the case of legislation imposing discriminatory treatment on women? This does indeed seem to be their view.

488 Hogg and Wright maintain, rather laconically, that "the power of legislative override (under s. 33) applies to s. 15, but not to s. 28". They expressly base this assertion on the drafting history of s. 28.

489 In a particularly detailed text, Froc also concludes that s. 28 is shielded from s. 33, notably by the effect of its introductory statement: when s. 28 states that it applies "[n]otwithstanding anything in this Charter", the word "anything" necessarily includes s. 33.

490 De Jong is of the opinion that a legislature can override any of the provisions mentioned in s. 33 and "deny their benefit to specified classes of people, but those classes cannot be gender-based. Whatever rights exist under the override must be guaranteed equally to men and women, because section 28 is not subject to the override power". She adds that:

> The interaction between section 28 and section 33 is most confusing when the only right overridden is the right under section 15(1) to equality without discrimination on the basis of sex. The right to equality without discrimination based on sex must be guaranteed equally to both male and female persons. What does this mean? It may mean that the section 15(1) guarantees cannot be overridden insofar as they relate to discrimination based on sex.
> [Underlining added]

493 … All the rights and freedoms referred to in ss. 2 to 23 of the Canadian Charter are subject to the guarantee of equality prescribed by s. 28, which attaches to and forms an integral part of each of them. When, however, through the use of s. 33, some of these provisions…are neutralized, the rights and freedoms in question are also neutralized, including the guarantee of equality inherent therein.

494 The jurisprudence on the issue of whether s. 33 allows legislatures to override s. 28 (or s. 15(1), in the case of sex-based inequality) is meagre and consists mainly of two judgments: the 1984 ruling of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court, Appeal Division, in Re Boudreau and Lynch , and the 2004 decision of the Quebec Superior Court in Syndicat de la fonction publique du Québec inc. c. Procureur général du Québec .

495 Boudreau concerned a legislative provision that made a distinction between men and women and limited the right to government financial assistance solely to fathers with disabilities, whereas all mothers, with or without a disability, were entitled to such assistance. As s. 15 of the Canadian Charter had not yet come into force, the appellant had relied on s. 28 to allege the discriminatory nature of the impugned provision. In rejecting the appellant's argument, Hart J., writing for the Court, stated the following incidentally:

> …Section 28 of the Charter …was simply intended to prevent any continuation of sexual discrimination by affirmative legislative action once the full Charter had come into force. By doing so the legislators have treated sexual discrimination as the most odious form of discrimination and taken away from legislative bodies the right to perpetrate it in the future. Other types of discrimination may without reasons being given be carried on under the legislative override provisions of s. 33.
> [Underlining added]

496 With all due respect, the underlined portion above, which is more of an assertion than a demonstration, is very brief and is obiter, since the legislature had not had recourse to s. 33 of the Canadian Charter in that case. It would appear that this obiter should be understood to mean that, because of s. 28, s. 33 could not be used to override s. 15(1) of the Charter and thereby save a legislative provision that discriminates on the basis of sex. Consequently, a legislature could override the right to equality in the case of a distinction based on ethnic origin, colour or disability, to mention but these, but not in the case of a sex-based distinction. This statement — to which we will return later — may be surprising to some (all the more so given that, in the same breath, Hart, J.A. recognized that s. 28 could not be invoked or have effect before s. 15 came into force, which clearly shows that s. 28 has no standalone effect and does not guarantee a right to equality as such).

497 In Syndicat de la fonction publique du Québec inc., the Superior Court, in a judgment rendered by Justice Carole Julien, also examined s. 28…

498 Here, too, however, this conclusion is obiter, as the legislature had not invoked s. 33 (nor had it invoked s. 1). The rest of the analysis examining the impugned legislative provisions' validity is essentially based on s. 15 , although the judge pointed out that, in light of s. 28 , [TRANSLATION] "[t]he Court must be particularly strict when assessing the validity of a statute which, by its effects, impairs sexual equality" (a statement which, it should be pointed out, is entirely consistent with the notion that s. 28 sets out a rule of interpretation).

499 Not everyone, however, agrees that s. 28 takes precedence over s. 33, or that a legislature cannot use the latter to shield legislation that discriminates on the basis of sex from ss. 2 and 7 to 15 of the Canadian Charter (in particular s. 15(1)) and from the judicial review that would otherwise ensue. Such primacy, in fact, raises a major logical difficulty, which we have already alluded to, and which the AGQ is invoking in this case. If a legislature, relying on s. 33(1) of the Charter , exempts a statute from ss. 2 or 7 to 15, such that the statute applies "but for / sauf" these provisions — that is, without them, as if they did not exist, in accordance with s. 33(2) — then to what does s. 28 , which would otherwise govern the application of these provisions, attach?...

502 In the Court's view, the logical argument must prevail and cannot lead to the conclusion that s. 28 limits s. 33 and prevents its use to override the "sexual equality" component of ss. 2 or 7 to 15. Indeed, one cannot acknowledge that s. 33 allows an override of ss. 2 and 7 to 15 and, at the same time, assert that s. 28 neutralizes such override when it has the effect of establishing a distinction between women and men, or when it has a disproportionately prejudicial effect on women (in relation to men) or on men (in relation to women)…

503 Moreover, such a conclusion would create inconsistency between the effect to be given to s. 28 when s. 33 is at issue, and the effect to be given to it when applying s. 1 . As we saw earlier, even when an apparent violation of the principle of equality enshrined in s. 15(1) of the Charter is based on sex, it can be validated by a demonstration under s. 1 . Section 28 must undoubtedly be considered in the course of this demonstration, as it is a general principle of interpretation, but it cannot constitute an obstacle to recognizing the validity of a limit to equality between women and men when such limit satisfies the conditions of s. 1 of the Charter , as developed in the case law. Section 33 allows for an even more drastic measure than s. 1 — that is, an override that can be declared and implemented without any particular justification and subject only to fairly light formal requirements. Accepting that s. 28 can, in the case of equality between women and men, supersede an override made under s. 33, whereas it cannot prevent the justification of a limit under s. 1 , creates an insoluble contradiction. Moreover, it is not in keeping with the letter or spirit of ss. 28 and 33, nor, generally, with the architecture of the Charter to assert that s. 28 takes precedence over s. 33, whether by depriving the legislature of the possibility of overriding the principle of sexual equality, or by neutralizing any such override.

504 Lastly, the manner in which the parties opposed to the Act propose reading s. 28 has the effect of granting primacy and superior value to the principle of equality between women and men — thus, s. 33 would in no way allow a discriminatory override of ss. 2 and 7 to 15, or allow a statute that treats women and men differently to be excluded from the application of these provisions, but would not prevent s. 33 from having such an effect where other prohibited grounds of discrimination are involved, namely, race, ethnic or national origin, colour, or physical or mental disability (or other similar grounds). Yet there is nothing in the Canadian Charter itself nor in its text, context or history to justify such a reading, not even s. 28 .

[Footnotes omitted]

2.5 Limits of Section 28

Section 28's impact is constrained by several institutional, textual, and doctrinal limitations:

- Judicial Reluctance: Courts have shown reluctance to give Section 28 legal force, often pairing it with section 15. This has resulted in an iterative cycle of judges refusing to employ section 28 more robustly because previous judges have not done so. For instance, the Supreme Court in Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v. N.A.P.E., 2004 SCC 66 and Centrale des syndicats du Québec v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 18 did not cite section 28 to preclude governmental justification of sex discrimination under section 1. Justice Blanchard in Hak cited N.A.P.E. to support his finding that section 28 could not act as a "shield" to protect women's rights from other sections of the Charter. However, none of the parties nor interveners advanced section 28 arguments in those cases.

- Un(der)developed case law: In the over forty years since section 28 has been in force, the Supreme Court of Canada has yet to pronounce definitively as to whether section 28 shields equal rights from reasonable limits under section 1. This is despite the Court deciding two cases in which a violation of women's equality rights was justified under section 1 (i.e. N.A.P.E., Centrale des Syndicats). It also rejected a claimant's attempt to use section 28 and section 2(b) together to advance a claim involving Indigenous women's equal right to funding to attend a constitutional consultation with the federal government in Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada 1994 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 627, saying the claim was "better characterized" as a section 15(1) argument. At the time this is written, the Hak case has not been heard at the Supreme Court and there is still no definitive statement from the Court about whether section 28 can operate to shield women's rights from the "notwithstanding clause."
- Interdependence on other rights: As noted, section 28 is not a "stand alone" provision, and depends on the rights and freedoms "referred to" in the Charter for content. This means that it cannot function completely independently from other provisions and as such, its scope is limited by them.
- Interaction with other rights: Courts have struggled with how to consider women's equality rights in cases involving constitutional challenges by others. For instance, in R v Seaboyer, R v Gayme, 1991 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 577, the Supreme Court struck down the "rape shield" law restricting the defence in cross examining sexual assault complainants about past sexual conduct. Justice McLachlin stated that while the recognition of a complainant's rights under sections 15 and 28 "is consistent with the view that s. 7 reflects a variety of societal and individual interests," it could not influence the decision that the accused's rights to full answer and defence was violated by the law.
- Further, in women's Charter claims, courts sometimes fail to consider the equality dimension. Notably, section 28 was not mentioned in R v NS, to influence the interpretation of a sexual assault complainant's freedom of religion.
- Explicit textual reference to the sexual binary: Given the explicit reference to "male and female persons" in section 28, whether section 28 can be interpreted to encompass the equal rights of trans and non-binary individuals remains an area of jurisprudential uncertainty.

2.6 Questions

1. To what extent should section 28 be understood as an enforceable right versus an interpretive principle?
2. Can section 28 provide a basis for constitutional challenges independently of section 15? What are the differences between the protection for sex equality in section 15(1) and equal rights in section 28?
3. How should courts balance potential conflicts between section 28 and other Charter rights, such as an accused's right to a fair trial in sexual assault cases under section 7? Some in Quebec feel that Bill 21 promotes religious neutrality and therefore protects their society's collective rights to a secular state. Should those interests be taken into consideration in deciding whether section 28 shields Muslim women's equal rights to freedom of religion "notwithstanding" the notwithstanding clause?
4. What are the risks of under-enforcing section 28? What about the risks of giving section 28's guarantee of equal rights primacy in the Charter? Does this conflict with previous statements from the Court that there should be no "hierarchical approach to rights"?
5. Does the binary language of "male and female persons" in section 28 limit its applicability to gender-diverse individuals, including trans and non-binary people? Should this be addressed through judicial interpretation or constitutional amendment?
6. Should legislatures be constitutionally barred from overriding gender equality using the notwithstanding clause? What about the state justifying sex discrimination using section 1? What role should normative evaluations of section 28's potential power play in constitutional interpretation.
7. What role can Section 28 play in shaping the interpretation of Charter rights in areas not traditionally framed as gendered, such as freedom of expression, mobility rights, or criminal procedure?
8. How should section 28's history inform the development of its interpretation moving forward? Does it offer a model for integrating intersectional analysis into Charter interpretation?

Chapter 16: S. 1: Reasonable Limits

By Emily Kidd White and Grégoire Webber

1 Introduction

The Canadian Charter's first section communicates two important constitutional commitments:

The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.	La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

A first commitment is affirmed in the opening words of section 1: the rights and freedoms outlined in the Charter are constitutionally guaranteed. As explained by Justice Dickson in Hunter v Southam, 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 148:

> The Constitution of Canada, which includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the supreme law of Canada. Any law inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. Section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 so mandates.

The constitutional guarantee of the Charter's rights and freedoms awards to those rights and freedoms legal status as part of the supreme law of Canada. Any law inconsistent with those rights is unconstitutional and without legal force. (But see Chapter 17: The Notwithstanding Clause.)

The second commitment is that the guarantee of the Charter's rights and freedoms is subject to reasonable limits. The second half of section 1 outlines the standard against which such legally prescribed limits are evaluated.

This second half of section 1 is commonly referred to as a limitation clause. Similar clauses predated the Canadian Charter: see, for example, Article 29(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which provides for a general limitation clause applicable to all rights and freedoms, and Articles 8(2), 9(2), 10(2), and 11(2) of the European Convention on Human Rights, which pair limitation clauses with specific rights and freedoms. In turn, some limitation clauses that post-date the Charter closely track the wording of section 1: see s. 5 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 and s. 36(1) of the Bill of Rights of the South African Constitution.

This chapter begins by reviewing the relationship between rights and their limitations before then reviewing how the Supreme Court of Canada introduced a proportionality evaluation to determine whether a limitation is reasonable. We then survey the famous case of R v Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, in which the Supreme Court articulated what has come to be known as the Oakes test. We close this chapter by reviewing some of the contextual factors that animate the Supreme Court's application of section 1 of the Charter and that counsel more or less deference to the choices of a legislature in limiting rights.

2 The interpretation of rights and the purpose of section 1

With some exceptions, the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Charter do not resolve contested claims of rights. For example, the guarantee of freedom of expression at s. 2(b) of the Charter does not address the questions of libel, pornography, or hate speech. The guarantee of freedom of religion and of conscience at s. 2(a) of the Charter does not address the questions of religious accommodations or conscientious objections to military service. The same is true of a great many contested claims of rights and their relationship to the wording of other rights and freedoms in the Charter.

An early question for the Supreme Court was whether the rights and freedoms of the Charter should be defined so as to resolve these contested claims. For example, freedom of expression could be defined so as to exclude libel and hate speech, but to include pornography and other expression-related claims of right. To do so would make reasonable limits internal to the definition of freedom of expression.

Instead, the general approach of the Supreme Court to the interpretation of Charter rights and freedoms has been to favour a broad and liberal interpretation of rights and to reserve to section 1 of the Charter the resolution of contested claims of rights. In this way, reasonable limits are conceived as being external to rights and freedoms defined independently of such limits.

In adopting this approach, the Supreme Court favoured a two-stage analysis of many Charter claims. At the first stage, a purposive interpretation of rights and freedoms is undertaken and it is determined whether any law infringes the scope of the rights and freedoms so defined. The claimant seeking to demonstrate a violation of rights bears the onus of proof at this stage. At the second stage, the justification of any such infringements is evaluated under section 1 of the Charter. The onus of proof here is on the party seeking to justify the limit, which is almost invariably the government. In Oakes, the Supreme Court articulated the standard of proof as follows:

> 67. The standard of proof under s. 1 is the civil standard, namely, proof by a preponderance of probability. The alternative criminal standard, proof beyond a reasonable doubt, would, in my view, be unduly onerous on the party seeking to limit. Concepts such as "reasonableness", "justifiability" and "free and democratic society" are simply not amenable to such a standard. Nevertheless, the preponderance of probability test must be applied rigorously. Indeed, the phrase "demonstrably justified" in s. 1 of the Charter supports this conclusion.
> 68. Having regard to the fact that s. 1 is being invoked for the purpose of justifying a violation of the constitutional rights and freedoms the Charter was designed to protect, a very high degree of probability will be, in the words of Lord Denning, "commensurate with the occasion". Where evidence is required in order to prove the constituent elements of a s. 1 inquiry, and this will generally be the case, it should be cogent and persuasive and make clear to the Court the consequences of imposing or not imposing the limit. See: Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, supra, at p. 384; Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, supra, at p. 217. A court will also need to know what alternative measures for implementing the objective were available to the legislators when they made their decisions. I should add, however, that there may be cases where certain elements of the s. 1 analysis are obvious or self-evident.

2.1 The first stage of Charter analysis: purposive interpretation of rights and freedoms

The purposive interpretation of Charter rights and freedoms was articulated in Hunter v Southam, 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, in which the Court confronted the s. 8 guarantee: "Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure."

For the Court, the wording of the right was "vague and open" (pp. 154-156):

> There is no specificity in the section beyond the bare guarantee of freedom from "unreasonable" search and seizure; nor is there any particular historical, political or philosophic context capable of providing an obvious gloss on the meaning of the guarantee.
> It is clear that the meaning of "unreasonable" cannot be determined by recourse to a dictionary, nor for that matter, by reference to the rules of statutory construction. The task of expounding a constitution is crucially different from that of construing a statute. A statute defines present rights and obligations. It is easily enacted and as easily repealed. A constitution, by contrast, is drafted with an eye to the future. Its function is to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power and, when joined by a Bill or a Charter of Rights, for the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties. Once enacted, its provisions cannot easily be repealed or amended. It must, therefore, be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers. The judiciary is the guardian of the constitution and must, in interpreting its provisions, bear these considerations in mind. […]
> The need for a broad perspective in approaching constitutional documents is a familiar theme in Canadian constitutional jurisprudence. It is contained in Viscount Sankey's classic formulation in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124, at p. 136, cited and applied in countless Canadian cases:
> > The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada… Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board—it is certainly not their desire—to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation.

For the Supreme Court, this recommended adopting a purposive interpretation of the Charter's rights and freedoms (p. 156):

> The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive document. Its purpose is to guarantee and to protect, within the limits of reason, the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms it enshrines.

This purposive approach could then inform the interpretation of each one of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Canadian Charter (p. 157):

> Since the proper approach to the interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive one, before it is possible to assess the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the impact of a search or of a statute authorizing a search, it is first necessary to specify the purpose underlying s. 8: in other words, to delineate the nature of the interests it is meant to protect.

The specific interest protected by s. 8 was held in Hunter v Southam to be privacy, such that the purposive interpretation of the right against unreasonable search and seizure extended to all over which an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

What is significant for understanding section 1 of the Charter is that the purposive interpretation of rights and freedoms defines the scope of those constitutional guarantees by reference to the interests that each of the rights and freedoms is understood to protect. The result is that, on the whole, rights and freedoms receive a generous interpretation. Any interests of others that may be inconsistent with generously defined rights are to be evaluated under the second stage of Charter analysis.

For more on purposive interpretation, see Chapter 14: Charter Interpretation.

2.2 The second stage of Charter analysis: justifying infringements

According to the two stages of Charter analysis, interests that may inform contested claims of rights fall outside of the scope the rights and freedoms. For example, a person's interest in protecting their reputation from libel will not inform the scope of freedom of expression. Instead, it will inform an evaluation at the second stage of analysis whether any law infringing the scope of freedom of expression is a reasonable limit.

As explained by the Supreme Court in the R v Oakes:

> 65. The rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter are not, however, absolute. It may become necessary to limit rights and freedoms in circumstances where their exercise would be inimical to the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance. For this reason, s. 1 provides criteria of justification for limits on the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter. These criteria impose a stringent standard of justification, especially when understood in terms of the two contextual considerations discussed above, namely, the violation of a constitutionally guaranteed right or freedom and the fundamental principles of a free and democratic society.

The result is that the two constitutional commitments in section 1 of the Canadian Charter recommend two stages of Charter analysis. A first stage inquires into the definition of rights and freedoms according to a purposive interpretation: that gives expression to the constitutional guarantee of rights and freedoms. A second stage inquires into the reasonableness of any limits on rights and freedoms: that gives expression to the possibility of justifying reasonable limits in a free and democratic society.

3 Proportionality and the limitation of rights

The doctrine of proportionality in constitutional law establishes criteria for the valid exercise of governmental authority that limits a constitutionally guaranteed freedom or right. Rights are not absolute under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As the Supreme Court of Canada has articulated, there are instances where "[i]t may become necessary to limit rights and freedoms in circumstances where their exercise would be inimical to the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance." Oakes at para. 65. The text of s. 1 requires an analysis into the 'reasonable limits' of Charter guaranteed rights and freedoms that 'can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society'. Under a s. 1 analysis, the onus is on the government to defend the limit on the Charter right or freedom in question. The standard of proof in a section 1 analysis is the civil standard, that is, a 'rigorously' applied' preponderance of probabilities test: Oakes at para 67.

Comparative constitutional law scholars work to detail and analyze the wide variety of constitutional arrangements around the world. Many modern constitutions contain rights guarantees that require a proportionality analysis that places a burden of justification on the party seeking to limit a constitutionally protected right or freedom. Constitutional systems that require a proportionality analysis ensure that limits on rights are justified by public-facing reasons that can be scrutinized by an independent judiciary. See, Wojciech Sadurski, Constitutional Public Reason, Oxford Scholarship Online (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2023). In Canada (Attorney General) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp., [2007] 2 SCR 610 , 2007 SCC 30, the Supreme Court stated:

> [36] Most modern constitutions recognize that rights are not absolute and can be limited if this is necessary to achieve an important objective and if the limit is appropriately tailored, or proportionate. The concept of proportionality finds its roots in ancient and scholastic scholarship on the legitimate exercise of government power. Its modern articulations may be traced to the Supreme Court of Germany and the European Court of Human Rights, which were influenced by earlier German law… This Court in Oakes set out a test of proportionality that mirrors the elements of this idea of proportionality — first, the law must serve an important purpose, and second, the means it uses to attain this purpose must be proportionate. Proportionality in turn involves rational connection between the means and the objective, minimal impairment and proportionality of effects. As Dickson C.J. stated in Oakes, at p. 139:
> There are, in my view, three important components of a proportionality test. First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short, they must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in this first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Third, there must be a proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance". [Emphasis deleted.]

The proportionality analysis under the Charter is guided by a series of constitutional values including respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, and a commitment to social justice and equality. In R. v. Oakes at paras 63-64, the Supreme Court extrapolates on some of the values and principles guiding the s.1 proportionality analysis:

> [63] It is important to observe at the outset that s. 1 has two functions: first, it constitutionally guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in the provisions which follow; and, second, it states explicitly the exclusive justificatory criteria (outside of s. 33 of the Constitution Act, 1982) against which limitations on those rights and freedoms must be measured. Accordingly, any s. 1 inquiry must be premised on an understanding that the impugned limit violates constitutional rights and freedoms--rights and freedoms which are part of the supreme law of Canada. As Wilson J. stated in Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, supra, at p. 218: "... it is important to remember that the courts are conducting this inquiry in light of a commitment to uphold the rights and freedoms set out in the other sections of the Charter."
> [64] A second contextual element of interpretation of s. 1 is provided by the words "free and democratic society". Inclusion of these words as the final standard of justification for limits on rights and freedoms refers the Court to the very purpose for which the Charter was originally entrenched in the Constitution: Canadian society is to be free and democratic. The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political > institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. The underlying values and principles of a free and democratic society are the genesis of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter and the ultimate standard against which a limit on a right or freedom must be shown, despite its effect, to be reasonable and demonstrably justified.

4 Justifying reasonable limits

The Oakes test consists of two evaluations, both of which must be satisfied in order for a limit to be reasonable under section 1 of the Canadian Charter. First, there is an evaluation of the objective of the infringing measure. Second, there is an evaluation of the proportionality of the infringing measure. These evaluations apply if a limit is prescribed by law, a threshold requirement we address below.

Here is the canonical statement of the test by the Supreme Court of Canada in R v Oakes:

> 69. To establish that a limit is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, two central criteria must be satisfied. First, the objective, which the measures responsible for a limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve, must be "of sufficient importance to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. The standard must be high in order to ensure that objectives which are trivial or discordant with the principles integral to a free and democratic society do not gain s. 1 protection. It is necessary, at a minimum, that an objective relate to concerns which are pressing and substantial in a free and democratic society before it can be characterized as sufficiently important.
> 70. Second, once a sufficiently significant objective is recognized, then the party invoking s. 1 must show that the means chosen are reasonable and demonstrably justified. This involves "a form of proportionality test": R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Although the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances, in each case courts will be required to balance the interests of society with those of individuals and groups. There are, in my view, three important components of a proportionality test. First, the measures adopted must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question. They must not be arbitrary, unfair or based on irrational considerations. In short, they must be rationally connected to the objective. Second, the means, even if rationally connected to the objective in this first sense, should impair "as little as possible" the right or freedom in question: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 352. Third, there must be a proportionality between the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of "sufficient importance".
> 71. With respect to the third component, it is clear that the general effect of any measure impugned under s. 1 will be the infringement of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter; this is the reason why resort to s. 1 is necessary. The inquiry into effects must, however, go further. A wide range of rights and freedoms are guaranteed by the Charter, and an almost infinite number of factual situations may arise in respect of these. Some limits on rights and freedoms protected by the Charter will be more serious than others in terms of the nature of the right or freedom violated, the extent of the violation, and the degree to which the measures which impose the limit trench upon the integral principles of a free and democratic society. Even if an objective is of sufficient importance, and the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, it is still possible that, because of the severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups, the measure will not be justified by the purposes it is intended to serve. The more severe the deleterious effects of a measure, the more important the objective must be if the measure is to be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

In order to meet the requirements of the Oakes test, each one of the four inquiries—pressing and substantial objective; rational connection; minimal impairment; and overall balance—must be satisfied. A failure to satisfy any one inquiry results in an unjustified infringement of a Charter right or freedom.

The Oakes test has remained more or less stable since it was first articulated in 1986. We here highlight some developments that inform the application of each of the four branches of the test.

4.1 Pressing and substantial objective

Although this first inquiry is regularly satisfied, the Supreme Court in R v Big M Drug Mart, 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, para. 139 recalled that "not every government interest or policy objective is entitled to s. 1 consideration." In that case, it was held that the objective of the Lord's Day Act to compel religious observance was not one that could be accepted under section 1 of the Charter.

Similarly, the objectives of saving costs and achieving administrative convenience have not generally been accepted as pressing and substantial for the purposes of the Oakes test. In Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13 (CanLII), [2020] 1 SCR 678, the Supreme Court outlined the following rationale for rejecting cost savings as a valid objective under section 1 of the Charter:

> [153] In my view, the courts below erred in ruling that "the fair and rational allocation of limited public funds" is a pressing and substantial objective in the case at bar. Public funds are limited by definition. Every government allocates its funds among its various programs on the basis of certain scales, and as fairly as possible. If merely adding the words "fair and rational" to the word "allocation" sufficed to transform the allocation of public funds into a pressing and substantial objective, it would be disconcertingly easy for any government to intrude on fundamental rights. I cannot accept such a result. The fair and rational allocation of limited public funds represents the daily business of government. The mission of a government is to manage a limited budget in order to address needs that are, for their part, unlimited. This is not a pressing and substantial objective that can justify an infringement of rights and freedoms. Treating this role as such an objective would lead society down a slippery slope and would risk watering down the scope of the Charter. I would add that, from a practical standpoint, the appropriateness of such an objective would be nearly impossible to verify.

However, in Newfoundland (Treasury Board) v. Newfoundland and Labrador Assn. of Public and Private Employees (N.A.P.E.), 2004 SCC 66 (CanLII), [2004] 3 SCR 381, the Court accepted that cost savings could, in exceptional circumstances, count as a pressing and substantive objective:

> 72 The result of all this, it seems to me, is that courts will continue to look with strong scepticism at attempts to justify infringements of Charter rights on the basis of budgetary constraints. To do otherwise would devalue the Charter because there are always budgetary constraints and there are always other pressing government priorities. Nevertheless, the courts cannot close their eyes to the periodic occurrence of financial emergencies when measures must be taken to juggle priorities to see a government through the crisis. It cannot be said that in weighing a delay in the timetable for implementing pay equity against the closing of hundreds of hospital beds, as here, a government is engaged in an exercise "whose sole purpose is financial". The weighing exercise has as much to do with social values as it has to do with dollars. In the present case, the "potential impact" is $24 million, amounting to more than 10 percent of the projected budgetary deficit for 1991-92. The delayed implementation of pay equity is an extremely serious matter, but so too (for example) is the layoff of 1,300 permanent, 350 part-time and 350 seasonal employees, and the deprivation to the public of the services they provided.

What is more, the objective of the measure must be the objective that animating the measure at the time it was adopted. However, this temporal restriction does not also imply that the evidence in support of the objective's pressing and substantial importance is restricted to the evidence available at the time the measure was enacted. Here is how the Supreme Court explains this difference in Irwin Toy v Quebec, 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927:

> The respondent contended that only evidence of legislative objective contemporary with the adoption of ss. 248 and 249 was relevant to deciding whether these sections constitute a reasonable limit to freedom of expression. It therefore attacked the relevance of studies post-dating the enactment of the Consumer Protection Act and upon which the government did not rely in adopting the legislation.
> Where the basis for its legislation is not obvious, the government must bring forward cogent and persuasive evidence demonstrating that the provisions in issue are justified having regard to the constituent elements of the s. 1 or 9.1 inquiry (see R. v. Oakes, supra, at p. 138). In showing that the legislation pursues a pressing and substantial objective, it is not open to the government to assert post facto a purpose which did not animate the legislation in the first place (see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 335). However, in proving that the original objective remains pressing and substantial, the government surely can and should draw upon the best evidence currently available. The same is true as regards proof that the measure is proportional to its objective (see R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, at p. 769). It is equally possible that a purpose which was not demonstrably pressing and substantial at the time of the legislative enactment becomes demonstrably pressing and substantial with the passing of time and the changing of circumstances.

More often, the question under the first branch of the Oakes test relates to how to formulate the objective pursued by the infringing measure. Some objectives may be too abstract for the purposes of the Oakes test.

In Sauvé v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), [2002] 3 SCR 519, 2002 SCC 68, a majority of the Supreme Court rejected as too abstract the stated objective of enhancing civic responsibility and respect for the rule of law to justify denying penitentiary inmates the right to vote:

> 23 At the end of the day, people should not be left guessing about why their Charter rights have been infringed. Demonstrable justification requires that the objective clearly reveal the harm that the government hopes to remedy, and that this objective remain constant throughout the justification process. As this Court has stated, the objective "must be accurately and precisely defined so as to provide a clear framework for evaluating its importance, and to assess the precision with which the means have been crafted to fulfil that objective": per Cory J. in U.F.C.W., Local 1518, supra, at para. 59; see also Thomson Newspapers, supra, at para. 96; RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 144. A court faced with vague objectives may well conclude, as did Arbour J.A. (as she then was) in Sauvé No. 1, supra, at p. 487, that "the highly symbolic and abstract nature of th[e] objective . . . detracts from its importance as a justification for the violation of a constitutionally protected right". If Parliament can infringe a crucial right such as the right to vote simply by offering symbolic and abstract reasons, judicial review either becomes vacuously constrained or reduces to a contest of "our symbols are better than your symbols". Neither outcome is compatible with the vigorous justification analysis required by the Charter.
> 24 The rhetorical nature of the government objectives advanced in this case renders them suspect. The first objective, enhancing civic responsibility and respect for the law, could be asserted of virtually every criminal law and many non-criminal measures. Respect for law is undeniably important. But the simple statement of this value lacks the context necessary to assist us in determining whether the infringement at issue is demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. To establish justification, one needs to know what problem the government is targeting, and why it is so pressing and important that it warrants limiting a Charter right. Without this, it is difficult if not impossible to weigh whether the infringement of the right is justifiable or proportionate.

Excepting objectives too abstract to inform the section 1 analysis, there remain live questions over how concretely or generally to formulate the objective of an infringing measure. For example, in RJR-MacDonald v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, the majority and dissent disagreed over how to formulate the legislative objective animating the Tobacco Products Control Act prohibitions against advertising and promotion of tobacco products. Whereas the dissent favoured an objective centred on protecting Canadians from the health risks of tobacco use, the majority favoured a more specific objective:

> 144 Care must be taken not to overstate the objective. The objective relevant to the s. 1 analysis is the objective of the infringing measure, since it is the infringing measure and nothing else which is sought to be justified. If the objective is stated too broadly, its importance may be exaggerated and the analysis compromised. As my colleague has noted, the Tobacco Products Control Act is but one facet of a complex legislative and policy scheme to protect Canadians from the health risks of tobacco use. However, the objective of the impugned measures themselves is somewhat narrower than this. The objective of the advertising ban and trademark usage restrictions must be to prevent people in Canada from being persuaded by advertising and promotion to use tobacco products. The objective of the mandatory package warning must be to discourage people who see the package from tobacco use. Both constitute important objectives, although the significance of the targeted decrease in consumption is reduced by the government's estimate that despite the ban, 65 percent of the Canadian magazine market will contain tobacco advertisements, given that the ban applies only to Canadian media and not to imported publications.
> 146 While the limited objective of reducing tobacco-associated health risks by reducing advertising-related consumption and providing warnings of dangers is less significant than the broad objective of protecting Canadians generally from the risks associated with tobacco use, it nevertheless constitutes an objective of sufficient importance to justify overriding the right of free expression guaranteed by the Charter. Even a small reduction in tobacco use may work a significant benefit to the health of Canadians and justify a properly proportioned limitation of right of free expression.

Given that the proportionality evaluations of the Oakes test all relate to the objective—whether the measures are rationally connected to the objective, whether there are less impairing alternatives to pursue the objective, whether the salutatory benefits in pursuing the objective outweigh the deleterious effects on the infringed right or freedom—the formulation of the objective at the first stage of the Oakes test is all-important.

4.2 Rational connection

The second branch of the Oakes test asks whether there is a rational connection between the pressing and substantial objective and the infringing measures. Is such a connection to be demonstrated by scientific evidence or by appeal to reason? Here is how the Court answered this question in RJR-Macdonald, supra:

> 153 As a first step in the proportionality analysis, the government must demonstrate that the infringements of the right of free expression worked by the law are rationally connected to the legislative goal of reducing tobacco consumption. It must show a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic. To put it another way, the government must show that the restriction on > rights serves the intended purpose. This must be demonstrated on a balance of probabilities.

> 154 The causal relationship between the infringement of rights and the benefit sought may sometimes be proved by scientific evidence showing that as a matter of repeated observation, one affects the other. Where, however, legislation is directed at changing human behaviour, as in the case of the Tobacco Products Control Act, the causal relationship may not be scientifically measurable. In such cases, this Court has been prepared to find a causal connection between the infringement and benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic, without insisting on direct proof of a relationship between the infringing measure and the legislative objective: R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, at pp. 768 and 777; R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452, at p. 503. As Sopinka J. wrote of the causal link between obscenity and harm to society in Butler, at p. 502:
> > While a direct link between obscenity and harm to society may be difficult, if not impossible, to establish, it is reasonable to presume that exposure to images bears a causal relationship to changes in attitudes and beliefs.
> 184 Rational connection is to be established, upon a civil standard, through reason, logic or simply common sense. The existence of scientific proof is simply of probative value in demonstrating this reason, logic or common sense. It is by no means dispositive or determinative.

In R v Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2 (CanLII), [2001] 1 SCR 45, the Supreme Court clarified the standard of proof for establishing the link between the impugned measure and the objective:

> 85. This raises a question pivotal to this appeal: what standard of proof must the Crown achieve in demonstrating harm – scientific proof based on concrete evidence or a reasoned apprehension of harm? The trial judge insisted on scientific proof based on concrete evidence. With respect, this sets the bar too high. In Butler, supra, considering the obscenity prohibition of the Criminal Code, this Court rejected the need for concrete evidence and held that a "reasoned apprehension of harm" sufficed (p. 504).
> 94. I conclude that the social science evidence adduced in this case, buttressed by experience and common sense, amply meets the Oakes requirement of a rational connection between the purpose of the law and the means adopted to effect this purpose.

The rational connection branch of the Oakes test is usually satisfied. It was held to be "not particularly onerous" in Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Canada, 2000 SCC 69 (CanLII), [2000] 2 SCR 1120, para. 228 and, in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567, para. 48, the Court reasoned that the "government must show that it is reasonable to suppose that the limit may further the goal, not that it will do so."

For an example when the rational connection test was not satisfied, see M. v. H., 1999 CanLII 686 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 3, where the Court found there to be no rational connection between the exclusion of same-sex couples from a scheme the objective of which was to provide for spousal support:

> 4 This infringement is not justified under s.1 of the Charter because there is no rational connection between the objectives of the spousal support provisions and the means chosen to further this objective. The objectives were accurately identified … as providing for the equitable resolution of economic disputes when intimate relationships between financially interdependent individuals break down, and alleviating the burden on the public purse to provide for dependent spouses. Neither of these objectives is furthered by the exclusion of individuals in same-sex couples from the spousal support regime. If anything, these goals are undermined by this exclusion.

4.3 Minimal impairment

The most consequential branch of the Oakes test is the third: the minimal impairment requirement. As formulated in R v Oakes, para. 70, the requirement is that the impugned measure should impair the right or freedom "as little as possible".

However, that requirement was interpreted in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713 to allow some leeway to the legislature. In evaluating an exemption from the general obligation to close retail businesses on Sunday for businesses with seven or fewer employees, the Court reasoned as follows in applying the minimal impairment branch of the Oakes test:

> 147. I might add that I do not believe there is any magic in the number seven as distinct from, say, five, ten, or fifteen employees as the cut-off point for eligibility for the exemption. In balancing the interests of retail employees to a holiday in common with their family and friends against the s. 2(a) interests of those affected the Legislature engaged in the process envisaged by s. 1 of the Charter. A "reasonable limit" is one which, having regard to the principles enunciated in Oakes, it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line.

The recognition that it is not for the courts to determine precisely where to draw the legislative line in evaluating minimal impairment has led the Court to understand the requirement here as one of evaluating whether the impugned measure falls within a range of reasonable alternatives. In RJR-Macdonald, supra, the Court explained as follows:

> 60. As the second step in the proportionality analysis, the government must show that the measures at issue impair the right of free expression as little as reasonably possible in order to achieve the legislative objective. The impairment must be "minimal", that is, the law must be carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary. The tailoring process seldom admits of perfection and the courts must accord some leeway to the legislator. If the law falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement: see Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, at pp. 1196-97; R. v. Chaulk, 1990 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 1303, at pp. 1340-41; Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), 1993 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 1084, at pp. 1105-06. On the other hand, if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail.

These same themes were again emphasized in Sharpe, supra:

> 96. This Court has held that to establish justification it is not necessary to show that Parliament has adopted the least restrictive means of achieving its end. It suffices if the means adopted fall within a range of reasonable solutions to the problem confronted. The law must be reasonably tailored to its objectives; it must impair the right no more than reasonably necessary, having regard to the practical difficulties and conflicting tensions that must be taken into account: see Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra; Chaulk, supra; Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v. Canada, 1991 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 139; Butler, supra; RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199; M. v. H., 1999 CanLII 686 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 3.
> 97. This approach to minimal impairment is confirmed by the existence of the third branch of the proportionality test, requiring that the impairment of the right be proportionate to the benefit in terms of achieving Parliament's goal. If the only question were whether the impugned > law limits the right as little as possible, there would be little need for the third stage of weighing the costs resulting from the infringement of the right against the benefits gained in terms of achieving Parliament's goal. It was argued after Oakes, supra, that anything short of absolutely minimal impairment was fatal. This Court has rejected that notion. The language of the third branch of the Oakes test is consistent with a more nuanced approach to the minimal impairment inquiry -- one that takes into account the difficulty of drafting laws that accomplish Parliament's goals, achieve certainty and only minimally intrude on rights. At its heart, s. 1 is a matter of balancing: see Dagenais, supra; RJR-MacDonald, supra; Ross v. New Brunswick School District No. 15, 1996 CanLII 237 (SCC), [1996] 1 SCR 825; Thomson Newspapers, supra.

In determining which measures fall within a range of reasonable alternatives, only those measures which are as effective at achieving the objective as the selected measure are to be considered. As explained by the Court in Hutterian Brethren, supra:

> 53. The question at this stage of the s. 1 proportionality analysis is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the pressing and substantial goal put forward to justify the limit. Another way of putting this question is to ask whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal. In making this assessment, the courts accord the legislature a measure of deference, particularly on complex social issues where the legislature may be better positioned than the courts to choose among a range of alternatives.
> 55. I hasten to add that in considering whether the government's objective could be achieved by other less drastic means, the court need not be satisfied that the alternative would satisfy the objective to exactly the same extent or degree as the impugned measure. In other words, the court should not accept an unrealistically exacting or precise formulation of the government's objective which would effectively immunize the law from scrutiny at the minimal impairment stage. The requirement for an "equally effective" alternative measure in the passage from RJR-MacDonald, quoted above, should not be taken to an impractical extreme. It includes alternative measures that give sufficient protection, in all the circumstances, to the government's goal: Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 SCR 350. While the government is entitled to deference in formulating its objective, that deference is not blind or absolute. The test at the minimum impairment stage is whether there is an alternative, less drastic means of achieving the objective in a real and substantial manner. As I will explain, in my view the record in this case discloses no such alternative.

This "effectiveness" requirement for alternative measures that could show the selected measure not to be minimally impairing recalls the rational connection test at the second branch of the Oakes test. It remains a somewhat open question whether, at the minimal impairment branch, some trade-off of effectiveness of an alternative measure could be compensated by a lesser degree of impairment of the affected right. If so, then that may help to explain why the overall balance branch of the Oakes test, reviewed next, does not play a signature role in Canadian jurisprudence.

4.4 Overall balancing

The final branch of the Oakes test serves an important function, even if it is rarely determinative in the justification analysis. Here is how the Court in Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 877, described the specific contribution of the overall balance assessment:

> 125. The third stage of the proportionality analysis performs a fundamentally distinct role. . .. The focus of the first [rational connection] and second [minimal impairment] steps of the proportionality analysis is not the relationship between the measures and the Charter right in question, but rather the relationship between the ends of the legislation and the means employed. Although the minimal impairment stage of the proportionality test necessarily takes into account the extent to which a Charter value is infringed, the ultimate standard is whether the Charter right is impaired as little as possible given the validity of the legislative purpose. The third stage of the proportionality analysis provides an opportunity to assess, in light of the practical and contextual details which are elucidated in the first and second stages, whether the benefits which accrue from the limitation are proportional to its deleterious effects as measured by the values underlying the Charter.

This final assessment was initial formulated as inviting a comparison between "the effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the Charter right or freedom, and the objective which has been identified as of 'sufficient importance'" (Oakes, supra, para. 70).

In Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 835, pp. 888-889, the Supreme Court reformulated the final branch of the Oakes test so as to add another proportionality evaluation:

> While the third step of the Oakes proportionality test has often been expressed in terms of the proportionality of the objective to the deleterious effects, this Court has recognized that in appropriate cases it is necessary to measure the actual salutary effects of impugned legislation against its deleterious effects, rather than merely considering the proportionality of the objective itself.
> In my view, characterizing the third part of the second branch of the Oakes test as being concerned solely with the balance between the objective and the deleterious effects of a measure rests on too narrow a conception of proportionality. I believe that even if an objective is of sufficient importance, the first two elements of the proportionality test are satisfied, and the deleterious effects are proportional to the objectives, it is still possible that, because of a lack of proportionality between the deleterious effects and the salutary effects, a measure will not be reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. I would, therefore, rephrase the third part of the Oakes test as follows: there must be a proportionality between the deleterious effects of the measures which are responsible for limiting the rights or freedoms in question and the objective, and there must be a proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of the measures.

In subsequent cases, however, the focus of the final branch of the Oakes test has been only on a proportionality between the deleterious and the salutary effects of the measures, without reference to a proportionality between the deleterious and the objective of the measures.

In R. v. K.R.J., 2016 SCC 31, [2016] 1 SCR 906, one of rare cases in which only the final branch of the Oakes test was held not to be satisfied, the Court described proportionality assessment in these words:

> [77] At this final stage of the proportionality analysis, the Court must "weig[h] the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good" (Carter, at para. 122).[6] This final stage is an important one because it performs a fundamentally distinct role. As a majority of this Court observed in Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 877:
> > The focus of the first and second steps of the proportionality analysis is not the relationship between the measures and the Charter right in question, but rather the relationship between the ends of the legislation and the means employed. . . . The third stage of the proportionality analysis provides an opportunity to assess, in light of the practical and contextual details which are elucidated in the first and second stages, whether the benefits which accrue from the limitation are proportional to its deleterious effects as measured by the values underlying the Charter. [para. 125]

[78] It is for this reason that Aharon Barak, former President of the Supreme Court of Israel, has described this final step as "the very heart of proportionality" ("Proportional Effect: The Israeli Experience" (2007), 57 U.T.L.J. 369, at p. 380). And in Hutterian Brethren, Abella J. wrote: ". . . most of the heavy conceptual lifting and balancing ought to be done at the final step —proportionality. Proportionality is, after all, what s. 1 is about" (para. 149).

[79] I agree. While the minimal impairment test has come to dominate much of the s. 1 discourse in Canada, this final step permits courts to address the essence of the proportionality enquiry at the heart of s. 1. It is only at this final stage that courts can transcend the law's purpose and engage in a robust examination of the law's impact on Canada's free and democratic society "in direct and explicit terms" (J. Cameron, "The Past, Present, and Future of Expressive Freedom Under the Charter" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 1, at p. 66). In other words, this final step allows courts to stand back to determine on a normative basis whether a rights infringement is justified in a free and democratic society. Although this examination entails difficult value judgments, it is preferable to make these judgments explicit, as doing so enhances the transparency and intelligibility of the ultimate decision. Further, as mentioned, proceeding to this final stage permits appropriate deference to Parliament's choice of means, as well as its full legislative objective.

4.5 Prescribed by law

The Oakes test only applies to those limits that are "prescribed by law", as outlined in section 1 of the Canadian Charter. In a series of cases, the Supreme Court has clarified the scope of this requirement.

A limit will be prescribed by law if it is "expressly provided for by statute or regulation, or results by necessary implication from the terms of a statute or regulation or from its operating requirements": R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 613, p. 645.

However, a limit may also be prescribed by law in other ways, as explained by the Supreme Court of Canada in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students - British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2009] 2 SCR 295 :

[50] In its decisions on the "prescribed by law" requirement in s. 1, the Court has distinguished between challenges to government acts and challenges to "laws" (Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038; Eldridge, at para. 20). This case raises the latter type of claim: the policies are being challenged, not the decision made by the transit authorities pursuant to the policies. In assessing whether the impugned policies satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement, it must first be determined whether the policies come within the meaning of the word "law" in s. 1 of the Charter. To do this, it must be asked whether the government entity was authorized to enact the impugned policies and whether the policies are binding rules of general application. If so, the policies can be "law" for the purposes of s. 1. At the second stage of the enquiry, to find that the limit is "prescribed" by law, it must be determined whether the policies are sufficiently precise and accessible. Professor Peter W. Hogg describes the rationale behind the "prescribed by law" requirement in Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. 2007), vol. 2, at p. 122:

> The requirement that any limit on rights be prescribed by law reflects two values that are basic to constitutionalism or the rule of law. First, in order to preclude arbitrary and discriminatory action by government officials, all official action in derogation of rights must be authorized by law. Secondly, citizens must have a reasonable opportunity to know what is prohibited so that they can act accordingly. Both these values are satisfied by a law that fulfils two requirements: (1) the law must be adequately accessible to the public, and (2) the law must be formulated with sufficient precision to enable people to regulate their conduct by it, and to provide guidance to those who apply the law.

[51] In R. v. Therens, 1985 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 613, the Court emphasized that the "prescribed by law" requirement safeguards the public against arbitrary state limits on Charter rights. Le Dain J. set out the Court's initial interpretation of the expression "prescribed by law" in s. 1 of the Charter (at p. 645):

> The requirement that the limit be prescribed by law is chiefly concerned with the distinction between a limit imposed by law and one that is arbitrary. The limit will be prescribed by law within the meaning of s. 1 if it is expressly provided for by statute or regulation, or results by necessary implication from the terms of a statute or regulation or from its operating requirements.

[52] Thus, the Court does not require that the limit be prescribed by a "law" in the narrow sense of the term; it may be prescribed by a regulation or by the common law. Moreover, it is sufficient that the limit simply result by necessary implication from either the terms or the operating requirements of the "law". (See also Irwin Toy; B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 214; R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 933; and R. v. Orbanski, 2005 SCC 37, [2005] 2 SCR 3.)

[53] The Court has also implicitly recognized other forms of limits that were not originally identified in Therens as being prescribed by law, including limits contained in municipal by-laws (Ramsden and City of Montréal), provisions of a collective agreement involving a government entity (Lavigne) and rules of a regulatory body (Black v. Law Society of Alberta, 1989 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 591). Such limits satisfy the "prescribed by law" requirement because, much like those resulting from regulations and other delegated legislation, their adoption is authorized by statute, they are binding rules of general application, and they are sufficiently accessible and precise to those to whom they apply. In these regards, they satisfy the concerns that underlie the "prescribed by law" requirement insofar as they preclude arbitrary state action and provide individuals and government entities with sufficient information on how they should conduct themselves.

[54] The Court has likewise taken a liberal approach to the precision requirement. The majority in Irwin Toy explained this as follows (at p. 983):

> Absolute precision in the law exists rarely, if at all. The question is whether the legislature has provided an intelligible standard according to which the judiciary must do its work. The task of interpreting how that standard applies in particular instances might always be characterized as having a discretionary element, because the standard can never specify all the instances in which it applies. On the other hand, where there is no intelligible standard and where the legislature has given a plenary discretion to do whatever seems best in a wide set of circumstances, there is no "limit prescribed by law".

The Court emphasized in Osborne v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1991 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 69, at pp. 94-97, that the standard is not an onerous one. Unless the impugned law "is so obscure as to be incapable of interpretation with any degree of precision using the ordinary tools", it will be deemed to have met the "prescribed by law" requirement (p. 94).

[55] These cases show that the Court has chosen to take a flexible approach to the "prescribed by law" requirement as regards both the form (e.g., statute, regulation, municipal by-law, rule of a regulatory body or collective agreement provision) and articulation of a limit on a Charter right (i.e., a standard intelligible to the public and to those who apply the law). In the end, the Court has emphasized, as in Therens, the need to distinguish between limits which arise by law and limits which result from arbitrary state action; those resulting from arbitrary state action continue to fail the "prescribed by law" requirement.

[56] This inclusive approach is based on a recognition that a narrow interpretation would lead to excessive rigidity in a parliamentary and legislative system that relies heavily on framework legislation and delegations of broad discretionary powers. McLachlin J. (as she then was) commented on this as follows in Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada (at p. 245):

> From a practical point of view, it would be wrong to limit the application of s. 1 to enacted laws or regulations. That would require the Crown to pass detailed regulations to deal with every contingency as a pre-condition of justifying its conduct under s. 1. In my view, such a technical approach does not accord with the spirit of the Charter and would make it unduly difficult to justify limits on rights and freedoms which may be reasonable and, indeed, necessary.
> See also Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69, [2000] 2 SCR 1120, at para. 137.

Where the rights and freedoms of the Charter are limited by the exercise of discretionary authority, the Oakes test is not applied. As explained in Doré v. Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2012] 1 SCR 395:

> [57] On judicial review, the question becomes whether, in assessing the impact of the relevant Charter protection and given the nature of the decision and the statutory and factual contexts, the decision reflects a proportionate balancing of the Charter protections at play. As LeBel J. noted in Multani, when a court is faced with reviewing an administrative decision that implicates Charter rights, "[t]he issue becomes one of proportionality" (para. 155), and calls for integrating the spirit of s. 1 into judicial review. Though this judicial review is conducted within the administrative framework, there is nonetheless conceptual harmony between a reasonableness review and the Oakes framework, since both contemplate giving a "margin of appreciation", or deference, to administrative and legislative bodies in balancing Charter values against broader objectives.
> [58] If, in exercising its statutory discretion, the decision-maker has properly balanced the relevant Charter value with the statutory objectives, the decision will be found to be reasonable.

5 Context and Deference

The Supreme Court takes a contextual approach to the s. 1 analysis. The test is a flexible one that considers the factual and social context of each case. In RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199 at para. 63, the Supreme Court stated:

> 63 This Court has on many occasions affirmed that the Oakes requirements must be applied flexibly, having regard to the specific factual and social context of each case. The word "reasonable" in s. 1 necessarily imports flexibility. In a significant, but often neglected, passage from Oakes itself, Dickson C.J. warned against an overly formalistic approach to s. 1 justification, stating, at p. 139, that "[a]lthough the nature of the proportionality test will vary depending on the circumstances, in each case the courts will be required to balance the interests of society with those of individuals and groups". Shortly thereafter, he reaffirmed this warning in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, at pp. 768-69, where, referring to the Court's decision in Oakes, he stated:
> > The Court stated that the nature of the proportionality test would vary depending on the circumstances. Both in articulating the standard of proof and in describing the criteria comprising the proportionality requirement the Court has been careful to avoid rigid and inflexible standards.
> Later, in R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, at p. 735, Dickson C.J. had occasion to elaborate more fully upon the nature of the Oakes inquiry, stating that it was "dangerously misleading to conceive of s. 1 as a rigid and technical provision". He noted at p. 735 that,
> > [f]rom a crudely practical standpoint, Charter litigants sometimes may perceive s. 1 in this manner, but in the body of our nation's constitutional law it plays an immeasurably richer role, one of great magnitude and sophistication.
> The role played by s. 1, he observed, at pp. 735-36, is to bring "together the fundamental values and aspirations of Canadian society" through the "dual function" of activating Charter rights and permitting such reasonable limits as a free and democratic society may have occasion to place upon them…In United States of America v. Cotroni, 1989 CanLII 106 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1469, at pp. 1489-90, I also stressed the…need to avoid what I called a "mechanistic approach" in the application of the s. 1 analysis:
> > In the performance of the balancing task under s. 1, it seems to me, a mechanistic approach must be avoided. While the rights guaranteed by the Charter must be given priority in the equation, the underlying values must be sensitively weighed in a particular context against other values of a free and democratic society sought to be promoted by the legislature.

5.1 Deference to Legislative Authority: Some Considerations

In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, a case concerning the constitutionality of ss. 248 and 249 of the Consumer Protection Act, R.S.Q., c. P-40.1, which prohibited commercial advertising directed at children under 13 years of age, the Supreme Court addressed the issue of when it is appropriate to defer to the judgement of the legislature. Citing the earlier case of R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, the Supreme Court found that:

> A "reasonable limit" is one which, having regard to the principles enunciated in Oakes, it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line.

Over a range of cases, including Irwin Toy, RJR-MacDonald, and Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 SCR 467, the Supreme Court has considered several factors that are relevant in determining the level of deference owed to legislative judgement in the section 1 analysis in a particular case. Deference in the section 1 analysis is less appropriate in the criminal law context or when the "core democratic rights" under s.3 of the Charter have been infringed. Frank v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1, [2019] 1 SCR 3

> [43] The jurisprudence also requires that a stringent standard of justification be applied when the government seeks to justify a limit on the s. 3 right to vote…This does not necessarily mean that the government bears a heavier burden in the context of this right than in the context of other Charter rights; as I mentioned above, the standard is always proof on a balance of probabilities. What it does mean is that reviewing courts must examine the government's proffered justification carefully and rigorously in this context rather than adopting a deferential attitude. Deference may be appropriate in the case of a complex regulatory response or a decision involving competing social and political policies, but it is not the appropriate posture for a court reviewing an absolute prohibition of a core democratic right (Sauvé #2, at para. 13; Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567, at para. 37).

The Supreme Court has distinguished between two types of deference owed to legislative judgement. While the distinction between the two types can be difficult to maintain, the first type concerns judicial deference owing to legislative determinations of fact, and the second concerns judicial deference to legislative decisions which aim to balance competing values and interests. The Supreme Court has held that judicial deference might be especially apt with respect to legislative understanding of the relevant social science evidence. In such cases, a lower standard of justification for legislative understandings of the factual matters pertinent to the s.1 analysis is defensible given the legislature's institutional competence at policy making, and access to resources. This reasoning holds, finds the Court, even in cases where it appears that the social science evidence is not especially determinative of the matter at hand. The Supreme Court has also found that deference is appropriate where the legislature is balancing competing values. This type of deference relies on arguments pertaining to democratic legitimacy. Where the factors tend towards deference, a lower standard of justification under the Oakes test would be appropriate. RJR-MacDonald at para. 68.

5.2 Deference when government acts as a singular-antagonist vis-à-vis a policy mediator between competing individuals and groups

In Irwin Toy, the Supreme Court found that legislative deference is appropriate where the government has sought to play a mediator role by crafting legislation that balances policy interests between competing individuals and groups. The degree of deference shown to the government turns on whether the Supreme Court ascertains the matter at hand to be one where the government would have the relevant expertise, and/or the democratic mandate to legislate on the complex and sometimes contentious policy matters that are the subject of the legislation. Deference is especially appropriate in cases where the legislation at issue is aimed at the protection of vulnerable groups. In such cases, the Supreme Court should not insist on the "least drastic means" test at the minimal impairment stage of their s.1 evaluation. Where, however, the government is "best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed" the Supreme Court should insist on a higher standard of justification.

The Supreme Court further considers the question of when judicial deference is appropriate in the following excerpt from Irwin Toy:

> Where the legislature mediates between the competing claims of different groups in the community, it will inevitably be called upon to draw a line marking where one set of claims legitimately begins and the other fades away without access to complete knowledge as to its precise location. If the legislature has made a reasonable assessment as to where the line is most properly drawn, especially if that assessment involves weighing conflicting scientific evidence and allocating scarce resources on this basis, it is not for the court to second guess. That would only be to substitute one estimate for another. In dealing with inherently heterogeneous groups defined in terms of age or a characteristic analogous to age, evidence showing that a clear majority of the group requires the protection which the government has identified can help to establish that the group was defined reasonably.
> Thus, in matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. Vulnerable groups will claim the need for protection by the government whereas other groups and individuals will assert that the government should not intrude. In Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, Dickson C.J. expressed an important concern about the situation of vulnerable groups (at p. 779):
> > In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons.
> > When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. For example, when "regulating industry or business it is open to the legislature to restrict its legislative reforms to sectors in which there appear to be particularly urgent concerns or to constituencies that seem especially needy" (Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at p. 772).
> > In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. For example, in justifying an infringement of legal rights enshrined in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter, the state, on behalf of the whole community, typically will assert its responsibility for prosecuting crime whereas the individual will assert the paramountcy of principles of fundamental justice. There might not be any further competing claims among different groups. In such circumstances, and indeed whenever the government's purpose relates to maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judicial system, the courts can assess with some certainty whether the "least drastic means" for achieving the purpose have been chosen, especially given their accumulated experience in dealing with such questions: see Sunday Times v. United Kingdom (1979), 2 E.H.R.R. 245, at p. 276. The same degree of certainty may not be achievable in cases involving the reconciliation of claims of competing individuals or groups or the distribution of scarce government resources.
> > In the instant case, the Court is called upon to assess competing social science evidence respecting the appropriate means for addressing the problem of children's advertising. The question is whether the government had a reasonable basis, on the evidence tendered, for concluding that the ban on all advertising directed at children impaired freedom of expression as little as possible given the government's pressing and substantial objective.

As outlined in Irwin Toy, deference shifts in accordance with whether the law under constitutional scrutiny is best viewed through a 'singular antagonist' or a public policy lens. A higher level of scrutiny will be required where the matter fits the singular antagonist frame, for as stated in RJR MacDonald at 68, "[c]ourts are specialists in the protection of liberty and the interpretation of legislation and are, accordingly, well placed to subject criminal justice legislation to careful scrutiny."

In RJR MacDonald, the Supreme Court again considered the question of judicial deference in a section 1 analysis after finding that certain provisions of the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, which prohibited (with exception) the advertising and promotion of tobacco products and the sale of tobacco products without unattributed health warnings and a list of toxic constituents, had violated s. 2(b) of the Charter. The Supreme Court here reiterates the importance of deferring to legislative judgement when the legislation at issue is aiming to address complex public policy issues. The aims of the legislation under review are relevant to the section 1 analysis both in 'in determining the appropriate standard of justification and in weighing the relevant evidence' (para 66). When aim of the legislation is to address a complex and multifaceted social issue, such as tobacco addition, it would not be appropriate under the s.1 analysis to demand definitive scientific evidence. The Court expands on this link between evidentiary standards and appropriate deference to legislative judgement in the following passages from RJR MacDonald:

> 64 … This Court has on many occasions stated that the evidentiary requirements under s. 1 will vary substantially depending upon both the nature of the legislation and the nature of the right infringed. In the present cases, both these contextual elements are highly relevant to a proper application of the s. 1 analysis. Accordingly, before proceeding to an analysis of the evidence submitted at trial, I find it necessary to explore in more detail both the nature of the legislation and the nature of the right it infringes.
> 65 I turn first to the nature of the legislation. In my discussion of the criminal law power, I concluded that the Act is, in pith and substance, criminal law aimed at the protection of public health. In enacting this legislation, Parliament clearly intended to protect public health by reducing the number of inducements for Canadians to consume tobacco, and by educating Canadians about the health risks entailed in its consumption. The appellants concede, and in my view, there is no doubt, that this goal is pressing and substantial. At trial and before this Court the Attorney General adduced copious evidence, some of which is set forth in the criminal law power discussion, demonstrating that tobacco consumption is one of the leading causes of illness and death in our society. It is noteworthy that the detrimental effects of tobacco consumption impact not only upon the estimated 30,000 Canadians who die from related diseases each year, but also upon every member of our community. Apart from the apparent danger posed to nonsmoking members of the community by secondary smoke, all Canadians, and not merely tobacco consumers, must shoulder the heightened tax burden arising from the high cost of medical care for tobacco users who become ill.

66 Having conceded that the objective of protecting public health from the detrimental effects of tobacco consumption is pressing and substantial, the appellants submit, and Chabot J. agreed, that the facts respecting the harmful effect of tobacco are irrelevant to the application of the proportionality analysis. Chabot J. stated, at p. 491:

> . . . much of the expert scientific evidence relating to the effects of tobacco on health, however voluminous and instructive, was nevertheless, with respect, irrelevant to the case and, in the humble view of the court, served merely to colour the debate unnecessarily.

With respect, I disagree. In my view, the nature and scope of the health problems raised by tobacco consumption are highly relevant to the s. 1 analysis, both in determining the appropriate standard of justification and in weighing the relevant evidence. In this respect, it is essential to keep in mind that tobacco addiction is a unique, and somewhat perplexing, phenomenon. Despite the growing recognition of the detrimental health effects of tobacco use, close to a third of the population continues to use tobacco products on a regular basis. At this point, there is no definitive scientific explanation for tobacco addiction, nor is there a clearly understood causal connection between advertising, or any other environmental factor, and tobacco consumption. This is not surprising. One cannot understand the causal connection between advertising and consumption, or between tobacco and addiction, without probing deeply into the mysteries of human psychology. Many of the workings of the human mind, and the causes of human behaviour, remain hidden to our understanding and will no doubt remain so for quite some time. In this respect, it is instructive to consider the view of the Surgeon General of the United States, who observed in his 1989 report entitled Reducing the Health Consequences of Smoking -- 25 Years of Progress -- A report of the Surgeon General, at pp. 512-13:

> There is no scientifically rigorous study available to the public that provides a definitive answer to the basic question of whether advertising and promotion increase the level of tobacco consumption. Given the complexity of the issue, none is likely to be forthcoming in the foreseeable future.

However, despite the lack of definitive scientific explanations of the causes of tobacco addiction, clear evidence does exist of the detrimental social effects of tobacco consumption. As I discussed earlier, overwhelming evidence was introduced at trial that tobacco use is a principal cause of deadly cancers, heart disease and lung disease, and that tobacco is highly addictive. Perhaps the most distressing aspect of the evidence introduced at trial is that tobacco consumption is most widespread among the young and the less educated -- those segments of the population who are least able to inform themselves about, and to protect themselves against, its hazards. The majority of Canadian tobacco smokers start smoking regularly in their teens, and approximately one in five begin smoking regularly as early as 13; see expert report of Dr. Roberta G. Ferrence, supra; "Project Plus/Minus", prepared for Imperial Tobacco Ltd. (1982). Indeed, it has been estimated that, among young Canadians who continue to use tobacco, six times more will die prematurely of disease caused by smoking than from car accidents, suicide, murder and AIDS combined; see expert report of Dr. Donald T. Wigle, supra. Moreover there are more smokers among people with less formal education. While, in 1986, 60 percent of those with no high school education smoked on a daily basis, only 8 percent of those with a university degree did so; see expert report of Dr. Roberta G. Ferrence, supra, at p. 32.

67 It appears, then, that there is a significant gap between our understanding of the health effects of tobacco consumption and of the root causes of tobacco consumption. In my view, this gap raises a fundamental institutional problem that must be taken into account in undertaking the s. 1 balancing. Simply put, a strict application of the proportionality analysis in cases of this nature would place an impossible onus on Parliament by requiring it to produce definitive social scientific evidence respecting the root causes of a pressing area of social concern every time it wishes to address its effects. This could have the effect of virtually paralyzing the operation of government in the socio-economic sphere. As I noted in McKinney, supra, at pp. 304-5, predictions respecting the ramifications of legal rules upon the social and economic order are not matters capable of precise measurement, and are often "the product of a mix of conjecture, fragmentary knowledge, general experience and knowledge of the needs, aspirations and resources of society, and other components". To require Parliament to wait for definitive social science conclusions every time it wishes to make social policy would impose an unjustifiable limit on legislative power by attributing a degree of scientific accuracy to the art of government which, in my view, is simply not consonant with reality. As LeBel J.A. observed in the Court of Appeal (at pp. 311-12):

> Interpreted literally, mechanically, without nuance, the Oakes test and the burden of proof which it imposes on the state would most often negate its ability to legislate.
> Moreover, such an approach misconceives the nature of a constitutional case such as this. It cannot be dealt with as if it were an ordinary civil trial. We are not dealing with a matter in which, for example, a particular litigant seeks to demonstrate that his tobacco consumption and the advertising of a manufacturer whose cigarettes he consumed caused his lung cancer or his emphysema. It is rather a question of determining the basis on which a legislator may choose to act, where the outcome is uncertain.
> It is necessary to understand the limits and the nature of policy choices. It is often difficult to forecast the future and to anticipate the beneficial or negative consequences of government policy. A well-conceived policy may be poorly applied. The necessary institutional resources may fail; unforeseen obstacles may intervene. If one is to apply rigorously the criterion of civil proof on the balance of probabilities it will be impossible to govern. On this basis, it would not be possible to make difficult but sometimes necessary legislative choices. There would be conferred on the courts a supervisory role over a state itself essentially inactive.

68 In several recent cases, this Court has recognized the need to attenuate the Oakes standard of justification when institutional constraints analogous to those in the present cases arise. In Irwin Toy, supra, at pp. 993-94, this Court stated:

> . . . in matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. Vulnerable groups will claim the need for protection by the government whereas other groups and individuals will assert that the government should not intrude.
> When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. . ..
> In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. For example, in justifying an infringement of legal rights enshrined in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter, the state, on behalf of the whole community, typically will assert its responsibility for prosecuting crime whereas the individual will assert the paramountcy of principles of fundamental justice. There might not be any further competing claims among different > groups. In such circumstances, and indeed whenever the government's purpose relates to maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judicial system, the courts can assess with some certainty whether the "least drastic means" for achieving the purpose have been chosen, especially given their accumulated experience in dealing with such questions. . ..

In drawing a distinction between legislation aimed at "mediating between different groups", where a lower standard of s. 1 justification may be appropriate, and legislation where the state acts as the "singular antagonist of the individual", where a higher standard of justification is necessary, the Court in Irwin Toy was drawing upon the more fundamental institutional distinction between the legislative and judicial functions that lies at the very heart of our political and constitutional system. Courts are specialists in the protection of liberty and the interpretation of legislation and are, accordingly, well placed to subject criminal justice legislation to careful scrutiny. However, courts are not specialists in the realm of policy-making, nor should they be. This is a role properly assigned to the elected representatives of the people, who have at their disposal the necessary institutional resources to enable them to compile and assess social science evidence, to mediate between competing social interests and to reach out and protect vulnerable groups. In according a greater degree of deference to social legislation than to legislation in the criminal justice context, this Court has recognized these important institutional differences between legislatures and the judiciary.

69 In my view, the considerations addressed by this Court in Irwin Toy and McKinney, supra, are applicable to the present cases. In enacting this legislation, Parliament was facing a difficult policy dilemma. On the one hand, Parliament is aware of the detrimental health effects of tobacco use, and has a legitimate interest in protecting Canadians from, and in informing them about, the dangers of tobacco use. Health underlies many of our most cherished rights and values, and the protection of public health is one of the fundamental responsibilities of Parliament. On the other hand, however, it is clear that a prohibition on the manufacture, sale or use of tobacco products is unrealistic. Nearly seven million Canadians use tobacco products, which are highly addictive. Undoubtedly, a prohibition of this nature would lead to an increase in illegal activity, smuggling and, quite possibly, civil disobedience. Well aware of these difficulties, Parliament chose a less drastic, and more incremental, response to the tobacco health problem. In prohibiting the advertising and promotion of tobacco products, as opposed to their manufacture or sale, Parliament has sought to achieve a compromise among the competing interests of smokers, non-smokers and manufacturers, with an eye to protecting vulnerable groups in society. Given the fact that advertising, by its very nature, is intended to influence consumers and create demand, this was a reasonable policy decision. Moreover, as I discussed above, the Act is the product of a legislative process dating back to 1969, when the first report recommending a full prohibition on tobacco advertising was published; see Report of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on Tobacco and Cigarette Smoking, supra. In drafting this legislation, Parliament took into account the views of Canadians from many different sectors of society, representing many different interests. Indeed, the legislative committee responsible for drafting Bill C-51, which was subsequently adopted by Parliament as the Act, heard from 104 organizations during hearings in 1988 representing a variety of interests, including medicine, transport, advertising, smokers' rights, non-smokers' rights, and tobacco production.

70 Seen in this way, it is clear that the Act is the very type of legislation to which this Court has generally accorded a high degree of deference. In drafting this legislation, which is directed toward a laudable social goal and is designed to protect vulnerable groups, Parliament was required to compile and assess complex social science evidence and to mediate between competing social interests. Decisions such as these are properly assigned to our elected representatives, who have at their disposal the necessary resources to undertake them, and who are ultimately accountable to the electorate…

71 Turning now to the nature of the right infringed under the Act, it is once again necessary to place the appellants' claim in context. This Court has recognized, in a line of freedom of expression cases dating back to Edmonton Journal, supra, that, depending on its nature, expression will be entitled to varying levels of constitutional protection…

In Rocket, supra, at pp. 246-47, McLachlin J. affirmed Wilson J.'s contextual approach:

> While the Canadian approach does not apply special tests to restrictions on commercial expression, our method of analysis does permit a sensitive, case-oriented approach to the determination of their constitutionality. Placing the conflicting values in their factual and social context when performing the s. 1 analysis permits the courts to have regard to special features of the expression in question. As Wilson J. notes in Edmonton Journal v. Alberta (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 1326, not all expression is equally worthy of protection. Nor are all infringements of free expression equally serious.

72 The source of the "sensitive, case-oriented approach" referred to by McLachlin J. in Rocket is this Court's more fundamental recognition that the right to freedom of expression is not absolute and cannot, in all cases, override other rights and values. Although freedom of expression is undoubtedly a fundamental value, there are other fundamental values that are also deserving of protection and consideration by the courts. When these values come into conflict, as they often do, it is necessary for the courts to make choices based not upon an abstract, platonic analysis, but upon a concrete weighing of the relative significance of each of the relevant values in our community in the specific context. This the Court has done by weighing freedom of expression claims in light of their relative connection to a set of even more fundamental values. In Keegstra, supra, at pp. 762-63, Dickson C.J. identified these fundamental or "core" values as including the search for political, artistic and scientific truth, the protection of individual autonomy and self-development, and the promotion of public participation in the democratic process. When state action places such values in jeopardy, this Court has been careful to subject it to a searching degree of scrutiny. However, when the form of expression placed in jeopardy falls farther from the "centre core of the spirit", this Court has ruled restrictions on such expression less difficult to justify. As Dickson C.J. observed in Keegstra, supra, at p. 760:

> In my opinion, however, the s. 1 analysis of a limit upon s. 2(b) cannot ignore the nature of the expressive activity which the state seeks to restrict. While we must guard carefully against judging expression according to its popularity, it is equally destructive of free expression values, as well as the other values which underlie a free and democratic society, to treat all expression as equally crucial to those principles at the core of s. 2(b).

73 In cases where the expression in question is farther from the "core" of freedom of expression values, this Court has applied a lower standard of justification. For example, in Keegstra, where a majority of this Court ruled that a prohibition on hate speech under s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, was a justifiable limitation on freedom of expression, Dickson C.J. found that this limited infringement was justified because hate propaganda was a form of expression that was only remotely related to "core" free expression values. He noted, at p. 766:

> . . . I am of the opinion that hate propaganda contributes little to the aspirations of Canadians or Canada in either the quest for truth, the promotion of individual self-development or the protection and fostering of a vibrant democracy where the participation of all individuals is accepted and encouraged. While I cannot conclude that hate propaganda deserves only marginal protection under the s. 1 analysis, I can take cognizance of the fact that limitations upon hate propaganda are directed at a special category of expression which strays some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b), and hence conclude that "restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b)". . ..

75 In my view, the harm engendered by tobacco, and the profit motive underlying its promotion, place this form of expression as far from the "core" of freedom of expression values as prostitution, hate mongering, or pornography, and thus entitle it to a very low degree of protection under s. 1. It must be kept in mind that tobacco advertising serves no political, scientific or artistic ends; nor does it promote participation in the political process. Rather, its sole purpose is to inform consumers about, and promote the use of, a product that is harmful, and often fatal, to the consumers who use it. The main, if not sole, motivation for this advertising is, of course, profit. The sale of tobacco products in Canada generates enormous profits for the three companies who dominate the market (RJR, Imperial and Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc.). In 1992, for example, earnings from Imperial's operations alone reached $432,000,000 (Earnings from operations (Tobacco) in Note 31 (Segmented financial information) in "Notes to the Consolidated Financial Statements", at p. 48 of Imasco Annual Report 1992 and "Six Year Review" in Imasco Annual Report 1992, at pp. 52-53).

76 The appellants, both of whom are large multinational corporations, spend millions of dollars every year to promote their products (in 1987 alone, RJR and Imperial spent over $75 million dollars on advertising and promotion); see RJR-MacDonald Inc., "Advertising and Promotion Spending (CND$)" (1976-1987); Imperial Tobacco Ltd., "Domestic Advertising Expense Summary" (1982-1987). The large sums these companies spend on advertising allow them to employ the most advanced advertising and social psychology techniques to convince potential buyers to buy their products. The sophistication of the advertising campaigns employed by these corporations, in my view, undermines their claim to freedom of expression protection because it creates an enormous power differential between these companies and tobacco consumers in the "marketplace of ideas". As noted by M. L. Rothschild in Advertising: From Fundamentals to Strategies (1987), at p. 8, and cited in Dr. Richard W. Pollay, "The Functions and Management of Cigarette Advertising", Report, prepared July 27, 1989, at p. 2:

> Advertising is salesmanship, and is paid for by a firm, a person or a group with a particular point of view. The message advocates that point of view, and its goal is to create awareness, attitude, or behaviour that is favorable to that advocacy position. The message attempts to inform and to persuade; it is intentionally biased, and there is no intent to present a balanced point of view.

The power differential between advertiser and consumer is even more pronounced with respect to children who, as this Court observed in Irwin Toy, at p. 987, are "particularly vulnerable to the techniques of seduction and manipulation abundant in advertising"; see, e.g., expert report of Dr. Michael J. Chandler, "A Report on the Special Vulnerabilities of Children and Adolescents" (1989), at p. 19; expert report of Simon Chapman and Bill Fitzgerald, "Brand Preference and Advertising Recall in Adolescent Smokers: Some Implications for Health Promotion" (1982), 72 Am. J. Pub. Health 491; Gerald J. Gorn and Renée Florsheim, "The Effects of Commercials for Adult Products on Children" (1985), 11 J. Consumer Res. 962. In this respect, it is critical to keep in mind Dickson C.J.'s reminder in Edwards Books, supra, at p. 779:

> In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons.

77 I conclude, therefore, that an attenuated level of s. 1 justification is appropriate in these cases. Taking into account both the nature of the right and the nature of the legislation in issue, I am satisfied that LeBel J.A. was correct in deciding that the Attorney General need only demonstrate that Parliament had a rational basis for introducing the measures contained in this Act. With these observations firmly in mind, I now proceed to an application of the proportionality test.

5.3 Legislative Interference with High or Low Value Expression; Legislative Interference with the Core or Penumbra of a Rights or Freedom Charter Guarantee.

In Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 SCR 467, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the importance of distinguishing between core and periphery practices that engage with the guarantee of freedom of expression at s. 2(b) in the section 1 analysis. Practices that engage with the core of a Charter right are those that reflect closely the purposes underlying the right. The Supreme Court stated in Whatcott that the section 1 analysis would be more strictly applied when the expression at issue was high-value expression, that is, where the expression that had been interfered with was close to the "core" values underlying the right, which in the case of s, 2(b) are, as Dickson C.J. wrote in Keegstra at 762-63, "political, artistic and scientific truth, the protection of individual autonomy and self-development, and the promotion of public participation in the democratic process."

> [65] The justification of a limit on freedom of expression under s. 1 requires a contextual and purposive approach. The values underlying freedom of expression will inform the context of the violation: see Taylor, Keegstra and Sharpe. McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority in Sharpe, explained succinctly the values underlying freedom of expression first recognized in Irwin Toy, being "individual self-fulfilment, finding the truth through the open exchange of ideas, and the political discourse fundamental to democracy" (para. 23).
> [66] We are therefore required to balance the fundamental values underlying freedom of expression (and, later, freedom of religion) in the context in which they are invoked, with competing Charter rights and other values essential to a free and democratic society, in this case, a commitment to equality and respect for group identity and the inherent dignity owed to all human beings: s. 15 of the Charter and R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, at p. 136; Ross v. New Brunswick School District No. 15, 1996 CanLII 237 (SCC), [1996] 1 SCR 825, at para. 78; and Taylor, at pp. 916 and 920.
> [67] The balancing of competing Charter rights should also take into account Canada's international obligations with respect to international law treaty commitments: Taylor, at p. 916, per Dickson C.J. Those commitments reflect an international recognition that certain types of expression may be limited in furtherance of other fundamental values: Taylor, at pp. 919-20, per Dickson C.J.

In Whatcott, the Supreme Court found that hate speech was low value expression, and far from the core of each of the three values underlying the guarantee of freedom of expression at s. 2(b). Deference will be afforded to the legislature where the expression in question is considered far from the core of the right. The Supreme Court explicates the importance of the high/low value expression distinction and the core/penumbra distinction in a section 1 analysis:

> (ii) Overbreadth
> [107] Section 14(1)(b) is alleged to be overreaching, so that it captures more expression than is necessary to satisfy the legislative objectives, and thereby fails to minimally impair the right to freedom of expression. It is also criticized for having a chilling effect on expression (including religious expression), public debate and media coverage on issues about moral conduct and social policy.
> 1. Wording of Section 14 of the Code
> [108] Having concluded that the words "ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of" in s. 14(1)(b) are not rationally connected to the objective of prohibiting speech which can lead to discrimination, I also find them constitutionally invalid because they do not minimally impair freedom of expression.
> [109] Restricting expression because it may offend or hurt feelings does not give sufficient weight to the role expression plays in individual self-fulfillment, the search for truth, and unfettered political discourse. Prohibiting any representation which "ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of" protected groups could capture a great deal of expression which, while offensive to most people, falls short of exposing its target group to the extreme detestation and vilification which risks provoking discriminatory activities against that group. Rather than being tailored to meet the particular requirements, such a broad prohibition would impair freedom of expression in a significant way.

[110] The Saskatchewan legislature recognized the importance of freedom of expression through its enactment of s. 14(2) of the Code. To repeat, that provision confirms that "[n]othing in subsection (1) restricts the right to freedom of expression under the law upon any subject." The objective behind s. 14(1)(b) is not to censor ideas or to legislate morality. The legislative objective of the entire provision is to address harm from hate speech while limiting freedom of expression as little as possible.

[111] In my view, once the additional words are severed from s. 14(1)(b), the remaining prohibition is not overbroad. A limitation predicated on expression which exposes groups to hatred tries to distinguish between healthy and heated debate on controversial topics of political and social reform, and impassioned rhetoric which seeks to incite hatred as a means to effect reform. The boundary will not capture all harmful expression, but it is intended to capture expression which, by inspiring hatred, has the potential to cause the type of harm that the legislation is trying to prevent. In that way, the limitation is not overbroad, but rather tailored to impair freedom of expression as little as possible.

2. Nature of the Expression

[112] Violent expression and expression that threatens violence does not fall within the protected sphere of s. 2(b) of the Charter: R. v. Khawaja, 2012 SCC 69, [2012] 3 SCR 555, at para. 70. However, apart from that, not all expression will be treated equally in determining an appropriate balancing of competing values under a s. 1 analysis. That is because different types of expression will be relatively closer to or further from the core values behind the freedom, depending on the nature of the expression. This will, in turn, affect its value relative to other Charter rights, the exercise or protection of which may infringe freedom of expression.

[113] Dickson C.J. emphasized the special nature of hate propaganda at p. 766 of Keegstra, and again in Taylor, at p. 922:

> . . . I am of the opinion that hate propaganda contributes little to the aspirations of Canadians or Canada in either the quest for truth, the promotion of individual self-development or the protection and fostering of a vibrant democracy where the participation of all individuals is accepted and encouraged. While I cannot conclude that hate propaganda deserves only marginal protection under the s. 1 analysis, I can take cognizance of the fact that limitations upon hate propaganda are directed at a special category of expression which strays some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b), and hence conclude that "restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b)" ([Rocket v. Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, 1990 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 232], at p. 247).

[114] Hate speech is at some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b) because it does little to promote, and can in fact impede, the values underlying freedom of expression. As noted by Dickson C.J. in Keegstra, expression can be used to the detriment of the search for truth (p. 763). As earlier discussed, hate speech can also distort or limit the robust and free exchange of ideas by its tendency to silence the voice of its target group. It can achieve the self-fulfillment of the publisher, but often at the expense of that of the victim. These are important considerations in balancing hate speech with competing Charter rights and in assessing the constitutionality of the prohibition in s. 14(1)(b) of the Code.

3. Political Discourse

[115] While hate speech constitutes a type of expression that lies at the periphery of the values underlying freedom of expression, political expression lies close to the core of the guarantee: see Sharpe, at para. 23, per McLachlin C.J. Mr. Whatcott submits that the expression in his flyers relates to the discovery of truth and sexual politics, and is therefore at the core of protected expression. He submits that Flyers D and E are his commentary on a social policy debate about whether homosexuality should be discussed as part of the public school curriculum or at university conferences. The question here is how the prohibition in s. 14(1)(b) of the Code interplays with legitimate expression on matters of public policy or morality. If the restriction is overbroad, it will not minimally impair expression.

[116] The purpose of hate speech legislation is to restrict the use of representations likely to expose protected groups to hatred and its harmful effects. The expression captured under hate speech laws is of an extreme nature. Framing that speech as arising in a "moral" context or "within a public policy debate" does not cleanse it of its harmful effect. Indeed, if one understands an effect of hate speech as curtailing the ability of the affected group to participate in the debate, relaxing the standard in the context of political debate is arguably more rather than less damaging to freedom of expression. As argued by some interveners, history demonstrates that some of the most damaging hate rhetoric can be characterized as "moral", "political" or "public policy" discourse.

[120] In my view, s. 14 of the Code provides an appropriate means by which to protect almost the entirety of political discourse as a vital part of freedom of expression. It extricates only an extreme and marginal type of expression which contributes little to the values underlying freedom of expression and whose restriction is therefore easier to justify: see Keegstra, at p. 761; Rocket v. Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario, 1990 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 232, at p. 247. This suggests that, at least in this respect, the provision is not overbroad in its application.

(iii) Intent, Proof, and Defences

[125] Critics of s. 14(1)(b) of the Code claim that it is also overbroad because (i) it does not require intent by the publisher; (ii) it does not require proof of harm; and (iii) it does not provide for any defences.

1. Intent

[126] In Taylor, Dickson C.J. justified the lack of a legislative requirement to prove intent by emphasizing that systemic discrimination is more widespread than intentional discrimination and that the focus of the legislation should be on effects and not intent (pp. 931-32):

> The preoccupation with effects, and not with intent, is readily explicable when one considers that systemic discrimination is much more widespread in our society than is intentional discrimination. To import a subjective intent requirement into human rights provisions, rather than allowing tribunals to focus solely upon effects, would thus defeat one of the primary goals of anti-discrimination statutes. At the same time, however, it cannot be denied that to ignore intent in determining whether a discriminatory practice has taken place according to s. 13(1) > increases the degree of restriction upon the constitutionally protected freedom of expression. This result flows from the realization that an individual open to condemnation and censure because his or her words may have an unintended effect will be more likely to exercise caution via self-censorship. [Emphasis in original.]

[127] The preventive measures found in human rights legislation reasonably centre on effects, rather than intent. I see no reason to depart from this approach.

2. Proof of Harm

[128] I have already addressed the notion of harm in the context of whether the objective of s. 14(1)(b) is pressing and substantial.

[129] In answer to the specific criticism that a prohibition against hate speech lacked a requirement to prove actual harm, Dickson C.J. argued in Keegstra (at p. 776) that both the difficulty of establishing a causal link between an expressive statement and the resulting hatred, and the seriousness of the harm to which vulnerable groups are exposed by hate speech, justifies the imposition of preventive measures that do not require proof of actual harm.

[130] Critics argue that the deference to the legislature shown by this Court in Keegstra, Taylor, Butler and Sharpe is an abdication of its duty to require that limitations on Charter rights be "demonstrably justified" under the s. 1 analysis: Sumner, at pp. 83 and 202-3. The Court's "deferential approach under section 1 to state restrictions on expression", has been said to erode the constitutional protection for freedom of expression: Moon (2000), at p. 37. The basic nature of the criticism is that it is an unacceptable impairment of freedom of expression to allow its restriction to be justified by the mere likelihood or risk of harm, rather than a clear causal link between hate speech and harmful or discriminatory acts against the vulnerable group.

[131] Such an approach, however, ignores the particularly insidious nature of hate speech. The end goal of hate speech is to shift the environment from one where harm against vulnerable groups is not tolerated to one where hate speech has created a place where this is either accepted or a blind eye is turned.

[132] This Court has addressed such criticism in a number of situations involving the applicability of s. 1 and has adopted a "reasonable apprehension of harm" approach. This approach recognizes that a precise causal link for certain societal harms ought not to be required. A court is entitled to use common sense and experience in recognizing that certain activities, hate speech among them, inflict societal harms.

[133] In Thomson Newspapers Co., this Court recognized that a reasonable apprehension of harm test should be applied in cases where "it has been suggested, though not proven, that the very nature of the expression in question undermines the position of groups or individuals as equal participants in society" (para. 115). Such an approach is warranted "when it is difficult or impossible to establish scientifically the type of harm in question" (para. 115). As the Court reasoned, at para. 116:

> While courts should not use common sense as a cover for unfounded or controversial assumptions, it may be appropriately employed in judicial reasoning where the possibility of harm is within the everyday knowledge and experience of Canadians, or where factual determination and value judgments overlap. Canadians presume that expressions which degrade individuals based on their gender, ethnicity, or other personal factors may lead to harm being visited upon them because this is within most people's everyday experience. . .. Common sense reflects common understandings. In these cases dealing with pornography and hate speech, common understandings were accepted by the Court because they are widely accepted by Canadians as facts, and because they are integrally related to our values, which are the bedrock of any s. 1 justification. As a result, the Court did not demand a scientific demonstration or the submission of definitive social science evidence to establish that the line drawn by Parliament was perfectly drawn.

[134] In Irwin Toy, this Court noted that the government was "afforded a margin of appreciation to form legitimate objectives based on somewhat inconclusive social science evidence" (p. 990) …Again in Sharpe, McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, applied the reasonable apprehension of harm test and stated, at para. 89:

> The lack of unanimity in scientific opinion is not fatal. Complex human behaviour may not lend itself to precise scientific demonstration, and the courts cannot hold Parliament to a higher standard of proof than the subject matter admits of.

[135] As was clear from Taylor, and reaffirmed through the evidence submitted by interveners in this appeal, the discriminatory effects of hate speech are part of the everyday knowledge and experience of Canadians. I am of the opinion that the Saskatchewan legislature is entitled to a reasonable apprehension of societal harm as a result of hate speech.

3. Lack of Defences

[136] In the context of civil liability for contravening a limitation on a certain type of expression such as defamation, the types of defences that are generally raised relate to the truth of the factual statements made. The legislature of Saskatchewan has not provided a defence of truth or any other defence as a basis upon which to avoid being found in contravention of s. 14(1)(b) of the Code (other than that private communications are not included in the prohibition).

[137] The majority in Taylor held that the lack of defences was not fatal to finding s. 13(1) of the CHRA constitutional. Dickson C.J. was of the view that the Charter did not mandate an exception for truthful statements in the context of human rights legislation (p. 935).

[139] Critics find the absence of a defence of truth of particular concern, given that seeking truth is one of the strongest justifications for freedom of expression. They argue that the right to speak the truth should not be lightly restricted, and that any restriction should be seen as a serious infringement.

[140] I agree with the argument that the quest for truth is an essential component of the "marketplace of ideas" which is, itself, central to a strong democracy. The search for truth is also an important part of self-fulfillment. However, I do not think it is inconsistent with these views to find that not all truthful statements must be free from restriction. Truthful statements can be interlaced with harmful ones or otherwise presented in a manner that would meet the definition of hate speech.

[141] As Dickson C.J. stated in Keegstra, at p. 763, there is "very little chance that statements intended to promote hatred against an identifiable group are true, or that their vision of society will lead to a better world". To the extent that truthful statements are used in a manner or context that exposes a vulnerable group to hatred, their use risks the same potential harmful effects on the vulnerable groups that false statements can provoke. The vulnerable group is no less worthy of protection because the publisher has succeeded in turning true statements into a hateful message. In not providing for a defence of truth, the legislature has said that even truthful statements may be expressed in language or context that exposes a vulnerable group to hatred.

(iv) Conclusion on Minimal Impairment

[145] The prohibition against hate speech involves balancing between freedom of expression and equality rights. People are free to debate or speak out against the rights or characteristics of vulnerable groups, but not in a manner which is objectively seen to expose them to hatred and its harmful effects. The only expression that should be suppressed by the prohibition is that which Dickson C.J. recognized in Keegstra as straying "some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b) [of the Charter]" (p. 766).

[146] In my view, s. 14(1)(b) of the Code meets the minimal impairment requirement. The prohibition, interpreted and applied in the manner set out in these reasons, is one of the reasonable alternatives that could have been selected by the legislature. It impairs freedom of expression "no more than reasonably necessary, having regard to the practical difficulties and conflicting tensions that must be taken into account": Sharpe, at para. 96, per McLachlin C.J. (emphasis in original).

5.4 Safety Valves

Blanket prohibitions have difficulty meeting the minimal impairment stage of the s. 1 analysis. On the question of deference to the judgment of the legislature, the Supreme Court has suggested that where the legislation provides "safety valves", that is legislative provisions that provide exceptions from blanket prohibitions, then more deference is warranted, and specifically with respect to the s. 1 analysis on minimal impairment.

See Canadian Council for Refugees v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2023 SCC 17, a case that considered the constitutionality of the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act (IRPA) and its regulations, which give effect to the Safe Third Country Agreement, a bilateral treaty signed by Canada and the United States that pursues shared responsibility of refugee status claims. In the case, the Supreme Court considered the relevance of 'safety valves' drafted into legislation on a section 1 analysis.

D. Section 1

[165] Given that the legislative scheme does not violate s. 7, it is not necessary to undertake a s. 1 analysis. However, for the sake of completeness, I provide some brief comments on s. 1 justification for circumstances in which it would be required. In doing so, I highlight the distinct relevance of safety valves in a s. 1 analysis where the burden of justification is on the state.

[166] The appellants argue that while legislative safety valves did not ensure that the legislation accords with the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, such avenues for discretionary relief may remain relevant in addressing s. 1. However, they submit that the respondents did not file any evidence in support of a s. 1 justification, and they rely on the Federal Court judge's statement that safeguards are "illusory".

[167] The respondents argue that had a s. 7 breach been made out, it would be justified under s. 1, in part because of related provisions in the legislative scheme. They say that the whole of the law serves to advance the pressing and substantial objective of sharing responsibility for refugee status determinations with the United States. Further, they submit that the scheme is minimally impairing of claimants' s. 7 rights and point to the continuous monitoring of the regime under s. 102(3) of the IRPA and to the IRPA's safety valves.

[168] Both parties rightly acknowledge that safety valves are relevant at the s. 1 stage, as this Court accepted in Carter (paras. 114-21). However, the role these mechanisms play at the s. 1 stage differs from their role at the s. 7 stage as does, of course, the burden that the state bears. This is because s. 7 and s. 1 "ask different questions" insofar as "justification on the basis of an overarching public goal is at the heart of s. 1, but it plays no part in the s. 7 analysis, which is concerned with the narrower question of whether the impugned law infringes individual rights" (Bedford, at para. 125). Given this distinction, "a different set of considerations comes into play under section 1: not just the effect of the law on (at least) one person's section 7 interests, but the effect of the section 7 violation in achieving the law's policy objectives" (H. Stewart, "Bedford and the Structure of Section 7" (2015), 60 *McGill L.J.*575, at p. 589). When safety valves are at issue, the considerations in play under s. 7 and s. 1 remain distinct.

[169] While discretionary exemption mechanisms are relevant to determining whether impugned legislation breaches individual rights protected by s. 7, they may not be adequate to ensure that no deprivations contrary to the principles of fundamental justice occur. In other words, they may not succeed in curing all deprivations of individuals' s. 7 interests. For instance, the scope of a safety valve may simply not be wide enough to exempt all individuals inappropriately caught by the general rule.

[170] As is the case throughout the s. 7 analysis, claimants bear the burden to show that legislative safety valves do not remedy individual deprivations. To do so, they may, for example, advance arguments and lead evidence demonstrating that a legislative regime itself causes a statute's curative mechanisms to be practically unavailable. However, at the s. 1 stage, the government bears the burden to show that the safety valves — as a whole — are sufficient to justify any established s. 7 breaches under the test from R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103. This Court has left open the "possibility that the government could establish that a s. 7 violation is justified" (Bedford, at para. 129).

[171] At the s. 1 stage, the government may argue — as Canada did here — that a scheme's safety valves, if they proved to be imperfect under s. 7, nonetheless render the legislation minimally impairing. Further, the government might seek to rely on safety valves in the final balancing stage of Oakes. Nonetheless, given that a s. 7 violation was not established in this case, it is unnecessary to comment on what the outcome of any part of the s. 1 analysis might have been here.

6 Discussion questions

1. One consequence of the two stages of Charter analysis is that rights and freedoms are generally opposed to each other and to other interests. This opposition is sometimes framed as one between the individual and a free and democratic society. Can you imagine a different way of conceiving of rights and their limits?

   See Grégoire Webber, "What Oakes could have said (or how else to read a limitations clause" (2023) 112 Supreme Court Law Review (2d) 61 and, more generally, Grégoire Webber, The Negotiable Constitution: On the Limitation of Rights (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2009), ch. 4.

2. Although the wording of the limitation clause in section 1 of the Charter extends to all rights and freedoms, it plays a greater role in relation to some rights (e.g. s. 2(b)) and a lesser role in relation to some other rights (e.g. s. 8).

Could this suggest that, contrary to the assumption in R v Oakes and since that there should be but one test for all limitations, there should be different tests for different rights? See Richard Moon, "Justified Limits on Free Expression: The Collapse of the General Approach to Limits on Charter Rights" (2002) 30 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 337.

3. On this same theme, consider the relationship between the section 1 analysis and the section 7 analysis. Do some of the principles of fundamental justice resemble the stages under the Oakes test? Which principle of fundamental justice does not align with a branch of the Oakes test?
4. How might legislation be drafted to better succeed under the minimal impairment stage of the Oakes analysis. Relatedly, why might the overall balancing stage of the Oakes analysis take on greater significance over time?
5. What considerations have the Supreme Court found to be relevant to questions of judicial deference to legislative judgement under the Oakes analysis?

Chapter 17: Section 33: The Notwithstanding Clause

By Dwight Newman and Geoffrey Sigalet

1 Introduction

The "notwithstanding clause", or section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is one of the more interesting and controversial parts of the Charter. It has drawn intense political and scholarly debate, and the attention of many comparative constitutionalists and political scientists, and this attention has increased in recent years.

Although the 1982 patriation of the Constitution entrenched the Charter as part of Canada's supreme law, section 33 of the Charter was meant to ensure that legislatures could contest judicial interpretations of the newly entrenched rights. The full text of section 33 reads as follows:

(1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.	(1) Le Parlement ou la législature d'une province peut adopter une loi où il est expressément déclaré que celle-ci ou une de ses dispositions a effet indépendamment d'une disposition donnée de l'article 2 ou des articles 7 à 15 de la présente charte.
(2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.	(2) La loi ou la disposition qui fait l'objet d'une déclaration conforme au présent article et en vigueur a l'effet qu'elle aurait sauf la disposition en cause de la charte.
(3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into	(3) La déclaration visée au paragraphe (1) cesse d'avoir effet à la date qui y est précisée ou, au plus force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.	tard, cinq ans après son entrée en vigueur.

(4) Parliament or the legislature of a province may re-enact a declaration made under subsection (1).	(4) Le Parlement ou une législature peut adopter de nouveau une déclaration visée au paragraphe (1).
(5) Subsection (3) applies in respect of a re-enactment made under subsection (4).	(5) Le paragraphe (3) s'applique à toute déclaration adoptée sous le régime du paragraphe (4).

The notwithstanding clause allows the provincial or federal legislatures to enact laws "notwithstanding" certain provisions of the Charter for up to 5 years (probably not coincidentally, the maximum period of an elected parliament or legislature), with unlimited renewals. The clause has sometimes been called an "override" clause, and some have more recently taken to calling it "the parliamentary sovereignty clause". To avoid the connotations of either, we are calling it simply the notwithstanding clause or section 33.

Section 33 does not apply to democratic rights (sections 3 through 5, which are the main check on it), or mobility rights (section 6, which are the means by which an individual could choose to become part of a different political community). They also do not apply to minority language rights (sections 16 through 23), which were considered a non-negotiable part of the nation-building project embedded in the Constitution Act, 1982.

Perhaps the most striking, and telling, fact about the notwithstanding clause is that it has never been used by the federal (central) Parliament, but it has been used by provincial legislatures (of different partisan stripes) at least 23 times (with 49 renewals).

There have been different periods when the provinces have used the notwithstanding clause. The initial period began immediately after the Charter's enactment in 1982: Quebec's separatist Parti Quebecois government did not consent to (and continued to litigate the validity of) the newly patriated constitution, including the Charter, and so to protest and protect against the ability of federal judges to strike down Quebec laws using the Charter the National Assembly re-enacted all of Quebec's laws to include invocations of section 33 (invoking the clause in relation to all the sections of the Charter it can apply to). This first "omnibus" use of the Charter later became the subject of the key case for interpreting the notwithstanding clause, Ford v Quebec, which we will discuss in Part 3 below. Between 1982 and 1988, Quebec used the clause a number of times after its omnibus invocation, including the Liberal government of Premier Robert Bourassa's invocation of section 33 in response to Ford. Uses of the clause outside of Quebec were rarer during this time, with one invocation by the Yukon and one by Saskatchewan.

Between 1988 and 2017 the notwithstanding clause was included in four new statutes in Quebec (alongside renewals) and only once by Alberta in the 2000 Marriage Amendment Law. Although the clause was not actively used much outside of Quebec during this period, it continued to be discussed in Charter jurisprudence.

In 2018 Saskatchewan invoked the clause in response to a trial court decision Good Spirit School Division No.204 v. Christ the Teacher Roman Catholic Separate School Division and inaugurated a new phase where provinces, including Quebec and Ontario, appear more willing to use the clause to curtail perceived judicial activism. The clause has been enacted in six new laws since 2018, and we discuss the jurisprudence of this new phase of invocations in Part 4 below.

This chapter concludes in Part 5 with a discussion of Quebec's Bill 21 secularism law, which invoked the notwithstanding clause and has been challenged in the case of English Montreal School Board et al. v Attorney General of Quebec [previously Hak et al. v Attorney General of Quebec]. We use this case to discuss the future of the notwithstanding clause and some of the novel theories that have been developed by those resistant to the ability it gives provinces to resist judicial power.

1.1 Notes and Questions

1. In this chapter, you will read more about some of the specific provincial uses. At a general level, why do you think that provinces have used the notwithstanding clause more than the federal government has? (For further reading on this question, see Geoffrey Sigalet & Dave Snow, "Notwithstanding Centralism: The Resurgence of the Notwithstanding Clause and the Conservative Provincial Rights Movement" (2025) Canadian Journal of Political Science (forthcoming).)
2. Comparative constitutionalists have been interested in, and relatively favourable toward, Canada's notwithstanding clause as a distinctive way of striking a balance between American-style judicial rights review and parliamentary traditions seeing legislative specification of rights. As you read the chapter, consider what you think other countries can learn from Canada.
3. The notwithstanding clause has drawn enormous attention in recent years. For an important recent collection surveying a variety of dimensions and perspectives, see Peter L Biro, ed, The Notwithstanding Clause and the Canadian Charter: Rights, Reforms, and Controversies (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2024).

2 The Historical Purpose of Section 33

The basic purpose of the notwithstanding clause was to allow legislatures to contest judicial interpretations of the rights entrenched in the Charter, and to legislatively protect rights not entrenched in the constitution. As the section's drafting history reveals, this purpose was also supported by the principle of federalism. Alberta's Premier Peter Lougheed and Saskatchewan's Alan Blakeney, who had insisted on the notwithstanding clause as a condition of agreeing to the Charter, were concerned that federal control over appellate judicial appointments would turn the Charter into a centralizing threat to provincial jurisdiction.

Section 33 of the Charter did not appear out of thin air. It had antecedents in section 2 of the 1960 Canadian Bill of Rights and in similar provisions in several provincial bills of rights, with Alberta's being one example:

> 2 Every law of Canada shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Parliament of Canada that it shall operate notwithstanding the Canadian Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared, and in particular, no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to […]
> Alberta Bill of Rights, SA 1972, c 1

> 2. Every law of Alberta shall, unless it is expressly declared by an Act of the Legislature that it operates notwithstanding The Alberta Bill of Rights, be so construed and applied as not to abrogate, abridge or infringe or to authorize the abrogation, abridgment or infringement of any of the rights or freedoms herein recognized and declared.

During the negotiations that led to the patriation of the Canadian Constitution in 1982, the majority of the provinces opposed the Charter and would have preferred to patriate a constitution with an amendment formula but no constitutional bill of rights (Ontario and New Brunswick did not object to Trudeau's proposed Charter). The entrenchment of a Charter was a key priority for then Liberal Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, and his strong preference was for a Charter without a limitations clause (what would become section 1) or a notwithstanding clause. The version of the Charter that was initially sent to the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and Senate included a limitations clause that provided for reasonable limits on rights in a "society with a parliamentary system of government." The words "parliamentary system of government" were meant to reassure the provinces that their legislatures would be able to set limits on entrenched rights. Pressure from different interest groups resulted in then Minister of Justice Jean Chretien removing the phrase "parliamentary systems of government" from what would become section 1.

Following this change in the language of section 1, several provinces were concerned that the limitations provision would not adequately recognize the role of provincial government in determining the reasonable balance between competing rights or interests. As a consequence, provincial resistance to the Charter grew. In April 1981 some provinces proposed a patriation plan with an amending formula but no Charter.

The idea of a notwithstanding clause had been discussed in the earlier 1979 round of constitutional negotiations. However, after the Patriation Reference, several provinces conditioned their agreement to the entrenchment of a Charter on the inclusion of such a clause. Amongst the provinces taking that view, Alberta's Premier Peter Lougheed and Saskatchewan's Alan Blakeney were key figures in advancing this approach; pushing for the notwithstanding clause but also convincing other Charter skeptical premiers, such as Manitoba's Sterling Lyon, to agree to a Charter with such a clause. In the final negotiations Trudeau insisted on the five-year expiration that became section 33(3).

2.1 Note

Lougheed and Blakeney would both later elaborate on their philosophical and practical reasons for insisting on a notwithstanding clause. Their reasons overlap but differ in emphasis. Lougheed focused more on the possibility of courts misinterpreting rights and engaging in judicial activism. He understood the notwithstanding clause as a tool for overriding such activist decisions and curbing courts in a more constitutionally democratic fashion than by threatening "court packing" or other direct institutional threats to judicial independence. Blakeney agreed with Lougheed on that purpose but also added a social democratic concern with the likelihood that courts would ignore non-entrenched positive rights, such as the right to housing, in favour of entrenched negative rights in ways that may need to be democratically contested by legislatures. See: Hon. Peter Lougheed, "Why a Notwithstanding Clause?", Centre for Constitutional Studies Points of View, No. 6 (Edmonton: Centre for Constitutional Studies, 1998), publishing the Marv Leitch Q.C. Lecture, delivered at the University of Calgary, 20 November 1991; Hon. Allan E. Blakeney, "The Notwithstanding Clause, the Charter, and Canada's Patriated Constitution: What I Thought We Were Doing" (2010) 19 Const. Forum 1.

Blakeney and Lougheed's support for the notwithstanding clause also rested on a concern about the federal power to appoint superior court judges and the possibility that the Charter would become an instrument of centralization. By contrast, Jean Chretien, who was federal Minister of Justice during the negotiations repeatedly emphasized that he saw the purpose of the clause as a "safety valve" for dealing with emergency situations that call for exceptional uses of legislative power. The precise expectations around the use of the clause may have differed between its proponents and those who more grudgingly agreed to its inclusion, setting the stage for some of the later controversies.

3 Early Uses of the Notwithstanding Clause and the Ford case

Saskatchewan and Yukon both made use of section 33 in the early days of the Charter. In both cases the section was used prior to any judicial review of the law, shielding the law from court decisions that were potentially quite unpredictable in those early days of the Charter. However, it was Quebec's omnibus use of the notwithstanding clause that led to a major Supreme Court of Canada decision on section 33, Ford v Quebec (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712, 54 DLR (4th) 577.

The province's blanket use of s. 33 was a response to the November 1981 exclusion of Quebec's premier from the final agreement that led to the patriation of the Constitution and the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982, including the Charter of Rights. That event, which is referred to by some in Quebec as 'the Night of the Long Knives', has cast a long shadow over Canadian constitutionalism, and, as discussed elsewhere in these materials, has played a significant role in subsequent attempts to amend the constitution.

While Quebec sought to use section 33 to shield all of its legislation from review under the Canadian Charter, it insisted that the affected rights would instead be protected under the province's Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which, although different from the Canadian Charter, gave protection to the rights covered by s.33.

In late June, 1982, the province repealed and re-enacted all of its pre-Charter laws, inserting into each a standard clause that declared that the law would apply notwithstanding sections 2 and 7-15 of the Charter. The province also included this clause in all new legislation. This practice continued until a change of government in 1985. The clause purported to apply not just prospectively, from the time of its inclusion in the various provincial laws, but also retrospectively, so that it would insulate from judicial review any breaches of the Charter that occurred after the introduction of the Charter in April 1982.

> [This case arose in the context of a challenge to sections of the Quebec Charter of the French Language, RSQ, c C-11 that mandated the use of only French signage on commercial establishments and prohibited the use of other languages. Many issues were discussed in the case, but the extract here focuses on the issue of whether Quebec's blanket use of section 33 was legal.]
> THE COURT (Dickson C.J. and Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Lamer, Wilson and Le Dain JJ., but with Estey and Le Dain JJ. taking no part in the judgment)
> It was contended that the words "a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter" in s. 33(1) and the words "but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration" in s. 33(2) indicate that in order to be valid, a declaration pursuant to s. 33 must specify the particular provision within a section of the Charter which Parliament or the legislature of a province intends to override. That is, the specific guaranteed right or freedom to be overridden must be referred to in the words of the Charter and not merely by the number of the section or paragraph in which it appears. The rationale underlying this contention is that the nature of the guaranteed right or freedom must be sufficiently drawn to the attention of the members of the legislature and of the public so that the relative seriousness of what is proposed may be perceived and reacted to through the democratic process. As the Attorney General for Ontario, who argued against the constitutionality of the standard override provision, put it, there must be a "political cost" for overriding a guaranteed right or freedom. […]

> In the course of argument different views were expressed as to the constitutional perspective from which the meaning and application of s. 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should be approached: the one suggesting that it reflects the continuing importance of legislative supremacy, the other suggesting the seriousness of a legislative decision to override guaranteed rights and freedoms and the importance that such a decision be taken only as a result of a fully informed democratic process. These two perspectives are not, however, particularly relevant or helpful in construing the requirements of s. 33. Section 33 lays down requirements of form only, and there is no warrant for importing into it grounds for substantive review of the legislative policy in exercising the override authority in a particular case. The requirement of an apparent link or relationship between the overriding Act and the guaranteed rights or freedoms to be overridden seems to be a substantive ground of review. It appears to require that the legislature identify the provisions of the Act in question which might otherwise infringe specified guaranteed rights or freedoms. That would seem to require a prima facie justification of the decision to exercise the override authority rather than merely a certain formal expression of it. There is, however, no warrant in the terms of s. 33 for such a requirement. A legislature may not be in a position to judge with any degree of certainty what provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms might be successfully invoked against various aspects of the Act in question. For this reason it must be permitted in a particular case to override more than one provision of the Charter and indeed all of the provisions which it is permitted to override by the terms of s. 33. The standard override provision in issue in this appeal is, therefore, a valid exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33 in so far as it purports to override all of the provisions in s. 2 and ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter. The essential requirement of form laid down by s. 33 is that the override declaration must be an express declaration that an Act or a provision of an Act shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in s. 2 or ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter. With great respect for the contrary view, this Court is of the opinion that a s. 33 declaration is sufficiently express if it refers to the number of the section, subsection or paragraph of the Charter which contains the provision or provisions to be overridden. Of course, if it is intended to override only a part of the provision or provisions contained in a section, subsection or paragraph then there would have to be a sufficient reference in words to the part to be overridden. In so far as requirements of the democratic process are relevant, this is the form of reference used in legislative drafting with respect to legislative provisions to be amended or repealed. There is no reason why more should be required under s. 33. A reference to the number of the section, subsection or paragraph containing the provisions or provisions to be overridden is a sufficient indication to those concerned of the relative seriousness of what is proposed. It cannot have been intended by the word "expressly" that a legislature should be required to encumber a s. 33 declaration by stating the provision or provisions to be overridden in the words of the Charter, which, in the case of the standard override provision in issue in the appeal, would be a very long recital indeed. […]
> Given the conclusion that the enactment of the standard override provision in the form indicated above is a valid exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, this Court is of the opinion that the validity of its enactment is not affected by the fact that it was introduced into all Quebec statutes enacted prior to a certain date by a single enactment. That was an effective exercise of legislative authority that did not prevent the override declaration so enacted in each statute from being an express declaration within the meaning of s. 33 of the Canadian Charter. Counsel referred to this form of enactment as reflecting an impermissibly "routine" exercise of the override authority or even a "perversion" of it. It was even suggested that it amounted to an attempted amendment of the Charter. These are once again essentially submissions concerning permissible legislative policy in the exercise of the override authority rather than what constitutes a sufficiently express declaration of override. As has been stated, there is no warrant in s. 33 for such considerations as a basis of judicial review of a particular exercise of the authority conferred by s. 33. The Court is of a different view, however, concerning the retrospective effect given to the standard override provision […]
> In this case, s. 33(1) admits of two interpretations; one that allows Parliament or a legislature to enact retroactive override provisions, the other that permits prospective derogation only. We conclude that the latter and narrower interpretation is the proper one, and that s. 7 cannot give retrospective effect to the override provision. […]

3.2 Notes and Questions

1. The Court in Ford assumed that a government could invoke the notwithstanding clause in advance of a judicial decision about the constitutionality of a law. This was implicit in the Court's decision to uphold the omnibus use of s. 33 and its observation that "[a] legislature may not be in a position to judge with any degree of certainty what provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms might be successfully invoked against various aspects of the Act in question." Some commentators have recently argued against "preemptive use" of the clause. What do you think lies behind these arguments? (We will return to this topic later in the chapter.)
2. Debate over Quebec's sign law continued for several years after the Ford decision. In December 1988, the Liberal government of Robert Bourassa (which had been elected in 1985 just before the Ford case) enacted a law that reinforced the requirement of French on commercial signage, and included in the law an invocation of s. 33. The law was opposed by many Quebec anglophones and "allophones", and in May 1993 there was a decision from the United Nations Human Rights Committee that the sign law was inconsistent with the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. The Bourrassa government decided not to renew its use of section 33 and instead amended the sign law so that it required only French-language predominance but did not preclude the use of other languages.
3. When s. 33 was added to the Charter it was assumed by some political actors and scholars that it would rarely be invoked and that any use of the section would be carefully scrutinized by voters and might carry a significant political cost. Until recently that was generally true. Some scholars from outside Canada saw the value of s.33 and wondered about its limited use by governments. (see for example Stephen Gardbaum, The New Commonwealth Model of Constitutionalism: Theory and Practice (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2013, and Aileen Kavanagh, The Collaborative Constitution (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2024 (which includes a chapter entitled the "Underuse of the Override"). Some scholars in the mid-2010s even began writing of the potential "desuetude" of the notwithstanding clause. But that was soon to change.

4 Emerging Uses of The Notwithstanding Clause: From Good Spirit Lake (2017) To City of Toronto (2021)

On April 20, 2017, a Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench trial judge rendered a decision on religious freedom and school funding, ruling that it was illegal for the province to provide funding in support of non-Catholics attending Catholic denominational schools. Government lawyers also worried that the decision had implications for the partial government funding for students attending other faith-based schools. On May 1, 2017, Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall announced that the government would use the notwithstanding clause to ensure the stability of the system, even though the judgment could be and was appealed to the Court of Appeal: "[w]e wanted to announce this now to provide clarity and provide parents with the assurance that they will be able to continue to choose the kind of school they want their children to attend."

Introducing the bill that would ultimately become the School Choice Protection Act, SS 2018, c 39, Saskatchewan's Minister of Education explained the use of section 33 as follows:

> Invoking the notwithstanding clause will ensure the government can continue to fund public and separate school divisions based on the current funding model which takes into account how many students are in the division but does not discriminate based on religious affiliation. School divisions will continue to be responsible for determining their own attendance and admittance policies.
> Both the Government of Saskatchewan and Christ the Teacher Roman Catholic Separate School Division have filed appeals on this ruling. It is anticipated the appeal could take between 6 to 18 months. Any decision would likely be delivered well after the June 30, 2018 date that the court decision is set to come into force. Having to wait for a decision on the appeal could leave parents and students with a great deal of uncertainty about the future, not knowing if they would continue to be funded to attend a separate school.
> It is important to invoke the notwithstanding clause now in order to provide certainty to parents and to students so that they can be assured that they will continue to be funded to attend their school without having to wait for the outcome of an appeal. Introducing the bill now will allow for Royal Assent in the spring, prior to the June 30, 2018 coming into force date of the court decision. […] (Saskatchewan Hansard, November 15, 2017, 2927-2928).

The legislation was passed unanimously. But the Act was never proclaimed, because the trial decision was overturned on appeal by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, with leave to appeal denied by the Supreme Court of Canada.

After 2018, several Canadian provinces made use of the notwithstanding clause: New Brunswick considered invoking s.33 but in the end did not: Quebec invoked the provision on several occasions, including to insulate from challenge its ban on civil servants wearing religious symbols; and Ontario invoked the provision for the first time in its history, and then on two other occasions.

In 2018, Ontario used the clause after a trial decision that would have prevented the province from redefining the size and shape of municipal constituencies in the City of Toronto during the municipal election campaign. The trial decision was ultimately overturned by the Ontario Court of Appeal, and the Supreme Court of Canada agreed with Ontario in 2021. The Supreme Court of Canada, in the course of its discussion of unwritten constitutional principles, commented on the notwithstanding clause, highlighting its role in enabling parliaments and legislatures to engage in the interpretation of rights. Two paragraphs from that majority decision are, for now, the Supreme Court of Canada's most recent comment on section 33.

4.1 Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34, [2021] 2 SCR 845

Joint Reasons for Judgment of Wagner CJ and Brown J (Moldaver, Côté and Rowe JJ concurring)

> [60] We add this. Were a court to rely on unwritten constitutional principles, in whole or in part, to invalidate legislation, the consequences of this judicial error would be of particular significance given two provisions of our Charter. First, s. 33 preserves a limited right of legislative override. Where, therefore, a court invalidates legislation using s. 2(b) of the Charter, the legislature may give continued effect to its understanding of what the Constitution requires by invoking s. 33 and by meeting its stated conditions (D. Newman, "Canada's Notwithstanding Clause, Dialogue, and Constitutional Identities", in G. Sigalet, G. Webber and R. Dixon, eds., Constitutional Dialogue: Rights, Democracy, Institutions (2019), 209, at p. 232). Were, however, a court to rely not on s. 2(b) but instead upon an unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation, this undeniable aspect of the constitutional bargain would effectively be undone, since s. 33 applies to permit legislation to operate "notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15" only. Secondly, s. 1 provides a basis for the state to justify limits on "the rights and freedoms set out" in the Charter. Unwritten constitutional principles, being unwritten, are not "set out" in the Charter. To find, therefore, that they can ground a constitutional violation would afford the state no corresponding justificatory mechanism.
> [61] Our colleague says that the application of s. 33 "is not directly before us" (para. 182). As the City has advanced its claim on the basis of s. 2(b), coupled with the unwritten principle of democracy, the prospect of circumventing s. 33's application to the invalidation of legislation under s. 2(b) by recourse to unwritten constitutional principles is indeed squarely before us.

4.2 Notes and Questions

1. What do the Saskatchewan 2018 use and Ontario 2018 use illustrate about the idea of waiting for a final judicial decision ahead of using section 33?
2. The Saskatchewan government's use in 2018 was a significant turning point, highlighting a number of factors in the evolving use of section 33 noted in Geoffrey Sigalet & Dave Snow, "Notwithstanding Centralism: The Resurgence of the Notwithstanding Clause and the Conservative Provincial Rights Movement" (2025) Canadian Journal of Political Science (forthcoming).While some legal academics criticized Saskatchewan's 2018 use of section 33, the use also drew support on its specific facts and coincided with developing constitutional theory in support of greater use of section 33. See e.g. Joanna Baron & Geoffrey Sigalet, "Saskatchewan's Brad Wall and the Rehabilitation of the Charter." Policy Options (May 19, 2017).; and the chapter by Dwight Newman cited in the City of Toronto excerpt above, which came originally from a 2016 conference presentation.
3. In 2022, Ontario passed the Keeping Students in Class Act, 2022, SO 2022, c 19, which used the notwithstanding clause to support legislation that terminated a strike. Massive protests led to a reversal of this decision and almost immediate repeal of the legislation. Does this case confirm the claim made at the time s. 33 was introduced that use of the section would be carefully scrutinized by voters?

5 Quebec's Bill 21 and the Future of the Notwithstanding Clause

In 2019 Quebec's National Assembly enacted An Act respecting the Laicity of the State (Loi sur la laïcité de l'État CQLR c L-0.3) often referred to as Bill 21. This law prohibited certain classes of Quebec's public servants, including members of the National Assembly itself, from wearing religious symbols or covering their faces while performing their public duties (the face covering provisions made exceptions for health, disabilities, or role-specific requirements). The law included a s. 33 declaration that its provisions would apply notwithstanding sections 2 and sections 7-15 of the Charter.

There was a likelihood, given the courts' previous religious freedom decisions, that this law would be found to breach the Charter in the absence of the s. 33 declaration. In response to this case, and the increased use of s.33, a number of legal academics have proposed different ways in which the scope or effect of s. 33 might be constrained. Many of those arguments depend on reading the Ford decision narrowly — see, for example, Grégoire Webber, "The Notwithstanding Clause and the Precedent in Ford: le dit et le non-dit" (2024) 32:3 Constitutional Forum 13.

In Hak et al. v Attorney General of Quebec, the plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of Bill 21, on several grounds including the following:

1. The law violates pre-Confederation statutes and unwritten constitutional principles, which include respect for minority rights and democratic governance.
2. The law violates the official language rights of English school boards in Quebec under section 23 of the Charter, which is not subject to section 33.
3. The law discriminates against women because it has the effect of excluding women who wear the hijab from many civil service jobs. While a declaration made under s. 33 can insulate a law from a challenge under s. 15 (the Charter's equality rights provision), s. 28 of the Charter (which is discussed in chapter 15) says that "Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons". The argument then is that s. 28 prohibits sex discrimination "notwithstanding" a s. 33 declaration. In various publications, Kerri Froc has argued that the history of its negotiation shows that s. 28 takes priority over everything in the Charter, including s. 1, and her writing is being invoked in support of this argument. For a different view, see e.g. Jesse Hartery, "Equality and the Notwithstanding Clause: Considering the Nature and Application of Section 28 of the Canadian Charter" (2023) 64 Les cahiers de droit 683.
4. The law violates the right of citizens under s. 3 of the Charter to seek election in either the federal parliament or the provincial legislature because it prohibits members of the Quebec legislature from wearing religious dress. Section 3 is not covered by s. 33.

The plaintiffs also argued that even if the s. 33 declaration was effective and precluded the courts from striking down Bill 21, the courts nevertheless retained the jurisdiction to consider whether the law breached the Charter (but for s.33), even though it could not provide any remedy if it determined that a breach had occurred. This argument is developed in a variety of articles, having first been put in a joint piece by Grégoire Webber, Eric Mendelsohn, and Robert Leckey: https://policyoptions.irpp.org/magazines/may-2019/faulty-wisdom-notwithstanding-clause/

But, for a contrary view, see also Geoffrey Sigalet "Legislated Rights as Trumps" Osgoode Hall Law Journal (2023) 61:1. Sigalet argues that section 33.2 ensures that laws properly invoking section 33 cannot be reviewed for compliance with the sections of the Charter because they "shall have such operation as [they] would but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration." Sigalet interprets this subjunctive clause to mean the laws operate as though the Charter provisions they select do not exist to be applied to the law by the courts. This legally allows the political process to make judgements about the consistency of laws invoking section 33 with enumerated rights.

In the Hak case (as it continues to be popularly referred to - after the name of an original plaintiff at trial), the Quebec Court of Appeal accepted the argument that Bill 21 violated the section 3 democratic right to qualify for membership in the legislature by constraining the religious expression of candidates who could compete for office (para 685). But the Court of Appeal rejected the other arguments and emphasized the importance of the notwithstanding clause.

5.1 Organisation mondiale sikhe du Canada c. Procureur général du Québec, 2024 QCCA 254 (English Translation of the Judgment of the Court)

[The Court followed the Supreme Court of Canada's precedent in Toronto (City) v Ontario in rejecting the idea (in response to the litigants' arguments of this type) that unwritten principles could be used to limit section 33:]

> (Joint reasons of Manon Savard C.J.Q, Yves-Marie Morissette J.A., and Marie-France Bich, J.A.)
> [210] In the present case, the written text of the Constitution (the Canadian Charter) guarantees freedom of religion (s. 2(a)) and expressly authorizes Parliament or a legislature to set justifiable limits to that freedom (s. 1) or to derogate therefrom (s. 33). Accepting the Fellowship's submissions would be tantamount to disregarding this text, however clear it may be, and recognizing two separate freedoms of religion within our constitutional order: an unwritten one — which would be guaranteed implicitly by the Constitution, and with respect to which no limitations or exceptions would be permitted —and another — guaranteed expressly by the same Constitution, and which could be subject to certain restrictions or exceptions. In practice, this would mean that the freedom of religion guaranteed explicitly by a written provision of the Constitution would be less extensive or less "protected" than the freedom of religion guaranteed implicitly by the same Constitution. In a sense, the freedom of religion guaranteed implicitly by the Constitution would render the freedom of religion enshrined in the Canadian Charter redundant. This approach would therefore undermine the delimitation of that freedom "chosen by our constitutional framers". This evidently makes no sense. The recognition of unwritten constitutional principles (such as the protection of minorities) cannot be used to "dispense with the written text of the Constitution".

The Court also noted the important historic purpose of section 33 as a federal-provincial compromise.

> [228] A final word on s. 33 of the Canadian Charter. It bears reminding that this section is the fruit of a federal-provincial compromise (with the exception of Quebec) in the context of the process that led to the patriation of the Constitution in 1982. As everyone knows, the decision to enshrine a charter of rights and freedoms was the subject of much discussion — and dissent — during the 1980-1981 Conference of First Ministers. For some, the idea that courts could set aside statutes enacted by Parliament or provincial legislatures, insofar as these statutes violated rights and freedoms guaranteed by such a charter, was a source of concern and reluctance. There was a fear that the judiciary would usurp or neutralize the legislative power exercised by an elected assembly, thereby running counter to the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. The proposal to introduce an override power reserved for Parliament and the provincial legislatures was intended as a [translation] "counterweight" […] to the broadened scope of judicial review resulting from the constitutionalization of rights and freedoms.

The Court rejected the idea that the notwithstanding clause was somehow a less legitimate part of Constitutional order than other parts of the Charter:

> [364] But while it is true that "all government power must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution", as enshrined in s. 32(1) of the Canadian Charter and s. 52(1) of the [Constitution Act 1982], and that courts "have the duty" to ensure that this power is exercised "in accordance with the Constitution", this does not entitle courts to ignore the effects of s. 33 of the Canadian Charter and carry out a judicial review that this provision does not allow. Indeed, s. 33 is a provision of the Constitution, and its use, when made in accordance with the requirements set out in Ford, is itself in accordance with the Constitution.

The Court also reaffirmed the pre-emptive use of section 33:

> [356] Of course, s. 33 can be used by the legislature after a court has ruled and pointed out a statute's constitutional flaws, but it can also be used preventively, in which case it cuts short the discussion: the legislature has the last word from the outset.

The Court rejected any attempt to use s. 28 to strike down laws invoking s. 33:

> [451] […] s. 28 has no standalone normative value and does not add a right distinct from those recognized by ss. 2 to 23 of the Charter. Instead, it conditions the interpretation — and hence the application — of these provisions. Moreover, to conclude otherwise would be to duplicate s. 15 of the Charter, which already enshrines, in various respects, the equality of individuals without distinction based on various grounds, including sex.

The Supreme Court of Canada has granted leave to hear an appeal from the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal. The case will be heard under the name of English Montreal School Board et al. v Attorney General of Quebec.

5.2 Notes and Questions

1. In Ontario (Attorney General) v. Working Families Coalition (Canada) Inc., 2025 SCC 5, the Court found that even though a provincial law (that restricted third party 'election' spending that occurred prior to the official start of an election campaign) could not be challenged under s.2 (b) of the Charter because the province had successfully invoked s.33, the law was nevertheless unconstitutional because it breached s. 3 of the Charter, which is not covered by s. 33. In the Court's view, s. 3 protected the right to citizens to be informed about political issues. Given the increasing use of s. 33, is it likely that litigants will begin to rely on other rights (that are not covered by s.33) to make their case? Will the courts be willing to adopt a broad reading of some of these other rights in order to avoid the effect of s. 33? If so, is that appropriate?
2. Why do you think that governments have become more willing to invoke s. 33?
3. What can comparative constitutional law scholars learn from Canada's experience with s. 33?

Chapter 18: Section 32: Charter Application

By Kyle Kirkup and Jena McGill

1 Introduction

1.1 The Text of Section 32

A threshold question in every Charter case is whether the Charter applies to the dispute at hand. Answering this question requires understanding who is bound by the Charter or who is "subject to the burden of Charter rights" (Peter W. Hogg & Wade Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th Ed. (loose-leaf) (Carswell, 2019) at §37:6). The starting point for this determination is the text of s.32, which provides:

> 32.(1) This Charter applies: > to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and > to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

1.2 The Charter Applies to Parliament and Legislatures

The language of s.32 makes clear that the Charter applies to limit the powers of federal, provincial, and territorial legislatures. These bodies must comply with the Charter and any action by Parliament or a legislature that is inconsistent with the Charter will be invalid. Federal, provincial, and territorial legislation and subordinate legislation like bylaws and regulations are thus subject to the Charter by virtue of the language of s.32.

1.3 The Charter Applies to Governments

In addition to Parliament and legislatures, the text of s.32 specifies that the Charter applies to the "government of Canada" and the "government of each province." These references to government have been found to encompass the executive branch of government including the federal cabinet (Operation Dismantle v The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 (SCC)) as well as the "ministers, officials employed in government departments, police officers, and other public agencies or agents that are subject to ministerial control or charged with the performance of government responsibilities" (The Constitutional Law Group, Canadian Constitutional Law, 4th Ed. (Toronto: Emond Montgomery Ltd, 2010 at 802).

1.4 The Charter Does Not Apply to Private Action

Section 32 is silent on whether the Charter applies to private – that is, non-government – action. Early in the life of the Charter, there was debate about whether this silence meant that the Charter applied only to Parliament, legislatures and governments and not to private individuals, or whether s.32 was intended to confirm that the named entities were subject to the Charter without limiting the Charter's application to those bodies alone.

Any uncertainty about the application of the Charter to private action was resolved in the first s.32 case heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC). There, McIntyre J. (Dickson C.J. and Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Le Dain JJ., concurring), reviewed the text of s.32 and the views of several commentators on the question of whether the Charter applied to private action and concluded:

> [33] I am in agreement with the view that the Charter does not apply to private [action]. It is evident from the authorities and articles cited above that that approach has been adopted by most judges and commentators who have dealt with this question. In my view, s. 32 of the Charter, specifically dealing with the question of Charter application, is conclusive on this issue...
> [34] It is my view that s.32 of the Charter specifies the actors to whom the Charter will apply. They are the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government. It will apply to those branches of government whether or not their action is invoked in public or private litigation…

The decision to limit the application of the Charter to government action is consistent with the overarching role of a constitution, which "establishes and regulates the institutions of government, and…leaves to those institutions the task of ordering the private affairs of the people" (Peter W. Hogg & Wade Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th Ed. (loose-leaf) (Carswell, 2019) at §37:13). In McKinney v University of Guelph, 1990 CanLII 60 (SCC), La Forest J. (Dickson C.J. and Gonthier and Sopinka JJ, concurring), expanded upon the rationale for the decision in Dolphin Delivery to limit the application of the Charter to government action, stating (at 262):

> The exclusion of private activity from the Charter was not a result of happenstance. It was a deliberate choice which must be respected. We do not really know why this approach was taken, but several reasons suggest themselves. Historically, bills of rights, of which that of the Unites States is the great constitutional exemplar, have been directed at government. Government is the body that can enact and enforce rules and authoritatively impinge on individual freedom. Only government requires to be constitutionally shackled to preserve the rights of the individual. Others, it is true, may offend against the rights of individuals. This is especially true in a world in which economic life is largely left to the private sector where powerful private institutions are not directly affected by democratic forces. But government can either regulate these or create distinct bodies for the protection of human rights and the advancement of human dignity.
> To open up all private and public action to judicial review could strangle the operation of society and… "diminish the area of freedom within which individuals can act"…It would mean reopening whole areas of settled law in several domains. For example, as has been stated: "In cases involving arrests, detentions, searches and the like, to apply the Charter to purely private action would be tantamount to setting up an alternative tort system" (see McLellan and Elman, "To Whom Does the Charter Apply? Some Recent Cases on Section 32" (1986), 24 Alta. L. Rev. 361, at p. 367, cited in RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., supra, at p. 597). And that is by no means all.
> Opening up private activities to judicial review could impose an impossible burden on the courts. Both government and the courts have recognized the need to limit judicial review by means, for example, of privative clauses and deference to specialized tribunals, techniques that would be unavailable in a Charter context. As well…government may, in many cases, establish more flexible means to deal with individual rights. Thus Human Rights Commissions have more flexible techniques for dealing with discriminatory practices without unduly constraining the exercise of other democratic rights that are extremely hard to balance…

We return to the specifics of Dolphin Delivery and McKinney, below.

1.5 Further Commentary and Questions

1. The decision in Dolphin Delivery to limit the Charter to government action sparked significant commentary at the time. See, for example, A. Anne McLellan & Bruce P. Elman, "To Whom does the Charter Apply? Some Recent Cases on Section 32" (1986) 14:2 Alberta LR 361 (suggesting at 375 that "the Charter will have its greatest impact on private activity through moral suasion") and Brian Slattery, "The Charter's Relevance to Private Litigation: Does Dolphin Deliver?" (1987) 32 McGill LJ 905 (calling for a more nuanced, contextual approach to s.32).
2. For more recent commentary on the Dolphin Delivery decision and its legacy, see Margot Young, Richard Mailey and Anthony Sangiuliano, "Editors' Introduction: Beyond Dolphin Delivery" (2025) 33:4 Constitutional Forum constitutionnel i.
3. In New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v Nova Scotia, 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), a majority of the Supreme Court determined that the Charter applied only to the actions of the New Brunswick provincial legislative assembly that are not shielded by parliamentary privilege, since the privileges necessary for the proper functioning of legislative assemblies are constitutionally entrenched. Justice McLachlin J (as she then was) explained: "It is a basic rule…that one part of the Constitution cannot be abrogated or diminished by another park of the Constitution...So if the privilege to expel strangers from the legislative assembly is constitutional, it cannot be abrogated by the Charter, even if the Charter otherwise applies to the body making the ruling" (373).

2 Government Action

The principle that the Charter applies only to government action sounds simple enough; however, the history of s.32 tells a different story. The distinction between government and private action has proved difficult to apply in practice, giving rise to a significant body of case law revolving around the "very vexed question" of when an entity qualifies as government under s.32 (Gerard J. Kennedy, The Charter of Rights in Litigation: Direction from the Supreme Court of Canada (loose-leaf), at § 2:2).

In Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), the Supreme Court identified two bases upon which an act may be found to be governmental for the purposes of Charter application: 1) where the act is performed by a government entity; and, 2) where a non-government entity performs a government activity. Justice La Forest, for a unanimous Court, summarized the government action framework in the following terms:

> [44] As the case law…makes clear, the Charter may be found to apply to an entity on one of two bases. First, it may be determined that the entity is itself "government" for the purposes of s. 32. This involves an inquiry into whether the entity whose actions have given rise to the alleged Charter breach can, either by its very nature or in virtue of the degree of governmental control exercised over it, properly be characterized as "government" within the meaning of s. 32(1). In such cases, all of the activities of the entity will be subject to the Charter, regardless of whether the activity in which it is engaged could, if performed by a non-governmental actor, correctly be described as "private". Second, an entity may be found to attract Charter scrutiny with respect to a particular activity that can be ascribed to government. This demands an investigation not into the nature of the entity whose activity is impugned but rather into the nature of the activity itself. In such cases, in other words, one must scrutinize the quality of the act at issue, rather than the quality of the actor. If the act is truly "governmental" in nature -- for example, the implementation of a specific statutory scheme or a government program -- the entity performing it will be subject to review under the Charter only in respect of that act, and not its other, private activities (emphasis added).

2.1 Eldridge Branch 1: Government Entities

Under the first branch of the Eldridge framework, the Charter will apply to all the activities of an entity that is itself government. There are two ways that an entity may be found to be government for the purposes of the Charter: 1) if the entity is "by its very nature" government; and, 2) if the entity is controlled by government to some significant degree (often described as "routine" or "regular" or "substantial" governmental control). The cases below illustrate the considerations courts look to in making these determinations.

2.1.1 Entities that are Government by Nature

2.1.1.1 Godbout v Longueuil (City), 1997 CanLII 335 (SCC)

As a condition of her employment with the city of Longueuil's police force, Michele Godbout was required to sign a declaration that her principal residence would remain in the city of Longueuil and that if she moved outside the city, her employment would be terminated without notice. When Godbout moved to the nearby town of Chably, her job was terminated in accordance with the declaration. The Supreme Court was unanimous in finding that Longueuil's residence requirement infringed the right to respect for private life guaranteed by the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, CQLR c C-12. Justice La Forest also found that the requirement infringed the right to life, liberty, and security of the person in section 7 of the Canadian Charter. As part of his analysis, he determined that the Charter applies to municipalities like Longueuil.

> La Forest J. (McLachlin and L'Heureux-Dube JJ concurring):

[47] [W]here...entities are, in reality, "governmental" in nature -- as evidenced by such things as the degree of government control exercised over them, or by the governmental quality of the functions they perform -- they cannot escape Charter scrutiny. In other words, the ambit of s.32 is wide enough to include all entities that are essentially governmental in nature and is not restricted merely to those that are formally part of the structure of the federal or provincial governments. This is not to say, of course, that the Charter applies only to those entities (other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal and provincial governments) that are, by their nature, governmental. Indeed, it may be that particular entities will be subject to Charter scrutiny in respect of certain governmental activities they perform, even if the entities themselves cannot accurately be described as "governmental"...Rather, it is simply to say that where an entity can accurately be described as "governmental in nature", it will be subject in its activities to Charter review. Thus, the Charter applied to Douglas College (in Douglas/kwantlen Faculty Assn. v Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 570] and to the Council of Regents [in Lavigne v Ontario Public Service Employees Union, 1991 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 211] because those bodies were wholly controlled by government and were, in essence, emanations of the provincial legislatures that created them...

[48] The possibility that the Canadian Charter might apply to entities other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal or provincial governments is, of course, explicitly contemplated by the language of s. 32(1) inasmuch as entities that are controlled by government or that perform truly governmental functions are themselves "matters within the authority" of the particular legislative body that created them. Moreover, interpreting s. 32 as including governmental entities other than those explicitly listed therein is entirely sensible from a practical perspective. Were the Charter to apply only to those bodies that are institutionally part of government but not to those that are -- as a simple matter of fact -- governmental in nature (or performing a governmental act), the federal government and the provinces could easily shirk their Charter obligations by conferring certain of their powers on other entities and having those entities carry out what are, in reality, governmental activities or policies. In other words, Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal and provincial executives could simply create bodies distinct from themselves, vest those bodies with the power to perform governmental functions and, thereby, avoid the constraints imposed upon their activities through the operation of the Charter. Clearly, this course of action would indirectly narrow the ambit of protection afforded by the Charter in a manner that could hardly have been intended and with consequences that are, to say the least, undesirable. Indeed, in view of their fundamental importance, Charter rights must be safeguarded from possible attempts to narrow their scope unduly or to circumvent altogether the obligations they engender.

[49] I pause here to reiterate an important observation...concerning how the notion of "government" is to be understood. The mere fact that an entity performs what may loosely be termed a "public function" will not by itself mean that the body under examination is "governmental" in nature... In order for the Canadian Charter to apply to institutions other than Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the federal and provincial governments, then, an entity must truly be acting in what can accurately be described as a "governmental" -- as opposed to a merely "public" -- capacity. The factors that might serve to ground a finding that an institution is performing "governmental functions" do not readily admit of any a priori elucidation. Nevertheless... "[a] public purpose test is simply inadequate" and "is simply not the test mandated by s. 32".

[50]…I turn now to examine directly...[t]he main issue...[of]...whether the Canadian Charter applies to municipalities...at all... [T]he analysis I have undertaken thus far leads inexorably to the conclusion that it does. While this Court has never before expressly endorsed that proposition, we have done so inferentially, inasmuch as we have already applied the Charter to municipal by-laws without specifically engaging in an analysis of the application issue... Moreover, the view that municipalities are subject to the Charter is not only sound, but also wholly consistent with the case law I have been discussing. Indeed, municipalities -- though institutionally distinct from the provincial governments that create them -- cannot but be described as "governmental entities". I base this finding on a number of considerations.

[51] First, municipal councils are democratically elected by members of the general public and are accountable to their constituents in a manner analogous to that in which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are accountable to the electorates they represent. To my mind, this itself is a highly significant (although perhaps not a decisive) indicium of "government" in the requisite sense. Secondly, municipalities possess a general taxing power that, for the purposes of determining whether they can rightfully be described as "government", is indistinguishable from the taxing powers of Parliament or the provinces. Thirdly, and importantly, municipalities are empowered to make laws, to administer them and to enforce them within a defined territorial jurisdiction....Finally, and most significantly, municipalities derive their existence and law-making authority from the provinces; that is, they exercise powers conferred on them by provincial legislatures, powers and functions which they would otherwise have to perform themselves. Since the Canadian Charter clearly applies to the provincial legislatures and governments, it must, in my view, also apply to entities upon which they confer governmental powers within their authority. Otherwise, provinces could (in the manner outlined earlier) simply avoid the application of the Charter by devolving powers on municipal bodies.…

2.1.1.2 Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10 (CanLII)

Cindy Dickson is a citizen of the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation (VGFN), a self-governing Indigenous community whose territory includes part of northern Yukon. Dickson hoped to stand for election as a Councillor in the First Nation. However, the VGFN Constitution, enacted pursuant to the 1993 Vuntut Gwitchin Self-Government Agreement between VGFN and the Yukon and federal governments, requires that all Chiefs and Councillors reside in the Old Crow settlement on the traditional territory of the Vuntut Gwitchin or relocate there within 14 days of their election ("the residency requirement"). Dickson lived in Whitehorse, about 800 kilometers from Old Crow. Due to her family and employment commitments, she could not relocate if elected. Dickson challenged the residency requirement, alleging it infringed her right to equality under s.15 of the Charter. The VGFN made several arguments in response, including that the Charter does not apply to it as a self-governing First Nation. In two sets of reasons, six of the seven Supreme Court of Canada judges who heard the case determined that the Charter applied to the self-governing Indigenous nation of VGFN; Justice Rowe, in dissent, determined that it did not.

Kasirer and Jamal JJ. (Wagner C.J. and Côté J. concurring)

A. Does the Charter Apply to the VGFN's Residency Requirement?

...

(2) Indigenous Self-Government and the Charter

[46] Before considering whether the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement, it is useful to review the historical and policy context for Indigenous self-government in Canada, including under the Charlottetown Accord of 1992, the federal government's "Inherent Right Policy" since 1995, and the final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples published in 1996. It is also useful to review how courts have consistently applied the Charter to Indigenous governments.

[47] As a preliminary matter, we note that although this Court has yet to recognize an inherent right to Indigenous self-government as an Aboriginal right protected under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982...an inherent right to Indigenous self-government has now been affirmed on the international plane by Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295, October

2, 2007. In 2016, the Canadian government supported the Declaration and committed to adopt and implement it in accordance with the Canadian Constitution. Recent federal legislation has affirmed the Declaration as "a universal international human rights instrument with application in Canadian law" and provides "a framework for the Government of Canada's implementation of the Declaration"...

(a) The Charlottetown Accord of 1992

[48] Section 32(1) of the Charter does not expressly provide that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments. However, the Draft Legal Text of the Charlottetown Accord of 1992 had proposed to amend s. 32 of the Charter to recognize, in s. 32(1)(c), that the Charter applies "to all legislative bodies and governments of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of their respective legislative bodies" (p. 36). It had also proposed to add a new s. 35.1 of the Constitution Act, 1982 to provide in part that "[t]he Aboriginal peoples of Canada have the inherent right of self-government within Canada" (p. 37). The Accord was approved by the federal, provincial, and territorial governments and by the Assembly of First Nations, Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, Native Council of Canada, and Métis National Council, but was not ratified because it did not receive the support of a majority of Canadians in a national referendum...Even so, it is noteworthy that these proposed constitutional amendments saw the inherent right to self-government as compatible with the obligation of Indigenous governments to comply with the Charter.

(b) Federal Government Policy Since 1995

[49] Despite the failure of the Charlottetown Accord, since 1995 the federal government's policy, first articulated under its "Inherent Right Policy", has been that Indigenous peoples in Canada have an inherent right to self-government guaranteed under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, but also that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments. The policy recognizes the historical fact that Indigenous peoples were living in self-governing communities before Europeans arrived, and seeks to ensure that Indigenous governments, like other governments in Canada, comply with the Charter...

[50] Since 1995, the federal government has negotiated many self-government agreements with Indigenous communities across Canada, which have recognized that the Charter, the Canadian Human Rights Act...and the Criminal Code...continue to apply to Indigenous peoples...The federal government has also affirmed that self-government agreements negotiated before 1995 will, as a general principle, "continue to operate according to their existing terms"...This includes the Self-Government Agreement with the VGFN.

(c) The Legal Policy Debate About Applying the Charter to Indigenous Governments

[51] Shortly after the failure to ratify the 1992 Charlottetown Accord, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples extensively studied whether the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments exercising inherent self-government powers. The Royal Commission concluded that the Charter applies, but in accordance with s. 25, it should be "given a flexible interpretation that takes account of the distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices of Aboriginal peoples"...(RCAP Final Report). We will return later to the Royal Commission's perspective on the intimate connection between ss. 32 and 25 of the Charter. That perspective takes a broad view of the application of the Charter to Indigenous governments under s. 32(1), but also interprets the Charter under s. 25 with sensitivity to the collective rights of Indigenous peoples, to protect what the Royal Commission referred to as their "distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices" — or what Professor Patrick Macklem has encapsulated in the term "[I]ndigenous difference"...As we explain below, s. 25 was included in the Charter as a protection for the distinctive minority rights of Indigenous peoples that might be abrogated or derogated from by the application of individual Charter rights.

[52] The RCAP Final Report, published in 1996, described two approaches to addressing whether the Charter applies to Indigenous governments exercising inherent self-government powers. The first approach claims that Indigenous governments should be bound by the Charter as a matter of basic constitutional principle, because "it would be highly anomalous if Canadian citizens enjoyed the protection of the Charter in their relations with every government in Canada except for Aboriginal governments" (vol. 2, at p. 227). This approach does not see the Charter as necessarily inconsistent with Indigenous values, because the Charter itself is "modelled on international standards with universal application" (p. 228).

[53] The second approach described by the RCAP Final Report asserts that Indigenous governments should not be bound by the Charter, because Indigenous peoples did not "consen[t] to the application of the Charter in a binding constitutional instrument, such as a self-government treaty with the Crown" (vol. 2, at p. 228). It also claims that "some Charter provisions reflect individualistic values that are antithetical to many Aboriginal cultures, which place greater emphasis on the responsibilities of individuals to their communities" (p. 230). This approach claims that applying the Charter to Indigenous governments "could hamper and even stifle the efforts of Aboriginal nations to revive and strengthen their cultures and traditions" and "might operate as the unwitting servant of the forces of assimilation and domination" (p. 230).

[54] After studying these issues extensively, the Royal Commission settled on an intermediate approach embodying three basic principles. First, all Canadians — Indigenous and non-Indigenous alike — are "entitled to enjoy the protection of the Charter's general provisions in their relations with governments in Canada, no matter where in Canada the people are located or which governments are involved" (p. 230). Second, Indigenous governments "occupy the same basic position relative to the Charter as the federal and provincial governments" (p. 230). And third, the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments and be "interpreted in a manner that allows considerable scope for distinctive Aboriginal philosophical outlooks, cultures and traditions", based on the "interpretive rule . . . found in section 25 of the Charter" (p. 230).

[55] The Royal Commission's final recommendation was thus that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments, but under s. 25, the Charter must be interpreted flexibly to account for the distinctive philosophies, traditions, and cultural practices of Indigenous peoples (RCAP Final Report, vol. 2, at p. 234; see also Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Partners in Confederation: Aboriginal Peoples, Self-Government, and the Constitution (1993), at pp. 39-41; Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Bridging the Cultural Divide: A Report on Aboriginal People and Criminal Justice in Canada (1996), at pp. 262-64).

(3) The Eldridge Framework for Applying Section 32(1) of the Charter

[The Court reviewed the two branches of the Eldridge framework with reference to key cases including: Godbout, Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority and Eldridge].

...

[70] An entity may be subject to the Charter in one of two ways. An entity may be government by its very nature or because the federal or a provincial government exercises substantial control over it, in which case all the entity's activities are subject to the Charter. Alternatively, even if an entity is not part of government, it will be subject to the Charter in respect of governmental activities it performs.

(4) Application of Section 32(1) to This Case

...

(a) The Charter Applies to the Residency Requirement Because the VGFN is "Government" by Nature"

...

[77] ...[I]n our view the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement under its Constitution because the VGFN is "government" by nature. Recall that in Godbout, La Forest J. stated that although there can be no a priori list of factors that determines whether an entity performs "governmental" functions, an entity may be considered to be government by nature when it has four features (para. 51). The four features are neither necessary nor determinative for an entity to be found to be government by nature but serve as useful indicia of government (para. 51):

1. The entity has a council that is "democratically elected by members of the general public and [is] accountable to [its] constituents in a manner analogous to that in which Parliament and the provincial legislatures are accountable to the electorates they represent".
2. It has "a general taxing power that, for the purposes of determining whether [it] can rightfully be described as 'government', is indistinguishable from the taxing powers of Parliament or the provinces".
3. Importantly, it is empowered to make, administer, and enforce coercive laws binding on the public within a defined territorial jurisdiction, which is a quintessentially governmental function.
4. Most significantly, it derives its existence and lawmaking authority from the federal or provincial government; that is, it exercises powers conferred by Parliament or by a provincial legislature, powers and functions that the federal or provincial government would otherwise have to perform itself.

[78]...[T]he VGFN as an Indigenous government illustrates indicia for "government by nature" identified by this Court in Godbout, and thus the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement...

[79] First, the VGFN Council consists of members who are elected by eligible voters of the VGFN and are democratically accountable to their constituents, much like members of Parliament or a provincial legislature...If elected, members swear or affirm loyalty to the VGFN and obedience to the VGFN Constitution as a "sacred responsibility of government"...

[80] Second, the VGFN has general taxing powers that are materially indistinguishable from those of Parliament or the provinces. The VGFN has status as "a municipality or public body performing the functions of government or a municipal corporation" under the Income Tax Act... This status is contingent on the VGFN restricting its activities "to the provision of government or other public services"...

[81] Third, like Parliament and provincial legislatures, the VGFN is empowered to make, administer, and enforce coercive laws that are binding on VGFN citizens and on the public generally within its settlement land...To quote La Forest J. in Godbout, this is a "quintessentially governmental function" (para. 51 (emphasis deleted), citing McKinney, at p. 270).

[82] Fourth, although (as the trial judge found) the Vuntut Gwitchin have been self-governing since time immemorial, and even if the VGFN has lawmaking authority under an inherent right to self-government, the VGFN is also recognized as a legal entity under the federal implementing legislation. To that extent, it derives at least some of its lawmaking authority under federal law. In other words, at least one source of the VGFN's lawmaking authority flows from Parliament, in that the VGFN exercises powers that Parliament otherwise would have exercised through its legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This of course is not to suggest that Indigenous self-government is necessarily an emanation of federal authority. Parliament can, as here, be a source of the self-government authority, and it is this fact that triggers the application of the Charter in this case.

[83]...In our view, in the present context it is sufficient for the VGFN to be recognized as a legal entity and to derive a source of its lawmaking authority from federal legislation, without necessarily deriving all of its lawmaking authority, or its existence, from federal legislation. In Godbout, La Forest J. spoke of municipalities deriving their "existence" from federal or provincial legislation, but this was because municipalities are entirely creatures of statute, whereas self-governing Indigenous governments manifestly are not. In short, Parliament can recognize the existence of an Indigenous government to which it confers some part of its lawmaking authority under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, without creating that Indigenous government and without necessarily being the only source of its lawmaking authority.

[84]...[E]ven if the VGFN has an inherent power of self-government that is not derived from federal legislation, it is undeniable that the VGFN also exercises powers conferred by Parliament under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 that would otherwise be performed by the federal or territorial government, as indeed they were before the Self-Government Agreement was implemented by federal legislation...

[86] In addition, whatever the source of the VGFN's self-government powers — whether it is an inherent right, federal legislation, or both — it is undeniable that the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act also regulates the exercise of the VGFN's self-government powers and makes them binding against third parties. In short, all the VGFN's self-government powers under the Self-Government Agreement and implemented by the federal and territorial self-government legislation must be exercised in accordance with that legislation. In our view, this constitutes sufficient involvement by Parliament to trigger the application of the Charter.

[87] Although not determinative, it bears noting that the view that the Charter applies to the VGFN's exercise of self-government powers was also expressed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Hon. Ron Irwin, at the second reading of the federal self-government legislation before the House of Commons. He stated that "[t]he principles embodied in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution of Canada as a whole will continue to apply"...He added that "First Nation constitutions will also provide protections for the rights and freedoms of First Nation citizens" (p. 4716). Thus, in the Minister's view, the citizens of self-governing First Nations would be entitled to invoke Charter rights alongside their rights under First Nations constitutions, just as Ms. Dickson did in this case...In our view, the Minister's statement before the House of Commons lends some support to the view that Parliament intended the exercise of self-government powers under the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act to be subject to the Charter.

[88] We hasten to say that in concluding that the VGFN engages each of the four illustrative indicia identified by this Court in Godbout for an entity that is government by nature, we do not of course suggest that an Indigenous government such as the VGFN exercising self-government powers is similar to a municipality. Unlike municipalities, which have no independent constitutional status, are entirely creatures of statute, and exercise only those powers conferred by legislation, Indigenous peoples are expressly recognized under the Constitution Act, 1867 (s. 91(24)), the Charter (s. 25), and the Constitution Act, 1982 (ss. 35 and 35.1). Indigenous peoples pre-existed the arrival of European settlers and the founding of Canada as a country; they do not depend on federal, provincial, or territorial legislation to exist as autonomous self-governing peoples.

[92] In our view, therefore, the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement because the VGFN is government by nature.

Martin and O'Bonsawin JJ. (dissenting in part)

...

[234] This claim raises numerous issues of fundamental importance concerning the extent to which the Charter protects the rights and freedoms of Indigenous people in respect of actions taken by Indigenous governments. In our view, the Charter applies to governmental action taken by self-governing Indigenous nations because they are both governmental in nature and because the purpose of s. 32(1) was to extend the Charter's protections to address the power imbalance between the governed and those who govern in Canada. As the contours of Indigenous self-government evolve, it is essential that no Charter-free zones in Canada be created, that everyone be equally protected by its constitutionally entrenched guarantees, and that all forms of government be constrained by its limits.

II. Section 32(1) of the Charter

...

[241] In our view, a purposive reading of s. 32(1) of the Charter ensures that the VGFN, as a self-governing Indigenous community, is obliged to respect the Charter rights of its citizens. We agree with Kasirer and Jamal JJ. that the VGFN's enactment of the residency requirement is subject to the Charter and that the VGFN is "'government' by nature". However, we reach this conclusion through a different set of considerations.

...

A. The Charter Is Directed at the Relationship Between the Governed and Those Who Govern

[249] The purpose underlying the scope of the Charter's applicability is...to address the power imbalance between the governed and those who govern…

[251] This purpose must underlie any understanding and interpretation of s. 32(1). In assessing to whom the Charter applies, there must be a focus on entities that are entitled to exercise governmental power over individuals in a manner that potentially limits their rights and freedoms. Any interpretation of Charter applicability that has the effect of creating a Charter-free zone in the face of this form of power imbalance would undermine the Charter's objectives and importance.

(3) The Eldridge Framework and Indigenous Governments

[260] Like Kasirer and Jamal JJ., we acknowledge that the VGFN falls within the first branch of the Eldridge framework as it is a government by nature. However, we question whether existing categories are adequate to deal with self-governing Indigenous nations and reject the idea that VGFN's governmental status is based on the delegation of authority from another level of government.

[261]...[E]xisting jurisprudence provides general and instructive statements about the purpose of s. 32(1). However, these cases did not involve the distinct context of Indigenous governments and instead addressed other unrelated circumstances. Legal tests devised to assess whether municipalities, universities, or hospitals must respect the Charter arise from, and necessarily respond to, their particular factual contexts. They should not be read as a complete answer on the scope of the Charter's applicability to self-governing Indigenous nations. Principles articulated for entities wholly created by the federal or provincial governments will be incomplete and ill-suited when assessing the lawmaking authority of the first inhabitants of Canada.

[262] Different considerations arise with respect to Indigenous governments as they are a foundational piece of Canada's constitutional fabric. Over time, governments and courts have learned that legal questions involving Indigenous peoples frequently require different considerations, legal concepts, and perspectives, grounded in the reality that they are the first inhabitants of Canada. Analogies to existing case law that identify governmental entities will be partial and imperfect when applied to self-governing Indigenous nations. Limiting conditions should not be grafted onto s. 32(1) when to do so would stunt the growth of what was intended to be a living, remedial, and responsive constitution. Although this Court has yet to fully recognize an inherent Aboriginal right to self-government, s. 32(1) should not be interpreted in a manner that would impair the recognition of such a right prior to the issue being adjudicated.

[263] The delegated authority or substantial control approaches used in Eldridge and McKinney are therefore not particularly helpful for assessing the applicability of the *Charter t*o the VGFN. Looking for a form of delegated authority by the federal or a provincial government does not respect the historic and integral role of Indigenous societies in Canada and fails to account for the modern context of self-governing Indigenous nations.

[264] Indigenous peoples were self-governing entities before the arrival of European settlers and continue to govern themselves to this day...The long-standing self-governance practices of Indigenous societies are well established in this Court's jurisprudence: "Long before Europeans explored and settled North America, aboriginal peoples were occupying and using most of this vast expanse of land in organized, distinctive societies with their own social and political structures" (Mitchell v M.N.R., 2001 SCC 33...at para. 9...)...

[265] Recognition of self-governing Indigenous nations as governments in their own right, and not by virtue of delegated power, falls clearly within the ambit of s. 32(1) and the purpose of the Charter. Importantly, it upholds long-standing Indigenous practices of self-governance and advances reconciliation in Canada. It is not necessary for the impugned action to stem from authority granted by federal, provincial, or territorial legislation for it to be subject to Charter scrutiny. The emphasis the majority places on the VGFN deriving at least some of its lawmaking authority from federal law gives insufficient weight to the VGFN's independent governmental nature.

[266] We thus reject the notion that an essential factor for the Charter's applicability under s. 32(1) is that the source of the VGFN's lawmaking authority flows from Parliament. We acknowledge that Kasirer and Jamal JJ. take great care to respect the position of self-governing Indigenous nations like the VGFN: noting that the VGFN is not controlled by the federal or Yukon government under the control prong (para. 76), that the Vuntut Gwitchin have been self-governing since time immemorial (para. 82), that Parliament can recognize an Indigenous government to which it confers lawmaking authority under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 without creating that Indigenous government (para. 83), and that the reasons should not be taken to suggest that the VGFN is similar to a municipality (para. 88). Nevertheless, they find that "the VGFN exercises powers that Parliament otherwise would have exercised through its legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24)" (para. 82) and place substantial weight on the Constitution Act, 1867 and federal legislation as the source of the VGFN's authority to enact the residency requirement...

[267] The weight placed on delegation under s. 91(24) does not reflect the unique situation of self-governing Indigenous nations and is not required under the first branch of Eldridge for an entity like the VGFN to attract Charter scrutiny. Self-governing Indigenous nations may not be expressly mentioned in s. 32(1) but they deal with "matters" which are, and this section must receive a purposive, expansive application so that the Charter applies to protect all.

B. Application of Section 32(1) to the VGFN

...

(2) The VGFN Is a Government by Its Very Nature

[277] We have no hesitation concluding that the VGFN is subject to the Charter. It is inherently governmental. The VGFN's long-standing history reinforces its governmental nature; as the trial judge noted, "[t]he Vuntut Gwitchin were constituted as a political entity prior to the assertion of British sovereignty and have governed themselves in accordance with their own laws since time immemorial"...

[278] An array of relevant factors demonstrate that the VGFN is governmental in nature. For example, the VGFN council is democratically elected, it has the authority to levy taxes, and it possesses extensive lawmaking powers — all of which were described by La Forest J. in Godbout as non-exhaustive indicia of government (para. 51; see also VGFN Final Agreement (1993), ch. 24; VGFN Self-Government Agreement, s. 13.0; Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, s. 11 and Sch. III). The VGFN also has the exclusive authority to govern its internal affairs (VGFN Self-Government Agreement, s. 13.1). This includes the enactment of the residency requirement itself — a legislative action that impacts individual members' rights by restricting democratic participation. Further, the VGFN can enact laws applicable in the Yukon in relation to a wide array of matters touching the everyday lives of its citizens, such as health care, education, adoption and child welfare, solemnization of marriage, and estate administration (s. 13.2). It is empowered to legislate on matters of a local or private nature on the settlement land, which the VGFN Self-Government Agreement defines as including the administration of justice, land use, expropriation of land, protection of fish, wildlife, and habitat, environmental protection, vehicles, curfews and the prevention of disorderly conduct, public health, public order, and other "matters coming within the good government of Citizens on Settlement Land" (s. 13.3).

[279] The VGFN's extensive catalogue of lawmaking powers touches on "matters within the authority" of Parliament and the provincial legislatures, as provided by s. 32(1). As the Congress of Aboriginal Peoples points out, many of the services provided by the VGFN as a self-governing Indigenous nation would otherwise be within the purview of other levels of government...While a different modality for the exercise of legislative power, the VGFN's authority as a self-governing Indigenous nation is no less impactful or binding on its citizens and no less capable of limiting their Charter rights.

[280] The VGFN's structure and functions reflect its inherently governmental nature: it creates laws and makes decisions that benefit, order, and restrict the lives of its citizens. We accordingly conclude that the VGFN is a government by its very nature. Its enactment of the residency requirement must attract Charter scrutiny.

C. Conclusion on Section 32(1)

[281]…"The Charter is a nation-building instrument" (J. Harrington, "Interpreting the Charter", in Oliver, Macklem and Des Rosiers, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution, 621, at p. 622). It was intended to solidify a national identity and preserve individual rights and freedoms in the face of governmental action. This purpose aligns with its application to self-governing Indigenous nations, including the VGFN. All orders of government in Canada are bound to uphold the Charter's protections as these protections represent an integral feature of the relationship between the governed and those who govern. Any narrower approach to s. 32(1) risks the creation of Charter-free zones and would undermine the balance intended to be struck by the introduction of constitutionally entrenched rights in Canada.

[282] Section 32(1) can be read to recognize the political and constitutional evolution that has occurred in respect of Indigenous self-government. Indigenous nations like the VGFN have been self-governing since time immemorial and our reasons affirm that, whatever the source of their self-government authority, self-governing Indigenous nations are subject to the Charter pursuant to s. 32(1) and in accordance with a modified Eldridge framework when they engage in governmental action.

Rowe J. (dissenting in part)

[425] Ultimately, this case is about whether, in crafting their own Constitution, the Vuntut Gwitchin can make their own choices about their affairs — including as to how they wish to protect fundamental rights and freedoms — or whether their choices are subject to judicial scrutiny under the Charter. I conclude that the choice is theirs. I would therefore dismiss Ms. Dickson's appeal and allow the VGFN's cross-appeal, on the basis that the Charter does not apply to the VGFN's enactment of the residency requirement.

...

III. The Charter Applies to the Federal and Provincial Governments and Entities or Activities With a Significant Connection to Those Governments

...

[435] The text of s. 32(1) does not refer to the concept of "government" generally. Rather, the text enumerates distinct institutions under two paragraphs: the "Parliament and government of Canada" (s. 32(1)(a)) and the "legislature and government of each province" (s. 32(1)(b)). In Dolphin Delivery, McIntyre J. made clear that "s. 32 of the Charter specifies the actors to whom the Charter will apply" (p. 598...). Section 32(1) also makes clear that the Charter applies to the federal and provincial governments "in respect of all matters within their respective authorities" (Dolphin Delivery, at p. 598).

[436] The clear language used to address to whom and to what the Charter applies reflects s. 32(1)'s purpose. No interpretation can be adopted that effectively rewrites s. 32(1) of the Charter... Accordingly, any approach to Charter applicability under s. 32(1) cannot ignore the clear boundaries set out within the provision itself.

[461] First, some entities — such as a labour arbitrator...a human rights commission...and municipalities... — have been held to be government "by their very nature" (see Eldridge, at para. 44) despite operating independently from the federal and provincial governments. This language appears to be the foundation for the arguments resting on the fact that the VGFN is a government. However, an assessment of the nature of the entity under Eldridge does not occur by reference to an abstract conception of "government". Rather, it is an inquiry into the entity's connection to the particular governments enumerated in s. 32(1), as demonstrated by the entity's creation, structure, and powers....

[462] My colleagues Justices Kasirer and Jamal state that the VGFN engages the illustrative indicia for "government by nature" (para. 78) because,

> although (as the trial judge found) the Vuntut Gwitchin have been self-governing since time immemorial, and even if the VGFN has lawmaking authority under an inherent right to self-government, the VGFN is also recognized as a legal entity under the federal implementing legislation. To that extent, it derives at least some of its lawmaking authority under federal law. In other words, at least one source of the VGFN's lawmaking authority flows from Parliament, in that the VGFN exercises powers that Parliament otherwise would have exercised through its legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 [para. 82.]

This implies that, as the self-government agreement in this case was authorized by federal legislation, Indigenous self-government for the VGFN is somehow an emanation of federal authority. This is fundamentally inconsistent with the nature, status and purpose of Indigenous self-government. Its purpose is to recognize and give practical effect to an autonomy that is different in status and nature from that exercised by band councils under the Indian Act. The idea of self-government is not that it is an "authority [that] flows from Parliament", but rather Indigenous peoples exercising authority that is rightfully theirs.

[463] Thus, the fact that an entity is a government does not automatically lead to the conclusion that the Charter applies to its activities. Nor does the conclusion that an entity is not subject to the Charter mean that it cannot be a government. For example, the government of the United Kingdom is no less a government because it is not subject to the Charter. The jurisprudence simply recognizes that the scope of s. 32(1), while capable of embracing extensions of the federal and provincial governments in the modern administrative state, is not so broad as to encompass entities that bear no significant connection to the particular governments enumerated in s. 32(1) itself.

[469] It is clear that the Charter applies under s. 32(1) to the federal and provincial governments. While the jurisprudence recognizes that "government" takes on various forms in the modern administrative state, an entity or activity must bear a significant connection to the federal or a provincial government in order to fall within the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter. Consequently, to determine whether the Charter applies to an entity such as the VGFN or to its activities, the focus must be on a connection to the federal or provincial government.

IV. The VGFN Arrangements Do Not Establish a Significant Connection to Either the Federal or the Yukon Government

[496] [N]one of the aspects of the VGFN Arrangements show that either branch of the Eldridge framework applies. To the contrary, they reinforce that the VGFN is distinct from the Crown, including in enacting the residency requirement pursuant to its own laws, customs, and practices. To apply the Charter in this case would amount to viewing the VGFN as an extension of the federal or the Yukon government, or its enactment of the residency requirement as ascribable to one of them. Such an understanding is not only inconsistent with the VGFN Arrangements, but is also inconsistent with the special relationship between the federal and territorial governments and the Vuntut Gwitchin.

...

V. A Proper Application of Section 32(1) Promotes the Objective of Reconciliation

[497] A faithful application of this Court's jurisprudence leads inexorably to the conclusion that the VGFN and its enactment of the residency requirement do not fall within the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter. Underlying Ms. Dickson and the interveners' arguments on the Charter's applicability are, in reality, policy arguments: that the Charter's protections should apply, because the VGFN is a government with significant authority over its citizens, and the inapplicability of the Charter under s. 32(1) would amount to creating a "'Charter-free' zon[e]"... Such policy arguments are not a sound basis in law to impose the Charter on the VGFN in a manner that effectively amends s. 32(1). Moreover, for the courts to impose the Charter on the VGFN would be contrary to the objective of reconciliation.

[498] Both the Charter and the diversity of Indigenous legal traditions are concerned with the protection of human dignity, but the Charter represents only one way to achieve this...The Charter exhibits one conception of how the individual interacts with the state, inspired by liberal enlightenment philosophy...

[499] These philosophical underpinnings of the Charter may not necessarily be commensurate with some Indigenous worldviews...and with the structure of Indigenous governing bodies which seek to "maintain . . . traditional structures integrated with contemporary forms of government" (Self-Government Agreement, s. 2.1). For example, there may be tensions between the Charter's general focus on negative rights and certain communities' preference for a more relational, reciprocal understanding of "relationships, duties, and responsibilities"...Some scholars have noted the potential for cultural disconnect between the Charter's anthropocentric focus on human rights-holders, and a more ecocentric or cosmocentric understanding of rights and responsibilities...Finally, depending on the systems upon which Indigenous governance structures are created, Indigenous communities may see the balance between individual and collective rights, and between individuals and the state, differently...

[500] Even where the value systems and legal traditions of specific Indigenous communities point to the same result as the Charter, their mode of reasoning may differ. For example, Indigenous stories, customs, covenants, ceremonies and deliberative circles can be powerful sources of Indigenous law, including on the limits of government power...These can form the basis for Indigenous communities to codify a charter of rights that is adapted to their culture, traditions, and outlook. Rather than a "monolithic form of rights analysis", Indigenous communities can craft protections for human rights which integrate their particular and distinct forms of Indigenous law...These alternative sources of rights and responsibilities can "serve the goal of human dignity as effectively as a western code of human rights" (p. 93). By contrast, the imposition of the Charter by the courts risks enabling litigants to "constitutionally interrogate the rich complexity of Aboriginal societies according to a rigid analytic grid of individual right and state obligation" (P. Macklem, Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada (2001), at p. 195).

[501] Of course, the foregoing analysis is not to say that Charter protections are inherently in tension with the desires of Indigenous communities, including the VGFN. Indigenous value systems and legal traditions should not be treated as monolithic, and it should not be assumed that individual rights are necessarily in conflict with collective Indigenous governance (Metallic, at p. 15). Moreover, Indigenous communities are not static: interaction with other societies over centuries, and the adoption of different systems of governance via treaty, may increase the commensurability of Charter protections...The Charter remains an exceptional achievement, which explains why a variety of Indigenous groups, especially women's groups, have supported its content...

[502] What is clear, however, is that the Charter should not be imposed on Indigenous communities. As noted by Professor McNeil, "[f]or the Charter to be unilaterally imposed on their governments today through a questionable interpretation of section 32(1) would turn the clock back to a time when the Aboriginal peoples were often not given the opportunity to participate when important decisions affecting their constitutional rights were made" (pp. 70-71). It is not for this Court to scrutinize the wisdom or fairness of the VGFN's choices by transposing an instrument designed by and for the federal and provincial governments onto the Vuntut Gwitchin, who did not participate in its creation or agree to its terms. To do so would be to subject the Vuntut Gwitchin to the sort of federal oversight from which it sought to remove itself through the VGFN Arrangements.

[505] As for policy arguments suggesting that the inapplicability of the Charter under s. 32(1) would create a "Charter-free zone", such arguments are dismissive of Indigenous approaches to protecting their members. Indeed, they rest on the erroneous assumption that if the Charter is not imposed, Indigenous community members will have no protections.

[506] Indigenous communities can and have enacted protections to regulate the interaction between members and their governments. A number of related approaches have been given effect across Canada. An Indigenous community can choose, on its own initiative, to implement an instrument that incorporates protections for members (as the federal and provincial governments did in enacting the Charter). Alternatively, it can commit via agreement or treaty — including through self-government agreements — to enact such an instrument. In either case, however, the Indigenous community plays an active role in deciding how it wants to craft such an instrument. Thus, it may enact — or agree to enact — its own protections rooted in its legal traditions; it may adopt an instrument that is inspired by the Charter; or it may even agree to the application of Charter protections. This may also be a subject of discussion among parties during the negotiation of self-government agreements. I note in passing that since 1995, Canada's negotiation policy has been to seek the insertion of a provision accepting the application of the Charter within self-government agreements (see, e.g., the Nisga'a Final Agreement (1999) and the Tla'amin Final Agreement (2014)). Numerous questions arise concerning the effect of such an agreement (e.g., is the actual Charter being applied, or are its protections being incorporated? How are such rights enforced, and by which adjudicative bodies? What happens if the Charter is amended pursuant to the amending formula between the federal and provincial governments?), but it is not possible to answer these questions in the present case.

[507] What is crucial...is that the foregoing avenues are a product of Indigenous choice. Indigenous communities can choose how to implement effective protections — whether on their own initiative or by mutual agreement with federal, provincial, and territorial authorities — rather than being subjected to the Charter via a distorted interpretation of s. 32(1). As I explained, taking reconciliation seriously means respecting Indigenous peoples' ability to "define themselves and to choose by what means to make their decisions, according to their own laws, customs and practices" (Desautel, at para. 86).

VI. The VGFN Agreed to the Enactment of Its Own Rights Protections, Rather Than the Application of Charter Protections

...

[517] The signatories to the Self-Government Agreement agreed to the following provision concerning the VGFN Constitution:

> 10.1 The Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Constitution shall:
> . . .
> 10.1.4 recognize and protect the rights and freedoms of Citizens;

Furthermore, s. 10.1.6 stipulates that the VGFN Constitution shall "provide for amending the Constitution by the Citizens" — that is, the citizens of the VGFN. Just as the federal and provincial governments have had the authority to amend the Constitution of Canada since patriation in 1982, s. 10.1.6 provides that the VGFN is able to amend its own Constitution, including the instrument stipulated in s. 10.1.4 recognizing and protecting the rights and freedoms of citizens.

[518] Section 10.1.4's inclusion in the Self-Government Agreement confirms the signatories' agreed-upon method for protecting the rights and freedoms of VGFN citizens in a manner that is reconcilable with Vuntut Gwitchin laws, customs, and practices. The provision makes no reference to the Charter. Instead, the signatories provided more generally for the recognition and protection of the rights and freedoms of citizens, without requiring the adoption of the exact rights and freedoms set out in the Charter, and while providing for the VGFN to amend those protections through its own governance structures.

[519]...Much of Article IV is clearly inspired by the Charter, and many of the enumerated rights are nearly identical in wording to Charter rights. Despite these similarities, Article IV of the VGFN Constitution is uniquely tailored to the VGFN's own traditions, values, or priorities. For example, the VGFN has chosen to recognize Gwich'in as its official language and to protect its use (Articles IV(15) to (18)). And the VGFN has enshrined a right to access personal information possessed or controlled by the VGFN government (Article IV(20)(a)) — a right with no analogue in the Charter. Crucially, for the purposes of the present case, the right to hold office in Vuntut Gwitchin Government is expressly "[s]ubject to residency and other requirements set out in Vuntut Gwitchin Law" (Article IV(4)). The residency requirement itself is part of the VGFN Constitution under Article XI(2) and was added pursuant to constitutional amendments in 2006. The VGFN has thus elevated its view of the importance of its leaders residing on Settlement Land to constitutional status, pursuant to its own priorities and its own values for community leadership.

[520] Article IV of the VGFN Constitution exemplifies how an Indigenous community can enact protections for fundamental rights and freedoms that are commensurate with its own laws, customs, and practices...[I]t is not the case that individual rights are not respected by the VGFN or that VGFN citizens are deprived of fundamental rights and exist in a rights-free zone. The VGFN has constitutionally entrenched rights and freedoms — many of which mirror those in the Charter — alongside procedures for VGFN citizens to challenge VGFN laws.

[521] Indeed, Ms. Dickson's own petition pursued an alternative claim that the residency requirement was invalid under the VGFN Constitution. This claim under the VGFN Constitution was mentioned briefly by the trial judge, but the courts below did not decide the claim on the merits, preferring to resolve the case under the Charter. The VGFN argues that Ms. Dickson's claim is properly addressed under the VGFN Constitution, rather than under the Charter. I agree. Ms. Dickson seeks to challenge an internal rule of the VGFN in order to participate in its governance; her claim must be addressed based on the rights enshrined within the VGFN Constitution, pursuant to the VGFN's own governance structures and processes.

VII. Conclusion

[522]...Having regard to the architecture of the Constitution Act, 1982, the relationship between Indigenous peoples and the federal and provincial governments, and the jurisprudence of this Court, it is my view that decisions about how to implement protections for the fundamental rights and freedoms of its citizens also rest with the VGFN. This in no way lessens the rights and freedoms that they enjoy vis-à-vis the federal and provincial governments under the Charter as citizens of Canada. Giving effect to Vuntut Gwitchin self-government is a critical part of the promise of reconciliation. This necessarily entails the right for the Vuntut Gwitchin themselves to decide what is fair and just in accordance with those rights and freedoms that they choose to enshrine in their own Constitution.

2.1.1.3 Further Commentary and Questions

1. In York Region District School Board v Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario, 2024 SCC 22 (CanLII), the Supreme Court determined for the first time that the Charter applies to Ontario Public School Boards under the first branch of Eldridge. Justice Rowe (Wagner C.J. and Côté, Kasirer and Jamal JJ. concurring) reviewed the Education Act, RSO 1990, c. E.2 and determined that "Ontario public school boards are, in effect, an arm of government in that they 'exercise powers conferred on them by provincial legislatures, powers and functions which they would otherwise have to perform themselves" (...Godbout, at para. 51)." Noting that public education is "inherently a governmental function", Justice Rowe concluded that all the actions of Ontario public school boards are subject to Charter scrutiny because school boards are government by nature.

2. For commentary on the likely impacts of the decisions in Dickson and York School Board on the future trajectory of s.32, see e.g. Paul Daly, "Unchartered Territory: York Region District School Board v Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario, 2024 SCC 22 and Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10" (30 September 2024), online (blog) (suggesting that the decisions' focus "…on delegated authority and public functions...is likely to animate arguments for Charter application in university settings.For the most part, Canadian universities exercise delegated authority under statute, make binding rules, take highly consequential decisions and perform public functions in educating students and distributing government money. These considerations chime with those relied upon in York Teachers and Dickson.")

3. In Dickson, above, Justice Rowe criticizes the majority's approach to the question of Charter application for failing to respect the choices of the VGFN. Justice Rowe explains: "It is not for this Court to scrutinize the wisdom or fairness of the VGFN's choices by transposing an instrument designed by and for the federal and provincial governments onto the Vuntut Gwitchin, who did not participate in its creation or agree to its terms. To do so would be to subject the Vuntut Gwitchin to the sort of federal oversight from which it sought to remove itself through the VGFN Arrangements" (para 502). Is it possible to reconcile Indigenous self-determination and self-governance with the application of the Charter, an inherently colonial instrument? For commentary on the relationship between the Charter and Indigenous nations and legal orders, see e.g. Naomi Metallic, "Checking our Attachment to the Charter and Respecting Indigenous Legal Orders: A Framework for Charter Application to Indigenous Governments" (2022) 31:2 Const F: Special Issue on Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2021 YKCA 5 3; Amy Swiffen, "Constitutional Reconciliation and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (2019) 24 Rev Const Stud 85; and John Borrows, "Contemporary Traditional Equality: The Effect of the Charter on First Nation Politics" (1994) 43 UNBLJ 19.

2.1.2 Entities that are Controlled by Government

2.1.2.1 McKinney v University of Guelph, 1990 CanLII 60 (SCC)

In McKinney v University of Guelph, eight university professors and one university librarian alleged that the mandatory retirement policies at four Ontario universities, all of which required retirement at the age of 65, violated their equality rights guaranteed by s.15 of the Charter. A threshold question was whether the Charter applied to the impugned university policies. A majority of the seven Supreme Court justices who heard the case concluded that the Charter did not apply to the mandatory retirement policies at issue. Justice Wilson, in dissent, preferred a different approach to the question of Charter application under s.32. Based on her approach, Wilson J. found the retirement policies were properly subject to the Charter.

Such an entity may be established to facilitate the performance of tasks that those seeking incorporation wish to undertake and to control, not to facilitate the performance of tasks assigned to government…

> It was not disputed that the universities are statutory bodies performing a public service. As such, they may be subjected to the judicial review of certain decisions, but this does not in itself make them part of government within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter…
>
> The Charter apart, there is no question of the power of the universities to negotiate contracts and collective agreements with their employees and to include within them provisions for mandatory retirement. These actions are not taken under statutory compulsion, so a Charter attack cannot be sustained on that ground. There is nothing to indicate that in entering into these arrangements, the universities were in any way following the dictates of the government. They were acting purely on their own initiative. Unless, then, it can be established that they form part of government, the universities' action here cannot fall within the ambit of the Charter. That cannot be answered by the mere fact that they are incorporated and perform an important public service. Many institutions in our society perform functions that are undeniably of an important public nature, but are undoubtedly not part of the government. These can include railroads and airlines, as well as symphonies and institutions of learning. And this may be so even though they are subjected to extensive governmental regulations and even assistance from the public purse … A public purpose test is simply inadequate. It is fraught with difficulty and uncertainty. It is simply not the test mandated by s. 32…
> ...[I]f the Charter covers municipalities, it is because "municipalities perform a quintessentially governmental function." They enact coercive laws binding on the public generally, for which offenders may be punished… The same can obviously not be said of universities. I hasten to add that I agree with my colleague Wilson J. that the Charter is not limited to entities which discharge functions that are inherently governmental in nature. As to what other entities may be subject to the Charter by virtue of the functions they perform, I would think that more would have to be shown than that they engaged in activities or the provision of services that are subject to the legislative jurisdiction of either the federal or provincial governments...
> The appellants also submit that the universities constitute part of the government under s. 32 of the Charter having regard to the nature of their relationship to the provincial government. The entire context must, they say, be looked at including the facts that they are established by statute which determines their powers, objects and governmental structures, that their historical development was as part of a public system of post-secondary education, that their survival depends on public funding, and that government structures largely coordinate and regulate their activities, through operating and capital grants, special funds, control over tuition fees and approval of new programs.
> There is no question that the relationship of government to Canadian universities has always been significantly different from that existing in Europe when communities of scholars first banded together to pursue learning. From the early days of this country, several of the provinces acted to establish provincial universities…These statutes set out the universities' powers, functions, privileges and governing structure. While these vary from university to university, they are in general much the same... [The Court briefly reviewed the statutes establishing Ontario universities].
> … [The government of Ontario] heavily funds universities on an ongoing basis. The operating grants alone range, according to the evidence, between a low for York of 68.8% of its operating funds to a high for Guelph of 78.9%… The province also provides most of the funds for capital expenditures, and provides special funds earmarked to meet specific policies. It exercises considerable control over new programs by requiring that they be specifically approved to be eligible for public funds.

It is evident from what has been recounted that the universities' fate is largely in the hands of government and that the universities are subjected to important limitations on what they can do, either by regulation or because of their dependence on government funds. It by no means follows, however, that the universities are organs of government. There are many other entities that receive government funding to accomplish policy objectives governments seek to promote. The fact is that each of the universities has its own governing body. Only a minority of its members (or in the case of York, none) are appointed by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and their duty is not to act at the direction of the government but in the interests of the university … The remaining members are officers of the Faculty, the students, the administrative staff and the alumni.

The government thus has no legal power to control the universities even if it wished to do so. Though the universities, like other private organizations, are subject to government regulations and in large measure depend on government funds, they manage their own affairs and allocate these funds, as well as those from tuition, endowment funds and other sources...

The legal autonomy of the universities is fully buttressed by their traditional position in society. Any attempt by government to influence university decisions, especially decisions regarding appointment, tenure and dismissal of academic staff, would be strenuously resisted by the universities on the basis that this could lead to breaches of academic freedom. In a word, these are not government decisions. Though the legislature may determine much of the environment in which universities operate, the reality is that they function as autonomous bodies within that environment. There may be situations in respect of specific activities where it can fairly be said that the decision is that of the government, or that the government sufficiently partakes in the decision as to make it an act of government, but there is nothing here to indicate any participation in the decision by the government and, as noted, there is no statutory requirement imposing mandatory retirement on the universities.

I, therefore, conclude that the respondent universities do not form part of the government apparatus, so their actions, as such, do not fall within the ambit of the Charter. Nor in establishing mandatory retirement for faculty and staff were they implementing a governmental policy.…

[Justices Sopinka and L'Heureux-Dube wrote separate reasons concurring with the conclusion of La Forest J. that the Charter did not apply.]

Wilson J. (dissenting)

...I do not think that any one test or approach is a panacea. All have something of value to offer since each provides a somewhat different perspective from which to deal with the question what is government. But each alone risks missing a range of bodies that it seems to me must be viewed as part of government, particularly if one is to ensure that the Charter does in fact provide unremitting protection for individual rights and liberties. It would seem therefore that the only satisfactory approach under s. 32(1) of the Charter is one that is sensitive to the strong points of each of the approaches outlined above.

As a result, I would favour an approach that asks the following questions about entities that are not self-evidently part of the legislative, executive or administrative branches of government:

1. Does the legislative, executive or administrative branch of government exercise general control over the entity in question?

2. Does the entity perform a traditional government function or a function which in more modern times is recognized as a responsibility of the state?

3. Is the entity one that acts pursuant to statutory authority specifically granted to it to enable it to further an objective that government seeks to promote in the broader public interest?

Each of these questions is meant to identify aspects of government in its contemporary context. An affirmative answer to one or more of these questions would, to my mind, be a strong indicator that one is dealing with an entity that forms part of government. I hasten to add, however, that an affirmative answer can never be more than an indicator. It will always be open to the parties to explain why the body in question is not part of government. Likewise a negative answer is not conclusive that the entity is not part of government. It will always be open to the parties to explain that there is some other feature of the entity that the questions listed above do not touch upon but which makes it part of government.

We must at all costs be sensitive to the fact that government is a constantly evolving organism. It follows that the kinds of questions we must ask when trying to identify government must also be capable of evolving. It seems to me that the reason why fixed tests designed to identify government inevitably fail is that they assume that government is static, an assumption that is not borne out by an historical and comparative review of governments in this and other countries. As a result, the questions that I have listed above are not carved in stone. Other questions may have to be added to the list as governments enter or withdraw from different fields. The questions I have listed are intended only as practical guidelines to those trying to decide whether a body that is not self-evidently part of the legislative, executive or administrative branches of government may nonetheless be part of government for purposes of s. 32(1) of the Charter.

[On the facts and evidence of McKinney, Justice Wilson answered the three questions above as follows: 1) "…the province exercises quite substantial, although in some areas indirect, control over [universities]"; 2) "…education at every level has been a traditional function of governments in Canada"; and 3) "…the fact that the universities are so heavily funded, the fact that government regulation seems to have gone hand in hand with funding, together with the fact that the governments are discharging through the universities a traditional government function pursuant to statutory authority leads me to conclude that the universities form part of 'government' for purposes of s.32."]

2.1.2.2 Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component, 2009 SCC 31 (CanLII)

The Canadian Federation of Students (CFS), representing college and university students in British Columbia, and the British Columbia Teachers' Federation (BCTF), representing public school teachers, wanted to purchase advertising space on the sides of buses operated by TransLink and BC Transit, the corporations that operate public transportation systems in the province of British Columbia. The intended advertisements encouraged young people to vote in an upcoming provincial election. For example, one of the proposed ads stated: "Tuition fees ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com - Minimum wage ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com - Environment ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com." Another ad from the BCTF stated: "2,500 fewer teachers, 114 schools closed. Your kids. Our students. Worth speaking out for." The transit authorities rejected the proposed advertisements because they violated their policies that banned political advertisements on public buses. CFS and BCTF alleged that these policies violated their freedom of expression guaranteed by s.2(b) of the Charter. As a threshold matter, the Supreme Court had to determine whether the Charter applied to the policies of the two transit authorities.

3. Analysis

[The Court reviewed s.32 and the Eldridge framework].

[16] Thus [according to Eldridge] there are two ways to determine whether the Charter applies to an entity's activities: by enquiring into the nature of the entity or by enquiring into the nature of its activities. If the entity is found to be "government", either because of its very nature or because the government exercises substantial control over it, all its activities will be subject to the Charter. If an entity is not itself a government entity but nevertheless performs governmental activities, only those activities which can be said to be governmental in nature will be subject to the Charter.

3.1.1. Application of the Principles to the Transit Authorities

[17]…BC Transit does not address the trial judge's conclusion that it is itself "government" within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter. It is clearly a government entity. It is a statutory body designated by legislation as an "agent of the government", with a board of directors whose members are all appointed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council (British Columbia Transit Act, RSBC 1996, c. 38...). Moreover, the Lieutenant Governor in Council has the power to manage BC Transit's affairs and operations by means of regulations (s. 32(2)). Thus, BC Transit cannot be said to be operating autonomously from the provincial government, since the latter has the power to exercise substantial control over its day-to-day activities.

[18] As for TransLink, it argues that the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal erred in finding that it is "government" within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter. Prowse J.A. found that because TransLink is controlled by the G[reater] V[ancouver] R[egional] D[istrict], which itself is "government" within the meaning of s. 32, it is an apparatus of government. She based her finding that the GVRD was governmental in nature on s. 5 of the Local Government Act, RSBC 1996, c. 323 ("LGA"), which defines "local government" as "the council of a municipality" and "the board of a regional district". She added that regional districts are corporations (s. 173), that they are governed by boards (s. 174) and that the boards consist of municipal directors and electoral area directors (s. 783(1)). Furthermore, the LGA describes regional districts as "independent, responsible and accountable order[s] of government within their jurisdiction" and states that a regional district is intended to provide "good government for its community" (s. 2(a)). The GVRD therefore clearly falls within the definition of "local government".

[19] One might add to the criteria upon which Prowse J.A. based her conclusion the facts that, subject to specific limitations established in the LGA, a regional district may operate any service that the board considers necessary or desirable for its geographic area... and that it may recover the costs of its services... Moreover, the board of a regional district has the power to make bylaws which are enforceable by fine or by imprisonment... Consequently, not only is the GVRD designated as "government" in the LGA, but the legislature has granted it powers consistent with that status.

[20] Having established that the GVRD is "government", Prowse J.A. went on to conclude that the GVRD exercises substantial control over TransLink:

> . . . the GVRD has substantial control over the day-to-day operations of TransLink which, when combined with the GVRD's powers to appoint the vast majority of the members of TransLink's board of directors, satisfies the control test posited by the authorities. To the extent that the GVRD does not have complete control over TransLink, control is shared by the provincial government. In either case, I conclude that TransLink cannot be viewed to be operating independently or autonomously in a manner similar to either universities or hospitals. It has no independent agenda other than that provided in its constituent Act and no history of being an entity independent of government. [para. 93]

[21] Prowse J.A. came to this conclusion after reviewing the Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 30, and remarking that the GVRD must appoint 12 of the 15 directors on TransLink's board...and must ratify TransLink's strategic transportation plan...that TransLink must "prepare all its capital and service plans and policies and carry out all its activities and services in a manner that is consistent with its strategic transportation plan"...and that the GVRD must ratify bylaws relating to a variety of taxes and levies...Although TransLink is not an agent of the government, Prowse J.A. concluded that it is substantially controlled by a local government entity — the GVRD — and is therefore itself a government entity. The control mechanisms are substantial, and I agree with Prowse J.A.'s analysis and conclusion on this issue.

[22] The conclusion that TransLink is a government entity is also supported by the principle enunciated by La Forest J. in Eldridge (at para. 42) and Godbout (at para. 48) that a government should not be able to shirk its Charter obligations by simply conferring its powers on another entity. The creation of TransLink by statute in 1998 and the partial vesting by the province of control over the region's public transit system in the GVRD was not a move towards the privatization of transit services, but an administrative restructuring designed to place more power in the hands of local governments...The devolution of provincial responsibilities for public transit to the GVRD cannot therefore be viewed as having created a "Charter-free" zone for the public transit system in Greater Vancouver.

[24] In summary, both BC Transit and TransLink are "government" within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter. Consequently, it is not necessary to enquire into the nature of individual activities, because all their activities are subject to the Charter...

2.1.2.3 Further Commentary and Questions

1. The Supreme Court decided three other cases involving mandatory retirement policies at the same time as McKinney. Harrison v University of British Columbia, 1990 CanLII 61 (SCC), followed McKinney in finding that the Charter did not apply to the University of British Columbia's mandatory retirement policy. In Stoffman v Vancouver General Hospital, 1990 CanLII 62 (SCC), the Court considered a similar policy at a Vancouver hospital. The hospital had a different governance structure than the universities in McKinney and Harrison. A majority of the Court concluded that the Charter did not apply to the retirement policy because hospital policies were controlled by the board of trustees, not the provincial government. Justices Wilson, Cory and L'Heureux-Dube, the dissenting justices in McKinney, concluded in dissent that the government exercised a "substantial amount of control" over the hospital in three key areas: governing structure, policy, and funding (534). Finally, in Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Association v Douglas College, 1990 CanLII 63 (SCC), which involved a challenge to a mandatory retirement policy that was part of a collective agreement, the Court unanimously concluded that the Charter applied to the negotiation and administration of the collective agreement between the community college and the union representing its faculty members and librarians. Key to this conclusion was the Court's determination that the government was directing the operation of Douglas College to such a degree that in carrying out its functions, "the college is performing acts of government." The Court distinguished this structure from the universities in McKinney and Harrison, which, "though extensively regulated and funded by government, are essentially autonomous bodies…" Is the Court's distinction between universities and colleges tenable? ? Are there any consequences that might flow from an approach to Charter application that differentiates between colleges and universities?

2. As the cases above reveal, the question of whether a government exercises sufficient control over an entity to make the Charter applicable is a highly context-specific inquiry. Considering the decisions in McKinney, Stoffman, Douglas College, and City of Vancouver, is it possible to identify which factors tend to support the conclusion that the government exercises sufficient control over the entity to make the Charter applicable, and which factors tend to support the opposite conclusion? Does this approach provide sufficient predictability in determining whether the Charter applies to a given entity?

2.2 Branch 2: Government Activities

Governments cannot escape their Charter obligations by delegating government activities to non-governmental entities. In Eldridge, La Forest J. explained, "it is a basic principle of constitutional theory that since legislatures may not enact laws that infringe the Charter, they cannot authorize or empower another person or entity to do so" (para 35). This principle is captured in the second branch of the Eldridge government action framework, which provides that even where an entity itself is not government, where it is carrying out an activity that can be "ascribed to government – like implementing a government program or exercising statutory powers" – the entity will be subject to Charter scrutiny only in respect of that activity (Eldridge at para 44).

2.2.1 Entities Implementing Government Programs

2.2.1.1 Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC)

Robin Eldridge, John Warren and Linda Warren were deaf and used sign language to communicate. They argued that the lack of sign language interpreters in the British Columbia healthcare system impeded their ability to communicate with doctors and other healthcare providers and violated their equality rights under s.15 of the Charter. In British Columbia, hospitals are funded under the Hospital Insurance Act, RSBC, 1996, c.204, pursuant to which hospitals have discretion to determine the services they provide for free. Healthcare services delivered outside of hospitals are funded by the Medical and Health Care Services Act, SBC, 1992, c.-76, which delegates decisions about which services will be designated as "benefits" under the Act to a Medical Services Commission. Neither scheme provided for sign language interpreters. Before the Court could consider the equality claim, it had to determine whether the Charter applied to hospitals and outside healthcare delivery service providers in respect of the decisions not to fund sign language interpretation. Seven years earlier, the Supreme Court determined in Stoffman v Vancouver General Hospital, 1990 CanLII 62 (SCC), that the Charter did not apply to Vancouver General Hospital's internal mandatory retirement policy. The Stoffman ruling was distinguished in Eldridge, below.

> [35] Having identified the sources of the alleged s.15(1) violations, it remains to be considered whether the Charter actually applies to them. At first blush, this may seem to be a curious question. As I have discussed, it is a basic principle of constitutional theory that since legislatures may not enact laws that infringe the Charter, they cannot authorize or empower another person or entity to do so; Slaight [Communications Inc. v Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038]. It is possible, however, for a legislature to give authority to a body that is not subject to the Charter. Perhaps the clearest example of this is the power of incorporation. Private corporations are entirely creatures of statute; they have no power or authority that does not derive from the legislation that created them. The Charter does not apply to them, however, because legislatures have not entrusted them to implement specific governmental policies. Of course, governments may desire corporations to serve certain social and economic purposes, and may adjust the terms of their existence to accord with those goals. Once brought into being, however, they are completely autonomous from government; they are empowered to exercise only the same contractual and proprietary powers as are possessed by natural persons. As a result, while the legislation creating corporations is subject to the Charter, corporations themselves are not part of "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter.
> [36] Legislatures have created many other statutory entities, however, that are not as clearly autonomous from government. There are myriad public or quasi-public institutions that may be independent from government in some respects, but in other respects may exercise delegated governmental powers or be otherwise responsible for the implementation of government policy. When it is alleged that an action of one of these bodies, and not the legislation that regulates them, violates the Charter, it must be established that the entity, in performing that particular action, is part of "government" within the meaning of s. 32 of the Charter.
> [41] While it is well established that the Charter applies to all the activities of government, whether or not those activities may be otherwise characterized as "private", this Court has also recognized that the Charter may apply to non-governmental entities in certain circumstances...It has been suggested, for example, that the Charter will apply to a private entity when engaged in activities that can in some way be attributed to government. …
> [42] It seems clear, then, that a private entity may be subject to the Charter in respect of certain inherently governmental actions. The factors that might serve to ground a finding that an activity engaged in by a private entity is "governmental" in nature do not readily admit of any a priori elucidation. McKinney [v University of Guelph, 1990 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 229] makes it clear, however, that the Charter applies to private entities in so far as they act in furtherance of a specific governmental program or policy. In these circumstances, while it is a private actor that actually implements the program, it is government that retains responsibility for it. The rationale for this principle is readily apparent. Just as governments are not permitted to escape Charter scrutiny by entering into commercial contracts or other "private" arrangements, they should not be allowed to evade their constitutional responsibilities by delegating the implementation of their policies and programs to private entities…
> [43] Two important points must be made with respect to this principle. First, the mere fact that an entity performs what may loosely be termed a "public function", or the fact that a particular activity may be described as "public" in nature, will not be sufficient to bring it within the purview of "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter…
> In order for the Charter to apply to a private entity, it must be found to be implementing a specific governmental policy or program. As I stated further on in McKinney, at p. 269, "[a] public purpose test is simply inadequate" and "is simply not the test mandated by s. 32".
> [44] The second important point concerns the precise manner in which the Charter may be held to apply to a private entity. As the case law discussed above makes clear, the Charter may be found to apply to an entity on one of two bases. First, it may be determined that the entity is itself "government" for the purposes of s. 32. This involves an inquiry into whether the entity whose actions have given rise to the alleged Charter breach can, either by its very nature or in virtue of the degree of governmental control exercised over it, properly be characterized as "government" within the meaning of s. 32(1). In such cases, all of the activities of the entity will be subject to the Charter, regardless of whether the activity in which it is engaged could, if performed by a non-governmental actor, correctly be described as "private". Second, an entity may be found to attract Charter scrutiny with respect to a particular activity that can be ascribed to government. This demands an investigation not into the nature of the entity whose activity is impugned but rather into the nature of the activity itself. In such cases, in other words, one must scrutinize the quality of the act at issue, rather than the quality of the actor. If the act is truly "governmental" in nature -- for example, the implementation of a specific statutory scheme or a government program -- the entity performing it will be subject to review under the Charter only in respect of that act, and not its other, private activities.

[45] In the present case, the controversy over the Charter's application centres on the question of hospitals. The respondents argue that if the failure to provide sign language interpreters does not flow from the Act but rather from the discretion of individual hospitals, then s. 15(1) is not engaged because the Charter does not apply to hospitals. Hospitals, they say, are not "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. In their view, this result flows from a straightforward application of this Court's decision in Stoffman...

[46] The foregoing analysis, however, establishes that it is not enough for the respondents to say that hospitals are not "government" for the purposes of s. 32 of the Charter. In Stoffman, the Court found that the Vancouver General Hospital was not part of the apparatus of government and that its adoption of a mandatory retirement policy did not implement a government policy. Stoffman made it clear that, as presently constituted, hospitals in British Columbia are non-governmental entities whose private activities are not subject to the Charter. It remains to be seen, however, whether hospitals effectively implement governmental policy in providing medical services under the Hospital Insurance Act.

[47] [I]n Stoffman...I determined only that the fact that an entity performs a "public function" in the broad sense does not render it "government" for the purposes of s. 32 and specifically left open the possibility that the Charter could be applied to hospitals in different circumstances. …

[48] …[T]he hospital's mandatory retirement policy [in Stoffman]… was a matter of internal hospital management...It was not instigated by the government and did not reflect its mandatory retirement policy. Hospitals in British Columbia, moreover, exhibited great variety in their approaches to retirement. That each of these policies obtained ministerial approval reflected the large measure of managerial autonomy accorded to hospitals in this area.

[49] The situation in the present appeal is very different. The purpose of the Hospital Insurance Act is to provide particular services to the public. Although the benefits of that service are delivered and administered through private institutions -- hospitals -- it is the government, and not hospitals, that is responsible for defining both the content of the service to be delivered and the persons entitled to receive it. As previously noted, s. 3(1) states that every person eligible to receive benefits is "entitled to receive the general hospital services provided under this Act". Section 5(1) defines "general hospital services" to include various services normally available in hospitals. As the definition of "hospital" in s. 1 makes clear, moreover, hospitals are required to furnish the general hospital services specified in the Act. While no single hospital makes all of these services available, the net effect of the Act is to entitle every qualified person to receive, and to require hospitals to supply, a complete range of medically required hospital services. Indeed, if the legislation did not assure this, it would run afoul of the Canada Health Act. It is also apparent that while hospitals are funded on a "lump sum" and not a "fee-for-service" basis, they are not entirely free to spend this money as they choose. This is apparent from s. 10(1) of the Act, which mandates the annual payment of a sum "determined by the minister to reimburse the hospital . . . for the cost of rendering to beneficiaries those general hospital services authorized by this Act the hospital is required by the minister to provide for beneficiaries", as well as from s. 15(3)(c), which authorizes the minister to make "payments to hospitals for the service provided for under this Act" and s. 13(1), which provides that payments to a hospital "for services rendered by it . . . shall be deemed to be payment in full for the services. . . ."

[50] The structure of the Hospital Insurance Act reveals, therefore, that in providing medically necessary services, hospitals carry out a specific governmental objective. The Act is not, as the respondents contend, simply a mechanism to prevent hospitals from charging for their services. Rather, it provides for the delivery of a comprehensive social program. Hospitals are merely the vehicles the legislature has chosen to deliver this program. It is true that hospitals existed long before the statute, and have historically provided a full range of medical services. In recent decades, however, health care, including that generally provided by hospitals, has become a keystone tenet of governmental policy. he interlocking federal-provincial medicare system I have described entitles all Canadians to essential medical services without charge. Although this system has retained some of the trappings of the private insurance model from which it derived, it has come to resemble more closely a government service than an insurance scheme...

[51] Unlike Stoffman, then, in the present case there is a "direct and . . . precisely-defined connection" between a specific government policy and the hospital's impugned conduct. The alleged discrimination -- the failure to provide sign language interpretation -- is intimately connected to the medical service delivery system instituted by the legislation. The provision of these services is not simply a matter of internal hospital management; it is an expression of government policy. Thus, while hospitals may be autonomous in their day-to-day operations, they act as agents for the government in providing the specific medical services set out in the Act. The Legislature, upon defining its objective as guaranteeing access to a range of medical services, cannot evade its obligations under s. 15(1) of the Charter to provide those services without discrimination by appointing hospitals to carry out that objective. In so far as they do so, hospitals must conform with the Charter.

[52] The case of the Medical Services Commission is more straightforward. It was not contested that the Charter applies to the Commission in exercising its power to determine whether a service is a benefit pursuant to s. 4(1) of the Medical and Health Care Services Act. It is plain that in so doing, the Commission implements a government policy, namely, to ensure that all residents receive medically required services without charge. In lieu of setting out a comprehensive list of insured services in legislation, the government has delegated to the Commission the power to determine what constitutes a "medically required" service. There is no doubt, therefore, that in exercising this discretion the Commission acts in governmental capacity and is thus subject to the Charter...

2.2.1.2 Further Commentary and Questions

1. In Martha Jackman, "The Application of the Canadian Charter in the Health Care Context" (2000-2001) 9 Health L Rev 22, Jackman describes the significant implications of Eldridge for the delivery of healthcare in Canada. She writes: "With the Supreme Court's decision in Eldridge, the potential for invoking the Charter in the health care context has expanded significantly. In its earlier decisions in Dolphin Delivery and in Stoffman, the Court appeared to limit the application of the Charter to entities which were subject to a degree of governmental control such that they could be characterized as being 'part of government' for the purposes of section 32(1). In the heath care context...such a sharp distinction between 'public' and 'private' does not exist" (25). Why might the provision of healthcare in Canada be at odds with a "sharp distinction between 'public' and 'private'", and what are the implications of this characterization for s.32 of the Charter?

2.2.2 Entities Exercising Statutory Powers

2.2.2.1 Blencoe v British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44 (CanLII)

Robin Blencoe was accused of sexual harassment in two complaints filed with the British Columbia Human Rights Commission pursuant to the Human Rights Code, RSBC 1996, c. 210. Following the Commission's investigation, hearings before the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal were scheduled to commence more than 30 months after the initial complaints were filed. Blencoe argued that the delay in processing the complaints against him resulted in negative consequences for himself and his family, violating his rights to liberty and security of the person under s.7 of the Charter. Assessing this argument required a determination of whether the Charter applied to the actions of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission, a statutory body established under, and acting pursuant to, the Human Rights Code.

VI. Analysis

A. Does the Charter Apply to the Actions of the British Columbia Human Rights Commission?

[32] It is clear that both the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures are bound by the Charter. However, one threshold issue which has been raised in this case is whether the Commission and the Tribunal are agents of government pursuant to s.32 of the Charter…

[33] For…the purposes of this appeal, it is only necessary to address the Charter 's applicability to the actions of the Commission since the prejudice suffered by the respondent is alleged to have resulted from unreasonable delay in the actions of the Commission.

[34] The mere fact that a body is independent of government is not determinative of the Charter's application, nor is the fact that a statutory provision is not impugned. Being autonomous or independent from government is not a conclusive basis upon which to hold that the Charter does not apply.

[35] Bodies exercising statutory authority are bound by the Charter even though they may be independent of government. This was confirmed by La Forest J., speaking for a unanimous Court in Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General)…at para. 21:

> There is no doubt, however, that the Charter also applies to action taken under statutory authority. The rationale for this rule flows inexorably from the logical structure of s. 32. As Professor Hogg explains in his Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992 (loose-leaf)), vol. 1, at pp. 34-8.3 and 34-9:
> > Action taken under statutory authority is valid only if it is within the scope of that authority. Since neither Parliament nor a Legislature can itself pass a law in breach of the Charter, neither body can authorize action which would be in breach of the Charter. Thus, the limitations on statutory authority which are imposed by the Charter will flow down the chain of statutory authority and apply to regulations, by-laws, orders, decisions and all other action (whether legislative, administrative or judicial) which depends for its validity on statutory authority.
> There is no doubt that the Commission is created by statute and that all of its actions are taken pursuant to statutory authority.

[36] One distinctive feature of actions taken under statutory authority is that they involve a power of compulsion not possessed by private individuals (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 2, at p. 34-12). Clearly the Commission possesses more extensive powers than a natural person. The Commission's authority is not derived from the consent of the parties. The Human Rights Code grants various powers to the Commission to both investigate complaints and decide how to deal with such complaints…

[37] The Commission in this case cannot therefore escape Charter scrutiny merely because it is not part of government or controlled by government. In Eldridge, a unanimous Court concluded that a hospital was bound by the Charter since it was implementing a specific government policy or program. The Commission in this case is both implementing a specific government program and exercising powers of statutory compulsion.

[38] With respect to the claim that the Commission exercises judicial functions and is thereby not subject to the Charter, the decision of this Court in Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038, is conclusive. Lamer J. (as he then was), in partial dissent but speaking for a unanimous Court on this point, held that the Charter applies to the orders of a statutorily appointed labour arbitrator. This determination was not open to challenge, as expressed by Lamer J., at pp. 1077-78:

> The fact that the Charter applies to the order made by the adjudicator in the case at bar is not, in my opinion, open to question. The adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. [Emphasis added.]

[39] The facts in Slaight and the case at bar share at least one salient feature: the labour arbitrator (in Slaight) and the Commission (in the case at bar) each exercise governmental powers conferred upon them by a legislative body. The ultimate source of authority in each of these cases is government. All of the Commission's powers are derived from the statute. The Commission is carrying out the legislative scheme of the Human Rights Code. It is putting into place a government program or a specific statutory scheme established by government to implement government policy…The Commission must act within the limits of its enabling statute. There is clearly a "governmental quality" to the functions of a human rights commission which is created by government to promote equality in society generally.

[40] Thus, notwithstanding that the Commission may have adjudicatory characteristics, it is a statutory creature and its actions fall under the authority of the Human Rights Code. The state has instituted an administrative structure, through a legislative scheme, to effectuate a governmental program to provide redress against discrimination. It is the administration of a governmental program that calls for Charter scrutiny. Once a complaint is brought before the Commission, the subsequent administrative proceedings must comply with the Charter. These entities are subject to Charer scrutiny in the performance of their functions just as government would be in like circumstances. To hold otherwise would allow the legislative branch to circumvent the Charter by establishing statutory bodies that are immune to Charter scrutiny. The above analysis leads inexorably to the conclusion that the Charter applies to the actions of the Commission.

2.2.2.2 Further Commentary and Questions

1. In Slaight Communications Inc. v Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), cited in Blencoe, a majority of the Supreme Court determined that the Charter applied to an order made by a labour adjudicator acting pursuant to the Canada Labour Code, RSC 1970, c. L-1, because:

> [t]he adjudicator is a statutory creature: he is appointed pursuant to a legislative provision and derives all his powers from the statute. As the Constitution is the supreme law of Canada and any law that is inconsistent with its provisions is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect, it is impossible to interpret legislation conferring discretion as conferring a power to infringe the Charter, unless, of course, that power is expressly conferred or necessarily implied. Such an interpretation would require us to declare the legislation to be of no force or effect, unless it could be justified under s. 1. Although this Court must not add anything to legislation or delete anything from it in order to make it consistent with the Charter, there is no doubt in my mind that it should also not interpret legislation that is open to more than one interpretation so as to make it inconsistent with the Charter and hence of no force or effect. Legislation conferring an imprecise discretion must therefore be interpreted as not allowing the Charter rights to be infringed. Accordingly, an adjudicator exercising delegated powers does not have the power to make an order that would result in an infringement of the Charter, and he exceeds his jurisdiction if he does so.

2. The Charter has been found to apply to the actions of professional regulatory bodies acting pursuant to statutory schemes established by provincial legislatures, including law societies. See eg: Re Klein and Law Society of Upper Canada, 1985 CanLII 3086 (ON SCDC) (Law Society rules governing lawyer advertising subject to the Charter); Black v Law Society of Alberta, 1989 CanLII 132 (SCC) (Charter applied to Law Society rules prohibiting lawyer partnerships with lawyers outside of Alberta); and Histed v Law Society of Manitoba, 2007 MBCA 150 (CanLII) (Charter applied to a decision of Law Society's disciplinary body).

3 Government Inaction

The application of the Charter to "all matters within the authority" of Parliament and the provincial and territorial governments means that the Charter is "not restricted to situations where the government actively encroaches on rights" (Vriend v Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC) at para 60). The Charter can apply equally to government omissions.

3.1 Vriend v Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493

Delwin Vriend was fired from his job at a Christian college after his employers learned that he was gay. Vriend wanted to file a human rights complaint under Alberta's Individual's Rights Protection Act, SA 1972, c 2 (IRPA) alleging employment discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. The IRPA prohibited discrimination in employment on the basis of several prohibited grounds including race, marital status and religious beliefs, but not sexual orientation. The legislative history demonstrated that sexual orientation had been deliberately omitted from the IRPA. As a result, Vriend's complaint was rejected. Vriend sought a declaration that the omission of sexual orientation from Alberta's IRPA violated his equality rights under s.15 of the Charter. This required the Court to consider whether the Charter applied to the legislative omission at issue.

Cory J. (Lamer CJ and Gonthier, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Bastarache JJ concurring)…

1. Application of the Charter to a Legislative Omission

[50] Does s.32 of the Charter prohibit consideration of a s. 15 violation when that issue arises from a legislative omission?

[52] This issue is resolved simply by determining whether the subject of the challenge in this case is one to which the Charter applies pursuant to s. 32. Questions relating to the nature of the legislature's decision, its effect, and whether it is neutral, are relevant instead to the s. 15 analysis. The threshold test demands only that there is some "matter within the authority of the legislature" which is the proper subject of a Charter analysis. At this preliminary stage no judgment should be made as to the nature or validity of this "matter" or subject. Undue emphasis should not be placed on the threshold test since this could result in effectively and unnecessarily removing significant matters from a full Charter analysis.

[53] Further confusion results when arguments concerning the respective roles of the legislature and the judiciary are introduced into the s. 32 analysis. These arguments put forward the position that courts must defer to a decision of the legislature not to enact a particular provision, and that the scope of Charter review should be restricted so that such decisions will be unchallenged. I cannot accept this position. Apart from the very problematic distinction it draws between legislative action and inaction, this argument seeks to substantially alter the nature of considerations of legislative deference in Charter analysis. The deference very properly due to the choices made by the legislature will be taken into account in deciding whether a limit is justified under s. 1 and again in determining the appropriate remedy for a Charter breach…

[56] It is suggested that this appeal represents a contest between the power of the democratically elected legislatures to pass the laws they see fit, and the power of the courts to disallow those laws, or to dictate that certain matters be included in those laws. To put the issue in this way is misleading and erroneous. Quite simply, it is not the courts which limit the legislatures. Rather, it is the Constitution, which must be interpreted by the courts, that limits the legislatures. This is necessarily true of all constitutional democracies. Citizens must have the right to challenge laws which they consider to be beyond the powers of the legislatures. When such a challenge is properly made, the courts must, pursuant to their constitutional duty, rule on the challenge. It is said, however, that this case is different because the challenge centres on the legislature's failure to extend the protection of a law to a particular group of people. This position assumes that it is only a positive act rather than an omission which may be scrutinized under the Charter. In my view, for the reasons that will follow, there is no legal basis for drawing such a distinction. In this as in other cases, the courts have a duty to determine whether the challenge is justified. It is not a question…of the courts imposing their view of "ideal" legislation, but rather of determining whether the challenged legislative act or omission is constitutional or not.

[59] The respondents contend that a deliberate choice not to legislate should not be considered government action and thus does not attract Charter scrutiny. This submission should not be accepted. They assert that there must be some "exercise" of "s.32 authority" to bring the decision of the legislature within the purview of the Charter. Yet there is nothing either in the text of s.32 or in the jurisprudence concerned with the application of the Charter which requires such a narrow view of the Charter's application.

[60] The relevant subsection, s. 32(1)(b), states that the Charter applies to "the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province". There is nothing in that wording to suggest that a positive act encroaching on rights is required; rather the subsection speaks only of matters within the authority of the legislature. Dianne Pothier has correctly observed that s.32 is "worded broadly enough to cover positive obligations on a legislature such that the Charter will be engaged even if the legislature refuses to exercise its authority" ("The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application when the Legislature Declines to Speak" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 113, at p. 115). The application of the Charter is not restricted to situations where the government actively encroaches on rights.

[61] The IRPA is being challenged as unconstitutional because of its failure to protect Charter rights, that is to say its underinclusiveness. The mere fact that the challenged aspect of the Act is its underinclusiveness should not necessarily render the Charter inapplicable. If an omission were not subject to the Charter, underinclusive legislation which was worded in such a way as to simply omit one class rather than to explicitly exclude it would be immune from Charter challenge. If this position was accepted, the form, rather than the substance, of the legislation would determine whether it was open to challenge. This result would be illogical and more importantly unfair. Therefore, where, as here, the challenge concerns an Act of the legislature that is underinclusive as a result of an omission, s. 32 should not be interpreted as precluding the application of the Charter.

> [62] It might also be possible to say in this case that the deliberate decision to omit sexual orientation from the provisions of the IRPA is an "act" of the Legislature to which the Charter should apply. This argument is strengthened and given a sense of urgency by the considered and specific positive actions taken by the government to ensure that those discriminated against on the grounds of sexual orientation were excluded from the protective procedures of the Human Rights Commission. However, it is not necessary to rely on this position in order to find that the Charter is applicable.
> [63] It is also unnecessary to consider whether a government could properly be subjected to a challenge under s.15 of the Charter for failing to act at all, in contrast to a case such as this where it acted in an underinclusive manner. It has been held that certain provisions of the Charter, for example those dealing with minority language rights (s.23), do indeed require a government to take positive actions to ensure that those rights are respected (see Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 342, at p. 393; Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), 1993 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 839, at pp. 862-63 and 866).

3.2 Further Commentary and Questions

1. The Charter will apply where a government fails to take steps to fulfill positive obligations imposed by a Charter right. See, for example, Arsenault-Cameron v Prince Edward Island, 2000 SCC 1 (CanLII), where a decision by Prince Edward Island not to provide adequate funding to local minority language schools pursuant to its obligations under s.23 of the Charter, which "mandates that provincial governments do whatever is practically possible to preserve and promote minority language education" (at para 26) was subject to Charter scrutiny.
2. Courts have drawn a distinction between situations where a government fails to act at all and where a government acts in an underinclusive manner (see Vriend at para 63, above). Generally, the Charter only applies to the latter context; where a government decides to act, by creating a law, policy or program, it must do so in a non-discriminatory way: see e.g. Schacter v Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), (Charter applied to a challenge to the parental leave provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 48, ss. 30); Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), (Charter applied to the legislative schemes governing the delivery of health care services in the province); and Chaoulli v Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35 (CanLII) (Chief Justice McLachlin and Major J., concurring, observing, "The Charter does not confer a freestanding constitutional right to health care. However, where the government puts in place a scheme to provide health care, that scheme must comply with the Charter" (para 104)). This principle is consistent with the overarching approach to several Charter rights, including sections 15 (equality), 7 (life, liberty, and security of the person) and 2 (fundamental freedoms) of the *Charte*r which are primarily understood as preventing governments from acting in Charter-infringing ways but not imposing positive obligations on governments to take steps to promote or ensure the realization of these rights.
3. The state action/inaction framework has been subject to significant commentary and critique in the context of equality rights. See, for example, Richard Moon, "A Discrete and Insular Right to Equality: Comment on Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia" (1989) 21 Ottawa LR 563, observing at 572:

   > The distinction between state action and state inaction (or the distinction between on the one hand, the obligation of the state not to act in a way that contributes to socio-economic inequality and, on the other hand, a positive obligation on the state to correct inequality) loses significance once it is recognized that all inequality in the community can be traced to state action. As well, once the focus of review is on the systemic effects rather than on the purpose of a particular law, the distinction between private and public spheres of action underlying the state-action doctrine begins to dissolve. Although the action of the private property owner may not be subject to judicial review, the state act which gives that owner power may come under review since it can be seen as contributing to inequality in the community. Social and economic inequality which is manifested in private power and re-created by private power ultimately derives from state action.

4. Imagine a scenario where a governmental decision not to create a law, policy or program infringes Charter rights. What factors do you think inform the reluctance of Canadian courts to apply the Charter to government decisions not to act?

4 The Courts and the Common Law

In the first s.32 case heard by the Supreme Court of Canada, RWDSU v Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573, the Supreme Court found that the term "government" in s.32 did not include the judiciary. However, in the decades since Dolphin Delivery, that aspect of the ruling has been repudiated. Accordingly, the Charter will apply to court orders "where the court acts of its own motion in some matter, thus acting as part of government, or where the court is subject to the natural application of particular Charter provisions" (Halsbury's Laws of Canada, Constitutional Law (Charter of Rights), "Charter Application to Governmental Actors" II.3.(2) at HCHR-12 (2023 re-issue). That the Charter applies to courts makes good sense; otherwise it would be impossible to enforce the Charter guarantees that specifically implicate court decisions, like the rights of any person charged with an offence to "be tried within a reasonable time" and "not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause" in s.11(b) and (e) of the Charter.

Whether and how the Charter applies directly to the common law, which is fashioned by judges and not legislatures, depends on how and by who the common law is relied upon in a given case. Generally, the Charter is applicable in cases where the government relies on the common law and is not directly applicable in cases where private parties rely on the common law. This is consistent with the core animating principle of s.32 that the Charter applies only to government action. However, even where the Charter does not apply directly to an impugned act, it is still relevant because of the overarching principle that judges should "apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution" (Dolphin Delivery at para 39).

4.1 RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC)

RWDSU, Local 580, was the certified bargaining agent for employees of Purolator — an Ontario shipping company. After Purolator locked out its employees over a labour dispute, RWDSU proposed to picket a different company, Dolphin Delivery, a practice known as "secondary picketing". Dolphin Delivery argued that the secondary picketing amounted to the tort of inducing breach of contract, and on that basis secured an injunction. The core issue at the Supreme Court was "whether secondary picketing by members of a trade union in a labour dispute is a protected activity under s. 2(b) of the...Charter..." which protects freedom of expression (at para 1). The Canada Labour Code, RSC, 1985, c. L-2 was silent on the permissibility of secondary picketing, leaving the matter to be resolved by the common law. The Supreme Court therefore needed to determine whether the Charter applied to the common law in a dispute between private parties.

McIntyre J. (Dickson C.J. and Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Le Dain JJ, concurring)

...

Does the Charter apply to the Common Law?

[25] In my view, there can be no doubt that it does apply. Section 52(1) of the C*onstitution Act, 1982* provides:

> 52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.
> 52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre règle de droit.

The English text provides that "any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect". If this language is not broad enough to include the common law, it should be observed as well that the French text adds strong support to this conclusion in its employment of the words "elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de tout autre règle de droit". (Emphasis added.) To adopt a construction of s. 52(1) which would exclude from Charter application the whole body of the common law which in great part governs the rights and obligations of the individuals in society, would be wholly unrealistic and contrary to the clear language employed in s. 52(1) of the Act.

Does the Charter apply to private [action]?

[McIntyre J. reviewed the text of s.32 and the views of several commentators on the question of whether the Charter applied to private action, and agreed that it does not].

[34] It is my view that s. 32 of the Charter specifies the actors to whom the Charter will apply. They are the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government. It will apply to those branches of government whether or not their action is invoked in public or private litigation. It would seem that legislation is the only way in which a legislature may infringe a guaranteed right or freedom. Action by the executive or administrative branches of government will generally depend upon legislation, that is, statutory authority. Such action may also depend, however, on the common law, as in the case of the prerogative. To the extent that it relies on statutory authority which constitutes or results in an infringement of a guaranteed right or freedom, the Charter will apply and it will be unconstitutional. The action will also be unconstitutional to the extent that it relies for authority or justification on a rule of the common law which constitutes or creates an infringement of a Charter right or freedom. In this way the Charter will apply to the common law, whether in public or private litigation. It will apply to the common law, however, only in so far as the common law is the basis of some governmental action which, it is alleged, infringes a guaranteed right or freedom.

[35] The element of governmental intervention necessary to make the Charter applicable in an otherwise private action is difficult to define. We have concluded that the Charter applies to the common law but not between private parties. The problem here is that this is an action between private parties in which the appellant resists the common law claim of the respondent on the basis of a Charter infringement. The argument is made that the common law, which is itself subject to the Charter, creates the tort of civil conspiracy and that of inducing a breach of contract. The respondent has sued and has procured the injunction which has enjoined the picketing on the basis of the commission of these torts. The appellants say the injunction infringes their Charter right of freedom of expression under s. 2(b)...

[38]...[I]t is difficult and probably dangerous to attempt to define with narrow precision that element of governmental intervention which will suffice to permit reliance on the Charter by private litigants in private litigation...

[39] It would also seem that the Charter would apply to many forms of delegated legislation, regulations, orders in council, possibly municipal by-laws, and by-laws and regulations of other creatures of Parliament and the Legislatures. It is not suggested that this list is exhaustive. Where such exercise of, or reliance upon, governmental action is present and where one private party invokes or relies upon it to produce an infringement of the Charter rights of another, the Charter will be applicable. Where, however, private party "A" sues private party "B" relying on the common law and where no act of government is relied upon to support the action, the Charter will not apply. I should make it clear, however, that this is a distinct issue from the question whether the judiciary ought to apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution. The answer to this question must be in the affirmative. In this sense, then, the Charter is far from irrelevant to private litigants whose disputes fall to be decided at common law. But this is different from the proposition that one private party owes a constitutional duty to another, which proposition underlies the purported assertion of Charter causes of action or Charter defences between individuals.

[40] Can it be said in the case at bar that the required element of government intervention or intrusion may be found?...If in our case one could point to a statutory provision specifically outlawing secondary picketing of the nature contemplated by the appellants, the case--assuming for the moment an infringement of the Charter [and subject to s.1] -- ...the statutory provision could be struck down....

[41] In the case at bar… we have no offending statute. We have a rule of the common law which renders secondary picketing tortious and subject to injunctive restraint, on the basis that it induces a breach of contract. While, as we have found, the Charter applies to the common law, we do not have in this litigation between purely private parties any exercise of or reliance upon governmental action which would invoke the Charter. It follows then that the appeal must fail...

4.2 Further Commentary and Questions

1. The portion of Dolphin Delivery on the relevance of the Charter to the common law sparked much commentary and at least some uncertainty. See eg Peter Hogg, "The Dolphin Delivery Case: The Application of the Charter to Private Action" (1987) 51 Sask LR 273 (characterizing the Court's treatment of the question of how the Charter applies to the common law as "confusing" (279)). More recent scholarship has continued to attend to the complex legacy of Dolphin Delivery for the application of the Charter to the common law. See e.g. Joel Bakan of & Sujit Choudhry, "The Hidden Promise of Dolphin Delivery: Shields, Swords and Horizontal Application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (2025) 33:4 Constitutional Forum constitutionnel 1 at 2 (concluding, "Dolphin Delivery is...notable for providing a powerful avenue — albeit indirect, and so-far unpursued — for the Charter to have significant impact in private domains. Though the Court insisted the Charter does not apply to private actors, and nor to courts deciding private disputes, it held as well that the Charter does apply to private law....[A]s Peter Hogg observed at the time... 'Horizontality — a concept used by jurists to describe application of constitutional rights and values to private law and relations — thereby exists, at least in some form, in Canada'" (emphasis theirs, citations omitted).

2. The recent decision of Cool World Technologies Inc v Twitter Inc, 2022 ONSC 7156 (CanLII) underscores the ongoing uncertainly flowing from Dolphin Delivery and tensions about the potential implications of applying the Charter to private law. Cool World was hired to advertise a documentary film called The New Corporation: The Unfortunately Necessary Sequel, and attempted to purchase a promoted post to advertise the film on Twitter (the platform now known as "X"). Twitter rejected the request six times, citing its policies on political content, among others. Cool World argued that Charter values must inform the common law of contracts and that discriminatory trusts have been found void for public policy reasons. Using these two lines of argument, Cool World claimed that Twitter's User Agreement is governed by the common law, that it violated the Charter value of free expression, and that it was therefore void for public policy reasons. Assuming Cool World is ultimately successful in its claim, what are the potential implications for the application of the Charter?

4.3 The Charter Applies to the Common Law in Litigation involving Government Action

4.3.1 R v Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC)

Following an attack on his wife and children, Owen Swain was arrested and charged with assault and aggravated assault contrary to the relevant provisions of the Criminal Code, RSC, 1985, c. C-46. He was transferred to a mental health facility where he received psychiatric treatment and his condition improved. At trial, the Crown relied on a common law rule to raise evidence relevant to the defence of insanity at the time of the offence, despite objections by the accused. Chief Justice Lamer concluded that the impugned common law rule was a violation of the accused's right to liberty under s.7 of the Charter. He then provided the following commentary on the application of the Charter to the common law in the circumstances of the case:

> Lamer C.J. (Sopinka and Cory JJ., concurring)
> Before turning to s. 1, however, I wish to point out that because this appeal involves a Charter challenge to a common law, judge-made rule, the Charter analysis involves somewhat different considerations than would apply to a challenge to a legislative provision. For example, having found that the existing common law rule limits an accused's rights under s.7 of the Charter, it may not be strictly necessary to go on to consider the application of s. 1. Having come to the conclusion that the common law rule…limits an accused's right to liberty in a manner which does not accord with the principles of fundamental justice, it could, in my view, be appropriate to consider at this stage whether an alternative common law rule could be fashioned which would not be contrary to the principles of fundamental justice.
> If a new common law rule could be enunciated which would not interfere with an accused person's right to have control over the conduct of his or her defence, I can see no conceptual problem with the Court's simply enunciating such a rule to take the place of the old rule, without considering whether the old rule could nonetheless be upheld under s.1 of the Charter. Given that the common law rule was fashioned by judges and not by Parliament or a legislature, judicial deference to elected bodies is not an issue. If it is possible to reformulate a common law rule so that it will not conflict with the principles of fundamental justice, such a reformulation should be undertaken. Of course, if it were not possible to reformulate the common law rule so as to avoid an infringement of a constitutionally protected right or freedom, it would be necessary for the Court to consider whether the common law rule could be upheld as a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. As was noted at the outset of this analysis, this Court has stated that a limit "prescribed by law" within the meaning of s. 1 may arise from the application of a common law rule as well as from a statute or regulation. Thus, I do not wish to be taken as having held that s. 1 can never have application when a common law rule is challenged under the Charter.
> In a sense, this stage of the analysis is similar to that which would arise if the challenge to the common law rule had not been brought under the Charter. Had the parties chosen to approach this issue from the standpoint that the common law rule was simply contrary to basic principles of criminal law, the Court would have been in the position of considering whether the rule could be reformulated so as to remove any inconsistency with basic criminal law principles (principles of fundamental justice), while still obtaining the original objectives. In other words, it is not strictly necessary to invoke s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 in order to challenge a common law, judge-made rule on the basis of the rights and values guaranteed by the Charter -- if a common law rule can be reformulated so as to attain its objectives while removing any inconsistency with basic principles, a judge is entitled to undertake such a reformulation and is not obliged to seek jurisdiction for this action under s. 52(1).

4.3.1.1 Further Commentary and Questions

1. Other cases where the Charter has applied to government reliance on the common law include B.C.G.E.U. v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), (Charter applied to a temporary injunction restraining picketing a courthouse issued by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia on his own motion); and Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), (Charter applied to common law rules on publication bans).

4.4 Relevance of the Charter to the Common Law in Purely Private Litigation

4.4.1 Hill v Church of Scientology of Toronto, 1995 CanLII 59 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 1130

Crown attorney Casey Hill commenced an action in defamation against Morris Manning, a lawyer representing the Church of Scientology, in relation to public comments made by Manning that alleged several professional wrongs by Hill, including that he had misled a judge and breached orders sealing certain documents. A jury awarded Hill damages. A key issue at the Supreme Court was the relevance of the Charter to the common law of defamation in a case involving purely private action.

> Cory J. (La Forest, Gonthier, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Major JJ., concurring)
> (A) Application of the Charter
> [65]…The question…is whether the common law of defamation can be subject to Charter scrutiny. The appellants submit that by reason of his position as a government employee, Casey Hill's action for damages constitutes "government action" within the meaning of s.32 of the Charter. In the alternative, the appellants submit that, pursuant to s.52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the common law must be interpreted in light of Charter values. I will address the s. 32 argument first.
> (1) Section 32: Government Action
> [The Court reviewed the text of s.32 and the conclusion in Dolphin Delivery that the Charter is applicable to the common law "only in so far as the common law is the basis of some governmental action which, it is alleged, infringes a guaranteed right or freedom."]
> [70] The appellants argue that at all material times Casey Hill was an agent of the Crown, acting on behalf of the Attorney General of Ontario, and that the defamatory statements which are the subject of the present action were made in relation to acts undertaken by him in that capacity. They further submit that Casey Hill commenced these legal proceedings at the direction and with the financial support of the Attorney General in order to vindicate the damage to the reputation of the Ministry resulting from criticism levelled at the conduct of one of its officials. It is, therefore, contended that this action represents an effort by a government department to use the action of defamation to restrict and infringe the freedom of expression of the appellants in a manner that is contrary to the Charter.

[71] These submissions cannot be accepted…Casey Hill's constitutional status for the purpose of the application of the Charter should not be determined by the nature of the allegations made against him. Rather, the determination of whether state involvement existed is dependent upon the circumstances surrounding the institution of the libel proceedings.

[72] The fact that persons are employed by the government does not mean that their reputation is automatically divided into two parts, one related to their personal life and the other to their employment status. To accept the appellants' position would mean that identical defamatory comments would be subject to two different laws, one applicable to government employees, the other to the rest of society. Government employment cannot be a basis for such a distinction. Reputation is an integral and fundamentally important aspect of every individual. It exists for everyone quite apart from employment.

[73] In order to establish the requisite government action for Charter scrutiny, the appellants argue that it is easy to distinguish between a janitor working in a government building who is simply an employee and a Crown Attorney who is an agent of the state. It is said that when a person who is clearly an agent of the state acts, he or she is acting for or on behalf of the state. I cannot accept this proposition. There are a significant number of public servants who represent the Crown in any number of ways. While it might be easy to differentiate between the extreme examples set forth by the appellants, the grey area between those extremes is too extensive and the functions of the officials too varied to draw any effective line of distinction…

[74] There is no doubt that Crown Attorneys exercise statutory powers as agents of the government…Therefore, as McIntyre J. pointed out in Nelles v. Ontario, 1989 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 170, at p. 209, they benefit from the protection of any immunity which attaches to their office. However, they may become personally liable when they exceed their statutory powers. By extension, actions taken by Crown Attorneys which are outside the scope of their statutory duties are independent of and distinct from their status as agents for the government. Such was the case here.

[75] The appellants impugned the character, competence and integrity of Casey Hill, himself, and not that of the government. He, in turn, responded by instituting legal proceedings in his own capacity. There was no evidence that the Ministry of the Attorney General or the Government of Ontario required or even requested him to do so. Neither is there any indication that the Ministry controlled the conduct of the litigation in any way…Further, the fact that Casey Hill's suit may have been funded by the Ministry of the Attorney General does not alter his constitutional status or cloak his personal action in the mantle of government action. See McKinney, supra, at p. 269.

[76] The private nature of these proceedings is apparent, as well, from the respondent's statement of claim, and particularly from the allegation contained in para. 19 that the defamatory statements:

> . . . constituting as they do statements of the most serious professional misconduct by the Plaintiff, have damaged his professional reputation and brought him into public scandal, odium and contempt, by reason of which the Plaintiff has suffered damage.

[79] In my opinion, the appellants have not satisfied the government action requirement described in s. 32. Therefore, the Charter cannot be applied directly to scrutinize the common law of defamation in the circumstances of this case.

(2) Section 52: Charter Values and the Common Law

(a) Interpreting the Common Law in Light of the Values Underlying the Charter

(i) Review of the Decisions Dealing With the Issue

[83] This Court first considered the application of the Charter to the common law in Dolphin Delivery, supra. In that case, the issue was whether an injunction to restrain secondary picketing violated the Charter freedom of expression. It was held that, pursuant to s. 32(1) of the Charter, a cause of action could only be based upon the Charter when particular government action was impugned. Therefore, the constitutionality of the common law could be scrutinized in those situations where a case involved government action which was authorized or justified on the basis of a common law rule which allegedly infringed a Charter right. However, Dolphin Delivery, supra, also held that the common law could be subjected to Charter scrutiny in the absence of government action. McIntyre J. wrote, at pp. 592-93, that, in light of s.52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 , "there can be no doubt" that the Charter applies to the common law…

In emphasizing that the common law should develop in a manner consistent with Charter principles, a distinction was drawn between private litigants founding a cause of action on the Charter and judges exercising their inherent jurisdiction to develop the common law…

[84] Since 1986…Dolphin Delivery, supra, remains the only case which has closely examined the application of the Charter in the context of purely private litigation…

[90] [I]t remains to be determined what approach should be followed when, in the context of private litigation with no government action involved, a common law rule is alleged to be inconsistent with the Charter.

(ii) Approach That Should Be Followed

[91] It is clear from Dolphin Delivery, supra, that the common law must be interpreted in a manner which is consistent with Charter principles. This obligation is simply a manifestation of the inherent jurisdiction of the courts to modify or extend the common law in order to comply with prevailing social conditions and values…

[92] Historically, the common law evolved as a result of the courts making those incremental changes which were necessary in order to make the law comply with current societal values. The Charter represents a restatement of the fundamental values which guide and shape our democratic society and our legal system. It follows that it is appropriate for the courts to make such incremental revisions to the common law as may be necessary to have it comply with the values enunciated in the Charter.

[93] When determining how the Charter applies to the common law, it is important to distinguish between those cases in which the constitutionality of government action is challenged, and those in which there is no government action involved. It is important not to import into private litigation the analysis which applies in cases involving government action.

[94] In Dolphin Delivery, supra, it was noted that the Charter sets out those specific constitutional duties which the state owes to its citizens. When government action is challenged, whether it is based on legislation or the common law, the cause of action is founded upon a Charter right. The claimant alleges that the state has breached its constitutional duty. The state, in turn, must justify that breach. While > criminal cases present the prime example of government action, challenges to government action can also arise in civil cases. The state's obligation to uphold its constitutional duties is no less pressing in the civil sphere than in the criminal…

> [95] Private parties owe each other no constitutional duties and cannot found their cause of action upon a Charter right. The party challenging the common law cannot allege that the common law violates a Charter right because, quite simply, Charter rights do not exist in the absence of state action. The most that the private litigant can do is argue that the common law is inconsistent with Charter values. It is very important to draw this distinction between Charter rights and Charter values. Care must be taken not to expand the application of the Charter beyond that established by s. 32(1), either by creating new causes of action, or by subjecting all court orders to Charter scrutiny. Therefore, in the context of civil litigation involving only private parties, the Charter will "apply" to the common law only to the extent that the common law is found to be inconsistent with Charter values.
> [96] Courts have traditionally been cautious regarding the extent to which they will amend the common law. Similarly, they must not go further than is necessary when taking Charter values into account. Far-reaching changes to the common law must be left to the legislature.
> [97] When the common law is in conflict with Charter values, how should the competing principles be balanced?...[T]he balancing must be more flexible than the traditional s. 1 analysis undertaken in cases involving governmental action cases. Charter values, framed in general terms, should be weighed against the principles which underlie the common law. The Charter values will then provide the guidelines for any modification to the common law which the court feels is necessary.
> [98] Finally, the division of onus which normally operates in a Charter challenge to government action should not be applicable in a private litigation Charter "challenge" to the common law. This is not a situation in which one party must prove a prima facie violation of a right while the other bears the onus of defending it. Rather, the party who is alleging that the common law is inconsistent with the Charter should bear the onus of proving both that the common law fails to comply with Charter values and that, when these values are balanced, the common law should be modified. In the ordinary situation, where government action is said to violate a Charter right, it is appropriate that the government undertake the justification for the impugned statute or common law rule. However, the situation is very different where two private parties are involved in a civil suit. One party will have brought the action on the basis of the prevailing common law which may have a long history of acceptance in the community. That party should be able to rely upon that law and should not be placed in the position of having to defend it. It is up to the party challenging the common law to bear the burden of proving not only that the common law is inconsistent with Charter values but also that its provisions cannot be justified.

4.4.2 Further Commentary and Questions

1. The Supreme Court has repeatedly underscored the importance of "Charter values" in the context of administrative decision-making. See eg Doré v Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12 (CanLII) (Justice Abella explaining that in order to comply with their obligation to act consistently with Charter values, "administrative decision-makers exercising statutory discretion must balance "the Charter values with the statutory objectives" in a given case (at para 55)).
2. The distinction between Charter rights and Charter values can be difficult to capture with precision. In Loyola High School v Quebec (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 12 (CanLII), Abella J (at para 36) explained "...Charter values — those values that underpin each right and give it meaning — help determine the extent of any given infringement in the particular administrative context and, correlatively, when limitations on that right are proportionate in light of the applicable statutory objectives". See also Commission scolaire francophone des Territoires du Nord-Ouest v Northwest Territories (Education, Culture and Employment), 2023 SCC 31 (CanLII). For commentary and critique on the judicial approach to Charter values in the administrative law context see e.g. Lorne Sossin & Mark Friedman, "Charter Values and Administrative Justice" (2014) 67 SCLR (2d) 391 (concluding at 408, "where Charter values come from and how they are related to, but distinct from, Charter rights remains at an embryonic stage"); Paul Daly, "The Doré Duty: Fundamental Rights in Public Administration" (2023) 101 Canadian Bar Review 297; and Matthew Horner, "Charter Values: The Uncanny Valley of Canadian Constitutionalism" (2014) 67 SCLR (2d) 361.
3. What does it mean for administrative decision-makers to render decisions "in accordance with Charter values?" What sources should decision-makers draw on when determining which Charter values apply in a particular case?

Chapter 19: S. 2(a): Freedom of Conscience and Religion

By Howard Kislowicz

1 Introduction

Freedom of conscience and religion is the first "fundamental freedom" protected by the Canadian Charter. Other constitutions and international human rights documents give similar pride of place to the protection of religious and conscientiously held beliefs and practices. Canada's history of protecting some form of religious freedom can be traced back to the 18th Century, when the Quebec Act of 1774 gave protections for Catholics in Lower Canada as citizens of the former French colony became incorporated into the British colony. In the 1950s, Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) justices used constitutional protections of federalism and the theory of the "implied bill of rights" to protect religious freedom, and the 1960 Canadian Bill of Rights also protected freedom of conscience and religion in the federal sphere (see Chapter 13: Charter Antecedents). With the entrenchment of s 2(a) of the Charter, however, courts became more assured in their invalidation of legislation and government action that interfered unjustifiably with religious freedom.

All this said, the relationship between religion and state in Canada is complicated. For many years, Indigenous spirituality was prohibited by legislation. Many religious minorities have, over the years, experienced discrimination at the hands of the state. And the Canadian state has never been fully separated from religious interests. Early colonization by both the British and the French was marked by close relationships between the church and the monarchy (Protestant for the British, Catholic for the French). This led to land grants to the respective churches in what was then Upper and Lower Canada, some of which endure. Another part of this legacy is s. 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which constitutionally mandates certain funding for Protestant and Catholic schools (though the picture is different across the provinces, depending on what funding existed at the time each province joined the federation, and the obligation has been amended away with respect to Quebec and Newfoundland).

The SCC has generally thought of s 2(a) as having two broad purposes. The first is ensuring that individuals and communities are free to hold diverse religious and conscientious beliefs and engage in diverse religious practices without penalty from the state. This is what Americans call the "free exercise" of religion. There are some potentially challenging questions related to whether something counts as an "exercise" of religion. For example: does all religiously-inspired behaviour count? What do we mean by "conscientious" beliefs and practices?

Can corporations, religious or otherwise, make claims under s 2(a) of the Charter? This said, most of the cases in this area tend to be resolved under s 1 of the Charter or under the associated rubric of proportionality in the administrative law context. Examples of this kind of case are in Part 2 of this chapter.

The second main purpose of s 2(a) is what is referred to in the case law as the state's duty of religious neutrality. Examples of this kind of case are found in Part 3 of this chapter. This aspect of the case law says that s 2(a) prohibits the state from adopting the perspective of a particular faith. Prof. Richard Moon has argued that the reasoning in these cases reflects a concern about inclusion of religious minorities in the civic community, the idea that no one should be excluded from participation in democratic society based on their religion. In his view, this imports an equality-based rationale into the interpretation of s 2(a), that sits alongside the liberty-based rationale that underlies the response to cases about interference with religious practice (though Moon has also argued that the Courts have not been demanding under s 1 when the state has a valid reason for restricting religious practice). One might also say that these two ways of thinking about the purposes of s 2(a) reflect different ways of thinking about how and why religion matters to individuals and communities. The liberty-based approach might be said to treat religion as important because it's a special kind of choice that individuals make; the equality-based approach treats religion as important because of its connection to individual and communal identity. In other words, these approaches see religious alternatively as something people choose or as something people are. The distinction between the approaches, however, is not always easy to draw in in the case law.

1.1 Guiding questions

As you read the excerpts in this section, consider the following questions:

1. Most (if not all) human rights protecting constitutions and documents protect some form of religious freedom. Why is this so? Should it be so?
2. How does the protection of religious and conscientious freedom fit into the scheme of the Charter's protections? How is it relevant in contemporary Canada? How might it be relevant in the next 20 years? How has the guarantee drawn the SCC into political and cultural debates, and is it maintaining an appropriate role in this regard?
3. Does protecting religious freedom require exemptions from generally applicable laws?
4. Most of the focus of the 2(a) case-law has been on religious freedom rather than conscientious freedom. How are these concepts similar? How are they different? Why is there so much more attention to religion than conscience in Canadian law?
5. What are the implications of the Court's approach to the "shifting purpose" argument offered in respect of the Lord's Day Act in Big M?
6. Justice Dickson writes that there is a kind of equality inherent in s. 2(a) (at para 94). What do you make of this? Is he conflating two distinct concepts?
7. The Charter's preamble provides that "Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law." How does this square with principles of state religious neutrality?

1.2 R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295

The judgment of Dickson, Beetz, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ. was delivered by

1. DICKSON J.--Big M Drug Mart Ltd. was charged with unlawfully carrying on the sale of goods, on Sunday, May 30, 1982 in the City of Calgary, Alberta, contrary to the Lord's Day Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-13.

2. Big M has challenged the constitutionality of the Lord's Day Act, both in terms of the division of powers and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Such challenge places in issue before this Court, for the first time, one of the fundamental freedoms protected by the Charter, the guarantee of "freedom of conscience and religion" entrenched in s. 2.

A. The Lord's Day Act

5. An understanding of the scheme of that Act and its basic purpose and effect is integral to any analysis of its constitutional validity. Section 2 defines, inter alia, the Lord's Day:

2. ...

"Lord's Day" means the period of time that begins at midnight on Saturday night and ends at midnight on the following night;

...

Section 4 contains the basic prohibition against any work or commercial activity upon the Lord's Day:

4. It is not lawful for any person on the Lord's Day, except as provided herein, or in any provincial Act or law in force on or after the 1st day of March 1907, to sell or offer for sale or purchase any goods, chattels, or other personal property, or any real estate, or to carry on or transact any business of his ordinary calling, or in connection with such calling, or for gain to do, or employ any other person to do, on that day, any work, business, or labour.

6. It is important to note that any person may be exempted from the operation of ss. 4, 6, and 7 by provincial legislation or municipal Charter. The following exemptions are also contained in the legislation: s. 3--the railways may be operated for passenger traffic; s. 11 --any person may do any work of necessity or mercy which covers a broad range of activities listed in subss. (a) to (x).

7. The Act makes it an offence punishable on summary conviction for: any person to violate the Act (s. 12); any employer to direct any violation of the Act (s. 13); any corporation to authorize, direct or permit any violation of the Act (s. 14).

8. Section 16 requires the Attorney General's fiat before any prosecution may be commenced for a violation of the Act. The Attorney General of Alberta granted his fiat before commencement of proceedings against Big M.

B. The Charter

9. Section 2 of the Charter contains the basic guarantee of religious freedom:

> 2. Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion ... .

10. Various provisions of the Charter must also be considered when analyzing the nature of the guarantee contained in s. 2. The preamble states:

> Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law....

11. Section 27 makes the multicultural heritage of Canada an interpretive guideline for the Charter:

27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Standing and Jurisdiction

33. As a preliminary issue the Attorney General for Alberta challenges the standing of Big M to raise the question of a possible infringement of the guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion and the jurisdiction of the Provincial Court to declare the Lord's Day Act inoperative.

34. As best I understand the first submission, the assertion is that Big M is not entitled to any relief pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter. It is urged that freedom of religion is a personal freedom and that a corporation, being a statutory creation, cannot be said to have a conscience or hold a religious belief. It cannot, therefore, be protected by s. 2(a) of the Charter, nor can its rights and freedoms have been infringed or denied under s. 24(1); Big M's application under that section must consequently fail.

37. Section 24(1) sets out a remedy for individuals (whether real persons or artificial ones such as corporations) whose rights under the Charter have been infringed. It is not, however, the only recourse in the face of unconstitutional legislation. Where, as here, the challenge is based on the unconstitutionality of the legislation, recourse to s. 24 is unnecessary and the particular effect on the challenging party is irrelevant.

38. Section 52 sets out the fundamental principle of constitutional law that the Constitution is supreme. The undoubted corollary to be drawn from this principle is that no one can be convicted of an offence under an unconstitutional law. The respondent did not come to court voluntarily as an interested citizen asking for a prerogative declaration that a statute is unconstitutional. If it had been engaged in such "public interest litigation" it would have had to fulfill the status requirements laid down by this Court in the trilogy of "standing" cases … but that was not the reason for its appearance in Court.

39. Any accused, whether corporate or individual, may defend a criminal charge by arguing that the law under which the charge is brought is constitutionally invalid. Big M is urging that the law under which it has been charged is inconsistent with s. 2(a) of the Charter and by reason of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, it is of no force or effect.

41. The argument that the respondent, by reason of being a corporation, is incapable of holding religious belief and therefore incapable of claiming rights under s. 2(a) of the Charter, confuses the nature of this appeal. A law which itself infringes religious freedom is, by that reason alone, inconsistent with s. 2(a) of the Charter and it matters not whether the accused is a Christian, Jew, Muslim, Hindu, Buddhist, atheist, agnostic or whether an individual or a corporation. It is the nature of the law, not the status of the accused, that is in issue.

The Characterization of the Lord's Day Act

(A) The Problem

48. There are obviously two possible ways to characterize the purpose of Lord's Day legislation, the one religious, namely securing public observance of the Christian institution of the Sabbath and the other secular, namely providing a uniform day of rest from labour. It is undoubtedly true that both elements may be present in any given enactment, indeed it is almost inevitable that they will be, considering that such laws combine a prohibition of ordinary employment for one day out of seven with a specification that this day of rest shall be the Christian Sabbath--Sunday. In the Anglo-Canadian tradition this intertwining is to be seen as far back as early Saxon times in such laws as that promulgated by Ine, King of Wessex from 688-725…

50. Despite this inevitable intertwining, it is necessary to identify the "matter" in relation to which such legislation is enacted and thereby to decide within which of the heads of s. 91 or s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 such legislation falls.

(B) The Historic Underpinnings

51. Historically, there seems little doubt that it was religious purpose which underlay the enactment of English Lord's Day legislation. From early times the moral exhortation found in the Fourth Commandment (Exodus 20: 8-11) "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy" increasingly became a legislative imperative. The first major piece of legislation, The Sunday Fairs Act, 27 Hen. 6, c. 5, prefaced its prohibition of fairs and markets on Sunday with a recital of "abomenable injuries and offences done to Almighty God and to his Saints" because of bodily labour, deceitful bargaining, drunkenness and religious non-observance associated with fairs. Following the Reformation under Henry VIII, religious observance acquired an added political significance and a number of statutes aimed at securing religious conformity were promulgated, including the Act of Uniformity, 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 1, the Act for the Keeping of Holy Days and Fasting-Days, 5 & 6 Edw. 6, c. 3, and the Act of Uniformity, 1 Eliz. 1, c. 2. All these Acts contained provisions making Sunday worship and observance compulsory obligations, as did the later Act Against Sectaries, 35 Eliz. 1, c. 1 and Act Against Papists, 35 Eliz. 1, c. 2, which, as their names suggest, were designed not only to enforce mandatory religious observance as provided for by the Church of England, but also to prohibit religious observance as practised by other Christian denominations.

53. The Sunday Observance Act of 1677 served as a model for Canadian pre-Confederation legislation, especially An Act to prevent the Profanation of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, in Upper Canada, 1845 (Can.), c. 45, which substantially re-enacted the English law with only minor alterations designed to suit it to the specific conditions and activities of Upper Canada. It was this statute, as re-enacted by the post-Confederation legislature of Ontario (R.S.O. 1897, c. 246), that the Privy Council found to be beyond the competence of the province to enact in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Hamilton Street Railway Co., 1903 CanLII 121 (UK JCPC), [1903] A.C. 524, a decision which lay behind the passage in 1906 of the federal Lord's Day Act. Like the Ontario Act, the federal Act embodied the basic framework and much of the language of the English Sunday Observance Act of 1677. After four consolidations, it still exhibits these same essential characteristics in its present form.

VI

Purpose and Effect of Legislation

78. A finding that the Lord's Day Act has a secular purpose is, on the authorities, simply not possible. Its religious purpose, in compelling sabbatical observance, has been long-established and consistently maintained by the courts of this country.

79. The Attorney General for Alberta concedes that the Act is characterized by this religious purpose. He contends, however, that it is not the purpose but the effects of the Act which are relevant…

80. I cannot agree. In my view, both purpose and effect are relevant in determining constitutionality; either an unconstitutional purpose or an unconstitutional effect can invalidate legislation. All legislation is animated by an object the legislature intends to achieve. This object is realized through the impact produced by the operation and application of the legislation. Purpose and effect respectively, in the sense of the legislation's object and its ultimate impact, are clearly linked, if not indivisible. Intended and actual effects have often been looked to for guidance in assessing the legislation's object and thus, its validity.

81. Moreover, consideration of the object of legislation is vital if rights are to be fully protected. The assessment by the courts of legislative purpose focuses scrutiny upon the aims and objectives of the legislature and ensures they are consonant with the guarantees enshrined in the Charter. The declaration that certain objects lie outside the legislature's power checks governmental action at the first stage of unconstitutional conduct. Further, it will provide more ready and more vigorous protection of constitutional rights by obviating the individual litigant's need to prove effects violative of Charter rights. It will also allow courts to dispose of cases where the object is clearly improper, without inquiring into the legislation's actual impact.

85. If the acknowledged purpose of the Lord's Day Act, namely, the compulsion of sabbatical observance, offends freedom of religion, it is then unnecessary to consider the actual impact of Sunday closing upon religious freedom. Even if such effects were found inoffensive, as the Attorney General of Alberta urges, this could not save legislation whose purpose has been found to violate the Charter's guarantees. In any event, I would find it difficult to conceive of legislation with an unconstitutional purpose, where the effects would not also be unconstitutional.

88. In short, I agree with the respondent that the legislation's purpose is the initial test of constitutional validity and its effects are to be considered when the law under review has passed or, at least, has purportedly passed the purpose test. If the legislation fails the purpose test, there is no need to consider further its effects, since it has already been demonstrated to be invalid. Thus, if a law with a valid purpose interferes by its impact, with rights or freedoms, a litigant could still argue the effects of the legislation as a means to defeat its applicability and possibly its validity. In short, the effects test will only be necessary to defeat legislation with a valid purpose; effects can never be relied upon to save legislation with an invalid purpose.

89. A second related submission is made by the Attorney General of Saskatchewan with respect to the characterization of the Lord's Day Act. Both Stevenson, Prov. Ct. J., at trial, and the American Supreme Court, in its quartet on Sunday observance legislation, suggest that the purpose of legislation may shift, or be transformed over time by changing social conditions… A number of objections can be advanced to this "shifting purpose" argument.

90. First, there are the practical difficulties. No legislation would be safe from a revised judicial assessment of purpose. Laws assumed valid on the basis of persuasive and powerful authority could, at any time, be struck down as invalid. Not only would this create uncertainty in the law, but it would encourage re-litigation of the same issues and, it could be argued, provide the courts with a means by which to arrive at a result dictated by other than legal considerations. It could effectively end the doctrine of stare decisis in division of power cases.

91. Furthermore, the theory of a shifting purpose stands in stark contrast to fundamental notions developed in our law concerning the nature of "Parliamentary intention". Purpose is a function of the intent of those who drafted and enacted the legislation at the time, and not of any shifting variable.

93. While the effect of such legislation as the Lord's Day Act may be more secular today than it was in 1677 or in 1906, such a finding cannot justify a conclusion that its purpose has similarly changed. In result, therefore, the Lord's Day Act must be characterized as it has always been, a law the primary purpose of which is the compulsion of sabbatical observance.

VII

Freedom of Religion

94. A truly free society is one which can accommodate a wide variety of beliefs, diversity of tastes and pursuits, customs and codes of conduct. A free society is one which aims at equality with respect to the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms and I say this without any reliance upon s. 15 of the Charter. Freedom must surely be founded in respect for the inherent dignity and the inviolable rights of the human person. The essence of the concept of freedom of religion is the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest religious belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. But the concept means more than that.

95. Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the state or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or restraint. Coercion includes not only such blatant forms of compulsion as direct commands to act or refrain from acting on pain of sanction, coercion includes indirect forms of control which determine or limit alternative courses of conduct available to others. Freedom in a broad sense embraces both the absence of coercion and constraint, and the right to manifest beliefs and practices. Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience.

96. What may appear good and true to a majoritarian religious group, or to the state acting at their behest, may not, for religious reasons, be imposed upon citizens who take a contrary view. The Charter safeguards religious minorities from the threat of "the tyranny of the majority".

97. To the extent that it binds all to a sectarian Christian ideal, the Lord's Day Act works a form of coercion inimical to the spirit of the Charter and the dignity of all non-Christians. In proclaiming the standards of the Christian faith, the Act creates a climate hostile to, and gives the appearance of discrimination against, non-Christian Canadians. It takes religious values rooted in Christian morality and, using the force of the state, translates them into a positive law binding on believers and non-believers alike. The theological content of the legislation remains as a subtle and constant reminder to religious minorities within the country of their differences with, and alienation from, the dominant religious culture.

98. Non-Christians are prohibited for religious reasons from carrying out activities which are otherwise lawful, moral and normal. The arm of the state requires all to remember the Lord's day of the Christians and to keep it holy. The protection of one religion and the concomitant non-protection of others imports disparate impact destructive of the religious freedom of the collectivity.

99. I agree with the submission of the respondent that to accept that Parliament retains the right to compel universal observance of the day of rest preferred by one religion is not consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. To do so is contrary to the expressed provisions of s. 27, which as earlier noted reads:

> 27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

100. If I am a Jew or a Sabbatarian or a Muslim, the practice of my religion at least implies my right to work on a Sunday if I wish. It seems to me that any law purely religious in purpose, which denies me that right, must surely infringe my religious freedom.

(iii) The Purpose of Protecting Freedom of Conscience and Religion

118. With regard to freedom of conscience and religion, the historical context is clear. As they are relevant to the Charter, the origins of the demand for such freedom are to be found in the religious struggles in post-Reformation Europe. The spread of new beliefs, the changing religious allegiance of kings and princes, the shifting military fortunes of their armies and the consequent repeated redrawing of national and imperial frontiers led to situations in which large numbers of people--sometimes even the majority in a given territory--found themselves living under rulers who professed faiths different from, and often hostile to, their own and subject to laws aimed at enforcing conformity to religious beliefs and practices they did not share.

120. Beginning, however, with the Independent faction within the Parliamentary party during the Commonwealth or Interregnum, many, even among those who shared the basic beliefs of the ascendent religion, came to voice opposition to the use of the State's coercive power to secure obedience to religious precepts and to extirpate non-conforming beliefs. The basis of this opposition was no longer simply a conviction that the State was enforcing the wrong set of beliefs and practices but rather the perception that belief itself was not amenable to compulsion. Attempts to compel belief or practice denied the reality of individual conscience and dishonoured the God that had planted it in His creatures. It is from these antecedents that the concepts of freedom of religion and freedom of conscience became associated, to form, as they do in s. 2(a) of our Charter, the single integrated concept of "freedom of conscience and religion".

121. What unites enunciated freedoms in the American First Amendment, s. 2(a) of the Charter and in the provisions of other human rights documents in which they are associated is the notion of the centrality of individual conscience and the inappropriateness of governmental intervention to compel or to constrain its manifestation. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra, the purpose of the Charter was identified, at p. 155, as "the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties". It is easy to see the relationship between respect for individual conscience and the valuation of human dignity that motivates such unremitting protection.

122. It should also be noted, however, that an emphasis on individual conscience and individual judgment also lies at the heart of our democratic political tradition. The ability of each citizen to make free and informed decisions is the absolute prerequisite for the legitimacy, acceptability, and efficacy of our system of self-government. It is because of the centrality of the rights associated with freedom of individual conscience both to basic beliefs about human worth and dignity and to a free and democractic political system that American jurisprudence has emphasized the primacy or "firstness" of the First Amendment. It is this same centrality that in my view underlies their designation in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as "fundamental". They are the sine qua non of the political tradition underlying the Charter.

123. Viewed in this context, the purpose of freedom of conscience and religion becomes clear. The values that underlie our political and philosophic traditions demand that every individual be free to hold and to manifest whatever beliefs and opinions his or her conscience dictates, provided inter alia only that such manifestations do not injure his or her neighbours or their parallel rights to hold and manifest beliefs and opinions of their own. Religious belief and practice are historically prototypical and, in many ways, paradigmatic of conscientiously-held beliefs and manifestations and are therefore protected by the Charter. Equally protected, and for the same reasons, are expressions and manifestations of religious non-belief and refusals to participate in religious practice. It may perhaps be that freedom of conscience and religion extends beyond these principles to prohibit other sorts of governmental involvement in matters having to do with religion. For the present case, it is sufficient in my opinion to say that whatever else freedom of conscience and religion may mean, it must at the very least mean this: government may not coerce individuals to affirm a specific religious belief or to manifest a specific religious practice for a sectarian purpose. I leave to another case the degree, if any, to which the government may, to achieve a vital interest or objective, engage in coercive action which s. 2(a) might otherwise prohibit.

128. With the entrenchment of the Charter the definition of freedom of conscience and religion is no longer vulnerable to legislative incursion. I conclude therefore that a definition of freedom of conscience and religion incorporating freedom from compulsory religious observance is not only in accord with the purposes and traditions underlying the Charter; it is also in line with the definition of that concept as found in the Canadian jurisprudence.

133. In my view, the guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion prevents the government from compelling individuals to perform or abstain from performing otherwise harmless acts because of the religious significance of those acts to others. The element of religious compulsion is perhaps somewhat more difficult to perceive (especially for those whose beliefs are being enforced) when, as here, it is non-action rather than action that is being decreed, but in my view compulsion is nevertheless what it amounts to.

135. In an earlier time, when people believed in the collective responsibility of the community toward some deity, the enforcement of religious conformity may have been a legitimate object of government, but since the Charter, it is no longer legitimate. With the Charter, it has become the right of every Canadian to work out for himself or herself what his or her religious obligations, if any, should be and it is not for the state to dictate otherwise. The state shall not use the criminal sanctions at its disposal to achieve a religious purpose, namely, the uniform observance of the day chosen by the Christian religion as its day of rest.

136. On the authorities and for the reasons outlined, the true purpose of the Lord's Day Act is to compel the observance of the Christian Sabbath and I find the Act, and especially s. 4 thereof, infringes upon the freedom conscience and religion guaranteed in s. 2(a) of the Charter...

VIII

Section 1 of the Charter

137. Is the Lord's Day Act, and especially s. 4 thereof, justified on the basis of s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms? That is the second question posed.

140. Two reasons have been advanced to justify the legislation here in issue as a reasonable limit. It can be urged that the choice of the day of rest adhered to by the Christian majority is the most practical. This submission is really no more than an argument of convenience and expediency and is fundamentally repugnant because it would justify the law upon the very basis upon which it is attacked for violating s. 2(a).

141. The other more plausible argument is that everyone accepts the need and value of a universal day of rest from all work, business and labour and it may as well be the day traditionally observed in our society. I accept the secular justification for a day of rest in a Canadian context and the reasonableness of a day of rest has been clearly enunciated by the courts in the United States of America. The first and fatal difficulty with this argument is, as I have said, that it asserts an objective which has never been found by this Court to be the motivation for the legislation. It seems disingenuous to say that the legislation is valid criminal law and offends s. 2(a) because it compels the observance of a Christian religious duty, yet is still a reasonable limit demonstrably justifiable because it achieves the secular objective the legislators did not primarily intend. The appellant can no more assert under s. 1 a secular objective to validate legislation which in pith and substance involves a religious matter than it could assert a secular objective as the basis for the argument that the legislation does not offend s. 2(a). While there is no authority on this point, it seems clear that Parliament cannot rely upon an ultra vires purpose under s. 1 of the Charter. This use of s. 1 would invite colourability, allowing Parliament to do indirectly what it could not do directly.

142. The characterization of the purpose of the Act as one which compels religious observance renders it unnecessary to decide the question of whether s. 1 could validate such legislation whose purpose was otherwise or whether the evidence would be sufficient to discharge the onus upon the appellant to demonstrate the justification advanced.

Conclusion

150. In my view the majority in the Alberta Court of Appeal was correct in its disposition of the issues in this appeal. The Lord's Day Act is enacted pursuant to the criminal law power under s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. In providing for the compulsory observance of the religious institution of the Sabbath (Sunday), the Act and especially s. 4 thereof does infringe on the guarantee of freedom of conscience and religion in s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and this infringement cannot be justified on the basis of s. 1 of the Charter. I would declare the Lord's Day Act to be of no force or effect, by reason of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

1.3 R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713

A different Sunday closing law was upheld in R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713. The province of Ontario required most retailers to close on Sundays, but there were significant differences that grounded this result: the scope of the exemptions to the law was wider, and the evidence was that the law had a secular purpose. This purpose was to create a "common pause day" or "uniform holiday" for employees, whose schedule is generally set by their employers. Here are some key passages from that decision:

> 58. It is beyond doubt that days such as Sundays, Christmas and Easter were celebrated as holidays in Canada historically for religious reasons. The celebration of these holidays has continued to the present partly because of continuing, though diminished, religious observances of the largest denominations of the Christian faith, partly because of statutory enforcement under, inter alia, the now unconstitutional Lord's Day Act, and partly because of the combined effect of social inertia and the perceived need for people to have days away from work or school in common with family, friends and other members of the community. These, in my view, are the social facts which explain the selection by individuals, businesses, school boards, and others of particular days as holidays.
> 59. It is important to keep in mind, however, that the Court is not called upon to characterize the historical origins, or even the continuing cause for the selection by individual members of the community of particular holidays. To do so would be to characterize social facts rather than characterizing the impugned law. The question in the present cases therefore cannot be reduced to a mathematical exercise of computing the number of holidays prescribed by the Act which have a religious origin. Our society is collectively powerless to repudiate its history, including the Christian heritage of the majority…
> 62. I agree with Tarnopolsky J.A. that the Retail Business Holidays Act was enacted with the intent of providing uniform holidays to retail workers. I am unable to conclude that the Act was a surreptitious attempt to encourage religious worship. The title and text of the Act, the legislative debates and the Ontario Law Reform Commission's Report on Sunday Observance Legislation (1970), all point to the secular purposes underlying the Act.
> 95. The Court was concerned in [Big M] with a direct command, on pain of sanction, to conform to a particular religious precept. The appeals with which we are now concerned are alleged to involve two forms of coercion. First, it is argued that the Retail Business Holidays Act makes it more expensive for retailers and consumers who observe a weekly day of rest other than Sunday to practise their religious tenets. In this manner, it is said, the Act indirectly coerces these persons to forego the practice of a religious belief. Second, it is submitted that the Act has the direct effect of compelling non-believers to conform to majoritarian religious dogma, by requiring retailers to close their stores on Sunday.
> 96. The first question is whether indirect burdens on religious practice are prohibited by the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion. In my opinion indirect coercion by the state is comprehended within the evils from which s. 2(a) may afford protection. The Court said as much in the Big M Drug Mart Ltd. case and any more restrictive interpretation would, in my opinion, be inconsistent with the Court's obligation under s. 27 to preserve and enhance the multicultural heritage of Canadians. … It matters not, I believe, whether a coercive burden is direct or indirect, intentional or unintentional, foreseeable or unforeseeable. All coercive burdens on the exercise of religious beliefs are potentially within the ambit of s. 2(a).
> 97. This does not mean, however, that every burden on religious practices is offensive to the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion. It means only that indirect or unintentional burdens will not be held to be outside the scope of Charter protection on that account alone. Section 2(a) does not require the legislatures to eliminate every miniscule state-imposed cost associated with the practice of religion. Otherwise the Charter would offer protection from innocuous secular legislation such as a taxation act that imposed a modest sales tax extending to all products, including those used in the course of religious worship. In my opinion, it is unnecessary to turn to s. 1 in order to justify legislation of that sort. The purpose of s. 2(a) is to ensure that society does not interfere with profoundly personal beliefs that govern one's perception of oneself, humankind, nature, and, in some cases, a higher or different order of being. These beliefs, in turn, govern one's conduct and practices. The Constitution shelters individuals and groups only to the extent that religious beliefs or conduct might reasonably or actually be threatened. For a state-imposed cost or burden to be proscribed by s. 2(a) it must be capable of interfering with religious belief or practice. In short, legislative or administrative action which increases the cost of practising or otherwise manifesting religious beliefs is not prohibited if the burden is trivial or insubstantial: see, on this point, R. v. Jones, 1986 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 284, per Wilson J. at p. 314.
> 103. The Act has a different impact on persons with different religious beliefs. Four classes of persons might be differently affected: those not observing any religious day of rest, those observing Sundays, those observing Saturdays, and those observing some other day of the week.
> 104. (i) Non-Observers
> 106. The Act prevents non-observing retailers who cannot fit themselves within one of the statutory exemptions from doing business on Sundays. In the absence of the Act, these retailers would be able to transact business on seven days of the week, and they would have a competitive advantage in this respect relative to retailers whose religious beliefs required closing on Saturdays, Sundays, or any other day of the week….
> 107. … the effects of the Act on non-observing retailers are generally secular in nature and do not impair or abridge their freedom of conscience or religion, at least in the absence of convincing evidence that the desire to remain open is motivated by dissentient religious purposes rather than purely business considerations.
> 108. (ii) Sunday Observers

> 109. The Act has a favourable impact on Sunday observers. By requiring some other retailers to refrain from trade on a day of special religious significance to Sunday observers, the latter are relieved of a loss of market share to retailers who would have been open for business on Sunday in the absence of the Act. The cost of religious observance has been decreased for Sunday observers by the enactment of the legislation.
> 110. (iii) Saturday Observers
> 111. There is evidence in the record that it is a religious tenet of the Jewish and Seventh-day Adventist faiths not to work or transact business on Saturdays. Other faiths may also observe Saturday as a religious day of rest, but for the purposes of the present appeals it is the effects on Jews and Seventh-day Adventists that will be considered.

112. The Attorney General of Ontario submits that any disability suffered by Saturday-observing retailers is a consequence of their religious beliefs, and not of the Act. Even in the absence of the Act, devout Jews and Seventh-day Adventists would close on Saturdays. The effect of the Act is to require them and all other persons, subject to the exemptions but irrespective of religious persuasion, to close on Sundays. Consequently, it is argued, there is no nexus between the impugned law and the freedom of Saturday observers to exercise their religious beliefs…

113. In view of the characteristics of the retail industry described in the Report on Sunday Observance Legislation, I find myself unable to draw such a neat distinction between benefits accruing to Sunday-observing retailers and burdens imposed on Saturday observers. The Report refers on numerous occasions to the highly competitive nature of the retail industry, such that an increase in sales by one individual retailer occasioned by that retailer's marketing practices tends to result in significant decreases in the sales of other retailers. It follows that if the Act confers an advantage on Sunday-observing retailers relative to Saturday-observing retailers, the latter are burdened by the legislation.

114. A careful comparison of the effects of Sunday closing legislation on different religious groups clearly demonstrates the manner in which the burden flows from the legislation. In the absence of legislative intervention, the Saturday observer and the Sunday observer would be on a roughly equal footing in competing for shares of the available consumer buying power. Both might operate for a maximum of six days each week. Both would be disadvantaged relative to non-observing retailers who would have the option of a seven day week. On this account, however, they would have no complaint cognizable in law since the disability would be one flowing exclusively from their religious tenets… exemptions aside, the Retail Business Holidays Act has the effect of leaving the Saturday observer at the same natural disadvantage relative to the non-observer and adding the new, purely statutory disadvantage of being closed an extra day relative to the Sunday observer. Just as the Act makes it less costly for Sunday observers to practise their religious beliefs, it thereby makes it more expensive for some Jewish and Seventh-day Adventist retailers to practise theirs.

131. A more difficult question--and one which goes to the heart of this litigation--is whether the Retail Business Holidays Act abridges the freedom of religion of Saturday observers as little as is reasonably possible. Section 3(4) [the exemption provision, which allowed stores to open on Sundays if (a) they had been closed on Saturday, (b) they had no more than seven employees, and (c) had less than 5000 square feet of retail space,] has the effect, and was intended to have the effect, of very substantially reducing the impact of the Act on those religious groups for whom Saturday is a Sabbath. What must be decided, however, is whether there is some reasonable alternative scheme which would allow the province to achieve its objective with fewer detrimental effects on religious freedom…

138. I am impressed… with the concerns of the majority of the United States Supreme Court [in Braunfeld v. Brown] in two respects. The first relates to the balancing of an indirect burden on the religious freedom of a retail store owner against the interests of his or her perhaps sometimes numerous employees. The second relates to the undesirability of state-sponsored inquiries into religious beliefs.

139. With respect to the first concern, I agree with the majority of the United States Supreme Court that it is legitimate for legislatures to be concerned with minimizing the disruptive effect of any exemption on the scope and quality of the pause day, and that it would be highly undesirable for such concern to find expression in a rule conditioning the availability of an exemption on the hiring by retailers of co-religionists. Because of their substantial share of total sales volume … and their numerous employees, the operation of large retail outlets on Sundays would entail a substantial disruption of the quality of the pause day. It is, however, not so much the disruption of the quality of the pause day in terms of commercial activity that concerns me. What concerns me, rather, is the limitation of its scope in terms of the employees who would be denied the benefits which the Act was designed to provide them.

140. What cannot be forgotten is that the object of the legislation is to benefit retail employees by making available to them a weekly holiday which coincides with that enjoyed by most of the community. These employees do not constitute a powerful group in society….

142. I turn now to the second factor which, in my opinion, contributes to the justification of the legislation under review. In discussing the possibility of a Sabbatarian exemption as a means of reducing the burdens of Sunday closing laws on religious freedom, the majority of the United States Supreme Court had occasion to express concern about state-conducted inquiries into religious beliefs. The striking advantage of the Ontario Act is that it makes available an exemption to the small and mid-size retailer without the indignity of having to submit to such an inquiry. In my view, state-sponsored inquiries into any person's religion should be avoided wherever reasonably possible, since they expose an individual's most personal and private beliefs to public airing and testing in a judicial or quasi-judicial setting. The inquiry is all the worse when it is demanded only of members of a non-majoritarian faith, who may have good reason for reluctance about so exposing and articulating their non-conformity.

143. I do not mean to suggest that a judicial inquiry into the sincerity of religious beliefs is unconstitutional. To so hold would mean that the courts could never grant constitutional exemptions from legislation which impinged on the free exercise of religious beliefs. Judicial inquiries into religious beliefs are largely unavoidable if the constitutional freedoms guaranteed by s. 2(a) are to be asserted before the courts… There will, however, be occasions when a substantial measure of religious freedom can be achieved without mandating a state-conducted inquiry into personal religious convictions and the legislatures ought to be encouraged to do so, if a fair balance is struck.

145. In this context, I note that freedom of religion, perhaps unlike freedom of conscience, has both individual and collective aspects. Legislatures are justified in being conscious of the effects of legislation on religious groups as a whole, as well as on individuals. In some circumstances, it is open to balance the religious freedoms of the many members of any particular religious group against those of the few when differential treatment is based on a criterion, such as the size of one's retail business, which is not in itself offensive to constitutional provisions, principles, and purposes.

146. Nevertheless, while the number of detrimentally affected retailers may be small, no legislature in Canada is entitled to do away with any of the religious freedoms to which these or any other individuals are entitled without strong reason. In my view, the balancing of the interests of more than seven employees to a common pause day against the freedom of religion of those affected constitutes justification for the exemption scheme selected by the Province of Ontario, at least in a context wherein any satisfactory alternative scheme involves an inquiry into religious beliefs.

147. I might add that I do not believe there is any magic in the number seven as distinct from, say, five, ten, or fifteen employees as the cut-off point for eligibility for the exemption. In balancing the interests of retail employees to a holiday in common with their family and friends against the s. 2(a) interests of those affected the Legislature engaged in the process envisaged by s. 1 of the Charter. A "reasonable limit" is one which, having regard to the principles enunciated in Oakes, it was reasonable for the legislature to impose. The courts are not called upon to substitute judicial opinions for legislative ones as to the place at which to draw a precise line.

2 Restriction and Accommodation of Religious Practice

Often, litigation of s 2(a) takes the form of an individual seeking an exception from a generally applicable rule. The Amselem case, excerpted below, is an example of this kind of case. It was in this case that the SCC articulated the current test for the infringement of s 2(a), which has been mostly stable since then. While the case involved a claim made under Québec's Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms rather than the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the SCC explained that the test would apply in both contexts. As you will see below, the test requires a claimant to prove (a) that they have a sincere belief that a belief or practice has nexus with religion, and (b) that some state conduct has interfered with that practice in a manner that is more than trivial. The first component of this analysis is subjective (based on the claimant's viewpoint), while the second is objective.

The other cases in this section provide further examples of claims to avoid the application of a general rule. Despite being framed in the rhetoric of freedom or liberty, they also may have implications for inclusion in public institutions, as the Multani case below arguably does with respect to public schools. Perhaps because of this, the majority in Multani borrows the concept of "reasonable accommodation" from the case law applying human rights codes, and finds that a school had an obligation to accommodate a Sikh student who believed he must wear kirpan. In addition, because so much comes down to section 1 of the Charter or its administrative law analog, we may start to see some pressure to allow more leeway to governments. In the Hutterian Brethren case that follows, we see the court determining that the "reasonable accommodation" analysis, while appropriate to individualized decisions of administrative decision-makers, is not appropriate for the constitutional analysis of generally applicable laws and regulations. Further, the case arguably makes it easier for governments to justify Charter infringements at the minimal impairment stage of the Oakes analysis.

2.1 Guiding questions

1. The test for religious freedom is highly subjective. What are the costs and benefits of such an approach? What might the alternatives be?
2. The test for a religious freedom infringement is relatively easy for a claimant to satisfy – what impact might this have on this kind of litigation?

IACOBUCCI J. —

I. Introduction

1 An important feature of our constitutional democracy is respect for minorities, which includes, of course, religious minorities: see Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 79-81. Indeed, respect for and tolerance of the rights and practices of religious minorities is one of the hallmarks of an enlightened democracy. But respect for religious minorities is not a stand-alone absolute right; like other rights, freedom of religion exists in a matrix of other correspondingly important rights that attach to individuals. Respect for minority rights must also coexist alongside societal values that are central to the make-up and functioning of a free and democratic society. This appeal requires the Court to deal with the interrelationship between fundamental rights both at a conceptual level and for a practical outcome.

2 More specifically, the cases which are the subject of this appeal involve a religious claim by the appellants for the setting up of a "succah" for nine days a year in the pursuit of their religious beliefs on their co-owned property under the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12 (the "Quebec Charter"). The Quebec courts denied the claim. With respect, I disagree and would allow the appeal.

3 In particular, after defining the scope of freedom of religion and its infringement, I find that the appellants' religious freedom under the Quebec Charter has been infringed by the declaration of co-ownership. While the respondent has raised rights to enjoy property and personal security as justification for its refusal to allow a succah to be set up, I find that the impairment of the appellants' religious freedom is serious whereas I conclude that the intrusion on the respondent's rights is minimal. As such, I hold that the appellants must be permitted to set up succahs on their balconies, provided that the succahs remain only for the limited time necessary — in this case nine days —, allow for an emergency access route, and conform, as much as possible, with the general aesthetics of the property. I also find the argument that the appellants waived their religious rights cannot be maintained under the circumstances, nor did they implicitly agree not to set up succahs on their balconies by signing the declaration of co-ownership.

II. Background

4 The appellants, all Orthodox Jews, are divided co-owners of residential units in "Place Northcrest", two luxury buildings forming part of "Le Sanctuaire du Mont-Royal" (the "Sanctuaire"), a larger complex in Montréal…

5 In late September 1996, Mr. Amselem, at the time a new resident of the Sanctuaire, set up a "succah" on his balcony for the purposes of fulfilling a biblically mandated obligation during the Jewish religious festival of Succot. A succah is a small enclosed temporary hut or booth, traditionally made of wood or other materials such as fastened canvas, and open to the heavens, in which, it has been acknowledged, Jews are commanded to "dwell" temporarily during the festival of Succot, which commences annually with nightfall on the fifteenth day of the Jewish month of Tishrei. This nine-day festival, which begins in late September or early- to mid-October, commemorates the 40-year period during which, according to Jewish tradition, the Children of Israel wandered in the desert, living in temporary shelters.

6 Under the Jewish faith, in commemoration of the festival's historical connection and as a symbolic demonstration of their faith in the divine, Jews are obligated to dwell in these succahs, as their ancestors did in the desert. Orthodox Jews observe this biblically mandated commandment of "dwelling" in a succah by transforming the succah into the practitioner's primary residence for the entire holiday period. They are required to take all their meals in the succah; they customarily conduct certain religious ceremonies in the succah; they are required, weather permitting, to sleep in the succah; and they are otherwise required to generally make the succah their primary abode for the entirety of the festival period, health and weather permitting.

7 Technically, a succah must minimally consist of a three-walled, open-roofed structure which must meet certain size specifications in order to fulfill the biblical commandment of dwelling in it properly according to the requirements of the Jewish faith. While a succah is usually festively decorated interiorly, there are no aesthetic requirements as to its exterior appearance.

8 During the first two and last two days of the Succot holiday, as well as during any intermittent Saturday, Orthodox Jews are normally forbidden from inter alia turning electricity on or off and riding in cars or elevators. Similarly, during the Saturday(s) falling within the nine-day festival, Orthodox Jews are forbidden from carrying objects outside of their private domiciles in the absence of a symbolic enclosure, or eruv.

9 After Mr. Amselem put up his succah in September 1996, the syndicate of co-ownership, Syndicat Northcrest (the "respondent" or "Syndicat"), requested its removal, claiming the succah was in violation of the Sanctuaire's by-laws as stated in the declaration of co-ownership, which inter alia prohibited decorations, alterations and constructions on the Sanctuaire's balconies…

None of the appellants had read the declaration of co-ownership prior to purchasing or occupying their individual units.

11 A year later, on October 6, 1997, and pursuant to the regulations in the declaration of co-ownership, Mr. Amselem requested permission from the Syndicat to set up a succah on, and thus enclose part of, his balcony to celebrate the same holiday of Succot. The Syndicat refused, invoking the restrictions in the declaration of co-ownership.

13 In a letter dated October 10, 1997, the Syndicat proposed to allow Mr. Amselem, in conjunction with the other Orthodox Jewish residents of the building, including the appellants Mr. Fonfeder and Mr. Klein, to set up a communal succah in the Sanctuaire's gardens.

14 In their October 14, 1997 letter to the Syndicat, the appellants expressed their dissatisfaction with the respondent's proposed accommodation. They explained why a communal succah would not only cause extreme hardship with their religious observance, but would also be contrary to their personal religious beliefs which, they claimed, called for "their own succah, each on his own balcony".

15 In their letter, the appellants implored the Syndicat to accede to their request and permit their own individual succahs, which they undertook to set up "in such a way that they would not block any doors, would not obstruct fire lanes, [and] would pose no threat to safety or security in any way". The Syndicat refused their request.

16 Each of the appellants nonetheless proceeded to set up a succah on his or her balcony. Apart from Mr. Amselem and Mr. Fonfeder in September 1996, the appellants in this appeal had not set up succahs on their balconies at the Sanctuaire in prior years; in those years they had celebrated the holiday as guests with family and friends, using their hosts' succahs.

17 In response, the respondent Syndicat filed an application for permanent injunction prohibiting the appellants from setting up succahs and, if necessary, permitting their demolition. The application was granted by the Superior Court on June 5, 1998.

III. Relevant Legislative Provisions

18 Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12

1. Every human being has a right to life, and to personal security, inviolability and freedom.

He also possesses juridical personality.

3. Every person is the possessor of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, freedom of opinion, freedom of expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association.

6. Every person has a right to the peaceful enjoyment and free disposition of his property, except to the extent provided by law.

9.1. In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec.

In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law.

V. Issues

35 In my view, the key issues before us are: (1) whether the clauses in the by-laws of the declaration of co-ownership, which contained a general prohibition against decorations or constructions on one's balcony, infringe the appellants' freedom of religion protected under the Quebec Charter; (2) if so, whether the refusal by the respondent to permit the setting up of a succah is justified by its reliance on the co-owners' rights to enjoy property under s. 6 of the Quebec Charter and their rights to personal security under s. 1 thereof; and (3) whether the appellants waived their rights to freedom of religion by signing the declaration of co-ownership.

VI. Analysis

A. Freedom of Religion

37 The analysis that follows sets out the principles that are applicable in cases where an individual alleges that his or her freedom of religion is infringed under the Quebec Charter or under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. …

(1) Definition of Religious Freedom

39 In order to define religious freedom, we must first ask ourselves what we mean by "religion". While it is perhaps not possible to define religion precisely, some outer definition is useful since only beliefs, convictions and practices rooted in religion, as opposed to those that are secular, socially based or conscientiously held, are protected by the guarantee of freedom of religion. Defined broadly, religion typically involves a particular and comprehensive system of faith and worship. Religion also tends to involve the belief in a divine, superhuman or controlling power. In essence, religion is about freely and deeply held personal convictions or beliefs connected to an individual's spiritual faith and integrally linked to one's self-definition and spiritual fulfilment, the practices of which allow individuals to foster a connection with the divine or with the subject or object of that spiritual faith.

40 What then is the definition and content of an individual's protected right to religious freedom under the Quebec (or the Canadian) Charter? This Court has long articulated an expansive definition of freedom of religion, which revolves around the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom.

42 This understanding is consistent with a personal or subjective conception of freedom of religion, one that is integrally linked with an individual's self-definition and fulfilment and is a function of personal autonomy and choice, elements which undergird the right…

43 The emphasis then is on personal choice of religious beliefs. In my opinion, these decisions and commentary should not be construed to imply that freedom of religion protects only those aspects of religious belief or conduct that are objectively recognized by religious experts as being obligatory tenets or precepts of a particular religion. Consequently, claimants seeking to invoke freedom of religion should not need to prove the objective validity of their beliefs in that their beliefs are objectively recognized as valid by other members of the same religion, nor is such an inquiry appropriate for courts to make; see, e.g., Re Funk and Manitoba Labour Board (1976), 1976 CanLII 1098 (MB CA), 66 D.L.R. (3d) 35 (Man. C.A.), at pp. 37-38. In fact, this Court has indicated on several occasions that, if anything, a person must show "[s]incerity of belief" (Edwards Books, supra, at p. 735) and not that a particular belief is "valid".

45 In the United States, where there is a richness of jurisprudence on this matter, the United States Supreme Court has similarly adopted a subjective, personal and deferential definition of freedom of religion, centred upon sincerity of belief. For example, in Thomas v. Review Board of the Indiana Employment Security Division, 450 U.S. 707 (1981), the court held that it was the plaintiff's subjective beliefs, and not the official position of the particular religion, which must be considered in evaluating the free exercise guarantees under the First Amendment of the U.S. Constitution…

46 To summarize up to this point, our Court's past decisions and the basic principles underlying freedom of religion support the view that freedom of religion consists of the freedom to undertake practices and harbour beliefs, having a nexus with religion, in which an individual demonstrates he or she sincerely believes or is sincerely undertaking in order to connect with the divine or as a function of his or her spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials.

47 But, at the same time, this freedom encompasses objective as well as personal notions of religious belief, "obligation", precept, "commandment", custom or ritual. Consequently, both obligatory as well as voluntary expressions of faith should be protected under the Quebec (and the Canadian) Charter. It is the religious or spiritual essence of an action, not any mandatory or perceived-as-mandatory nature of its observance, that attracts protection. An inquiry into the mandatory nature of an alleged religious practice is not only inappropriate, it is plagued with difficulties. …

49 To require a person to prove that his or her religious practices are supported by a mandatory doctrine of faith, leaving it for judges to determine what those mandatory doctrines of faith are, would require courts to interfere with profoundly personal beliefs in a manner inconsistent with the principles set out by Dickson C.J. in Edwards Books…

50 In my view, the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma. Accordingly, courts should avoid judicially interpreting and thus determining, either explicitly or implicitly, the content of a subjective understanding of religious requirement, "obligation", precept, "commandment", custom or ritual. Secular judicial determinations of theological or religious disputes, or of contentious matters of religious doctrine, unjustifiably entangle the court in the affairs of religion.

51 That said, while a court is not qualified to rule on the validity or veracity of any given religious practice or belief, or to choose among various interpretations of belief, it is qualified to inquire into the sincerity of a claimant's belief, where sincerity is in fact at issue: see Jones, supra; Ross, supra. It is important to emphasize, however, that sincerity of belief simply implies an honesty of belief: see Thomas v. Review Board of the Indiana Employment Security Division, supra.

52 According to American constitutional law scholar Professor Laurence Tribe, the jurisprudence in this area evinces that inquiries into a claimant's sincerity must be as limited as possible. He argues that "given the widening understanding of what constitutes religion in our society, the very rights ostensibly protected by the free exercise clause might well be jeopardized by any but the most minimal inquiry into sincerity": L. H. Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2nd ed. 1988), at pp. 1245-46. While this was written in the context of the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, I believe that it is equally applicable to delimiting the court's role in interpreting religious freedom under the Quebec (or the Canadian) Charter. Indeed, the court's role in assessing sincerity is intended only to ensure that a presently asserted religious belief is in good faith, neither fictitious nor capricious, and that it is not an artifice. Otherwise, nothing short of a religious inquisition would be required to decipher the innermost beliefs of human beings.

53 Assessment of sincerity is a question of fact that can be based on several non-exhaustive criteria, including the credibility of a claimant's testimony (see Woehrling, supra, at p. 394), as well as an analysis of whether the alleged belief is consistent with his or her other current religious practices. It is important to underscore, however, that it is inappropriate for courts rigorously to study and focus on the past practices of claimants in order to determine whether their current beliefs are sincerely held. Over the course of a lifetime, individuals change and so can their beliefs. Religious beliefs, by their very nature, are fluid and rarely static. A person's connection to or relationship with the divine or with the subject or object of his or her spiritual faith, or his or her perceptions of religious obligation emanating from such a relationship, may well change and evolve over time. Because of the vacillating nature of religious belief, a court's inquiry into sincerity, if anything, should focus not on past practice or past belief but on a person's belief at the time of the alleged interference with his or her religious freedom.

54 A claimant may choose to adduce expert evidence to demonstrate that his or her belief is consistent with the practices and beliefs of other adherents of the faith. While such evidence may be relevant to a demonstration of sincerity, it is not necessary. Since the focus of the inquiry is not on what others view the claimant's religious obligations as being, but rather what the claimant views these personal religious "obligations" to be, it is inappropriate to require expert opinions to show sincerity of belief. An "expert" or an authority on religious law is not the surrogate for an individual's affirmation of what his or her religious beliefs are. Religious belief is intensely personal and can easily vary from one individual to another. Requiring proof of the established practices of a religion to gauge the sincerity of belief diminishes the very freedom we seek to protect.

55 This approach to freedom of religion effectively avoids the invidious interference of the State and its courts with religious belief. The alternative would undoubtedly result in unwarranted intrusions into the religious affairs of the synagogues, churches, mosques, temples and religious facilities of the nation with value-judgment indictments of those beliefs that may be unconventional or not mainstream. As articulated by Professor Tribe, supra, at p. 1244, "an intrusive government inquiry into the nature of a claimant's beliefs would in itself threaten the values of religious liberty".

56 Thus, at the first stage of a religious freedom analysis, an individual advancing an issue premised upon a freedom of religion claim must show the court that (1) he or she has a practice or belief, having a nexus with religion, which calls for a particular line of conduct, either by being objectively or subjectively obligatory or customary, or by, in general, subjectively engendering a personal connection with the divine or with the subject or object of an individual's spiritual faith, irrespective of whether a particular practice or belief is required by official religious dogma or is in conformity with the position of religious officials; and (2) he or she is sincere in his or her belief. Only then will freedom of religion be triggered.

(2) Infringement of Religious Freedom

57 Once an individual has shown that his or her religious freedom is triggered, as outlined above, a court must then ascertain whether there has been enough of an interference with the exercise of the implicated right so as to constitute an infringement of freedom of religion under the Quebec (or the Canadian) Charter.

58 … Section 2(a) of the Canadian Charter prohibits only burdens or impositions on religious practice that are non-trivial…

59 It consequently suffices that a claimant show that the impugned contractual or legislative provision (or conduct) interferes with his or her ability to act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. The question then becomes: what does this mean?

61 … it should be emphasized that not every action will become summarily unassailable and receive automatic protection under the banner of freedom of religion. No right, including freedom of religion, is absolute: … This is so because we live in a society of individuals in which we must always take the rights of others into account. In the words of John Stuart Mill: "The only freedom which deserves the name, is that of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it": On Liberty and Considerations on Representative Government (1946), at p. 11. In the real world, oftentimes the fundamental rights of individuals will conflict or compete with one another.

62 Freedom of religion, as outlined above, quite appropriately reflects a broad and expansive approach to religious freedom under both the Quebec Charter and the Canadian Charter and should not be prematurely narrowly construed. However, our jurisprudence does not allow individuals to do absolutely anything in the name of that freedom. Even if individuals demonstrate that they sincerely believe in the religious essence of an action, for example, that a particular practice will subjectively engender a genuine connection with the divine or with the subject or object of their faith, and even if they successfully demonstrate non-trivial or non-insubstantial interference with that practice, they will still have to consider how the exercise of their right impacts upon the rights of others in the context of the competing rights of private individuals. Conduct which would potentially cause harm to or interference with the rights of others would not automatically be protected. The ultimate protection of any particular Charter right must be measured in relation to other rights and with a view to the underlying context in which the apparent conflict arises.

63 Indeed, freedom of religion, like all other rights, applicable either as against the State or, under the Quebec Charter, in its private dimension as against another individual, may be made subject to overriding societal concerns. As with other rights, not every interference with religious freedom would be actionable, in accordance with the limitations on the exercise of fundamental rights recognized by the Quebec Charter.

(3) Alleged Justification for the Limit on the Exercise of Freedom of Religion

64 The respondent in the instant appeal has argued that the rights of the co-owners to peacefully enjoy property and to personal security limit the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom under the circumstances. I acknowledge that much can be said about the nature of and interrelationship among the various rights found in the Quebec Charter as raised in this appeal. But such an analysis is not necessary to dispose of the issues in this case. This is because at bottom, and as discussed below, whereas I find the appellants' rights to freedom of religion significantly impaired, on the facts of this case the impact on the respondent's rights at issue is, at best, minimal and thus cannot be construed as validly limiting the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom.

B. Application to the Facts

(1) Freedom of Religion and Infringement

(a) As Pertaining to Setting Up One's Own Succah

65 As outlined above, the first step in successfully advancing a claim that an individual's freedom of religion has been infringed is for a claimant to demonstrate that he or she sincerely believes in a practice or belief that has a nexus with religion. The second step is to then demonstrate that the impugned conduct of a third party interferes with the individual's ability to act in accordance with that practice or belief in a manner that is non-trivial. …

66 … the approach adopted by Rochon J. at trial and Dalphond J. for the majority of the Court of Appeal is inconsistent with the proper approach to freedom of religion. First, the trial judge's methodology was faulty in that he chose between two competing rabbinical authorities on a question of Jewish law. Second, he seems to have based his findings with respect to freedom of religion solely on what he perceived to be the objective obligatory requirements of Judaism. He thus failed to recognize that freedom of religion under the Quebec (and the Canadian) Charter does not require a person to prove that his or her religious practices are supported by any mandatory doctrine of faith.

67 Furthermore, in my opinion, any incorporation of distinctions between "obligation" and "custom" or, as made by the respondent and the courts below, between "objective obligation" and "subjective obligation or belief" within the framework of a religious freedom analysis is dubious, unwarranted and unduly restrictive. In my view, when courts undertake the task of analysing religious doctrine in order to determine the truth or falsity of a contentious matter of religious law, or when courts attempt to define the very concept of religious "obligation", as has been suggested in the courts below, they enter forbidden domain. It is not within the expertise and purview of secular courts to adjudicate questions of religious doctrine.

68 Similarly, to frame the right either in terms of objective religious "obligation" or even as the sincere subjective belief that an obligation exists and that the practice is required would lead to arbitrary and hierarchical determinations of religious "obligation", would exclude religious custom from protection, and would disregard the value of non-obligatory religious experiences by excluding those experiences from protection. Jewish women, for example, strictly speaking, do not have a biblically mandated "obligation" to dwell in a succah during the Succot holiday. If a woman, however, nonetheless sincerely believes that sitting and eating in a succah brings her closer to her Maker, is that somehow less deserving of recognition simply because she has no strict "obligation" to do so? Is the Jewish yarmulke or Sikh turban worthy of less recognition simply because it may be borne out of religious custom, not obligation? Should an individual Jew, who may personally deny the modern relevance of literal biblical "obligation" or "commandment", be precluded from making a freedom of religion argument despite the fact that for some reason he or she sincerely derives a closeness to his or her God by sitting in a succah? Surely not.

69 Rather, as I have stated above, regardless of the position taken by religious officials and in religious texts, provided that an individual demonstrates that he or she sincerely believes that a certain practice or belief is experientially religious in nature in that it is either objectively required by the religion, or that he or she subjectively believes that it is required by the religion, or that he or she sincerely believes that the practice engenders a personal, subjective connection to the divine or to the subject or object of his or her spiritual faith, and as long as that practice has a nexus with religion, it should trigger the protection of s. 3 of the Quebec Charter or that of s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter, or both, depending on the context.

70 On the question of sincerity, the respondent argues that the appellants do not sincerely believe that their religion requires them to build their own individual succahs on their balconies. That said, the trial judge did find that Mr. Amselem, at least, sincerely believed that he was obliged to set up a succah on his own property, thus triggering his freedom of religion protection according to the first step in our analysis.

73 When the appellants adduced Rabbi Ohana's expert testimony, they were submitting evidence of their sincere individual belief as to the inherently personal nature of fulfilling the commandment of dwelling in a succah. As expounded upon by Rabbi Ohana, according to Jewish law the obligation of "dwelling" must be complied with festively and joyously, without causing distress to the individual. Great distress, such as that caused by inclement weather, extreme cold or, in this case, the extreme unpleasantness rendered by forced relocation to a communal succah, with all attendant ramifications, for the entire nine-day period would not only preclude the acknowledged obligation of dwelling in a succah but would also render voluntary compliance wrongful and inappropriate, thus necessitating the setting up of a private succah. In light of our test for freedom of religion, such expert testimony, although not required, would in my view certainly support a positive finding of sincerity and honesty of the appellants' belief. As a result, all of the appellants have, in my opinion, successfully implicated freedom of religion.

74 According to the governing principles, however, in order for a triggered right of religious freedom to have been infringed, the interference with the right needs to be more than trivial or insubstantial: see Jones, supra. It is evident that in respect of Mr. Amselem the impugned clauses of the declaration of co-ownership interfere with his right in a substantial way. For if, as Rochon J. himself found, Mr. Amselem sincerely believes that he is obligated by the Jewish religion to set up and dwell in his own succah, then a prohibition against setting up his own succah obliterates the substance of his right, let alone interferes with it in a non-trivial fashion. A communal succah is simply not an option. Thus, his right is definitely infringed.

77 … a communal succah, as the respondent proposes, would force the appellants to carry food and utensils from their units on elevated floors to the succah, and traverse the expanse of the property to the Sanctuaire's gardens for every course at every meal throughout the holiday. Since Orthodox Jews are precluded from using elevators on the Sabbath and on the first two and last two days of the Succot holiday, this would amount to forcing Orthodox Jewish residents, including the elderly among them, to climb up and down numerous flights of stairs throughout each meal for much of the nine-day holiday period. Furthermore, by being forced to share all meals with the other Jewish residents of the complex, a communal succah would also preclude the intimate celebration of the holiday with immediate family. Those who choose to sleep in the succah, weather permitting, would have to do so communally and in the open, far from the proximity and safety of their individual units. Such distress is even objectively substantial and would undoubtedly, as the appellants assert, detract from the joyous celebration of the holiday and thus constitute a non-trivial interference with and an infringement of their rights to religious freedom.

(b) As Pertaining to "Dwelling" in a Succah

78 In the alternative, there is no doubt whatsoever from the record that all of the appellants sincerely believe that they must fulfill the biblically mandated obligation, perhaps not necessarily of having one's own succah, but of "dwelling" in a succah for the entire nine-day festival of Succot. This thus triggers freedom of religion. The question then becomes, once again, whether the appellants' rights have been infringed. Even though the Sanctuaire's by-laws do not overtly forbid them to dwell in a succah — in that the appellants are free to celebrate the holiday with relatives or in a proposed communal succah —, the appellants' protected rights will nonetheless be infringed, according to this Court's jurisprudence, if the impugned clauses constrain their rights to dwell in a succah in a manner that is non-trivial or not insubstantial. In my view, they do.

79 The burdens placed upon the appellants as a result of the operation of the impugned clauses, either by requiring them to celebrate the holiday by imposing on others or by forcing them, as suggested by the respondent, to celebrate in a communal succah, are evidently substantial. Preventing the appellants from building their own succah therefore constitutes a non-trivial interference with their protected rights to dwell in a succah during the festival of Succot, which all acknowledge they sincerely regard as a religious requirement. The result is that the impugned stipulations in the declaration of co-ownership infringe upon the appellants' freedom of religion under s. 3 of the Quebec Charter.

80 Consequently, I believe that all of the appellants have successfully made out an infringement of their freedom of religion.

81 As discussed above, to my mind, the impairment of the appellants' religious freedom resulting from the refusal of the respondent to allow the setting up of succahs on balconies is serious. As a result, the enjoyment of their rights to religious freedom has been significantly impaired. The Syndicat's offer of allowing the appellants to set up a communal succah in the Sanctuaire's gardens does not remedy nor does it even address that impairment.

(2) The Alleged Justification for the Limit on the Exercise of Freedom of Religion in this Case

82 Against the appellants' rights, the respondent Syndicat claims that the potential setting up of succahs on the appellants' balconies for the nine-day holiday of Succot would interfere with the co-owners' rights to the peaceful enjoyment of their property and to personal security, protected under ss. 6 and 1 of the Quebec Charter, respectively, thus justifying the total blanket prohibition against setting up succahs.

83 More specifically, in this case the co-owners' rights to peaceful enjoyment of their co-owned property in general, and of the balconies as "common portions" thereof in particular, has been articulated as a function of preserving the economic and aesthetic value of their property, which, they assert, is a component of an individual's right to enjoy his or her property under the Quebec Charter. Similarly, the respondent claims that the co-owners' rights to personal security under the Charter have been implicated; because the balconies of the Sanctuaire are fire-escape routes, cordoning off of the balcony would jeopardize the co-owners' safety in an emergency situation. In essence, the Syndicat is requesting in the name of the co-ownership that the appellants cease and desist from setting up these succahs, claiming that their presence negatively affects the co-owners' aesthetic, economic, and security interests in the property.

84 In the final analysis, however, I am of the view that the alleged intrusions or deleterious effects on the respondent's rights or interests under the circumstances are, at best, minimal and thus cannot be reasonably considered as imposing valid limits on the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom.

85 In practice, to what degree would the respondent be harmed were the appellants allowed to set up a succah for a period of 9 out of 365 days a year? The evidence before us does not provide a satisfactory answer. The respondent has simply not adduced enough evidence for us to conclude that allowing the appellants to set up such temporary succahs would cause the value of the units, or of the property, to decrease. Even if I were to consider the possibility that the economic value of the property might decrease if a substantial number of co-owners were allowed to set up succahs on their balconies for a lengthy time period throughout the year, any drop in value caused by the presence of a small number of succahs for a period of nine days each year would undoubtedly be minimal. Consequently, in this case, the exercise of the appellants' freedom of religion, which I have concluded would be significantly impaired, would clearly outweigh the unsubstantiated concerns of the co-owners about the decrease in property value.

86 Similarly, protecting the co-owners' enjoyment of the property by preserving the aesthetic appearance of the balconies and thus enhancing the harmonious external appearance of the building cannot be reconciled with a total ban imposed on the appellants' exercise of their religious freedom. Although residing in a building with a year-long uniform and harmonious external appearance might be the co-owners' preference, the potential annoyance caused by a few succahs being set up for a period of nine days each year would undoubtedly be quite trivial.

87 In a multiethnic and multicultural country such as ours, which accentuates and advertises its modern record of respecting cultural diversity and human rights and of promoting tolerance of religious and ethnic minorities — and is in many ways an example thereof for other societies —, the argument of the respondent that nominal, minimally intruded-upon aesthetic interests should outweigh the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom is unacceptable. Indeed, mutual tolerance is one of the cornerstones of all democratic societies. Living in a community that attempts to maximize human rights invariably requires openness to and recognition of the rights of others. In this regard, I must point out, with respect, that labelling an individual's steadfast adherence to his or her religious beliefs "intransigence", as Morin J.A. asserted at para. 64, does not further an enlightened resolution of the dispute before us.

88 Finally, the respondent alleges that banning succahs on the appellants' balconies, portions of which are subject under the by-laws to a right of servitude in cases of emergency, ensures that the balconies, as fire escape routes, would remain unobstructed in the case of emergency and, as such, the ban seeks to protect the co-owners' rights to personal security under s. 1 of the Quebec Charter. I agree that security concerns, if soundly established, would require appropriate recognition in ascertaining any limit on the exercise of the appellants' religious freedom.

89 However, in their October 14, 1997 letter to the respondent, the appellants obviated any such concerns by all offering to set up their succahs "in such a way that they would not block any doors, would not obstruct fire lanes, [and] would pose no threat to safety or security in any way".

91 Dalphond J. held, and the respondent contends, that the appellants had waived their rights to freedom of religion — or had implicitly agreed with the terms of the by-laws — when they signed the declaration of co-ownership, and that the appellants must comply with the impugned provisions of the Sanctuaire's by-laws, including the general prohibition against decorations or constructions on balconies. I confess to some difficulty in understanding the legal basis for this proposition. Whether it amounts to "waiver" — or to waiver by another name —, the argument does not withstand scrutiny.

96 … by its very nature, waiver of any right must be voluntary, freely expressed and with a clear understanding of the true consequences and effects of so doing if it is to be effective: see Richard, supra, at para. 22.

98 Under the circumstances of the instant case, the appellants had no choice but to sign the declaration of co-ownership in order to live at the Sanctuaire… It would be both insensitive and morally repugnant to intimate that the appellants simply move elsewhere if they took issue with a clause restricting their rights to freedom of religion.

99 Further, in this case, there is no evidence whatsoever that the appellants were aware that signing the declaration of co-ownership amounted to a waiver of their rights to freedom of religion. In fact, the respondent admits that the appellants [TRANSLATION] "did not read these provisions on purchasing their co-owned property, although they were duly given a copy of the declaration of co-ownership". …

100 Third, at a minimum, waiver of a fundamental right such as freedom of religion, if possible at all, presumably need not only be voluntary; it must also be explicit, stated in express, specific and clear terms. Not only would a general prohibition on constructions, such as the one in the declaration of co-ownership, be insufficient to ground a finding of waiver, but arguably so would any document lacking an explicit reference to the affected Charter right.

VII. Conclusions and Disposition

103 Based on the foregoing analysis, I find that the impugned provisions in the declaration of co-ownership prohibiting constructions on the appellants' balconies infringe the appellants' freedom of religion under the Quebec Charter. I also do not believe it can be maintained that the appellants waived their rights to freedom of religion or implicitly agreed not to set up succahs on their balconies for the religiously mandated period by signing the declaration of co-ownership. Under the circumstances, I find that the respondent's justificatory claims for this infringement are unfounded; the co-owners' personal security concerns are largely obviated and their property interests are, at most, minimally intruded upon. The appellants are thus legally entitled to set up succahs on their balconies for a period lasting no longer than the holiday of Succot, so long as the succahs allow room for a passageway in case of emergency as well as conform, as much as possible, with the general aesthetics of the property.

104 For the foregoing reasons, I would allow the appeal with costs throughout, set aside the decision of the Court of Appeal, and, in lieu thereof, declare that the appellants have a right to set up succahs on their balconies for the annual festival of Succot, subject to the undertakings they have given with regard to the size, placement, and general aesthetics of said succahs.

IV. Analysis

A. The Scope of Freedom of Conscience and Religion

135 These passages seem to show that this Court has interpreted freedom of religion as protecting both religious beliefs, which are considered to be highly personal and private in nature, and consequent religious practices. However, a religion is a system of beliefs and practices based on certain religious precepts. A nexus between personal beliefs and the religion's precepts must therefore be established. This point of view is consistent with those encountered in other common law jurisdictions: ...Religious precepts constitute a body of objectively identifiable data that permit a distinction to be made between genuine religious beliefs and personal choices or practices that are unrelated to freedom of conscience. Connecting freedom of religion to precepts provides a basis for establishing objectively whether the fundamental right in issue has been violated. By identifying with a religion, an individual makes it known that he or she shares a number of precepts with other followers of the religion. The approach I have adopted here requires not only a personal belief or the adoption of a religious practice that is supported by a personal belief, but also a genuine connection between the belief and the person's religion. In my view, the only way the trial judge can establish that a person has a sincere belief, or has sincerely adopted a religious practice that is genuinely connected with the religion he or she claims to follow, is by applying an objective test. It is one thing to assert that a practice is protected even though certain followers of the religion do not think that the practice is included among the religion's precepts and quite another to assert that a practice must be protected when none of the followers think it is included among those precepts. If, pursuant to s. 3, a practice must be connected with the religion, the connection must be objectively identifiable.

137 … a method must be established for determining the scope of the protection that freedom of religion affords a claimant … there are in fact two elements to consider in analysing freedom of religion. First, there is the freedom to believe and to profess one's beliefs; second, there is the right to manifest one's beliefs, primarily by observing rites, and by sharing one's faith by establishing places of worship and frequenting them. Thus, although private beliefs have a purely personal aspect, the other dimension of the right has genuine social significance and involves a relationship with others. It would be an error to reduce freedom of religion to a single dimension, especially in conducting a contextual analysis like the one that must be conducted under s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter.

140 …a claimant must prove that the conduct or practice to which he or she seeks to have freedom of religion apply is in fact based on a precept of his or her religion. The test is reasonable belief in the existence of a religious precept. In the absence of such proof, the court cannot assess the effects of the provisions or standards that, according to the claimant, infringe the rights of one or more members of a religious group: Edwards Books, supra, at p. 767. Even though religion is, first and foremost, a question of conscience, when an individual feels that a right as fundamental as the right to practise his or her religion has been infringed, a connection must be established between the religious precept and the individual asserting the right. To this end, expert testimony will be useful, as it can serve to establish the fundamental practices and precepts of a religion the individual claims to practise.

141 In the second step, the judge considers the sincerity of the claimant's religious beliefs.

C. Application to the Facts

162 The evidence shows that the appellants sincerely believed they were under an obligation to eat their meals and celebrate Succot in a succah. Although it would be preferable to do so in their own succahs whenever possible, there are numerous circumstances, such as the ones noted by the trial judge, in which using another person's succah would appear to be justified. Based on the evidence that was adduced and accepted by the trial judge, I accept that the appellants sincerely believe that, whenever possible, it would be preferable for them to erect their own succahs; however, it would not be a divergence from their religious precept to accept another solution, so long as the fundamental obligation of eating their meals in a succah was discharged. I therefore cannot accept that the appellants sincerely believe, based on the precepts of their religion that they are relying on, that they are under an obligation to erect their own succahs on their balconies, patios or porches. Rather, it is their practice of eating or celebrating Succot in a succah that is protected by the guarantee of freedom of religion set out in s. 3 of the Quebec Charter. The declaration of co-ownership does not hinder this practice, as it does not bar the appellants from celebrating Succot in a succah, whether at the homes of friends or family or even in a communal succah, as proposed by the respondent. Consequently, the prohibition against erecting their own succahs does not infringe the purpose of the appellants' right to freedom of religion. Any inconvenience resulting from the prohibition against erecting individual succahs is not sufficient to elevate the preference to the status of a mandatory religious practice.

163 In the case of the appellant Amselem, however, the trial judge concluded that he was [TRANSLATION] "the only one who saw the obligation to erect a succah on his own property in terms of a divine command" (p. 1909). Assuming that his belief is sincere, which the trial judge accepted, and that it is based on a precept of his religion, in accordance with the interpretation of the Book of Nechemiah, Chapter 8, verses 13 to 18, accepted by Morin J.A. on appeal, it is necessary to turn to the second step and to interpret the prohibitions imposed by the declaration of co-ownership in light of s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter to determine whether they violate Mr. Amselem's right to freedom of religion.

2. Reconciling Rights Under Section 9.1 of the Quebec Charter

166 In the case at bar, the right to the peaceful enjoyment and free disposition of one's property is included in the purpose of the restrictions provided for in the declaration of co-ownership. The restrictions are aimed first and foremost at preserving the market value of the dwelling units held in co-ownership. They also protect the co-owners' right to enjoy the common portions reserved for exclusive use while preserving the building's style and its aesthetic appearance of a luxury building, not to mention the use of the balconies to evacuate the building in a dangerous situation. The total ban on erecting anything whatsoever, including succahs, on the balconies is necessary to attain this goal, since without it, harmony cannot be maintained and emergency routes will be compromised. In this situation, freedom of religion imposes limits on the exercise of the rights of all the co-owners.

176 In the case at bar, not only is there a conflict between the right to freedom of religion and property rights, but the right to freedom of religion is also in conflict with the right to life and personal security, and with contractual rights. It should also be borne in mind that the Syndicat, in an attempt to reconcile the co-owners' competing interests, proposed the construction of a communal succah near one of the towers. This offer, which, it should be noted, Mr. Amselem had accepted, was the result of a negotiation process involving a number of parties. What is more, the Canadian Jewish Congress considered the proposed compromise to be reasonable and, in a letter dated October 10, 1997, thanked the Syndicat for its efforts to accommodate its Jewish residents. All this is important to the assessment of what is consistent with the general well-being of citizens.

177 In the end, the appellants rejected the Syndicat's offer, citing a multitude of problems and details, but they never proposed anything other than the erection of succahs on their balconies. It is clear that the communal succah would be a source of inconvenience for Mr. Amselem, but the individual succah, too, was a source of genuine inconvenience for the other co-owners: in particular, it obstructed an emergency route, and the elevators were blocked during the construction while being used to transport the materials. On this issue, the trial judge criticized the appellants for being inflexible in rejecting the compromise. In his view, their attitude showed that they were not willing to contribute to a solution that would be acceptable to all. It is especially important to note in this respect that such a contribution is required of all rights holders by s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter, by the Charter's preamble, which recognizes that "the rights and freedoms of the human person are inseparable from the rights and freedoms of others and from the common well-being", and by the preliminary provision of the Civil Code of Québec, which states that the Code, "in harmony with the Charter of human rights and freedoms and the general principles of law, governs persons, relations between persons, and property". As I noted above, the application of s. 9.1 does not simply presuppose an accommodation approaching extreme tolerance by all rights holders other than Mr. Amselem. He, too, is part of the multicultural society that demands reconciliation of the rights of all. It is not irrelevant that the trial judge, following a thorough analysis, concluded that there was a reasonable accommodation in the case at bar and that in the Court of Appeal, Morin J.A. relied on this Court's decision in British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v. BCGSEU, supra, to hold that there was no reason to interfere with this assessment of the evidence. In other words, the trier of fact was satisfied that even the most demanding test did not support the appellants' case.

180 This leads me to conclude that, since Mr. Amselem's right to freedom of religion cannot be exercised in harmony with the rights and freedoms of others or with the general well-being, the infringement of Mr. Amselem's right is legitimate. Even though the declaration of co-ownership's prohibition against building prevents the appellants from erecting succahs on their balconies, porches or patios, it does not violate their freedom of religion.

BINNIE J. (dissenting) —

I. Introduction

183 The unusual aspect of the claim to freedom of religion in this case is that the claim is asserted by the appellants, not against the State but against fellow co-owners of a Montréal luxury building (or "immovable"), all of whom (including the appellants) entered into contractual rules governing the use of commonly owned facilities. The agreed rules, as found by all of the judges in the courts below, plainly prohibit the erection on the communally owned balconies of a succah, which is a makeshift temporary dwelling, open to the sky, that is used in connection with the appellants' religious observance in the Jewish tradition for nine days in each year. The appellants rely on a right to freedom of religion under the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12, to insist on building a succah on each of their balconies despite the contract they made with their co-owners and despite their co-owners' offer of a communal succah in the garden of the building. There is much to be said on both sides of this issue but in the end, I agree with the Quebec Court of Appeal that in all the circumstances the appellants cannot reasonably insist on a personal succah. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

184 My reasons differ from those of my colleague Bastarache J. because of the weight I place on the private contract voluntarily made among the parties to govern their mutual rights and obligations, including the contractual rules contained in the declaration of co-ownership, as well as on the co-owners' offer of accommodation. Buried at the heart of this fact-specific case is the issue of the appellants' acceptance, embodied in the contract with their co-owners, that they would not insist on construction of a personal succah on the communally owned balconies of the building.

185 There is a vast difference, it seems to me, between using freedom of religion as a shield against interference with religious freedoms by the State and as a sword against co-contractors in a private building. It was for the appellants, not the other co-owners, to determine in advance of their unit purchase what the appellants' particular religious beliefs required. They had a choice of buildings in which to invest. They undertook by contract to the owners of this building to abide by the rules of this building even if (as is apparently the case) they accepted the rules without reading them. They thereafter rejected the accommodation offered by their co-owners of a communal succah in the garden because it did not fully satisfy their religious views although the accommodation was not, as will be seen, inconsistent even with Mr. Moïse Amselem's sense of religious obligation in circumstances where a personal succah is simply not available.

2.3 Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6 (CanLII), [2006] 1 SCR 256

Charron J. —

1. Introduction

1 This appeal requires us to determine whether the decision of a school board's council of commissioners prohibiting one of the students under its jurisdiction from wearing a kirpan to school as required by his religion infringes the student's freedom of religion. If we find that it does, we must determine whether that infringement is a reasonable limit that can be justified by the need to maintain a safe environment at the school.

2 As I will explain below, I am of the view that an absolute prohibition against wearing a kirpan infringes the freedom of religion of the student in question under s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Canadian Charter"). The infringement cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter, since it has not been shown that such a prohibition minimally impairs the student's rights. The decision of the council of commissioners must therefore be declared a nullity.

2. Facts

3 The appellant Balvir Singh Multani and his son Gurbaj Singh Multani are orthodox Sikhs. Gurbaj Singh, born in 1989, has been baptized and believes that his religion requires him to wear a kirpan at all times; a kirpan is a religious object that resembles a dagger and must be made of metal. On November 19, 2001, Gurbaj Singh accidentally dropped the kirpan he was wearing under his clothes in the yard of the school he was attending, École Sainte-Catherine-Labouré. On December 21, 2001, the school board, the Commission scolaire

Marguerite-Bourgeoys ("CSMB"), through its legal counsel, sent Gurbaj Singh's parents a letter in which, as a [translation] "reasonable accommodation", it authorized their son to wear his kirpan to school provided that he complied with certain conditions to ensure that it was sealed inside his clothing. Gurbaj Singh and his parents agreed to this arrangement.

4 In a resolution passed on February 12, 2002, the school's governing board refused to ratify the agreement on the basis that wearing a kirpan at the school violated art. 5 of the school's Code de vie (code of conduct), which prohibited the carrying of weapons and dangerous objects. For the purposes of this case, it is not in dispute that the governing board had, pursuant to the authority granted to it under s. 76 of the Education Act, R.S.Q., c. I-13.3, approved the Code de vie, which imposed certain rules of conduct.

5 On March 19, 2002, based on a unanimous recommendation by a review committee to which a request by the Multanis to reconsider the governing board's decision had been referred, the CSMB's council of commissioners upheld that decision. The council of commissioners also notified the Multanis that a symbolic kirpan in the form of a pendant or one in another form made of a material rendering it harmless would be acceptable in the place of a real kirpan.

6 On March 25, 2002, Balvir Singh Multani, personally and in his capacity as tutor to his son Gurbaj Singh, filed in the Superior Court… a motion for a declaratory judgment together with an application for an interlocutory injunction. In his motion, Mr. Multani asked the court to declare that the council of commissioners' decision was of no force or effect and that Gurbaj Singh had a right to wear his kirpan to school if it was sealed and sewn up inside his clothing. He submitted that this would represent a reasonable accommodation to the freedom of religion and right to equality guaranteed in ss. 3 and 10 of the Charter of human rights and freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12 ("Quebec Charter"), and ss. 2 and 15 of the Canadian Charter.

4. Issues

13 Does the decision of the council of commissioners prohibiting Gurbaj Singh Multani from wearing his kirpan at Sainte-Catherine-Labouré school infringe his freedom of religion under s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter or s. 3 of the Quebec Charter? Does the decision infringe his right to equality under s. 15 of the Canadian Charter or s. 10 of the Quebec Charter? If so, can the infringement be justified pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter or s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter?

[On the preliminary issue of the standard of review, Justice Charron concluded that a typical constitutional law analysis should be preferred over an administrative law-based analysis. This position has since been overtaken by the approach outlined in Doré v. Barreau du Québec, 2012 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2012] 1 SCR 395. What follows remains a useful example of how s 1 can be applied and analyzed, but if the case were argued today the analytical framework would likely follow Doré.]

5.2 Internal Limits of Freedom of Religion, or Justification Within the Meaning of Section 1?

26 This Court has clearly recognized that freedom of religion can be limited when a person's freedom to act in accordance with his or her beliefs may cause harm to or interfere with the rights of others (see R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 337, and Syndicat Northcrest v. Amselem, [2004] 2 SCR 551, 2004 SCC 47, at para. 62). However, the Court has on numerous occasions stressed the advantages of reconciling competing rights by means of a s. 1 analysis… In my view, it appears sounder to leave to the state the burden of justifying the restrictions it has chosen. Any ambiguity or hesitation should be resolved in favour of individual rights. Not only is this consistent with the broad and liberal interpretation of rights favoured by this Court, but s. 1 is a much more flexible tool with which to balance competing rights than s. 2(a).

27 Ross provides another example of this. In that case, the Court recognized a teacher's right to act on the basis of antisemitic views that compromised the right of students to a school environment free of discrimination, but opted to limit the teacher's freedom of religion pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter (at paras. 74-75):

This mode of approach is analytically preferable because it gives the broadest possible scope to judicial review under the Charter . . ., and provides a more comprehensive method of assessing the relevant conflicting values. . . .

That approach seems to me compelling in the present case where the respondent's claim is to a serious infringement of his rights of expression and of religion in a context requiring a detailed contextual analysis. In these circumstances, there can be no doubt that the detailed s. 1 analytical approach developed by this Court provides a more practical and comprehensive mechanism, involving review of a whole range of factors for the assessment of competing interests and the imposition of restrictions upon individual rights and freedoms.

31 Thus, the central issue in the instant case is best suited to a s. 1 analysis. But before proceeding with this analysis, I will explain why the contested decision clearly infringes freedom of religion.

6. Infringement of Freedom of Religion

35 The fact that different people practise the same religion in different ways does not affect the validity of the case of a person alleging that his or her freedom of religion has been infringed. What an individual must do is show that he or she sincerely believes that a certain belief or practice is required by his or her religion. The religious belief must be asserted in good faith and must not be fictitious, capricious or an artifice (Amselem, at para. 52). In assessing the sincerity of the belief, a court must take into account, inter alia, the credibility of the testimony of the person asserting the particular belief and the consistency of the belief with his or her other current religious practices (Amselem, at para. 53).

36 In the case at bar, Gurbaj Singh must therefore show that he sincerely believes that his faith requires him at all times to wear a kirpan made of metal. Evidence to this effect was introduced and was not contradicted. No one contests the fact that the orthodox Sikh religion requires its adherents to wear a kirpan at all times. The affidavits of chaplain Manjit Singh and of Gurbaj Singh explain that orthodox Sikhs must comply with a strict dress code requiring them to wear religious symbols commonly known as the Five Ks: (1) the kesh (uncut hair); (2) the kangha (a wooden comb); (3) the kara (a steel bracelet worn on the wrist); (4) the kaccha (a special undergarment); and (5) the kirpan (a metal dagger or sword). Furthermore, Manjit Singh explains in his affidavit that the Sikh religion teaches pacifism and encourages respect for other religions, that the kirpan must be worn at all times, even in bed, that it must not be used as a weapon to hurt anyone, and that Gurbaj Singh's refusal to wear a symbolic kirpan made of a material other than metal is based on a reasonable religiously motivated interpretation.
