1 An open access constitutional law casebook

This open-access constitutional law casebook is the product of a collaborative effort involving more than 40 constitutional law teachers from across Canada.

While primarily intended as a teaching tool for law students, this casebook is also designed to serve a broader audience. Whether you are a student, researcher, practitioner, or simply a curious reader seeking to better understand the Canadian constitutional order, we hope you will find this resource useful and accessible.

The casebook focuses on many of the foundational elements of Canada’s constitutional structure. It addresses themes such as federalism, the separation of powers, constitutional rights and Indigenous sovereignty. That said, this is not a comprehensive treatment of the entire field. Choices had to be made about scope and depth, and some areas are treated more fully than others.

We believe, however, that this casebook offers a strong foundation for critical engagement with Canadian constitutional law. We are grateful to the many contributors who volunteered their time and expertise to make this resource possible, and we hope it will continue to evolve and grow through feedback and future collaboration.

2 What is a constitution?

Virtually every society around the world has something called a “constitution.” But they differ from one another significantly. Some bind only the government of the country, some bind private actors as well. Some constitutions are written (like those of the United States, France, South Africa and India), some (like that of the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Israel) are unwritten (or “uncodified”) and some (like Canada) are hybrids of the two. Some (like Canada, the United States and South Africa) contain protections for human rights, and some (like Australia) do not.

At a basic level, however, the function of a constitution is to define and limit the institutions that govern a society. In terms of limiting governmental power, constitutions define a set of fundamental principles by which future governments must abide. Otherwise, the state can operate for the short-term benefit of those in currently in government, to the detriment of those that are not.

A corollary of this principle is that constitutions tend to be difficult to amend, often requiring the assent of a “supermajority” (e.g. two thirds or three fourths) of legislators (or legislatures in countries with federal arrangements). The notion that a special (and often more difficult) process must be followed to change constitutional rules is known as “entrenchment.” Entrenchment gives a degree of stability to the rules. As well, because constitutional rules allocate powers to different parts of the governing system - and establish limits on those powers – then at least in principle no one part of the system should be able to easily change those rules.

Constitutions also serve an important symbolic purpose. In this sense, aside from any rules that a constitution may include that define and constrain the powers of government, a constitution can create a nation’s identity. That this is so in Canada can be evidenced by Statistics Canada’s 2013 General Social Survey, in which Canadians ranked the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms as the most important symbol for national identity (beating out the national anthem, the RCMP and even hockey).[1]

3 What is in the Canadian constitution?

The Canadian constitution is a hybrid of written constitutional texts and unwritten principles and conventions. As explained by Justice Rowe in Canada (Attorney General) v. Power, 2024 SCC 26 (in dissent, but not on this point):

> [263] The Canadian Constitution consists of written and unwritten components. They set out how sovereign authority is constituted, who can exercise that authority, for what purposes, by which means, and with what limitations.

The written constitutional texts are:

- The Constitution Act, 1867 (originally known as the British North America Act);
- The Constitution Act, 1982; and

- The statutes listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982. These include the terms of union incorporating various provinces and territories into Canada after 1867 and the 1931 Statute of Westminster,[2] which granted Canada legislative independence (save for the power to amend Canada's constitution, which Britain retained until the passage of the Constitution Act, 1982).

As Justice Rowe notes, the Canadian constitution also includes a number of important unwritten constitutional principles and conventions, which are discussed in greater detail below.

In sum, however, unwritten constitutional principles, which include federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities,[3] form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. As we will see, their precise role in constitutional law remains very much in dispute.

By contrast, unwritten constitutional conventions are the rules about the functioning of government that have evolved by way of custom over many years. A good example of this is the convention that the prime minister will only appoint cabinet members who are elected to the House of Commons or appointed to the Senate.[4] Constitutional conventions are fundamentally political in nature and while the courts might declare whether a particular convention exists and has been breached in a particular circumstance, they will not otherwise enforce them.[5]

3.1 The Constitution Act, 1867

The Constitution Act, 1867, which was originally known as the British North America Act, is in many ways the foundational document of Canada's constitution. It was passed by the British Parliament to create the Dominion of Canada, which was then comprised of three of the five British North American colonies at the time. The Act came into effect on July 1, 1867, which is today celebrated annually as a national holiday.

The idea of unifying the British North American colonies into a single country was the result of a number of economic and geo-political factors. One factor was growing concern about the possibility of American military aggression and expansion, which was exacerbated by Britain's reluctance to pay for the defence of its colonies in North America. Another concern was the United States' increasingly protectionist trade policies, which made free trade between the British North American colonies an attractive proposition.[6]

The Constitution Act, 1867 has a number of key features:

- A Preamble declaring that colonies of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and the Province of Canada (which included Ontario and Québec) "have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom." The Preamble also provides that "it is expedient that Provision be made for the eventual Admission into the Union of other Parts of British North America."[7]
- The creation of the executive branch of the federal government. While overall executive authority in the federal government is "vested in the Queen" (s. 9), that authority is to be carried on by the Governor General "on behalf and in the Name of the Queen" (s. 10). The executive branch also includes a "Council to aid and advise in the Government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada" (s. 11) and the "Governor General in Council" (colloquially known as Cabinet) which is the "Governor General acting with the advice of the Privy Council" (s. 13);
- The creation of a federal Parliament similar to the Parliament of the United Kingdom. Parliament is "bicameral": an Upper House called the Senate (analogous to the UK House of Lords), and a House of Commons (s. 21). The Senate is divided up regionally, with (unelected) Senators representing different parts of the country being appointed by the Governor General (ss. 21-22).
- Section 23 sets out a number of qualifications that must be met in order for a person to be eligible to be appointed as a senator. These include being at least 30 years old, residing in the province that one is appointed to represent and being the owner of land in that province worth at least $4000. It was only in 1929 that the applicable provisions in the Constitution Act, 1867 were interpreted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (in the famous Person's Case, discussed in greater detail in Part 4.1 below)[8] to allow both men and women to be appointed as Senators (if they met all of the other qualifications). While Senators originally held office for life, this was changed in 1965 to require retirement at age 75 (s. 29).[9]
- The House of Commons consists of elected members representing electoral districts (or ridings) around the country. Legislation must be passed by both the Senate and the House of Commons and assented to by the Governor General before having the force of law (s. 55);
- The creation of provincial executive governments and legislatures similar to those of the federal government, with representatives of the Queen called Lieutenant Governors General and cabinets known as Lieutenant Governors in Council (ss. 58, 66);
- The creation of superior courts in each province with judges appointed by the Governor General (s. 96), as well as a "General Court of Appeal for Canada" (which became the Supreme Court of Canada) and "Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada," which are now the Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal (s. 101).
- A distribution of legislative powers between the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures (ss. 91-95), with Parliament having jurisdiction over areas such as criminal law, marriage and divorce, banking and national defence, and provincial legislatures having jurisdiction over areas such as hospitals, municipalities as well as property and civil rights. The key provisions in terms of division of powers as between the federal and provincial governments are sections 91 and 92, which provide:

  > VI. Distribution of Legislative Powers
  > Powers of the Parliament
  > Legislative Authority of Parliament of Canada
  > 91 It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say
  > 1. Repealed.
  > 1A. The Public Debt and Property.
  > 2. The Regulation of Trade and Commerce.
  > 2A. Unemployment insurance.
  > 3. The raising of Money by any Mode or System of Taxation.
  > 4. The borrowing of Money on the Public Credit.

5. Postal Service.

6. The Census and Statistics.

7. Militia, Military and Naval Service, and Defence.

8. The fixing of and providing for the Salaries and Allowances of Civil and other Officers of the Government of Canada.

9. Beacons, Buoys, Lighthouses, and Sable Island.

10. Navigation and Shipping.

11. Quarantine and the Establishment and Maintenance of Marine Hospitals.

12. Sea Coast and Inland Fisheries.

13. Ferries between a Province and any British or Foreign Country or between Two Provinces.

14. Currency and Coinage.

15. Banking, Incorporation of Banks, and the Issue of Paper Money.

16. Savings Banks.

17. Weights and Measures.

18. Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes.

19. Interest.

20. Legal Tender.

21. Bankruptcy and Insolvency.

22. Patents of Invention and Discovery.

23. Copyrights.

24. Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians.

25. Naturalization and Aliens.

26. Marriage and Divorce.

27. The Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the Procedure in Criminal Matters.

28. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Penitentiaries.

29. Such Classes of Subjects as are expressly excepted in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

And any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section shall not be deemed to come within the Class of Matters of a local or private Nature comprised in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.

Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures

Subjects of exclusive Provincial Legislation

92 In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,

1. (Repealed).

2. Direct Taxation within the Province in order to the raising of a Revenue for Provincial Purposes.

3. The borrowing of Money on the sole Credit of the Province.

4. The Establishment and Tenure of Provincial Offices and the Appointment and Payment of Provincial Officers.

5. The Management and Sale of the Public Lands belonging to the Province and of the Timber and Wood thereon.

6. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Public and Reformatory Prisons in and for the Province.

7. The Establishment, Maintenance, and Management of Hospitals, Asylums, Charities, and Eleemosynary Institutions in and for the Province, other than Marine Hospitals.

8. Municipal Institutions in the Province.

9. Shop, Saloon, Tavern, Auctioneer, and other Licences in order to the raising of a Revenue for Provincial, Local, or Municipal Purposes.

10. Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are of the following Classes:

(a) Lines of Steam or other Ships, Railways, Canals, Telegraphs, and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province:

(b) Lines of Steam Ships between the Province and any British or Foreign Country:

(c) Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general Advantage of Canada or for the Advantage of Two or more of the Provinces.

11. The Incorporation of Companies with Provincial Objects.

12. The Solemnization of Marriage in the Province.

13. Property and Civil Rights in the Province.

14. The Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction, and including Procedure in Civil Matters in those Courts.

> 15. The Imposition of Punishment by Fine, Penalty, or Imprisonment for enforcing any Law of the Province made in relation to any Matter coming within any of the Classes of Subjects enumerated in this Section.
> 16. Generally, all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province.

Why did the framers of the Constitution Act, 1867 pursue a federal system and not a unitary system with a central government, like that of the United Kingdom? After all, as the Preamble states, the colonies that were forming this new country had a "Desire to be…united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom [emphasis added]." While the answer is not entirely straightforward, some of the reasons included:

- One of the most pressing concerns was the coexistence of French-speaking Catholics in Lower Canada (Quebec) and English-speaking Protestants in Upper Canada (Ontario). A unitary system might have led to assimilationist policies or domination by one group, threatening minority rights and social cohesion. Federalism allowed Quebec to preserve its language, religion, and civil law tradition by granting provinces control over education, civil law, and cultural matters.[10]
- The British North American colonies were geographically vast and economically diverse, with distinct regional interests (e.g., fisheries in the Maritimes, agriculture in Ontario, French civil law in Quebec). A federal system permitted local governments to tailor policies to regional needs, while a central government could address matters of national concern, such as defence, criminal law, trade and commerce.
- At the same time, the Canadian model of federalism was designed with a strong central government (e.g., residual power in s. 91; the "disallowance" power, etc.) to prevent fragmentation and secure national unity, especially in defense and economic integration.

In a federal system - at least in its ideal form - neither order of government is superior or subordinate to the other - in the sense that neither level/order depends on the other level/order for the grant, definition, or exercise of its powers. The powers of the two levels of government are set out in the Constitution, which is a written document that is supreme law and can only be changed through a special amendment process. In other words, neither level of government can, on its own, add to its own powers or take away from the powers of the other level of government. That at least is the ideal model.

However, there are many ways in which the Canadian constitution does not conform to this ideal form of federalism. Most notable in this regard is perhaps the federal "disallowance power." This is a mechanism found in section 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867 that allows the federal government to disallow (i.e., invalidate) provincial legislation even after it has been validly passed by a provincial legislature and given royal assent. Notably, while the power was used over 100 times after Confederation and remains in the text of the Constitution Act, 1867, it has not been used since 1943. Some scholars believe that a constitutional convention now exists that prohibits the federal government from using the disallowance power in the future.[11]

3.1.1 Questions

1. Does the distribution of powers as between the federal and provincial governments in sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 seem logical to you?
2. What appears to be the underlying rationale that was being utilized by the framers of the constitution?
3. Do the powers in ss. 91 and 92 overlap or are they clearly distinct from one another?

3.1.2 A Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom?

It is notable that the Preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 provides that the federal dominion shall have a "Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom." On its face, this seems somewhat peculiar since in 1867 the United Kingdom did not have (a) an entrenched, written/codified constitutional document analogous to the Constitution Act, 1867; or (b) a federal system of government with provinces or states that had governments and areas of responsibility that were different from the federal or national government.

For these reasons, renowned constitutional legal scholar Albert Venn Dicey wrote that, "if preambles were intended to express the truth," the Constitution Act, 1867 should have indicated that it was a constitution similar in principle to that of the United States (which, like Canada, had an entrenched and written constitution that divided powers between states and a federal government).[12]

Scholars other than Dicey, however, viewed the matter differently, suggesting that a "Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" indicated an intention to set up "Westminster"-style Parliamentary and executive institutions modelled on those employed by the United Kingdom.[13] This view is explained by Peter Oliver in his article 'A Constitution Similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom': The Preamble, Constitutional Principles, and a Sustainable Jurisprudence" (2019) 65:2 McGill Law Journal 207 at 217-219 as follows:

> The most salient similarities to the constitution of the United Kingdom were the following: the Queen, prime minister, cabinet, and system of responsible government; the sovereignty of Parliament and the protection of rights by means of the common law; and the law and custom of Parliament.
> 1. The Queen, Prime Minister, Cabinet, and the System of Responsible Government
> The 1867 Act referred to the legislative institutions (House of Commons and Senate) and the courts, but it said very little about the executive, or very little that was recognizable to lay observers. Executive power was vested in the Queen and in the Governor General and Lieutenant-Governors, with little mention of the establishment of and limits on the exercise of that power. The detailed rules regarding succession to the throne, like the detailed rules regarding the election, composition, and functioning of the Westminster Parliament (the de facto general amending formula of the Canadian Constitution), were nowhere to be found. In a way this was not surprising, seeing as the Crown (and the Crown-in-Parliament) were British institutions of long standing. If Canadians needed to know more about them, the preamble referred them to the United Kingdom and its laws and other traditions, without the need to adopt them into Canadian law.
> The cabinet was referred to only obliquely, and the prime minister and premiers not at all. Similarly, the collective and individual responsibility of ministers to Parliament and the legislatures were not mentioned. Most of these latter "omissions" from the written text were, according to the constitution of the United Kingdom, governed by constitutional convention. Given that responsible government had already been achieved in the British North American colonies of Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia, it was inevitable that responsible government would also exist in the new Canada.
> All this is to say that while the 1867 Act provided a substantial number of written constitutional rules, it did not in any sense purport to be codified. The Queen, prime minister, the cabinet, and the system of responsible government that were governed by unwritten constitutional conventions in the United Kingdom would be governed by similar rules in Canada. Unless this assumption is made, the 1867 Act makes very little sense. It is therefore safe to assume that the phrase "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" was at least intended to import unwritten conventional rules of this type. It is part of a broader post-1867 story (which is not emphasized in this particular narrative) that those same conventions evolved as Canada moved from colony to independent nation.

2. Sovereignty of Parliament and the Protection of Rights by Means of the Common Law

Other than rights regarding the use of the English and French languages, the 1867 Act made no attempt to protect rights in a manner similar to the famous American Bill of Rights. As Dicey would soon point out, rights in the UK constitution were protected in the common law, and (so it was said) in the good sense and tolerance of the British people and Parliament. In cases such as Entick v. Carrington, British judges ensured that the executive respected the rule of law and the liberties of subjects.

Courts would not, however, invalidate acts of Parliament; Parliament remained supreme. Yet while only Parliament (not the executive) could trump the common law, it was assumed that a democratically elected Parliament would not cede its powers to the executive or attack the liberties of its own citizens. If "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" is to be given a likely meaning, then the long-standing British approach to parliamentary sovereignty and rights would have to be close to the core of that meaning.

3. The Law and Custom of Parliament

Section 18 of the 1867 Act made clear that the Parliament of Canada could define the privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate and House of Commons. However, until Parliament did so, the privileges, immunities, and powers of the Senate, House of Commons, and provincial legislatures were presumably those that had already existed in the legislatures of the British North American colonies, and in the British parliamentary tradition for far longer. These rules are essential to the running of Parliament in the British tradition. Although such rules have often been overlooked or under-emphasized by constitutional lawyers, they too are essential to the proper functioning of the Constitution in the British tradition. And again, it is difficult to understand the 1867 Act without them. It is likely, therefore, that the preamble is also referring to the law and custom of Parliament where it speaks of "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom".

3.1.3 Was the Constitution Act, 1867 ahead of its time?

The Constitution Act, 1867 was the product of negotiations at several conferences between 1864-67 among the thirty-six "Fathers of Confederation" who represented the various British North American colonies at the time. Notably absent from the negotiation table: women, people of colour, and representatives of the many Indigenous nations that had continuously occupied what would become the Dominion of Canada for thousands of years. Consistent with their absence from the negotiating table, the only mention of Indigenous people in the Constitution Act, 1867 is in s. 91(24), in which the federal Parliament was given jurisdiction over "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians."

While the Constitution Act, 1867 was primarily the product of negotiations between the 36 Fathers of Confederation, former Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin has argued that one can nevertheless finds within the document several modern Canadian constitutional values, such as respect and accommodation for minorities, as well as democracy and federalism:

> Our first constitutional moment was – by definition – the birth of the Canadian Confederation. The canned version of Canadian Confederation is simple. In 1867, a few British-ruled colonies in the north-eastern part of North America got together to form a country with its own Parliament and provincial Legislatures. Well, sort of a country, since ties to England remained firmly fixed both in culture and letter of the law.
> The reality, however, was more complicated. Confederation was the result of a need to accommodate three diverse groups that signed the original Confederation pact – the English Canadians in Ontario, the French Canadians in Quebec, and the eastern colonies. English-Canadian politicians from central Canada, admiring the highly centralized form of government in the United Kingdom, and influenced by the influx of United Empire Loyalists who fled the American Civil War, wanted a strong central government, which incidentally, they would control. French Canadian politicians, by contrast, were acutely aware that they would be a minority in the new Parliament of Canada, and therefore insisted that the provincial Legislatures be vested with enough power to safeguard the French language and culture, the civil law, and the Roman Catholic religion in Quebec. And on the seaboard, the politicians wanted to protect their way of life, their privileges and their traditions.
> These concerns dictated the constitutional form of the new country of Canada: a federation that gave each colony the powers necessary to protect its interests and culture. Only a federal union could provide each colony with the safeguards needed to preserve the new country's distinct culture and traditions.
> Looking back, we can identify three values that animated the Constitution that was conceived and ultimately subscribed to: democracy; federalism; and respect for minorities and accommodation.
> The new country was democratic. The pre-confederation colonies had fought long and hard for the principles of representation by population and responsible government, and were not about to let them go. It was therefore no surprise that the new constitution should be grounded in the basic democratic idea that the people should rule through their elected representatives.
> The new country was also federalist. The differences between the colonies – particularly between Quebec and the other colonies – made any other solution untenable. At the heart of the Constitution lay sections 91 and 92, listing the respective federal and provincial powers. Scholars argue that the original intent of the framers of the Constitution – as expressed through the allocation of federal-provincial powers, the federal Parliament's power to disallow provincial statutes, and the residual federal responsibility over peace, order and good government – was that the federal power should dominate. Be that as it may, over the decades that followed the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council put a distinctly regional stamp on the Constitution and today, cooperative federalism is the dominant norm.
> The third value that animated the 1867 Constitution is respect for diversity and minorities. Deep linguistic and religious differences divided the country at its inception. Respect of differences and the equal worth of different cultures were radical ideas in 1867 – an era when nation states defined themselves in terms of uniformity and fought wars to oust diversity. The new nation of Canada, uniting French Catholic and Anglo-Protestant colonies, had no choice but to take a different course and accept diversity. Difference and the right to preserve difference were, quite simply, the price of unity. And continue to be, to this day.
> To recap, Canada's first and defining moment, Confederation, grounded the nation in three values that were to prove lasting – democracy, federalism, and respect for difference and diversity.[14]

Do you agree with Chief Justice McLachlin's characterization of the Constitution Act, 1867?

3.2 Independence from the United Kingdom

Canada's path to independence from the United Kingdom was a gradual process, not a single event. It involved the evolution of self-governance within the British Empire and culminated in full legal sovereignty (including the power to amend its own constitution) with the passage of the Constitution Act, 1982. Some of the key milestones in that regard include:

- 1867: Confederation. As discussed above, the British North America Act united Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick into the Dominion of Canada. While this marked a significant step towards self-governance, Canada remained under British control in some areas.
- 1926: The Balfour Declaration. It declared that the United Kingdom and the "Dominions" (which included Canada) were "...autonomous Communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations." This declaration acknowledged, among other things, Canada's autonomy in the area of foreign affairs.
- 1931: The Statute of Westminster. This statute gave full legislative independence from the United Kingdom to Canada (as well as the Dominions of Australia, New Zealand South Africa, Ireland and Newfoundland, which did not become a Canadian province until 1949).
- 1949: The Supreme Court Act was amended to abolish appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in civil matters (appeals to the Privy Council for criminal matters were abolished in 1933). This made the Supreme Court of Canada a true apex court of final appeal that was no longer subject to overturn from the courts of the United Kingdom.
- 1982: The Constitution Act, 1982. Canada's constitution was "patriated," giving Canada the sole authority to amend the Constitution in the future (without needing to request that the UK Parliament pass legislation to give such an amendment effect).

3.3 The Constitution Act, 1982

After a protracted period of difficult negotiations between the federal government of Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau and provincial governments, in 1981, the Parliament of Canada formally requested that the Parliament of the United Kingdom give up its power to amend the Constitution of Canada. This led to the enactment of the Canada Act, 1982 by the Parliament of the United Kingdom. This legislation represented the formal "patriation" of the Constitution in that it transferred to Canada the power to amend its own Constitution. Schedule B to the Canada Act, 1982 was the newly entrenched Constitution Act, 1982.

The Constitution Act, 1982 has several parts:

- Part I, which includes ss. 1-34, sets out the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- Part II, which includes s. 35, recognizes and affirms the "existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada." The "aboriginal peoples of Canada" are defined as including the "Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada."
- Part III, which includes ss. 36, commits the federal Parliament and government to "the principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation.
- Part IV, which included the now repealed ss. 37 and 37.1, provided for the convening of constitutional conferences involving the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces.
- Part V, which includes ss. 38-51, sets out a detailed procedure for the amendment of the Constitution.
- Part VII, which includes ss. 52-61 covers various general provisions. Most notably, the "supremacy clause" in s. 52 provides that "[t]he Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect."
- A Schedule, which lists a number of statutes that are incorporated by reference into the Constitution of Canada. These include the Constitution Act, 1867, the Statute of Westminster, 1931 and various statutes through which different provinces joined confederation after 1867.

3.3.1 The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

> Rights and freedoms in Canada
> 1 The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.
> Fundamental freedoms
> 2 Everyone has the following fundamental freedoms:
> (a) freedom of conscience and religion;
> (b) freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication;
> (c) freedom of peaceful assembly; and
> (d) freedom of association.
> Democratic rights of citizens
> 3 Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.
> Mobility of citizens
> 6 (1) Every citizen of Canada has the right to enter, remain in and leave Canada.
> Rights to move and gain livelihood
> (2) Every citizen of Canada and every person who has the status of a permanent resident of Canada has the right
> (a) to move to and take up residence in any province; and
> (b) to pursue the gaining of a livelihood in any province.
> Limitation
> (3) The rights specified in subsection (2) are subject to

(a) any laws or practices of general application in force in a province other than those that discriminate among persons primarily on the basis of province of present or previous residence; and

(b) any laws providing for reasonable residency requirements as a qualification for the receipt of publicly provided social services.

Affirmative action programs

(4) Subsections (2) and (3) do not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration in a province of conditions of individuals in that province who are socially or economically disadvantaged if the rate of employment in that province is below the rate of employment in Canada.

Life, liberty and security of person

7 Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Search or seizure

8 Everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure.

Detention or imprisonment

9 Everyone has the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned.

Arrest or detention

10 Everyone has the right on arrest or detention

(a) to be informed promptly of the reasons therefor;

(b) to retain and instruct counsel without delay and to be informed of that right; and

(c) to have the validity of the detention determined by way of habeas corpus and to be released if the detention is not lawful.

Proceedings in criminal and penal matters

11 Any person charged with an offence has the right

(a) to be informed without unreasonable delay of the specific offence;

(b) to be tried within a reasonable time;

(c) not to be compelled to be a witness in proceedings against that person in respect of the offence;

(d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal;

(e) not to be denied reasonable bail without just cause;

(f) except in the case of an offence under military law tried before a military tribunal, to the benefit of trial by jury where the maximum punishment for the offence is imprisonment for five years or a more severe punishment;

(g) not to be found guilty on account of any act or omission unless, at the time of the act or omission, it constituted an offence under Canadian or international law or was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by the community of nations;

(h) if finally acquitted of the offence, not to be tried for it again and, if finally found guilty and punished for the offence, not to be tried or punished for it again; and

(i) if found guilty of the offence and if the punishment for the offence has been varied between the time of commission and the time of sentencing, to the benefit of the lesser punishment.

Treatment or punishment

12 Everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment or punishment.

Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law

15 (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Affirmative action programs

(2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Enforcement of guaranteed rights and freedoms

24 (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

Exclusion of evidence bringing administration of justice into disrepute

(2) Where, in proceedings under subsection (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all the circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.

Multicultural heritage

27 This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

Rights guaranteed equally to both sexes

28 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

Application of Charter

32 (1) This Charter applies

(a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and

(b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

Exception

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), section 15 shall not have effect until three years after this section comes into force.

Exception where express declaration

33 (1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

Operation of exception

(2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.

Five-year limitation

(3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.

Re-enactment

(4) Parliament or the legislature of a province may re-enact a declaration made under subsection (1).

Five-year limitation

(5) Subsection (3) applies in respect of a re-enactment made under subsection (4).

Citation

34 This Part may be cited as the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

3.3.1.1 Notes/Questions:

- Section 27 of the South African Bill of Rights provides that "27. (1) Everyone has the right to have access to— (a) health care services, including reproductive health care; (b) sufficient food and water; and (c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance. (2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights. (3) No one may be refused emergency medical treatment." The Charter does not have any comparable provisions that seem to explicitly require the state to act positively in order to ensure that rights are protected. Why do you think that such provisions were not included in the Charter? Should they have been?

3.4 Constitutional Amendment

The topic of constitutional amendment is covered more thoroughly in Chapter 4. For now, recall that Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 sets out the procedure by which the Constitution may be amended. It sets out four categories of amending procedures:

- The general amending procedure — the "7/50" procedure — (s. 38) which requires resolutions of the Senate, the House of Commons, and legislative assemblies of at least seven provinces whose population represents, in the aggregate, at least half of the current population of all the provinces.
- The unanimous consent procedure (s. 41), which applies to certain changes deemed fundamental by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982.
- The special arrangements procedure (s. 43), which applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces.
- The unilateral federal and provincial procedures, which allow unilateral amendment of aspects of government institutions that engage purely federal or provincial interests (ss. 44 and 45).

These amendment procedures were described and discussed in Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32 (CanLII), [2014] 1 SCR 704, in which the Court had to determine what procedure was required in order to reform or abolish the Senate:

C. The Part V Amending Procedures

[28] Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides the blueprint for how to amend the Constitution of Canada (see Appendix). It tells us what changes Parliament and the provincial legislatures can make unilaterally, what changes require substantial federal and provincial consent, and what changes require unanimous agreement.

(1) History

[29] The Part V amending formula reflects the principle that constitutional change that engages provincial interests requires both the consent of Parliament and a significant degree of provincial consent. Prior to patriation, constitutional amendment in Canada required the adoption of a law by the British Parliament following a joint resolution addressed to it by the Senate and the House of Commons, since the Constitution Act, 1867 was an Act of the British Parliament. There was no formal requirement for consultation with the provinces. However, in practice, throughout the 20th century, the federal government consulted with the provinces on constitutional amendments that directly affected federal-provincial relations, and obtained their consent before putting a joint address to the British Parliament: Canada, Minister of Justice, The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (1965) ("Favreau"), at pp. 15-16. By the time of patriation, this practice had ripened into a constitutional convention requiring substantial consent to constitutional change directly affecting federal-provincial relations: Reference re Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753 (the "Patriation Reference"), at pp. 889-95; Reference re Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1982 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 793.

[30] Beginning in the 1930s, the federal government and the provinces held a series of conferences to discuss the possibility of adopting a formal amending formula. This produced several proposals: see in particular the Fulton-Favreau formula in Favreau, at pp. 110-15; and the Victoria Charter, in Constitutional Conference: Proceedings (1971), App. B. In October 1980, amid efforts to achieve broad constitutional reform, the federal government tabled a new proposed amending formula in the House of Commons and the Senate: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", in The Canadian Constitution 1980: Proposed Resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada (1980). In response, the provincial premiers developed a counter-proposal that became the template for Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 — the "April Accord" of 1981: Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan (1981).

[31] The April Accord, and ultimately Part V, reflect the political consensus that the provinces must have a say in constitutional changes that engage their interests. The "underlying purpose" of these documents is "to constrain unilateral federal powers to effect constitutional change": P. J. Monahan and B. Shaw, Constitutional Law (4th ed. 2013), at p. 204; Supreme Court Act Reference, at paras. 98-100. They also consecrate the principle of "the constitutional equality of provinces as equal partners in Confederation": Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan, General Comment in Part A, at p. 1. In principle, no province stands above the others with respect to constitutional amendments, and all provinces are given the same rights in the process of amendment. The result is an amending formula designed to foster dialogue between the federal government and the provinces on matters of constitutional change, and to protect Canada's constitutional status quo until such time as reforms are agreed upon.

(2) The Amending Procedures

[32] Part V contains four categories of amending procedures. The first is the general amending procedure (s. 38, complemented by s. 42), which requires a substantial degree of consensus between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The second is the unanimous consent procedure (s. 41), which applies to certain changes deemed fundamental by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982. The third is the special arrangements procedure (s. 43), which applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces. The fourth is made up of the unilateral federal and provincial procedures, which allow unilateral amendment of aspects of government institutions that engage purely federal or provincial interests (ss. 44 and 45).

3.5 Unwritten Constitutional Principles

3.5.1 Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34

[This case concerned a constitutional challenge to provincial legislation that significantly reduced the number of electoral districts in the city of Toronto. Controversially, the legislation was passed well into an ongoing election. The legislation was challenged as being unconstitutional both on the grounds that it violated the right to freedom of expression in s. 2(b) of the Charter, but also on the basis that it violated the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. This gave the Court the opportunity to lay out the proper role that unwritten constitutional principles play and, crucially, whether they can be deployed on their own to invalidate legislation.]

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ. was delivered by THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND BROWN J. —

(1) Interpretive and Gap-Filling Roles of Unwritten Constitutional Principles

[49] The Constitution of Canada embodies written and unwritten norms. This Court has recognized that our Constitution describes an architecture of the institutions of state and of their relationship to citizens that connotes certain underlying principles (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3, at para. 93; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 50-51). These principles, such as democracy and the rule of law, "infuse our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 50). Although not recorded outside of "oblique reference[s]" in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and to the Constitution Act, 1982 (para. 51), these principles are "foundational" (para. 49), without which "it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure" (para. 51). These principles have "full legal force" and may give rise to substantive legal obligations (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753, at p. 845). "[L]ike all principles of political morality, [they] can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches" (C.A. reasons, at para. 84, citing British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 SCR 473, at para. 52).

[50] Unwritten principles are therefore part of the law of our Constitution, in the sense that they form part of the context and backdrop to the Constitution's written terms. Our colleague Abella J. seizes upon a statement from a dissenting opinion in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution to support the proposition that "full legal force" necessarily includes the power to invalidate legislation. But the complete passage in Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, and the jurisprudence cited therein, demonstrates that Martland and Ritchie JJ. are discussing federalism and, while specific aspects of federalism may be unwritten and judicially developed, it is indisputable that federalism has a strong textual basis. Nor does our colleague's reliance upon MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 SCR 725 (at para. 176), support the capacity of unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation, since the finding there was that granting exclusive jurisdiction to the youth court would infringe ss. 96 to 101 and 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Regardless, any uncertainty on the question of whether unwritten constitutional principles may invalidate legislation that may have remained after the Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution and the Secession Reference was, as we will explain, fully put to rest in Imperial Tobacco.

[51] Further, the authorities she cites as "recogniz[ing] that unwritten constitutional principles have full legal force and can serve as substantive limitations on all branches of government" (para. 166) do not support the proposition that unwritten constitutional principles can be applied to invalidate legislation. Indeed, it is quite the contrary — for example, in R. (on the application of Miller) v. Prime Minister, [2019] UKSC 41, [2020] A.C. 373, at para. 41, the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom stated that the constitutional principle of parliamentary sovereignty means that legislation itself ("laws enacted by the Crown in Parliament"), under the Constitution of the United Kingdom, remains "the supreme form of law". While courts in the United Kingdom may find primary legislation to be inconsistent with the European Convention on Human Rights, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, they may only issue a declaration of incompatibility (Human Rights Act 1998 (U.K.), 1998, c. 42, s. 4); they have not used unwritten constitutional principles to invalidate legislation.

[52] Our colleague is concerned about the "rare case" where "legislation [that] elides the reach of any express constitutional provision . . . is fundamentally at odds with our Constitution's 'internal architecture' or 'basic constitutional structure'" and recourse must be had to unwritten constitutional principles (para. 170, quoting Secession Reference, at para. 50, and OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 57). But it is inconceivable that legislation which is repugnant to our "basic constitutional structure" would not infringe the Constitution itself. And that structure, recorded in the Constitution's text (as we discuss below), is interpreted with the aid of unwritten constitutional principles. This is clear from the context of Martland and Ritchie JJ.'s statement that unwritten principles have "full legal force in the sense of being employed to strike down legislative enactments" (Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, at p. 845). As noted above, that case was about federalism, as was the jurisprudence cited in support of their statement; Martland and Ritchie JJ. were describing the "constitutional requirements that are derived from the federal character of Canada's Constitution" (pp. 844-45 (emphasis added)). And this is precisely the point while the specific aspects of federalism at issue there may not have been found in the express terms of the Constitution, federalism is.

[53] To explain, federalism is fully enshrined in the structure of our Constitution, because it is enshrined in the text that is constitutive thereof —— particularly, but not exclusively, in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Structures are not comprised of unattached externalities; they are embodiments of their constituent, conjoined parts. The structure of our Constitution is identified by way of its actual provisions, recorded in its text. This is why our colleague can offer no example of legislation that would undermine the structure of the Constitution that cannot be addressed as we propose, which is via purposive textual interpretation. It is also why, once "constitutional structure" is properly understood, it becomes clear that, when our colleague invokes "constitutional structure", she is in substance inviting judicial invalidation of legislation in a manner that is wholly untethered from that structure.

[54] Ultimately, what "full legal force" means is dependent on the particular context. Any legal instrument or device, such as a contract or a will or a rule, has "full legal force" within its proper ambit. Our colleague's position — that because unwritten constitutional principles have "full legal force", they must necessarily be capable of invalidating legislation — assumes the answer to the preliminary but essential question: what is the "full legal force" of unwritten constitutional principles? And in our view, because they are unwritten, their "full legal force" is realized not in supplementing the written text of our Constitution as "provisions of the Constitution" with which no law may be inconsistent and remain of "force or effect" under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Unwritten constitutional principles are not "provisions of the Constitution". Their legal force lies in their representation of general principles within which our constitutional order operates and, therefore, by which the Constitution's written terms — its provisions — are to be given effect. In practical terms, this means that unwritten constitutional principles may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways.

[55] First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Indeed, that is the "full legal force" that this Court described in Secession Reference (para. 54). In this way, the unwritten constitutional principles of judicial independence and the rule of law have aided in the interpretation of ss. 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which have come to safeguard the core jurisdiction of the courts which fall within the scope of those provisions (Provincial Court Judges Reference, at paras. 88-89; MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 10-11 and 27-28; Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 SCR 31, at paras. 29-33). When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing "the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, . . . the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, [and] the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 7, quoting Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344; see also R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, at para. 32).

[56] Secondly, and relatedly, unwritten principles can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution per se, but necessary to the coherence of, and flowing by implication from, its architecture. In this way, structural doctrines can fill gaps and address important questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent, such as the doctrine of full faith and credit (Morguard Investments Ltd. v. De Savoye, 1990 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 1077; Hunt v. T&N plc, 1993 CanLII 43 (SCC), [1993] 4 SCR 289); the doctrine of paramountcy (Huson v. The Township of South Norwich (1895), 1895 CanLII 1 (SCC), 24 SCR 145); the remedy of suspended declarations of invalidity (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 721); and the obligations to negotiate that would follow a declaration of secession by a province (Secession Reference).

[57] Neither of these functions support the proposition advanced by the City that the force of unwritten principles extends to invalidating legislation. Indeed, the truth of the matter is to the contrary. Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.

[58] First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers (Imperial Tobacco, at paras. 53-54, 60 and 64-67; J. Leclair, "Canada's Unfathomable Unwritten Constitutional Principles" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 389, at pp. 427-32). Our colleague's approach, which invites the use of unwritten constitutional principles in a manner that is wholly untethered from the text, ignores this fundamental concern.

[59] Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter — rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority — the concep[t] of democracy . . . ha[s] no canonical formulatio[n]" (C.A. reasons, at para. 85). Unlike the written text of the Constitution, then, which "promotes legal certainty and predictability" in the exercise of judicial review (Secession Reference, at para. 53), the nebulous nature of the unwritten principles makes them susceptible to be interpreted so as to "render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). Accordingly, there is good reason to insist that "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box" (para. 66). In our view, this statement should be understood as covering all possible bases for claims of right (i.e., "unjust or unfair" or otherwise normatively deficient).

[60] We add this. Were a court to rely on unwritten constitutional principles, in whole or in part, to invalidate legislation, the consequences of this judicial error would be of particular significance given two provisions of our Charter. First, s. 33 preserves a limited right of legislative override. Where, therefore, a court invalidates legislation using s. 2(b) of the Charter, the legislature may give continued effect to its understanding of what the Constitution requires by invoking s. 33 and by meeting its stated conditions (D. Newman, "Canada's Notwithstanding Clause, Dialogue, and Constitutional Identities", in G. Sigalet, G. Webber and R. Dixon, eds., Constitutional Dialogue: Rights, Democracy, Institutions (2019), 209, at p. 232). Were, however, a court to rely not on s. 2(b) but instead upon an unwritten constitutional principle to invalidate legislation, this undeniable aspect of the constitutional bargain would effectively be undone, since s. 33 applies to permit legislation to operate "notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15" only. Secondly, s. 1 provides a basis for the state to justify limits on "the rights and freedoms set out" in the Charter. Unwritten constitutional principles, being unwritten, are not "set out" in the Charter. To find, therefore, that they can ground a constitutional violation would afford the state no corresponding justificatory mechanism.

[61] Our colleague says that the application of s. 33 "is not directly before us" (para. 182). As the City has advanced its claim on the basis of s. 2(b), coupled with the unwritten principle of democracy, the prospect of circumventing s. 33's application to the invalidation of legislation under s. 2(b) by recourse to unwritten constitutional principles is indeed squarely before us.

[63] In sum, and contrary to the submissions of the City, unwritten constitutional principles cannot serve as bases for invalidating legislation. A careful review of the Court's jurisprudence supports this conclusion.

V. Conclusion

[85] We would dismiss the appeal.

3.6 Unwritten Constitutional Conventions

In 1981, the federal Parliament, led by Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau, wished to pass a resolution requesting that the Parliament of the United Kingdom pass legislation that would amend the Constitution Act, 1867, add a domestic amendment formula (which would allow Canada to modify the Constitution itself) and entrench a new Charter of Rights and Freedoms. At the time, eight provinces opposed the plan, while Ontario and New Brunswick approved.

In what became known as the Patriation Reference, the Supreme Court of Canada was asked to determine whether (a) it was within the legislative competence of the federal Parliament to unilaterally make the request without provincial consent; and (b) whether there existed a constitutional convention that required provincial governments to agree before any such request was made by the federal government.

With regard to the first question, a majority of the Court concluded that the proposed resolution requesting the amendment of the Canadian Constitution by the United Kingdom Parliament was within the legislative competence of the Houses of the Parliament of Canada notwithstanding the fact that it affected provincial legislative powers. The Court's discussion of the second question is set out below.

3.6.1 Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753

MARTLAND, RITCHIE, DICKSON, BEETZ, CHOUINARD AND LAMER JJ.—

I—The nature of constitutional conventions

A substantial part of the rules of the Canadian constitution are written. They are contained not in a single document called a constitution but in a great variety of statutes some of which have been enacted by the Parliament at Westminster, such as the British North America Act, 1867, 1867 (U.K.), c. 3, (the B.N.A. Act) or by the Parliament of Canada, such as The Alberta Act, 1905 (Can.), c. 3, The Saskatchewan Act, 1905 (Can.), c. 42, the Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-8, or by the provincial legislatures, such as the provincial electoral acts. They are also to be found in orders in council like the Imperial Order in Council of May 16, 1871 admitting British Columbia into the Union, and the Imperial Order in Council of June 26, 1873, admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

Another part of the Constitution of Canada consists of the rules of the common law. These are rules which the courts have developed over the centuries in the discharge of their judicial duties. An important portion of these rules concerns the prerogative of the Crown. Sections 9 and 15 of the B.N.A. Act provide:

> 9. The Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.
> 15. The Commander-in-Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military Forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

But the Act does not otherwise say very much with respect to the elements of "Executive Government and Authority" and one must look at the common law to find out what they are, apart from authority delegated to the executive by statute.

The common law provides that the authority of the Crown includes for instance the prerogative of mercy or clemency[52] and the power to incorporate by charter so as to confer a general capacity analogous to that of a natural person[53]. The royal prerogative puts the Crown in a preferred position as a creditor[54] or with respect to the inheritance of lands for defect of heirs[55] or in relation to the ownership of precious metals[56] and bona vacantia[57]. It is also under the prerogative and the common law that the Crown appoints and receives ambassadors, declares war, concludes treaties and it is in the name of the Queen that passports are issued.

Those parts of the Constitution of Canada which are composed of statutory rules and common law rules are generically referred to as the law of the constitution. In cases of doubt or dispute, it is the function of the courts to declare what the law is and since the law is sometimes breached, it is generally the function of the courts to ascertain whether it has in fact been breached in specific instances and, if so, to apply such sanctions as are contemplated by the law, whether they be punitive sanctions or civil sanctions such as a declaration of nullity. Thus, when a federal or a provincial statute is found by the courts to be in excess of the legislative competence of the legislature which has enacted it, it is declared null and void and the courts refuse to give effect to it. In this sense it can be said that the law of the constitution is administered or enforced by the courts.

But many Canadians would perhaps be surprised to learn that important parts of the constitution of Canada, with which they are the most familiar because they are directly involved when they exercise their right to vote at federal and provincial elections, are nowhere to be found in the law of the constitution. For instance, it is a fundamental requirement of the constitution that if the opposition obtains the majority at the polls, the government must tender its resignation forthwith. But fundamental as it is, this requirement of the constitution does not form part of the law of the constitution.

It is also a constitutional requirement that the person who is appointed prime minister or premier by the Crown and who is the effective head of the government should have the support of the elected branch of the legislature; in practice this means in most cases the leader of the political party which has won a majority of seats at a general election. Other ministers are appointed by the Crown on the advice of the prime minister or premier when he forms or reshuffles his cabinet. Ministers must continuously have the confidence of the elected branch of the legislature, individually and collectively. Should they lose it, they must either resign or ask the Crown for a dissolution of the legislature and the holding of a general election. Most of the powers of the Crown under the prerogative are exercised only upon the advice of the prime minister of the cabinet which means that they are effectively exercised by the latter, together with the innumerable statutory powers delegated to the Crown in council.

Yet none of these essential rules of the constitution can be said to be a law of the constitution. It was apparently Dicey who, in the first edition of his Law of the Constitution, in 1885, called them the "conventions of the constitution", (see W. S. Holdsworth, "The Conventions of the Eighteenth Century Constitution" (1932), 17 Iowa Law Rev. 161), an expression which quickly became current. What Dicey described under these terms are the principles and rules of responsible government, several of which are stated above and which regulate the relations between the Crown, the prime minister, the cabinet and the two Houses of Parliament. These rules developed in Great Britain by way of custom and precedent during the nineteenth century and were exported to such British colonies as were granted self-government.

Dicey first gave the impression that constitutional conventions are a peculiarly British and modern phenomenon. But he recognized in later editions that different conventions are found in other constitutions. As Sir William Holdsworth wrote (supra, at p. 162):

> "In fact conventions must grow up at all times and in all places where the powers of government are vested in different persons or bodies—where in other words there is a mixed constitution. "The constituent parts of a state," said Burke, [French Revolution, 28.] "are obliged to hold their public faith with each other, and with all those who derive any serious interest under their engagements, as much as the whole state is bound to keep its faith with separate communities." Necessarily conventional rules spring up to regulate the working of the various parts of the constitution, their relations to one another, and to the subject."

Within the British Empire, powers of government were vested in different bodies which provided a fertile ground for the growth of new constitutional conventions unknown to Dicey and from which self-governing colonies acquired equal and independent status within the Commonwealth. Many of these culminated in the Statute of Westminster, 1931, 1931 (U.K.), c. 4.

A federal constitution provides for the distribution of powers between various legislatures and governments and may also constitute a fertile ground for the growth of constitutional conventions between those legislatures and governments. It is conceivable for instance that usage and practice might give birth to conventions in Canada relating to the holding of federal-provincial conferences, the appointment of lieutenant governors, the reservation and disallowance of provincial legislation. It was to this possibility that Duff C.J. alluded when he referred to "constitutional usage or constitutional practice" in Reference re Disallowance and Reservation of Provincial Legislation[58], at p. 78. He had previously called them "recognized constitutional conventions" in Wilson v. Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Co.[59], at p. 210.

The main purpose of constitutional conventions is to ensure that the legal framework of the constitution will be operated in accordance with the prevailing constitutional values or principles of the period. For example, the constitutional value which is the pivot of the conventions stated above and relating to responsible government is the democratic principle: the powers of the state must be exercised in accordance with the wishes of the electorate; and the constitutional value or principle which anchors the conventions regulating the relationship between the members of the Commonwealth is the independence of the former British colonies.

Being based on custom and precedent, constitutional conventions are usually unwritten rules. Some of them, however, may be reduced to writing and expressed in the proceedings and documents of imperial conferences, or in the preamble of statutes such as the Statute of Westminster, 1931, or in the proceedings and documents of federal-provincial conferences. They are often referred to and recognized in statements made by members of governments.

The conventional rules of the constitution present one striking peculiarity. In contradistinction to the laws of the constitution, they are not enforced by the courts. One reason for this situation is that, unlike common law rules, conventions are not judge-made rules. They are not based on judicial precedents but on precedents established by the institutions of government themselves. Nor are they in the nature of statutory commands which it is the function and duty of the courts to obey and enforce. Furthermore, to enforce them would mean to administer some formal sanction when they are breached. But the legal system from which they are distinct does not contemplate formal sanctions for their breach.

Perhaps the main reason why conventional rules cannot be enforced by the courts is that they are generally in conflict with the legal rules which they postulate and the courts are bound to enforce the legal rules. The conflict is not of a type which would entail the commission of any illegality. It results from the fact that legal rules create wide powers, discretions and rights which conventions prescribe should be exercised only in a certain limited manner, if at all.

Some examples will illustrate this point.

As a matter of law, the Queen, or the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor could refuse assent to every bill passed by both Houses of Parliament or by a Legislative Assembly as the case may be. But by convention they cannot of their own motion refuse to assent to any such bill on any ground, for instance because they disapprove of the policy of the bill. We have here a conflict between a legal rule which creates a complete discretion and a conventional rule which completely neutralizes it. But conventions, like laws, are sometimes violated. And if this particular convention were violated and assent were improperly withheld, the courts would be bound to enforce the law, not the convention. They would refuse to recognize the validity of a vetoed bill. This is what happened in Gallant v. The King[60], a case in keeping with the classic case of Stockdale v. Hansard[61] where the English Court of Queen's Bench held that only the Queen and both Houses of Parliament could make or unmake laws. The Lieutenant Governor who had withheld assent in Gallant apparently did so towards the end of' his term of office. Had it been otherwise, it is not inconceivable that his withholding of assent might have produced a political crisis leading to his removal from office which shows that if the remedy for a breach of a convention does not lie with the courts, still the breach is not necessarily without a remedy. The remedy lies with some other institutions of government; furthermore it is not a formal remedy and it may be administered with less certainty or regularity than it would be by a court.

Another example of the conflict between law and convention is provided by a fundamental convention already stated above: if after a general election where the opposition obtained the majority at the polls the government refused to resign and clung to office, it would thereby commit a fundamental breach of convention, one so serious indeed that it could be regarded as tantamount to a coup d'état. The remedy in this case would lie with the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor as the case might be who would be justified in dismissing the ministry and in calling on the opposition to form the government. But should the Crown be slow in taking this course, there is nothing the courts could do about it except at the risk of creating a state of legal discontinuity, that is, a form of revolution. An order or a regulation passed by a minister under statutory authority and otherwise valid could not be invalidated on the ground that, by convention, the minister ought no longer be a minister. A writ of quo warranto aimed at ministers, assuming that quo warranto lies against a minister of the Crown, which is very doubtful, would be of no avail to remove them from office. Required to say by what warrant they occupy their ministerial office, they would answer that they occupy it by the pleasure of the Crown under a commission issued by the Crown and this answer would be a complete one at law, for at law the government is in office by the pleasure of the Crown although by convention it is there by the will of the people.

This conflict between convention and law which prevents the courts from enforcing conventions also prevents conventions from crystallizing into laws, unless it be by statutory adoption.

It is because the sanctions of convention rest with institutions of government other than courts, such as the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor, or the Houses of Parliament, or with public opinion and ultimately, with the electorate, that it is generally said that they are political.

We respectfully adopt the definition of a convention given by the learned Chief Justice of Manitoba, Freedman C.J.M., in the Manitoba Reference, supra, at pp. 13-14:

> What is a constitutional convention? There is a fairly lengthy literature on the subject. Although there may be shades of difference among the constitutional lawyers, political scientists, and Judges who have contributed to that literature, the essential features of a convention may be set forth with some degree of confidence. Thus there is general agreement that a convention occupies a position somewhere in between a usage or custom on the one hand and a constitutional law on the other. There is general agreement that if one sought to fix that position with greater precision he would place convention nearer to law than to usage or custom. There is also general agreement that "a convention is a rule which is regarded as obligatory by the officials to whom it applies". Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), p. 9. There is, if not general agreement, at least weighty authority, that the sanction for breach of a convention will be political rather than legal.

It should be borne in mind however that, while they are not laws, some conventions may be more important than some laws. Their importance depends on that of the value or principle which they are meant to safeguard. Also, they form an integral part of the constitution and of the constitutional system. They come within the meaning of the word "Constitution" in the preamble of the British North America Act, 1867:

> "Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united ... with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom."

That is why it is perfectly appropriate to say that to violate a convention is to do something which is unconstitutional although it entails no direct legal consequence. But the words "constitutional" and "unconstitutional" may also be used in a strict legal sense, for instance with respect to a statute which is found ultra vires or unconstitutional. The foregoing may perhaps be summarized in an equation: constitutional conventions plus constitutional law equal the total constitution of the country.

III—Whether the convention exists

It was submitted by counsel for Canada, Ontario and New Brunswick that there is no constitutional convention, that the House of Commons and Senate of Canada will not request Her Majesty the Queen to lay before the Parliament at Westminster a measure to amend the Constitution of Canada affecting federal-provincial relationships, etc., without first obtaining the agreement of the provinces.

It was submitted by counsel for Manitoba, Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Alberta that the convention does exist, that it requires the agreement of all the provinces and that the second question in the Manitoba and Newfoundland References should accordingly be answered in the affirmative.

Counsel for Saskatchewan agreed that the question be answered in the affirmative but on a different basis. He submitted that the convention does exist and requires a measure of provincial agreement. Counsel for Saskatchewan further submitted that the Resolution before the Court has not received a sufficient measure of provincial consent.

We wish to indicate at the outset that we find ourselves in agreement with the submissions made on this issue by counsel for Saskatchewan.

1. The class of constitutional amendments contemplated by the question

Constitutional amendments fall into three categories: (1) amendments which may be made by a provincial legislature acting alone under s. 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act; (2) amendments which may be made by the Parliament of Canada acting alone under s. 91(1) of the B.N.A. Act; (3) all other amendments.

The first two categories are irrelevant for the purposes of these References. While the wording of the second and third questions of the Manitoba and Newfoundland References may be broad enough to embrace all amendments in the third category, it is not necessary for us to consider those amendments which affect federal-provincial relationships only indirectly. In a sense, most amendments of the third category are susceptible of affecting federal-provincial relationships to some extent. But we should restrict ourselves to the consideration of amendments which

"... directly affect federal-provincial relationships in the sense of changing federal and provincial legislative powers…"

The reason for this is that the second and third questions of the Manitoba and Newfoundland References must be read in the light of the first question. They must be meant to contemplate the same specific class of constitutional amendments as the ones which are sought in the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada". More particularly, they must be meant to address the same type of amendments as the Charter of Rights, which abridges federal and provincial legislative powers, and the amending formula, which would provide for the amendment of the Constitution including the distribution of legislative powers.

These proposed amendments present one essential characteristic: they directly affect federal-provincial relationships in changing legislative powers and in providing for a formula to effect such change.

Therefore, in essence although not in terms, the issue raised by the second question in the Manitoba and Newfoundland References is whether there is a constitutional convention for agreement of the provinces to amendments which change legislative powers and provide for a method of effecting such change. The same issue is raised by Question B of the Quebec Reference above quoted in part.

2. Requirements for establishing a convention

The requirements for establishing a convention bear some resemblance with those which apply to customary law. Precedents and usage are necessary but do not suffice. They must be normative. We adopt the following passage of Sir W. Ivor Jennings, The Law and the Constitution (5th ed., 1959), at p. 136:

> "We have to ask ourselves three questions: first, what are the precedents; secondly, did the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule; and thirdly, is there a reason for the rule? A single precedent with a good reason may be enough to establish the rule. A whole string of precedents without such a reason will be of no avail, unless it is perfectly certain that the persons concerned regarded them as bound by it."

[The majority of the Court went on to apply this test to the proposed constitutional convention.]

IV—Conclusion

We have reached the conclusion that the agreement of the provinces of Canada, no views being expressed as to its quantification, is constitutionally required for the passing of the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" and that the passing of this Resolution without such agreement would be unconstitutional in the conventional sense.

3.6.2 Notes/ Questions:

- On September 28, 1981, the Supreme Court of Canada released its decision in the Patriation Reference (on live television, for the first time). The Court ruled that the federal government had the right, by letter of the law, to proceed with the unilateral patriation of the constitution.
- However, the Court also ruled that a unilateral patriation was not in accordance with constitutional convention. Although the courts enforce laws, not constitutional conventions, the court's decision stated that agreement by a "substantial" number of premiers would be required to abide by the convention. This number was not defined.
- Prime Minister Trudeau, in his memoirs, paraphrased the court's decision in the Patriation Reference as saying that "patriation was legal, but not nice."

- What are some of the advantages and disadvantages of having significant aspects of a governmental system operate in accordance with constitutional conventions that may not be enforced by the courts?

4 How is the Constitution Interpreted?

While the courts have deployed a variety of methods when interpreting the Canadian constitution (e.g. textual, historical, structural, or contextual analyses), two dominant approaches stand out: (a) the "living tree" doctrine (which can be contrasted with an "originalist" or "frozen concepts" approach); and (b) the "purposive" approach to constitutional interpretation.

4.1 The Living Tree Doctrine

The crux of the living tree doctrine is that since society changes over time, the interpretation given to the broad terms set out in a constitution, which are capable of a wide variety of meanings, must change as well.

Though it is now a foundational doctrine that is frequently invoked by Canadian courts when interpreting the constitution,[15] the living tree doctrine was first articulated by Lord Sankey of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Edwards v. Canada (Attorney General), [1930] AC 124, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC). As is noted above, this famous decision has become known as the "Persons Case" because it concerned the question of whether women were "persons" within the meaning of s. 24 of the British North America Act such that they were eligible for appointment to the Senate.

Notably, the Privy Council in the Persons Case overturned the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, whose interpretation typified the "frozen concepts" or originalist approach to constitutional interpretation. What follows are excerpts from the Supreme Court of Canada's decision and then that of the Privy Council.

4.1.1 Reference re meaning of the word "Persons" in s.24 of British North America Act, 1928 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1928] SCR 276

> Anglin C.J.C.—By Order of the 19th of October, 1927, made on a petition of five ladies, His Excellency the Governor in Council was pleased to refer to this court "for hearing and consideration" the question:
> "Does the word 'Persons' in section 24 of the British North America Act, 1867, include female persons?"
> Section 24 is one of a group, or fasciculus of sections in the British North America Act, 1867, numbered 21 to 36, which provides for the constitution of the Senate of Canada. This group of sections (omitting three which are irrelevant to the question before us) reads as follows:
> THE SENATE
> 21. The Senate shall, subject to the Provisions of this Act, consist of Seventy-two Members, who shall be styled Senators.
> * * * *
> 23. The Qualification of a Senator shall be as follows:
> (1) He shall be of the full age of Thirty Years;
> (2) He shall be either a Natural-born Subject of the Queen, or a Subject of the Queen naturalized by an Act of the Parliament of Great Britain, or of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of the Legislature of One of the Provinces of Upper Canada, Lower Canada, Canada, Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, before the Union, or of the Parliament of Canada after the Union;
> (3) He shall be legally or equitably seised as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in free and common Socage, or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Francalleu or in Roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the value of Four thousand Dollars, over and above all Rents, Dues, Debts, Charges, Mortgages, and Incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same;
> (4) His Real and Personal Property shall be together worth Four Thousand Dollars over and above his Debts and Liabilities;
> (5) He shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed;
> (6) In the case of Quebec he shall have his Real Property Qualification in the Electoral Division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that Division.
> 24. The Governor General shall from Time to Time, in the Queen's Name, by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified Persons to the Senate; and, subject to the Provisions of this Act, every Person so summoned shall become and be a Member of the Senate and a Senator.
> 25. Such Persons shall be first summoned to the Senate as the Queen by Warrant under Her Majesty's Royal Sign Manual thinks fit to approve, and their Names shall be inserted in the Queen's Proclamation of Union.
> 26. If at any Time on the Recommendation of the Governor General the Queen thinks fit to direct that Three or Six Members be added to the Senate, the Governor General may by Summons to Three or Six qualified Persons (as the Case may be), representing equally the Three Divisions of Canada, add to the Senate accordingly.
> 27. In case of such Addition being at any Time made the Governor General shall not summon any Person to the Senate, except on a further like Direction by the Queen on the like Recommendation, until each of the Three Divisions of Canada is represented by Twenty-four Senators and no more.
> 28. The Number of Senators shall not at any Time exceed Seventy-eight.
> 29. A Senator shall, subject to the Provisions of this Act, hold his Place in the Senate for Life.
> 30. A Senator may by Writing under his Hand addressed to the Governor General resign his Place in the Senate, and thereupon the same shall be vacant.
> 31. The Place of a Senator shall become vacant in any of the following Cases:—
> (1) If for Two consecutive Sessions of the Parliament he fails to give his Attendance in the Senate.
> (2) If he takes an Oath or makes a Declaration or Acknowledgment of Allegiance, Obedience, or Adherence to a Foreign Power, or does an Act whereby he becomes a Subject or Citizen, or entitled to the Rights or Privileges of a Subject or Citizen, of a Foreign Power;
> (3) If he is adjudged Bankrupt or Insolvent, or applies for the Benefit of any Law relating to Insolvent Debtors, or becomes a public Defaulter;
> (4) If he is attainted of Treason or convicted of Felony or any Infamous Crime;

(5) If he ceases to be qualified in respect of Property or of Residence; provided that a Senator shall not be deemed to have ceased to be qualified in respect of Residence by reason only of his residing at the Seat of the Government of Canada while holding an Office under that Government requiring his Presence there.

32. When a Vacancy happens in the Senate by Resignation, Death, or otherwise, the Governor General shall by summons to a fit and qualified Person fill the Vacancy.

33. If any question arises respecting the qualification of a Senator or a Vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate.

35. Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the Presence of at least Fifteen Senators, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a Meeting of the Senate for the Exercise of its Powers.

The British North America Act, 1867, does not contain provisions in regard to the Senate corresponding to its sections 41 and 52, which, respectively, empower the Parliament of Canada from time to time to alter the qualifications or disqualifications of persons to be elected to the House of Commons and to determine the number of members of which that House shall consist. Except in regard to the number of Senators required to constitute a quorum (s. 35), the provisions affecting the constitution of the Senate are subject to alteration only by the Imperial Parliament.

Section 33 which empowers the Senate to hear and determine any question that may arise respecting the qualification of a Senator, applies only after the person whose qualification is challenged has been appointed or summoned to the Senate. That section is probably no more than declaratory of a right inherent in every parliamentary body. (Vide clause 1 of the preamble to the B.N.A. Act and the quotation of Lord Lyndhurst's language made from Mac-Queen's Debates on The Life Peerage Question, at p. 300, by Viscount Haldane in Viscountess Rhondda's Claim[1].

It should be observed that, while the question now submitted by His Excellency to the court deals with the word "Persons," section 24 of the B.N.A. Act speaks only of "qualified Persons"; and the other sections empowering the Governor General to make appointments to the Senate (26 and 32) speak, respectively, of "qualified Persons" and of "fit and qualified Persons." The question which we have to consider, therefore, is whether "female persons" are qualified to be summoned to the Senate by the Governor General; or, in other words—Are women eligible for appointment to the Senate of Canada? That question it is the duty of the court to "answer" and to "certify to the Governor in Council for his information * * * its opinion * * * with the reasons for * * * such answer." Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. [1927] c. 35, s. 55, subs. 2.

In considering this matter we are, of course, in no wise concerned with the desirability or the undesirability of the presence of women in the Senate, nor with any political aspect of the question submitted. Our whole duty is to construe, to the best of our ability, the relevant provisions of the B.N.A. Act, 1867, and upon that construction to base our answer.

Passed in the year 1867, the various provisions of the B.N.A. Act (as is the case with other statutes, Bank of Toronto v. Lambe)[2] bear to-day the same construction which the courts would, if then required to pass upon them, have given to them when they were first enacted. If the phrase "qualified persons" in s. 24 includes women to-day, it has so included them since 1867.

"In deciding the question before us", said Turner L. J., in Hawkins v. Gathercole, > we have to construe not merely the words of the Act of Parliament but the intent of the Legislature as collected, from the cause and necessity of the Act being made, from a comparison of its several parts and from foreign (meaning extraneous) circumstances so far as they can be justly considered to throw light upon the subject.

Two well-known rules in the construction of statutes are that, where a statute is susceptible of more than one meaning, in the absence of express language an intention to abrogate the ordinary rules of law is not to be imputed to Parliament (Wear Commissioners v. Adamson[5]); and, as they are framed for the guidance of the people, their language is to be considered in its ordinary and popular sense, per Byles J., in Chorlton v. Lings[6].

Two outstanding facts or circumstances of importance bearing upon the present reference appear to be

(a) that the office of Senator was a new office first created by the B.N.A. Act. It is an office, therefore, which no one apart from the enactments of the statute has an inherent or common law right of holding, and the right of any one to hold the office must be found within the four corners of of the statute which creates the office, and enacts the conditions upon which it is to be held, and the persons who are entitled to hold it; (Beresford-Hope v. Sandhurst[7], per Lord Coleridge, C.J.);

(b) that by the common law of England (as also, speaking generally, by the civil and the canon law: foeminae ab omnibus officiis civilibus vel publicis remotae sunt) women were under a legal incapacity to hold public office, referable to the fact (as Willes J., said in Chorlton v. Lings[8], that in this country in modern times, chiefly out of respect to women, and a sense of decorum, and not from their want of intellect, or their being for any other such reason unfit to take part in the government of the country, they have been excused from taking any share in this department of public affairs.

Prior to 1867 the common law legal incapacity of women to sit in Parliament had been fully recognized in the three provinces—Canada (Upper and Lower), Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, which were then confederated as the Dominion of Canada.

Moreover, paraphrasing an observation of Lord Coleridge C.J., in Beresford-Hope v. Sandhurst, it is not also perhaps to be entirely left out of sight, that in the sixty years which have run since 1867, the questions of the rights and privileges of women have not been, as in former times they were, asleep. On the contrary, we know as a matter of fact that the rights of women, and the privileges of women, have been much discussed, and able and acute minds have been much exercised as to what privileges ought to be conceded to women. That has been going on, and surely it is a significant fact, that never from 1867 to the present time has any woman ever sat in the Senate of Canada, nor has any suggestion of women's eligibility for appointment to that House until quite recently been publicly made.

Has the Imperial Parliament, in sections 23, 24, 25, 26 and 32 of the B.N.A. Act, read in the light of other provisions of the statute and of relevant circumstances proper to be considered, given to women the capacity to exercise the public functions of a Senator? Has it made clear its intent to effect, so far as the personnel of the Senate of Canada is concerned, the striking constitutional departure from the common law for which the petitioners contend, which would have rendered women eligible for appointment to the Senate at a time when they were neither qualified to sit in the House of Commons nor to vote for candidates for membership in that House? Has it not rather by clear implication, if not expressly, excluded them from membership in the Senate? Such an extraordinary privilege is not conferred furtively, nor is the purpose to grant it to be gathered from remote conjectures deduced from a skilful piecing together of expressions in a statute which are more or less precisely accurate. (Nairn v. University of St. Andrews[19]). When Parliament contemplates such a decided innovation it is never at a loss for language to make its intention unmistakable. "A judgment", said Lord Robertson in the case last mentioned, at pp. 165-6 > is wholesome and of good example which puts forward subject-matter and fundamental constitutional law as guides of construction never to be neglected in favour of verbal possibilities.

There can be no doubt that the word "persons" when standing alone prima facie includes women. (Per Lore-burn L.C., Nairn v. University of St. Andrews[18]). It connotes human beings—the criminal and the insane equally with the good and the wise citizen, the minor as well as the adult. Hence the propriety of the restriction placed upon it by the immediately preceding word "qualified" in ss. 24 and 26 and the words "fit and qualified" in s. 32, which exclude the criminal and the lunatic or imbecile as well as the minor, who is explicitly disqualified by s. 23 (1). Does this requirement of qualification also exclude women?

Ex facie, and apart from their designation as "Senators" (s. 21), the terms in which the qualifications of members of the Senate are specified in s. 23 (and it is to those terms that reference is made by the word "qualified" in s. 24) import that men only are eligible for appointment. In every clause of s. 23 the Senator is referred to by the masculine pronoun—"he" and "his"; and the like observation applies to ss. 29 and 31. Frost v. The King[20]. Moreover, clause 2 of section 23 includes only "natural-born" subjects and those "naturalized" under statutory authority and not those who become subjects by marriage—a provision which one would have looked for had it been intended to include women as eligible.

We are, for these reasons, of the opinion that women are not eligible for appointment by the Governor General to the Senate of Canada under Section 24 of the British North America Act, 1867, because they are not "qualified persons" within the meaning of that section. The question submitted, understood as above indicated, will, accordingly, be answered in the negative.

4.1.2 Edwards v. Canada (Attorney General), 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC)

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord Sankey, L.C.:

By sec. 24 of the British North America Act, 1867, it is provided that:

> The governor general shall from time to time, in the Queen's name, by instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified persons to the Senate; and, subject to the provisions of this Act, every person so summoned shall become and be a member of the Senate and a senator.

The question at issue in this appeal is whether the words "qualified persons" in that section include a woman, and consequently whether women are eligible to be summoned to and become members of the Senate of Canada.

Of the appellants, Henrietta Muir Edwards is the vice-president for the province of Alberta of the National Council of Women for Canada; Nellie L. McClung and Louise C. McKinney were for several years members of the Legislative Assembly of the said province; Emily F. Murphy is a police magistrate in and for the said province; and Irene Parlby is a member of the Legislative Assembly of the said province and a member of the Executive Council thereof.

On August 29, 1927, the appellants petitioned the Governor-General in Council to refer to the Supreme Court certain questions touching the powers of the Governor-General to summon female persons to the Senate, and upon October 19, 1927, the Governor-General in Council referred to the Supreme Court the aforesaid question. The case was heard before Chief Justice Anglin, Mr. Justice Duff, Mr. Justice Mignault, Mr. Justice Lamont and Mr. Justice Smith, and upon April 24, 1928, the Court answered the question in the negative (1928 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1928] SCR 276); the question being understood to be "Are women eligible for appointment to the Senate of Canada?"

The Chief Justice, whose judgment was concurred in by Mr. Justice Lamont and Mr. Justice Smith, and substantially by Mr. Justice Mignault, came to this conclusion upon broad lines mainly because of the common-law disability of women to hold public office and from a consideration of various cases which had been decided under different statutes as to their right to vote for a member of Parliament.

Mr. Justice Duff, on the other hand, did not agree with this view. He came to the conclusion that women are not eligible for appointment to the Senate upon the narrower ground that upon a close examination of the British North America Act of 1867 the word "persons" in sec. 24 is restricted to members of the male sex. The result therefore of the decision was that the Supreme Court was unanimously of opinion that the word "persons" did not include female persons, and that women are not eligible to be summoned to the Senate.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the word "persons" in sec. 24 does include women, and that women are eligible to be summoned to and become members of the Senate of Canada.

It coming to a determination as to the meaning of a particular word in a particular Act of Parliament it is permissible to consider two points, viz.: (i) The external evidence derived from extraneous circumstances such as previous legislation and decided cases; (ii) The internal evidence derived from the Act itself.

As the learned counsel on both sides have made great researches and invited their Lordships to consider the legal position of women from the earliest times, in justice to their argument they propose to do so and accordingly turn to the first of the above points, viz.: (i) The external evidence derived from extraneous circumstances.

The exclusion of women from all public offices is a relic of days more barbarous than ours, but it must be remembered that the necessity of the times often forced on man customs which in later years were not necessary. Such exclusion is probably due to the fact that the deliberative assemblies of the early tribes were attended by men under arms, and women did not bear arms. "Nihil autem neque publicae neque privatae rei, nisi armati, agunt:" Tacitus Germania, ch. 13. Yet the tribes did not despise the advice of women: "Inesse quin etiam sanctum et providum putant, nec aut consilia earum aspernantur aut responsa neglegunt:" Germania, ch. 8.

The likelihood of attack rendered such a proceeding unavoidable, and after all what is necessary at any period is a question for the times upon which opinion grounded on experience may move one way or another in different circumstances. This exclusion of women found its way into the opinions of the Roman jurists, Ulpian (A.D. 211) laying it down: "Feminae ab omnibus officiis civilibus vel publicis remotae sunt:" Dig. 1.16.195.

The barbarian tribes who settled in the Roman Empire and were exposed to constant dangers naturally preserved and continued the tradition.

In England no woman under the degree of a Queen or a Regent, married or unmarried, could take part in the government of the state. A woman was under a legal incapacity to be elected to serve in Parliament and even if a peeress in her own right she was not, nor is, entitled as an incident of peerage to receive a writ of summons to the House of Lords.

Various authorities are cited in the recent case of Viscountess Rhondda's Claim, [1922] 2 A.C. 339, 38 T.L.R. 759, where it was held that a woman was not entitled to sit in the House of Lords. Women were, moreover, subject to a legal incapacity to vote at the election of members of parliament: Coke, 4 Inst., p. 5; Chorlton v. Lings (1868) L.R. 4 C.P. 374, 38 L.J.C.P. 25; or of town councillor: Reg. v. Harrold (1872) L.R. 7 Q.B. 361, 41 L.J.Q.B. 173; or to be elected members of the county council: Beresford-Hope v. Sandhurst (Lady) (1889) 23 Q.B.D. 79, 58 L.J.Q.B. 316.

They were excluded by the common law from taking part in the administration of justice either as Judges or as jurors, with the single exception of inquiries by a jury of matrons upon a suggestion of pregnancy: Coke, 2 Inst. 119, 3 B1. Comm. 362.

Other instances are referred to in the learned judgment of Mr. Justice Willes in Chorlton v. Lings, supra.

No doubt in the course of centuries there may be found cases of exceptional women and exceptional instances, but as Lord Esher said in De Souza v. Cobden, [1891] 1 Q.B. 687, at 691, 60 L.J.Q.B. 533:

By the Common Law of England women are not in general deemed capable of exercising public functions, although there are certain exceptional cases where a well-recognized custom to the contrary has become established.

No doubt in any code where women were expressly excluded from public office the problem would present no difficulty, but where instead of such exclusion those entitled to be summoned to or placed in public office are described under the word "person" different considerations arise.

The word is ambiguous and in its original meaning would undoubtedly embrace members of either sex. On the other hand, supposing in an Act of Parliament several centuries ago it had been enacted that any person should be entitled to be elected to a particular office it would have been understood that the word only referred to males, but the cause of this was not because the word "person" could not include females but because at common law a woman was incapable of serving a public office. The fact that no woman had served or has claimed to serve such an office is not of great weight when it is remembered that custom would have prevented the claim being made, or the point being contested.

Customs are apt to develop into traditions which are stronger than law and remain unchallenged long after the reason for them has disappeared.

The appeal to history therefore in this particular matter is not conclusive.

As far back as Stradling v. Morgan (1560) 1 Plowd. 199, at 209, 75 E.R. 305, it was laid down that extraneous circumstances may be admitted as an aid to the interpretation of a statute and in Herron v. Rathmines and Rathgar Improvement Commrs., [1892] A.C. 498, 67 L.T. 658, Lord Halsbury said: The subject-matter with which the legislature was dealing, and the facts existing at the time with respect to which the legislature was legislating, are legitimate topics to consider in ascertaining what was the object and purpose of the legislature in passing the Act, but the argument must not be pushed too far and their Lordships are disposed to agree with Farwell, L.J., in Rex v. West Riding of Yorkshire County Council, [1906] 2 K.B. 676, "although it may, perhaps, be legitimate to call history in aid to show what facts existed to bring about a statute the inferences to be drawn therefrom are exceedingly slight:" see Craies Statute Law, 3rd ed., p. 118.

Over and above that, their Lordships do not think it right to apply rigidly to Canada of to-day the decisions and the reasonings therefor which commended themselves, probably rightly, to those who had to apply the law in different circumstances, in different centuries to countries in different stages of development. Referring therefore to the judgment of the Chief Justice and those who agreed with him, their Lordships think that the appeal to Roman Law and to early English decisions is not of itself a secure foundation on which to build the interpretation of the British North America Act of 1867.

Their Lordships fully appreciate the learned arguments set out in his judgment, but prefer, on this part of the case, to adopt the reasonings of Mr. Justice Duff who did not agree with the other members of the Court, for reasons which appear to their Lordships to be strong and cogent. As he says: Nor am I convinced that the reasoning based upon the "extraneous circumstances" we are asked to consider -- the disabilities of women under the common law, and the law and practice of Parliament in respect of appointment to public place or office -- establishes a rule of interpretation for the British North America Act, by which the construction of powers, legislative and executive, bestowed in general terms is controlled by a presumptive exclusion of women from participating in the working of the institutions set up by the Act.

Their Lordships now turn to the second point, namely: (ii) The internal evidence derived from the Act itself.

Before discussing the various sections they think it necessary to refer to the circumstances which led up to the passing of the Act.

The communities included within the Britannic system embrace countries and peoples in every stage of social, political and economic development and undergoing a continuous process of evolution.

The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada. Like all written constitutions it has been subject to development through usage and convention. [Canadian Constitutional Studies, Sir Robert Borden (1922) p. 55.]

Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board -- it is certainly not their desire -- to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation so that the Dominion to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, may be mistress in her own house, as the provinces to a great extent, but within certain fixed limits, are mistresses in theirs. "The Privy Council, indeed, has laid down that Courts of law must treat the provisions of the British North America Act by the same methods of construction and exposition which they apply to other statutes. But there are statutes and statutes; and the strict construction deemed proper in the case, for example, of a penal or taxing statute or one passed to regulate the affairs of an English parish, would be often subversive of Parliament's real intent if applied to an Act passed to ensure the peace, order and good government of a British Colony." See Clement's Canadian Constitution, ed. 3, p. 347.

The learned author of that treatise quotes from the argument of Mr. Mowat and Mr. Edward Blake before the Privy Council in St. Catherine's Milling and Lbr. Co. v. Reg. (1888) 1888 CanLII 209 (UK JCPC), 14 App. Cas. 46, at 50, 58 L.J.P.C. 54: The Act should be on all occasions interpreted in a large, liberal and comprehensive spirit, considering the magnitude of the subjects with which it purports to deal in very few words.

With that their Lordships agree, but as was said by the Lord Chancellor in Brophy v. Atty.-Gen. for Man., [1895] A.C. 202, at 216, 64 L.J.P.C. 70, the question is not what may be supposed to have been intended, but what has been said.

It must be remembered, too, that their Lordships are not here considering the question of the legislative competence either of the Dominion or its provinces which arise under secs. 91 and 92 of the Act providing for the distribution of legislative powers and assigning to the Dominion and its provinces their respective spheres of government.

Their Lordships are concerned with the interpretation of an Imperial Act, but an Imperial Act which creates a constitution for a new country. Nor are their Lordships deciding any question as to the rights of women but only a question as to their eligibility for a particular position. No one either male or female has a right to be summoned to the Senate. The real point at issue is whether the Governor-General has a right to summon women to the Senate.

The Act consists of a number of separate heads.

The preamble states that the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have expressed their desire to be federally united into one Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

Head No. 2 refers to the Union; Head No. 3, secs. 9 to 16, to the executive power.

It is in sec. 11 that the word "persons" which is used repeatedly in the Act, occurs for the first time.

It provides that the persons who are members of the Privy Council shall be from time to time chosen and summoned by the Governor-General.

The word "person" as above mentioned may include members of both sexes, and to those who ask why the word should include females, the obvious answer is why should it not.

In these circumstances the burden is upon those who deny that the word includes women to make out their case.

Head No. 4 (secs. 17-21) deals first with the legislative power. Sec. 17 provides there shall be one Parliament for Canada consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons. Secs. 21-36 deal with the creation, constitution and powers of the Senate. They are the all-important sections to consider in the present case and their Lordships return to them after briefly setting out the remaining sections of the Act.

[Lord Sankey then summarizes the rest of the British North America Act]

Such being the general analysis of the Act, their Lordships turn to the special sections dealing with the Senate.

It will be observed that sec. 21 provides that the Senate shall consist of 72 members who shall be styled senators. The word "member" is not in ordinary English confined to male persons. Sec. 24 provides that the Governor-General shall summon qualified persons to the Senate.

As already pointed out, "persons" is not confined to members of the male sex, but what effect does the adjective "qualified" before the word "persons" have?

In their Lordships' view it refers back to the previous section, which contains the qualifications of a senator. Subsecs. 2 and 3 appear to have given difficulties to the Supreme Court. Subsec. 2 provides that the qualification of a senator shall be that he shall be either a natural born subject of the Queen naturalized by an Act of Parliament of Great Britain or of one of the provincial Legislatures before the Union or of the Parliament of Canada after the Union. The Chief Justice in dealing with this says that it does not include those who become subjects by marriage, a provision which one would have looked for had it been intended to include women as being eligible.

The attention of the Chief Justice, however, was not called to the Aliens Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., ch. 66), sec. 16 of which provides that any woman married or who shall be married to a natural born subject or person naturalized shall be deemed and taken to be herself naturalized and have all the rights and privileges of a natural born subject. The Chief Justice assumed that by common law a wife took her husband's nationality on marriage, but by virtue of that section any woman who marries a natural born or naturalized British subject was deemed and taken to be herself naturalized. Accordingly, sec. 23, subsec. 2, uses language apt to cover the case of those who become British subjects by marriage.

Their Lordships agree with Mr. Justice Duff when he says "I attach no importance ... to the use of the masculine personal pronoun in section 23, and, indeed, very little importance to the provision in section 23 with regard to nationality" and refer to sec. 1 of the Interpretation Act, 1889, 52-53 Vict., ch. 63, which in sec. 1 (2) provides that words importing the masculine gender shall include females.

The reasoning of the Chief Justice would compel their Lordships to hold that the word "persons" as used in sec. 11 relating to the constitution of the Privy Council for Canada was limited to "male persons" with the resultant anomaly that a woman might be elected a member of the House of Commons but could not even then be summoned by the Governor-General as a member of the Privy Council.

Subsec. 3 of sec. 23 provided that the qualification of a senator shall be that he is legally and equitably seized of a freehold for his own use and benefit of lands and tenements of a certain value. This section gave some trouble to Mr. Justice Duff who says that subsection points to the exclusion of married women and would have been expressed in a different way if the presence of married women had been contemplated.

Their Lordships think that this difficulty is removed by a consideration of the rights of a woman under the Married Women's Property Acts. A married woman can possess the property qualification required by this subsection. Apart from statute a married woman could be equitably seized of free hold property for her own use only and by an Act respecting certain separate rights of property of married women, Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, ch. 73, sec. 1, it was provided: Every woman who has married since the 4th May, 1859, or who marries after this Act takes effect, without any marriage contract or settlement, shall and may, notwithstanding her coverture, have, hold and enjoy all her real and personal property ... in as full and ample a manner as if she continued sole and unmarried...

Their Lordships do not think it possible to interpret the word "persons" by speculating whether the framer of the British North America Act purposely followed the system of Legislative Councils enacted in the Acts of 1791 and 1840 rather than that which prevailed in the maritime province for the model on which the Senate was to be formed, neither do they think that either of these subsections is sufficient to rebut the presumption that the word "persons" includes women. Looking at the sections which deal with the Senate as a whole (secs. 21-36) their Lordships are unable to say that there is anything in those sections themselves upon which the Court could come to a definite conclusion that women are to be excluded from the Senate.

So far with regard to the sections dealing especially with the Senate -- Are there any other sections in the Act which shed light upon the meaning of the word "persons"?

Their Lordships think that there are. For example, sec. 41 refers to the qualifications and disqualifications of persons to be elected or to sit or vote as members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly and by a proviso it is said that until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides at any election for a member of the House of Commons for the district of Algoma in addition to persons qualified by the law of the province of Canada to vote every male British subject aged 21 years or upwards being a householder shall have a vote. This section shows a distinction between "persons" and "males." If persons excluded females it would only have been necessary to say every person who is a British subject aged 21 years or upwards shall have a vote.

Again in sec. 84 referring to Ontario and Quebec a similar proviso is found stating that every male British subject in contra-distinction to "person" shall have a vote.

Again in sec. 133 it is provided that either the English or the French language may be used by any person or in any pleadings in or issuing from any Court of Canada established under this Act and in or from all of any of the Courts of Quebec. The word "person" there must include females as it can hardly have been supposed that a man might use either the English or the French language but a woman might not.

> If Parliament had intended to limit the word "persons" in sec. 24 to male persons it would surely have manifested such intention by an express limitation as it has done in secs. 41 and 84. The fact that certain qualifications are set out in sec. 23 is not an argument in favour of further limiting the class, but is an argument to the contrary because it must be presumed that Parliament has set out in sec. 23 all the qualifications deemed necessary for a senator and it does not state that one of the qualifications is that he must be a member of the male sex.
> Finally with regard to sec. 33, which provides that if any question arises respecting the qualifications of a senator or a vacancy in the Senate the same shall be heard and determined by the Senate that section must be supplemented by sec. 1 of the Parliament of Canada Act, 1875, and by sec. 4 of ch. 10 of R.S.C., and their Lordships agree with Mr. Justice Duff when he says: As yet, no concrete case has arisen to which the jurisdiction of the Senate could attach. We are asked for advice on the general question, and that, I think, we are bound to give. It has, of course, only the force of an advisory opinion.
> The existence of this jurisdiction of the Senate does not, I think, affect the question of substance. We must assume that the Senate would decide in accordance with the law.
> The history of these sections and their interpretation in Canada is not without interest and significance.
> From Confederation to date both the Dominion Parliament and the provincial Legislatures have interpreted the word "persons" in secs. 41 and 84 of the British North America Act as including female persons and have legislated either for the inclusion or exclusion of women from the class of persons entitled to vote and to sit in the Parliament and Legislature respectively, and this interpretation has never been questioned. From Confederation up to 1916 women were excluded from the class of persons entitled to vote in both Federal and provincial elections.
> From 1916 to 1922 various Dominion and provincial Acts were passed to admit women to the franchise and to the right to sit as members in both Dominion and provincial legislative bodies.
> At the present time women are entitled to vote and to be candidates: (1) At all Dominion elections on the same basis as men; (2) At all provincial elections save in the province of Quebec.
> From the date of the enactment of the Interpretation Acts in the province of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick prior to Confederation and in the Dominion of Canada since Confederation and until the franchise was extended, women have been excluded by express enactment from the right to vote.
> Neither is it without interest to record that when upon May 20, 1867, the Representation of the People Bill came before a committee of the House of Commons, John Stuart Mill moved an amendment to secure women's suffrage and the amendment proposed was to leave out the word "man" in order to insert the word "person" instead thereof. See Hansard, 3rd series, vol. 187, column 817.

4.1.3 Questions

1. How does the living tree doctrine reconcile with democratic principles when judges (who are not democratically elected and have security of tenure until the age of 75) overturn the decisions of democratically elected bodies?
2. How can judges determine what values are sufficiently "settled" to justify constitutional updating through the use of the living tree doctrine? ? Are judges well-placed to make read society's evolving values in this way?

4.2 The "Purposive" Approach to Constitutional Interpretation

Closely related to the "living tree" doctrine, the Supreme Court of Canada has, particularly since the enactment of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in 1982, invoked a "purposive" approach to constitutional interpretation. That is, in order to interpret the constitution with the "large, liberal and comprehensive spirit" suggested by Lord Sankey in the Persons Case, the courts have considered both the purpose of the constitution in general, and the purposes or interests meant to be protected by particular provisions in the constitution.

This approach is taken up in greater detail in Chapter 14. It was outlined by Justice Dickson (as he then was) in Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, which was the first case in which the Supreme Court of Canada interpreted the newly entrenched Charter. In particular, the Court was tasked with interpreting the meaning of s. 8 of the Charter which provides that "[e]veryone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure."

4.2.1 Hunter et al. v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145

> The judgment of the Court was delivered by
> DICKSON J.—The Constitution of Canada, which includes the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is the supreme law of Canada. Any law inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect. Section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 so mandates. The constitutional question posed in this appeal is whether s. 10(3), and by implication s. 10(1), of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, (the "Act") are inconsistent with s. 8 of the Charter by reason of authorizing unreasonable searches and seizures and are therefore of no force and effect.
> As is clear from the arguments of the parties as well as from the judgment of Prowse J.A., the crux of this case is the meaning to be given to the term "unreasonable" in the s. 8 guarantee of freedom from unreasonable search or seizure. The guarantee is vague and open. The American courts have had the advantage of a number of specific prerequisites articulated in the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, as well as a history of colonial opposition to certain Crown investigatory practices from which to draw out the nature of the interests protected by that Amendment and the kinds of conduct it proscribes. There is none of this in s. 8. There is no specificity in the section beyond the bare guarantee of freedom from "unreasonable" search and seizure; nor is there any particular historical, political or philosophic context capable of providing an obvious gloss on the meaning of the guarantee.

> It is clear that the meaning of "unreasonable" cannot be determined by recourse to a dictionary, nor for that matter, by reference to the rules of statutory construction. The task of expounding a constitution is crucially different from that of construing a statute. A statute defines present rights and obligations. It is easily enacted and as easily repealed. A constitution, by contrast, is drafted with an eye to the future. Its function is to provide a continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power and, when joined by a Bill or a Charter of Rights, for the unremitting protection of individual rights and liberties. Once enacted, its provisions cannot easily be repealed or amended. It must, therefore, be capable of growth and development over time to meet new social, political and historical realities often unimagined by its framers. The judiciary is the guardian of the constitution and must, in interpreting its provisions, bear these considerations in mind. Professor Paul Freund expressed this idea aptly when he admonished the American courts "not to read the provisions of the Constitution like a last will and testament lest it become one".
> The need for a broad perspective in approaching constitutional documents is a familiar theme in Canadian constitutional jurisprudence. It is contained in Viscount Sankey's classic formulation in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124, at p. 136, cited and applied in countless Canadian cases:
> > The British North America Act planted in Canada a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits. The object of the Act was to grant a Constitution to Canada… Their Lordships do not conceive it to be the duty of this Board—it is certainly not their desire—to cut down the provisions of the Act by a narrow and technical construction, but rather to give it a large and liberal interpretation.
> More recently, in Minister of Home Affairs v. Fisher, [1980] A.C. 319, dealing with the Bermudian Constitution, Lord Wilberforce reiterated at p. 328 that a constitution is a document "sui generis, calling for principles of interpretation of its own, suitable to its character", and that as such, a constitution incorporating a Bill of Rights calls for:
> > …a generous interpretation avoiding what has been called "the austerity of tabulated legalism," suitable to give individuals the full measure of the fundamental rights and freedoms referred to.
> Such a broad, purposive analysis, which interprets specific provisions of a constitutional document in the light of its larger objects is also consonant with the classical principles of American constitutional construction enunciated by Chief Justice Marshall in M'Culloch v. Maryland, 17 U.S. (4 Wheat.) 316 (1819). It is, as well, the approach I intend to take in the present case.
> I begin with the obvious. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive document. Its purpose is to guarantee and to protect, within the limits of reason, the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms it enshrines. It is intended to constrain governmental action inconsistent with those rights and freedoms; it is not in itself an authorization for governmental action. In the present case this means, as Prowse J.A. pointed out, that in guaranteeing the right to be secure from unreasonable searches and seizures, s. 8 acts as a limitation on whatever powers of search and seizure the federal or provincial governments already and otherwise possess. It does not in itself confer any powers, even of "reasonable" search and seizure, on these governments. This leads, in my view, to the further conclusion that an assessment of the constitutionality of a search and seizure, or of a statute authorizing a search or seizure, must focus on its "reasonable" or "unreasonable" impact on the subject of the search or the seizure, and not simply on its rationality in furthering some valid government objective.
> Since the proper approach to the interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is a purposive one, before it is possible to assess the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the impact of a search or of a statute authorizing a search, it is first necessary to specify the purpose underlying s. 8: in other words, to delineate the nature of the interests it is meant to protect.
> Historically, the common law protections with regard to governmental searches and seizures were based on the right to enjoy property and were linked to the law of trespass. It was on this basis that in the great case of Entick v. Carrington (1765), 19 St. Tr. 1029, 1 Wils. K.B. 275, the Court refused to countenance a search purportedly authorized by the executive, to discover evidence that might link the plaintiff to certain seditious libels. …
> In my view the interests protected by s. 8 are of a wider ambit than those enunciated in Entick v. Carrington. Section 8 is an entrenched constitutional provision. It is not therefore vulnerable to encroachment by legislative enactments in the same way as common law protections. There is, further, nothing in the language of the section to restrict it to the protection of property or to associate it with the law of trespass. It guarantees a broad and general right to be secure from unreasonable search and seizure.

4.2.2 Questions

1. Like the "living tree" doctrine, the use of a purposive approach to constitutional interpretation has been criticized by some on the basis that it gives too much discretion to unelected judges, allowing them to read into the constitution values or rights that were never intended by its framers or expressed by the democratic will of legislatures. Do you agree?
2. If they accept such concerns as valid, what alternatives to a purposive mode of interpretation might courts employ?

Chapter 2: Parliament and Crown

By Mark Walters and Jean-Christophe Bédard-Rubin

1 Introduction

The modern state is generally acknowledged to be a juridical entity endowed with plenary authority, or sovereignty, that permits it to engage with other states on the international stage and to govern peoples within its boundaries. A central task for the constitutional law of any state is to establish an institutional structure for the exercise of state sovereignty. In most states, the key governmental institutions are identified by the tripartite division between Legislature, Executive, and Judiciary—a separation, that is, between legislative institutions that make laws that guide the conduct of people within the state, executive institutions that represent the state internationally and govern the state internally through administering or executing the laws, and judicial institutions that interpret and apply the laws in the course of adjudicating disputes that arise under the laws. In Canada, the separation of powers between legislative, executive, and judicial institutions is recognized as "part of the foundational architecture of our constitutional order", though the separation is not "watertight" and permits a degree of overlap and flexibility.[16]

In this chapter, we introduce the legislative and executive branches of government in Canada. The next chapter introduces the judicial branch. The title of this chapter—Parliament and Crown—signals the importance of the Westminster common law/parliamentary system of governance for understanding how legislative and executive power is constituted in Canada. The Westminster system in Canada manifests legislative and executive power through institutions of Parliament and Crown modelled on the British constitution as adjusted to fit Canadian constitutional values and aspirations including, especially, the commitment to federalism. The adjustments are significant. The Westminster system in Canada has been called "our Westminster system".[17]

Canada's foundational constitutional document, the Constitution Act, 1867, announces the adoption of this model for governance in its preamble. The desire of the confederating provinces is, the preamble states, > to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom ...

The preamble then states that it is expedient to provide for both "the Constitution of the Legislative Authority in the Dominion" as well as "the Nature of the Executive Government therein". The substantive provisions of the Act go on to identify the main legislative and executive institutions of state in terms that might be somewhat surprising to many Canadians. Only by reading the text in a broader constitutional context does a more familiar system of legislative and executive power emerge and take shape.

2 Crown, state, and sovereignty

In the next two sections of this chapter, we shall see that the king or queen is a component of federal and provincial legislatures and the head of federal and provincial executive governments in Canada. Before looking at legislative and executive power, it will therefore be helpful to begin, in this section, with some general observations on the relationship between the king or queen—or crown—and broader conceptions of state and state sovereignty.

In certain respects, it is true to say that "the Crown is the centrepiece of the working constitution"[18], that the crown is "an integral, and indeed pivotal, part of our constitution".[19] Yet it is an institution, a concept, and sometimes a person that must be approached with caution. Over a century ago, a famous legal historian, Frederick Maitland, said this to his students: "There is one term against which I wish to warn you, and that term is 'the crown.' You will certainly read that the crown does this and the crown does that. As a matter of fact we know that the crown does nothing but lie in the Tower of London to be gazed at by sight-seers. No, the crown is a convenient cover for ignorance: it saves us from asking difficult questions".[20]

2.1 The crown as hieroglyphic for the state

What difficult questions does the concept of crown obscure? Two centuries before Maitland lectured, Sir Edward Coke described the "Crown" as a "hieroglyphic"[21], a symbol or metaphor—but standing for what? The short answer is: the state. The common law regarded the king as having two bodies, one natural and one political, and his body politic was a corporation in which he was the head and his subjects the members—the "great corporation or body politick of the kingdome".[22] The resulting corporate body politic represented by the king was "the common law's closest approximation to the state".[23]

We have not come much closer since. Indeed, the crown—or king or queen—as state is ubiquitous in Canadian law. Here are just two examples. If the Canadian state prosecutes you for a crime, the prosecutor will be His Majesty the King and the prosecution will be conducted "on behalf of the Crown" by federal prosecutors[24] or by provincial "crown attorneys".[25] And if you wish to bring a civil action against the Canadian state for damages caused by its officials, the "Crown" is liable.[26] In this latter instance, we know that crown equals state because although crown is defined in the English version of the Crown Liability and Proceeding Act to mean "Her Majesty [now His Majesty] in right of Canada", in the French version of the Act, which is equally authoritative, the term "Crown" is replaced by "État" (State) which is defined as "Sa Majesté du chef du Canada".[27]

2.2 Crown sovereignty and crown honour

If the crown is or represents the state as a matter of law, then it would seem to follow that state sovereignty is crown sovereignty. Indeed, the "sovereignty of the Crown" was an expression used to describe the geographical extent and juridical identity of the United Kingdom and the larger British empire.[28] Canadian judges rarely refer to crown sovereignty today except in relation to one particular field of law—the law relating to Aboriginal and treaty rights that has emerged under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The doctrine of Aboriginal rights recognizes the prior occupation of Canada by Indigenous societies and the need to reconcile those societies with the unilateral assertion of crown sovereignty over them, an ongoing process of reconciliation shaped by distinctive obligations placed on governments arising from the principle of the "honour of the Crown".[29] Historic treaties made between Indigenous nations and the crown must be interpreted consistently with the honour of the crown.[30] Where no historic treaties were made, modern treaties are required "to reconcile pre-existing Aboriginal sovereignty with assumed Crown sovereignty", or "de facto Crown sovereignty", the respective "sovereignty claims" being "reconciled through the process of honourable negotiation".[31]

The topic of Aboriginal and treaty rights is the subject of Chapter 12. For present purposes, however, several observations are important. First, the law just summarized is premised upon a judicial recognition that the moral (and possibly legal?) foundations of crown sovereignty and thus the Canadian state are flawed—that there is an "ongoing rift in the national fabric"[32]—and the crown's "honour" must be redeemed through a process of reconciliation that imposes special duties upon governments. Thinking back to Maitland's point, are we confronting or avoiding difficult questions by this emphasis on the crown and its honour in this context?

Second, references to crown and crown sovereignty obscure important points of constitutional law. The crown as the juridical embodiment of the state may be sovereign, but within domestic constitutional law we shall find that the principal legal manifestation of sovereignty lies within the doctrine of parliamentary not crown sovereignty—or rather we must say that the crown-in-parliament rather than the crown alone is sovereign.

Third, the idea of crown sovereignty coupled with the identification of the crown in the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 as "the Crown of the United Kingdom" obscures the legal reality of Canadian state sovereignty. This topic deserves further attention.

2.3 Dividing the crown: the independence of Canada

Canada emerged as a sovereign, independent state in the early twentieth century: "Its sovereignty was acquired in the period between its separate signature of the Treaty of Versailles in 1919 and the Statute of Westminster, 1931".[33] However, its foundational constitutional text, the British North America Act, 1867, now labelled the Constitution Act, 1867, has not been amended to reflect this development.

In a series of Imperial Conferences in the late 1920s, it was recognized that the United Kingdom and the self-governing Dominions, including Canada, were "equal in status ... though united by a common allegiance to the Crown".[34] The independence of the Dominions was confirmed legally by the Statute of Westminster, 1931, 22 Geo. V, c. 4 (UK), by which the UK renounced the ability to legislate for the Dominions (subject in Canada's case to an exception, made at Canada's request, regarding the British North America Act, 1867 which would be removed by the Canada Act, 1982 (UK), c. 11).

The Statute of Westminster, 1931 is listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982 and is therefore part of the supreme "Constitution of Canada" today. Its preamble affirms a constitutional convention that addresses how independent states would manage the identity of a common crown:

> And whereas it is meet and proper to set out by way of preamble to this Act that, inasmuch as the Crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and as they are united by a common allegiance to the Crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the Succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of the Parliament of the United Kingdom ...

The line of succession, then and now, was established in 1701[35], and Charles III is the latest successor. When the law of succession was amended by Act of the UK Parliament in 2013 to ensure equality between males and females in the succession and to repeal a rule that barred from the throne anyone married to a Roman Catholic[36], the Parliament of Canada followed the "established constitutional position" expressed in the preamble to the Statute of Westminster, 1931 and assented to the changes.[37] The changes were not considered an amendment to the "office of the Queen" in the Constitution of Canada, which would have required unanimous federal and provincial consent (Constitution Act, 1982, s. 41(a)).[38]

The Statute of Westminster, 1931 confirmed legally Canada's legislative independence from the UK. But if the crown remains a central part of Canada's constitutional architecture, what prevents British interference at an executive level? The answer, which we will explore in greater detail in section IV of this chapter, is the principle of "responsible government"—the principle that the crown must act on advice of ministers responsible to elected representatives, and, in Canada's case, beginning in the 1840s, local Canadian ministers. For now, it is important simply to indicate how this point was reinforced in 1947 by the issuance of new letters patent constituting the office of governor general in Canada. The 1947 letters patent, which remain the constitutive instrument for the office of governor general today, confirm that all crown powers in relation to Canada are delegated to the governor general to be exercised upon the advice of Canadian ministers (or, on provincial matters, crown powers are exercised by lieutenant governors advised by provincial ministers).

Letters Patent Constituting the Office of Governor
General of Canada

Effective October 1, 1947

"GEORGE R."

CANADA

George the Sixth, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas King, Defender of the Faith.

[SEAL]

To All To Whom these Presents shall come,

GREETING:

And We do declare Our Will and pleasure as follows:

I. We do hereby constitute, order, and declare that there shall be a Governor General and Commander-in-Chief in and over Canada, and appointments to the Office of Governor General and Commander-in-Chief in and over Canada shall be made by Commission under Our Great Seal of Canada.

II. And We do hereby authorize and empower Our Governor General, with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada or of any members thereof or individually, as the case requires, to exercise all powers and authorities lawfully belonging to Us in respect of Canada, and for greater certainty but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing to do and execute, in the manner aforesaid, all things that may belong to his office and to the trust We have reposed in him according to the several powers and authorities granted or appointed him by virtue of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1946 and the powers and authorities hereinafter conferred in these Letters Patent and in such Commission as may be issued to him under Our Great Seal of Canada and under such laws as are or may hereinafter be in force in Canada.

III. And We do hereby authorize and empower Our Governor General to keep and use Our Great Seal of Canada for sealing all things whatsoever that may be passed under Our Great Seal of Canada.

IV. And We do further authorize and empower Our Governor General to constitute and appoint, in Our name and on Our behalf, all such Judges, Commissioners, Justices of the Peace, and other necessary Officers (including diplomatic and consular officers) and Ministers of Canada, as may be lawfully constituted or appointed by Us.

VI. And We do further authorize and empower Our Governor General to exercise all powers lawfully belonging to Us in respect of summoning, proroguing or dissolving the Parliament of Canada.

...

In witness whereof We have caused these Our Letters to made Patent, and for the greater testimony and validity thereof, We have caused Our Great Seal of Canada to be affixed to these presents, which We have signed with Our Royal Hand.

BY HIS MAJESTY'S COMMAND,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING,

Prime Minister of Canada

After the imperial conferences of the 1920s, governors general were appointed upon recommendation of the Canadian prime minister, though they remained British until the first Canadian governor general, Vincent Massey, was appointed in 1952. The appointment itself remains by the king or queen, but on the advice of the prime minister of Canada, and the commission is under the Great Seal of Canada. Commissions follow this template:

Canada

Elizabeth the Second, by the Grace of God of the United Kingdom, Canada and Her other Realms and Territories Queen, Head of the Commonwealth, Defender of the Faith.

To

Our Trusty and Well-beloved

ROLAND MICHENER

A Member of Our Privy Council for Canada and One of Our Counsel learned in the Law.

Greeting:

We do, by this Our Commission under Our Great Seal of Canada, appoint you, ROLAND MICHENER to be, during Our Pleasure, our Governor General and Commander-in-Chief in and over Canada, with all the powers, rights, privileges and advantages belonging or appertaining to the office.

AND We do hereby authorize, empower and command you, as Our representative, to exercise and perform all the singular the powers and directions contained in certain Letters Patent under Our Great Seal of Canada, bearing date the Eight day of September, 1947, constituting the Office of the Governor General and Commander-in-Chief in and over Canada, or in any other Letters Patent adding to, amending or substituted for the same.

And We do hereby command all and singular Our Officers, Ministers and loving subjects in Canada and all others whom it may concern, to take due notice hereof and to give their ready obedience accordingly.

GIVEN under our Royal Hand and under Our Great Seal of Canada, this 29th day of March in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven and in the Sixteenth year of Our Reign.

By Her Majesty's Command

(Sgd.) L.B. Pearson

Prime Minister of Canada

The adoption of the title used for the queen in the above commission was itself a step in the Canadianization of the crown taken by the Royal Style and Titles Act, RSC 1985, c. 12, in 1953. Upon the accession of Charles III to the throne, the Canadian title for the King was adjusted (Royal Style and Titles Act, 2023, S.C. 2023, c. 26, s. 510). Following a form adopted in many other realms of the king, the formal title today is:

Charles the Third, by the Grace of God King of Canada and His other Realms and Territories, Head of the Commonwealth.

Canada's constitution had evolved significantly between 1952 and 2023, including the development of a complex body of law relating to freedom of religion under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that places particular importance on the concept of state neutrality regarding religious matters—and so one wonders whether the efforts at further Canadianizing the crown in 2023 might have involved dropping, in addition to "Defender of the Faith", the reference to "by the Grace of God".

2.4 Judicial recognition of the Canadian crown

The constitutional moments summarized above—1926, 1931, 1947, 1953—are pivotal points in the story of how the crown evolved into a Canadian institution. The story is one of legal continuity rather than revolution and the legal moments that punctuate the story often follow events after the fact. The legal idea of the Queen or King of Canada is explained in the following two cases.

2.4.1 The Queen v The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs,ex parte Indian Association of Alberta, [1982] QB 892

Court of Appeal for England and Wales

Lord Denning M.R.

Over 200 years ago, in the year 1763, the King of England made a Royal Proclamation under the Great Seal. In it he gave solemn assurances to the Indian peoples of Canada. These assurances have been honoured for the most part ever since. But now the Indian peoples feel that the assurances are in danger of being dishonoured. They are anxious about the Canada Bill which is now before the Parliament of the United Kingdom [Lord Denning is referring to the bill that became the Canada Act, 1982 that patriated the Canadian constitution and enacted the Constitution Act, 1982]. Under it there is to be a new constitution for Canada. The Indian peoples distrust the promoters of the Bill. They feel that, if it is passed, their own special rights and freedoms will be in peril of being reduced or extinguished. They have not gone to the courts of Canada for redress. They have come to this court. They say that the assurances which were given 200 years ago — and repeated in treaties 100 years later — were binding on the Crown of the United Kingdom. So they come to the courts of this country to plead their case. They come in particular from Alberta, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. But the other Indian peoples from the other provinces are watching closely too. They want to see what happens. Seeing that their claim is against the Crown in respect of the United Kingdom, they are entitled, I think, to come here to put their case. They ask this court to make a declaration:

> "that treaty [or other] obligations entered into by the Crown to the Indian peoples of Canada are still owed by Her Majesty in right of Her Government in the United Kingdom."

This is disputed by the Department of State in the United Kingdom, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. When the matter was under consideration by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Commons, the question was put to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. "Has the United Kingdom any treaty or other responsibilities to Indians in Canada?" The answer given by that Office on November 11, 1980, was:

> "No. All relevant treaty obligations in so far as they still subsisted became the responsibility of the Government of Canada with the attainment of independence, at the latest with the Statute of Westminster 1931."

The Indian peoples dispute that answer. In order to challenge it, they have brought these proceedings for judicial review.

Our long experience .... [of empire] taught us how to treat the indigenous peoples. As matter of public policy, it was of the first importance to pay great respect to their laws and customs: and never to interfere with them except when necessary in the interests of peace and good order. It was the responsibility of the Crown of England — and those representing the Crown — to see that the rights of the indigenous people were secured to them, and that they were not imposed upon by the selfish or the thoughtless or the ruthless. ...

In all these matters in the 18th and 19th centuries it was a settled doctrine of constitutional law that the Crown was one and indivisible. The colonies formed one realm with the United Kingdom, the whole being under the sovereignty of the Crown. The Crown had full powers to establish such executive, legislative and judicial arrangements [for the colonies] as it thought fit. In exercising these powers, it was the obligation of the Crown (through its representatives on the spot) to take steps to ensure that the original inhabitants of the country were accorded their rights and privileges according to the customs coming down the centuries — except in so far as these conflicted with the peace and good order of the country or the proper settlement of it. This obligation is evidenced most strikingly in the case of Canada by the Royal Proclamation of 1763.

[T]here was a series of important treaties made with the Indian peoples across the greater part of Canada affecting all the provinces. They follow the same pattern but suffice it to state as an example a treaty made in 1873 [Treaty No. 3 or the Northwest Angle Treaty] between "The Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, by Her Commissioners" and "The Saulteaux Tribe of the Ojibbeway Indians … by their Chiefs …" After describing a tract of land, the treaty goes on to provide that the Tribe and all other Indians:

> "do hereby cede, release, surrender and yield up to the Government of the Dominion of Canada for Her Majesty the Queen and Her successors forever, all their rights, titles and privileges whatsoever, to the lands … To have and to hold the same to Her Majesty the Queen, and Her successors forever."

In return Her Majesty the Queen entered into several obligations to the Indians [Lord Denning sets out treaty terms in which Her Majesty recognized Ojibway rights to reserves and the right to hunt and fish within the surrendered lands until lands are taken up for settlement or other uses].

... [At that time, the] Crown was single and indivisible. ...[T]he Indian title ... was a title superior to all others save in so far as the Indians themselves surrendered or ceded it to the Crown. ... Then by treaties which covered much of Canada the Indians did cede and surrender their right in some lands to the Crown and in return the Crown undertook to fulfil the obligations set out in the treaties. Those treaty obligations were obligations of the Crown — the single and indivisible Crown — which was at that time the Crown of the United Kingdom.

Hitherto I have said that in constitutional law the Crown was single and indivisible. But that law was changed in the first half of this century—not by statute—but by constitutional usage and practice. The Crown became separate and divisible—according to the particular territory in which it was sovereign. This was recognised by the Imperial Conference of 1926 (1926) (Cmd. 2768). It framed the historic definition (p. 14) of the status of Great Britain and the Dominions as > "autonomous Communities within the British Empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any respect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the Crown, and freely associated as members of the British Commonwealth of Nations."

It was also agreed, at p. 16:

> "the Governor-General of a Dominion is the representative of the Crown, holding in all essential respects the same position in relation to the administration of public affairs in a Dominion as is held by His Majesty the King in Great Britain, and that he is not the representative or agent of His Majesty's Government in Great Britain or of any Department of that Government."

Thenceforward the Crown was no longer single and indivisible. It was separate and divisible for each self-governing dominion or province or territory. ...

As a result of this important constitutional change, I am of opinion that those obligations which were previously binding on the Crown simpliciter are now to be treated as divided. They are to be applied to the Dominion or Province or territory to which they relate: and confined to it. Thus the obligations to which the Crown bound itself in the Royal Proclamation of 1763 are now to be confined to the territories to which they related and binding only on the Crown in respect of those territories: and the treaties by which the Crown bound itself ... are to be confined to those territories and binding on the Crown only in respect of those territories. None of them is any longer binding on the Crown in respect of the United Kingdom.

[N]ow that the Crown is separate and divisible, I think that the obligations under the Proclamation and the treaties are obligations of the Crown in respect of Canada. They are not obligations of the Crown in respect of the United Kingdom.

May L.J.

Although at one time it was correct to describe the Crown as one and indivisible, with the development of the Commonwealth this is no longer so. Although there is only one person who is the Sovereign within the British Commonwealth, it is now a truism that in matters of law and government the Queen of the United Kingdom, for example, is entirely independent and distinct from the Queen of Canada. Further, the Crown is a constitutional monarchy and thus when one speaks today, and as was frequently done in the course of the argument on this application, of the Crown "in right of Canada," or of some other territory within the Commonwealth, this is only a short way of referring to the Crown acting through and on the advice of Her Ministers in Canada or in that other territory within the Commonwealth.

As a result of this process and on the authorities to which I have referred, I have no doubt that any treaty or other obligations which the Crown had entered into with the Indian peoples of Canada in right of the United Kingdom had become the responsibility of the Government of Canada with the attainment of independence, at the latest with the Statute of Westminster 1931. I therefore think that this application must fail.

2.4.2 McAteer v. Canada (Attorney General), 2014 ONCA 578, (2014) 121 O.R. (3d) 1

Court of Appeal for Ontario

Weiler J.A.

[1] Permanent residents of Canada over 14 years old who wish to become Canadian citizens are required to swear an oath or make an affirmation: see Citizenship Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-29 (the "Act"), s. 3(1)(c). ... Section 24 of the Act requires a person to take the oath in the form set out in the Schedule to the Act as follows:

> I swear (or affirm) that I will be faithful and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Second, Queen of Canada, Her Heirs and Successors, and that I will faithfully observe the laws of Canada and fulfil my duties as a Canadian citizen.

[3] The appellants assert that the requirement in the Act to swear or affirm allegiance to the Queen in order to become a Canadian citizen is a violation of their rights under ss. 2(a) (freedom of conscience and religion), 2(b) (freedom of expression), and 15(1) (equality) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[6] ... The appellants' arguments are based on a literal "plain meaning" interpretation of the oath to the Queen in her personal capacity. Adopting the purposive approach to interpretation mandated by the Supreme Court of Canada leads to the conclusion that their interpretation is incorrect because it is inconsistent with the history, purpose and intention behind the oath. The oath in the Act is remarkably similar to the oath required of members of Parliament and the Senate under [section 128 of] the Constitution Act, 1867. In that oath, the reference to the Queen is symbolic of our form of government and the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. The harmonization principle of interpretation leads to the conclusion that the oath in the Act should be given the same meaning.

[48] The evolution of Canada from a British colony into an independent nation and democratic constitutional monarchy must inform the interpretation of the reference to the Queen in the citizenship oath. As Canada has evolved, the symbolic meaning of the Queen in the oath has evolved. ...

[50] ... Viewing the oath to the Queen as an oath to an individual is disconnected from the reality of the Queen's role in Canada today. During the heyday of the Empire, British constitutional theory saw the Crown as indivisible. At that time, there was no need to distinguish between the sovereign's role as an individual and as the head of the executive; nor was there any need in unitary Great Britain to differentiate between the roles that the Crown plays: see the Hon. Bora Laskin, The British Tradition In Canadian Law (London: Stevens & Sons, 1969), at pp. 117-19.

[51] However, as Canada developed as an independent federalist state, the conception of the Queen (commonly referred to as the Crown) evolved. Unlike the unitary role of the Crown at the height of the British Empire, its role in Canada is divided into three distinct roles. First, the Queen of Canada plays a legislative role in assenting to refusing assent to, or reserving bills of the provincial legislature or Parliament—a role that is performed through the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governors. Second, the Queen of Canada is the head of executive authority pursuant to ss. 9 and 12 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Third, the Queen of Canada is the personification of the State ... [In Canada,] the Crown may for some purposes fall within provincial power under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and for other purposes fall within federal power under s. 91. For the purposes of Canadian federalism, the Crown therefore cannot be viewed as a single indivisible entity: Laskin, at p. 119. The Crown is "separate and divisible for each self-governing dominion or province or territory": R. v. Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex parte Indian Assn. of Alberta, [1982] Q.B. 892, [1982] 2 All E.R. 118 (Eng. C.A.), at p. 917 Q.B., per Lord Denning.

[52] ...[T]he Queen of Canada fulfils these varying roles figuratively, not literally. The Hon. Bora Laskin explains, at pp. 118-19, that "Her Majesty has no personal physical presence in Canada ... [O]nly the legal connotation, the abstraction that Her Majesty or the Crown represents, need be considered for purposes of Canadian federalism. The fact that Interpretation Acts, whether the federal Act or provincial Acts, give the term 'Her Majesty' or the 'Crown' a personal meaning, is [an] anachronism." The oath to the Queen of Canada is an oath to our form of government, as symbolized by the Queen as the apex of our Canadian parliamentary system of constitutional monarchy.

[54] Although the Queen is a person, in swearing allegiance to the Queen of Canada, the would-be citizen is swearing allegiance to a symbol of our form of government in Canada. This fact is reinforced by the oath's reference to "the Queen of Canada", instead of "the Queen". It is not an oath to a foreign sovereign.

[62] Applying a purposive and progressive approach to the wording of the oath, with regard to its history in Canada and the evolution of our country, leads to the conclusion that the oath is a symbolic commitment to be governed as a democratic constitutional monarchy unless and until democratically changed. Inasmuch as the oath to the Queen is a requirement in the Constitution for members of Parliament and is seen as an oath to our form of government, the harmonization principle supports the conclusion that the oath to the Queen in the Citizenship Act be given a consistent interpretation. This interpretation of the oath, as a symbolic commitment to our form of government and the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy, is supported by the legal norms of rationality and coherence.

[Weiler J.A. proceeded to analyse the various Charter claims in light of this interpretation of the oath, concluding that none of the Charter claims could succeed.]

3 Parliament and Parliamentary Sovereignty

3.1 The Federal Parliament and Provincial Legislatures

Legislative power under the constitution is divided between the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures. This section focuses on the federal Parliament and provincial legislature and leaves the question of Indigenous peoples' law-making power to Chapter 12.

The rules relating to the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures are found in different sources. Some come from statutes and constitutional documents, others have their origin in Imperial orders in council, and others result from the exercise by Parliament and the provincial legislatures of their inherent privilege to regulate their own internal proceedings. The relationship between legislative institutions, courts, and the Crown is governed by the common law and constitutional conventions. Notably, the common law establishes the principle of parliamentary sovereignty, discussed in the next section. The constitutional conventions that relate to Parliament are mostly concerned with the relation between the two houses of Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, and between the executive and the legislative branches. The purpose and content of these conventions have evolved over time. Today their central purpose is to ensure that the members of Parliament, who form the committee of the King's Privy Council for Canada (the cabinet or Ministry) are collectively accountable to the elected chamber of Parliament. With some minor adaptations, similar common law rules and constitutional conventions operate at the provincial level. Taken together, these principles support the system of responsible government.

The federal Parliament was a new institution created at Confederation. Section 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides:

> 17. There shall be One Parliament for Canada, consisting of the Queen, an Upper House styled the Senate, and the House of Commons.

The Constitution Act, 1867 contains a number of rules relating to Parliament. These include rules relating to the number, regional distribution and qualification of senators, some general voting rules and some procedural rules, the most important of which are discussed below. Beyond these, most of the rules governing the operation of Parliament are set out in ordinary statutes or internal rules of proceedings of the Senate or House of Commons or the equivalent at the provincial level. For example, the Parliament of Canada Act, RSC 1985, c. P-1 concerns everything from the election of the Speaker to the formation of caucuses, the remuneration of members of Parliament, parliamentary ethics and conflicts of interests, etc.

Provincial legislatures have more diverse origins. Some legislatures existed before the particular province joined Confederation, such as the legislatures of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Others, like the legislatures of Quebec and Ontario, were established as separate bodies in the Constitution Act, 1867, following a twenty-seven year period in which Canada East (Quebec) and Canada West (Ontario) had a single legislature. Others still, such as the legislatures of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, were created by constitutional statute when they joined Confederation as distinct provinces, although each territory had a form of representative institution before their formal entry into Confederation.

One of the most important differences between the federal Parliament and provincial legislatures concerns their internal structure. The federal Parliament is bicameral, meaning that it is composed, like the United Kingdom Parliament, of two chambers (camera in Latin): the House of Commons, sometimes called the Lower House, and the Senate, called the Upper House. The members of the House of Commons are elected, while Senators are appointed by the Governor General in Council, which in practice (by convention) means the federal government. The provincial legislatures are all unicameral, meaning that they are composed of only one chamber, an elected legislature. While most provinces and territories have had a bicameral legislature at one time or another, all provincial Upper Houses have been abolished, the last one being Quebec's Legislative Council in 1968.

The House of Commons, the elected chamber of Parliament, is composed of 343 members (as of 2025). Provided that certain constitutional requirements are met, this number can be increased or decreased by regular statute (see Constitution Act, 1867, s. 51 & 52). The Senate is composed of 105 Senators. The number and regional allocation of Senate seats is set out in the Constitution Act, 1867. The last time the number of seats was modified was in 1999, when the constitutional amendment creating Nunavut (Constitution Act, 1999), allotted one Senator to the territory.

Section 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides that Parliament is composed of three elements: the Senate and the House of Commons (the two legislative chambers), and the Monarch or King. A bill becomes law only after it has been "read" three times in both chambers and receives royal assent from the Governor General, as the King's representative (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 55). The concurrence of all three parts of Parliament is required before a bill becomes law. The same applies at the provincial level with the concurrence of the legislative chamber and the Lieutenant-Governor is required before a bill becomes law.

In the case of certain constitutional amendments, the assent of the Senate may not be required. While the Senate alone may not defeat such an amendment, it may exercise a six-months suspensive veto. If the amendment resolution is passed by the House of Commons and the requisite number of provincial legislatures but is not adopted by the Senate, it can nevertheless be proclaimed by the Governor General if, after one hundred and eighty days, the House of Commons adopts the same amendment resolution again (See Constitution Act, 1982, s. 47(1)). Constitutional Amendment is addressed in Chapter 4.

While the Governor General or the Lieutenant-Governors are formally part of the legislative process, in practice they will not withhold royal assent. This well-settled constitutional convention is central to the system of responsible government. In the exceedingly rare occasion that royal assent has been withheld, as happened in the case of Gallant v. R., 1948 CanLII 316 (PE SCTD), [1949] 2 D.L.R. 425, the courts have refused to enforce a bill that never became a statute. In the Patriation Reference, the majority accepted that while Gallant was good law, the case was a reminder of the central importance of constitutional conventions in the legislative process and (by convention) the merely formal role of the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor:

> As a matter of law, the Queen, or the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor could refuse assent to every bill passed by both Houses of Parliament or by a Legislative Assembly as the case may be. But by convention they cannot of their own motion refuse to assent to any such bill on any ground, for instance because they disapprove of the policy of the bill. We have here a conflict between a legal rule which creates a complete discretion and a conventional rule which completely neutralizes it. But conventions, like laws, are sometimes violated. And if this particular convention were violated and assent were improperly withheld, the courts would be bound to enforce the law, not the convention. They would refuse to recognize the validity of a vetoed bill. This is what happened in Gallant v. The King.... The Lieutenant Governor who had withheld assent in Gallant apparently did so towards the end of' his term of office. Had it been otherwise, it is not inconceivable that his withholding of assent might have produced a political crisis leading to his removal from office which shows that if the remedy for a breach of a convention does not lie with the courts, still the breach is not necessarily without a remedy. The remedy lies with some other institutions of government; furthermore it is [882] not a formal remedy and it may be administered with less certainty or regularity than it would be by a court. (Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753, at 881-882)

Sections 53 and 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provide:

> 53 Bills for appropriating any Part of the Public Revenue, or for imposing any Tax or Impost, shall originate in the House of Commons.
> 54 It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill for the Appropriation of any Part of the Public Revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the Session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

Under section 53 appropriation bills (i.e. spending legislation) and the raising of new taxes or impost must originate in the House of Commons, the elected chamber of Parliament, a right that the UK House of Commons asserted for itself beginning in the late 16th century. Section 54 provides that such bills must, in addition, be recommended by the Crown. In practice, this generally means that, except on rare occasions, financial measures can only be introduced by a member of the government. By convention, the Crown must also consent to any bill that purports to limit its prerogative, hereditary revenues, personal property or interest. This is generally done through a verbal message delivered by a Minister of the Crown sitting in the House of Commons to the effect that the Crown has consented to the measure considered before the third reading of the relevant bill.

In the case of Mikisew Cree II, which concerned the difference between the role of the Crown in its executive and its legislative capacity, Justice Brown summarized, in his concurring opinion, the three roles of the Crown in the legislative process.

Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Governor General in Council)*, [2018] 2 SCR 765, 2018 SCC 40

> Brown J — […]

> [130] By way of explanation, Parliament consists of the House of Commons, the Senate and the Queen (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 17). The scope of the Queen's legislative role — that is, the role of the Crown-in-Parliament — embraces "three determinative acts that are part of Parliament's core functions as a legislative body: royal recommendation, royal consent and royal assent" (C. Robert, "The Role of the Crown-in-Parliament: A Matter of Form and Substance", in M. Bédard and P. Lagassé, eds., The Crown and Parliament (2015), 95, at p. 96 (emphasis added)).
> [131] Royal recommendation, which is retained in s. 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, provides for the procedure to be followed in respect of authorizing expenditure of public monies. Royal consent is a practice based on a convention limiting Parliament's right to take measures infringing the Crown prerogative or other Crown rights and interests. Of relevance here, however, is royal assent. […] Royal assent is also expressly required by s. 55 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provides that, upon a bill passed by both the House of Commons and the Senate being presented to the Governor General for the Queen's assent, the Queen's assent (or withholding of consent, or reservation of the bill) shall be declared.
> [132] Sections 54 and 55 appear within Part IV of the Constitution Act, 1867 and are therefore designated by the Constitution as falling within "Legislative Power". This makes sense, because royal recommendation, royal consent and royal assent are distinct from other exercises of Crown authority. Unlike, for example, statutory bodies such as the National Energy Board, or ministers of the Crown acting under delegated statutory powers, the Crown-in-Parliament does not "exis[t] to exercise executive power as authorized by legislatures"; and, the steps taken as part of the parliamentary process of law-making, including royal assent, are not "the vehicle through which the Crown acts" (Clyde River (Hamlet) v. Petroleum Geo-Services Inc., 2017 SCC 40, [2017] 1 S.C.R. 1069, at para. 29).

While royal assent is generally (and by convention) a formality, this is not the case for royal recommendation and royal consent. These are among the most fundamental rules governing the relation between the Houses of Parliament and the Crown. In practice, the combined effect of these rules is that the government — i.e. the members of Parliament who collectively form the special committee of the King's Privy Council for Canada called the cabinet — exercises a key role in the parliamentary process. Legislation relating to the spending of money (a spending bill) or to the raising of revenue through taxes must be introduced by the government or obtain the government's approval. A minister of the Crown must explicitly express the Crown's consent before a bill to similar effect is introduced by a backbencher or a member of the opposition. And, in practice, the government decides whether a measure limiting the Crown's prerogative can be debated in Parliament. This means that two of the most important constraints that Parliament can impose on the Crown (how money is spent and the scope of the executive's prerogative powers) are essentially self-imposed constraints by the government on itself and on future governments (provided that the measures are not repealed).

While the government – the executive – must retain the confidence of the House of Commons to remain in power, Parliament is limited in its ability to impose its will on the executive in day-to-day affairs. This, combined with the fact that the volume of delegated legislation (regulations) adopted by the executive now far exceeds that of primary legislation adopted by Parliament, it is fair to say that Parliament is more often an overseer or watchdog of the executive and the legislative process than a law-maker.

According to constitutional convention, when the government loses the confidence of the House of Commons, the Prime Minister must either tender their resignation and that of their government, or advise the Governor General to exercise the prerogative of dissolution and call new elections.

The maximum term for a Parliament is five years. Before the expiry of the five year period, the House of Commons must be dissolved and an election called. This is set out in section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1867:

> 50. Every House of Commons shall continue for Five Years from the Day of the Return of the Writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

Note that s. 50 does not refer to provincial legislatures, which meant that provinces could extend the term of their legislatures beyond five years. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms changed this in 1982. Section 4(1) of the Charter now provides:

> 4(1). No House of Commons and no legislative assembly shall continue for longer than five years from the date fixed for the return of the writs of a general election of its members.

The drafters of the Charter were alert to the possibility that a strict five-year term might sometimes cause problems. They included in paragraph 4(2) an exception for "real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection". In this case, the House of Commons or the legislative assembly can be continued beyond five years provided that no more than one third of the assembly's members vote to oppose such an extension.

Section 5 of the Charter also provides that there shall be a sitting of Parliament and of each legislature at least once every twelve months.

3.2 A Note on Reservation and Disallowance

The legislative process in Canada also contains remnants of its colonial origin. The powers of reservation and disallowance were originally used to subject corporations, such as municipalities, to the oversight of the Crown who could nullify their delegated legislation. This mechanism was subsequently extended to the British colonies in North America and was retained in the Constitution Act, 1867. Consider ss. 55, 56, and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867:

> 55. Where a Bill passed by the Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.
> 56. Where the Governor General assents to a Bill in the Queen's Name, he shall by the first convenient Opportunity send an authentic Copy of the Act to One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, and if the Queen in Council within Two Years after Receipt thereof by the Secretary of State thinks fit to disallow the Act, such Disallowance (with a Certificate of the Secretary of State of the Day on which the Act was received by him) being signified by the Governor General, by Speech or Message to each of the Houses of the Parliament or by Proclamation, shall annul the Act from and after the Day of such Signification.
> 90. The following Provisions of this Act respecting the Parliament of Canada, namely, — the Provisions relating to Appropriation and Tax Bills, the Recommendation of Money Votes, the Assent to Bills, the Disallowance of Acts, and the Signification of Pleasure on Bills reserved, — shall extend and apply to the Legislatures of the several Provinces as if those Provisions were here re-enacted and made applicable in Terms to the respective Provinces and the Legislatures thereof, with the Substitution of the Lieutenant Governor of the Province for the Governor General, of the Governor General for the Queen and for a Secretary of State, of One Year for Two Years, and of the Province for Canada.

In practice, no statute of the federal Parliament was ever reserved or disallowed by the British Crown since Confederation. This power, at least in the case of the federal Parliament, has now fallen into desuetude. Paul Gérin-Lajoie explains the evolution of constitutional conventions and diplomatic relations between Canada and the United Kingdom that resulted in the desuetude of the power of reservation and disallowance in the early part of the twentieth century.

Paul Gérin-Lajoie, Constitutional Amendment in Canada, Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1950, pp. 25-29.

> It is easy to understand how much conventions may change the working of the fundamental law if it is borne in mind that conventions are the flesh giving a form to the skeleton Constitution. A Constitution may thus have a result far from that intended by its framers. Although such a development usually takes place en marge of the Constitution without conflicting with its express terms, the opposite may also arise. It is an unquestioned rule of law that usage, however well established, can never supersede the provisions of an act of Parliament. But law and practice, Constitution and government, are quite different matters. What is prohibited in law and cannot be recognized by the courts may well become an established practice which will never be or is not even susceptible of being submitted to the courts. This situation may happen in the internal working of government or in the relations of government with government whenever private rights are not directly involved. A situation then arises where a political stand according to the law but in violation of such practice would be faced by disapproval at the general elections, or by universal dis-obedience, or even by revolution. The force of things prevails over the force of law.
> Such a situation (where conventions override the acts of Parliament) arose in Canada mainly with respect to Imperial and Commonwealth relations. Under sections 55, 56, and 57 of the British North America Act, 1867, for example, the King on the advice of his Ministers in the United Kingdom originally gave instructions to the Governor-General concerning the assent and reservation of the bills passed by the Canadian Houses of Parliament; the Governor-General, according to his discretion, but subject to such instructions, assented to or reserved the bills or even withheld his assent completely; after assenting to a bill, he forwarded an authentic copy of the act to one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State (the Colonial Secretary) ; and within two years after its receipt by the Secretary of State such an act was subject to disallowance by the King on the advice of his British Ministers. These sections 55, 56, and 57 are still in the Constitution and have full force of law.
> Despite the text of the law the constitutional position and practice as recognized or established at Imperial Conferences are quite different. At the Conferences of 1929-30, applying the principles laid down in 1926, it was recognized as an established principle that the British Government would not advise the King to give the Governor-General any instructions to reserve bills presented to him for assent; and if a discretionary power of reservation existed it could be exercised by the Governor-General only "in accordance with the constitutional practice in the Dominion," in which case, as regards the signification of the King's pleasure, "it would not be in accordance with constitutional practice for advice to be tendered to His Majesty by the British Government, against the views of the Government of the Dominion concerned." In all these matters—instructions to the Governor-General, the discretionary power of reservation which the Governor-General may have, the signification of the King's pleasure—the King or his representative in a Dominion acts on the exclusive advice of his Ministers in the Dominion concerned. This was considered to be an established practice up to the point that it could be formally recognized by an amendment to the Constitution of any Dominion which so desired. The position is the same with respect to the power of disallowance of Dominion legislation formerly exercised by the King on the advice of his Ministers in the United Kingdom. Such power can no longer be exercised.
> Change has also occurred in the practice under which the acts of the Canadian Parliament were forwarded to London by the Governor-General, in accordance with section 56 of the British North America Act, 1867, which provides for the power of disallowance of federal legislation. The obligation of the Canadian Government under this section was implemented by the Publication of Statutes Act which provided for the delivery to the Governor-General by the clerk of the Parliaments, after each session, of a certified copy of the new statutes. The Imperial Conference, 1926, recognized that it was not wholly in accordance with the constitutional position of the Governor-General that the latter be the formal official channel of communication between the Government of the United Kingdom and the Governments of the Dominions. It was thought that the channel of communication should be from Government to Government direct. This new procedure, so far as Canada was concerned, came into force on July 1, 1927.
> From then until 1942, although the text of the Constitution was still unchanged, after each session of Parliament a bound copy of the statutes (certified by the clerk of the Parliaments) was sent direct by the Canadian Secretary of State for External Affairs to the British Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs. Moreover, in 1942, "in view of the complete obsolescence of the power of disallowance, and in order to bring the actual practice into conformity with the constitutional position," as later explained by Prime Minister Mackenzie King in the House of Commons, the transmission to London was stopped. Under the Publication of Statutes Act, however, the clerk of the Parliaments remained under the obligation to forward to the Governor-General, after each session, a copy of the new statutes. Actually he did send it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, since 1942, simply deposited it in the library of Parliament. In 1947, the Canadian Parliament finally amended the Publication of Statutes Act by deleting all references to disallowance of Canadian acts in London and reservation of the Governor-General's assent, and by relieving the clerk of the Parliaments of his former obligation. (footnotes omitted)

There is no question that the power of reservation and disallowance is now extinguished at the federal level. The adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982, confirmed in law what had become a reality by convention.

The matter is more disputed, though no less politically explosive, at the provincial level. The power to reserve or disallow a provincial statute was used relatively frequently by the Governor General on the advice of the federal cabinet in the first decades after Confederation. The power continued to be used, although less frequently until the 1940s. In total, 112 statutes were disallowed by the federal government between Confederation and 1943, which was the last year a provincial statute was disallowed. (See Gerard L. V. La Forest, Disallowance and Reservation of Provincial Legislation, Ottawa, Department of Justice, 1955). A provincial bill in Saskatchewan was reserved as late as 1962.

3.3 Parliamentary Sovereignty

3.3.1 Content of the doctrine – force and scope

The doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty is among the most fundamental constitutional principles in the English legal system and in those systems, such as Canada's, that derive from this system. The doctrine evolved in England over centuries and so its meaning is fluid and sometimes open to debate. (See Jeffrey Goldsworthy, The Sovereignty of Parliament: History and Philosophy, Oxford, Oxford University Press, 1999.) For our purposes, it is helpful to start with the formulation that the principle received in the writings of an English jurist, Albert Venn Dicey (1835-1922), who wrote around the turn of the twentieth century. Dicey's formulation of parliamentary sovereignty has been influential in both the United Kingdom and Canada. Even if it does not fully capture how the doctrine applies in a federation with a written constitution and formal amendment rules like Canada, it provides a helpful starting point to understand the various manifestations of the doctrine.

A.V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 8th edition, London, MacMillan, 1915.

[Dicey's most famous work is the Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, originally published in 1885 and reedited throughout his life. The eighth edition, published in 1915, was the last one published by Dicey himself. As you read the excerpt below, ask yourself whether the world that Dicey describes corresponds to the Canadian constitutional system that you know.]

The sovereignty of Parliament is (from a legal point of view) the dominant characteristic of our political institutions. My aim in this chapter is, in the fist place, to explain the nature of Parliament sovereignty and to show that it its existence is a legal fact, fully recognised by the law of England; in the next place, to prove that none of the alleged legal limitations on the sovereignty of Parliament have any existence; and, lastly, to state and meet certain speculative difficulties which hinder the ready admission of the doctrine that Parliament is, under the British constitution, an absolutely sovereign legislature.

A. Nature of Parliamentary Sovereignty. — Parliament means, in the mouth of a lawyer (though the word has often a different sense in ordinary conversation), the King, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons; these three bodies acting together may be aptly described as the "King in Parliament," and constitute Parliament.

The principle of Parliamentary sovereignty means neither more nor less than this, namely, that Parliament thus defined has, under the English constitution, the right to make or unmake any law whatever ; and, further, that no person or body is recognised by the law of England as having a right to override or set aside the legislation of Parliament.

A law may, for our present purpose, be defined as "any rule which will be enforced by the Courts." The principle then of Parliamentary sovereignty may, looked at from its positive side, be thus described: Any Act of Parliament, or any part of an Act of Parliament, which makes a new law, or repeals or modifies an existing law, will be obeyed by the Courts. The same principle, looked at from its negative side, may be thus stated: There is no person or body of persons who can, under the English constitution, make rules which override or derogate from an Act of Parliament, or which (to express the same thing in other words) will be enforced by the Courts in contravention of an Act of Parliament. Some apparent exceptions to this rule no doubt suggest themselves. But these apparent exceptions, as where, for example, the Judges of the High Court of Justice make rules of court repealing Parliamentary enactments, are resolvable into cases in which Parliament either directly or indirectly sanctions subordinate legislation. This is not the place for entering into any details as to the nature of judicial legislation; the matter is mentioned here only in order to remove an obvious difficulty which might present itself to some students.

It will be necessary in the course of these lectures to say a good deal more about Parliamentary sovereignty, but for the present the above rough description of its nature may suffice. The important thing is to make clear that the doctrine of Parliamentary sovereignty is, both on its positive and on its negative side, fully recognised by the law of England.

[Dicey went on to describe the "positive side" of parliamentary sovereignty. Dicey gave many examples, from acts of indemnity to the extension of the term of Parliaments and the modification of the rule of succession to the British Crown, etc.

Dicey then turned to what he called the "negative side" of parliamentary sovereignty which is "the absence of any competing legislative power". Dicey proceeded by showing that the King could not make laws. He cited the Henry VIII clause, discussed above, and the Case of Proclamations by which judges affirmed that, at common law, executive orders or proclamations cannot alter the rights and obligations of legal subjects. Dicey then considered the case of resolutions of either Houses of Parliament. He discussed the case of Stockdale v. Hansard as conclusive that a resolution of the House of Commons to the effect that a document printed on its order is not libelous does not change the law of libel. Dicey then considered the vote of parliamentary electors. Compared with countries like Switzerland, the electors in the United Kingdom do not have any legal power other than that of electing members of Parliament. Finally, Dicey considered the case of courts.]

All that we need note is that the adhesion by our judges to precedent, that is, their habit of deciding one case in accordance with the principle, or supposed principle, which governed a former case, leads inevitably to the gradual formation by the Courts of fixed rules for decision, which are in effect laws. This judicial legislation might appear, at first sight, inconsistent with the supremacy of Parliament. But this is not so. English judges do not claim or exercise any power to repeal a Statute, whilst Acts of Parliament may override and constantly do override the law of the judges. Judicial legislation is, in short, subordinate legislation, carried on with the assent and subject to the supervision of Parliament.

Alleged Limitations on the Legislative Sovereignty of Parliament

Our whole business is now to carry a step further the proof that, under the English constitution, Parliament does constitute such a supreme legislative authority or sovereign power as, according to Austin and other jurists, must exist in every civilised state, and for that purpose to examine into the validity of the various suggestions, which have from time to time been made, as to the possible limitations on Parliamentary authority, and to show that none of them are countenanced by English law.

The suggested limitations are three in number.

First, Acts of Parliament, it has been asserted, are invalid if they are opposed to the principles of morality or to the doctrines of international law. Parliament, it is in effect asserted, cannot make a law opposed to the dictates of private or public morality […] and expressions are sometimes used by modern judges which imply that the Courts might refuse to enforce statutes going beyond the proper limits (internationally speaking) of Parliamentary authority. But to words such as those […] we must give a very qualified interpretation. There is no legal basis for the theory that judges, as exponents of morality, may overrule Acts of Parliament. Language which might seem to imply this amounts in reality to nothing more than the assertion that the judges, when attempting to ascertain what is the meaning to be affixed to an Act of Parliament, will presume that Parliament did not intend to violate the ordinary rules of morality, or the principles of international law, and will therefore, whenever possible, give such an interpretation to a statutory enactment as may be consistent with the doctrines both of private and of international morality. A modem judge would never listen to a barrister who argued that an Act of Parliament was invalid because it was immoral, or because it went beyond the limits of Parliamentary authority. The plain truth is that our tribunals uniformly act on the principle that a law alleged to be a bad law is ex hypothesi a law, and therefore entitled to obedience by the Courts.

Secondly, doctrines have at times been maintained which went very near to denying the right of Parliament to touch the Prerogative.

In the time of the Stuarts the doctrine was maintained, not only by the King, but by lawyers and statesmen who, like Bacon, favoured the increase of royal authority, that the Crown possessed under the name of the "prerogative" a reserve, so to speak, of wide and indefinite rights and powers, and that this prerogative or residue of sovereign power was superior to the ordinary law of the land. This doctrine combined with the deduction from it that the Crown could suspend the operation of statutes, or at any rate grant dispensation from obedience to them, certainly suggested the notion that the high powers of the prerogative were to a certain extent beyond the reach of Parliamentary enactment. We need not, however, now enter into the political controversies of another age. All that need be noticed is that though certain powers—as, for example, the right of making treaties—are now left by law in the hands of the Crown, and are exercised in fact by the executive government, no modem lawyer would maintain that these powers or any other branch of royal authority could not be regulated or abolished by Act of Parliament, or, what is the same thing, that the judges might legally treat as invalid a statute, say, regulating the mode in which treaties are to be made, or making the assent or the Houses of Parliament necessary to the validity of a treaty.

> Thirdly, language has occasionally been used in Acts of Parliament which implies that one Parliament can make laws which cannot be touched by any subsequent Parliament, and that therefore the legislative authority of an existing Parliament may be limited by the enactments of its predecessors.
> That Parliaments have more than once intended and endeavoured to pass Acts which should tie the hands of their successors is certain, but the endeavour has always ended in failure. [Dicey then discussed examples such as Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland, many of which were subsequently explicitly or implicitly repealed or amended by Parliament.]
> Parliamentary sovereignty is therefore an undoubted legal fact. It is complete both on its positive and on its negative side. Parliament can legally legislate on any topic whatever which, in the judgment of Parliament, is a fit subject for legislation. There is no power which, under the English constitution, can come into rivalry with the legislative sovereignty of Parliament.
> No one of the limitations alleged to be imposed by law on the absolute authority of Parliament has any real existence, or receives any countenance, either from the statute-book or from the practice of the Courts.
> This doctrine of the legislative supremacy of Parliament is the very keystone of the law of the constitution. […]

Dicey's theory of parliamentary sovereignty was extremely influential. But, as has often been noted, he often straddled the line between prescription and description and tended sometimes to idealize the working of the English constitution. Dicey's theory was put to test in the context of the Empire, which became a focal point for his critics.

One of the first cases that put Dicey's theory to test was released just a few years before the publication of the first edition of the Introduction. Hodge v. The Queen concerned a tavern owner, Archibald Hodge, who operated his billiard room after the operating hours authorized by Ontario legislation. The province's Liquor License Act or Crooks Act, took the regulation of liquor out of the hands of municipalities and gave it to newly created Boards of License Commissioners, who were appointed by the provincial government. These boards were in charge of the administration of the statute, and held the power to decide the number of licenses issued. Hodge was charged and convicted under the Liquor License Act. In his appeal Hodge argued that provincial legislatures could not delegate their law-making powers to administrative boards like the Board of License Commissioners. (Another argument raised by Hodge concerning provincial powers under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is discussed in Chapter 5).

3.3.2 Hodge v. The Queen, [1883] 9 A.C. 117

> [In this excerpt from the judgment, Sir Barnes Peacock of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council addresses the argument that the Ontario legislature could not delegate its power to commissioners because the provincial legislature held only delegated powers and so could not sub-delegate those powers to another entity.]
> Assuming that the Local Legislature had power to legislate to the full extent of the Resolutions passed by the License Commissioners […], it was further contended that the Imperial Parliament had conferred no authority on the Local Legislature to delegate those powers to the License Commissioners or any other persons. In other words, that the power conferred by the Imperial Parliament on the Local Legislature should be exercised in full by that body, and by that body alone. The maxim delegatus non potest delegare was relied on.
> It appears to their Lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the appellants is founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the Provincial Legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a Legislature for Ontario, and that its Legislative Assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in Sect. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by Sect. 92, as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the Local Legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make bye-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect.
> It is obvious that such an authority is ancillary to legislation, and without it an attempt to provide for varying details and machinery to carry them out might become oppressive, or absolutely fail. The very full and elaborate judgment of the Court of Appeal contains abundance of precedents for this legislation entrusting a limited discretionary authority to others, and has many illustrations of its necessity and convenience. It was argued at the bar that a Legislature committing important regulations to agents or delegates effaces itself. That is not so. It retains its powers intact, and can, whenever it pleases, destroy the agency it has created and set up another, or take the matter directly into its own hands. How far it shall seek the aid of subordinate agencies, and how long it shall continue them, are matters for each Legislature, and not for courts of law, to decide. […]

Hodge v. The Queen clarified the status of provincial legislatures and the legal framework applicable to them. The maxim delegatus non potest delegare, discussed by Lord Peacock, is a rule of administrative law that precludes a body, on which Parliament has conferred law-making powers, from further delegating these powers to another body - to sub-delegate. In deciding that the powers of a provincial legislature are "not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament", the JCPC seemed then to be saying that not all law-making power flows from a single source, the UK Parliament, contrary to Dicey's view.

At the same time, Hodge v. The Queen also illustrated one of the consequences flowing from the finding that provincial legislatures are sovereign within their jurisdiction. When Parliament or a provincial legislature creates an entity to which it delegates some legislative powers, that entity must exercise those powers for the purpose for which they were granted. Its discretion can be relatively wide or narrow. But regardless of the breadth of its discretion, delegated law-making bodies must exercise their discretion in a way that is reasonable.

For example, in the English case of Kruse v. Johnson, [1898] 2 Q.B. 91, decided a few years after Hodge v. The Queen, the English Court of Queen's Bench held that a municipal by-law could be ultra vires, even though the law-making process was democratic and was subject to administrative oversight. The Chief Justice, Lord Russell, explained in his opinion the circumstances in which a court might make such a determination:

> If, for instance, [the by-laws] were found to be partial and unequal in their operation as between different classes, if they were manifestly unjust, if they disclosed bad faith, if they involved such oppressive or gratuitous interference with the rights of those subject to them as could find no justification in the minds of reasonable men, the court might well say Parliament never intended to give authority to make such rules; they are unreasonable and ultra vires.

This statement by Lord Russell points to an important clarification of the legal status of provincial legislatures recognized in by Hodge v. The Queen. While delegated law-making bodies, like municipal councils, receive a delegation of power for a specific purpose, provincial legislatures are not created for a purpose. They are free to pursue any purpose they wish, as long as they remain within their jurisdiction (and provided, since 1982, that they do not unjustifiably limit Charter rights). Some judges and lawyers have used the expression "quasi-sovereign" to characterize provincial legislatures and the federal Parliament, and distinguish them from other (delegated) law-making bodies.

This offers an opportunity to return to Dicey's classical definition of parliamentary sovereignty and its applicability to Canada. Dicey's definition allows us to distinguish between the scope and the force of the law-making power of parliament. Parliamentary sovereignty means that the legal force of a statute is stronger than other forms of law. A statutory rule has precedence over any other conflicting rule of law (other than a constitutional rule in Canada). Other 'laws' must be compatible with statute law, or the courts will hold that they have been pro tanto repealed, amended, or displaced. At the same time, this also means that a court of law cannot ignore a duly enacted statute, because it conflicts with the common law or any other source of law, for example. In the Canadian system, only a constitutional provision takes precedence over a statute.

Parliamentary sovereignty also means that the scope of Parliament's (or a legislature's) law-making power is not substantively limited. A sovereign parliament can make and unmake laws about any subject matter whatsoever. While this statement may be true of the UK Parliament, it needs to be qualified in the case of Canada. As we saw, legislative power in Canadian constitutional law is divided between the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The federal Parliament and provincial legislatures may legislate in relation to any matter they choose within the scope of the powers granted to them under the constitution. In contrast to bodies, such as municipal government, that are exercising delegated law-making powers, Parliament and the provincial legislatures do not have to exercise their powers "reasonably". when so doing. They must only stay within their general jurisdiction.

Even if parliamentary sovereignty is a central component of Canadian constitutional law, courts rarely have the opportunity to discuss it directly. Most often, it only forms the background against which other constitutional doctrines and conventions are elaborated or developed, like the doctrine of implied repeal discussed in the next section. However, in the Reference re Pan-Canadian Securities Regulation, reproduced below, the Supreme Court of Canada explained how the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty applies in Canada. It also explained the ways in which the doctrine needs to be adapted to the Canadian constitutional system where there is a written constitution amendable through specific procedures and a federal division of powers between two orders of government.

[The case concerned an agreement between the federal government and five provinces and one territory to create a pan-Canadian scheme for securities regulation. The province of Quebec argued that the agreement was incompatible with parliamentary sovereignty. A second issue dealing with the scope of the federal government's power to enact laws in relation to trade and commerce is discussed in Chapter 9.

In the excerpt reproduced here, the Court explains what the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty is and how it applies, with variations, in the Canadian context.]

The Court — […]

(b) Parliamentary Sovereignty

[54] Parliamentary sovereignty is a foundational principle of the Westminster model of government, and it is based on a recognition that the legislature's power to make laws exists without any legal limits or constraints […]. In its traditional form, parliamentary sovereignty means that the legislature has the exclusive authority to enact, amend, and repeal any law as it sees fit, and that there is no matter in respect of which it may not make laws. [The Court then went on to cite an excerpt from A.V. Dicey's Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, reproduced above.]

[55] The sovereignty of the legislature is central to the United Kingdom's uncodified constitutional structure (Jackson v. Her Majesty's Attorney General, [2005] UKHL 56, [2006] 1 A.C. 262, at para. 9 (per Lord Bingham)). Because there are no constituent instruments that either restrict the U.K. Parliament's jurisdiction over certain subject matters or enshrine certain civil rights and liberties, "[a]ny law, upon any subject matter, is within Parliament's competence" (P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 12-1). Parliamentary sovereignty therefore means that the legislative branch of government has supremacy over the executive and the judiciary: both must act in accordance with statutory enactments, and neither can usurp or interfere with the legislature's law-making function.

[56] While the principle of parliamentary sovereignty is an equally important feature of Canadian law, various aspects of our written Constitution have qualified the basic Diceyan rule that Parliament has the power "to make or unmake any law whatever". One such qualification lies in the federal structure of the Canadian state, which restricts the subject matters over which each legislature has jurisdiction. The distribution of legislative power between Parliament and the provincial legislatures is set out in Part VI of the Constitution Act, 1867. Since neither level of government has the power to legislate in respect of matters that fall within the exclusive competence of the other, the sovereignty of Parliament and of the provincial legislatures has been limited in Canada since Confederation. This was explained by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117 (P.C.), as follows:

> When the British North America Act [now known as the Constitution Act, 1867] enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for provincial purposes in relation to matters enumerated in sect. 92, it conferred . . . authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by sect. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances . . . . [Emphasis added; p. 132.]

Given this constitutional division of powers, therefore, neither Parliament nor the provincial legislatures have the authority to enact laws that touch on all subject matters. Rather, the effect of parliamentary sovereignty in the context of Canadian federalism is that Parliament and the provincial legislatures are supreme with respect only to matters that fall within their respective spheres of jurisdiction.

[57] Further limits were placed upon parliamentary sovereignty in Canada following the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, a constitutional document which (among other things) protects the various civil rights and freedoms enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (ss. 1 to 34), recognizes and affirms existing Aboriginal and treaty rights (s. 35), and provides that any laws which are inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution are, "to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect" (s. 52(1)). Not only does this constitutional instrument impose substantive limits on the content of statutory enactments, but it also codifies the authority of superior courts to review legislation for constitutional compliance (an authority that had previously been only assumed to exist). Professor Monahan et al. had the following to say about the effect of the Constitution Act, 1982 on the principles of parliamentary supremacy and of the rule of law:

> All laws, regardless of the subject matter, are subject to review on the basis that they offend fundamental rights of individuals or groups under the Charter, or Indigenous rights under [s. 35]. . . . In this sense, the principle of constitutionalism and the rule of law — which requires that all actions of the state must be authorized by law and consistent with constitutional requirements — has now significantly narrowed the

> [58] In Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217, this Court observed that, "with the adoption of the Charter, the Canadian system of government was transformed to a significant extent from a system of parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy" (para. 72). This is of course true, insofar as the Constitution places limits on the law-making powers of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. However, the principle of parliamentary sovereignty remains foundational to the structure of the Canadian state: aside from these constitutional limits, the legislative branch of government remains supreme over both the judiciary and the executive.
> [59] An important corollary to parliamentary sovereignty is the rule that the executive cannot unilaterally fetter the legislature's law-making power. [The Court then went on to discuss the decision Re Anti-Inflation Act, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 373 to underscore the fact that an intergovernmental agreement cannot, in and of itself, bind Parliament or a provincial legislature.]
> [62] When an action of the executive branch appears to clash with the legislature's law-making powers, parliamentary sovereignty can be invoked for the purpose of determining the legal effect of the impugned executive action, but not its underlying validity. For example, the executive of one province may act within the confines of its constitutional authority when entering into an intergovernmental agreement with that of another province. If a term in such an agreement purports to bind the province's legislature, the result is not that the agreement itself is constitutionally invalid; the principle of parliamentary sovereignty simply means that the legislature's hands cannot be tied, and therefore that the impugned term is ineffective. In other words, because the legislature's law-making powers are supreme over the executive, the latter cannot bind the former. The result is that any executive agreement that purports to fetter the legislature is not inherently unconstitutional, but will quite simply not have the desired effect.
> [63] This understanding of the principle of parliamentary sovereignty is firmly established in this Court's jurisprudence. The advisory opinion in Reference Re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.) is particularly illustrative in this regard. At the centre of that case was an agreement entered into in 1967 between the governments of Canada and British Columbia, pursuant to the Canada Assistance Plan, S.C. 1966-67, c. 45 ("Plan"). Section 4 of the Plan authorized the federal government to enter into agreements with individual provinces to share the cost of expenditures on social assistance and welfare, and s. 5 authorized payments to each contracting province of roughly 50 percent of that province's eligible expenditures. The Plan also provided that any such agreement would continue in force so long as the relevant provincial law remained in operation (s. 8(1)), and could be amended or terminated only by mutual consent or by giving one year's notice (s. 8(2)). In response to a budget deficit, however, the federal government introduced legislation into Parliament that would limit the growth of payments to financially stronger provinces — including British Columbia — to less than 50 percent. This Court rejected the Government of British Columbia's challenge to the bill (which was eventually passed into law). Sopinka J., writing for a unanimous Court, held on the basis of the principle of parliamentary sovereignty that Parliament was free to amend the Plan as it did, and that the terms of the agreement could not restrict its power to effect such change. On this, he specifically acknowledged that the federal executive "could not bind Parliament from exercising its powers to legislate amendments to the Plan" (p. 548), and that parliamentary sovereignty "prevents a legislative body from binding itself as to the substance of its future legislation" (p. 563).
> [64] A similar issue arose in Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 (SCC), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199, in which this Court considered a claim for damages brought by Mr. Wells, a member of the Public Utilities Board, after amendments made to the Public Utilities Act, R.S.N. 1970, c. 322, by the Newfoundland House of Assembly had led to his position being abolished. As per the terms of his appointment, he was entitled to serve as a commissioner of the Board during good behaviour until the age of 70. This Court found that these terms were part of an enforceable contract of employment with the Crown and could thus form the basis of a claim for breach of contract. Relying on the opinion in Reference re Canada Assistance Plan, however, it unanimously affirmed that this employment contract did not in any way fetter the House of Assembly's authority to restructure or eliminate the Public Utilities Board pursuant to its constitutionally protected law-making powers. Although this Court found that Mr. Wells was still entitled to pursue a claim for breach of contract against the Government of Newfoundland, it relied on the principle of parliamentary sovereignty in affirming the primacy of the legislature's will over acts of the executive.
> [65] Interestingly, in both Reference Re Canada Assistance Plan and Wells, this Court supported its decision by quoting the following passage from the Supreme Court of South Australia in West Lakes:
> > Ministers of State cannot, however, by means of contractual obligations entered into on behalf of the State fetter their own freedom, or the freedom of their successors or the freedom of other members of parliament, to propose, consider and, if they think fit, vote for laws, even laws which are inconsistent with the contractual obligations. [p. 390]
> [67] In short, the foregoing makes clear that the principle of parliamentary sovereignty is precisely what preserves the provincial legislatures' right to enact, amend and repeal their securities legislation independently of the Council of Ministers' approval. Therefore, even if the Memorandum actually purported to fetter this legislative power, it would be merely ineffective in this regard (since it cannot bind the legislature), and not constitutionally invalid.

When discussing parliamentary sovereignty, judges and lawyers do not always distinguish between questions of force and questions of scope. Indeed, the difference between the two may not always be easy to identify. Some scholars, for example, argue that basic moral principles form part of the common law and that judges can refuse to apply legislation when it directly conflicts with these principles. Is this because these principles form the outer boundary of parliament's jurisdiction and thus limit the scope of its lawmaking power? Or is it because, instead, the legal force of a statute is weak when it conflicts with an important legal principle that might thus override it?

This is a debate that is particularly relevant in countries that do not have a written and entrenched constitution, like the United Kingdom. In Canada, judges have been reluctant to add constraints that are not already provided for in the written texts that form the "Constitution of Canada". One exception concerns the principle of free and open political discourse, sometimes interpreted (in limited circumstances) by courts as a necessary component of a parliamentary system of government. Those cases are discussed in Chapter 13, "Charter Antecedents". The case of Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), [2021] 2 SCR 845, 2021 SCC 34 is illustrative of the foregoing. In this case, the majority declined to rely on the "unwritten constitutional principle" of democracy to strike down legislation. The case is discussed in the chapters dealing with Charter interpretation, freedom of expression, and democratic rights.

3.4 Implied Repeal, Clear Statement Rules and Interpretive Presumptions

Another element of parliamentary sovereignty is the doctrine of implied repeal: a principle of statutory interpretation that Parliament will be taken to have impliedly repealed a previous statutory provision if it is inconsistent with a more recent enactment. The rule of law requires that the law not make contradictory demands on its subjects or on the courts which must apply the law. As A.V. Dicey emphasized in the excerpt above from his Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, the sovereignty of parliament entails the power to make and unmake any law whatsoever. Thus, where two statutes seem to be in conflict, the last to be enacted will be understood as the expression of parliament's will. Parliament then does not need to say explicitly that it is repealing an earlier statute, though it ordinarily does make this explicit.

In England, the doctrine of implied repeal received its clearest expression in two decisions of the Court of King's Bench in the 1930s. In 1919 the UK Parliament enacted a statute, which provided that "The provisions of the Act or order by which the land is authorised to be acquired, or of any Act incorporated therewith, shall, in relation to the matters dealt with in this Act, have effect subject to this Act, and so far as inconsistent with this Act those provisions shall cease to have or shall not have effect". In 1925, the Parliament passed another statute that conflicted with the 1919 law without expressly repealing it. The cases of Vauxhall Estates Ltd v. Liverpool Corporation, [1932] 1 K.B. 732 and Ellen Street Estate v. Minister of Health, [1934] 1 K.B. 590 considered the effect of this later statute. In both cases, the Court refused to give effect to the 1919 statute. In Ellen Street Estate, Lord Maugham expressed the matter thus:

> [Counsel] contends that as regards subsequent legislation, in the absence of an express repeal of this provision of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the provisions of that Act must apply, however clear the intention of Parliament, as expressed in the subsequent Act, is to modify the provisions of the Act of 1919. I am quite unable to accept that view. The Legislature cannot, according to our constitution, bind itself as to the form of subsequent legislation, and it is impossible for Parliament to enact that in a subsequent statute dealing with the same subject matter there can be no implied repeal. If in a subsequent Act Parliament chooses to make it plain that the earlier statute is being to some extent repealed, effect must be given to that intention just because it is the will of the Legislature.

It should be noted that the doctrine of implied repeal is a corollary of parliamentary sovereignty, but it does not depend on it. For example, the doctrine is also applied to municipal by-laws, even though municipalities are not sovereign legislatures. It is also recognized in international law and in other jurisdiction that do not have parliamentary sovereignty. The Latin maxim Lex posterior derogate lex priori expresses this general rule of statutory interpretation whereby later laws trump former laws. The leading text on constitutional law in Canada adopts this view, that "[t]he incapacity of an elected legislative assembly to bind its successors as to the substance of future legislation seems such a fundamental requirement of democracy that one is tempted to suggest that the incapacity must be inherent in all elected assemblies." (Peter Hogg & Wade Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed online, Toronto, Carswell, 2025, § 12:9, fn 4.)

There are of course other rules of statutory interpretation that a court may employ to resolve apparent conflicts between statutes. The Latin maxim Lex specialis derogate lex generalis expresses the interpretive principle that a more specific law derogates from and thus prevails over a more general law. As Elmer Driedger writes, "In some cases [judges and lawyers] say that a special statute overrides a general statute. If the special statute is also later, they say that the special has impliedly repealed the earlier in so far as they are inconsistent, or that the special amended the general by subtracting the subject-matter of the special from the subject-matter of the general. If the special statute is earlier, they cannot say it repealed the later, but they can say that the subject-matter of the general does not include the subject-matter of the special. Whatever they say, they are in fact simply ignoring the general statute and applying the special to the facts before them." (Elmer A. Driedger, "The Meaning and Effect of the Canadian Bill of Rights: A Draftman's Viewpoint", (1977) 9:2 Ottawa Law Review 303, p. 309).

In the 1970s, the Canadian courts began to regard some statutes as "quasi-constitutional", and to adapt their interpretive approach to these statutes in a way that recognized their fundamental importance. This recognition of "quasi-constitutional" legislation, provides a third way in which the courts may sometimes resolve conflicts between statutes.

In Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Simpson-Sears, Justice McIntyre when interpreting a provincial human rights code noted that: "The accepted rules of construction are flexible enough to enable the Court to recognize in the construction of a human rights code the special nature and purpose of the enactment […], and give to it an interpretation which will advance its broad purposes. Legislation of this type is of a special nature, not quite constitutional but certainly more than the ordinary--and it is for the courts to seek out its purpose and give it effect." (Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Simpson-Sears, 1985 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 536, para. 12)

The Canadian courts have not yet developed a clear or comprehensive account of quasi-constitutional legislation. In the absence of such an account, it may be difficult to determine which statutes are quasi-constitutional. The courts have said that quasi-constitutional statutes have "a special status in the Canadian legal framework" (Lavigne v. Canada (Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages), 2002 SCC 53, para. 23) that reflects "certain basic goals of our society" and that they must be interpreted so "as to advance the broad policy considerations underlying [them]" (Robichaud v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1987 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 84, para. 8). Also, courts are now more willing to accept "clear statement rules" like the one in the Canadian Bill of Rights, which provide that this statute will prevail over any other conflicting statute, even when the conflicting statute is a later enactment, unless the later statute clearly provides otherwise. One can find such provisions, for example, in the federal Official Languages Act (s. 82(1)) or the Quebec Charter of Human Rights (s. 52). (See Vanessa MacDonnell, "A Theory of Quasi-Constitutional Legislation", (2016) 53:2 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 508).

Other examples of statutes that courts have recognized as "quasi-constitutional" even if they do not include such clear statement rules include the Privacy Act, the Access to Information Act, and human rights codes like the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Ontario Human Rights Code.

These interpretative presumptions —the doctrine of implied repeal, the doctrine that a specific law derogates from a general law, and the recognition of quasi-constitutional legislation — serve to mitigate conflicts between statutes. But there are other important interpretive presumptions that courts have long used to address conflicting laws and that may have the effect of tempering parliamentary sovereignty. For example, courts have generally required that parliament use clear and plain language to extinguish a common law right or the royal prerogative.

In the case of Wells v. Newfoundland, the Supreme Court of Canada recognized that the legislature of Newfoundland could abolish the office of Mr. Wells (a public position with quasi-judicial responsibility), but that mere abolition of his office would not be interpreted as a statutory extinguishment of Wells' contractual right to compensation under his employment agreement with the Crown: "While the legislature may have the extraordinary power of passing a law to specifically deny compensation to an aggrieved individual with whom it has broken an agreement, clear and explicit statutory language would be required to extinguish existing rights previously conferred on that party." (Wells v. Newfoundland, 1999 CanLII 657 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 199, para. 41.)

The courts will also require clear and plain language when the legislature wants to limit the Crown prerogative. This interpretive rule is now provided by statute in the Interpretation Act, RSC 1985 c. I-21: "No enactment is binding on Her Majesty or affects Her Majesty or Her Majesty's rights or prerogatives in any manner, except as mentioned or referred to in the enactment."

We can see that the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty is thus tempered by different interpretive presumptions. While courts will give effect to parliamentary law-making, courts may still require Parliament or the legislature to use clear, plain, and unambiguous language in some contexts. In other words, if statutory language is unclear, courts are unlikely to interpret legislation in a way that will negatively affect someone's rights or interests, such as stripping someone of their rights at common law, or important statutory rights, such as those protected by human rights statutes, or limiting the Crown's prerogative. It is the lawmakers' constitutional responsibility to express clearly and plainly what they intend to do and, presumably, to explain the overriding reasons that justify their legislative decision in these instances.

4.1 Preliminary observations: what is government?

When people refer to the "government" of Canada, what do they have in mind? The term is often used in different ways. We may think of government as a massive, faceless bureaucracy that requires us to pay taxes, complete forms, obtain licences and permits, etc. We may think of government in terms of political personalities or parties—e.g. the "Harper government" or the "Liberal government". We will often praise or criticize government for its handling of the economy or its stand on international affairs or the laws it has made or failed to make. Some of these uses of the term are what McIntyre J. called "government in its generic sense ... meaning the whole of the governmental apparatus of the state"; but, he insisted, this sense of government must be distinguished from the narrower understanding of government as "the executive government" of the state. [39]

It is this latter understanding of government that is baked into Canadian constitutional law. As we have seen, the Constitution Act, 1867 states in its preamble that it is expedient to provide for both "the Constitution of the Legislative Authority in the Dominion" as well as "the Nature of the Executive Government therein". With this preambular commitment to establishing an executive government separate from legislative authority, we can turn to the substantive provisions of the Act to discover what the executive government is. In doing so, however, we immediately confront a kind of constitutional cognitive dissonance.

Most Canadians would, upon reflection, probably agree that the executive government of the day, federally or provincially, is centred within a cabinet of ministers led by a prime minister or premier, with each cabinet minister leading a department of government relating to some aspect of public affairs (defence, health, transportation, finance, education, etc.). Yet the provisions on executive government in the Constitution Act, 1867 make no mention of cabinets, prime ministers, or premiers. Instead, the text introduces us to another set of offices and institutions—the queen, governor general, lieutenant governors, privy council, and executive councils. Today's reader of the written constitution may be forgiven for thinking that they have entered a museum of constitutional relics.

From the beginning, however, the Constitution Act, 1867 was premised upon the possibility of a kind of double constitutional life: that institutions could be described one way in law with an understanding that they would operate another way in practice. To work out this distinctive constitutional arrangement, we need to begin by setting out the written provisions of the Constitution of Canada that address the executive branch of state—keeping in mind that these provisions tell at best only half the story.

4.2 The legal framework for executive power

4.2.1 Provisions of the Constitution of Canada relating to the crown and executive government

...

III. Executive Power

Declaration of Executive Power in the Queen

9. The Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

Application of Provisions referring to Governor General

10. The Provisions of this Act referring to the Governor General extend and apply to the Governor General for the Time being of Canada, or other the Chief Executive Officer or Administrator for the Time being carrying on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the Name of the Queen, by whatever Title he is designated.

Constitution of Privy Council for Canada

11. There shall be a Council to aid and advise in the Government of Canada, to be styled the Queen's Privy Council for Canada; and the Persons who are to be Members of that Council shall be from Time to Time chosen and summoned by the Governor General and sworn in as Privy Councillors, and Members thereof may be from Time to Time removed by the Governor General.

These provisions from Parts III and V of the Constitution Act, 1867 establish a skeletal legal framework for executive authority in Canada. The Queen is confirmed to be vested with the "Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada" (s. 9); a Governor General "carr[ies] on the Government of Canada on behalf and in the Name of the Queen" (s. 10); and the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, whose members are appointed by the governor general, is established "to aid and advise in the Government of Canada" (s. 11).

The Constitution Act, 1867 was not meant to be a complete constitutional code; a background legal world brings its terms to life. The Act constitutes neither the office of queen nor governor general. The provisions on executive government refer to "the Queen", who in 1867 was Victoria, but it originally stated in section 2 that references to "the Queen" extend "also to the Heirs and Successors of Her Majesty, Kings and Queens of the United Kingdom". Rather than establish the office of governor general, the Act simply says that references to the office are to the governor general "for the Time being" of Canada. The office of governor general is constituted by letters patent issued by the queen or king, the present version dating from 1947 and each occupant of the office is appointed by commission issued by the king or queen. On these points, see section 2.3 above.

With each of its bald pronouncements about executive government, then, the Constitution Act, 1867 draws upon a long lineage of legal ideas. "Behind the written word is an historical lineage stretching back through the ages".[40] The vesting of executive government in "the Queen" follows ancient notions about monarchical governance. In his famous Commentaries on the Laws of England, Sir William Blackstone wrote in 1765: "The supreme executive power is vested by our laws in a single person, the king or queen".[41] The establishment of a Canadian privy council also tracks ancient forms. Medieval kings governed through a curia regis—a court or council—from which over the course of centuries there evolved separate bodies with distinct executive, legislative, and judicial functions, including, according to Blackstone, a "noble, honorable, and reverend assembly" known as the "privy council" to which the king summoned "the principal officers [or ministers] of state" to provide advice on executive or administrative affairs (as well as on certain judicial affairs through a distinct judicial committee consisting of judges).[42] In Canada, the governor general is to summon and seek the aid and advice of a similar body of councillors in relation to governmental affairs (but not on judicial matters).

4.2.2 The crown and provincial executive government

Any thought that references to the "Government of Canada" in Part III of the Constitution Act, 1867 might refer to executive authority over Canada in a global sense—over both federal and provincial affairs—is precluded by the provisions on provincial executive power in Part V of the Act which contemplate separate provincial governments in the form of a "Lieutenant Governor" tasked with "carrying on the Government of the Province" (s. 62) acting where necessary "by and with the Advice of" an "Executive Council" (s. 66).

The provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 on provincial executive government are at first glance confusing because they treat the new provinces, Ontario and Quebec, formed out of the predecessor province of Canada, differently from the pre-existing provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and because they have not been amended to reflect the subsequent admission of six other provinces: Manitoba (1870), British Columbia (1871), Prince Edward Island (1873), Saskatchewan (1905), Alberta (1905), and Newfoundland and Labrador (1949).

The instruments admitting new provinces are listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982 and are therefore included within the "Constitution of Canada" as defined by section 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982. These instruments either establish lieutenant governors and executive councils for the new province[43] or provide for the continuity of the pre-existing "Constitution of Executive Authority" (and thus lieutenant governor and executive council) in the province[44], and all instruments of admission provide that each new province occupies the same position as the original provinces.[45]

It should be noted that the constitutions of the Northwest Territories, Yukon, and Nunavut are found in federal statutes that are not listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982 and so are not expressly included within the "Constitution of Canada", but the structure of executive authority in the territories resembles that found in the provinces, with a "Commissioner" (rather than a lieutenant governor) appointed by the governor in council and an "Executive Council" appointed by the commissioner (in Nunavut appointments being "on the recommendation of the Legislative Assembly of Nunavut").[46]

The "Government of Canada" and the "Government of the Province" are thus two separate sets of executive governments established or recognized by the Constitution of Canada. However, the references to the queen in the provisions constituting the federal government are not paralleled with similar references to the queen in the provisions on provincial governments. Also, the lieutenant governors are appointed by the governor general in council (s. 58), not the queen. These points are consistent with the prevailing view upon confederation that the lieutenant governors represented the federal government rather than the crown directly, and this in turn was consistent with the subordination of provinces to federal authority. In Lenoir v. Ritchie, 1879 SCC 37, Gwynne J. said:

> ... the Provincial Governments are, as it were, carved out of, and subordinated to, the Dominion. The head of their executive Government is not an officer appointed by Her Majesty, or holding any commission from her, or in any manner personally representing her, but an officer of the Dominion Government, appointed by the Governor-General, acting under the advice of a council, which the act constitutes the Privy Council of the Dominion. The Queen forms no part of the Provincial Legislatures, as she does of the Dominion Parliament. [47]

The subsequent rejection of this view by the courts (two leading cases follow) was a critical step in the emergence of a robust version of federalism in Canada.

4.2.2.1 Maritime Bank of Canada (Liquidators of) v.New Brunswick (Receiver-General), [1892] A.C. 437

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada (Dec. 14, 1889), affirming a judgment of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick (Oct. 19, 1888) upon a special case submitted.

[Background: A bank in New Brunswick became insolvent and declared bankruptcy. The law of bankruptcy provides that unsecured creditors will be paid from whatever funds are still available in order of a ranking (e.g., employees, shareholders, customers, etc.). It is one peculiar feature of British constitutional law that the Crown, if it is a creditor, stands first in line to be paid, and this priority is an established right by virtue of the Crown's "royal prerogative", or inherent common law powers. The government of New Brunswick had deposits in the insolvent bank. The question of constitutional law in this case was whether New Brunswick could claim priority by virtue of the crown prerogative.]

The Attorney General (Sir R. Webster), Stockton, Q.C. (of the New Brunswick bar), and R. Brown, for the appellants:

The prerogative rights of the Crown cannot be invoked and exercised by the provincial government, as distinguished from the Dominion Government. There is no section in the British North America Act of 1867 which gives this Crown right to the province. Accordingly, if the province possesses that right it must be on the general principle that the Lieutenant-Governor is entitled to exercise the prerogative of the Crown. But the effect of the Act of 1867 is that the Dominion Government represents the four provinces existing at the time of the Union and other provinces which were thereafter to be constituted; and, consequently, the direct connection between the Crown and the provinces has ceased. The Governor-General of Canada is the real representative of the Crown as the Dominion is at present constituted; and the Lieutenant-Governor of each province is not.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., Blair, Q.C. (Attorney General for New Brunswick), and Ingle Joyce, for the respondent:

Before the [British North America] Act of 1867 each provincial government exercised the prerogatives of the Crown. They are reserved to them by the [1867] Act. Sects. 64 and 65 read together mean that the powers and authorities vested in and exercised by the provincial government at the time of the Union should continue. These powers cannot be cut down except by express enactment, and there is nothing either in the Act of 1867 or in any subsequent Act which abolishes or alters them. According to the true effect of that Act the provincial governments and legislatures are within their respective spheres supreme. They are not made in any way subordinate to the legislature and government of the Dominion. The intention was that the Dominion and the provinces should have co-ordinate authority within their respective spheres, all subject to the control of the Imperial Parliament.

Lord Watson: --

Their Lordships do not think it necessary to examine, in minute detail, the provisions of the [British North America] Act of 1867, which nowhere profess to curtail in any respect the rights and privileges of the Crown, or to disturb the relations then subsisting between the Sovereign and the provinces. The object of the Act was neither to weld the provinces into one, nor to subordinate provincial governments to a central authority, but to create a federal government in which they should all be represented, entrusted with the exclusive administration of affairs in which they had a common interest, each province retaining its independence and autonomy. That object was accomplished by distributing, between the Dominion and the provinces, all powers executive and legislative, and all public property and revenues which had previously belonged to the provinces; so that the Dominion Government should be vested with such of these powers, property, and revenues as were necessary for the due performance of its constitutional functions, and that the remainder should be retained by the provinces for the purposes of provincial government. ...

It is clear, therefore, that the provincial legislature of New Brunswick does not occupy the subordinate position which was ascribed to it in the argument of the appellants. It derives no authority from the Government of Canada, and its status is in no way analogous to that of a municipal institution, which is an authority constituted for purposes of local administration. ...

In asking their Lordship to draw that inference from the terms of the statute [i.e., that the provinces are akin to municipal governments and subordinate to the federal government], the appellants mainly, if not wholly, relied upon the fact that, whereas the Governor-General of Canada is directly appointed by the Queen, the Lieutenant-Governor of a province is appointed, not by Her Majesty, but by the Governor-General, who has also the power of dismissal. If the Act had not committed to the Governor-General the power of appointing and removing Lieutenant-Governors, there would have been no room for the argument, which, if pushed to its logical conclusion, would prove that the Governor-General, and not the Queen, whose Viceroy he is, became the sovereign authority of the province whenever the Act of 1867 came into operation. But the argument ignores the fact that, by sect. 58, the appointment of a provincial governor is made by the "Governor-General in Council by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada," or, in other words, by the Executive Government of the Dominion, which is, by sect. 9, expressly declared "to continue and be vested in the Queen." There is no constitutional anomaly in an executive officer of the Crown receiving his appointment at the hands of a governing body who have no powers and no functions except as representatives of the Crown. The act of the Governor-General and his Council in making the appointment is, within the meaning of the statute, the act of the Crown; and a Lieutenant-Governor, when appointed, is as much the representative of Her Majesty for all purposes of provincial government as the Governor-General himself is for all purposes of Dominion government.

Being of opinion that the decisions of both Courts below were sound, and agreeing with the reasons assigned by the learned judges, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment appealed from, and to dismiss the appeal.

4.2.2.2 Reference re: Initiative and Referendum Act (Man.), 1919 CanLII 426 (UK JCPC), [1919] A.C. 935

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council

Viscount Haldane

> In this case, questions were raised in the Province of Manitoba as to the validity of an Act passed by its Legislature and entitled the Initiative and Referendum Act. ... [Viscount Haldane explained the gist of the impugned statute: it allowed for laws to be made in Manitoba by direct vote of the electors—by a referendum—rather than through the passage of a bill by the Legislative Assembly and the granting of assent by the Lieutenant Governor.]
> The framework of the constitution of Canada was enacted in 1867 by the Imperial Parliament in order to give effect to the desire expressed in the resolutions adopted by the conference of Canadian and other delegates held at Quebec in October, 1864. The object was to form in the first instance out of the old Province of Canada, along with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, a Dominion with a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom. Provision was made for the extension of this constitution to other Colonies, such as Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, should they desire to come in, and also to Rupert's Land and the N.W.T. [Northwest Territories]. It is out of these last [territories] that the Province of Manitoba was formed [in 1870] ...
> The Executive Government of Canada was declared by the Act of 1867 to remain vested in the Queen, and, by s. 12, all powers, authorities and functions vested in or exercisable by the Governors or Lieutenant-Governors of the Provinces brought into Confederation were, so far as the same continued in existence and were capable of being exercised after the Union in relation to the Government of Canada, to be vested in and exercisable by the Governor-General. A Parliament was then set up for Canada.
> Part V of the Act established analogous constitutions for the Provinces. For each of these there was to be a Lieutenant-Governor. Although he is under s. 58 appointed by the Governor-General, it has been settled by decisions of the Judicial Committee, such as that in Liquidators of the Maritime Bank of Canada v. The Receiver-General of New Brunswick [1892], A.C. 437, that, as the appointment of a Provincial Governor is made under the Great Seal of Canada, and therefore really by the Executive Government of the Dominion which is in the Sovereign, the Lieutenant-Governor is as much the representative of His Majesty for all purposes of Provincial government as is the Governor-General for all purposes of Dominion government. ... The scheme of the Act passed in 1867 was thus, not to weld the Provinces into one, nor to subordinate Provincial Governments to a central authority, but to establish a Central Government in which these Provinces should be represented, entrusted with exclusive authority only in affairs in which they had a common interest. Subject to this, each Province was to retain its independence and autonomy, and to be directly under the Crown as its head. ...
> ... The analogy of the British constitution is that on which the entire scheme is founded, and that analogy points to the impropriety, in the absence of clear and unmistakable language, of construing s. 92 as permitting the abrogation of any power which the Crown possesses through a person who directly represents it. For when the Lieutenant-Governor gives to or withholds his assent from a Bill passed by the Legislature of the Province, it is in contemplation of law the Sovereign that so gives or withholds assent. Moreover, in accordance with the analogy of the British constitution which the Act of 1867 adopts, the Lieutenant-Governor who represents the Sovereign is a part of the Legislature. ... It follows that if the Initiative and Referendum Act has purported to alter the position of the Lieutenant-Governor in these respects, this Act was insofar ultra vires.

The above two cases confirm that the executive government of the provinces vests in the crown as represented directly by the lieutenant governor. As Taschereau J. later said: "the Lieutenant-Governor stands in a unique position, fulfilling in the Province, for which he is appointed the duties fulfilled by the King himself in England, and which no one else can exercise".[48] That the provincial lieutenant governors came to be seen as crown and not federal government representatives was profoundly important for the emergence of provinces as equal and co-ordinate constitutional entities with the federal level. There is, in other words, a crown in right of each province as well as a crown in right of Canada.[49]

Does the Indian Association of Alberta case (section 2.4.1 above) mean that therefore there is a King of Ontario, King of Manitoba, King of Quebec, etc., as well as a King of Canada? Full divisibility of kingships followed upon Canada's independence from the UK. Within the state of Canada, however, "divisibility of the Crown ... does not mean that there are eleven Queens or eleven Sovereigns"; it means, rather, that internally the single queen or king has eleven jurisdictional manifestations.[50] Federalism produces a "compound monarchy" in Canada.[51] It is important to observe that the Yukon, Northwest Territories, and Nunavut occupy the position provinces were thought to have in Lenoir v. Ritchie: unlike provincial lieutenant governors, the territorial commissioners do not represent the crown directly and "there is not, in law, a 'territorial' Crown ... or Her Majesty the Queen 'in right of the Territories'".[52]

Just as the crown in right of Canada embodies the juridical identity of the Canadian state, the provincial crowns can be seen to embody the juridical identities of the provincial polities. Several examples illustrate this point. If you wish to sue "Ontario" for the negligence of one of its officials, you sue "the Crown in right of Ontario".[53] Lands that that are no longer subject to aboriginal title and have not yet been granted are crown lands. Ontario's Land Titles Act assumes that public lands in the province are "owned by Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada or Ontario"[54]—though by virtue of section 109 of the Constitution Act, 1867 most public land belongs to the crown in right of the provinces rather than in right of Canada.

These two examples, crown liability and crown title to land, illustrate how the representation of the crown as the polity may be legally contemplated at the provincial level—but they may not be constitutionally mandated. Both appear to have been abolished in Quebec: one sues the "State" for wrongdoing committed by a provincial official in Quebec[55], and public lands in Quebec are lands that "belong to the State and form part of its domain".[56] Since the 1960s, Quebec has gradually eliminated statutory references to the crown where constitutionally permissible.

4.2.3 Filling in the details of the legal framework for executive government: common law and statutory contexts

The written provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 (set out in section IV.B.1 above) provide only a skeletal legal framework for executive government in Canada. Upon reading these provisions, the obvious question is: where is the prime minister, premiers, and cabinet ministers? We confront that question in section IV.B.6 below. First, however, let's consider two other questions. The term "Executive Government" is used in relation to both federal and provincial governments in the Act—but what are the functions or tasks ascribed by the constitution to executive government? And what are the sources of legal power or authority to perform those functions or tasks?

The specific functions or tasks that the Constitution Act, 1867 expressly allocates to the executive government are very important, but not very many. One rather large job it confirms for the king or queen is that she is to be commander-in-chief of land and naval forces (s. 15). The Act also gives specific functions to the crown's representatives to carry out on behalf of the king or queen—e.g., the governor general appoints privy councillors (s. 11), appoints senators (s. 24), summons and dissolves the House of Commons (ss. 38, 50), gives or withholds royal assent to bills passed by the houses of parliament (s. 55), appoints lieutenant governors (s. 58), and appoints provincial superior court judges (s. 96). Certain of these tasks the governor general performs on behalf of the king or queen in their capacity as a component of parliament, in particular giving or withholding royal assent to bills, and are therefore part of the legislative rather than executive function. In contrast, appointment powers and summoning, proroguing, and dissolving legislatures are executive functions. As important as these tasks are, however, they do not come close to defining the role of a proper government in a modern society. The Act does not say much at all about what the executive does or should do in carrying out the day-to-day government of Canada and its provinces.

In fact, there was no mystery about this question in 1867. Transitional provisions meant that the new country hit the road running. The governor general and lieutenant governors assumed whatever statutory powers pre-confederation governors enjoyed (ss. 12, 65), and the laws of the confederating provinces continued in force and governmental officers at all levels remained in office (s. 129), with those officers exercising powers falling outside the newly defined legislative competences of the provinces becoming, instantly, federal officers (s. 130). For the new provinces of Ontario and Quebec, specific members for the first sitting of the executive councils were even identified, e.g., the Treasurer of the Province, Commissioner of Crown Lands, and Commissioner of Agriculture and Public Works (s. 63), and these and other officers retained pre-existing powers (s. 135).

All of these transitional provisions were prefaced with the same important qualification: existing executive offices continued until the relevant legislature, federal or provincial, "otherwise provides". So, in 1867 Canada inherited an executive departmental infrastructure, which automatically divided between federal and provincial levels, but with the expectation that federal and provincial legislatures would define and redefine that infrastructure in the years to come. The Constitution of Canada leaves a largely open canvass upon which federal and provincial legislatures may give shape and colour to executive government.

Indeed, from the beginning provincial legislative authority even included the authority to amend provincial constitutions, including the executive government of the province, "except as regards the Office of Lieutenant Governor" (s. 92(1)), an analogous power being allocated to the federal parliament in 1949 (s. 91(1)). This authority to amend constitutional rules relating to the executive (and legislative) institutions, unilaterally by ordinary statute, is now conferred upon federal and provincial legislatures by sections 44 and 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982 —except, it must be emphasized, as regards constitutional amendments to "the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province" which require unanimous federal and provincial consent (s. 41(a)).[57]

In short, ordinary legislation has always been the primary method by which executive government is legally defined. However, we might imagine someone saying that, surely, there must be certain inherent and general powers of executive government above and beyond powers that happen to be given or taken by ordinary statute, powers that vest in the executive government by virtue of the Constitution Act, 1867 itself. Surely, it may be argued, there are general executive powers flowing directly or indirectly from the vesting of the "Executive Government and Authority" over Canada in the queen (s. 9). On this point, the following excerpt from the Patriation Reference suggests an answer.

4.2.3.1 Reference re Amendment of the Constitution of Canada [the Patriation Reference], 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753

Supreme Court of Canada

Martland, Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Chouinard and Lamer JJ.

A substantial part of the rules of the Canadian constitution are written. They are contained not in a single document called a constitution but in a great variety of statutes some of which have been enacted by the Parliament at Westminster, such as the British North America Act, 1867, 1867 (U.K.), c. 3, (the B.N.A. Act) or by the Parliament of Canada, such as The Alberta Act, 1905 (Can.), c. 3, The Saskatchewan Act, 1905 (Can.), c. 42, the Senate and House of Commons Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. S-8, or by the provincial legislatures, such as the provincial electoral acts. They are also to be found in orders in council like the Imperial Order in Council of May 16, 1871 admitting British Columbia into the Union, and the Imperial Order in Council of June 26, 1873, admitting Prince Edward Island into the Union.

Another part of the Constitution of Canada consists of the rules of the common law. These are rules which the courts have developed over the centuries in the discharge of their judicial duties. An important portion of these rules concerns the prerogative of the Crown. Sections 9 and 15 of the B.N.A. Act provide:

> 9. The Executive Government and Authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.
> 15. The Commander-in-Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military Forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the Queen.

But the Act does not otherwise say very much with respect to the elements of "Executive Government and Authority" and one must look at the common law to find out what they are, apart from authority delegated to the executive by statute.

The common law provides that the authority of the Crown includes for instance the prerogative of mercy or clemency ... and the power to incorporate [companies] by charter so as to confer a general capacity analogous to that of a natural person. ... The royal prerogative puts the Crown in a preferred position as a creditor ... It is also under the prerogative and the common law that the Crown appoints and receives ambassadors, declares war, concludes treaties and it is in the name of the Queen that passports are issued.

The above passage from the Patriation Reference recognizes one of the most important points about constitutionalism in Canada: leaving aside specific functions or powers mentioned in the Constitution Act, 1867 itself, executive government has only those functions and powers delegated by regular statutes enacted by provincial or federal legislatures or recognized by common law. The point of section 9 seems to be to confirm who has the executive government and not to provide an independent source of executive power; it tells us that the queen will govern Canada, and implicitly it tells us that she will govern in the way that kings and queens normally govern. In the Westminster common law/parliamentary system, the crown as executive government has only two sources of legal power: powers conferred by ordinary statute law and powers recognized by ordinary common law. We now examine both sources of power briefly.

4.2.4 The royal prerogative as a source of executive power in Canada

The common law provides legal resources for governance in two ways. The crown as a juridical person representing the polity has rights and duties under the general law. The common law, or in Quebec the civil code, may allow governments to advance certain policy objectives through managing property or making contracts with private entities. However, private law provides only limited authority for carrying on the day-to-day governance of the modern state. In contrast, the branch of the common law known as the royal prerogative (which is public rather than private common law and so applies in Quebec as in common law provinces), consists of powers, privileges, and immunities derived from the crown's historic position as sovereign and thus provides significant resources for governance. Yet, the royal prerogative is also limited as a practical basis for day-to-day modern governance. Once seemingly absolute, the various prerogative powers have over the centuries been boxed or cabined by common law and at least some of them have been superseded, limited, or even eliminated by statute.

The courts in Canada have generally adopted the definition of the prerogative offered by Albert Venn Dicey. In 1933, Duff C.J. stated:

> The nature of prerogative is, in our opinion, rightly set forth by Mr. Dicey at p. 420 of his Law of the Constitution (8th ed.):
> > The "prerogative" appears to be both historically and as a matter of actual fact nothing else than the residue of discretionary or arbitrary authority, which at any given time is legally left in the hands of the Crown. The King was originally in truth what he still is in name, "the sovereign," or, if not strictly the "sovereign" in the sense in which jurists use that word, at any rate by far the most powerful part of the sovereign power. [58]

Prerogative powers are thus the remnant of medieval royal powers still vested in the crown. Prerogative power is also, as the judges suggest in the Patriation Reference, determined by the common law. The Supreme Court of Canada has more recently adopted Peter Hogg's straightforward definition: "the royal prerogative means 'the powers and privileges accorded by the common law to the Crown'". [59]

These two points about the prerogative have significant implications. First, if the prerogative is simply the remnant of medieval powers enjoyed by the crown, it is unlikely to provide significant legal resources for the day-to-day governance of the modern state. After all, times have changed. Second, if the prerogative consists of mere common law powers and privileges, then its scope is subject to further diminution by ordinary statute: "as statute law expands and encroaches upon the purview of the royal prerogative, to that extent the royal prerogative contracts". [60] This proposition comes with an important yet still rather fuzzy qualification: certain prerogative powers may be integral to the "office" of the crown and thus immune from abolition or limitation without formal constitutional amendment through unanimous federal and provincial consent (see section IV.B.3 above).

The manner in which the prerogative has been boxed or cabined by the common law is of central importance to the way we understand constitutionalism in Canada and other Westminster systems. It will be helpful to sketch the relationship between prerogative and common law. We will venture back in time to consider several classic statements—which have all been endorsed by modern Canadian courts.

Prohibitions del Roy (1607) 12 Co. Rep. 63, is a memorandum written by Sir Edward Coke (1552-1634), then Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, summarizing a meeting held between King James I and the common law judges. The king insisted that he had the power by virtue of the royal prerogative (which provides that the crown is the 'fountain of justice') to adjudicate common law cases personally. It should be remembered that, in general, James advanced a theory of royal absolutism. Coke rejected this assertion of royal power. Recording his exchange with the king on this point, Coke wrote:

> "[I]t was answered by me, in the presence, and with the clear consent of all the Judges of England, and Barons of the Exchequer, that the King in his own person cannot adjudge any case, either criminal, as treason, felony, &c., or betwixt party and party, concerning his inheritance, chattels, or goods, &c., but this ought to be determined and adjudged in some Court of Justice, according to the law and custom of England ... [T]he King cannot take any cause out of any of his Courts, and give judgment upon it himself … [T]hen the King said, that he thought the law was founded upon reason, and that he and others had reason, as well as the Judges: to which it was answered by me, that true it was, that God had endowed His Majesty with excellent science, and great endowments of nature; but His Majesty was not learned in the laws of his realm of England, and causes which concern the life, or inheritance, or goods, or fortunes of his subjects, are not to be decided by natural reason but by the artificial reason and judgment of law, which law is an act which requires long study and experience, before that a man can attain to the cognizance of it: that the law was the golden met-wand and measure to try the causes of the subjects; and which protected His Majesty in safety and peace: with which the King was greatly offended, and said, that then he should be under the law, which was treason to affirm, as he said; to which I said, that Bracton saith, quod Rex non debet esse sub homine, sed sub Deo et lege."

At the end of this testy exchange, Coke resorted to authority. Henry de Bracton was a judge who wrote one of the first treatises on English law in about 1260. The Latin phrase from Bracton may be translated as: The King is under no man but is under God and law.

The Case of Proclamations (1611) 12 Co. Rep. 74, is a memorandum in which Coke recorded his responses to assertions by James I, conveyed by the Lord Chancellor, that his royal prerogative allowed him to make new laws by proclamation. The Lord Chancellor said that "he would advise the Judges to maintain the power and prerogative of the King; and in cases in which there is no authority and precedent, to leave it to the King to order in it, according to his wisdom, and for the good of his subjects, or otherwise the King would be no more than the Duke of Venice". Coke recorded his response: "I answered ... that the King cannot change any part of the common law, nor create any offence by his proclamation, which was not an offence before, without Parliament ... [T]he law of England is divided into three parts, common law, statute law, and custom; but the King's proclamation is none of them ... [T]he King hath no prerogative, but that which the law of the land allows him."

These memoranda by Coke are brief but powerful: the crown has no inherent or prerogative power to make or change the law without the consent of the houses of parliament or to interfere with the adjudication of cases before the common law courts. The inherent prerogative or common law powers of the crown, whatever they are, are purely executive and not legislative or judicial. In Rand J.'s words, "as Bracton laid it down and as Coke admonished James I, he himself [James] was under the law, a law which brooded over England encompassing all persons". [61] Strayer J. cited Prohibitions del Roy as articulating "an aspect of the rule of law" that "has been recognized for centuries in the system of public law we inherited in Canada". [62] Brown J. cited the Case of Proclamations for the proposition that "parliamentary and judicial functions have been clearly separated from [executive] Crown control". [63]

The powers associated with the expression "Executive Government" in the Constitution Act, 1867 are constrained by common law principles that—to the posthumous chagrin of James I—put the crown in its executive capacity "under the law". As the next case confirms, the law under which the crown and crown ministers are under is just the ordinary law. There is no special law of state outside the common law that the executive government can draw upon.

4.2.4.2 Entick v. Carrington, (1765) 19 St. Tr. 1030

Background: The plaintiff brought an action in trespass against the defendants, the "King's Messengers", who had broken into his house and spent some four hours rummaging through his belongings, breaking boxes and locks, and then carrying off his private papers. The defendants pleaded that they were authorized to conduct this search and seizure under a general warrant issued by the Earl of Halifax, who was the Secretary of State and thus a prominent minister of the crown. The warrant alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of seditious libel and that his papers were to be seized. The plaintiff, who was an outspoken critic of the government of the day, argued that the Secretary of State had no legal authority to issue the warrant.

Court of Common Pleas (England)

Lord Camden C.J.

> [I]f this point should be determined in favour of the jurisdiction [of the Secretary of State], the secret cabinets and bureaus of every subject in this kingdom will be thrown open to the search and inspection of a messenger, whenever the secretary of state shall think fit to charge, or even to suspect, a person to be the author … of a seditious libel. …
> This power, so claimed by the Secretary of State, is not supported by one single citation from any law book extant. …
> The arguments, which the defendants' counsel have thought fit to urge in support of this practice, are of this kind ... that this power is essential to government, and the only means of quieting clamours and sedition.
> Before I state the question, it will be necessary to describe the power claimed by this warrant in its full extent. If honestly exerted, it is a power to seize that man's papers, who is charged upon oath to be the author or publisher of a seditious libel; if oppressively, it acts against every man, who is so described in the warrant, though he is innocent. It is executed against the party, before he is heard or even summoned; and the information, as well as the informers, is unknown. It is executed by messengers with or without a constable … in the presence or the absence of the party, as the messengers shall think fit, and without a witness to testify what passes at the time of the transaction; so that when the papers are gone, as the only witnesses are the trespassers, the party injured is left without proof. If this injury falls upon an innocent person, he is as destitute of remedy as the guilty: and the whole transaction is so guarded against discovery, that if the officer should be disposed to carry off a bank-bill, he may do it with impunity….
> Such is the power, and therefore one should naturally expect that the law to warrant it should be clear in proportion as the power is exorbitant.
> If it is law, it will be found in our books. If it is not to be found there, it is not law.
> The great end, for which men entered into society, was to secure their property. That right is preserved sacred and incommunicable in all instances, where it has not been taken away or abridged by some public law for the good of the whole. The cases where this right of property is set aside by positive law, are various. Distresses, executions, forfeitures, taxes, &c. are all of this description; wherein every man by common consent gives up that right, for the sake of justice and the general good.
> By the laws of England, every invasion of private property ... is a trespass. No man can set his foot upon my ground without my licence, but he is liable to an action, though the damage be nothing; which is proved by every declaration in trespass, where the defendant is called upon to answer for bruising the grass and even treading upon the soil. If he admits the fact, he is bound to shew by way of justification, that some positive law has empowered or excused him. The justification is submitted to the judges, who are to look into the books; and see if such a justification can be maintained by the text of the statute law, or by the principles of the common law. If no such excuse can be found or produced, the silence of the books is an authority against the defendant, and the plaintiff must have judgment.
> According to this reasoning, it is now incumbent upon the defendants to shew the law, by which this seizure is warranted. If that cannot be done, it is a trespass.
> … Where is the written law that gives any magistrate such a power? I can safely answer, there is none …
> What would the Parliament say, if the judges should take upon themselves to mould an unlawful power into a convenient authority, by new restrictions? That would be, not judgment, but legislation. …
> As therefore no authority in our books can be produced to support such a doctrine ... I cannot be persuaded, that such a power can be justified by the common law. ...
> It is then said, that it is necessary for the ends of government to lodge such a power with a state officer; and that it is better to prevent the publication [of seditious libel] before than to punish the offender afterwards. I answer, if the legislature be of that opinion, they will revive the Licensing Act [which, in former times, strictly regulated all publishing]. But if they have not done that, I conceive they are not of that opinion. And with respect to the argument of State necessity, or a distinction that has been aimed at between State offences and others, the common law does not understand that kind of reasoning, nor do our books take notice of any such distinctions.
> Serjeant Ashley was committed to the Tower in the 3rd of Charles Ist, by the House of Lords only for asserting in argument, that there was a 'law of State' different from the common law; and the Ship-Money judges were impeached for holding, first, that State-necessity would justify the raising money without consent of parliament; and secondly, that the king was judge of that necessity [This was a reference to R v Hampden or the Case of Ship-money (1637) 3 St. Tr. 826.]
> If the king himself has no power to declare when the law ought to be violated for reason of State, I am sure we his judges have no such prerogative. …
> I have now taken notice of everything that has been urged upon the present point; and upon the whole we are all of opinion, that the warrant to seize and carry away the party's papers in the case of a seditious libel, is illegal and void.

Entick v. Carrington remains an important statement concerning the principle of legality and the powers of the crown and crown ministers in the common law tradition. Whatever powers the crown prerogative might include, it does not include powers drawn from a special or separate 'law of state' or 'reason of state' giving crown officials authority to set the legal rights of subjects aside, even in the face of perceived threats to the peace or security of the state.

A.V. Dicey cited Entick v. Carrington in a famous passage in Law of the Constitution, first published in 1885, in which he insisted that one central aspect of the "rule of law" is that "every official, from the Prime Minister down to a constable" is subject to the ordinary law of the land enforced by the ordinary courts.[64] This passage was quoted and applied by Abbott J. in Roncarelli v. Duplessis, perhaps still the leading case on the rule of law in Canada (though more for Rand J.'s than Abbott J.'s reasons).[65] In this case, the actions of the prime minister and attorney general of Quebec, Maurice Duplessis, actions that Duplessis insisted were undertaken in the sincere belief that he was protecting the public welfare or common good from vicious criticisms by a religious minority, were held to be unlawful because they were unsupported by any power clearly delegated by statute. Inherent executive powers are indeed limited. As Dicey observed, the king or queen may be "head of the executive government" but is not a "sovereign monarch" capable of "interfering with the regular course of law".[66] In the common law tradition, the king-in-parliament is sovereign, not the king alone and certainly not the king's ministers; there is legislative but not executive sovereignty.

4.2.4.3 The Case of the Five Knights and the Petition of Right, 1628

The curious reference in Entick v. Carrington (above) to Serjeant Ashley being committed to the Tower is worth explaining. The story begins with Darnel's Case or the Case of the Five Knights (1627) 3 St Tr 1. The case arose after five 'knights' were imprisoned without charge or trial for refusing to make loans to the King. King Charles I had imposed these 'loans' (really a form of taxation) in order to raise money without summoning parliament for statutory authorization to impose taxes. Writs of habeas corpus were issued to challenge the detention of the knights. The writ of habeas corpus is a judicial order requiring that the detention of a person be legally justified (the right to habeas corpus is now constitutionally protected in Canada by section 10(c) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.)

Before the Court of King's Bench, it was stated that the knights were held per special mandatum domini Regis and no cause for their imprisonment was given—a result that was, according to counsel for one of the knights, contrary to Magna Carta and "the fundamental laws and statutes of this realm"—the reference being to the article in Magna Carta, 1215 which famously protects the subject from deprivation of liberty or property "except by the lawful judgment of his equals or by the law of the land [lex terræ]".

In response, the Attorney General, Sir Robert Heath, argued that when subjects are detained according to law, cause must be shown, but when imprisonment is "not in a legal and ordinary way", but "extraordinarily done" for "reason of state", cause need not be shown. Heath insisted that the king's "absoluta potestas" in this respect was integral to sovereignty, vesting when "the first stone of sovereignty was ... laid", and although the king "hath rules to govern himself by" and must act as "the head of the common wealth" rather than as a "private person" when using this absolute power, compliance with these rules was not a question into which "we ... as lawyers, who govern themselves by the rules of the law ... [may] make inquiries". The refusal by the judges to release the knights gave the impression that they may have accepted this argument about an extraordinary "law of state" outside the common law and outside the domain of the ordinary courts.

The implications of Darnel's Case were immediately apparent and concerns were expressed that the case, although only an interim order, might be cited as precedent in future cases. Parliamentarians met in conference to argue the legal points raised by the judges' order.[67] Sir Edward Coke, by then a member of Parliament and no longer a judge, insisted that although the royal prerogative is "highly tendered and respected ... it hath bounds set unto it by the laws of England", for "the common law has admeasured the king's prerogative".

Attorney General Heath and Sir Francis Ashley, a Serjeant or high-ranking barrister, attended the parliamentary conference to argue the king's position. Ashley submitted that lex terræ in Magna Carta included a "Law of State" that governed in areas where "the common law extends not", giving the king power to act "when the necessity of state requires it" subject only to "natural equity", the king's power to commit "acts of state" upon subjects in virtue of his "supreme power in matters of state" being a power "too high to be determined by any legal direction". Coke and his colleagues from the Commons objected in no uncertain terms: "we read of no Law of State" and no law is meant by the expression lex terræ "save the Common Law".

This was no mere quibble about where to draw boundaries between different kinds of prerogative power. The depth of the theoretical difference between the legal positions advanced is perhaps reflected in the fact that Ashley was briefly taken into custody after making his point—to which Lord Camden referred in Entik v. Carrington.

It was unseemly, to say the least, for those fighting unjust detention to resort to it themselves. But a more judicious response to Darnel's Case was in the works: parliamentarians drew up a Petition of Right to denounce the imprisonment of subjects without cause as contrary to the "law of the land" and "due process of law" affirmed by Magna Carta and other "good laws and statutes".

The Petition of Right was drafted as a bill by the House of Commons. When the bill was before the House of Lords, an amendment was sought to include a clause stating that liberties were therein affirmed "but with due regard to leave entire that Sovereign Power, wherewith your majesty is trusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people"—but the Commons refused. "If we grant this," Coke argued (it is said that he spoke with tears in his eyes), "by implication we give a sovereign power above all these laws", referring here primarily to Magna Carta, and he added that "Magna Charta is such a fellow, that he will have no sovereign".

In the end, the Lords and Commons passed the Petition of Right without the amendment, and it was given royal assent by Charles I (Petition of Right, 1628, 3 Cha. 1. c. 1 (Eng.)).

That crown or executive government may not claim sovereign powers under a purported law of state, that its inherent powers come from and are admeasured by the ordinary common law as enforced by the ordinary common law courts, and that any other powers it seeks must be delegated by parliament, are principles enormously significant for Canada. In recent times, theories of an unbounded, sovereign executive that upend the idea of the rule of law have (re)emerged and are gaining traction in various countries around the world.[68] Executive power in Canada is defined by ordinary statute and common law, and when it comes to claims about a special law of state based on a sovereign executive power unbounded by ordinary law it must be remembered that "the common law does not understand that kind of reasoning" (Camden), and "Magna Charta is such a fellow, that he will have no sovereign" (Coke).

This is not to say that the prerogative powers inherent in the crown are not important in Canada. They are extremely important in at least two main areas:

1. the crown (governor general or lieutenant governor) appoints and dismisses prime ministers, premiers, and other ministers of the crown and summons, prorogues, and dissolves legislatures (though some of these tasks are also confirmed by express provisions in the Constitution Act, 1867); and,
2. the crown prerogatives in relation to foreign affairs and defence, though regulated in some respects by statute[69], are still largely intact, in the hands of the governor general (not lieutenant governors), and often exercised directly by ministers of the crown or other governmental officials.

Can the exercise of these kinds of executive power be policed by law through judicial review? Or are they far too political to make judicial supervision possible? We return to this important question in Part 4.3.5 below.

4.2.5 Statute law and the legal framework for executive government

The royal prerogative does not provide a sufficient legal basis for day-to-day domestic governance. The executive powers necessary for domestic governance of the state are therefore mostly delegated by statutes enacted by federal or provincial legislatures.

How do we know which functions and powers of executive government relate to the "Government of Canada" and which to the "Government of the Province"? By now, the answer is probably clear—but let's make it explicit. The Constitution Act, 1867 divides legislative authority between federal and provincial legislatures through lists of substantive subject matters, found mainly in sections 91 and 92, over which each is empowered to make laws. There are no parallel lists dividing federal and provincial executive powers. However, as Viscount Haldane put it, "The distribution under the new grant of executive authority [in 1867] in substance follows the distribution under the new grant of legislative powers".[70] Each head of federal and provincial legislative power defined by sections 91 and 92 of the Act establishes a sphere of jurisdiction over the relevant subject matter that includes the authority to define how the matter will be governed or regulated and what executive offices, powers, and responsibilities (if any) shall exist in relation to the matter. As Dickson J. (as he then was) put it:

> ... [I]n that division, ss. 91 and 92 of the British North America Act redistributed in an exhaustive fashion the legislative functions ... and the executive functions must have followed, of necessity, the distribution of legislative power. Executive power is nurtured by and is dependent upon legislative power. Executive functions, federal and provincial, must be exercised with due regard to, and within the limits prescribed by, ss. 91 and 92 respectively.[71]

Dickson J.'s point is worth underscoring: federal and provincial executive powers track or follow the division between federal and provincial legislative powers at least in part because "[e]xecutive power is nurtured by and is dependent upon legislative power."

If prerogative executive powers are limited, statutory executive powers are potentially vast: the "growing complexity of modern government" has entailed the "unprecedented delegation" of powers by statute "to the executive branch of government".[72] And although delegated to the executive branch, many such powers are functionally judicial (or quasi-judicial) or legislative; they may include the power to adjudicate matters arising under complex new regulatory regimes or the power to make subordinate or delegated legislation. Indeed, the growth in delegated legislation since 1867 has been "phenomenal".[73]

The principle of parliamentary sovereignty gives legislatures tremendous scope in configuring the regulatory state. It must be recalled, however, that the powers so delegated are always subordinate powers and their exercise may be reviewed in the ordinary superior courts to ensure that decisions are consistent with the legislature's intentions and general principles of procedural fairness and substantive reasonableness associated with the rule of law.[74] The principle of parliamentary sovereignty means that statutes or primary legislation enacted by the federal parliament or a provincial legislature may not be judicially reviewed except to ensure compliance with constitutional limitations. In contrast, subordinate or secondary powers exercised by the executive government, whether functionally executive, legislative, or judicial, may be reviewed on a broader range of common law, statutory, and constitutional grounds—a subject that falls within the field of administrative law (which is beyond the scope of this chapter).

Specific executive, administrative, or regulatory powers are conferred by statutes, federal and provincial, on three main categories of office or institution:

1. upon the crown as advised by the relevant council in the form of the "Governor in Council" federally or the "Lieutenant Governor in Council" provincially;
2. upon individual ministers of the crown who are appointed by the governor general federally or lieutenant governor provincially; and,
3. various other subordinate officials, boards, commissions, tribunals, agencies, etc. that are established by statute (many of which enjoy an important degree of independence from the federal or provincial government of the day).

We may pause at this point and re-visit the question of labels, in particular 'the crown', 'the government', the 'executive government', and 'the executive'. In considering the meaning of "Crown" in section 17(1) of the Federal Courts Act, RSC 1985, c. F-7, which gives the Federal Court "concurrent original jurisdiction in all cases where relief is claimed against the Crown", Décary J.A. stated:

> The "federal Crown" is an expression used to refer to the [federal] executive power, which in practice is exercised by the prime minister and his cabinet. ... "When 'the Crown' is spoken of in a statute, the term is symbolic of the executive power and means the King acting in his executive capacity. This, in effect, means 'the Government'" [McArthur, Matthew v. The King, 1943 CanLII 296 (CA EXC), [1943] Ex. C.R. 77, per Thorson P., at page 104].[75]

Said Martland J. with respect to the "Government of Canada" and "the Crown", "the two terms are equivalent".[76]

These comments are helpful but still leave open questions about the range of what is covered by the various terms. Crown, government, the executive, etc., may have narrower or broader meanings depending on the context. The crown may refer to His Majesty the King, but also his representatives in Canada, the governor general and lieutenant governors, and in other contexts 'crown' may be used to describe the government generally or indeed the state of Canada or the provincial polity.

How much of the massive regulatory or administrative infrastructure that has been built up since the beginning of the twentieth century is part of the executive government or the crown may, again, depend upon the context. Are decisions on whether to approve a pipeline or other energy project made by the National Energy Board (NEB) pursuant to the Canada Oil and Gas Operations Act (COGOA)[77], actions of the crown that trigger the duty to consult Indigenous communities under the principle of the 'honour of the crown'? The Supreme Court of Canada, in Clyde River (Hamlet) v. Petroleum Geo-Services Inc., 2017 SCC 40, said yes:

> ... [T]he term "Crown" is commonly used to symbolize and denote executive power. ...
> By this understanding, the NEB is not, strictly speaking, "the Crown". Nor is it, strictly speaking, an agent of the Crown, since—as the NEB operates independently of the Crown's ministers—no relationship of control exists between them ... As a statutory body holding responsibility under s. 5(1)(b) of COGOA, however, the NEB acts on behalf of the Crown when making a final decision on a project application. Put plainly, once it is accepted that a regulatory agency exists to exercise executive power as authorized by legislatures, any distinction between its actions and Crown action quickly falls away. In this context, the NEB is the vehicle through which the Crown acts. Hence this Court's interchangeable references in Carrier Sekani [Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43, [2010] 2 SCR 650] to "government action" and "Crown conduct" (paras. 42-44). It therefore does not matter whether the final decision maker on a resource project is Cabinet or the NEB. In either case, the decision constitutes Crown action that may trigger the duty to consult.[78]

So, "[i]n this context" the decisions of the regulatory agency are actions of the crown; yet, one wonders about other contexts, whether, for example, thinking back to Décray J.A.'s statement, the NEB would be considered "the Crown" for the purposes of section 17(1) of the Federal Courts Act. Perhaps not.

4.2.6 Executive departments, ministers, and councils

Although the vast network of federal and provincial administrative or regulatory agencies, like the National Energy Board, may be part of the executive branch acting on behalf of the 'crown' broadly defined in certain contexts, we turn our attention now to the shape of executive government in its narrower sense; we to return to the popular notion of governments as prime ministers or premiers together with cabinet ministers presiding over the key departments of state. Looking at the departments of the federal state, a clear pattern is identifiable. Let's consider at a specific example.

Although the subject matter of health is primarily a matter of provincial legislative authority in Canada, there are aspects of health that justify federal legislation.[79] Indeed, the executive government of Canada includes a federal ministry or Department of Health established by a federal statute and led by a federal Minister of Health. The following excerpts from the statute are instructive:

Department of Health Act, S.C. 1996, c. 8

> 2(1) There is hereby established a department of the Government of Canada, called the Department of Health, over which the Minister of Health, appointed by commission under the Great Seal, shall preside.
> (2) The Minister holds office during pleasure and has the management and direction of the Department.
> 4(1) The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction relating to the promotion and preservation of the health of the people of Canada not by law assigned to any other department, board or agency of the Government of Canada.

> (2) Without restricting the generality of subsection (1), the Minister's powers, duties and functions relating to health include the following matters ... [a list of general powers and duties follows and then the Act provides further details of the legal framework for the federal Department of Health].

Several points about this federal statute are worth emphasizing. First, this statute is not unique. In fact, it follows a template commonly adopted for acts of the federal parliament that establish departments of the executive government of Canada and confer powers and impose responsibilities on ministers presiding over those departments.[80]

Second, the departmental and ministerial powers and responsibilities established under this and similar statutes are expressly defined and limited by reference to the federal legislative authority over the relevant subject matter (see Department of Health Act, s. 4(1) above)—a limitation that would exist even if not expressly mentioned.

Third, although governmental departments and ministerial powers and responsibilities are established by federal statutes like the Department of Health Act, the arrangements can be reconfigured without statutory amendment. The governor in council is empowered by statute to divide departments and/or transfer powers and responsibilities from one department or minister to another as deemed expedient[81]—something that happens frequently when cabinets are formed or reshuffled—which means one must look beyond the statute to what may be a bewildering trail of orders in council to determine which minister is responsible for what.[82]

Fourth, the Department of Health Act and similar statutes provide that the minister presiding over the department will be appointed by commission under the great seal and will hold office during pleasure, but the statute does not say who appoints and dismisses the minister and it is unclear as to whether the office of minister is established by the statute or through some other mechanism. We must look beyond the statute to understand the legal status of these offices.

When we do, we find that the ministers who preside over departments of the federal executive government are ministers of the crown who are appointed by the governor general. We also find that there is an invariable practice followed whereby upon appointment each minister is also (if they have not been before) sworn in for life as a privy councillor.[83]

The governor general's legal authority to appoint members of the privy council is, as we have seen, conferred by section 11 of the Constitution Act, 1867. In contrast, the legal power to appoint and dismiss privy councillors to and from the office of minister of the crown, including the office of prime minister, is not mentioned in the Constitution Act, 1867 at all. This power is one of the most important executive powers derived from the crown's royal prerogative and it is expressly delegated to the governor general (see the 1947 Letters Patent, art. IV, reproduced in section II.C above). One becomes a privy councillor for life, but one is a prime minister or other minister of the crown only during pleasure—and legally speaking that pleasure is the crown's pleasure as expressed by the governor general.

That ministers are also privy councillors is assumed or required in certain statutes.[84] But the statutes identifying a minister for a department do not generally indicate that the minister be selected from the privy council.[85] We return below to the important yet somewhat obscure relationship between the members of the privy council and the ministers of the crown who preside over departments and collectively form cabinet. For now, we shall simply note that 'cabinet' is not an institution established by law, but it is the active part of the privy council.

The following is an example of a prime minister's 'advice' regarding a cabinet minister's appointment and the formal instrument of appointment of a minister:

Attorney General of Canada

Let's turn now the structure of provincial executive government. The Constitution Act, 1867 refers to the lieutenant governor and executive council. Provincial executive councils are analogous to the federal privy council, in that they aid and advise the crown's representative (the lieutenant governor) with one significant difference—membership in the provincial executive council is at pleasure not for life. The link between provincial executive councils and ministers of the crown presiding over governmental departments is generally defined in a more systematic way than the link between the federal privy council and federal departmental ministers. Provincial departments and ministers are often, as in the federal case, defined by statute; but, similarly, the power to reconfigure arrangements for government is invariably granted to the lieutenant governor to ensure maximum flexibility. The framework for provincial executive government is found in an Executive Council Act (or the equivalent) in each province. Excerpts from the Ontario Executive Council Act are illustrative:

Executive Council Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.25

1 The Executive Council shall be composed of such persons as the Lieutenant Governor from time to time appoints, and all executive councillors so appointed are ministers of the Crown, and rank among themselves in the order of their appointments.

2(1) The Lieutenant Governor may appoint under the Great Seal such ministers of the Crown as are provided for under any Act or as the Lieutenant Governor sees fit to appoint, to hold office during pleasure.

(2) The Lieutenant Governor may by order in council prescribe the duties of the ministers of the Crown and the duties of any ministries over which they preside, and of the public servants under their jurisdiction.

5(1) Any of the powers and duties that have been heretofore or may be hereafter assigned by law to any minister of the Crown may from time to time by order in council be assigned and transferred either for a limited period or otherwise to any other minister by name or otherwise.

...

8(1). Despite any other Act, the authority of the Lieutenant Governor under this Act to prescribe duties of a minister of the Crown or to assign and transfer powers and duties that have been assigned by law to a minister of the Crown to any other minister includes authority, by order in council, to,

(a) assign responsibility for the administration of an Act or a part of an Act to a minister of the Crown;

(b) transfer responsibility for the administration of an Act or a part of an Act from a minister of the Crown to another minister of the Crown;

(c) assign a power, duty, function or responsibility of a minister of the Crown under an Act to a minister of the Crown;

(d) transfer a power, duty, function or responsibility of a minister of the Crown under an Act to another minister of the Crown;

(e) direct that two or more ministers share responsibility for the administration of an Act or a part of an Act;

(f) specify how the ministers are to share responsibility for the administration of an Act or a part of an Act;

(g) direct that two or more ministers share a power, duty, function or responsibility under an Act; and

(h) specify how the ministers are to share a power, duty, function or responsibility under an Act.

The office of prime minister or premier, federally or provincially, is a rather shadowy one in terms of statute law. However, in some provinces, there is express provision for membership in the executive council of the premier, in some cases as president of the council.[86] In Quebec, the Executive Power Act provides that the lieutenant governor may appoint, from among the members of the executive council, a long list of named ministers, including "a Prime Minister who shall, ex officio, be president of the Conseil" as well as (for example) a Minister of Justice, a Minister of International Relations, a Minister of Finance, a Minister of Transport, etc. (s. 4)—though the names and responsibilities of ministerial offices may be changed by order of the "Government", i.e., lieutenant governor in council (s. 9).[87] As with the federal cabinet, provincial 'cabinets' are not legally recognized; however, because only the present provincial ministers of the crown are members of the executive council, 'executive council' and 'cabinet' are just labels, one formal the other informal, for the same institution.

4.2.7 Completing the legal picture: the interlocking constitutional law, statute law, and common law framework for executive government

We are now in a position to summarize the executive government in Canada as a matter of law.

By the Constitution Act, 1867, the king or queen is vested with the executive government of Canada but exercises that authority through a governor general who is aided and advised by members of a privy council that the governor general appoints. In a separate legal track, the Constitution Act, 1867 gives legislative authority to the federal parliament to enact laws in relation to various subject matters, and through this authority governmental departments for the Government of Canada have been established under the leadership of departmental ministers. The two tracks are joined together because the ministers who by statute preside over governmental departments are also made members of the privy council that has the constitutional mandate to aid and advise the governor general in carrying out the government of Canada on behalf of the king or queen. We may therefore say that the executive government of Canada is, as a matter of law, vested in the king or queen and carried on by the governor general aided and advised by those members of the privy council who are presently ministers of the crown having been appointed by the governor general pursuant to the royal prerogative to that office and who have also been clothed by federal legislation with legal powers and responsibilities as ministers presiding over the key departments of the government of Canada.

This structure reappears at the provincial level with some modifications: the lieutenant governor is advised by an executive council, but the council consists only of ministers of the crown and the relevant Executive Council Act (or its equivalent) may supplant the prerogative power of appointing ministers of the crown (see e.g., Ontario's Executive Council Act, s. 2(1), above).

This legal structure for executive government is still only part of the story. The system just sketched leaves far too much to crown discretion. At the federal level, for example, what if the governor general doesn't appoint departmental ministers as privy councillors, or doesn't listen to them after they are made privy councillors? What if a governor general acts upon the advice of members of the privy council who are no longer ministers of the crown? Where in the arrangements sketched does the prime minister fit in? What if Charles III rescinds the 1947 Letters Patent and begins exercising the powers of executive government under section 9 of the Constitution Act, 1867 personally? What ensures democracy in this system?

These and many similar constitutional quandaries are addressed by what is generally known as the principle of responsible government. The curious thing about constitutions that follow the Westminster parliamentary model is that this critical constitutional principle is a rule of convention rather than law. What is the difference between constitutional convention and constitutional law? And how does the principle of responsible government work?

4.3 The conventions of the constitution and responsible government

4.3.1 Conventions versus law

Canada's constitution is similar in principle to the United Kingdom constitution (Constitution Act, 1867, preamble), and so it will be helpful to set out the classic statement in British legal literature on the relationship between constitutional law and constitutional convention written by Albert Venn Dicey in 1885. We then turn to the leading statement on law and convention from the Supreme Court of Canada.

4.3.1.1 A.V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution, 7th edition (London: Macmillan, 1908)

[excerpts from Chapter XIV]

E. Nature of Conventions of the Constitution

IN an earlier part of this work stress was laid upon the essential distinction between the 'law of the constitution', which, consisting (as it does) of rules enforced or recognized by the courts, makes up a body of 'laws' in the proper sense of that term, and the 'conventions of the constitution', which consisting (as they do) of customs, practices, maxims, or precepts which are not enforced or recognized by the courts, make up a body not of laws, but of constitutional or political ethics ...

These [conventional] rules ... make up the constitutional morality of the day. They are all constantly acted upon, and, since they cannot be enforced by any court of law, have no claim to be considered laws. They are multifarious, differing, as it might at first sight appear, from each other not only in importance but in general character and scope. They will be found however, on careful examination, to possess one common quality or property; they are all, or at any rate most of them, rules for determining the mode in which the discretionary powers of the Crown (or of the Ministers as servants of the Crown) ought to be exercised ...

... [T]he prerogative ... [is] a term which has caused more perplexity to students than any other expression referring to the constitution. …

... The prerogative is the name for the remaining portion of the Crown's original authority, and is therefore, as already pointed out, the name for the residue of discretionary power left at any moment in the hands of the Crown, whether such power be in fact exercised by the Queen herself or by her Ministers. Every act which executive government can lawfully do without the authority of the Act of Parliament is done in virtue of this prerogative. If therefore we omit from view ... powers conferred on the Crown or its servants by Parliamentary enactments ... we may use the term 'prerogative' as equivalent to the discretionary authority of the executive, and then lay down that the conventions of the constitution are in the main precepts for determining the mode and spirit in which the prerogative is to be exercised, or (what is really the same thing) for fixing the manner in which any transaction which can legally be done in virtue of the Royal prerogative ... ought to be carried out. ... Thus, to say that a Cabinet when outvoted [in the House of Commons] on any vital question are bound in general to retire from office, is equivalent to the assertion, that the prerogative of the Crown to dismiss its servants at the will of the Queen must be exercised in accordance with the wish of the Houses of Parliament ...

Having ascertained that the conventions of the constitution are (in the main) rules for determining the exercise of the prerogative, we may carry our analysis of their character one step farther. They have all one ultimate object. Their end is to secure that Parliament, or the Cabinet which is indirectly appointed by Parliament, shall in the long run give effect to the will of that power which in modern England is the true political sovereign of the State—the majority of the electors or (to use popular though not quite accurate language) the nation.

... The conventions of the constitution now consist of customs which (whatever their historical origin) are at the present day maintained for the sake of ensuring the supremacy of the House of Commons, and ultimately, through the elective House of Commons, of the nation. Our modern code of constitutional morality secures, though in a roundabout way, what is called abroad the 'sovereignty of the people'.

That this is so becomes apparent if we examine into the effect of one or two among the leading articles of this code. The rule that the powers of the Crown must be exercised through Ministers who are members of one or other House of Parliament and who 'command the confidence of the House of Commons', really means, that the elective portion of the legislature in effect, though by an indirect process, appoints the executive government; and, further, that the Crown, or the Ministry, must ultimately carry out, or at any rate not contravene, the wishes of the House of Commons. But as the process of representation is nothing else than a mode by which the will of the representative body or House of Commons is made to coincide with the will of the nation, it follows that a rule which gives the appointment and control of the government mainly to the House of Commons is at bottom a rule which gives the election and ultimate control of the executive to the nation.

Background:

As we saw (section II.C above), the Statute of Westminster, 1931 granted Dominions such as Canada the right to amend or repeal British statutes that extended to them, but Canada requested that this power be withheld from it in relation to the British North America Act, 1867 (now Constitution Act, 1867) until the federal and provincial governments could agree amongst themselves upon a new constitutional amending formula. Until then, amendments to the BNA Act were to be, as before, enacted by the UK Parliament upon the request of Canada, and such requests were communicated in the form of a resolution passed by the two Houses of the federal Parliament (referred to below as the "resolution procedure"). In cases where the proposed amendment to the BNA Act affected provincial powers or interests, the Canadian government would first obtain the consent of the provinces affected before submitting the requisite resolution to the UK Parliament.

In 1980, the federal government of Pierre Trudeau sought to introduce a package of constitutional reforms that would: (1) end the nominal authority that the UK retained over Canada's constitution; (2) adopt a local Canadian constitutional amending mechanism; and (3) introduce an entrenched bill of rights (the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms). This objective became known, informally, as the patriation of the Canadian constitution.

The proposed reforms had obvious and significant implications for provincial powers. However, after negotiations with the provinces, the federal government could get support for its 'patriation' package from only two provinces, Ontario and New Brunswick. The Trudeau government announced its intention to go ahead anyway and submit a resolution to the UK Parliament requesting it to enact the 'patriation' package of reforms. Legal challenges ensued.

The eight opposing provinces argued that the federal government (through the Houses of the federal Parliament) did not have the legal authority to proceed. Governments in three provinces, Manitoba, Newfoundland and Quebec, referred the question to their respective courts of appeal. The decisions were then appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada and heard together. Although worded differently, the reference questions gave rise to two basic issues:

1. As a matter of law, did the federal Houses of Parliament have the authority to pass a resolution requesting the UK Parliament to enact the proposed amendments to the BNA Act without provincial consent?
2. If they did, as a matter of constitutional convention did the federal Houses of Parliament have the authority to pass a resolution requesting the UK Parliament to enact the amendments to the BNA Act without provincial consent?

A majority of the Court (Laskin C.J. and Dickson, Beetz, Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Lamer JJ; Martland and Ritchie JJ dissenting) held that there were no legal impediments to the Trudeau plan to request the UK Parliament to enact the patriation package of reforms without provincial consent. A differently constituted majority (Martland, Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Chouinard and Lamer JJ.; Laskin C.J., Estey and McIntyre JJ. dissenting) concluded that there was, however, a "constitutional convention" that before requests were made to the UK Parliament to amend the BNA Act there should be a "substantial measure of provincial consent". The following excerpt includes the majority's discussion on constitutional conventions.

> Martland, Ritchie, Dickson, Beetz, Chouinard and Lamer JJ.
> A substantial part of the rules of the Canadian constitution are written. ...
> Another part of the Constitution of Canada consists of the rules of the common law. ...
> The common law provides that the authority of the Crown includes ... [t]he royal prerogative ...
> [We have already considered the full statements on each of these points from this case—see section 4.2.3 above.]
> Those parts of the Constitution of Canada which are composed of statutory rules and common law rules are generically referred to as the law of the constitution. In cases of doubt or dispute, it is the function of the courts to declare what the law is and since the law is sometimes breached, it is generally the function of the courts to ascertain whether it has in fact been breached in specific instances and, if so, to apply such sanctions as are contemplated by the law, whether they be punitive sanctions or civil sanctions such as a declaration of nullity. Thus, when a federal or a provincial statute is found by the courts to be in excess of the legislative competence of the legislature which has enacted it, it is declared null and void and the courts refuse to give effect to it. In this sense it can be said that the law of the constitution is administered or enforced by the courts.
> But many Canadians would perhaps be surprised to learn that important parts of the constitution of Canada, with which they are the most familiar because they are directly involved when they exercise their right to vote at federal and provincial elections, are nowhere to be found in the law of the constitution. For instance it is a fundamental requirement of the constitution that if the opposition obtains the majority at the polls, the government must tender its resignation forthwith. But fundamental as it is, this requirement of the constitution does not form part of the law of the constitution.
> It is also a constitutional requirement that the person who is appointed prime minister or premier by the Crown and who is the effective head of the government should have the support of the elected branch of the legislature; in practice this means in most cases the leader of the political party which has won a majority of seats at a general election. Other ministers are appointed by the Crown on the advice of the prime minister or premier when he forms or reshuffles his cabinet. Ministers must continuously have the confidence of the elected branch of the legislature, individually and collectively. Should they lose it, they must either resign or ask the Crown for a dissolution of the legislature and the holding of a general election. Most of the powers of the Crown under the prerogative are exercised only upon the advice of the prime minister of the cabinet which means that they are effectively exercised by the latter, together with the innumerable statutory powers delegated to the Crown in council.
> Yet none of these essential rules of the constitution can be said to be a law of the constitution. It was apparently Dicey who, in the first edition of his Law of the Constitution, in 1885, called them the "conventions of the constitution" … an expression which quickly became current. What Dicey described under these terms are the principles and rules of responsible government, several of which are stated above and which regulate the relations between the Crown, the prime minister, the cabinet and the two Houses of Parliament. These rules developed in Great Britain by way of custom and precedent during the nineteenth century and were exported to such British colonies as were granted self-government. …
> Within the British Empire, powers of government were vested in different bodies which provided a fertile ground for the growth of new constitutional conventions unknown to Dicey and from which self-governing colonies acquired equal and independent status within the Commonwealth. Many of these culminated in the Statute of Westminster, 1931, 1931 (U.K.), c. 4.
> A federal constitution provides for the distribution of powers between various legislatures and governments and may also constitute a fertile ground for the growth of constitutional conventions between those legislatures and governments. It is conceivable for instance that usage and practice might give birth to conventions in Canada relating to the holding of federal-provincial conferences, the appointment of lieutenant governors, the reservation and disallowance of provincial legislation. ...
> The main purpose of constitutional conventions is to ensure that the legal framework of the constitution will be operated in accordance with the prevailing constitutional values or principles of the period. For example, the constitutional value which is the pivot of the conventions stated above and relating to responsible government is the democratic principle: the powers of the state must be exercised in accordance with the wishes of the electorate; and the constitutional value or principle which anchors the conventions regulating the relationship between the members of the Commonwealth is the independence of the former British colonies.

> Being based on custom and precedent, constitutional conventions are usually unwritten rules. Some of them, however, may be reduced to writing and expressed in the proceedings and documents of imperial conferences, or in the preamble of statutes such as the Statute of Westminster, 1931, or in the proceedings and documents of federal-provincial conferences. They are often referred to and recognized in statements made by members of governments.
> The conventional rules of the constitution present one striking peculiarity. In contradistinction to the laws of the constitution, they are not enforced by the courts. One reason for this situation is that, unlike common law rules, conventions are not judge-made rules. They are not based on judicial precedents but on precedents established by the institutions of government themselves. Nor are they in the nature of statutory commands which it is the function and duty of the courts to obey and enforce. Furthermore, to enforce them would mean to administer some formal sanction when they are breached. But the legal system from which they are distinct does not contemplate formal sanctions for their breach.
> Perhaps the main reason why conventional rules cannot be enforced by the courts is that they are generally in conflict with the legal rules which they postulate and the courts are bound to enforce the legal rules. The conflict is not of a type which would entail the commission of any illegality. It results from the fact that legal rules create wide powers, discretions and rights which conventions prescribe should be exercised only in a certain limited manner, if at all.
> Some examples will illustrate this point.
> As a matter of law, the Queen, or the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor could refuse assent to every bill passed by both Houses of Parliament or by a Legislative Assembly as the case may be. But by convention they cannot of their own motion refuse to assent to any such bill on any ground, for instance because they disapprove of the policy of the bill. We have here a conflict between a legal rule which creates a complete discretion and a conventional rule which completely neutralizes it. But conventions, like laws, are sometimes violated. And if this particular convention were violated and assent were improperly withheld, the courts would be bound to enforce the law, not the convention. ... [S]till the breach [of the convention] is not necessarily without a remedy. The remedy lies with some other institutions of government; furthermore it is not a formal remedy and it may be administered with less certainty or regularity than it would be by a court.
> Another example of the conflict between law and convention is provided by a fundamental convention already stated above: if after a general election where the opposition obtained the majority at the polls the government refused to resign and clung to office, it would thereby commit a fundamental breach of convention, one so serious indeed that it could be regarded as tantamount to a coup d'état. The remedy in this case would lie with the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor as the case might be who would be justified in dismissing the ministry and in calling on the opposition to form the government. But should the Crown be slow in taking this course, there is nothing the courts could do about it except at the risk of creating a state of legal discontinuity, that is, a form of revolution. ...
> This conflict between convention and law which prevents the courts from enforcing conventions also prevents conventions from crystallizing into laws, unless it be by statutory adoption.
> It is because the sanctions of convention rest with institutions of government other than courts, such as the Governor General or the Lieutenant Governor, or the Houses of Parliament, or with public opinion and ultimately, with the electorate, that it is generally said that they are political.
> It should be borne in mind however that, while they are not laws, some conventions may be more important than some laws. Their importance depends on that of the value or principle which they are meant to safeguard. Also they form an integral part of the constitution and of the constitutional system. They come within the meaning of the word "Constitution" in the preamble of the British North America Act, 1867:
> > Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united ... with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom. …
> That is why it is perfectly appropriate to say that to violate a convention is to do something which is unconstitutional although it entails no direct legal consequence. But the words "constitutional" and "unconstitutional" may also be used in a strict legal sense, for instance with respect to a statute which is found ultra vires or unconstitutional. The foregoing may perhaps be summarized in an equation: constitutional conventions plus constitutional law equal the total constitution of the country.
> …. [In this Reference the Court is not asked to enforce a convention.] We are asked to recognize it if it exists. Courts have done this very thing many times in England and the Commonwealth to provide aid for and background to constitutional or statutory construction. …
> In so recognizing conventional rules, the courts have described them, sometimes commented upon them and given them such precision as is derived from the written form of a judgment. They did not shrink from doing so on account of the political aspects of conventions, nor because of their supposed vagueness, uncertainty or flexibility.
> ...
> The requirements for establishing a convention bear some resemblance with those which apply to customary law. Precedents and usage are necessary but do not suffice. They must be normative. We adopt the following passage of Sir W. Ivor Jennings, The Law and the Constitution (5th ed., 1959), at p. 136:
> > We have to ask ourselves three questions: first, what are the precedents; secondly, did the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule; and thirdly, is there a reason for the rule? A single precedent with a good reason may be enough to establish the rule. A whole string of precedents without such a reason will be of no avail, unless it is perfectly certain that the persons concerned regarded them as bound by it.

The majority then applied Jennings' three-part test for determining whether a convention exists and concluded that a convention had emerged that before requests were made to the UK Parliament to amend the BNA Act in a manner affecting provincial interests, there should be a "substantial measure of provincial consent". Although not required by law to do so, the Trudeau government sought to respect the convention and engaged in further negotiations with the provinces. In the end, all provinces except Quebec agreed to patriation and the UK Parliament enacted the Canada Act, 1982 to which the Constitution Act, 1982 is appended as a schedule.

The majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Patriation Reference followed Dicey's approach to law and convention and summarized the ideas with an "equation", namely, "constitutional conventions plus constitutional law equal the total constitution of the country." In Canada, this equation turns an undemocratic hereditary monarchy into a constitutional democracy.

4.3.2 Some constitutional quirks relating to law versus convention and command versus counsel

Dicey focused on the way that non-legal constitutional conventions qualify how the crown's legal powers under the royal prerogative are exercised. In Canada, we must expand the operational scope of the conventions surrounding responsible government. The crown in Canada, through the governor general or lieutenant governors, exercises at least three kinds of legal powers:

1. common law prerogative powers;
2. powers conferred or confirmed by the written text of the Constitution of Canada upon
    a. the governor general
    b. the governor in council
    c. the lieutenant governor, and
    d. the lieutenant governor in council; and,
3. powers conferred by regular federal or provincial statutes upon
    a. the governor in council, and
    b. the lieutenant governor in council.

In the cases of (1), 2(a), and 2(c), the power is legally vested in the crown's representative solely but convention determines that the power must be exercised according to the directions issued by the prime minister or premier or other responsible ministers of the crown. In cases of 2(b), 2(d), 3(a) and 3(b), the power is legally vested in the crown's representative and members of the relevant council, and the governor and the privy council federally or the lieutenant governor and the executive council provincially must legally act together to make the decision; however, in these cases, again, convention determines that the crown's representative will follow the directions of responsible ministers who will never consist of all privy councillors federally and may not even consistent of all cabinet ministers federally or provincially.

Internal cabinet rules and practices determine how decisions are made. Full cabinet meetings are not always required; committees of cabinet may meet to make decisions. The governor general or lieutenant governor does not attend cabinet meetings. For run-of-the-mill federal orders in council, the quorum is usually four, including the minister who presides over the relevant department, and their recommendation is then sent to the governor general for signature. On certain matters, the prime minister personally recommends the decision to the governor general, including the dissolution and convocation of parliament and the appointment of privy councillors, cabinet ministers, lieutenant governors, senators, and the chief justices of all courts[88]—though of course the prime minister's approval is generally needed for all important matters of state.

So, in short, power legally vested in the hands of the crown or its representative directly or together with members of a federal or provincial council is, by convention, power in the hands of the prime minister, premier, or other relevant ministers of the crown who together form cabinet. In terms of federal executive power, the observations of MacGuigan J.A. may be helpful: after observing that the Constitution Act, 1867 vests executive government in the queen, governor general, and privy council, he stated: "Beyond that, the operation of the executive is shrouded in the conventions of responsible government" and it is by virtue of those conventions "that it is the Cabinet, in form merely a Committee of the Privy Council, which in reality constitutes the 'Council' advising the Governor General at any particular time".[89] And even this is not complete, for sometimes cabinet will act through a committee of cabinet.

In Canada, whenever the law (either the common law prerogative or statute) requires that a decision be issued in a formal sense by the crown or its representative, i.e., the governor general or lieutenant governor, the legal role of the responsible ministers is to aid and advise or provide counsel on what decision to make, the decision itself being legally the decision of the crown. By convention we know that the relevant minister (or ministers) actually directs or commands the crown's representative what to do, i.e., that de facto power is in the hands of the minister or ministers who 'advise' the crown. At law they 'advise', but by convention they 'command'. But what they cannot do is skip the formal step and issue the instrument themselves.

What legal status does the 'advice' have? Even where by convention the minister directs how a prerogative power is exercised, the minister is not exercising the prerogative power itself. Some recent courts describe the giving of ministerial advice as the exercise of a related prerogative power. It may be more appropriate, however, to say that the minister is, as member of the federal privy council or provincial executive council, performing a common law duty that arose historically for an advisor upon being summoned by the crown to attend the curia regis (see section IV.A.1 above), though one affirmed by sections 11 and 63 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Non-legal conventions may determine that advice is needed, who gives it, and what impact it has—but the advice itself is either the exercise of a legal power or the performance of a legal duty that remains distinct from the exercise of the prerogative power in question (which always remains in the crown).[90]

At this point it is important to clarify something Dicey wrote in the excerpt above, namely, that the prerogative may be "exercised by the Queen herself or by her Ministers" (emphasis added). There are many instances where a responsible minister or public servants within their departments may exercise the prerogative power directly rather than directing its use through advice. This is possible only when the participation of the governor general or lieutenant governor is not formally required. Many of these examples arise in the areas where the prerogative remains most important as a legal source of governmental decision making today, in particular foreign affairs and defence (see the Black case below).

The key constitutional conventions related to the principle of responsible government may be summarized as follows:

Rule of constitutional law	Equivalent rule of constitutional convention
The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) has the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative to appoint and dismiss the prime minister or premier.	The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) must appoint a prime minister or premier who enjoys the support and confidence of a majority of the members of the House of Commons or Legislative Assembly (usually the leader of the party whose members have just won the most seats in an election). The prime minister or premier must be a member of Parliament or Legislative Assembly or seek and obtain a seat within a reasonable period of time. The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) may dismiss a prime minister or premier in extraordinary circumstances (e.g., if the prime minister refuses to resign after losing an election)—an example of the crown's so-called 'reserve' power.

The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) has the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative to summon, prorogue, and dissolve Parliament or the Legislative Assembly (with dissolution causing a general election). The summoning and dissolving powers are expressly mentioned in the Constitution Act, 1867 (ss. 38, 82, 50, 85).	The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) can only summon, prorogue, or dissolve Parliament or the Legislative Assembly at the direction of the prime minister or premier. However, it should be noted that, in rare circumstances, the crown may exercise so-called 'reserve' powers to refuse advice to dissolve (and possible prorogue) Parliament or the Legislative Assembly. Requests by the prime minister or premier to dissolve the legislature and call an election have been refused when an election has recently been held and it appeared that someone else might be able to form a government with support of the House of Commons or Legislative Assembly. Where this has happened, the prime minister or premier whose advice was rejected usually resigns. For examples in Canada, see: the 'King-Byng' affair of 1926 and the events in British Columbia in 2017. For another famous example, where a governor general refused the prime minister's request to call an election, and where the prime minister was dismissed by the governor general, see the 'Whitlam' crisis in Australia in 1975.
The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) has the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative to appoint and dismiss the ministers that collectively form the government (cabinet) and individually head the primary ministries or departments of the government. (This appointment power may be a statutory power in certain provinces.)	The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) must appoint and dismiss cabinet ministers at the direction of the prime minister or premier, and the ministers appointed must be members of Parliament or the Legislative Assembly (or seek a seat within a reasonable time) and they must remain individually and collectively accountable and responsible to and maintain the confidence of the elected members of Parliament or the Legislative Assembly. (Note: the convention that cabinet ministers are appointed "on the advice of the Premier" is made explicit in the Newfoundland and Labrador: Executive Council Act, SNL 1995, c. E-16.1, ss. 4(1), 5(1)).
The crown has the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative—and in Canada the governor general and the lieutenant governors have this power by virtue of ss. 55 and 90 of the Constitution Act, 1867—to withhold royal assent to bills passed by the Houses of Parliament or Legislative Assemblies (thus preventing the bill from becoming law).	The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) must give royal assent to all bills passed by the Houses of Parliament or Legislative Assembly.

The crown historically had the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative to appoint judges. In Canada, the governor general has the power to appoint provincial superior court judges (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 96) and the governor in council has power to appoint Supreme Court of Canada justices (Supreme Court Act, RSC 1985, c. S-26, s. 4(2) and Federal Court justices (Federal Courts Act RSC, 1985, c. F-7, s. 5.2). Provincial court judges are typically appointed by the lieutenant governor in council (e.g., Courts of Justice Act, RSO 1990, c. C.43, s. 42).	The crown (governor general/lieutenant governor) must appoint judges at the direction of the prime minister, premier, minister of justice, or attorney general (depending upon the court). The Ontario Courts of Justice Act, RSO 1990, c. C.43, s. 42(1), specifies that appointments of provincial court judges are by the lieutenant governor in council "on the recommendation of the Attorney General").
The crown (governor general, but not the lieutenant governor*) has the legal power by virtue of the royal prerogative to enter into treaties with foreign states, to command the armed forces, to declare war and peace, to receive ambassadors, and, in general, to conduct foreign affairs. In Canada, the "Queen" has the "Command-in-Chief of the Land and Naval Militia, and of all Naval and Military Forces, of and in Canada" by virtue of s. 15 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The governor general is made "commander-in-chief" by the 1947 Letters Patent. [*It may be said that there are limited provincial prerogative powers on foreign affairs within areas of provincial competence. Quebec has been most forceful in making this assertion (the 'Gérin-Lajoie doctrine'), and has a Minister of International Relations and offices in foreign states.]	To the extent that a formal instrument is needed in relation to foreign affairs or defence, the crown (governor general) must only exercise prerogative powers relating to foreign and military affairs upon the direction of ministers of the crown who are responsible to Parliament. However, most foreign affairs and defence prerogative powers do not require a formal crown instrument and so may be exercised directly by the prime minister or relevant cabinet minister and have in some cases been subjected to statute (like the National Defence Act).

4.3.3 Cabinet as hyphen between executive and legislative branches: revisiting the separation of powers

Now that we have examined the central place of cabinet in the system of government, we can see why the separation of powers, although "part of the foundational architecture of our constitutional order", is not "watertight".[91] The prime minister and other ministers of the crown who form cabinet by convention "must be or become members of the Legislature and are expected, individually and collectively, to enjoy the confidence of its elected branch" with the result that there is "a considerable degree of integration between the Legislature and the Government".[92] The central players in the executive government are also central players in the legislature.

The British writer Walter Bagehot famously described "cabinet" as "a combining committee—a hyphen which joins, a buckle which fastens, the legislative part of the state to the executive part of the state".[93] A large part of what we consider to be the work of government—the work of governmental departments and the ministers presiding over them—is to develop policies, incorporate those policies into draft legislation, and introduce bills into parliament or the legislative assembly that will be debated, voted upon, and, if all goes according to plan, enacted as statutes or primary legislation. In Mikisew Cree, which addressed whether the government was under a duty to consult Indigenous communities pursuant to the 'honour of the crown' principle when drafting a bill that might affect them, Karakatsanis J. cited Bagehot's "hyphen" metaphor and concluded that all of the stages of the legislative process, even policy development long before a bill gets to parliament, represent the exercise by ministers and their governmental departments of "legislative" power pursuant to Part IV of the Constitution Act, 1867 rather than "executive" power under Part III.[94]

Although the same ministers are involved, the hyphen clearly separates the legislative from the executive parts of their jobs. The distinction matters because activities on the legislative side of the hyphen represent the exercise of parliamentary sovereignty and are immune from judicial review or the imposition of procedural or substantive duties (like the duty to consult), though any resulting statute produced will of course be open to legal challenge on constitutional grounds. In contrast, activities on the executive side of the hyphen involve administering or executing the law by decisions made pursuant to powers conferred by statutes (or primary legislation), or by the royal prerogative, and are all in principle judicially reviewable to ensure that appropriate legal standards, whether common law, legislative, or constitutional, are met even before the decision is made—including, for example, consulting affected Indigenous communities to ensure the 'honour of the crown'.

What about the vast body of subordinate or secondary legislation made by the executive government, like regulations made by the governor in council or ministers pursuant to powers conferred by primary legislation? Karakatsanis J. was clear: "the process by which subordinate legislation (such as regulations or rules) is adopted ... is clearly executive rather than parliamentary".[95] The real issue, then, is not whether members of the executive government are exercising executive or legislative functions, but whether their activities are parliamentary in the sense in which they are an integral part of the distinctive constitutional role allocated to parliament or the provincial legislatures respectively.

4.3.4 Piercing the veil of law to recognize the constitutional importance of conventions

The orthodox view is that courts do not enforce constitutional conventions because they are not law. However, courts do not ignore constitutional conventions; on the contrary, judges have insisted that the proper interpretation of law may require weighing the importance of conventions for securing the principle of responsible government and thus constitutional democracy in Canada.[96]

When reviewing whether an executive or administrative decision is lawful or not, Stratas J.A. has observed that it may be relevant for the court to consider the nature of the body that made the decision. Where the decision being judicially reviewed was made by the governor in council, it may be helpful to pause and recall just who or what the governor in council really is. Wrote Stratas J.A.:

> The "Governor in Council" is the "Governor General of Canada acting by and with the advice of, or by and with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction with the Queen's Privy Council for Canada" ... All the ministers of the Crown ... are active members of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. They meet in a body known as Cabinet. Cabinet is "to a unique degree the grand co-ordinating body for the divergent provincial, sectional, religious, racial and other interests throughout the nation" and, by convention, it attempts to represent different geographic, linguistic, religious, and ethnic groups: Norman Ward, Dawson's The Government of Canada, 6th ed., (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1987), at pages 203–204 ...[97]
> By vesting decision making authority over a certain matter in the governor in council, then, "Parliament implicated the decision making of Cabinet, a body of diverse policy perspectives representing all constituencies within government".[98] Knowing this may affect how judges review the decision. Judges have often pierced the veil of formal law to see the actual source of executive power.[99] Having said this, the courts also insist that the same principles of law apply regardless of the identity of the decision-maker, even if the decision-maker is the governor or king in council, because decisions or regulations made pursuant to a statute "derive their validity from the statute which creates the power, and not from the executive body by which they are made".[100]

The close relationship between constitutional law and constitutional convention is, at times, too important for judges to ignore. The governor general appoints Senators (Constitution Act, 1867, s. 24), but, as the Supreme Court of Canada observed, "constitutional convention requires the Governor General to follow the recommendations of the Prime Minister of Canada when filling Senate vacancies".[101] The Court then concluded that a proposed federal statute that would have introduced the option for provinces to hold non-binding or 'consultative' elections for Senate nominees, even though it left the formal appointment process intact, was unconstitutional because it would have had a profound impact on the "architecture of the Constitution" by transforming the Senate over time into an elected body—a result flowing from the "practical effect" of non-binding senatorial elections given the "political pressures" that would have been created for prime ministers to respect electoral outcomes (paras. 61-62). In effect, the Court ruled that a law that would likely have altered a constitutional convention was unconstitutional because of its impact on the constitution's structure or architecture.

The following case is a recent example of the Supreme Court of Canada insisting that constitutional convention informs the interpretation of constitutional law.

> [1] Freedom of information (FOI) legislation strikes a balance between the public's need to know and the confidentiality the executive requires to govern effectively. Both are crucial to the proper functioning of our democracy. This appeal concerns the balance between these two foundational principles.

> [3] However, in our Westminster system of government, the executive — like the judicial and legislative branches — also requires certain spheres of confidentiality to fulfill its constitutional role. Each of the executive, legislative branch, and judiciary play "critical and complementary roles in our constitutional democracy" and "each branch will be unable to fulfill its role if it is unduly interfered with by the others" (Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43, [2013] 3 SCR 3, at para. 29). Thus, constitutional conventions flow from the separation of powers and protect the spheres of confidentiality needed for a government institution "to perform its constitutionally-assigned functions" (British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Provincial Court Judges' Association of British Columbia, 2020 SCC 20, [2020] 2 SCR 506 (B.C. Judges), at para. 66). ... Cabinet confidentiality grants the executive the necessary latitude to govern in an effective, collectively responsible manner (*Babcock v. F.31 (FIPPA). Section 12(1) exempts a list of records, as well as any other records that would reveal the "substance of deliberations" of Cabinet or its committees. The interpretation of "substance of deliberations" by the Information and Privacy Commissioner of Ontario (IPC or Commissioner) is at the heart of this case. [Note: it is important to observe that section 12(1) does not actually refer to "Cabinet" but rather refers to the "Executive Council".]

These Letters, commonly called "mandate letters", set out the Premier's views on policy priorities for the government's term in office. Cabinet Office declined the journalist's request, claiming the Letters were exempt from disclosure under s. 12(1) of FIPPA.

The Commissioner paid careful attention to the text of the legislation and considered some of the purposes of Cabinet confidentiality. His reasons were intelligible and transparent. But he did not engage meaningfully with the legal and factual context against which s. 12(1) operates — in particular, constitutional conventions and traditions surrounding Cabinet confidentiality and Cabinet's decision-making process, including the role of the Premier within that process. Cabinet confidentiality creates conditions necessary to ensure an effective government. The Commissioner did not consider a key rationale underlying the convention: promoting the efficiency of the collective decision-making process. His failure to grapple with the broader constitutional dimension of Cabinet confidentiality led him to an overly narrow interpretation of s. 12(1). ...

[27] Beyond legislation, Cabinet confidentiality is protected as a matter of constitutional convention, or the rules of behavior established by government institutions that are not enforced by the courts, but are considered binding by those who operate the Constitution (A. Heard, Canadian Constitutional Conventions: The Marriage of Law & Politics (2nd ed. 2014), at p. 5; see also Reference re Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753, at p. 880). Because s. 12(1) was designed to preserve the secrecy of Cabinet's deliberative process, the constitutional dimension of Cabinet secrecy was crucial context in interpreting s. 12(1).

[28] In our constitutional democracy, the confidentiality of Cabinet deliberations is a precondition to responsible government because it enables collective ministerial responsibility. Responsible government is a fundamental principle of our system of government (OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 38) and the "most important non-federal characteristic of the Canadian Constitution" (P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at § 9:3). Government is "responsible" in that the executive is accountable to, and must maintain the confidence of, the legislative assembly (§ 9:1; Heard, at p. 90). Cabinet ministers are both individually responsible for their own conduct and respective departments, and collectively responsible for government policy and action (G. White, Cabinets and First Ministers (2005), at pp. 15-16).

[29] Cabinet secrecy derives from the collective dimension of ministerial responsibility (Y. Campagnolo, "The Political Legitimacy of Cabinet Secrecy" (2017), 51 R.J.T.U.M. 51, at p. 59). Collective ministerial responsibility requires that ministers be able to speak freely when deliberating without fear that what they say might be subject to public scrutiny (IPC reasons, at paras. 86-87 and 97). ... At base, Cabinet confidentiality promotes executive accountability by permitting private disagreement and candour in ministerial deliberations, despite public solidarity…

[32] The IPC demonstrated appreciation for the import of the candour and solidarity rationales supporting Cabinet confidentiality, citing this Court's decision in Babcock (see para. 87). ... But the IPC's engagement with the convention of Cabinet confidentiality essentially stopped there (see para. 87). Despite the submissions of Cabinet Office that disclosure of the mandate Letters could harm the efficacy of the Cabinet decision-making process (A.R., vol. III, at pp. 101-2), the Commissioner did not engage with a core purpose of Cabinet secrecy to promote the efficiency of the collective decision making, nor with the ultimate goal of this constitutional convention: effective government. This was critical context to interpreting s. 12(1).

[33] Ministerial candour and solidarity are components of effective governance, to be sure, but they are only part of the foundation on which Cabinet confidentiality and effective governance rests — and thus the legal context within which s. 12(1) operates. To reasonably interpret the opening words of s. 12(1), it was therefore critical that the IPC fully consider the function of Cabinet within our system of government, and the bounds of confidentiality necessary for it to discharge that function effectively (see Criminal Lawyers' Association 2010, at para. 40; C.A. reasons, at para. 163). The IPC's failure to do so was material. It led him to: (1) ascribe an overly narrow purpose to s. 12(1); and (2) neglect important arguments made by Cabinet Office that informed the scope of the exemption.

[58] In sum, the IPC failed to give meaningful weight to the legal and factual context, including traditions and constitutional conventions concerning Cabinet confidentiality, the role of the Premier, and the fluid, dynamic nature of the Cabinet decision-making process. The IPC's lack of appreciation for the contextual constraints bearing upon its decision led him to unreasonable interpretive approaches and conclusions. He characterized the Letters as outcomes of the Premier's deliberative process; found they were mere topics that did not permit accurate inferences as to Cabinet deliberations; and required evidence from Cabinet Office to show that disclosure of the Letters would permit accurate inferences to be drawn as to "actual Cabinet deliberations at a specific Cabinet meeting" (para. 100; see also paras. 116-17). As a result, the IPC's narrow interpretation of the "substance of deliberations" was unreasonable. ...

[60] Given the key role Cabinet confidentiality plays in the proper functioning of our Westminster system of government, cases about its proper scope raise important issues for the stability and legitimacy of our democracy. Cabinet confidentiality both enables the proper functioning of responsible government by promoting collective ministerial accountability to the legislature and affords the executive the operational space it needs to function effectively ... These functions are crucial both to the principle of responsible government and to the separation of powers. Spheres of confidentiality insulated from "undue external interference" are essential to the executive's ability to "perform its constitutionally-assigned functions" (B.C. Judges, at paras. 66 and 96).

[61] In approaching assertions of Cabinet confidentiality, administrative decision makers and reviewing courts must be attentive not only to the vital importance of public access to government-held information but also to Cabinet secrecy's core purpose of enabling effective government, and its underlying rationales of efficiency, candour, and solidarity. They must also be attentive to the dynamic and fluid nature of executive decision making, the function of Cabinet itself and its individual members, the role of the Premier, and Cabinet's prerogative to determine when and how to announce its decisions.

[64] I would allow the appeal and set aside the order of the IPC, with costs to the appellant payable by the CBC. The private record of proceedings filed with this Court will remain in the Court file but shall be confidential, sealed, and not form part of the public record.

4.3.5 Judicial review of executive 'high policy' decisions

The crown and crown ministers may be under the law in their executive capacities, yet many of the executive decisions we've considered—like deciding when to dissolve parliament and call an election or how to engage with other states on the international stage—are inherently political decisions that may defy legal assessment or standards. In this last section, we consider how courts have recently approached the question of whether sensitive executive decisions made pursuant to the royal prerogative are open to judicial review.[102]

4.3.5.1 Black v. Canada (Prime Minister), 2001 CanLII 8537 (ON CA), 2001 ONCA 8537 54 O.R. (3d) 215

Background context: Conrad Black was a well-known newspaper publisher in Canada and the United Kingdom. He was considered for nomination to the House of Lords in Britain, even though he was at the time a Canadian not a British citizen. Appointments to the UK House of Lords are made by the queen or king on the recommendation of the British prime minister. The Canadian prime minister at the time, Jean Chrétien, intervened and informed the queen that the appointment of Black to a peerage would contravene Canadian policies regarding such honours—in particular a resolution of the House of Commons (the 'Nichols' resolution in 1919) on the conferral of titles.

Black brought an action against the prime minister for abuse of power, misfeasance in public office, and negligence. It was argued that the prime minister was acting in his private capacity and was motivated by dislike for Black. The trial judge found that the prime minister, in making the representations to the queen, was exercising prerogative powers relating to honours and foreign affairs and dismissed the actions. On appeal, two of the issues addressed were: could the prime minister exercise powers pursuant to the royal prerogative, and, if so, is the exercise of prerogative power open to challenge in court (is the prerogative 'justiciable')?

[31] Mr. Black's ... submission is that the Prime Minister cannot exercise the Crown prerogative. He submits that in Canada, only the Governor General can exercise the prerogative. I find no support for this proposition in theory or in practice. Admittedly, the Governor General is the Queen's permanent representative in Canada. The 1947 Letters Patent constituting the office of the Governor General of Canada ... is the instrument by which the Monarch delegates her prerogative powers for application in Canada. The Letters Patent empower the Governor General "to exercise all powers and authorities lawfully belonging to Us in respect of Canada" (at para. II). By convention, the Governor General exercises her powers on the advice of the Prime Minister or Cabinet. Although the Governor General retains discretion to refuse to follow this advice, in Canada that discretion has been exercised only in the most exceptional circumstances. See Paul Lordon, Q.C., Crown Law (Toronto: Butterworths, 1991) at p. 70.

[32] Still, nothing in the Letters Patent or the case law requires that all prerogative powers be exercised exclusively by the Governor General. As members of the Privy Council, the Prime Minister and other Ministers of the Crown may also exercise the Crown prerogative: see Lordon, supra, at p. 71. ... The conduct of foreign affairs, for example, "is an executive act of government in which neither the Queen nor Parliament has any part": F.A. Mann, Foreign Affairs in English Courts (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1986) at p. 2. See also Barton v. Commonwealth of Australia (1974), A.L.J.R. 161 at 172.

[33] Counsel for the respondents points out that if Mr. Black were correct, the Prime Minister—whose powers are not enumerated in any statute—would have no legal authority to speak for Canada on foreign affairs. This proposition is, on its face, absurd. I therefore reject Mr. Black's submission that only the Governor General can exercise prerogative powers in Canada. I conclude that the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada can exercise the Crown prerogative as well.

[34] Mr. Black's [next] submission is that even if the Prime Minister can exercise prerogative power relating to the granting of honours or the conduct of foreign affairs, on the facts pleaded in the amended statement of claim, Prime Minister Chrétien was doing neither. He was not deciding whether to grant Mr. Black an honour -- that decision rests with the Queen -- and he was not conducting foreign affairs. Instead, according to Mr. Black, Prime Minister Chrétien intervened personally with the Queen and gave unsolicited and wrong legal advice.

[35] In my view, however, whether one characterizes the Prime Minister's actions as communicating Canada's policy on honours to the Queen, giving her advice on Mr. Black's peerage, or opposing Mr. Black's appointment, he was exercising the prerogative power of the Crown relating to honours.

[36] Unquestionably, the granting of honours is the prerogative of the Crown. The Monarch is "the fountain, parent and distributor of honours, dignities, privileges and franchises": Joseph Chitty, A Treatise on the Law of the Prerogatives of the Crown: And the Relative Duties and Rights of the Subject (London: Butterworths and Son, 1820), at p. 6. Because no statute in Canada governs the conferral of honours, this prerogative has not been displaced by federal law. Nor has it been limited by the common law. As Hogg and Monahan, supra, observe at pp. 18-19, appointments and honours is one area in which the prerogative power "remains meaningful". Their view is consistent with the opinion of Lord Roskill in the important House of Lords decision, Council of Civil Service Unions v. Minister for the Civil Service, [1985] 1 A.C. 374, [1984] 3 All E.R. 935. In his speech in that case Lord Roskill said at p. 418 that the modern exercise of the prerogative includes "the making of treaties, the defence of the realm, the prerogative of mercy, the grant of honours, the dissolution of Parliament and the appointment of ministers as well as others . . .". (Emphasis added.)

[37] It is one thing to state that the honours prerogative still exists in Canada. However, one critical question on this appeal is the scope of that power. Common sense dictates that, at a minimum, the honours prerogative includes the power to grant or refuse to grant an honour to a Canadian citizen. However, in my view the honours prerogative is much broader than that, and is not limited to conferrals the Government of Canada or the Prime Minister might make. The honours prerogative also includes giving advice on, even advising against, a foreign country's conferral of an honour on a Canadian citizen. If that were not so, the three Canadian policy statements on the granting of honours by foreign countries -- the 1919 Nickle Resolution, the 1968 Regulation and the 1988 Policy -- would be meaningless. Because these policy statements guide the exercise of Canada's honours prerogative, the exercise of the prerogative necessarily embraces the communication of these policies to a foreign country considering bestowing a title on a Canadian citizen. Furthermore, the authority to communicate that policy rests with the nation's leader, the Prime Minister.

[38] The policy statements show that Canada has chosen to exercise the honours prerogative differently from England. As we have seen, Canada calls for foreign countries to obtain the Government of Canada's approval before granting honours to Canadian citizens. The underlying rationale of these policies is egalitarianism. Canada disapproves of ranking its citizens according to status and lineage. In communicating Canada's policy to the Queen, in giving her advice on it, right or wrong, in advising against granting a title to one of Canada's citizens, the Prime Minister was exercising the Crown prerogative relating to honours.

[40] ... Prime Minister Chrétien's intervention with the Queen was not personal. Whatever his motivation, he was acting as the leader of this country, giving advice or communicating Canada's policy on honours to a foreign head of state.

[45] Under the law that existed at least into the 1960s, the court's power to judicially review the prerogative was very limited. The court could determine whether a prerogative power existed and, if so, what its scope was, and whether it had been superseded by statute. However, once a court established the existence and scope of a prerogative power, it could not review how that power was exercised. ... The appropriateness or adequacy of the grounds for its exercise, even whether the procedures used were fair, were not reviewable. The courts insisted that the source of the power -- the prerogative -- precluded judicial scrutiny of its exercise. The underlying rationale for this narrow review of the prerogative was that exercises of prerogative power ordinarily raised questions courts were not qualified or competent to answer.

[46] Even this narrow view of the court's role in reviewing the prerogative power now has to be modified in Canada because of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. By s. 32(1)(a), the Charter applies to Parliament and the Government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament. The Crown prerogative lies within the authority of Parliament. Therefore, if an individual claims that the exercise of a prerogative power violates that individual's Charter rights, the court has a duty to decide the claim. See Operation Dismantle, supra. However, Mr. Black does not assert any Charter claim.

[47] Apart from the Charter, the expanding scope of judicial review and of Crown liability make it no longer tenable to hold that the exercise of a prerogative power is insulated from judicial review merely because it is a prerogative and not a statutory power. The preferable approach is that adopted by the House of Lords in the Civil Service Unions case, supra. There, the House of Lords emphasized that the controlling consideration in determining whether the exercise of a prerogative power is judicially reviewable is its subject matter, not its source. If, in the words of Lord Roskill, the subject matter of the prerogative power is "amenable to the judicial process", it is reviewable; if not, it is not reviewable. Lord Roskill provided content to this subject matter test of reviewability by explaining that the exercise of the prerogative will be amenable to the judicial process if it affects the rights of individuals. Again, in his words at p. 417 A.C.:

> If the executive in pursuance of the statutory power does an act affecting the rights of the citizen, it is beyond question that in principle the manner of the exercise of that power may today be challenged on one or more of the three grounds which I have mentioned earlier in this speech [legality, rationality, and fairness]. If the executive instead of acting under a statutory power acts under a prerogative power ... so as to affect the rights of the citizen, I am unable to see, subject to what I shall say later, that there is any logical reason why the fact that the source of the power is the prerogative and not statute should today deprive the citizen of that right of challenge to the manner of its exercise which he would possess were the source of the power statutory. In either case the act in question is the act of the executive.

[48] In his speech in that case, Lord Diplock discussed two ways in which the exercise of a prerogative power may affect the rights of an individual: by altering the individual's legal rights and obligations or by affecting the individual's legitimate expectations. ...

[49] I agree with the House of Lords that the proper test for the review of the exercise of the prerogative is the subject matter test. It is that test that I will endeavour to apply in this case.

[50] At the core of the subject matter test is the notion of justiciability. The notion of justiciability is concerned with the appropriateness of courts deciding a particular issue, or instead deferring to other decision-making institutions like Parliament. ... Only those exercises of the prerogative that are justiciable are reviewable. The court must decide "whether the question is purely political in nature and should, therefore, be determined in another forum or whether it has a sufficient legal component to warrant the intervention of the judicial branch": Reference re Canada Assistance Plan (British Columbia), 1991 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 525 at p. 545, 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 1.

[51] Under the test set out by the House of Lords, the exercise of the prerogative will be justiciable, or amenable to the judicial process, if its subject matter affects the rights or legitimate expectations of an individual. Where the rights or legitimate expectations of an individual are affected, the court is both competent and qualified to judicially review the exercise of the prerogative.

[53] At the other end of the spectrum lie decisions like the refusal of a passport or the exercise of mercy. The power to grant or withhold a passport continues to be a prerogative power. ... [C]ommon sense dictates that a refusal to issue a passport for improper reasons or without affording the applicant procedural fairness should be judicially reviewable. This was the position taken by the English Court of Appeal in R. v. Secretary of State for Foreign & Commonwealth Affairs, Ex p. Everett, supra. ... Taylor L.J. wrote at p. 660 All E.R.:

> At the top of the scale of executive functions under the prerogative are matters of high policy, of which examples were given by their Lordships: making treaties, making law, dissolving Parliament, mobilising the armed forces. Clearly those matters, and no doubt a number of others, are not justiciable. But the grant or refusal of a passport is in a quite different category. It is a matter of administrative decision, affecting the rights of individuals and their freedom of travel. It raises issues which are just as justiciable as, for example, the issues arising in immigration cases.

[64] For these reasons, I agree with the motions judge that Prime Minister Chrétien's exercise of the honours prerogative by giving advice to the Queen about granting Mr. Black's peerage is not justiciable and therefore not judicially reviewable.

Note: if Prime Minister Chrétien had been advising the Queen in her capacity as the Queen of Canada on how to exercise a power in relation the conferral of an honour in Canada, then he would not have been exercising the prerogative directly but 'advising' her in a constitutional sense about how she should exercise the prerogative. But Laskin J.A. found, rightly, that the Prime Minister "was giving advice or communicating Canada's policy on honours to a foreign head of state", i.e., he was informing the Queen in her capacity as the Queen of the United Kingdom about Canada's position regarding foreign honours for Canadian citizens, and this act was thus the exercise of a prerogative power directly not through advice in the constitutional sense. After all, the prime minister of Canada has no more right to advise the Queen of the United Kingdom on how to exercise her powers in that country than the prime minister of the United Kingdom has a right to advise the Queen of Canada on how to exercise her powers in this country. It is regrettable, however, that Laskin J.A. was not clearer as to when the prime minister or other ministers of the crown in Canada may exercise a prerogative power directly and when they may only 'advise' the crown in right of Canada on how a prerogative power in Canada should be exercised—for not all prerogative powers may be exercised directly by ministers (see Part 4.3.2 above).

4.3.5.2 Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 SCR 44

This was an appeal from a decision of the Federal Court of Appeal requiring the Canadian government to request the United States to return Omar Khadr from the US facility at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Khadr, a Canadian citizen, had been at the time detained at Guantanamo Bay without trial for over seven years. He was 15 years old when he was taken prisoner in 2002 by US forces in Afghanistan; it was alleged that he threw a grenade that killed a US soldier during a battle. In February and September 2003, agents from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service ("CSIS") and the Foreign Intelligence Division of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade ("DFAIT") questioned Khadr in Guantanamo Bay on matters connected to the charges pending against him and shared the product of these interviews with US authorities. In March 2004, a DFAIT official interviewed Khadr again, with the knowledge that he had been subjected by US authorities to sleep deprivation. The Court concluded that the conduct of Canadian officials was contrary to Canada's international human rights obligations and were an unjustifiable violation of Khadr's right to liberty and security of the person guaranteed by section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We examine the Court's conclusions on the appropriate remedy here.

> The Court (McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron, Rothstein and Cromwell JJ.):
> ...
> Is the Remedy Sought Appropriate and Just in All the Circumstances?

[27] ... The issue on this appeal is whether the breach of s. 7 of the Charter entitles Mr. Khadr to the remedy of an order that Canada request of the United States that he be returned to Canada. Two questions arise at this stage: (1) Is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach? and (2) Is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative power over foreign affairs?

[29] First, is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach?

[32] We conclude that the necessary connection between the breaches of s. 7 and the remedy sought has been established for the purpose of these judicial review proceedings.

[33] Second, is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative over foreign affairs? A connection between the remedy and the breach is not the only consideration. As stated in Doucet-Boudreau [Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 SCR 3], an appropriate and just remedy is also one that "must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy" (para. 56) and must be a "judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court" (para. 57). The government argues that courts have no power under the Constitution of Canada to require the executive branch of government to do anything in the area of foreign policy. It submits that the decision not to request the repatriation of Mr. Khadr falls directly within the prerogative powers of the Crown to conduct foreign relations, including the right to speak freely with a foreign state on all such matters: P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 1-19.

[34] The prerogative power is the "residue of discretionary or arbitrary authority, which at any given time is legally left in the hands of the Crown": Reference as to the Effect of the Exercise of the Royal Prerogative of Mercy Upon Deportation Proceedings, 1933 CanLII 40 (SCC), 1933 SCC 40, [1933] SCR 269, at p. 272, per Duff C.J., quoting A. V. Dicey, Introduction to the Study of the Law of the Constitution (8th ed. 1915), at p. 420. It is a limited source of non-statutory administrative power accorded by the common law to the Crown: Hogg, at p. 1-17.

[35] The prerogative power over foreign affairs has not been displaced by s. 10 of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-22, and continues to be exercised by the federal government. The Crown prerogative in foreign affairs includes the making of representations to a foreign government: Black v. Canada (Prime Minister) (2001), 2001 CanLII 8537 (ON CA), 2001 ONCA 8537, 199 D.L.R. (4th) 228 (Ont. C.A.). We therefore agree with O'Reilly J.'s implicit finding (paras. 39, 40 and 49) that the decision not to request Mr. Khadr's repatriation was made in the exercise of the prerogative over foreign relations.

[36] In exercising its common law powers under the royal prerogative, the executive is not exempt from constitutional scrutiny: Operation Dismantle v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 74 (SCC), 1985 SCC 74, [1985] 1 SCR 441. It is for the executive and not the courts to decide whether and how to exercise its powers, but the courts clearly have the jurisdiction and the duty to determine whether a prerogative power asserted by the Crown does in fact exist and, if so, whether its exercise infringes the Charter (Operation Dismantle) or other constitutional norms (Air Canada v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1986 CanLII 2 (SCC), 1986 SCC 2, [1986] 2 SCR 539).

[37] The limited power of the courts to review exercises of the prerogative power for constitutionality reflects the fact that in a constitutional democracy, all government power must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution. This said, judicial review of the exercise of the prerogative power for constitutionality remains sensitive to the fact that the executive branch of government is responsible for decisions under this power, and that the executive is better placed to make such decisions within a range of constitutional options. The government must have flexibility in deciding how its duties under the power are to be discharged: see, e.g., Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), 1998 SCC 793, [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 101-2. But it is for the courts to determine the legal and constitutional limits within which such decisions are to be taken. It follows that in the case of refusal by a government to abide by constitutional constraints, courts are empowered to make orders ensuring that the government's foreign affairs prerogative is exercised in accordance with the constitution: United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 SCR 283.

[38] Having concluded that the courts possess a narrow power to review and intervene on matters of foreign affairs to ensure the constitutionality of executive action, the final question is whether O'Reilly J. misdirected himself in exercising that power in the circumstances of this case ...

[39] Our first concern is that the remedy ordered below gives too little weight to the constitutional responsibility of the executive to make decisions on matters of foreign affairs in the context of complex and ever-changing circumstances, taking into account Canada's broader national interests. For the following reasons, we conclude that the appropriate remedy is to declare that, on the record before the Court, Canada infringed Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights, and to leave it to the government to decide how best to respond to this judgment in light of current information, its responsibility for foreign affairs, and in conformity with the Charter.

[40] As discussed, the conduct of foreign affairs lies with the executive branch of government. The courts, however, are charged with adjudicating the claims of individuals who claim that their Charter rights have been or will be violated by the exercise of the government's discretionary powers: Operation Dismantle.

[41] In some situations, courts may give specific directions to the executive branch of the government on matters touching foreign policy. For example, in Burns, the Court held that it would offend s. 7 to extradite a fugitive from Canada without seeking and obtaining assurances from the requesting state that the death penalty would not be imposed. The Court gave due weight to the fact that seeking and obtaining those assurances were matters of Canadian foreign relations. Nevertheless, it ordered that the government seek them.

[42] The specific facts in Burns justified a more specific remedy. The fugitives were under the control of Canadian officials. It was clear that assurances would provide effective protection against the prospective Charter breaches: it was entirely within Canada's power to protect the fugitives against possible execution. Moreover, the Court noted that no public purpose would be served by extradition without assurances that would not be substantially served by extradition with assurances, and that there was nothing to suggest that seeking such assurances would undermine Canada's good relations with other states: Burns, at paras. 125 and 136.

[43] The present case differs from Burns. Mr. Khadr is not under the control of the Canadian government; the likelihood that the proposed remedy will be effective is unclear; and the impact on Canadian foreign relations of a repatriation request cannot be properly assessed by the Court.

[44] This brings us to our second concern: the inadequacy of the record. The record before us gives a necessarily incomplete picture of the range of considerations currently faced by the government in assessing Mr. Khadr's request. We do not know what negotiations may have taken place, or will take place, between the U.S. and Canadian governments over the fate of Mr. Khadr. As observed by Chaskalson C.J. in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa, [2004] ZACC 5, 136 I.L.R. 452, at para. 77: "The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal." It follows that in these circumstances, it would not be appropriate for the Court to give direction as to the diplomatic steps necessary to address the breaches of Mr. Khadr's Charter rights.

[46] In this case, the evidentiary uncertainties, the limitations of the Court's institutional competence, and the need to respect the prerogative powers of the executive, lead us to conclude that the proper remedy is declaratory relief. ...

[47] The prudent course at this point, respectful of the responsibilities of the executive and the courts, is for this Court to allow Mr. Khadr's application for judicial review in part and to grant him a declaration advising the government of its opinion on the records before it which, in turn, will provide the legal framework for the executive to exercise its functions and to consider what actions to take in respect of Mr. Khadr, in conformity with the Charter.

Conclusion

[48] The appeal is allowed in part. Mr. Khadr's application for judicial review is allowed in part. This Court declares that through the conduct of Canadian officials in the course of interrogations in 2003-2004, as established on the evidence before us, Canada actively participated in a process contrary to Canada's international human rights obligations and contributed to Mr. Khadr's ongoing detention so as to deprive him of his right to liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter, contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. Costs are awarded to Mr. Khadr.

4.3.5.3 Hupacasath First Nation v. Canada (Foreign Affairs and International Trade Canada), 2015 FCA 4

Federal Court of Appeal

Stratas J. (Nadon and Scott J.A. concurring):

[1] In the Federal Court, the appellant, Hupacasath First Nation, alleged that a foreign investment promotion and protection agreement between Canada and the People's Republic of China might affect Aboriginal rights and interests it has asserted over certain lands in British Columbia. Due to that potential effect, the appellant submitted that, as a matter of law, the Minister of Foreign Affairs Canada and the Attorney General of Canada ("Canada") had to consult with it and, if necessary, accommodate its concerns before causing the agreement to come into force. Canada did not do this and so, the appellants said, Canada failed to fulfil its duty.

[11] The appellant is a band under the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5. Its 285 members live on two reserves covering roughly 56 acres of land on Vancouver Island. However, it asserts Aboriginal rights, including self-government rights, and title over roughly 573,000 acres of land on Vancouver Island, an area that overlaps with the territory claimed by nine other First Nations.

[12] On September 9, 2012, Canada announced that it had signed a foreign investment promotion and protection agreement with the People's Republic of China. This agreement is known as the Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the People's Republic of China for the Promotion and Reciprocal Protection of Investments (hereafter "Agreement"). The Agreement is similar to twenty-four other foreign investment promotion and protection agreements Canada has signed with other nations.

[13] Under the Agreement, Canada and the People's Republic of China must, among other things, treat investors from the other country and their investments in accordance with principles of non-discriminatory treatment and protection from expropriation without compensation. ...

[16] Broadly speaking, the appellant says that the Agreement changes the landscape in the sense that it creates incentives for Canada to act in a manner that avoids breaches of the Agreement and resulting monetary awards. This, it says, may cause Canada to act in a manner that injures the appellant and its interests.

[17] On the law set out in cases such as Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43, [2010] 2 SCR 650, Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Minister of Canadian Heritage), 2005 SCC 69, [2005] 3 SCR 388, and Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 SCR 511, the appellant says that Canada became obligated in these circumstances to consult with it and accommodate its rights and interests. Before signing the Agreement and, indeed, before the matter was heard in the Federal Court, Canada did not consult with the appellant. The appellant maintains that had Canada consulted with it, Canada would have had to protect the appellant's rights in the Agreement. But Canada did not.

The matter under review and the nature of the jurisdictional issue

[23] The matter under review is the coming into effect of the Agreement. This, the appellant says, will happen without consultation with it, thereby violating its rights.

[24] How does this Agreement come into effect? The parties agree that this happens in two steps.

[25] First, the Governor in Council passes an order in council authorizing the Minister of Foreign Affairs to take the actions necessary to have the Agreement come into effect. At the time of the appellant's judicial review, this had not been done.

[26] Second, the Agreement comes into effect when the Minister signs an instrument of ratification and Canada delivers it to the People's Republic of China, confirming that all of Canada's internal legal procedures for bringing the Agreement into effect have been met. ...

[31] In this case, however, the Governor in Council's power to make the order is not conferred by or under an Act of Parliament. What is the source of its power?

[32] The Governor in Council's power to make the order comes from the Crown's prerogative powers. These are the Crown's remaining inherent or historical powers as the common law has shaped them: Peter W. Hogg, Q.C., et al., Liability of the Crown, 4th ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 2011) at pages 19-20. Looking at it another way, prerogative powers are "the residue of discretionary or arbitrary authority, which at any given time is legally left in the hands of the Crown": A.V. Dicey, Law of the Constitution, 10th ed. (1959) at page 424.

[33] The conduct of foreign affairs is one area where the Crown holds some prerogative powers. These include the power to enter into treaties and international agreements. Properly understood then, to bring the Agreement into effect, the Crown, acting through the Governor in Council, uses its prerogative power to make an order instructing the Minister of Foreign Affairs to issue an instrument of ratification. In turn, the Minister of Foreign Affairs complies with that order.

under the Federal Courts Act to review exercises of pure Crown prerogative? If not, provincial superior courts have that power by default because of their inherent jurisdiction.

[Stratas J.A. then examined competing arguments as to the jurisdiction of the Federal Court to review exercises of prerogative power by the federal crown.]

[58] In light of the foregoing, I conclude that the Federal Courts can review exercises of jurisdiction or power rooted solely in the federal Crown prerogative.

The justiciability issue

[59] In the course of its written submissions on this Court's jurisdiction, Canada says that if exercises of pure federal Crown prerogative are potentially reviewable, then this Court still cannot consider them. The subject-matter, being policy-oriented and concerned with foreign relations, is not justiciable, i.e., it is not appropriately reviewable in a court of law.

[61] It is true that these cases do stand for the narrow proposition that Charter cases are justiciable regardless of the nature of the government action, be it an exercise of the Crown prerogative or otherwise. But these cases do not stand for the broad proposition that all other exercises of the Crown prerogative are not justiciable. In fact, as I shall demonstrate, some are.

[62] Justiciability, sometimes called the "political questions objection," concerns the appropriateness and ability of a court to deal with an issue before it. Some questions are so political that courts are incapable or unsuited to deal with them, or should not deal with them in light of the time-honoured demarcation of powers between the courts and the other branches of government.

> If the executive in pursuance of the statutory power does an act affecting the rights of the citizen, it is beyond question that in principle the manner of the exercise of that power may be challenged on one or more…grounds…. If the executive instead of acting under a statutory power acts under a prerogative power…I am unable to see…that there is any logical reason why the fact that the source of the power is the prerogative and not statute should deprive the citizen of that right of challenge to the manner of its exercise which he would possess were the source of the power statutory. In either case the act in question is the act of the executive.

[64] I also agree with the Court of Appeal for Ontario in Black, supra at paragraph 44 that "the source of the power – statute or prerogative – should not determine whether the action complained of is reviewable."

[65] So what is or is not justiciable?

[66] In judicial review, courts are in the business of enforcing the rule of law, one aspect of which is "executive accountability to legal authority" and protecting "individuals from arbitrary [executive] action": Reference Re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), 1998 SCC 793, [1998] 2 SCR 217, 161 D.L.R. (4th) 385 at paragraph 70. Usually when a judicial review of executive action is brought, the courts are institutionally capable of assessing whether or not the executive has acted reasonably, i.e., within a range of acceptability and defensibility, and that assessment is the proper role of the courts within the constitutional separation of powers. ... In rare cases, however, exercises of executive power are suffused with ideological, political, cultural, social, moral and historical concerns of a sort not at all amenable to the judicial process or suitable for judicial analysis. In those rare cases, assessing whether the executive has acted within a range of acceptability and defensibility is beyond the courts' ken or capability, taking courts beyond their proper role within the separation of powers. For example, it is hard to conceive of a court reviewing in wartime a general's strategic decision to deploy military forces in a particular way. ...

[69] But here the gist of the appellant's challenge is different. It alleges that, regardless of the factors prompting the Agreement, the decision of the executive to bring the Agreement into effect would be unacceptable and indefensible because the appellant has enforceable legal rights to be consulted before that happens. In this case, acceptability and defensibility turns on whether or not the appellant has those legal rights.

[70] Assessing whether or not legal rights exist on the facts of a case lies at the core of what courts do. Under the constitutional separation of powers, determining this is squarely within our province. Canada's justiciability objection has no merit.

Was a duty to consult triggered?

[79] The parties agree that the Federal Court identified the correct law concerning what triggers the duty to consult and, if necessary, accommodate Aboriginal rights and title which have been asserted but not yet proven. That law is found in RioTinto, Mikisew, and Haida Nation, all supra.

[82] The Supreme Court identified two aims the duty to consult is meant to further. First is "the need to protect Aboriginal rights and to preserve the future use of the resources claimed by Aboriginal peoples while balancing countervailing Crown interests": Rio Tinto, supra at paragraph 50. Second is the need to "recognize that actions affecting unproven Aboriginal title or rights or Agreement rights can have irreversible [adverse] effects that are not in keeping with the honour of the Crown": Rio Tinto, supra at paragraph 46.

[83] This last-mentioned idea – that the duty is aimed at preventing a present, real possibility of harm caused by dishonourable conduct that cannot be addressed later – is key:

> The Crown, acting honourably, cannot cavalierly run roughshod over Aboriginal interests where claims affecting these interests are being seriously pursued in the process of [Agreement] negotiation and proof. It must respect these potential, but yet unproven, interests. The Crown is not rendered impotent. It may continue to manage the resource in question pending claims resolution. But, depending on the circumstances, > discussed more fully below, the honour of the Crown may require it to consult with and reasonably accommodate Aboriginal interests pending resolution of the claim. To unilaterally exploit a claimed resource during the process of proving and resolving the Aboriginal claim to that resource, may be to deprive the Aboriginal claimants of some or all of the benefit of the resource. That is not honourable.

> (Haida, supra at paragraph 27.)
> ...
> [85] Both before the Federal Court and in this Court, the central issue was whether ... [there was] a causal relationship between the Crown conduct and potential adverse impacts on pending Aboriginal claims or rights ...
> [Stratas J.A. then examined this point in detail.]
> [118] Assuming the Agreement is successful in achieving its objectives, it is true that there will be more investment in Canada from the People's Republic of China. But more investment in Canada does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the appellant's Aboriginal rights will be affected. The appellant's case founders on that break in the chain of reasoning, a break that can only be repaired by resort to assumptions, conjectures or guesses. In short, the appellant has failed to show, in the words of Rio Tinto at paragraph 45, "a causal relationship between the proposed government conduct or decision and a potential for adverse impacts on [its] pending Aboriginal claims or rights" that rises above the speculative.
> [123] Therefore, for the foregoing reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs. I wish to thank the parties for their helpful submissions.

4.3.5.4 MacKinnon v. Canada (Attorney General), 2025 FC 422

In this case, it was argued that the Prime Minister Justin Trudeau acted unlawfully when he advised the governor general to prorogue parliament for a lengthy period of time in circumstances in which, had parliament been able to convene, the opposition parties had indicated that they would have voted in favour of a non-confidence motion and thus forced an immediate election. It was argued that the decision to prorogue parliament not only prevented parliament from holding the government accountable, but it was made for partisan political reasons, namely, to allow the Liberal party time to select a new leader before the next election.

Crampton CJ had to address a series of issues. He concluded that (1) the Federal Court has jurisdiction under the Federal Courts Act to judicially review the exercise by a federal decision-maker of a prerogative power (rejecting the argument that only the provincial superior courts have that jurisdiction); (2) he concluded that although the prime minister's decision took the form of "advice" to the governor general and was not itself the decision to prorogue parliament, prime ministerial advice in this context has significant legal and practical implications, and so is judicially reviewable so long as it meets the test for justiciability; (3) he applied Black and Hupacasath and concluded that a decision to advise the governor general to prorogue parliament is not purely political or ideological but has a sufficient legal component and can be measured against legal standards, including unwritten constitutional principles, and so is justiciable; (4) he considered and rejected arguments that the prime minister's decision violated or was inconsistent with section 3 of the Charter (the right to vote) and section 5 of the Charter (mandating a parliamentary session at least once per year); and (5) he considered and rejected arguments that the prime minister's decision violated the unwritten constitutional principles of parliamentary sovereignty, parliamentary accountability (responsible government), democracy, and the rule of law. In the excerpt below, we focus only on points (2) and (5).

Federal Court of Canada

Crampton C.J.

[4] In this proceeding, the Applicants seek judicial review of the Prime Minister's decision "to advise ... the Governor General of Canada, (the "Governor General"), to exercise her prerogative power to prorogue the first session of the 44th Parliament of Canada until Monday, March 24, 2025 (the "Decision")."

...

[23] Since late September 2024, the House has been seized with a motion relating to privilege. In the intervening period prior to the prorogation, very limited other House business proceeded.

[24] On November 25, 2024, President-elect Trump posted a message on the "Truth Social" social media application ("Truth Social") advising that on his first day in office he would "sign all necessary documents to charge Mexico and Canada a 25% Tariff on ALL products coming into the United States" (the "25% Tariff"). He explained that this "Tariff will remain in effect until such time as Drugs, in particular Fentanyl, and all Illegal Aliens stop the Invasion of our Country!"

[25] Two days later, the Premiers of Canada's provinces and territories reportedly met virtually with the Prime Minister and certain senior members of the federal Cabinet to discuss the 25% Tariff.

[26] Beginning on December 10, 2024, President-elect Trump made successive posts on Truth Social in which he referred to the Prime Minister and Canada as the "Governor" and the "Great State of Canada," respectively. The President-elect also issued posts describing various benefits that Canadians could gain by becoming "the 51st State."

[27] On December 16, 2024, then-Finance Minister Chrystia Freeland resigned from Cabinet by way of an open letter. In her letter, she stated, among other things, that "[o]ur country today faces a grave challenge. The incoming administration in the United States is pursuing a policy of aggressive economic nationalism, including a threat of 25 per cent tariffs."

[28] The following afternoon, Parliament adjourned for its scheduled holiday recess. At that time, the House was scheduled to resume sittings on January 27, 2025, and to be subsequently adjourned from February 15 to February 23, and from March 1 to March 16, 2025.

[29] On January 6, 2025, the Prime Minister held a press conference at which he announced the Decision and his intention to resign as Prime Minister and as leader of the Liberal Party. He added that he had requested the president of the Liberal Party to begin the process of selecting the party's next leader.

[30] Later that day, the Canada Gazette Part II, Extra vol. 159, No. 1, was published, containing the Governor General's Proclamation Proroguing Parliament to March 24, 2025 (the "Prorogation").

[31] Prior to the Prorogation, the leaders of all major opposition parties in the House had announced their intention to vote non-confidence in the current government, as soon as there was an opportunity.

IV. The Decision

[41] As noted at paragraph 29 above, the Prime Minister announced the Decision on January 6, 2025 [speaking publicly he stated]:

> … [D]espite best efforts to work through it, Parliament has been paralyzed for months, after what has been the longest session of a minority Parliament in Canadian history.
> That's why this morning, I advised the Governor General that we need a new session of Parliament. She has granted this request, and the House will now be prorogued until March 24.
> Over the holidays, I've also had a chance to reflect and have had long talks with my family about our future. Throughout the course of my career, any success I have personally achieved has been because of their support, and with their encouragement.
> So last night over dinner, I told my kids about the decision that I'm sharing with you today. I intend to resign as party leader, as Prime Minister, after the party selects its next leader through a robust, nationwide, competitive process.
> Last night, I asked the president of the Liberal Party to begin that process. This country deserves a real choice in the next election, and it has become clear to me that if I'm having to fight internal battles, I cannot be the best option in that election.

[65] ... [T]he Applicants rely on the UKSC's [the Supreme Court of the United Kingdom's] analysis in Miller II [R (Miller) v The Prime Minister, [2019] UKSC 41]. There, a unanimous 11-member panel of the Court granted declarations and orders in relation to the advice given by Prime Minister Boris Johnson to Her Late Majesty Queen Elizabeth II that Parliament should be prorogued. In the course of its analysis, the Court appeared to treat the Prime Minister's advice-giving function and Her Late Majesty's exercise of the prerogative to prorogue to be effectively one and the same: Miller II at para 30.

[66] The Respondent maintains that Miller II is distinguishable because the UKSC assumed, without deciding, that Her Late Majesty was obliged by constitutional convention to accept Prime Minister Johnson's advice: Miller II at para 30. By contrast, the Respondent asserts that, in Canada, "many commentators take the view that … the Governor General has a discretion to refuse and certainly to 'warn and encourage' regarding a Prime Minister's request to prorogue."

[68] In these circumstances, the Respondent's contention that the Prime Minister's advice cannot affect legal rights, impose legal obligations, or cause prejudicial effects fails to reflect the reality of the situation. The Prime Minister's advice is in fact a critical lynchpin of the exercise of the Crown's prerogative to prorogue Parliament. If the Prime Minister exceeded the constitutional or other legal limits of his authority in providing that advice, the elected representatives of the people would unlawfully be prevented from performing their constitutional functions. In my view, this constitutes a sufficient adverse prejudicial effect on those elected representatives and the public at large to give this Court jurisdiction in this matter ...

[229] In support of their position that the Decision prevented Parliament from tabling a motion of non-confidence, the Applicants rely on the publicly announced intentions of the leaders of the three main opposition parties to support a motion of non-confidence in the current government, as soon as there was a confidence vote: see paragraphs 31–33 above. ...

[231] It has been recognized that the rules governing responsible government are almost entirely conventional in nature ...

[232] ... [However], letters or statements made outside Parliament cannot be accepted by this Court as evidence about confidence, and the stated intent of individual members of the House cannot be conflated with the "will of Parliament," as expressed in its actual actions ...

[234] Insofar as the matter at hand is concerned, the Respondent's uncontested evidence is that the House expressed its confidence in the government on three occasions soon before the House adjourned on December 17, 2024 for its winter recess. Specifically, on November 28, 2024, the House passed Bill C-78, An Act respecting temporary cost of living relief (affordability). On December 9, 2024, the House defeated an opposition day motion that the House had lost confidence in the government. The following day, the House passed Bill C-79, An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the federal public administration for the fiscal year ending March 31, 2025, which is generally considered a confidence matter.

[235] I can understand the Applicants' view that the situation changed on December 20, 2024, when Mr. Jagmeet Singh, the leader of the NDP, announced in an open letter to Canadians that his party would "put forward a clear motion of non-confidence in the next sitting of the House of Commons." However, as stated above, that is not reliable evidence of the House's confidence. Furthermore, it is far from clear when any motion of non-confidence likely would have been placed before the House for a vote, had the House not been prorogued. ...

[238] In the absence of any persuasive evidence as to when any motion of non-confidence likely would have been placed before the House as a whole for a vote, it is not possible to gauge the extent to which the actual effect of the Decision was to prevent a vote on a non-confidence motion that would likely have occurred significantly prior to March 24, 2025, if at all.

[239] Beyond asserting that, as a practical matter, the Decision prevented Parliament from tabling a motion of non-confidence, the Applicants assert that it was one of the intended effects of the Decision to "stymie the publicly stated intent of a majority of the House of Commons to bring a motion for non-confidence in the government."

[240] The Applicants have not demonstrated on a balance of probabilities that the intended effect of the Prime Minister's Decision was to avoid a motion for non-confidence in the House. The overall circumstances discussed above and below do not permit the Court to draw any inference in this regard.

[241] I pause to observe that the Court must always remain mindful of the SCC's teaching that the courts should refrain from unduly interfering with the other branches of government. I consider it to be implicit in this teaching that the Court should avoid drawing any inference regarding a Prime Minister's unstated intentions in relation to prorogation, in the absence of exceptional circumstances.

[270] In the prepared statement made by the Prime Minister to announce the Decision, he stated: "This country deserves a real choice in the next election, and it has become clear to me that if I'm having to fight internal battles, I cannot be the best option in that election."

[271] Elsewhere in that prepared statement, the Prime Minister stated: ”A new PM and Leader of the Liberal Party will carry its values and ideals into that next election.”

[272] The Applicants maintain that, by invoking the desirability of having a new leader to carry the Liberal Party’s ”values and ideals” into the next election, the Prime Minister conflated his role as leader of the government with his role as leader of the governing party.

[273] I recognize that, in exercising the prerogative power to prorogue Parliament, it is within the Prime Minister’s ”area of responsibility” to consider at least some ”matters of political judgment”: Miller II at para 51.

[275] It is unnecessary to make any determination on the issue of whether partisan considerations are within the scope of the Prime Minister’s authority to advise the Governor General to prorogue Parliament, because nothing turns on it. This is because it is not possible to disentangle the impugned partisan considerations from the other considerations that supported the Decision, for the purposes of making an overall finding on the issue of whether the Prime Minister exceeded the scope of his authority in making his Decision.

[280] In summary, the considerations that supported the making of the Decision by the Prime Minister included a mix of some matters that pertain to the affairs of Parliament and some partisan considerations that pertain to the Liberal Party. The Prime Minister also appears to have considered that it would be in the public interest for Canadians to have ”a real choice in the next election,” presumably as opposed to having an outgoing or interim leader representing the governing party.

[281] The Prime Minister was not obliged to give any reasons for proroguing Parliament. However, having done so, it was open to the Applicants to challenge them.

[282] While the overall circumstances are troubling, it is not possible to disentangle the various considerations identified by the Prime Minister, for the purpose of determining whether, on balance, he exceeded the scope of his constitutional and legal authority in making the Decision.

[283] The Applicants bore the burden of demonstrating on a balance of probabilities that the Prime Minister exceeded the scope of his authority in making the Decision. They failed to meet that burden.

Chapter 3: The Judiciary

By Mark Mancini

1 Introduction and Layout of the Judiciary

At Confederation, the Constitution Act, 1867 entrenched “a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.” This principle, applied to the Canadian judiciary, has certain implications. The first feature of the British system of justice is a central role for courts of inherent jurisdiction—those with the power to hear any case, subject only to statutory derogation. Historically, these superior courts controlled so-called inferior courts that did not generally have inherent subject matter jurisdiction and were established by statute or another legal instrument.

This same, unifying role for the superior courts is protected in several provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 96 vests a power of appointment in the federal government over judges of the superior courts, which supports a continuance of the unitary British system of justice. But it has also come to mean much more than that. In conjunction with ss. 99 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (security of tenure) and s.100 (salaries set by Parliament), these provisions protect the jurisdiction and independence of the superior courts, consistent with the British system of justice.

However, the framers of the Constitution Act, 1867, had to adapt the British system of unitary government to a federal system of government, in which the central and provincial governments are sovereign within their own constitutionally recognized spheres. Subject to ss.96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, provincial legislatures have the power to establish inferior courts and tribunals, under s. 92(14), “the Administration of justice in the Province”.

The result is a constitutionally protected network of superior courts within the provinces, underwritten by ss.96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Constitutional protections for superior courts limit the ability of provinces (and the federal Parliament) to vest certain types of adjudicative power in inferior statutory courts or administrative bodies. From this perspective, ss.96-101 can be seen as a restraint on each order of government’s ability to experiment with adjudication.

The courts have held that ss.96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, preclude the creation of parallel or “shadow” superior courts (Reference re Code of Civil Procedure, 2021 SCC 27) that exercise powers that are part of the historical jurisdiction of “s. 96 courts”. They have also been held to preclude either level of government from divesting those courts of an essential, core area of jurisdiction. That said—and perhaps more importantly—the unwritten principles of the constitution have extended the scope of the protections entrenched in these provisions including fixed salaries and tenure, applying them to other adjudicative bodies.

Courts in Canada are arranged hierarchically. At the top of the hierarchy is the Supreme Court of Canada. Members of the Supreme Court of Canada are appointed by the Governor General on the advice of the Prime Minister (as a practical matter, this means the federal government appoints the judges of the court). In turn, each province has its own appeal courts (the Court of Appeal for Ontario, the Court of Appeal for British Columbia, and so on), with judges appointed by the federal government under s.96. The superior courts of each province, the centrepieces of the Canadian justice system, are composed of judges also appointed by the federal government under s.96, and decisions from these courts are appealed to the Courts of Appeal in each province.

Despite the federal powers contemplated in s.96-100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, provinces also play a role in managing the courts, including superior courts – so-called s. 96 courts. Under s.92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, provinces have power over the “administration of justice” in the province, which includes the maintenance and organization of provincial courts. This empowers provincial governments to establish provincial courts, with judges appointed by the provincial government. Provincial courts are inferior statutory courts. This means that unlike the superior courts of inherent jurisdiction, provincial courts only have the powers and jurisdiction assigned by statute, and that are not part of the established jurisdiction of superior courts.

There are other statutory courts in the Canadian judicial system. The Federal Court system is the most prominent example. These courts were established under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives the federal government the power to establish courts for “the better Administration of the Laws and Canada”. These statutory courts have jurisdiction over certain matters falling within federal jurisdiction, such as federal taxation, and judicial review of the decisions of federal boards and tribunals. Like the provincial courts, the Federal Courts differ from the superior courts because their powers are confined to those explicitly or impliedly conferred by statute. The judges of the Federal Court are appointed and managed under the jurisdiction of the federal government.

This chapter proceeds in five parts. The first part explores the history and principles underlying the protected jurisdiction of the superior courts. The second part examines the two tests that the Supreme Court of Canada has constructed to protect the jurisdiction of the superior courts. The third part examines how unwritten constitutional principles have been interpreted by the courts to protect the independence of provincial courts from interference by provincial governments. Finally, in parts 5 and 6, the chapter explores the place of the Federal Courts and the Supreme Court of Canada, respectively.

2 History of the Superior Courts and Constitutional Principle

Most recently, in Reference re Code of Civil Procedure (Que), 2021 SCC 27, the Supreme Court of Canada (per Côté and Martin JJ) explained the historical significance of Canada's system of courts. Côté and Martin JJ emphasize the centrality of the so-called "s.96 courts." These are the courts contemplated in s.96 of the Constitution Act, 1867:

> 96 The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

At first blush, this provision merely provides a power of appointment. But the Supreme Court of Canada has held that it is not a "mere appointing power" (Crevier v AG Quebec, 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 SCR 220 at 237). Instead, s.96—as well as related provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 —support a "core" of protected jurisdiction in these courts.

Reference re Code of Civil Procedure explains the significance of two aspects of Canada's judicial system. First, modelled after the United Kingdom's distinction between superior courts and inferior courts, superior courts hold a special position in the constitutional structure. Judges of the superior courts are appointed by the federal government (s.96); the judges appointed to these courts carry guaranteed security of tenure (s.99(1)); and adjustments to their salaries or pensions are constitutionally granted to the federal Parliament (s.100). These provisions ensure the uniform application of law across the country—this is the unitary system referred to in Reference re Code of Civil Procedure. Second, the exclusive power of the provinces to make law in relation to the administration of justice in the province serves to recognize distinctive realities in each province.

3 Reference re Code of Civil Procedure (Que.), art. 35, 2021 SCC 27 (CanLII), [2021] 2 SCR 291

CÔTÉ AND MARTIN JJ

[29] Superior courts are the centrepiece of the unitary judicial system created by ss. 92(14), 96 to 100 and 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867. These provisions lay one of the key foundations of Canada's Constitution, as they represent the balance struck between our federation's national and provincial aspirations […]

[31] This Court's jurisprudence on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 upholds the two fundamental principles underlying this provision, namely national unity and the rule of law. The case law has sought to safeguard the compromise reached at Confederation by preserving the unitary nature of our judicial system. To achieve this objective, the Court has, over the years, developed various tests designed to protect the status of the superior courts. The creation of courts that mirror the superior courts has always been considered an important limit that cannot be overstepped. All the tests have had the purpose, among others, of precluding such an outcome. If the role of the superior courts were undermined by the creation of parallel courts, Canada's judicial system would be stripped of its unitary nature and could be transformed into a dualistic system like that of the United States.

(1) Compromise Reached at Confederation

[32] Historically, the English judicial system was based on a dichotomy between so-called inferior courts and the superior courts whose judges were appointed by the monarch (W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765), Book I, at pp. 258 and 327). The term "inferior court" was based on the fact that the powers and jurisdiction of such courts were strictly limited by their constitutions. The superior courts, on the other hand, had an inherent general jurisdiction. The advantage of the inferior courts was their accessibility; their decentralization allowed for justice to be delivered to the door of everyone in the country, whereas the royal courts were less accessible to the ordinary citizen. However, royal courts historically had more extensive legal expertise than inferior courts. For this reason, royal courts exercised a power of control and supervision over decisions of inferior courts (G. Pépin, Les tribunaux administratifs et la Constitution — Étude des articles 96 à 101 de l'A.A.N.B. (1969), at pp. 134-35, quoting Halsbury, The Laws of England (3rd ed. 1954), vol. 9, at pp. 348-50).

[33] This fundamental dichotomy was imported into the colonies of British North America. Although the colonies established a three-tiered system consisting of a superior court, intermediate courts and inferior courts, the classification of the courts of the Canadian provinces reflected the dichotomy of the English system. There were superior courts on the one hand, and the non-superior courts on the other hand (Pépin, at pp. 134-35). This judicial system was maintained until the Constitution Act, 1867 was enacted (J. Baker, An Introduction to English Legal History (5th ed. 2019), at pp. 57-59).

[34] At the time of Confederation, the founding fathers chose to establish a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom, as recognized in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. The judicial system and the constitutional arrangements passed on to us by the United Kingdom therefore constitute the historical foundation of our judicial system.

[35] However, because the founding provinces opted for a federal union rather than a unitary system like the one that existed in the United Kingdom, the British judicial system required adaptation. It was modified to take into account the fact that powers in Canada are shared by two levels of government — the provinces and the federal government.

[36] To guarantee both national unity and provincial autonomy, the Fathers of Confederation reached a compromise, creating a unitary justice system characterized by federal-provincial cooperation.[2] To begin, all courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction of the founding provinces would continue to exist (s. 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867). Thus, the distinction between superior and non-superior courts that characterized the British system was expressly maintained.

[37] In addition, s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 ensured that the provinces' exclusive power over the administration of justice would remain intact, thereby preserving their autonomy in that regard. A province could therefore reorganize its courts to reflect its own reality and needs. However, ss. 96 to 100 created an exception to the provinces' power by conferring on the federal government the power to appoint judges to the superior courts, fix their remuneration and remove them (Residential Tenancies, at p. 728). Another exception, s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, gave the federal government the power to create federal statutory courts. This power was limited, however, as such courts would be confined by their constitutional boundaries to the administration of federal laws (Windsor (City) v. Canadian Transit Co., 2016 SCC 54, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 617, at para. 33).

[39] The superior courts of the various provinces were called upon to form the cornerstone of this system and to act as a "unifying force", thereby enabling the development of the law nationwide (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 11, 29 and 37; see also Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC) , [1982] 2 S.C.R. 307, at p. 327; Reference re Young Offenders Act (P.E.I.), 1991 CanLII 11713 (SCC), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 252 , at p. 264; Reference re Amendments to the Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), 1996 CanLII 259 (SCC), [1996] 1 S.C.R. 186 (Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.)), at para. 72; Windsor, at para. 32). Because the superior courts were given an inherent general jurisdiction like that of their British predecessors, they were empowered to interpret and apply both provincial and federal law (Scowby v. Glendinning, 1986 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1986] 2 S.C.R. 226, at pp. 249-50, per La Forest J., dissenting on another point).

[40] In short, the aim of the compromise reached at Confederation was not simply to maintain the pre-existing justice system. It created a system in which responsibilities were shared between the provinces and the federal government, enabling each province to shape the judicial landscape in its own territory in accordance with local realities. Thus, there is no requirement that the judiciary be structured uniformly from one province to the next; for a province to have established its own standards or made unique choices does not in itself amount to a constitutional defect. On the contrary, ss. 92(14) and 96 work together to advance access to justice by allowing the superior courts to coexist with tribunals and courts with provincially appointed members, as long as the unitary system, of which the superior courts are the cornerstone, is preserved.

[46] The rule of law is maintained through the separation of judicial, legislative and executive functions ((A.) J. Johnson, "The Judges Reference and the Secession Reference at Twenty: Reassessing the Supreme Court of Canada's Unfinished Unwritten Constitutional Principles Project" (2019), 56 Alta. L. Rev. 1077, at pp. 1100-1101). In keeping with the principle of the separation of powers, the task of interpreting, applying and stating the law falls primarily to the judiciary (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC) , [1985] 1 S.C.R. 721, at p. 744; British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 50).

[47] This separation allows the courts to implement the three fundamental facets of the rule of law: equality of all before the law, the creation and maintenance of an actual order of positive laws, and oversight of the exercise of public powers (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, at pp. 748-51; Imperial Tobacco, at para. 58; Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 1996 CanLII 152 (SCC) , [1996] 3 S.C.R. 854, at para. 16). Historically, the superior courts had primary responsibility for this task.

[48] Thus, in order to preserve the superior courts' role as the cornerstone of the judicial system, they must be able to continue acting as primary guardians of the rule of law as they always have (MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 29; Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at para. 26, per Lamer C.J., concurring; W. R. Lederman, "The Independence of the Judiciary" (1956), 34 Can. Bar Rev. 769, 1139, at p. 1178; A. Lamer, "The Rule of Law and Judicial Independence: Protecting Core Values in Times of Change" (1996), 45 U.N.B.L.J. 3, at p. 11; L. Huppé, Le régime juridique du pouvoir judiciaire (2000), at pp. 10-11). This role falls to the superior courts because they are ideally placed to ensure the maintenance of the rule of law (Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at paras. 26, per Lamer C.J., concurring, and 72, per McLachlin J. for the majority).

[49] In light of Canada's constitutional architecture, the superior courts are in the best position to preserve the various facets of the rule of law. Because of their independence and national character, they are best suited to resolving disputes over the division of powers between the provinces and the federal government and ensuring that government actions do not conflict with the fundamental rights of citizens (see Amax Potash Ltd. v. Government of Saskatchewan, 1976 CanLII 15 (SCC) , [1977] 2 S.C.R. 576, at p. 590; D. P. Jones, "A Constitutionally Guaranteed Role for the Courts" (1979), 57 Can. Bar Rev. 669, at p. 675). Moreover, the superior courts' existence and status enjoy constitutional protection against legislative interference (Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at paras. 72-73; Trial Lawyers, at para. 30). As a result, the superior courts need not rely on statutorily conferred powers to fully exercise their judicial functions.

4 The Section 96 tests

In determining whether the establishment of a particular tribunal interferes with the jurisdiction of the superior courts, the Supreme Court of Canada has developed two tests. The first test—the so-called Residential Tenancies test—asks whether the province or federal government has transferred a power that is part of the historic jurisdiction of the superior courts to a statutory body that is not a superior court under s.96.

The second, the "core jurisdiction" test—asks whether a core element of the superior court's jurisdiction has been removed by the legislature, even if the removal of this jurisdiction is not inconsistent with the Residential Tenancies test. The core jurisdiction test protects central features of the s. 96 courts, as they exist today, that are necessary to the exercise their functions as courts of law.

DICKSON J.—The resolution of disputes between landlords and tenants has long been a central preoccupation of the common law courts. As early as 1587, Lord Coke observed that the law of landlord and tenant was vital since, "for the most part, every man is a lessor or a lessee". […]

Within the past few years the Province of Ontario, in common with a number of other provinces, has enacted legislation to redress what was perceived to be an imbalance, in favour of landlords, in the landlord and tenant relationship. On June 21, 1979, the Legislative Assembly of Ontario enacted The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1979 (Ont.), c. 78, to come into effect on proclamation. The Act contains a detailed legislative code to govern landlords and tenants and establishes a tribunal, bearing the name the Residential Tenancy Commission, to oversee and enforce the newly enunciated rights and obligations. Questions having been raised as to the authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to empower the Commission to make orders evicting tenants from residential premises and to require landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under the Act, the Executive Council of the Province, pursuant to s. 1 of The Constitutional Questions Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 79, referred the following questions to the Court of Appeal of Ontario for hearing and consideration:

1. Is it within the legislative authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario to empower the Residential Tenancy Commission to make an order evicting a tenant as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979?

2. Is it within the legislative authority of the Legislative Assembly of Ontario as provided in The Residential Tenancies Act, 1979 to empower the Residential Tenancy Commission to make orders requiring landlords and tenants to comply with obligations imposed under that Act?

The jurisprudence since John East leads one to conclude that the test must now be formulated in three steps. The first involves consideration, in the light of the historical conditions existing in 1867, of the particular power or jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal. The question here is whether the power or jurisdiction conforms to the power or jurisdiction exercised by superior, district or county courts at the time of Confederation. This temporary segregation, or isolation, of the impugned power is not for the purpose of turning back the clock and restoring Toronto v. York as the governing authority, an approach deplored in Mississauga. It is rather the first step in a three step process.

If the historical inquiry leads to the conclusion that the power or jurisdiction is not broadly conformable to jurisdiction formerly exercised by s. 96 courts, that is the end of the matter. As Rand J. noted in Dupont et al v. Inglis et al.[26], "Judicial power not of that type, [i.e. that exercised by s. 96 courts at Confederation] such as that exercised by inferior courts, can be conferred on a provincial tribunal whatever its primary character" (p. 542). If, however, the historical evidence indicates that the impugned power is identical or analogous to a power exercised by s. 96 courts at Confederation, then one must proceed to the second step of the inquiry.

Step two involves consideration of the function within its institutional setting to determine whether the function itself is different when viewed in that setting. In particular, can the function still be considered to be a 'judicial' function? In addressing the issue, it is important to keep in mind the further statement by Rand J. in Dupont v. Inglis that "…it is the subject-matter rather than the apparatus of adjudication that is determinative". Thus the question of whether any particular function is 'judicial' is not to be determined simply on the basis of procedural trappings. The primary issue is the nature of the question which the tribunal is called upon to decide. Where the tribunal is faced with a private dispute between parties, and is called upon to adjudicate through the application of a recognized body of rules in a manner consistent with fairness and impartiality, then, normally, it is acting in a 'judicial capacity'. To borrow the terminology of Professor Ronald Dworkin, the judicial task involves questions of 'principle', that is, consideration of the competing rights of individuals or groups. This can be contrasted with questions of 'policy' involving competing views of the collective good of the community as a whole. (See Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (Duckworth, 1977) pp. 82-90.)

If, after examining the institutional context, it becomes apparent that the power is not being exercised as a "judicial power" then the inquiry need go no further for the power, within its institutional context, no longer conforms to a power or jurisdiction exercisable by a s. 96 court and the provincial scheme is valid. On the other hand, if the power or jurisdiction is exercised in a judicial manner, then it becomes necessary to proceed to the third and final step in the analysis and review the tribunal's function as a whole in order to appraise the impugned function in its entire institutional context. The phrase—'it is not the detached jurisdiction or power alone that is to be considered but rather its setting in the institutional arrangements in which it appears'—is the central core of the judgment in Tomko. It is no longer sufficient simply to examine the particular power or function of a tribunal and ask whether this power or function was once exercised by s. 96 courts. This would be examining the power or function in a 'detached' manner, contrary to the reasoning in Tomko. What must be considered is the 'context' in which this power is exercised. Tomko leads to the following result: it is possible for administrative tribunals to exercise powers and jurisdiction which once were exercised by the s. 96courts. It will all depend on the context of the exercise of the power. It may be that the impugned 'judicial powers' are merely subsidiary or ancillary to general administrative functions assigned to the tribunal (John East; Tomko) or the powers may be necessarily incidental to the achievement of a broader policy goal of the legislature (Mississauga). In such a situation, the grant of judicial power to provincial appointees is valid. The scheme is only invalid when the adjudicative function is a sole or central function of the tribunal (Farrah) so that the tribunal can be said to be operating 'like a s. 96 court'.

Step one, the historical inquiry. The Residential Tenancy Commission is given a broad range of powers under the Act: in this reference, as I have noted, we are concerned with only two, power to make an eviction order and power to make a 'compliance' order. These powers recur constantly throughout the Act; there are nineteen separate provisions which empower the Commission to make an eviction order and seventeen separate provisions empowering the Commission to make a compliance order. Illustrations of the former are found in s. 36(2)(c) (eviction for non-payment of rent); s. 38(3)(d) (eviction for interference with safety or enjoyment of landlord or other tenants); s. 41(2)(c) (eviction for carrying on of illegal activity); and s. 51(1) (eviction where landlord requires premises for own use or for sale). Illustrations of the latter power are found in s. 28(4)(a) (landlord may be ordered to comply with obligation to repair); s. 29(2)(a) (obligation to supply vital services); s. 37(2)(a) (tenant to repair damage wilfully or negligently caused by him). In contrast, the impugned power in Tomko to issue "cease and desist" orders was found in one subs., 49(2), forming part of a legislative scheme of some 103 sections.

Section 84(1) of The Residential Tenancies Act, subject to certain exceptions, gives the Commission "exclusive jurisdiction to examine into, hear and determine all matters and questions arising under this Act and as to any matter or thing in respect of which any power, authority or discretion is conferred upon the Commission". Section 116(1) permits the filing of a Commission order evicting a tenant in the County or District Court and states that such order once filed: "has the same force and effect and all proceedings may be taken on it, as if it were an order of that court, and the clerk of the court shall issue a writ of possession".

The Ontario Court of Appeal held that the power to order eviction was analogous to the traditional power of the courts to order the ejectment of a tenant, while the power to order compliance was analogous to the power of the courts to award damages or specific performance or to grant injunctive relief. This finding was not challenged on the hearing of this appeal. The Attorney General for Ontario conceded that the powers given to the Residential Tenancy Commission "…are not merely analogous to those [pre-1867] powers but are the same powers".

We pass now to the second step of the inquiry, to consideration of the impugned powers within their institutional setting. Is the power to order eviction or compliance when so viewed still a 'judicial power'? I have already indicated that the hallmark of a judicial power is a lis between parties in which a tribunal is called upon to apply a recognized body of rules in a manner consistent with fairness and impartiality. The adjudication deals primarily with the rights of the parties to the dispute, rather than considerations of the collective good of the community as a whole.

With very few exceptions, the Residential Tenancy Commission is not free to intervene of its own motion in disputes between landlords and tenants. Virtually all of the provisions of the Act require that either a landlord or a tenant apply to the Commission before any action be taken. Moreover, the power to order eviction or compliance will, in all case, be exercised in the context of a lis between parties. This is so even where a. third party may invoke the Commission's intervention. Under s. 29, for example, a Public Utility may notify the Commission that its service has been or is likely to be stopped, and the Commission may intervene. But s. 29 goes on to provide that the Commission shall determine whether a particular landlord is breaching his obligation to supply vital services to his tenants. Thus there will clearly be a lis between parties and an issue to be resolved.

When confronted with a lis, the task of the Commission will be to determine the respective rights and obligations of the parties according to the terms of the legislation. The Commission does not have an untrammelled discretion to 'set matters right'. The powers which it may invoke and the remedies which it may award are circumscribed by the terms of the Act. At no point is the individual's right at law surrendered for the benefit of a common group or policy. The Commission deals exclusively with matters of contract and land law as they arise between landlords and tenants.

The Commission has authority to hear and determine disputes in accordance with rules of law, and by the authority of the law. It authorizes actions for which application is made. It has the power to impose penalties and sanctions and to award remedies for the infringement of rights. Disobedience of an order of the Commission is a penal offence. The Commission decides contractual and property rights between individual landlords and tenants and in so doing determines not only the right to land and property, but also other rights. In each case, there is an analysis of the law, an application of the applicable law to the particular facts, and then a judicial decision and a consequent order. It is difficult to conceive that when so acting the Commission acts otherwise than as a curial tribunal. In substance the tribunal is exercising judicial powers roughly in the same way as they are exercised by the courts.

We now face the most difficult aspect of this appeal—an examination of the inter-relationship between the Commission's impugned 'judicial powers' and the other powers and jurisdiction conferred under the Act.

There is no broad legislative scheme as there was in Mississauga, supra, to subsume the judicial functions of the Commission. It was argued that the powers vested in the Residential Tenancy Commission were merely incidental or ancillary to the policy of "security of tenure" for tenants. This submission is unconvincing. The primary purpose and effect of the 1979 Act was to transfer jurisdiction over a large and important body of law, affecting landlords and tenants of one million rental units, from the s. 96 courts where it has been administered since Confederation to a provincially appointed tribunal.

Here the chief role of the Commission is not to administer a policy or to carry out an administrative function. Its primary role is to adjudicate. The administrative features of the legislation can be characterized as ancillary to the main adjudicative function. The power of the Commission to mediate disputes is aimed at the speedy resolution of differences between the parties. So too is the informal nature of the proceedings. The goal of these provisions is to enable the Commission to 'process' controversies in an expeditious manner. As such, they are merely incidental to the main purpose of the legislation.

In the result, I would dismiss the appeal, and answer in the negative the constitutional questions which have been posed by the Executive Council of the Province of Ontario. No question of costs arises.

6 Sobeys Stores v Yeomans and Labour Standards Tribunal (NS), 1989 CanLII 116 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 238

In the next case, the Supreme Court of Canada (per Wilson J) offered three clarifications to the Residential Tenancies test. These clarifications mostly pertain to the first branch of the test. Sobey's also explains the function of each of the branches of the Residential Tenancies test. The first branch is designed to preserve, as much as possible, the historical jurisdiction of the superior courts. The second and third branches are designed to "save" grants of jurisdiction that nonetheless replicate the historical jurisdiction of the superior court. So long as the adjudicative power is sufficiently integrated in a valid scheme of regulation, it is ancillary to the provincial regulation, and is therefore valid.

WILSON J

The Appeal Division correctly held that the test to be applied in s. 96 cases is that laid down by this Court in the Residential Tenancies case. This three-step test represents a consolidation of the principles enunciated in a number of previous decisions, in particular The Adoption Reference, 1938 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1938] S.C.R. 398; John East Iron Works, Ld., supra; and Tomko v. Labour Relations Board (Nova Scotia), 1975 CanLII 183 (SCC), [1977] 1 S.C.R. 112 . The first stage requires us to consider whether "the challenged power or jurisdiction broadly conform[s] to the power or jurisdiction exercised by Superior, District or County Courts at the time of Confederation": per Laskin C.J. in Massey-Ferguson Industries Ltd. v. Saskatchewan, 1981 CanLII 209 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 413 , at p. 429. But before addressing this question it is necessary to examine three preliminary issues which were raised during the hearing of the appeal:

(1) how broadly should the power or jurisdiction be characterized for purposes of the historical analysis?

(2) do the words "broadly conform" to Superior Court jurisdiction mean that such jurisdiction must have been exclusive to those courts at Confederation?

(3) should the court look only at the jurisdiction of the courts of the province in which the case arose or should the inquiry embrace all or most of the provinces?

(i)Characterization of the Power or Jurisdiction at Issue

In argument before this Court both the Attorney General of Nova Scotia (appellant) and the respondent Sobeys initially characterized the jurisdiction under s. 67A as jurisdiction in relation to the equitable remedy of specific performance of employment contracts. Each argued that such a characterization would be determinative in his favour, the appellant because traditionally the courts did not grant such a remedy and the respondent because the remedy, whether actually granted or not, was equitable and therefore clearly part of the exclusive jurisdiction of superior courts at Confederation. This was not, however, the only characterization offered to the Court. When the argument progressed to the second and third stages of the Residential Tenancies test the same parties suggested broader characterizations such as "unjust dismissal", "employer-employee relations" and "labour standards". Counsel for the other appellant, Yeomans, argued consistently throughout that the jurisdiction was over "master-servant relations". In the Appeal Division, Hart J.A., while rejecting the argument that specific performance of an employment contract was not a superior court power just because the remedy was never granted, characterized s. 67A as a provision relating to "unjust dismissal". In so doing he rendered nugatory the arguments over specific performance.

It seems to me that this raises two problems pertaining to the characterization of the jurisdiction. How broadly should it be characterized, and can a broader or narrower characterization be used for the different steps of the Residential Tenancies test? These questions do not appear to have been canvassed in any previous decision of the Court, yet they could clearly be important. The way in which the power or jurisdiction is characterized can have significant consequences for the historical inquiry in which the courts must search for analogous jurisdiction in inferior courts. Although in the present case both the Attorney General and Sobeys saw an advantage for themselves in a narrow characterization, that is probably only so because of the unusual remedy at issue. In general, those challenging legislation will probably favour the narrower view as more likely to bring success through the historical test. Those supporting the legislation will no doubt advocate a more expansive view on the assumption that the broader the characterization the more likely it will be that at least some aspects of the jurisdiction will have been within the purview of inferior courts at Confederation.

To resolve these questions on characterization one must look to the different purposes served by the three stages of the Residential Tenancies test. The test represents a reconciliation of jurisprudence from two different types of cases, those that dealt with attempted expansions of inferior court jurisdiction and those that involved the assignment of subject areas of superior court jurisdiction to administrative tribunals. This distinction between the two principal types of s. 96 cases was noted in a different context by then Chief Justice Laskin in Re B.C. Family Relations Act, 1982 CanLII 155 (SCC), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 62, at p. 68. The first line of cases establish the proposition that, while the jurisdiction of the inferior courts will not be frozen as of the date of Confederation, neither will it be substantially expanded so as to undermine the independence of the judiciary which s. 96 protects: see The Adoption Reference, supra; Re B.C. Family Relations Act, supra; Séminaire de Chicoutimi v. Cité de Chicoutimi, 1972 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1973] S.C.R. 681; Re Cour de Magistrat de Québec, 1965 CanLII 46 (CSC), [1965] S.C.R. 772; Canadian Broadcasting Corporation v. Quebec Police Commission, 1979 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1979] 2 S.C.R. 618. The second line of cases, those dealing with administrative tribunals, provide what might be called permissible exceptions to the constitutional stricture against the reduction of superior court jurisdiction. The courts have recognized that s. 96 should not stand in the way of new institutional approaches to social or political problems. Departures from the strict rule against devolving superior court jurisdiction on inferior tribunals are permitted only if the scheme meets the criteria of the second or third stage of the test. Otherwise bald grants of superior court jurisdiction to inferior courts are precluded.

Viewed against this background the first step of the Residential Tenancies test, which is drawn from the "inferior court" cases, represents a kind of threshold test, a method of deciding whether, in a formal sense, s. 96 has been violated at all. The second and third steps serve to validate some legislative schemes despite the fact that they trench on the traditional jurisdiction of s. 96 courts. The purposes of s. 96 require a strict, that is to say a narrow, approach to characterization at the first stage. Given what I have to say below on concurrent superior/inferior court jurisdiction at Confederation, any other approach would potentially open the door to large accretions of jurisdiction and thereby defeat the purposes of the constitutional provision. I would therefore reject as too broad characterizations of the s. 67A jurisdiction as being in relation to employer/employee relations or labour standards.

Having rejected broad characterizations, the court is given a choice between two possible narrow ones, jurisdiction over reinstatement or jurisdiction over unjust dismissal. Dealing with a very similar provision in the Quebec Labour Standards Act that province's Court of Appeal in Asselin v. Industries Abex Ltée, 1985 CanLII 3414 (QC CA), [1985] C.A. 72, 22 D.L.R. (4th) 212, characterized the jurisdiction as being in relation to the mandatory performance of an employment contract. As a result Nolan J.A. concluded that reinstatement "was not a power which the s. 96 courts could exercise in Lower Canada before Confederation" (p. 89 C.A., p. 236 D.L.R.)

I would, however, reject this characterization, preferring again to resolve the issue by reference to the language and purpose of the Residential Tenancies test. At the first stage the search is for "broad conformity" with the powers of s. 96 courts at Confederation. It is a search for analogous, not precisely the same, jurisdiction. Even if I were to accept the appellant's contention that the remedy of reinstatement was outside the purview of s. 96 courts, as was done in Asselin, I do not think that should be determinative in s. 96 cases. To do so would be to freeze the jurisdiction of those courts at 1867 by a technical analysis of remedies. It is, in my view, the type of dispute that must guide us and not the particular remedy sought. The question of new remedies for traditional causes of action is better suited to the second and third steps of the Residential Tenancies test which are specifically designed to allow the courts to consider new approaches to old problems, approaches which are more responsive to changing social conditions. Thus, the jurisdiction in this case should, in my view, be characterized as jurisdiction in relation to unjust dismissal.

The fact that the different stages of the Residential Tenancies test serve different purposes also, in my view, militates against any "broadening" of the characterization as the analysis progresses from one stage to another. The characterization chosen is irrelevant to a consideration at stage two of whether the Tribunal is functioning judicially or not. A broad characterization at the third stage would be equally unnecessary because this aspect of the test requires the courts to view the particular power or jurisdiction within a broad context. Thus, in this case, for example, a broadening of the characterization to "labour standards" would require the court to assess whether such a power or jurisdiction is "so integrated with the valid regulatory regime" (Residential Tenancies, at p. 736) of labour standards legislation as to take on a different character. The inquiry would have become a tautological one and the Residential Tenancies test would be deprived of its essential purpose.

The Appeal Division held that jurisdiction over unjust dismissal was exclusively the preserve of Nova Scotia's superior courts in 1867. In his reasons for judgment Hart J.A., speaking for the Court, said at p. 399:

> This was not the type of jurisdiction exercised by any of the inferior courts in existence at that time....The action for wrongful dismissal in Nova Scotia has always been commenced and conducted in the superior courts.

The appellants presented historical evidence in this Court to demonstrate that inferior courts also exercised jurisdiction over unjust dismissal and other breaches of employment contracts. They do not deny that the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia dealt with such matters but argue that because various inferior courts also did so the legislation can be upheld under the historical test. The relevance of such evidence of "shared jurisdiction" depends on the resolution of an issue left uncertain by previous judgments of this Court. It is obvious that at the first stage s. 96 will be violated if provincial tribunals are accorded a power or jurisdiction that belonged exclusively to s. 96 courts at Confederation. It is equally trite law that there will be no violation if the power or jurisdiction was the exclusive preserve of inferior courts. These propositions, however, leave unclear what the consequences are of discovering a shared, or concurrent, jurisdiction between the two levels of court. Moreover, if concurrent jurisdiction will enable the provincial tribunal to pass the historical test, it is necessary to ask how much shared jurisdiction will suffice for this purpose.

The foregoing leads me to conclude that a certain gloss must be added to the Residential Tenancies test. At the first step, the threshold question is whether at Confederation superior courts exercised an exclusive jurisdiction. This test accords with the general principle that inferior court jurisdiction need not be frozen at its pre-Confederation level: see Re Cour de Magistrat de Québec, supra. If the jurisdiction was exclusive to superior courts, then the inquiry must pass on to the second and third stages of the test. If the jurisdiction was shared, the legislation under challenge may, in some circumstances, be held valid by the historical test.

How much concurrent jurisdiction is necessary for the purposes of the test? It would obviously largely defeat the purpose of s. 96 if a finding of one small aspect of jurisdiction, limited, for example, by subject matter, geography or monetary amount, in an inferior court were sufficient to permit legislatures to oust the jurisdiction of today's superior courts. However, the dangers of this are not as great as they might at first sight appear, given what I have said earlier about the need to characterize the power or jurisdiction relatively narrowly for the purposes of the historical test. Yet they must be borne in mind in fashioning a test of general application.

In my view the correct approach to this problem can be found in Grondin. Chouinard J. summarized inferior court jurisdiction in the following manner at pp. 379-81:

> The Commissioners' Court accordingly had a certain jurisdiction over relations between lessors and lessees, since attachments for rent are the procedure by which a lessor may, in order to guarantee his rights, obtain a seizure before judgment of movables found on the premises and belonging to the lessee (art. 734 C.C.P. and art. 1637 C.C.).
> The Commissioners' Courts were created in 1821 by 1 Geo. IV, c. 2, titled the Act for the summary Trial of certain small causes in the Country Parishes of this Province . . . .
> The jurisdiction of the Commissioners was undoubtedly very limited as to territory and amount, the latter being $25 in 1867. However, I would add that according to the submissions made by the Attorney General of Quebec and the Régie du logement, which were not contradicted, there were 222 localities in Quebec in 1867 which had a Commissioners' Court, and such courts continued until 1960 . . . .
> Further, arts. 1217 and 1219 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1867 conferred jurisdiction on the Recorder's Court in certain cities over disputes between lessors and lessees . . . .
> It should be noted that at that time the Montreal Recorder's Court had the same jurisdiction and powers over lessor-lessee relations as the Superior Court and the Circuit Court under the same Act, titled the Act respecting Lessors and Lessees, C.S.L.C. 1861, c. 40. The jurisdiction and powers were however limited to "cases where the consideration or annual value of the property occupied shall not exceed the sum of one hundred dollars, and which shall apply to premises or real estate situate within the limits of the said city".
> Not only did the Montreal Recorder's Court have jurisdiction over this matter in 1867, but art. 1217 of the C.C.P., 1867, recognized that jurisdiction over lessor and lessee relations could be conferred on lower courts.

Thus, in Grondin, although inferior court jurisdiction was subject to pecuniary limits, it was province-wide and included most matters of dispute between landlords and tenants. Chouinard J. found sufficient jurisdiction to uphold the provincial legislation.

> It seems to me that in Grondin this Court laid down a test which requires the practical involvement of inferior courts to have been broadly co-extensive with the work of superior courts. This is not to suggest that jurisdiction must have been entirely or even generally concurrent, for the nature of the inferior-superior court distinction will invariably mean that the former's jurisdiction was limited in some way. But some limits will be more significant than others. A significant geographical limitation would tell against the legislative scheme much more than a purely pecuniary limit. The former might well have prevented recourse to the inferior courts for the majority of colonial residents, while the latter, given inflation, would be a much less dramatic bar. The courts must search for what I would term a general shared involvement in a jurisdiction, not concurrent jurisdiction in all respects. It is impossible to define with precision just how much jurisdiction is enough for a finding of shared involvement in all cases. But the following questions, in my view, are relevant:
> (a) was the inferior court jurisdiction geographically restricted? Was it confined to certain municipal or district courts or was it being exercised province-wide?
> (b) was the inferior court jurisdiction limited to a few specific situations? For example, in the area of unjust dismissal, did only certain types of employees have recourse to the inferior courts?
> (c) was the inferior court jurisdiction restricted by pecuniary limits so as to reduce its scope even after allowing for inflation?
> These are by no means the only questions the courts should address and I proffer them by way of illustration only. Others will appear germane in different contexts. In all cases, however, the inquiry should be directed to the question whether or not the work of the inferior courts at the time of Confederation was broadly co-extensive with that of the superior courts. Only if this standard is met will the history of shared jurisdiction validate the contemporary scheme under the historical test.
> (iii)Extent of the Historical Inquiry
> Once this principle is accepted, it seems to me unavoidable to conclude that the Residential Tenancies test of 1867 jurisdiction should be expanded somewhat to include examination of the general historical conditions in all four original confederating provinces. I say this for two reasons. The first is a practical one. While it might make sense to examine only Ontario in an Ontario case (as was done in Residential Tenancies) or Quebec in a Quebec case (as was done in Grondin) there would be no reason to choose one or the other in deciding a case emanating from Alberta, Prince Edward Island or elsewhere.
> The second and more important reason is that implicit in what I have said above is the principle that s. 96 should apply in the same way across the country. The "strong constitutional base for national unity, through a unitary judicial system" (Residential Tenancies, at p. 728) would indeed be undermined by inconsistent results derived from a jurisprudence developed province by province. Indeed, this has already occurred. The Ontario legislative scheme which was struck down in Residential Tenancies was practically indistinguishable from the Quebec scheme upheld in Grondin. Comparable landlord and tenant legislation in Alberta was invalidated while that of British Columbia and Nova Scotia survived s. 96 challenges: see, respectively, Reference Re Proposed Legislation Concerning Leased Premises and Tenancy Agreements (1978), 1978 ALTASCAD 264 (CanLII), 89 D.L.R. (3d) 460 (Alta. C.A.); Re Pepita and Doukas (1979), 1979 CanLII 757 (BC CA), 101 D.L.R. (3d) 577 (B.C.C.A.); and Re Fort Massey Realties and Rent Review Commission (1982), 1982 CanLII 2957 (NS CA), 132 D.L.R. (3d) 516 (N.S.C.A.) Similarly, reinstatement provisions in employment standards legislation have suffered conflicting fates under the historical test in this case and in Asselin.

After Sobey's, and in Reference re Code of Civil Procedure, the Supreme Court of Canada helpfully summarized the status of the Residential Tenancies test:

> [59] Finally, in Residential Tenancies, our Court articulated the three-step test that remains in use today, subject to a few modifications introduced in subsequent cases:
> • Characterization of the grant of jurisdiction: To determine whether a grant of jurisdiction is constitutionally infirm, a court must first properly characterize the jurisdiction being transferred.
> • Three steps:
> (1) Does the transferred jurisdiction conform to a jurisdiction that was dominated by superior, district or county courts at the time of Confederation?
> (2) If so, was the jurisdiction in question exercised in the context of a judicial function?

(3) If the first two questions are answered in the affirmative, is the jurisdiction either subsidiary or ancillary to an administrative function or necessarily incidental to the achievement of a broader policy goal of the legislature?

(pp. 734-36; Attorney General of Quebec v. Grondin, 1983 CanLII 165 (SCC) , [1983] 2 S.C.R. 364 ; Sobeys, at p. 266; Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at paras. 32, per Lamer C.J., concurring, and 74, per McLachlin J. (as she then was) for the majority)

7 Core Jurisdiction

Even if a particular grant of jurisdiction survives the three-part Residential Tenancies test, the Supreme Court of Canada has articulated a second test to ensure the preservation of the "core" superior court powers. In Reference re Code of Civil Procedure, the Supreme Court of Canada explained the relationship between the Residential Tenancies test and the "core jurisdiction test" in this way:

> [64] Until MacMillan Bloedel, this Court's decisions protected the superior courts' role by limiting grants of their historical jurisdiction. In MacMillan Bloedel, the Court applied the three-step Residential Tenancies test to an exclusive grant to youth courts of the power to punish young persons for ex facie contempt of court — a power that was traditionally exercised by superior courts. The application of that test was seen as deficient because it did not prevent the removal of this significant power from the superior courts. This Court thought it was necessary to interpret the nucleus of the superior courts as also protecting their core jurisdiction (Sobeys, at p. 264). Otherwise, there was a risk that gaps in the Residential Tenancies test would undermine the role of superior courts either by allowing the creation of parallel courts with certain powers essential to the superior courts' role or by allowing the defining features of superior courts to be removed.
> [65] To preserve the essence of the superior courts, this Court therefore added a second test to the analysis of constitutionality under s. 96. It held that when the core jurisdiction of superior courts is affected, courts must ask whether the legislation has the effect of removing any of the attributes of the superior courts' core jurisdiction (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 18 and 27). Core jurisdiction includes "critically important jurisdictions which are essential to the existence of a superior court of inherent jurisdiction and to the preservation of its foundational role within our legal system" (Reference re Residential Tenancies Act (N.S.), at para. 56, per Lamer C.J., concurring). These defining features enable a superior court "to fulfil itself as a court of law" (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 30, 35 and 38 (emphasis deleted), quoting I. H. Jacob, "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1970), 23 Current Legal Problems 23, at p. 27). Their "inherent" nature is attributable to the fact that they are derived not from legislation, but "from the very nature of the court as a superior court of law" (para. 30, quoting Jacob, at p. 27). If such an attribute is removed, the measure is unconstitutional.

7.1 MacMillan Bloedel Ltd v Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 SCR 725

MacMillan Bloedel was one of the first cases to explain the scope, significance, and constitutional status of the core jurisdiction test. As you read Lamer CJC's opinion, consider several points. First, as Lamer CJC explains, the Residential Tenancies test limits the ability of Parliament or a provincial legislature to grant exclusive authority to a statutory body to adjudicate disputes as part of an integrated regulatory regime. Second, and importantly, the "core jurisdiction" test is concerned not with whether a legislature can grant a particular power, but whether it can remove such a power from the jurisdiction of the superior courts. The import of MacMillan Bloedel is that certain "core" functions of the superior courts cannot be removed from these courts, except by constitutional amendment.

MacMillan Bloedel provides a good example of this. Lamer CJC explains that the power to punish youth for ex facie contempt of court is an inherent power of the superior courts. For that reason, Parliament's attempt to remove this function from the courts and vest it in in a statutory, inferior youth court was unconstitutional.

> 26 Having settled on a characterization of the power being transferred, the three branches of the Residential Tenancies test are quickly dealt with in this case. Power to punish youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts was within the jurisdiction of superior courts at Confederation. Under the second branch of the test, this power obviously remains judicial in nature even in its new institutional setting. Nonetheless, when considering the institutional function of the youth courts, a transfer of this power is permissible. As we elaborated in Reference re Young Offenders Act, the policy objectives of the youth court system are clear and laudable. Our society wishes to establish different treatment for youths accused of criminal offences than for adults. Youth courts have an expertise in providing procedural protections appropriate for youths and in deciding punishments for convicted young offenders. The power to punish youths for ex facie contempt of superior courts is indeed a mere ancillary to these primary functions. Accordingly, granting jurisdiction to punish youth for ex facie contempt of superior courts does not infringe s. 96. What remains to be considered, however, is whether this jurisdiction can be granted to the exclusion of superior courts.
> 28 To determine whether either Parliament or a provincial legislature may remove part of the superior court's jurisdiction, we must consider the contours and contents of the "core" or "inherent" jurisdiction of superior courts. On the facts of this appeal, the British Columbia Supreme Court being the superior court involved, we need only consider whether this jurisdiction can be removed from superior courts of general jurisdiction, that is, the provincial superior courts. Whether jurisdiction to punish youth for ex facie contempt of statutorily constituted superior courts can be removed from those courts is a question for another day since neither the parties nor the courts below addressed the issue of whether a distinction might exist between these two kinds of superior courts.
> 29 The seminal article on the core or inherent jurisdiction of superior courts is I. H. Jacob's "The Inherent Jurisdiction of the Court" (1970), 23 Current Legal Problems 23. Jacob's work is a starting point for many discussions of the subject, figures prominently in analyses of contempt of court, and was cited with approval by Dickson C.J. in B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214 . While the particular focus of Jacob's work is the High Court of Justice in England, he notes that "[t]he English doctrine of the inherent jurisdiction of the court is reflected in most, if not all, other common law jurisdictions, though not so extensively in the United States" (p. 23, fn. 1). Moreover, the English judicial system is the historic basis of our system and is explicitly imported into the Canadian context by the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867. The superior courts of general jurisdiction are as much the cornerstone of our judicial system as they are of the system which is Jacob's specific referent.
> 30 Discussing the history of inherent jurisdiction, Jacob says (at p. 25):
> > . . . the superior courts of common law have exercised the power which has come to be called "inherent jurisdiction" from the earliest times, and . . . the exercise of such power developed along two paths, namely, by way of punishment for contempt of court and of its process, and by way of regulating the practice of the court and preventing the abuse of its process.
> While inherent jurisdiction may be difficult to define, it is of paramount importance to the existence of a superior court. The full range of powers which comprise the inherent jurisdiction of a superior court are, together, its "essential character" or "immanent attribute". To remove any part of this core emasculates the court, making it something other than a superior court.

37 Commenting on the constitutional jurisprudence regarding courts, Cromwell, supra, concludes (at p. 1032):

> Thus, through generous interpretation of the constitutional provisions governing appointment and independence of provincial superior court judges and a restrictive reading of the constitutional limits of jurisdiction on the Federal Court, the primacy of the provincial superior courts in constitutional judicial review has been maintained. The basic proposition is that the Canadian conception of constitutional judicial review is deeply committed to the supervisory role of the provincial superior courts, that is, the general jurisdiction trial courts in each province.

> In the constitutional arrangements passed on to us by the British and recognized by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, the provincial superior courts are the foundation of the rule of law itself. Governance by rule of law requires a judicial system that can ensure its orders are enforced and its process respected. In Canada, the provincial superior court is the only court of general jurisdiction and as such is the centre of the judicial system. None of our statutory courts has the same core jurisdiction as the superior court and therefore none is as crucial to the rule of law. To remove the power to punish contempt ex facie by youths would maim the institution which is at the heart of our judicial system. Destroying part of the core jurisdiction would be tantamount to abolishing the superior courts of general jurisdiction, which is impermissible without constitutional amendment.

38 The core jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts comprises those powers which are essential to the administration of justice and the maintenance of the rule of law. It is unnecessary in this case to enumerate the precise powers which compose inherent jurisdiction, as the power to punish for contempt ex facie is obviously within that jurisdiction. The power to punish for all forms of contempt is one of the defining features of superior courts […]

What is in the core jurisdiction of the superior courts? MacMillan Bloedel did not offer an exhaustive list of these powers. However, the Supreme Court of Canada has opted for a broad and evolutive approach to the content of the core. In Reference re Code of Civil Procedure, it said the following:

> [67] The emergence of a test protecting core jurisdiction thus marks a change in direction. Unlike the Residential Tenancies test, the core jurisdiction analysis is not primarily historical in nature. It is the very essence of the superior courts that is protected. The content of the core jurisdiction is therefore not limited to what the superior courts exercised exclusively at the time of Confederation. It extends to whatever is needed in order to preserve the vigour and strength of those courts. The protected powers and jurisdiction are solidly anchored in the role the superior courts are called upon to play in the maintenance of the rule of law in our unitary justice system (MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 37-38 and 41).

> [68] The content of the core jurisdiction includes the inherent jurisdiction and inherent powers of a superior court recognized in MacMillan Bloedel: namely, review of the legality and constitutional validity of laws, enforcement of its orders, control over its own process, and its residual jurisdiction as a court of original general jurisdiction.

One of the matters that is undoubtedly part of the core jurisdiction of the superior courts is the power to review administrative action. This power is implicated when courts enact privative clauses—clauses that purport to oust the power of the courts to conduct judicial review of administrative action. Privative clauses create a tension between the principle of parliamentary sovereignty and the rule of law. On one hand, if Parliament is sovereign, the enactment of a privative clause barring judicial review of administrative action is within its powers. On the other hand, the rule of law warrants that there will be an impartial arbiter to determine whether administrative action is authorized by law. A privative clause, taken on its face, can bar this review.

The next case, Crevier, involves an attempt by the Quebec Legislature to regulate professions. Decisions made under the regime were protected by a privative clause that purported to oust the review of the superior courts, in the following terms:

> 194. No extraordinary recourse contemplated in articles 834 to 850 of the Code of Civil Procedure shall be exercised and no injunction granted against the persons mentioned in section 193 acting in their official capacities.

In reading Crevier, consider how the prohibition against the creation of shadow s.96 courts was violated by the Quebec legislation. How did the legislation purport to divest the s.96 courts of a core function?

7.2 Crevier v AG (Quebec) et al., 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 SCR 220

LASKIN CJC

I need make but a brief allusion to the facts. The Professional Code governs some 38 professional corporations listed in an annex to the Code. Each of these corporations is required to establish a Discipline Committee in conformity with the Code to deal with allegations of professional misconduct. The Discipline Committees have authority under s. 156 to impose a range of sanctions upon. a finding of guilty, such as a reprimand or a temporary or permanent striking off the rolls of the particular corporation or a fine of at least $200 for each offence. The Discipline Committee has no authority to admit members to the particular profession and hence is not invested with any power to set standards for membership. This is done by Bureaux constituted under the Code for the respective professions.

The second issue arising from the reasons of the Quebec Court of Appeal concerns the effect upon s. 96 of a privative clause of a statute which purports to insulate a provincial adjudicative tribunal from any review of its decisions. Is it enough to deflect s. 96 if the privative clause is construed to preserve superior court supervision over questions of jurisdiction, and if (as in this case) such a construction is not open because of the wording of the privative clause, is the clause constitutionally valid? In my opinion, where a provincial Legislature purports to insulate one of its statutory tribunals from any curial review of its adjudicative functions, the insulation encompassing jurisdiction, such provincial legislation must be struck down as unconstitutional by reason of having the effect of constituting the tribunal a s. 96 court.

lt is true that this is the first time that this Court has declared unequivocally that a provincially-constituted statutory tribunal cannot constitutionally be immunized from review of decisions on questions of jurisdiction. In my opinion, this limitation, arising by virtue of s. 96, stands on the same footing as the well-accepted limitation on the power of provincial statutory tribunals to make unreviewable determinations of constitutionality. There may be differences of opinion as to what are questions of jurisdiction but, in my lexicon, they rise above and are different from errors of law, whether involving statutory construction or evidentiary matters or other matters. It is now unquestioned that privative clauses may, when properly framed, effectively oust judicial review on questions of law and, indeed, on other issues not touching jurisdiction. However, given that s. 96 is in the British North America Act and that it would make a mockery of it to treat it in non-functional formal terms as a mere appointing power, I can think of nothing that is more the hallmark of a superior court than the vesting of power in a provincial statutory tribunal to determine the limits of its jurisdiction without appeal or other review.

> In short, what the Farrah case decided was that to give a provincially-constituted statutory tribunal a jurisdiction in appeal on questions of law without limitation, and to reinforce this appellate authority by excluding any supervisory recourse to the Quebec Superior Court, was to create a s. 96 court. The present case is no different in principle, even though in ss. 162 and 175 of the Professional Code, dealing with the appellate authority of the Professions Tribunal, there is no mention of the word "law" or the word "jurisdiction". When regard is had to the privative terms of ss. 194 and 195, added to the fact that by s. 175 the Professions Tribunal's decisions are final, I see no significant distinction between the present case and the Farrah case in the fact that in the latter the authority granted to the appeal tribunal was "to the exclusion of any other court". In both cases there was a purported exclusion of the reviewing authority of any other court, whether by appeal or by evocation.

Crevier, Residential Tenancies, and many of the other "s.96 cases" involve provincially-created statutory bodies. But, in a key case, the Supreme Court of Canada held that s.96 is binding on the federal Parliament as well as the provincial legislatures. At issue in McEvoy was a joint plan by the Legislature of New Brunswick and the Parliament of Canada to transfer jurisdiction to try indictable offences to a "unified criminal court" with provincially appointed judges. In concluding that this proposal was unconstitutional, Laskin CJ reasoned that the effect of the proposal would be to establish a shadow s.96 court, and that the prohibition against the establishment of such courts applies also to the federal Parliament.

7.3 McEvoy v Attorney General for New Brunswick et al, 1983 CanLII 149 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 704

LASKIN CJC

> The questions posed for decision leave open many matters which cannot be ignored when it is intended to replace provincial Superior Courts in the administration of the criminal law, including indictable offences. We have alrady raised the question whether unreviewable authority is to be given to the new provincial court in the proposed grant of exclusive jurisdiction or, at best, only a statutory right of appeal. Unreviewable authority might put the provincially-established Court and its provincially-appointed Judges in a s. 96 position notwithstanding that its jurisdiction comes from Parliament. The Crevier case, 1981 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1981] 2 S.C.R. 220, might be considered as apt.
> What is proposed in the New Brunswick proposals is the establishment of a statutory Court. As distinguished from what? Certainly not from existing provincial courts which must be fed criminal jurisdiction by federal legislation. No doubt, however, to separate the new Court from provincial Superior Courts. Will that help or advance the matter if functional considerations have to be considered? It has long been the rule that s. 96, although in terms an appointing power, must be addressed in functional terms lest its application be eroded. What then, is the relation between the proposed new statutory Court and s. 96? This is the key constitutional issue in the present case and, as we view the matter, the result is to defeat the new statutory Court because it will effectively be a s. 96 Court.
> What is being contemplated here is not one or a few transfers of criminal law power, such as has already been accomplished under the Criminal Code, but a complete obliteration of Superior Court criminal law jurisdiction. Sections 96 to 100 do not distinguish between courts of civil jurisdiction and courts of criminal jurisdiction. They should not be read as permitting the Parliament of Canada through use of its criminal law power to destroy Superior Courts and to deprive the Governor General of appointing power and to exclude members of the Bar from preferment for Superior Court appointments.
> Parliament can no more give away federal constitutional powers than a province can usurp them. Section 96 provides that "The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province". The proposal here is that Parliament transfer the present Superior Courts' jurisdiction to try indictable offences to a provincial court. The effect of this proposal would be to deprive the Governor General of his power under s. 96 to appoint the judges who try indictable offences in New Brunswick. That is contrary to s. 96. Section 96 bars Parliament from altering the constitutional scheme envisaged by the judicature sections of the Constitution Act, 1867 just as it does the provinces from doing so.
> The traditional independence of English Superior Court judges has been raised to the level of a fundamental principle of our federal system by the Constitution Act, 1867 and cannot have less importance and force in the administration of criminal law than in the case of civil matters. Under the Canadian constitution the Superior Courts are independent of both levels of government. The provinces constitute, maintain and organize the Superior Courts; the federal authority appoints the judges. The judicature sections of the Constitution Act, 1867 guarantee the independence of the Superior Courts; they apply to Parliament as well as to the Provincial Legislatures.

8 Judicial Independence and Access to the Superior Courts

In addition to prohibiting the creation of "new" s.96 courts, ss.96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 also serve to protect the independence of superior courts as well as access to these courts. These provisions are supported by, and intertwined with, unwritten constitutional principles such as the rule of law. A commitment to the rule of law requires that individuals have recourse to an independent and impartial adjudicator that resolves disputes through the application of the law. Indeed, as the Supreme Court of Canada noted, "[i]n keeping with the principle of the separation of powers, the task of interpreting, applying and stating the law falls primarily to the judiciary" (Reference re Code of Civil Procedure, at para 46).

In the next case, the Supreme Court of Canada extended the protection of judicial independence to provincial court judges. Provincial courts are established by the provincial legislatures, under s.92 (14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. At issue in the Provincial Judges Reference was a proposal by several provincial legislature to reduce the salaries of their provincial court judges. It is well-established that s.100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 protects the financial security of superior court judges. The question for the Court was whether the independence of provincial court judges should be protected in the same way. In answering this question, Lamer CJC emphasized that s.96 does not exhaust the meaning and requirements of judicial independence in the Canadian court system.

The specific question for the Court was whether the financial security of provincial court judges was protected. The question is important, because under s.11(d) of the Charter, any person facing a criminal charge in provincial court has the right "to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal."

88 A perusal of the language of s. 96 reveals the same difficulty:

> 96. The Governor General shall appoint the Judges of the Superior, District, and County Courts in each Province, except those of the Courts of Probate in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Section 96 seems to do no more than confer the power to appoint judges of the superior, district, and county courts. It is a staffing provision, and is once again a subtraction from the power of the provinces under s. 92(14). However, through a process of judicial interpretation, s. 96 has come to guarantee the core jurisdiction of the courts which come within the scope of that provision. In the past, this development has often been expressed as a logical inference from the express terms of s. 96. Assuming that the goal of s. 96 was the creation of "a unitary judicial system", that goal would have been undermined "if a province could pass legislation creating a tribunal, appoint members thereto, and then confer on the tribunal the jurisdiction of the superior courts": Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1981 CanLII 24 (SCC) , [1981] 1 S.C.R. 714, at p. 728. However, as I recently confirmed, s. 96 restricts not only the legislative competence of provincial legislatures, but of Parliament as well: MacMillan Bloedel, supra. The rationale for the provision has also shifted, away from the protection of national unity, to the maintenance of the rule of law through the protection of the judicial role.

89 The point which emerges from this brief discussion is that the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100 has come a long way from what those provisions actually say. This jurisprudential evolution undermines the force of the argument that the written text of the Constitution is comprehensive and definitive in its protection of judicial independence. The only way to explain the interpretation of ss. 96 and 100, in fact, is by reference to a deeper set of unwritten understandings which are not found on the face of the document itself.

94 In my opinion, the existence of many of the unwritten rules of the Canadian Constitution can be explained by reference to the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867. The relevant paragraph states in full:

> Whereas the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom:

Although the preamble has been cited by this Court on many occasions, its legal effect has never been fully explained. On the one hand, although the preamble is clearly part of the Constitution, it is equally clear that it "has no enacting force": Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC) , [1981] 1 S.C.R. 753, at p. 805 (joint majority reasons). In other words, strictly speaking, it is not a source of positive law, in contrast to the provisions which follow it.

95 But the preamble does have important legal effects. Under normal circumstances, preambles can be used to identify the purpose of a statute, and also as an aid to construing ambiguous statutory language: Driedger on the Construction of Statutes (3rd ed. 1994), by R. Sullivan, at p. 261. The preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, certainly operates in this fashion. However, in my view, it goes even further. In the words of Rand J., the preamble articulates "the political theory which the Act embodies": Switzman, supra, at p. 306. It recognizes and affirms the basic principles which are the very source of the substantive provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. As I have said above, those provisions merely elaborate those organizing principles in the institutional apparatus they create or contemplate. As such, the preamble is not only a key to construing the express provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, but also invites the use of those organizing principles to fill out gaps in the express terms of the constitutional scheme. It is the means by which the underlying logic of the Act can be given the force of law.

96 What are the organizing principles of the Constitution Act, 1867, as expressed in the preamble? The preamble speaks of the desire of the founding provinces "to be federally united into One Dominion", and thus, addresses the structure of the division of powers. Moreover, by its reference to "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom", the preamble indicates that the legal and institutional structure of constitutional democracy in Canada should be similar to that of the legal regime out of which the Canadian Constitution emerged. To my mind, both of these aspects of the preamble explain many of the cases in which the Court has, through the normal process of constitutional interpretation, stated some fundamental rules of Canadian constitutional law which are not found in the express terms of the Constitution Act, 1867.

105 The same approach applies to the protection of judicial independence. In fact, this point was already decided in Beauregard, and, unless and until it is reversed, we are governed by that decision today. In that case (at p. 72), a unanimous Court held that the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867, and in particular, its reference to "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom", was "textual recognition" of the principle of judicial independence. Although in that case, it fell to us to interpret s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, the comments I have just reiterated were not limited by reference to that provision, and the courts which it protects.

106 The historical origins of the protection of judicial independence in the United Kingdom, and thus in the Canadian Constitution, can be traced to the Act of Settlement of 1701. As we said in Valente, supra, at p. 693, that Act was the "historical inspiration" for the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. Admittedly, the Act only extends protection to judges of the English superior courts. However, our Constitution has evolved over time. In the same way that our understanding of rights and freedoms has grown, such that they have now been expressly entrenched through the enactment of the Constitution Act, 1982, so too has judicial independence grown into a principle that now extends to all courts, not just the superior courts of this country.

107 I also support this conclusion on the basis of the presence of s. 11(d) of the Charter, an express provision which protects the independence of provincial court judges only when those courts exercise jurisdiction in relation to offences. As I said earlier, the express provisions of the Constitution should be understood as elaborations of the underlying, unwritten, and organizing principles found in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. Even though s. 11(d) is found in the newer part of our Constitution, the Charter, it can be understood in this way, since the Constitution is to be read as a unified whole: Reference re Bill 30, An Act to amend the Education Act (Ont.), 1987 CanLII 65 (SCC) , [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1148, at p. 1206. An analogy can be drawn between the express reference in the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1982 to the rule of law and the implicit inclusion of that principle in the Constitution Act, 1867: Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, supra, at p. 750. Section 11(d), far from indicating that judicial independence is constitutionally enshrined for provincial courts only when those courts exercise jurisdiction over offences, is proof of the existence of a general principle of judicial independence that applies to all courts no matter what kind of cases they hear.

108 I reinforce this conclusion by reference to the central place that courts hold within the Canadian system of government. In OPSEU, as I have mentioned above, Beetz J. linked limitations on legislative sovereignty over political speech with "the existence of certain political institutions" as part of the "basic structure of our Constitution" (p. 57). However, political institutions are only one part of the basic structure of the Canadian Constitution. As this Court has said before, there are three branches of government — the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary: Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 (SCC) , [1985] 2 S.C.R. 455, at p. 469; R. v. Power, 1994 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 620. Courts, in other words, are equally "definitional to the Canadian understanding of constitutionalism" (Cooper, supra, at para. 11) as are political institutions. It follows that the same constitutional imperative — the preservation of the basic structure — which led Beetz J. to limit the power of legislatures to affect the operation of political institutions, also extends protection to the judicial institutions of our constitutional system. By implication, the jurisdiction of the provinces over "courts", as that term is used in s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, contains within it an implied limitation that the independence of those courts cannot be undermined.

109 In conclusion, the express provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Charter are not an exhaustive written code for the protection of judicial independence in Canada. Judicial independence is an unwritten norm, recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. In fact, it is in that preamble, which serves as the grand entrance hall to the castle of the Constitution, that the true source of our commitment to this foundational principle is located. However, since the parties and interveners have grounded their arguments in s. 11(d), I will resolve these appeals by reference to that provision.

B. Section 11(d) of the Charter

110 As I mentioned earlier, these appeals were heard together because they all raise the question of whether and how s. 11(d) of the Charter restricts the manner by and extent to which provincial governments and legislatures can reduce the salaries of provincial court judges. Before I can address this specific question, I must make some general comments about the jurisprudence under s. 11(d).

111 The starting point for my discussion is Valente, where in a unanimous judgment this Court laid down the interpretive framework for s. 11(d)'s guarantee of judicial independence and impartiality. Le Dain J., speaking for the Court, began by drawing a distinction between impartiality and independence. Later cases have referred to this distinction as "a firm line": Généreux, supra, at p. 283. Impartiality was defined as "a state of mind or attitude of the tribunal in relation to the issues and the parties in a particular case" (Valente, supra, at p. 685 (emphasis added)). It was tied to the traditional concern for the "absence of bias, actual or perceived". Independence, by contrast, focussed on the status of the court or tribunal. In particular, Le Dain J. emphasized that the independence protected by s. 11(d) flowed from "the traditional constitutional value of judicial independence", which he defined in terms of the relationship of the court or tribunal "to others, particularly the executive branch of government" (p. 685). As I expanded in R. v. Lippé, 1990 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 114, the independence protected by s. 11(d) is the independence of the judiciary from the other branches of government, and bodies which can exercise pressure on the judiciary through power conferred on them by the state.

112 Le Dain J. went on in Valente to state that independence was premised on the existence of a set of "objective conditions or guarantees" (p. 685), whose absence would lead to a finding that a tribunal or court was not independent. The existence of objective guarantees, of course, follows from the fact that independence is status oriented; the objective guarantees define that status. However, he went on to supplement the requirement for objective conditions with what could be interpreted as a further requirement: that the court or tribunal be reasonably perceived as independent. The reason for this additional requirement was that the guarantee of judicial independence has the goal not only of ensuring that justice is done in individual cases, but also of ensuring public confidence in the justice system. As he said (at p. 689):

> Without that confidence the system cannot command the respect and acceptance that are essential to its effective operation. It is, therefore, important that a tribunal should be perceived as independent, as well as impartial, and that the test for independence should include that perception.

However, it would be a mistake to conclude that Le Dain J. intended the objective guarantees and the reasonable perception of independence to be two distinct concepts. Rather, the objective guarantees must be viewed as those guarantees that are necessary to ensure a reasonable perception of independence. As Le Dain J. said himself, for a court or tribunal to be perceived as independent, that "perception must . . . be a perception of whether the tribunal enjoys the essential objective conditions or guarantees of judicial independence" (p. 689).

113 Another point which emerges from Valente relates to the question of whose perceptions count. The answer given is that of the reasonable and informed person. This standard was formulated by de Grandpré J. in Committee for Justice and Liberty v. National Energy Board, 1976 CanLII 2 (SCC) , [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369, at p. 394, with respect to a reasonable apprehension of bias, and was cited with approval in Valente, supra, at p. 684:

> . . . the apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. In the words of the Court of Appeal, that test is "what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically — and having thought the matter through — conclude. . . ."

That test was adapted to the determination of judicial independence by Howland C.J.O. in his judgment in the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Valente (No. 2) (1983), 1983 CanLII 1901 (ON CA), 2 C.C.C. (3d) 417, at pp. 439-40:

> The question that now has to be determined is whether a reasonable person, who was informed of the relevant statutory provisions, their historical background and the traditions surrounding them, after viewing the matter realistically and practically would conclude [that the tribunal or court was independent].

To my mind, the decisions of Howland C.J.O. in Valente, and de Grandpré J. in National Energy Board, correctly establish the standard for the test of reasonable perception for the purposes of s. 11(d).

114 After establishing these core propositions, Le Dain J. in Valente went on to discuss two sets of concepts; the three core characteristics of judicial independence, and what I term the two dimensions of judicial independence.

115 The three core characteristics identified by Le Dain J. are security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence. Valente laid down (at p. 697) two requirements for security of tenure for provincial court judges: those judges could only be removed for cause "related to the capacity to perform judicial functions", and after a "judicial inquiry at which the judge affected is given a full opportunity to be heard". Unlike the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, which govern the removal of superior court judges, s. 11(d) of the Charter does not require an address by the legislature in order to dismiss a provincial court judge.

116 Financial security was defined in these terms (at p. 706):

> The essential point, in my opinion, is that the right to salary of a provincial court judge is established by law, and there is no way in which the Executive could interfere with that right in a manner to affect the independence of the individual judge. [Emphasis added.]

Once again, the Court drew a distinction between the requirements of s. 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and s. 11(d); whereas the former provision requires that the salaries of superior court judges be set by Parliament directly, the latter allows salaries of provincial court judges to be set either by statute or through an order in council.

117 Finally, the Court defined the administrative independence of the provincial court, as control by the courts "over the administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of the judicial function" (p. 712). These were defined (at p. 709) in narrow terms as > assignment of judges, sittings of the court, and court lists — as well as the related matters of allocation of court rooms and direction of the administrative staff engaged in carrying out these functions…

Although this aspect of judicial independence was also referred to as "institutional independence" in Valente at p. 708, that term, as I explain below, has a distinct meaning altogether, and should not be confused with administrative independence.

118 The three core characteristics of judicial independence — security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence — should be contrasted with what I have termed the two dimensions of judicial independence. In Valente, Le Dain J. drew a distinction between two dimensions of judicial independence, the individual independence of a judge and the institutional or collective independence of the court or tribunal of which that judge is a member. In other words, while individual independence attaches to individual judges, institutional or collective independence attaches to the court or tribunal as an institutional entity. The two different dimensions of judicial independence are related in the following way (Valente, supra, at p. 687):

> The relationship between these two aspects of judicial independence is that an individual judge may enjoy the essential conditions of judicial independence but if the court or tribunal over which he or she presides is not independent of the other branches of government, in what is essential to its function, he or she cannot be said to be an independent tribunal.

119 It is necessary to explain the relationship between the three core characteristics and the two dimensions of judicial independence, because Le Dain J. did not fully do so in Valente. For example, he stated that security of tenure was part of the individual independence of a court or tribunal, whereas administrative independence was identified with institutional or collective independence. However, the core characteristics of judicial independence, and the dimensions of judicial independence, are two very different concepts. The core characteristics of judicial independence are distinct facets of the definition of judicial independence. Security of tenure, financial security, and administrative independence come together to constitute judicial independence. By contrast, the dimensions of judicial independence indicate which entity — the individual judge or the court or tribunal to which he or she belongs — is protected by a particular core characteristic.

120 The conceptual distinction between the core characteristics and the dimensions of judicial independence suggests that it may be possible for a core characteristic to have both an individual and an institutional or collective dimension. To be sure, sometimes a core characteristic only attaches to a particular dimension of judicial independence; administrative independence, for example, only attaches to the court as an institution (although sometimes it may be exercised on behalf of a court by its chief judge or justice). However, this need not always be the case. The guarantee of security of tenure, for example, may have a collective or institutional dimension, such that only a body composed of judges may recommend the removal of a judge. However, I need not decide that particular point here.

163 The relevance of the judicature provisions, and s. 100 in particular, to the interpretation of s. 11(d) emerges from their shared commitment to judicial independence. The link between these two sets of provisions can be found in Beauregard itself, where the Court developed the distinction between individual independence and institutional independence by reference to Valente. I also alluded to the link between these two sets of provisions in my separate reasons in Cooper. As I have suggested, this link arises in part as a function of the fact that both ss. 11(d) and 100 are expressions of the unwritten principle of judicial independence which is recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867.

164 What the link between s. 11(d) and the judicature provisions means is that certain fundamental aspects of judicial independence are enjoyed not only by superior courts, but by provincial courts as well. In my opinion, the constitutional parameters of the power to change or freeze judges' salaries under s. 100, as defined by Beauregard and developed in these reasons, fall into this category.

165 In conclusion, the requirements laid down in Beauregard and developed in these reasons with respect to s. 100 and superior court judges, are equally applicable to the guarantee of financial security provided by s. 11(d) to provincial court judges. Just as Parliament can change or freeze the salaries of superior court judges, legislatures and executives of the provinces can do the same to the salaries of provincial court judges.

As Lamer CJC makes clear in the Provincial Judges Reference, the unwritten principle of the rule of law, supported by the principle of judicial independence, does not emerge directly from the express constitutional text. However, the Preamble, alongside the express provisions of the Constitution, protects a nexus of unwritten constitutional norms. Those norms, alongside ss.96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, serve to protect access to an impartial and independent tribunal which cannot be abridged by provincial legislatures under s.92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. Indeed, this is the key point of the next case.

10 Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59

THE CHIEF JUSTICE—

I. Overview

[1] The issue in this case is whether court hearing fees imposed by the Province of British Columbia that deny some people access to the courts are constitutional. The trial judge, upheld on appeal, held that the legislation imposing the fees was unconstitutional. I agree.

[2] In my view, the fees at issue here violate s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Although the province can establish hearing fees under its power to administer justice under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the exercise of that power must also comply with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which constitutionally protects the core jurisdiction of the superior courts. For the reasons discussed below, the fees impermissibly infringe on that jurisdiction by, in effect, denying some people access to the courts.

II. Facts

[3] This case began as a family action (2009 BCSC 434 (CanLII)). Ms. Vilardell and Mr. Dunham began a relationship in England and came to British Columbia, Canada, with their daughter. The relationship foundered, and the question arose — who should have custody of the child? Ms. Vilardell wanted to return with the child to Spain, her country of origin. Mr. Dunham wanted to keep the child in British Columbia. Ms. Vilardell also claimed an interest in Mr. Dunham's house.

[4] Ms. Vilardell went to court to have these issues resolved. In order to get a trial date, she had to undertake in advance to pay a court hearing fee. At the outset of the trial, Ms. Vilardell asked the judge to relieve her from paying the hearing fee. The judge reserved his decision on this request until the end of the trial, so he could address the question of ability to pay after hearing evidence respecting the parties' means, circumstances, and entitlement to property.

[5] The parties were not represented by lawyers, and the hearing took 10 days. The hearing fee amounted to some $3,600 — almost the net monthly income of the family (2012 BCSC 748 , 260 C.R.R. (2d) 1, at para. 396). Ms. Vilardell is not an "impoverished" person in the ordinary sense of the word. She is qualified as a veterinary surgeon in Europe. She was unemployed in the year leading up to the trial; the "family" income appears to have come mainly from her partner. She had some assets, including about $10,000 in savings in a Canadian bank account, $10,000 in a Barclays Investment Savings Account in the United Kingdom, and $4,500 in a registered retirement account in Spain. However, after legal fees had depleted her savings, she could not afford the hearing fee.

[6] Aware that there was some authority for the proposition that hearing fees are unconstitutional (Pleau v. Nova Scotia (Prothonotary) (1998), 1998 CanLII 12462 (NS SC) , 186 N.S.R. (2d) 1 (S.C.)), the judge held that the Attorney General should be given an opportunity to intervene on Ms. Vilardell's application. He also invited submissions from the Law Society of British Columbia and the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association. The judge stayed Ms. Vilardell's obligation to pay the hearing fee pending further order.

[7] Ultimately, the B.C. branch of the Canadian Bar Association and the Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia intervened and challenged the hearing fee scheme as unconstitutional. They argued that people like Ms. Vilardell — possessing some means but not able to pay the hearing fee — have the right to have a court adjudicate their legal disputes, and that the hearing fee regime in British Columbia essentially denies them that right.

[8] The trial judge ruled that the hearing fee provision was unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal agreed that the scheme could not stand as it is, but held that if the exemption provision were expanded by reading in the words "or in need", it would pass constitutional muster (2013 BCCA 65 , 43 B.C.L.R. (5th) 217). The Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia and the Canadian Bar Association — British Columbia Branch appeal the remedy to this Court. The Province cross-appeals on the issue of the constitutionality of the hearing fees.

III. The Legislative Regime

[9] The Supreme Court Rules, B.C. Reg. 221/90, as amended by B.C. Reg. 10/96 and B.C. Reg. 75/98, in place at the time this case began, were enacted as subordinate legislation under the Court Rules Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 80. In 2010, the Supreme Court Rules were replaced by the Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009. The appellants challenge the constitutionality of the hearing fees set out in both rules of court.

[10] The current hearing fees are set out in Schedule 1 of Appendix C of the Supreme Court Civil Rules and the Supreme Court Family Rules, B.C. Reg. 169/2009. The fees escalate from no fee for the first three days of trial, to $500 for days four to ten, to $800 for each day over ten.

[11] Rule 20-5(1) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules provides for an exemption from hearing fees:

> If the court, on application made in accordance with subrule (3) before or after the start of a proceeding, finds that a person receives benefits under the Employment and Assistance Act or the Employment and Assistance for Persons with Disabilities Act or is otherwise impoverished, the court may order that no fee is payable by the person to the government under Schedule 1 of Appendix C in relation to the proceeding unless the court considers that the claim or defence
> (a) discloses no reasonable claim or defence, as the case may be,
> (b) is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, or
> (c) is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court.

[12] In B.C., the party that sets a case down for trial (usually the plaintiff) is required to undertake to pay the hearing fee — regardless of whether the trial length is based on that party's estimate or the estimate of the other party or the court.

[13] Applications for the impoverishment exemption are usually spoken to in court, often on an ex parte basis. The registry provides the applicant with an application form, a blank affidavit, and a draft order (r. 20-5(3)).

IV. Issues

[14] This appeal raises the following issues:

1. Is B.C.'s hearing fee scheme constitutionally valid?
2. If not, what is the appropriate remedy?

[15] The appellants challenge the Province's hearing fees on a number of grounds, including the rule of law and access to an independent judiciary.

[16] The Province argues that the hearing fee scheme is a valid exercise of the provincial power over the administration of justice under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[17] The question arises: What, if any, are the limits of the scope of provincial authority over the administration of justice under s. 92(14)? The authority is a wide one, but it must be exercised harmoniously with the core jurisdiction of provincial superior courts protected by s. 96. The issue in this case comes down to whether s. 96 is infringed by legislation that imposes hearing fees that deny some people access to the courts.

V. Analysis

A. The Province Has the Power to Impose Hearing Fees

[18] The Province has the power to legislate with respect to the administration of justice under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This includes the power to charge fees for court services.

[19] Section 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides:

> 92. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to . . .
> 14. The Administration of Justice in the Province, including the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of the Provincial Courts, both of Civil and of Criminal Jurisdiction, and including Procedure in Civil matters in those Courts.

[20] In British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Christie, 2007 SCC 21 , [2007] 1 S.C.R. 873 , this Court said:

> The legislature has the power to pass laws in relation to the administration of justice in the province under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This implies the power of the province to impose at least some conditions on how and when people have a right to access the courts. Therefore B.C.G.E.U. cannot stand for the proposition that every limit on access to the courts is automatically unconstitutional. [Emphasis added; para. 17.]

[21] Hearing fees fall squarely within the "administration of justice" and may be used to defray some of the cost of administering the justice system, to encourage the efficient use of court resources, and to discourage frivolous or inappropriate use of the courts.

[22] It was argued that all hearing fees are unconstitutional; as courts are a "first charge on government", charging fees for time in court is as offensive to democracy as charging fees for voting. However, this argument is flawed because it focuses on the type of the fee, rather than the real problem — using fees to deny certain people access to the courts. Moreover, the argument raises policy issues relating to how governments should generate revenue and allocate their funds. Hearing fees paid by litigants who can afford them may be a justifiable way of making resources available for the justice system and increasing access to justice overall.

[23] I conclude that levying hearing fees is a permissible exercise of the Province's jurisdiction under s. 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

B. The Provinces' Power to Impose Hearing Fees Is Not Unlimited

[24] On its face, s. 92(14) does not limit the powers of the provinces to impose hearing fees. However, that does not mean that the province can impose hearing fees in any fashion it chooses. Its power to impose hearing fees must be consistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the requirements that flow by necessary implication from s. 96. This follows from two related tenets of constitutional interpretation.

[25] First, particular constitutional grants of power must be read together with other grants of power so that the Constitution operates as an internally consistent harmonious whole. Thus s. 92(14) does not operate in isolation. Its ambit must be determined, not only by reference to its bare wording, but with respect to other powers conferred by the Constitution. In this case, this requires us to consider s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[26] Second, the interpretation of s. 92(14) must be consistent not only with other express terms of the Constitution, but with requirements that "flow by necessary implication from those terms": British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 S.C.R. 473, at para. 66, per Major J. As this Court has recently stated, "the Constitution must be interpreted with a view to discerning the structure of government that it seeks to implement. The assumptions that underlie the text and the manner in which the constitutional provisions are intended to interact with one another must inform our interpretation, understanding, and application of the text": Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 704, at para. 26 (emphasis added).

[27] It follows that in determining the power conferred on the province over the administration of justice, including the imposition of hearing fees, by s. 92(14), the Court must consider not only the written words of that provision, but how a particular interpretation fits with other constitutional powers and the assumptions that underlie the text.

[28] In this case, the other constitutional grant of power that must be considered is s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which has been held to guarantee the core jurisdiction of provincial superior courts throughout the country.

[29] While s. 92(14) gives the provinces the responsibility for the administration of justice, s. 96 gives the federal government the power to appoint judges to the superior, district and county courts in each province. Taken together, these sections have been held to provide a constitutional basis for a unified judicial presence throughout the country: MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725, at paras. 11 and 52. Although the bare words of s. 96 refer to the appointment of judges, its broader import is to guarantee the core jurisdiction of provincial superior courts: Parliament and legislatures can create inferior courts and administrative tribunals, but "[t]he jurisdiction which forms this core cannot be removed from the superior courts by either level of government, without amending the Constitution" (MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 15). In this way, the Canadian Constitution "confers a special and inalienable status on what have come to be called the 'section 96 courts'" (MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 52).

[31] It is not suggested that legislating hearing fees that prevent people from accessing the courts would abolish or destroy the existence of the courts. The question is rather whether legislating hearing fees that prevent people from accessing the courts infringes on the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[32] The historic task of the superior courts is to resolve disputes between individuals and decide questions of private and public law. Measures that prevent people from coming to the courts to have those issues resolved are at odds with this basic judicial function. The resolution of these disputes and resulting determination of issues of private and public law, viewed in the institutional context of the Canadian justice system, are central to what the superior courts do. Indeed, it is their very book of business. To prevent this business being done strikes at the core of the jurisdiction of the superior courts protected by s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. As a result, hearing fees that deny people access to the courts infringe the core jurisdiction of the superior courts.

[34] In Residential Tenancies, the law at issue unconstitutionally denied access to the superior courts by requiring that a certain class of cases be decided by an administrative tribunal. In Crevier, the law at issue unconstitutionally denied access to the superior courts by imposing a privative clause excluding the supervisory jurisdiction of the superior courts. In MacMillan Bloedel, the legislation at issue unconstitutionally barred access to the superior courts for a segment of society — young persons — by conferring an exclusive power on youth courts to try youths for contempt in the face of superior courts. This Court, per Lamer C.J., relied on Crevier, concluding that "[it] establishes . . . that powers which are 'hallmarks of superior courts' cannot be removed from those courts" (MacMillan Bloedel, at para. 35).

[35] Here, the legislation at issue bars access to the superior courts in yet another way — by imposing hearing fees that prevent some individuals from having their private and public law disputes resolved by the courts of superior jurisdiction — the hallmark of what superior courts exist to do. As in MacMillan Bloedel, a segment of society is effectively denied the ability to bring their matter before the superior court.

[36] It follows that the province's power to impose hearing fees cannot deny people the right to have their disputes resolved in the superior courts. To do so would be to impermissibly impinge on s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Rather, the province's powers under s. 92(14) must be exercised in a manner that is consistent with the right of individuals to bring their cases to the superior courts and have them resolved there.

[37] This is consistent with the approach adopted by Major J. in Imperial Tobacco. The legislation here at issue — the imposition of hearing fees — must conform not only to the express terms of the Constitution, but to the "requirements . . . that flow by necessary implication from those terms" (para. 66). The right of Canadians to access the superior courts flows by necessary implication from the express terms of s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as we have seen. It follows that the province does not have the power under s. 92(14) to enact legislation that prevents people from accessing the courts.

[38] While this suffices to resolve the fundamental issue of principle in this appeal, the connection between s. 96 and access to justice is further supported by considerations relating to the rule of law. This Court affirmed that access to the courts is essential to the rule of law in B.C.G.E.U. v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214. As Dickson C.J. put it, "[t]here cannot be a rule of law without access, otherwise the rule of law is replaced by a rule of men and women who decide who shall and who shall not have access to justice" (p. 230). The Court adopted, at p. 230, the B.C. Court of Appeal's statement of the law ((1985), 1985 CanLII 143 (BC CA), 20 D.L.R. (4th) 399, at p. 406):

> . . . access to the courts is under the rule of law one of the foundational pillars protecting the rights and freedoms of our citizens. . . . Any action that interferes with such access by any person or groups of persons will rally the court's powers to ensure the citizen of his or her day in court. Here, the action causing interference happens to be picketing. As we have already indicated, interference from whatever source falls into the same category. [Emphasis added.]

As stated more recently in Hryniak v. Mauldin, 2014 SCC 7, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 87, per Karakatsanis J., "without an accessible public forum for the adjudication of disputes, the rule of law is threatened and the development of the common law undermined" (para. 26).

[39] The s. 96 judicial function and the rule of law are inextricably intertwined. As Lamer C.J. stated in MacMillan Bloedel, "[i]n the constitutional arrangements passed on to us by the British and recognized by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, the provincial superior courts are the foundation of the rule of law itself" (para. 37). The very rationale for the provision is said to be "the maintenance of the rule of law through the protection of the judicial role": Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 88. As access to justice is fundamental to the rule of law, and the rule of law is fostered by the continued existence of the s. 96 courts, it is only natural that s. 96 provide some degree of constitutional protection for access to justice.

[40] In the context of legislation which effectively denies people the right to take their cases to court, concerns about the maintenance of the rule of law are not abstract or theoretical. If people cannot challenge government actions in court, individuals cannot hold the state to account — the government will be, or be seen to be, above the law. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, the creation and maintenance of positive laws will be hampered, as laws will not be given effect. And the balance between the state's power to make and enforce laws and the courts' responsibility to rule on citizen challenges to them may be skewed: Christie v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 631, 262 D.L.R. (4th) 51, at paras. 68-9, per Newbury J.A.

[41] This Court's decision in Christie does not undermine the proposition that access to the courts is fundamental to our constitutional arrangements. The Court in Christie — a case concerning a 7 percent surcharge on legal services — proceeded on the premise of a fundamental right to access the courts, but held that not "every limit on access to the courts is automatically unconstitutional" (para. 17). In the present case, the hearing fee requirement has the potential to bar litigants with legitimate claims from the courts. The tax at issue in Christie, on the evidence and arguments adduced, was not shown to have a similar impact.

[42] Nor does the argument that legislatures generally have the right to determine the cost of government services undermine the proposition that laws cannot prevent citizens from accessing the superior courts. (Indeed, the Attorney General does not assert such a proposition.) The right of the province to impose hearing fees is limited by constitutional constraints. In defining those constraints, the Court does not impermissibly venture into territory that is the exclusive turf of the legislature. Rather, the Court is ensuring that the Constitution is respected.

[43] I conclude that s. 92(14), read in the context of the Constitution as a whole, does not give the provinces the power to administer justice in a way that denies the right of Canadians to access courts of superior jurisdiction. Any attempt to do so will run afoul of the constitutional protection for the superior courts found in s. 96.

C. When Do Hearing Fees Become Unconstitutional?

[44] The remaining question is how to determine when hearing fees deny access to superior courts.

[45] Litigants with ample resources will not be denied access to the superior courts by hearing fees. Even litigants with modest resources are often capable of arranging their finances so that, with reasonable sacrifices, they may access the courts. However, when hearing fees deprive litigants of access to the superior courts, they infringe the basic right of citizens to bring their cases to court. That point is reached when the hearing fees in question cause undue hardship to the litigant who seeks the adjudication of the superior court.

[46] A hearing fee scheme that does not exempt impoverished people clearly oversteps the constitutional minimum — as tacitly recognized by the exemption in the B.C. scheme at issue here. But providing exemptions only to the truly impoverished may set the access bar too high. A fee that is so high that it requires litigants who are not impoverished to sacrifice reasonable expenses in order to bring a claim may, absent adequate exemptions, be unconstitutional because it subjects litigants to undue hardship, thereby effectively preventing access to the courts.

[47] Of course, hearing fees that prevent litigants from bringing frivolous or vexatious claims do not offend the Constitution. There is no constitutional right to bring frivolous or vexatious cases, and measures that deter such cases may actually increase efficiency and overall access to justice.

[48] It is the role of the provincial legislatures to devise a constitutionally compliant hearing fee scheme. But as a general rule, hearing fees must be coupled with an exemption that allows judges to waive the fees for people who cannot, by reason of their financial situation, bring non-frivolous or non-vexatious litigation to court. A hearing fee scheme can include an exemption for the truly impoverished, but the hearing fees must be set at an amount such that anyone who is not impoverished can afford them. Higher fees must be coupled with enough judicial discretion to waive hearing fees in any case where they would effectively prevent access to the courts because they require litigants to forgo reasonable expenses in order to bring claims. This is in keeping with a long tradition in the common law of providing exemptions for classes of people who might be prevented from accessing the courts — a tradition that goes back to the Statute of Henry VII, 11 Hen. 7, c. 12, of 1495, which provided relief for people who could not afford court fees.

D. Application to Hearing Fee at Issue

[49] To recap, provinces may impose hearing fees as part of the administration of justice. However, this power does not extend to hearing fees that effectively prevent litigants from accessing the courts because they cannot afford the fees.

[50] On the findings of the trial judge, the hearing fee scheme at issue in this case places an undue hardship on litigants and impedes the right of British Columbians to bring legitimate cases to court.

[51] The trial judge held that the primary purpose of the hearing fee scheme is to provide an incentive for efficient use of court time and a disincentive for lengthy and inefficient trials (para. 309). The secondary purpose of the scheme is to provide sufficient revenue to offset the costs of providing civil justice in Provincial Court Small Claims matters, Supreme Court civil claims, and Supreme Court family claims (paras. 302-7). To put it in other words, the Province's aim is to establish a revenue-neutral trial service.

[52] The trial judge, affirmed by the Court of Appeal, found that B.C.'s hearing fees go beyond these purposes and limit access to courts for litigants who are not indigent or impoverished (and therefore who do not fall under the exemption provision), but for whom the hearing fees are nonetheless unaffordable. This is supported by the evidence. At trial, the appellants filed a report by economist Robert Carson, who used a "Market Basket Measure" ("MBM") developed in 2003 by Human Resources Development Canada to measure poverty. Assuming that the test for the indigency exemption was based on an MBM measure of poverty, he concluded that a significant percentage of the population would not be exempted from hearing fees (because their income is above MBM), but would nonetheless have great difficulty affording the hearing fees for a 10-day trial, like the one in this case, because the fees would equal or exceed any income in excess of MBM. In other words, the effect of the fees is unconstitutional, because for many litigants, bringing a claim would require

[55] Indeed, the effect of B.C.'s hearing fee scheme is illustrated in this case. Ms. Vilardell is not "impoverished", and is therefore not caught by the exemption provision. However, the fee for Ms. Vilardell's 10-day trial amounted to her family's net monthly income. This was on top of $23,000 already spent on lawyer fees. She could not afford the fee. That the fee arbitrarily was imposed only on Ms. Vilardell and escalated with the length of the trial — even though she did not control the length of the trial — worsened her situation.

[56] The Province argues that the exemption provision for impoverished litigants should be interpreted broadly to allow a judge to waive the hearing fees in appropriate cases, thereby avoiding the potentially unconstitutional impact of the scheme. I cannot accept this submission.

[57] The current exemption, cited above, provides an exemption for people receiving benefits under the Employment and Assistance Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 40, and the Employment and Assistance for Persons with Disabilities Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 41, or for persons who are "otherwise impoverished". The exemption in place at the time of the trial provided that a judge could waive all fees for a person who is "indigent". I conclude that these exemptions do not provide sufficient discretion to the trial judge to exempt litigants from having to pay hearing fees in appropriate circumstances.

[58] I agree with the view of the trial judge that the plain meaning of the words "impoverished" and "indigent" does not cover people of modest means who are nonetheless prevented from having a trial because of the hearing fees:

> The AGBC . . . reconciles the principle that the courts are meant to be accessible by pointing to the indigency exemption. It is clear, however, that if indigency is not redefined to include those who would otherwise be described as middle class, many will be forced to forego the assertion of their rights and interests in a courtroom for lack of money. I again note that in this particular case the cost of hearing fees for 10 days approached the net income of the family for a month.
> . . . The AGBC's answer dares the courts to redefine indigency — while maintaining the label — in a manner that would bring the whole exercise into disrepute. The courts simply do not engage in calling things what they are not, and could not be enlisted into an executive function by administering a more general form of means test to those who come before them, without compromising the appearance of independence, and the fact of equality before the law, as the TLABC has noted: see para. 180 herein. The "indigency" remedy does not cure this obvious impediment to access to justice. [paras. 396 and 398]

[59] Like the trial judge, I am of the view that the courts must read "impoverished" in its ordinary sense. A judge may waive fees for the very poor, and no one else. As the trial judge noted, while a person who cannot afford a fee of $100 or $200 may properly be described as "indigent" or "impoverished", it is awkward to use these terms to describe a middle class family's inability to pay a fee that amounts to a month's net salary. As the trial judge found, there "may be something at odds between the indigency test and the level of the fees" (para. 26).

[60] Other objections to the exemption provision can be raised. Litigants are required to come before the court, explain why they are indigent and beg the court to publicly acknowledge this status and excuse the payment of fees. This is arguably an affront to dignity and imposes a significant burden on the potential litigant of adducing proof of impoverishment — a burden she may be unable or unwilling to assume. This burden may further hamper access to the court. In clear cases of impoverishment, the task may be relatively straightforward. However, if "impoverished" were extended to the large group of additional people that the evidence indicates is prevented from going to court because of the current hearing fees, the task might be much more complex. In such circumstances, there is a practical concern the exemption application itself may contribute to hardship.

[61] The contention that this hearing fee regime promotes proportionality and efficiency by weeding out unmeritorious cases and encouraging shorter trials, thereby actually increasing access to the courts, does not answer the findings of the trial judge that it unconstitutionally prevents access to the courts. Moreover, the trial judge held that it is "dubious" that the hearing fees at issue here increase efficacy and fairness (para. 310). They penalize long trials simply because they are long, and do so by incremental leaps. But long trials are not necessarily inefficient. Prolonged trials may be caused by the nature of the case or the evidence. Litigants in long but efficient trials ought not to be penalized by hearing fees — particularly fees that escalate with the length of the trial.

[62] Moreover, the plaintiff who is required to pay the hearing fee may not control the length or efficiency of the trial — the defendant may be responsible for prolonging the matter. The ability of the trial judge to make orders for costs against such a defendant does not address the real problem — before being able to set a matter down for trial the plaintiff must undertake to pay hearing fees that may escalate through no fault of her own. If she cannot afford the prospective fees, she may reasonably conclude that she cannot bring her dispute to the court.

[63] Most fundamentally, unlike cost awards, the imposition of the hearing fees at issue are not dependent on efficiency or the merit of one's claim. The hearing fees imposed by this scheme escalate to $800 per day after 10 days of trial — the highest price tag in the country — without any relationship to the efficiency of the proceeding. These hearing fees do not promote efficient use of court time; at best they promote less use of court time.

[64] I conclude that the hearing fee scheme prevents access to the courts in a manner inconsistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and the underlying principle of the rule of law. It therefore falls outside the Province's jurisdiction under s. 92(14) to administer justice.

VI. What Is the Appropriate Remedy?

[65] This leaves the question of the appropriate remedy. The trial judge struck down the scheme as unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal preferred the remedy of "reading in" the words "or in need" into the exemption provision.

[66] "Reading in" is a remedy sparingly used, and available only where it is clear that the legislature, faced with a ruling of unconstitutionality, would have made the change proposed: Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679. I am not satisfied that this condition is met here. The legislature or Lieutenant Governor in Council has a number of options, from abandoning or modifying the hearing fee to changing the exemption provision. Moreover, any expansion of the exemption provision will be at odds with the legislative objective of deterring use of the courts. "Reading in" to cure the constitutional defect of the hearing fee scheme would defeat the purpose of the legislation.

[67] I would also note that modifying the exemption as suggested by the Court of Appeal might still not cure the problem; it is not clear that the term "or in need" will cover all litigants who cannot afford the hearing fee and other provisions might be required in order to avoid the onerous or undignified process of proving that one falls within the exception.

[68] The proper remedy is to declare the hearing fee scheme as it stands unconstitutional and leave it to the legislature or the Lieutenant Governor in Council to enact new provisions, should they choose to do so.

VII. Conclusion

[69] The appeal is allowed and the cross-appeal is dismissed, both without costs. I would affirm the declaration of unconstitutionality of the trial judge and set aside the order of the Court of Appeal expanding the exemption provision. Ms. Vilardell is excused from paying the hearing fee.

11 Section 101 Courts: The Federal Courts and The Supreme Court of Canada

Under s.101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, Parliament has power to "…provide for…the Establishment of any additional Courts for the better administration of the Laws of Canada." Under this provision, Parliament created the Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal. Previously enabled by the Supreme and Exchequer Court Act, and now the Federal Courts Act, the Federal Court has jurisdiction over matters falling within classes of subjects in s.91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Unlike the superior courts of inherent jurisdiction, the Federal Court is a statutory court, meaning its powers derive exclusively from the statute enabling it.

The place of the Federal Courts in the constitutional pattern is somewhat unclear. On the one hand, the Federal Courts are not superior courts, and from that perspective, do not have the same constitutional footing as the provincial superior courts. On the other hand, the principles of judicial independence and the rule of law might bolster the place of the Federal Courts, enabled by s.101 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

In the next case, the Supreme Court of Canada interpreted the Federal Court's jurisdiction rather narrowly to protect the constitutional position of the superior courts.

12 Windsor (City) v Canadian Transit Co, 2016 SCC 54

KARAKATSANIS J

[1] The Canadian Transit Company owns and operates the Canadian half of the Ambassador Bridge connecting Windsor, Ontario, and Detroit, Michigan. Over the past decade the Company has purchased more than 100 residential properties in Windsor with the intention of eventually demolishing the homes and using the land to facilitate maintenance and expansion of the bridge and its facilities. Most of the homes are now vacant and, according to the City of Windsor, in varying states of disrepair. The City regards them as a blight on the Olde Sandwich Towne neighbourhood and, pursuant to its by-laws, has issued more than 100 repair orders against the properties.

[2] The Company has not complied with the repair orders, claiming that the Ambassador Bridge is a federal undertaking and the City's by-laws and repair orders cannot constitutionally apply to it. The parties have been engaged in proceedings relating to those repair orders in the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. The Company has also sought a number of declarations from the Federal Court.

[3] This appeal deals only with the preliminary issue of whether the Federal Court has jurisdiction to decide whether the Company must comply with the City's by-laws and repair orders. The City says only the Ontario Superior Court of Justice has jurisdiction to settle the issue.

[4] I agree with the City: the Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to decide whether the City's by-laws apply to the Company's residential properties. Rather, the issue must be decided by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. I would allow the appeal.

III. Statutory Provisions

[14] The Federal Court was established by Parliament under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which provides as follows:

> 101. The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from Time to Time provide for the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the Establishment of any additional Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada.

[15] Pursuant to this constitutional authority, Parliament created the Federal Court "for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada" in 1971 (Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. 10 (2nd Supp.)). Federal court jurisdiction is now governed by the Federal Courts Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7.

[16] The provision at the heart of this appeal is s. 23(c) of the Federal Courts Act, on which the Company relies to establish the jurisdiction of the Federal Court:

> 23 Except to the extent that jurisdiction has been otherwise specially assigned, the Federal Court has concurrent original jurisdiction, between subject and subject as well as otherwise, in all cases in which a claim for relief is made or a remedy is sought under an Act of Parliament or otherwise in relation to any matter coming within any of the following classes of subjects:
> . . .
> (c) works and undertakings connecting a province with any other province or extending beyond the limits of a province.

V. Analysis

[24] The sole issue is whether the Federal Court has jurisdiction under the ITO test to hear the Company's application. If it is plain and obvious that the Federal Court lacks jurisdiction to hear this application, the motion to strike must succeed (Hodgson v. Ermineskin Indian Band (2000), 2000 CanLII 15066 (FC) , 180 F.T.R. 285). First, I identify the essential nature of the Company's claim. I then review the role and jurisdiction of the Federal Court before applying the ITO test for jurisdiction. Given my conclusion that the Federal Court does not have jurisdiction to hear this matter, it is unnecessary to address the issue of whether the court should decline to exercise jurisdiction.

A. Essential Nature of the Company's Claim

[25] In order to decide whether the Federal Court has jurisdiction over a claim, it is necessary to determine the essential nature or character of that claim (JP Morgan Asset Management (Canada) Inc. v. Canada (National Revenue), 2013 FCA 250 , [2014] 2 F.C.R. 557, at para. 50; Sifto Canada Corp. v. Minister of National Revenue, 2014 FCA 140 , 461 N.R. 184, at para. 25). As discussed in further detail below, s. 23(c) of the Federal Courts Act only grants jurisdiction to the Federal Court when a claim for relief has been made, or a remedy has been sought, "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise". The conferral of jurisdiction depends on the nature of the claim or remedy sought. Determining the claim's essential nature allows the court to assess whether it falls within the scope of s. 23(c). Jurisdiction is not assessed in a piecemeal or issue-by-issue fashion.

[26] The essential nature of the claim must be determined on "a realistic appreciation of the practical result sought by the claimant" (Domtar Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2009 FCA 218 , 392 N.R. 200, at para. 28, per Sharlow J.A.). The "statement of claim is not to be blindly read at its face meaning" (Roitman v. Canada, 2006 FCA 266 , 353 N.R. 75, at para. 16, per Décary J.A.). Rather, the court must "look beyond the words used, the facts alleged and the remedy sought and ensure . . . that the statement of claim is not a disguised attempt to reach before the Federal Court a result otherwise unreachable in that Court" (ibid.; see also Canadian Pacific Railway v. R., 2013 FC 161, [2014] 1 C.T.C. 223, at para. 36; Verdicchio v. R., 2010 FC 117 , [2010] 3 C.T.C. 80, at para. 24).

[27] On the other hand, genuine strategic choices should not be maligned as artful pleading. The question is whether the court has jurisdiction over the particular claim the claimant has chosen to bring, not a similar claim the respondent says the claimant really ought, for one reason or another, to have brought.

> 1. A declaration that the Ambassador Bridge, including its approaches, terminal facilities, machinery and appurtenances, is a federal undertaking;
> 2. A declaration that the applicant The Canadian Transit Company ("CTC") has, pursuant to its enabling legislation, An Act to incorporate The Canadian Transit Company, 11-12 George V., 1921, c. 57, as amended (the "CTC Act"):
> (a) the right to purchase, lease or otherwise acquire and hold lands for the Ambassador Bridge and its terminal yards, including its accommodation works and facilities, as CTC thinks necessary in its discretion;
> (b) the right to expropriate and take an easement in, over, under or through any lands without the necessity of acquiring a title in fee simple thereto; and
> (c) an obligation, as set out in By-Law Number 1606 of The Town of Sandwich ("Sandwich By-Law"), to keep and maintain the Ambassador Bridge and all works connected therewith in good order and condition and of sufficient strength and capacity at all times to sustain and protect such machinery and structures and also the vehicles and traffic that may be carried or allowed thereon;
> 3. A declaration that, pursuant to paragraphs 1 and 2 above, the Corporation of the City of Windsor By-Law Number 147-2011, titled a By-Law to Establish Standards for the Maintenance and Occupancy of All Property in the City of Windsor and to Repeal By-Law 156-2005 (the "By- Law"), does not apply to properties purchased, leased or otherwise acquired and held by CTC pursuant to its enabling legislation;
> 4. A declaration that certain properties purchased by CTC which are immediately west of and/or adjacent to the Ambassador Bridge (the "Properties") are necessary for the continued operation and maintenance of the Ambassador Bridge;
> (A.R., vol. I, at pp. 47-48)

[29] Although the Company has tied each of these declarations to the CTC Act, the main federal legislation involved, it is clear that what the Company ultimately seeks is immunity from the requirements of the By-law. The third declaration — that the By-law does not apply to the properties — is the essence of the Company's claim. There has been no suggestion by the Company that the other declarations — that the Ambassador Bridge is a federal undertaking, that the Company enjoys certain rights under the CTC Act, and that the properties are necessary for the continued operation of the bridge — would be worthwhile pursuing in the absence of the third declaration. Adopting "a realistic appreciation of the practical result sought by the claimant" (Domtar, at para. 28), the real issue is whether the Company's rights under the CTC Act are subject to the By-law. The first, second and fourth declarations sought by the Company are valuable to the Company only to the extent they help it establish, by the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity or paramountcy, that the By-law is inapplicable or inoperative against the Company. In essence, the Company's claim is simply that it is not required to comply with the By-law and repair the properties as the City has ordered.

[30] Stated generally, the issue is whether the Federal Court has jurisdiction to decide a claim that a municipal by-law is constitutionally inapplicable or inoperative in relation to a federal undertaking.

B. Overview of the Role and Jurisdiction of the Federal Court

[31] The role and jurisdiction of the Federal Court appear most clearly when seen through the lens of the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 96 recognized the superior courts of general jurisdiction which already existed in each province at the time of Confederation. Section 101 empowered Parliament to establish "additional Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada" — i.e., to establish new courts to administer federal law (R. v. Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Ltd., 1979 CanLII 187 (SCC), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 695, at p. 707; Quebec North Shore Paper Co. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1976 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1054 , at pp. 1065-66; Consolidated Distilleries, Ltd. v. The King, 1933 CanLII 316 (UK JCPC), [1933] A.C. 508 (P.C.), at pp. 520-22). Parliament exercised this power in 1875 when it enacted legislation creating the Exchequer Court of Canada, which ultimately became the Federal Court of Canada (see The Supreme and Exchequer Court Act, S.C. 1875, c. 11). The Federal Court plays an important role in the interpretation and development of federal law in matters over which it has been granted jurisdiction.

[32] The provincial superior courts recognized by s. 96 "have always occupied a position of prime importance in the constitutional pattern of this country" (Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1982] 2 S.C.R. 307, at p. 327, per Estey J.). Provincially administered (s. 92(14)) and federally appointed (ss. 96 and 100), they weave together provincial and federal concerns and act as a strong unifying force within our federation. As courts of general jurisdiction, the superior courts have jurisdiction in all cases except where jurisdiction has been removed by statute (Québec Téléphone v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, 1971 CanLII 160 (SCC), [1972] S.C.R. 182, at p. 190). The inherent jurisdiction of the superior courts can be constrained by legislation, but s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867 protects the essential nature and powers of the provincial superior courts from legislative incursion (Ontario v. Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, 2013 SCC 43 , [2013] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 18; MacMillan Bloedel Ltd. v. Simpson, 1995 CanLII 57 (SCC) , [1995] 4 S.C.R. 725 , at para. 15).

[33] The Federal Court, by contrast, has only the jurisdiction it has been conferred by statute.[1] It is a statutory court, created under the constitutional authority of s. 101, without inherent jurisdiction. While the Federal Court plays a critical role in our judicial system, its jurisdiction is not constitutionally protected in the same way as that of a s. 96 court. It can act only within the constitutional boundaries of s. 101 and the confines of its statutory powers.[2] As this Court noted in Roberts v. Canada, 1989 CanLII 122 (SCC), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 322, at p. 331, "[b]ecause the Federal Court is without any inherent jurisdiction such as that existing in provincial superior courts, the language of the [Federal Court Act] is completely determinative of the scope of the Court's jurisdiction."

C. The ITO Test for Jurisdiction

[34] This Court held in ITO that a statutory grant of jurisdiction is necessary, but not alone sufficient, for the Federal Court to have jurisdiction in a given case. Because Parliament established the Federal Court pursuant to its competence, under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, to establish "additional Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada", the role of the Federal Court is constitutionally limited to administering "the Laws of Canada", which in this context means federal law (Thomas Fuller, at p. 707; Quebec North Shore, at pp. 1065-66; Consolidated Distilleries, at pp. 521-22). The three-part ITO test for jurisdiction is designed to ensure the Federal Court does not overstep this limited role (ITO, at p. 766, per McIntyre J.):

1. There must be a statutory grant of jurisdiction by the federal Parliament.

2. There must be an existing body of federal law which is essential to the disposition of the case and which nourishes the statutory grant of jurisdiction.

3. The law on which the case is based must be "a law of Canada" as the phrase is used in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[35] The first part of this test addresses the specific statutory grant of jurisdiction. There is a certain degree of overlap between the second and third aspects of this test, which both address the need to stay within the constitutional limits of s. 101.

D. ITO Part 1: Statutory Grant of Jurisdiction

[36] The first part of the ITO test requires that a federal statute grant jurisdiction to the Federal Court.

[37] The Federal Court of Appeal found, and the Company submits, that s. 23(c) of the Federal Courts Act grants jurisdiction over the Company's application. I cannot agree.

[38] Once again, s. 23(c) reads as follows:

> 23 Except to the extent that jurisdiction has been otherwise specially assigned, the Federal Court has concurrent original jurisdiction, between subject and subject as well as otherwise, in all cases in which a claim for relief is made or a remedy is sought under an Act of Parliament or otherwise in relation to any matter coming within any of the following classes of subjects:
> . . .
> (c) works and undertakings connecting a province with any other province or extending beyond the limits of a province.

[39] As the text of the provision indicates, s. 23(c) grants jurisdiction to the Federal Court only when three criteria are met:

(1) jurisdiction must not have been "specially assigned" to another court;

(2) the claim for relief must be made, or the remedy must be sought, "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise"; and,

(3) the claim for relief must be made, or the remedy must be sought, "in relation to" a work or undertaking connecting a province with any other province or extending beyond the limits of a province.

[40] Only the second criterion is at issue in this appeal. In Quebec North Shore, this Court interpreted the phrase "under an Act of the Parliament of Canada or otherwise" (as it read then) to mean under "federal law, whether under statute or regulation or common law" and concluded "[s]ection 23 requires that the claim for relief be one sought under such law" (p. 1066 (emphasis added)). Laskin C.J. reasoned that provisions of the Federal Court Act which confer jurisdiction on the Federal Court should not be interpreted as unconstitutionally exceeding Parliament's competence under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to establish courts for the better administration of federal law (pp. 1057-58).

[41] Quebec North Shore makes clear that s. 23 grants jurisdiction to the Federal Court only when the claimant is seeking relief under federal law. As I read Quebec North Shore, the implication is that the claimant's cause of action, or the right to seek relief, must be created or recognized by a federal statute, a federal regulation or a rule of the common law dealing with a subject matter of federal legislative competence. This is what it means to seek relief "under" federal law in s. 23.

[42] In Roberts, for example, Wilson J. offered this paraphrase of Quebec North Shore: ". . . the cause of action must be founded 'on some existing federal law, whether statute or regulation or common law'" (p. 339, quoting Quebec North Shore, at p. 1066 (emphasis added)). If the claimant's cause of action or right to seek relief is not created or recognized by federal law, s. 23 does not confer jurisdiction on the Federal Court.

[43] Thus, in Quebec North Shore itself, s. 23 did not confer jurisdiction: although the claimants were seeking relief in relation to an extra-provincial undertaking, the claimants were not seeking relief under federal law. Rather, the claimants were seeking relief under the Quebec law of contract. Similarly, in Norrail Transport Inc. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd. (1998), 1998 CanLII 7641 (FC), 154 F.T.R. 161, which also involved an extra-provincial undertaking, s. 23 did not confer jurisdiction because the causes of action were in the Quebec law of contract and the Quebec law of fault.

[44] By contrast, s. 23 did confer jurisdiction in Prudential Assurance Co. v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 2948 (FCA), [1993] 2 F.C. 293 (C.A.), which was a claim for damages brought under the federal Carriage by Air Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-26. Bensol Customs Brokers Ltd. v. Air Canada, 1979 CanLII 4235 (FCA), [1979] 2 F.C. 575 (C.A.), was another claim for damages under the federal Carriage by Air Act in which s. 23 was held to confer jurisdiction. The claimants in that case brought a tort claim as well; however, the majority of the Federal Court of Appeal held that s. 23 did not confer jurisdiction over the tort claim.

[45] The Federal Court of Appeal in this case did not consider whether the Company was seeking relief under federal law, nor did it refer to Quebec North Shore. The court's paraphrase of s. 23(c) — that it empowers a party to seek a declaration in relation to works and undertakings connecting a province with any other province or extending beyond the limits of a province (para. 27) — suggests it is sufficient if the subject matter of the litigation is an extra-provincial undertaking. This paraphrase does not acknowledge or give any meaning to the requirement that relief be sought "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise".

[46] This phrase cannot be ignored or rendered superfluous. Section 23(c) confers jurisdiction "in all cases in which a claim for relief is made or a remedy is sought under an Act of Parliament or otherwise in relation to [an extra-provincial undertaking]". If Parliament had intended the Federal Court to have jurisdiction whenever relief is sought in relation to an extra-provincial undertaking, whether or not that relief is sought under federal law, it would not have added the qualifier that the relief must be sought "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise". The explicit language of s. 23 requires that the relief be sought under — and not merely in relation to — federal law. This is even clearer in the French version of s. 23, which requires relief to be sought "sous le régime d'une loi fédérale ou d'une autre règle de droit".

[47] The Federal Court of Appeal stated that a broad scope of Federal Court jurisdiction would promote consistency across the country in the interpretation of federal law. However, such an objective does not justify departing from the explicit language of s. 23. I also note that concerns about consistency can cut both ways. The jurisdiction s. 23 confers on the Federal Court is concurrent with the provincial superior courts. Even if this Court accepted that s. 23 granted the Federal Court jurisdiction in cases like this one, litigants could choose to bring their claim in a superior court rather than the Federal Court.

[48] Requiring the right to seek relief to arise directly from federal law brings clarity to the scope of the Federal Court's concurrent jurisdiction. Giving effect to the explicit wording of s. 23 minimizes jurisdictional disputes by ensuring that litigants know the scope of the Federal Court's jurisdiction in advance. This will avoid unnecessary litigation, including disputes about whether the court should decline to exercise jurisdiction even if it has jurisdiction to hear the matter.

[49] In its written submissions, the Company said it was seeking relief "in relation to" the CTC Act. In response to a question asked during oral argument, the Company submitted it is seeking relief under s. 23(c) itself, or alternatively under the CTC Act.

[50] The Company stresses that the Federal Courts Act defines "relief" to include declarations. In the Company's submission, this definition means that s. 23(c) gives parties the right to apply to the Federal Court for declarations about extra-provincial undertakings.

[51] This argument cannot be sustained. A definition simply provides the meaning for a term used in the legislation. If Parliament had spelled out the full definition of the defined term "relief" — "every species of relief, whether by way of damages, payment of money, injunction, declaration, restitution of an incorporeal right, return of land or chattels or otherwise" — in s. 23, it would not change the meaning of the words of the provision.

[52] Effect must still be given to the words "is sought under an Act of Parliament or otherwise" in s. 23. Had Parliament intended the Federal Courts Act to grant jurisdiction to the Federal Court to provide any relief (as defined broadly) in relation to the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 23, it would simply have said so. It would be circular to reason that s. 23 is self-referential: it is not itself a federal law under which the Company can seek relief, however "relief" is defined. Rather, as Shore J. found at first instance, s. 23 confers on the Federal Court jurisdiction over certain claims, including certain claims for declarations, but does not confer on parties the right to make those claims in the first place. For that right, parties must look to other federal law.

[53] Prudential Assurance, for example, was a claim brought under the Carriage by Air Act, which creates a cause of action against air carriers for damage to baggage and cargo. The type of relief the plaintiffs were seeking was damages, which, like declarations, falls within the definition of "relief" in the Federal Court Act, but nothing in the jurisdictional analysis turned on the type of relief the plaintiffs were seeking. What mattered was that the plaintiffs were seeking relief under federal law: the cause of action was created by the federal Carriage by Air Act. It was the federal Carriage by Air Act which gave the plaintiffs the right to seek damages from the carrier.

[54] Other federal causes of action that might satisfy s. 23 include the Radiocommunication Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. R-2, s. 18(1) (a person who has suffered a loss as a result of conduct contrary to certain sections of the Act may, "in any court of competent jurisdiction, sue for and recover damages from the person who engaged in the conduct"), and the Canada Transportation Act, S.C. 1996, c. 10, s. 116(5) (a person "aggrieved by any neglect or refusal of a company to fulfil its service obligations has . . . an action for the neglect or refusal against the company").

[55] When a party seeks relief under provisions such as these, s. 23 may grant jurisdiction to the Federal Court, assuming the other requirements of s. 23 are met. But a person cannot seek relief under s. 23 itself. It does not create any right of action. It merely confers on the Federal Court jurisdiction to provide relief that a person can otherwise seek "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise".

[56] The Company further submits that Strickland v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 37, [2015] 2 S.C.R. 713, which dealt with a similar provision of the Federal Courts Act, requires that s. 23 be read as conferring a right to seek relief. But Strickland was argued on the assumption that s. 18 of the Federal Courts Act conferred on the claimants the right to seek a declaration that certain federal regulations were invalid. (Section 18 confers exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal Court "to issue an injunction, writ of certiorari, writ of prohibition, writ of mandamus or writ of quo warranto, or grant declaratory relief, against any federal board, commission or other tribunal".) Cromwell J. expressly stated that he was not endorsing the parties' assumption that s. 18 conferred on the claimants the right to seek the declaration they were seeking (para. 6). The issue in Strickland was whether, assuming the Federal Court had jurisdiction to make the declaration, it could decline to make the declaration on the ground that it would be more appropriate for the claim to be heard in a provincial superior court. In short, Strickland concerned only the scope of the Federal Court's remedial discretion, not the interpretation of s. 18 — let alone the interpretation of s. 23.

[57] The Company's alternative submission, that it is seeking relief under the CTC Act, is similarly unpersuasive. Although the CTC Act confers certain rights and powers (and imposes certain responsibilities) on the Company, it does not give the Company any kind of right of action or right to seek the relief sought.

[58] The essence of the Company's position is that the By-law is inapplicable by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity or inoperative by the doctrine of paramountcy. The Company is seeking relief under constitutional law, because it is constitutional law which confers on parties the right to seek a declaration that a law is inapplicable or inoperative.

[59] A party seeking relief under constitutional law is not seeking relief "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise" within the meaning of s. 23. I agree with the City and the interveners, including the Attorney General of Canada, that constitutional law cannot be said to be federal law for the purposes of s. 23 (see also, e.g., P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 7-27; B. J. Saunders, D. J. Rennie and G. Garton, Federal Courts Practice 2014 (2013), at p. 9).

[60] The Federal Court of Appeal effectively concluded otherwise in its discussion of the additional issue that court raised, namely whether the Federal Court has the power to make constitutional declarations. The court suggested that the Constitution is one of the "Laws of Canada" referred to in s. 101, as are the constitutional doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and paramountcy. On this logic, these doctrines would also qualify as federal law for the purposes of s. 23.

[61] First, this conclusion is contrary to this Court's comments in Northern Telecom Canada Ltd. v. Communication Workers of Canada, 1983 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 733, at p. 745, per Estey J.:

> The Constitution Act, 1867, as amended, is not of course a "law of Canada" in the sense of the foregoing cases because it was not enacted by the Parliament of Canada. The inherent limitation placed by s. 101, supra, on the jurisdiction which may be granted to the Federal Court by Parliament therefore might exclude a proceeding founded on the Constitution Act.

This passage is not equivocal on the issue of whether the Constitution Act, 1867 is one of the "Laws of Canada" denoted by s. 101. Although obiter, the comments were intended to provide guidance and should be accepted as authoritative (see R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76, [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609, at para. 57).

[62] Nor did our Constitution became one of the "Laws of Canada" after 1982. In concluding otherwise, the Federal Court of Appeal reasoned that although the enactments which together make up our Constitution were originally enacted or authorized by the Parliament of the United Kingdom, the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11, "patriated" our Constitution in part by providing that the Constitution Act, 1982 "is hereby enacted for and shall have the force of law in Canada" (s. 1)[3]. The Constitution Act, 1982 in turn empowered Canadians to amend the Constitution (ss. 38 to 49) and referred to the Constitution as the "supreme law of Canada" (s. 52). From this, the Federal Court of Appeal inferred that the enactments which together make up the Constitution became "Laws of Canada" after 1982.

[63] However, "Canada" has two distinct meanings in our Constitution. It can denote the country as a whole or the federal level within it. In section 1 of the Canada Act 1982 and s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, "Canada" denotes the country as a whole. As this Court has confirmed on a number of occasions, in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, "Canada" denotes only the federal level (Thomas Fuller, at p. 707; Quebec North Shore, at pp. 1065-66; Consolidated Distilleries, at pp. 520-22). Further, interpreting "Canada" in s. 101 to denote the country as a whole, such that Parliament could create additional courts of general (federal and provincial) jurisdiction, would be inconsistent with the other judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867, which take as their "basic principle . . . the jurisdiction of the superior courts of the provinces in all matters federal and provincial" (Thomas Fuller, at p. 713). After the 1982 "patriation", the Constitution is certainly a law of Canada the country, as opposed to a law of the United Kingdom, but it is not one of the "Laws of Canada", the federal laws, referred to in s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[64] Obviously, the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and paramountcy arise from s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and can affect the force of federal legislation. However, these constitutional doctrines can also affect the force of provincial legislation. Surely constitutional law is neither federal nor provincial. The Constitution logically precedes that distinction: it is the Constitution itself that bifurcates Canadian law into federal and provincial matters.

[65] In conclusion, the Company is not seeking relief "under an Act of Parliament or otherwise" (i.e., under federal law) as required by s. 23(c) of the Federal Courts Act. Section 23(c) therefore does not grant jurisdiction over this application to the Federal Court and the first part of the ITO test is not met. There is no statutory grant of jurisdiction. This finding is dispositive: the Federal Court lacks jurisdiction in this case. There is therefore no need to consider whether the second and third parts of the ITO test are met in this case.

E. ITO Part 2: Federal Law Essential to Disposition

[66] Nonetheless, the approach taken by the Federal Court of Appeal with respect to the second part of the ITO test merits comment.

[67] The second part of the ITO test requires that federal law be "essential to the disposition of the case" such that it "nourishes the statutory grant of jurisdiction" (p. 766, per McIntyre J.). Indeed, the fact that the claim involves rights and obligations conferred by federal law will be relevant to this question. This requirement is important because it speaks to the constitutional status and role of the Federal Court under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[68] The Federal Court of Appeal concluded that this part of the test is met because "there [is] sufficient federal law for the Federal Court to have jurisdiction" (para. 32). The reasons refer to a number of articulations by the Federal Court of Appeal of this part of the ITO test: Bensol Customs Brokers, at pp. 582-83 (whether the outcome is determined "to some material extent" by federal law or the cause of action is "affected" by federal law); The Queen v. Montreal Urban Community Transit Commission, 1980 CanLII 4268 (FCA), [1980] 2 F.C. 151 (C.A.), at p. 153 (whether federal law "has an important part to play" in determining the outcome).

[69] These articulations of the test should not be understood to lower in any way the high threshold articulated in ITO itself. The fact that the Federal Court may have to consider federal law as a necessary component is not alone sufficient; federal law must be "essential to the disposition of the case". It must "nourish" the grant of jurisdiction.

VI. Disposition

[72] Because the ITO test is not met, the application is "bereft of any possibility of success" (JP Morgan, at para. 47, quoting David Bull Laboratories (Canada) Inc. v. Pharmacia Inc., 1994 CanLII 3529 (FCA), [1995] 1 F.C. 588 (C.A.), at p. 600). It is plain and obvious that the Federal Court lacks jurisdiction to hear the application. Shore J. did not err in striking the notice of application and the Federal Court of Appeal ought not to have intervened. I would, accordingly, allow the appeal, set aside the order of the Federal Court of Appeal and reinstate the order of Shore J. striking the Company's notice of application. I would also award costs to the City in this Court and in the courts below.

The Supreme Court of Canada sits at the apex of the Canadian judicial system. But its place is not expressly protected by the text of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, like the Federal Courts, Parliament established the Supreme Court of Canada under s.101 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which gives it the power to "provide for the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada…".

The Supreme Court Act sets out the requirements and standards for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada. Perhaps most controversially, it provides that three of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of Canada must be appointed "from among the judges of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec or from among the advocates of that Province" (see Supreme Court Act, s.6). This provision exists because the Supreme Court hears appeals on cases involving Quebec civil law.

In 2013, then-Prime Minister Harper announced the nomination of Federal Court of Appeal Justice Marc Nadon to the Supreme Court of Canada. The question was whether the Justice Nadon could be appointed to the Supreme Court, considering he was not strictly "among the advocates" of the Province of Quebec at the time of his appointment.

In concluding that Justice Nadon was not eligible for appointment, the Supreme Court of Canada reasoned that the place of the Supreme Court in Canada's constitutional pattern is protected, even though the Supreme Court—like the Federal Courts—were established by ordinary statute. It did so even in the face of a subsequent amendment to the Supreme Court Act which stipulated that former advocates in the province of Quebec would be eligible for appointment to the Supreme Court.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND LEBEL, ABELLA, CROMWELL, KARAKATSANIS AND WAGNER JJ. —

I. Introduction

[1] The Supreme Court Act provides that three of the nine judges of the Supreme Court of Canada must be appointed "from among the judges of the Court of Appeal or of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec or from among the advocates of that Province": R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, s. 6. This reference seeks our opinion on two aspects of the eligibility requirements for appointment to these three Quebec seats.

[2] The first is whether a person who was at any time an advocate of at least 10 years standing at the Barreau du Québec qualifies for appointment under s. 6 as being "from among the advocates of that Province". If the answer to the first question is no, the second question arises. It is whether Parliament can enact legislation to make such a person eligible for appointment to one of the three Quebec seats on the Court. The answer to these questions — which on their face raise issues of statutory interpretation — engage more fundamental issues about the composition of the Court and its place in Canada's legal and constitutional order.

[3] These questions arise in the context of the appointment under s. 6 of the Honourable Marc Nadon, a supernumerary judge of the Federal Court of Appeal and formerly, but not at the time of this appointment, a member of the Quebec bar of more than 10 years standing. Justice Nadon was not a judge of the Court of Appeal or the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec and therefore was not eligible for appointment on that basis. The narrow question is thus whether he was eligible for appointment because he had previously been a member of the Quebec bar.

[4] In our view, the answer to this question is no: a current judge of the Federal Court of Appeal is not eligible for appointment under s. 6 as a person who may be appointed "from among the advocates of that Province". This language requires that, at the time of appointment, the appointee be a current member of the Quebec bar with at least 10 years standing.

[5] On the question of whether Parliament can enact legislation purporting to declare a binding interpretation of s. 6 and thereby permit the appointment of a former member of the bar to one of the Quebec positions on the Court, our view is that the answer is also no. The eligibility requirements set out in s. 6 relate to the composition of the Court and are, therefore, constitutionally protected. Under s. 41(d) of the Constitution Act, 1982, any amendment in relation to the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada may only be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province.

[6] The practical effect is that the appointment of Justice Nadon and his swearing-in as a judge of the Court were void ab initio. He remains a supernumerary judge of the Federal Court of Appeal.

[72] In light of our conclusion that appointments to the Court under s. 6 require current membership of the Barreau du Québec or of the Court of Appeal or Superior Court of Quebec, in addition to the criteria set out in s. 5, it is necessary to consider the second question, which is whether Parliament can enact declaratory legislation that would alter the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada.

[73] The Attorney General of Canada argues that the eligibility requirements for appointments under s. 6 have not been entrenched in the Constitution, and that Parliament retains the plenary power under s. 101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to unilaterally amend the eligibility criteria under ss. 5 and 6.

[74] We disagree. Parliament cannot unilaterally change the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada. Essential features of the Court are constitutionally protected under Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982. Changes to the composition of the Court can only be made under the procedure provided for in s. 41[1] of the Constitution Act, 1982 and therefore require the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. Changes to the other essential features of the Court can only be made under the procedure provided for in s. 42[2] of the Constitution Act, 1982, which requires the consent of at least seven provinces representing, in the aggregate, at least half of the population of all the provinces.

[75] We will first discuss the history of how the Court became constitutionally protected, and then answer the Attorney General of Canada's arguments on this issue. Finally, we will discuss the effect of the declaratory provisions enacted by Parliament.

B. Evolution of the Constitutional Status of the Supreme Court

[76] The Supreme Court's constitutional status initially arose from the Court's historical evolution into an institution whose continued existence and functioning engaged the interests of both Parliament and the provinces. The Court's status was then confirmed by the Constitution Act, 1982, which reflected the understanding that the Court's essential features formed part of the Constitution of Canada.

(1) The Supreme Court's Evolution Prior to Patriation

[77] At Confederation, there was no Supreme Court of Canada. Nor were the details of what would eventually become the Supreme Court expounded in the Constitution Act, 1867. It was assumed that the ultimate judicial authority for Canada would continue to be the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London. For example, George-Étienne Cartier, then the Attorney General for Canada East, expressed the view that "we shall always have our court of final appeal in Her Majesty's Privy Council", even if a general court of appeal for Canada were to be established domestically: Province of Canada, Legislative Assembly, Parliamentary Debates on the Subject of the Confederation of the British North American Provinces, 3rd Sess., 8th Parl., March 2, 1865, at p. 576.

[78] The Constitution Act, 1867, however, gave Parliament the authority to establish a general court of appeal for Canada:

> 101. The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from Time to Time provide for the Constitution, Maintenance, and Organization of a General Court of Appeal for Canada, and for the Establishment of any additional Courts for the better Administration of the Laws of Canada.

[79] The Parliamentary debates between 1868 and 1875 over whether to create a Supreme Court were instigated by Sir John A. Macdonald, who was Canada's Prime Minister and Minister of Justice from 1867 to 1873. He introduced bills for the establishment of the Supreme Court in 1869 and again in 1870 in the House of Commons. Both bills, which did not reserve any seats on the Court for Quebec jurists, faced staunch opposition from Quebec in Parliament. The first bill died on the Order Paper and the second was withdrawn.

[80] In addition to Quebec's opposition, the nature of the court's jurisdiction was contested, and many questioned whether a general court of appeal was even needed. Since an appeal to the Privy Council was available and Ontario and Quebec already had provincial courts of appeal, a Supreme Court would only be an intermediate step on the way to London.

[81] The bill that finally became the Supreme Court Act was introduced in 1875 by the federal Minister of Justice, Télesphore Fournier, and was adopted after several amendments (1875 Debates, February 23, 1875, at p. 284). The new Supreme Court had general appellate jurisdiction over civil, criminal, and constitutional cases. In addition, the Court was given an exceptional original jurisdiction not incompatible with its appellate jurisdiction, for instance to consider references from the Governor in Council: Re References by the Governor-General in Council (1910), 1910 CanLII 29 (SCC), 43 S.C.R. 536, affirmed on appeal to the Privy Council, 1912 CanLII 407 (UK JCPC), [1912] A.C. 571 (sub nom. Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada); Secession Reference, at para. 9.

[82] Under the authority newly granted by the Statute of Westminster, 1931, Parliament abolished criminal appeals to the Privy Council in 1933 (An Act to amend the Criminal Code, S.C. 1932-33, c. 53, s. 17). Of even more historic significance, in 1949, it abolished all appeals to the Privy Council (An Act to amend the Supreme Court Act, s. 3). This had a profound effect on the constitutional architecture of Canada. The Privy Council had exercised ultimate judicial authority over all legal disputes in Canada, including those arising from Canada's Constitution. It played a central role in this country's constitutional structure, by, among other things, delineating the contours of federal and provincial jurisdiction through a number of landmark cases that continue to inform our understanding of the division of powers to this day (John T. Saywell, The Lawmakers: Judicial Power and the Shaping of Canadian Federalism (2002); Warren J. Newman, "The Constitutional Status of the Supreme Court of Canada" (2009), 47 S.C.L.R. (2d) 429, at p. 439). As Warren Newman explains:

> . . . the supreme appellate function of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was an integral part of the Canadian judicial system until it was ultimately displaced by the Parliament of Canada in favour of the Supreme Court. Canadians could do without a general court of appeal for Canada as long as the Judicial Committee continued to play that role. With the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council, the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada became essential. [p. 439]

[83] The abolition of appeals to the Privy Council meant that the Supreme Court of Canada inherited the role of the Council under the Canadian Constitution. As a result, the Court assumed the powers and jurisdiction "no less in scope than those formerly exercised in relation to Canada by the Judicial Committee" (Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, 1957 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1957] S.C.R. 198, at p. 212), including adjudicating disputes over federalism. The need for a final, independent judicial arbiter of disputes over federal-provincial jurisdiction is implicit in a federal system:

> Inherent in a federal system is the need for an impartial arbiter of jurisdictional disputes over the boundaries of federal and provincial powers (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC) , [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 124). That impartial arbiter is the judiciary, charged with "control[ling] the limits of the respective sovereignties" (Northern Telecom Canada Ltd. v. Communication Workers of Canada, 1983 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1983] 1 S.C.R. 733, at p. 741).

[85] With the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the continued existence and functioning of the Supreme Court of Canada became a key matter of interest to both Parliament and the provinces. The Court assumed a vital role as an institution forming part of the federal system. It became the final arbiter of division of powers disputes, and became the final word on matters of public law and provincial civil law. Drawing on the expertise of its judges from Canada's two legal traditions, the Court ensured that the common law and the civil law would evolve side by side, while each maintained its distinctive character. The Court thus became central to the functioning of legal systems within each province and, more broadly, to the development of a unified and coherent Canadian legal system.

[86] The role of the Supreme Court of Canada was further enhanced as the 20th century unfolded. In 1975, Parliament amended the Supreme Court Act to end appeals as of right to the Court in civil cases (S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 18). This gave the Court control over its civil docket, and allowed it to focus on questions of public legal importance. As a result, the Court's "mandate became oriented less to error correction and more to development of the jurisprudence": R. v. Henry, 2005 SCC 76 , [2005] 3 S.C.R. 609, at para. 53.

[87] As a result of these developments, the Supreme Court emerged as a constitutionally essential institution engaging both federal and provincial interests. Increasingly, those concerned with constitutional reform accepted that future reforms would have to recognize the Supreme Court's position within the architecture of the Constitution.

(2) The Supreme Court and Patriation

[88] We have seen that the Supreme Court was already essential under the Constitution's architecture as the final arbiter of division of powers disputes and as the final general court of appeal for Canada. The Constitution Act, 1982 enhanced the Court's role under the Constitution and confirmed its status as a constitutionally protected institution.

[89] Patriation of the Constitution was accompanied by the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which gave the courts the responsibility for interpreting and remedying breaches of the Charter. Patriation also brought an explicit acknowledgement that the Constitution is the "supreme law of Canada":

> 52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

The existence of an impartial and authoritative judicial arbiter is a necessary corollary of the enactment of the supremacy clause. The judiciary became the "guardian of the constitution" (Hunter, at p. 155, per Dickson J.). As such, the Supreme Court of Canada is a foundational premise of the Constitution. With the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1982, "the Canadian system of government was transformed to a significant extent from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy": Secession Reference, at para. 72.

[90] Accordingly, the Constitution Act, 1982 confirmed the constitutional protection of the essential features of the Supreme Court. Indeed, Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 expressly makes changes to the Supreme Court and to its composition subject to constitutional amending procedures.

[91] Under s. 41(d), the unanimous consent of Parliament and all provincial legislatures is required for amendments to the Constitution relating to the "composition of the Supreme Court". The notion of "composition" refers to ss. 4(1), 5 and 6 of the Supreme Court Act, which codify the composition of and eligibility requirements for appointment to the Supreme Court of Canada as they existed in 1982. By implication, s. 41(d) also protects the continued existence of the Court, since abolition would altogether remove the Court's composition.

[92] The textual origin of Part V was the "April Accord" of 1981 (Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan (1981)), to which eight provinces, including Quebec, were parties. The explanatory notes to this Accord confirm that the intention was to limit Parliament's unilateral authority to reform the Supreme Court. That sentiment finds particular expression in the explanatory note for what became s. 41, which requires unanimity for amendments relating to five matters, including the composition of the Supreme Court: "This section recognizes that some matters are of such fundamental importance that amendments in relation to them should require the consent of all the provincial Legislatures and Parliament" (p. 9 (note 9)). Pointedly, the explanatory note to s. 41(d) states: "This clause would ensure that the Supreme > Court of Canada is comprised of judges a proportion of whom are drawn from the Bar or Bench of Quebec and are, therefore, trained in the civil law" (p. 9 (note 9(d))). The intention of the provision was demonstrably to make it difficult to change the composition of the Court, and to ensure that Quebec's representation was given special constitutional protection.

> [93] The fact that the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada was singled out for special protection in s. 41(d) is unsurprising, since the Court's composition has been long recognized as crucial to its ability to function effectively and with sufficient institutional legitimacy as the final court of appeal for Canada. As explained above, the central bargain that led to the creation of the Supreme Court in the first place was the guarantee that a significant proportion of the judges would be drawn from institutions linked to Quebec civil law and culture. The objective of ensuring representation from Quebec's distinct juridical tradition remains no less compelling today, and implicates the competence, legitimacy, and integrity of the Court. Requiring unanimity for changes to the composition of the Court gave Quebec constitutional assurance that changes to its representation on the Court would not be effected without its consent. Protecting the composition of the Court under s. 41(d) was necessary because leaving its protection to s. 42(1)(d) would have left open the possibility that Quebec's seats on the Court could have been reduced or altogether removed without Quebec's agreement.
> [94] Section 42(1)(d) applies the 7/50 amending procedure to the essential features of the Court, rather than to all of the provisions of the Supreme Court Act.[3] The express mention of the Supreme Court of Canada in s. 42(1)(d) is intended to ensure the proper functioning of the Supreme Court. This requires the constitutional protection of the essential features of the Court, understood in light of the role that it had come to play in the Canadian constitutional structure by the time of patriation. These essential features include, at the very least, the Court's jurisdiction as the final general court of appeal for Canada, including in matters of constitutional interpretation, and its independence.
> [95] In summary, the Supreme Court gained constitutional status as a result of its evolution into the final general court of appeal for Canada, with jurisdiction to hear appeals concerning all the laws of Canada and the provinces, including the Constitution. This status was confirmed in the Constitution Act, 1982, which made modifications of the Court's composition and other essential features subject to stringent amending procedures.

14 Conclusion

The words of ss.96-100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 are simple, but they have come to mean more than they indicate. Supported by unwritten constitutional principles like the rule of law, the jurisprudence has developed to protect the core jurisdiction of superior courts and the independence of judicial actors beyond the superior courts. The courts have built on the bare words of s.96, establishing a set of standards that guarantee the role of the courts and their independence in the constitutional framework. The decision in Trial Lawyers also serves to guarantee a certain right of access to the superior courts, one that cannot be unduly limited by government restrictions like fees.

Today, ss.96-100 are the structural framework for a broader set of unwritten constitutional principles, providing an array of guarantees supporting the independence of the judges of the superior courts. Those guarantees, alongside the route of access set out in Trial Lawyers, solidifies the centrality of the superior courts in the Canadian constitutional framework.

At the same time, it would be too quick to say the superior courts are the totality of the Canadian judicial system. The Federal Courts play an important function in the Canadian judicial system. The Federal Courts facilitate the uniform application of federal law, promoting rule of law values like certainty and predictability. Similarly, the provincial inferior courts deal with matters of deep importance to the litigants involved. They, too, play a central role in the Canadian judicial system.

Chapter 4: The Law and History of Constitutional Amendment

By Richard Albert, Dave Guénette, and Catherine Mathieu

In this first part, we will look at the main features of the Canadian constitutional amendment procedure, the long process that brought it into being, and the constitutional amendments that have taken place since 1982.

1 Constitutional amendments before patriation

The Confederation of 1867 was the process by which the United Province of Canada was divided into two provinces, to become Ontario and Quebec, these two new provinces then joining New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to form a new "Dominion" named Canada. As mentioned in the preamble to the British North America Act, "the Provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick have expressed their Desire to be federally united into One Dominion under the Crown of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, with a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom."

After Confederation, the power to amend the "Constitution of Canada" remained a prerogative of the British Parliament, as Canada was still a colony. That being said, many provisions allowed "constitutional changes" to happen in Canada, whether they are the work of the provinces or the Federal Parliament. As we shall see, this power has increased over time, in particular with regard to the admission of new provinces, but also to include a more "general" formula for amending the Constitution. After the Statute of Westminster, there were many attempts to "patriate" the Constitution, which eventually led to a formal Patriation, in 1982. In this section, we will deal with amendment powers that were in place before Patriation.

1.1 The Colonial Laws Validity Act

Even before Confederation, in 1867, the colonies of British North America had the power to amend their own "constitution." While there was some ambiguity on this subject for a while, the Colonial Laws Validity Act confirmed this power, in 1865.

> Colonial Laws Validity Act, 28 & 29 Victoria, c. 63 (U.K.).
> An Act to remove Doubts as for the Validity of Colonial Laws
> WHEREAS doubts have been entertained respecting the validity of divers laws enacted or purporting to have been enacted by the legislatures of certain of Her Majesty's colonies, and respecting the powers of such legislatures, and it is expedient that such doubts should be removed:
> 5. […] Representative legislatures may alter their constitutions.

> Every colonial legislature shall have, and be deemed at all times to have had, full power within its jurisdiction to establish courts of judicature, and to abolish and reconstitute the same, and to alter the constitution thereof, and to make provision for the administration of justice therein; and every representative legislature shall, in respect to the colony under its jurisdiction, have, and be deemed at all times to have had, full power to make laws respecting the constitution, powers, and procedure of such legislature; provided that such laws shall have been passed in such manner and form as may from time to time he required by any Act of Parliament, letters patent, Order in Council, or colonial law for the time being in force in the said colony.

1.2 The British North America Act and the provinces

Directly in line with the Colonial Laws Validity Act, in the British North America Act of 1867, provinces kept the power to amend their own constitution:

> British North America Act, 30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3 (U.K.).
> […]
> VI. Distribution of Legislative Powers
> […]
> Subjects of exclusive Provincial Legislation
> 92 In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,
> 1. The Amendment from Time to Time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the Constitution of the Province, except as regards the Office of Lieutenant Governor.

In 1987, in its Ontario (Attorney General) v OPSEU case, the Supreme Court wrote the following with regards to section 92(1):

> Ontario (Attorney General) v OPSEU, 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2.
> […]
> 2. The Amendment of the Constitution of the Province
> [82] Section 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides for the process whereby the constitution of the province can be amended. This process is an ordinary law or statute of the provincial legislature. But the Constitution Act, 1867 nowhere defines the expression "constitution of the province".
> [83] The constitution of Ontario, like that of the other provinces and that of the United Kingdom, but unlike that of many states, is not to be found in a comprehensive, written instrument called a constitution. It is partly contained in a variety of statutory provisions. Some of these provisions have been enacted by the Parliament at Westminster, such as ss. 58 to 70 and ss. 82 to 87 of the Constitution Act, 1867 . Other provisions relating to the constitution of Ontario have been enacted by ordinary statutes of the Legislature of Ontario, for instance The Legislative Assembly Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 240; The Representation Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 413, and The Executive Council Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 153.
> [84] Another part of the constitution of Ontario consists of the rules of the common law, developed or recognized over the years by the courts. Many of these common law rules concern the royal prerogative. For instance, they have put the Crown in right of the province in a preferred position as a creditor (Maritime Bank of Canada (Liquidators of) v. Receiver-General of New Brunswick, [1892] App. Cas. 437) and with respect to the inheritance of lands for defect of heirs (Attorney-General of Ontario v. Mercer (1883), 8 App. Cas. 767).
> [85] As was explained in Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753, at pp. 876-78, with respect to the Constitution of Canada--but the same can generally be said of the constitution of Ontario-- "those parts which are composed of statutory rules and common law rules are generically referred to as the law of the constitution". In addition, the constitution of Ontario comprises rules of a different nature but of great importance called conventions of the constitution. The most fundamental of these is probably the principle of responsible government which is largely unwritten, although it is implicitly referred to in the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867, and one of its facets is articulated in s. 83 of this Act--possibly spent--which, in Ontario and Quebec, "Until the Legislature of Ontario or of Quebec otherwise provides", puts a restriction on the election of holders of offices other than ministerial offices.

1.3 The British North America Act and the Parliament of Canada

Already in 1867, the British North America Act also allowed the Federal Parliament to proceed unilaterally with certain constitutional amendments. Here are a few examples, where the words "Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides", for instance, include this amendment power:

> British North America Act, 30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3 (U.K.).
> […]
> Quorum of Senate
> 35 Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the Presence of at least Fifteen Senators, including the Speaker, shall be necessary to constitute a Meeting of the Senate for the Exercise of its Powers.
> […]
> Electoral districts of the four Provinces
> 40 Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick shall, for the Purposes of the Election of Members to serve in the House of Commons, be divided into Electoral Districts as follows:
> Continuance of existing Election Laws until Parliament of Canada otherwise provides
> 41 Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all Laws in force in the several Provinces at the Union relative to the following Matters or any of them, namely, — the Qualifications and Disqualifications of Persons to be elected or to sit or vote as Members of the House of Assembly or Legislative Assembly in the several Provinces, the Voters at Elections of such Members, the Oaths to be taken by Voters, the Returning Officers, their Powers and Duties, the Proceedings at Elections, the Periods during which Elections may be continued, the Trial of controverted Elections, and Proceedings incident thereto, the vacating of Seats of Members, and the Execution of new Writs in case of Seats vacated otherwise than by Dissolution, — shall respectively apply to Elections of Members to serve in the House of Commons for the same several Provinces.

Provided that, until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, at any Election for a Member of the House of Commons for the District of Algoma, in addition to Persons qualified by the Law of the Province of Canada to vote, every Male British Subject, aged Twenty-one Years or upwards, being a Householder, shall have a Vote.

Transfer of Officers to Canada

130 Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, all Officers of the several Provinces having Duties to discharge in relation to Matters other than those coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces shall be Officers of Canada, and shall continue to discharge the Duties of their respective Offices under the same Liabilities, Responsibilities, and Penalties as if the Union had not been made.

Appointment of new Officers

131 Until the Parliament of Canada otherwise provides, the Governor General in Council may from Time to Time appoint such Officers as the Governor General in Council deems necessary or proper for the effectual Execution of this Act.

1.4 Constitution Act, 1871 and the creation of new provinces

The British North America Act, 1867 also contained a Part relating to the admission of new colonies, but to ensure that the Federal Parliament had the power to create new provinces, the British North America Act, 1871 was adopted:

British North America Act, 1871, 34-35 Victoria, c. 28 (U.K.).

An Act respecting the establishment of Provinces in the Dominion of Canada.

WHEREAS doubts have been entertained respecting the powers of the Parliament of Canada to establish Provinces in Territories admitted, or which may hereafter be admitted into the Dominion of Canada, and to provide for the representation of such Provinces in the said Parliament, and it is expedient to remove such doubts, and to vest such powers in the said Parliament:

1. This Act may be cited for all purposes as "The British North America Act, 1871."

2. The Parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new Provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any Province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such Province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order, and good government of such Province, and for its representation in the said Parliament. Parliament of Canada may establish new Provinces and provide for the constitution etc., thereof.

3. Alteration of limits of Provinces.

The Parliament of Canada may from time to time, with the consent of the Legislature of any Province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such Province, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed to by the said Legislature, and may, with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any such increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any Province affected thereby.

4. Parliament of Canada may legislate for any territory not included in a Province.

The Parliament of Canada may from time to time make provision for the administration, peace, order, and good government of any territory not for the time being included in any Province.

5. Confirmation of Acts of Parliament of Canada, 32 & 33 Vict., (Canadian) cap. 3, 33 Vict., (Canadian) cap. 3.

The following Acts passed by the said Parliament of Canada, and intituled respectively: "An Act for the temporary government of Rupert's Land and the North Western Territory when united with Canada," and "An Act to amend and continue the Act thirty-two and thirty-three Victoria, chapter three, and to establish and provide for the government of the Province of Manitoba," shall be and be deemed to have been valid and effectual for all purposes whatsoever from the date at which they respectively received the assent, in the Queen's name, of the Governor General of the said Dominion of Canada.

6. Limitation of powers of Parliament of Canada to legislate for an established Province.

Except as provided by the third section of this Act, it shall not be competent for the Parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last mentioned Act of the said Parliament, in so far as it relates to the Province of Manitoba, or of any other Act hereafter establishing new Provinces in the said Dominion, subject always to the right of the Legislature of the Province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provisions of any law respecting the qualification of electors and members of the Legislative Assembly, and to make laws respecting elections in the said Province.

This procedure enabled Canada to admit, in addition to the original four provinces, Manitoba (1870), British Columbia (1871), Prince Edward Island (1871), Alberta (1905), Saskatchewan (1905) and Newfoundland (1949).

1.5 The Statute of Westminster, 1931, and the beginning of Canadian sovereignty

In 1931, the British Parliament adopted the Statute of Westminster, which represented the legal materialization of the Balfour Declaration of a few years earlier. The main effect of the Statute was that, henceforth, the laws of the United Kingdom would only have effect in Canada if the latter had requested and consented to them.

Statute of Westminster, 1931, 22 Geo. V, c. 4 (U.K.).

An Act to give effect to certain resolutions passed by Imperial Conferences held in the years 1926 and 1930

WHEREAS the delegates of His Majesty's Governments in the United Kingdom, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland, at Imperial Conferences holden at Westminster in the years of our Lord nineteen hundred and twenty-six and nineteen hundred and thirty did concur in making the declarations and resolutions set forth in the Reports of the said Conferences:

And whereas it is meet and proper to set out by way of preamble to this Act that, inasmuch as the Crown is the symbol of the free association of the members of the British Commonwealth of Nations, and as they are united by a common allegiance to the Crown, it would be in accord with the established constitutional position of all the members of the Commonwealth in relation to one another that any alteration in the law touching the Succession to the Throne or the Royal Style and Titles shall hereafter require the assent as well of the Parliaments of all the Dominions as of the Parliament of the United Kingdom:

And whereas it is in accord with the established constitutional position that no law hereafter made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall extend to any of the said Dominions as part of the law of that Dominion otherwise than at the request and with the consent of that Dominion:

And whereas it is necessary for the ratifying, confirming and establishing of certain of the said declarations and resolutions of the said Conferences that a law be made and enacted in due form by authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom:

And whereas the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland have severally requested and consented to the submission of a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom for making such provision with regard to the matters aforesaid as is hereafter in this Act contained:

Now, therefore, be it enacted by the King's Most Excellent Majesty by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

1. Meaning of "Dominion" in this Act.

In this Act the expression "Dominion" means any of the following Dominions, that is to say, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State and Newfoundland.

2. Validity of laws made by Parliament of a Dominion.

(1) The Colonial Laws Validity Act, 1865, shall not apply to any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion.

(2) No law and no provision of any law made after the commencement of this Act by the Parliament of a Dominion shall be void or inoperative on the ground that it is repugnant to the law of England, or to the provisions of any existing or future Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or to any order, rule or regulation made under any such Act, and the powers of the Parliament of a Dominion shall include the power to repeal or amend any such Act, order, rule or regulation in so far as the same is part of the law of the Dominion.

3. Power of Parliament of Dominion to legislate extra-territorially.

It is hereby declared and enacted that the Parliament of a Dominion has full power to make laws having extra-territorial operation.

4. Parliament of United Kingdom not to legislate for Dominion except by consent.

No Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this Act shall extend, or be deemed to extend, to a Dominion as part of the law of that Dominion, unless it is expressly declared in that Act that that Dominion has requested, and consented to the enactment thereof.

5. Powers of Dominion Parliaments in relation to merchant shipping.

Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions of this Act, sections seven hundred and thirty-five and seven hundred and thirty-six of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, shall be construed as though reference therein to the Legislature of a British possession did not include reference to the Parliament of a Dominion.

6. Powers of Dominion Parliaments in relation to Courts of Admiralty.

Without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provisions of this Act, section four of the Colonial Courts of Admiralty Act, 1890 (which requires certain laws to be reserved for the signification of His Majesty's pleasure or to contain a suspending clause), and so much of section seven of that Act as requires the approval of His Majesty in Council to any rules of Court for regulating the practice and procedure of a Colonial Court of Admiralty, shall cease to have effect in any Dominion as from the commencement of this Act.

7. Saving for British North America Acts and application of the Act to Canada.

(1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to apply to the repeal, amendment or alteration of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1930, or any order, rule or regulation made thereunder.

(2) The provisions of section two of this Act shall extend to laws made by any of the Provinces of Canada and to the powers of the legislatures of such Provinces.

(3) The powers conferred by this Act upon the Parliament of Canada or upon the legislatures of the Provinces shall be restricted to the enactment of laws in relation to matters within the competence of the Parliament of Canada or of any of the legislatures of the Provinces respectively.

8. Saving for Constitution Acts of Australia and New Zealand.

Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to confer any power to repeal or alter the Constitution or the Constitution Act of the Commonwealth of Australia or the Constitution Act of the Dominion of New Zealand otherwise than in accordance with the law existing before the commencement of this Act.

9. Saving with respect to States of Australia.

(1) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to authorize the Parliament of the Commonwealth of Australia to make laws on any matter within the authority of the States of Australia, not being a matter within the authority of the Parliament or Government of the Commonwealth of Australia.

(2) Nothing in this Act shall be deemed to require the concurrence of the Parliament or Government of the Commonwealth of Australia in any law made by the Parliament of the United Kingdom with respect to any matter within the authority of the States of Australia, not being a matter within the authority of the Parliament or Government of the Commonwealth of Australia, in any case where it would have been in accordance with the constitutional practice existing before the commencement of this Act that the Parliament of the United Kingdom should make that law without such concurrence.

(3) In the application of this Act to the Commonwealth of Australia the request and consent referred to in section four shall mean the request and consent of the Parliament and Government of the Commonwealth.

10. Certain sections of Act not to apply to Australia, New Zealand or Newfoundland unless adopted.

(1) None of the following sections of this Act, that is to say, sections two, three, four, five and six, shall extend to a Dominion to which this section applies as part of the law of that Dominion unless that section is adopted by the Parliament of the Dominion, and any Act of that Parliament adopting any section of this Act may provide that the adoption shall have effect either from the commencement of this Act or from such later date as is specified in the adopting Act.

(2) The Parliament of any such Dominion as aforesaid may at any time revoke the adoption of any section referred to in subsection (1) of this section.

(3) The Dominions to which this section applies are the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand and Newfoundland.

11. Meaning of "Colony" in future Acts. 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63.

Notwithstanding anything in the Interpretation Act, 1889, the expression "Colony" shall not, in any Act of the Parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this Act, include a Dominion or any Province or State forming part of a Dominion.

12. This Act may be cited as the Statute of Westminster, 1931.

1.6 Constitution Act, 1949 (no 2) and a general federal formula

Finally, in 1949, the Westminster Parliament adopted an Act granting the Parliament of Canada a general power of constitutional amendments over matters of federal concern only:

British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949, 13 Geo VI, c. 81 (U.K.).

An Act to amend the British North America Act, 1867, as respects the amendment of the Constitution of Canada

WHEREAS the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled have submitted an Address to His Majesty praying that His Majesty may graciously be pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the Parliament of the United Kindgom for the enactment of the provisions hereinafter set forth:

Be it therefore enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:

Amendment as to legislative authority of Parliament of Canada 30 & 31 Vict. c. 3

Section ninety-one of the British North America Act, 1867 is hereby amended by renumbering Class 1 thereof as Class 1A and by inserting therein immediately before that Class the following as Class 1:

"1. The amendment from time to time of the Constitution of Canada, except as regards matters coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the provinces, or as regards rights or privileges by this or any other Constitutional Act granted or secured to the Legislature or the Government of a province, or to any class of persons with respect to schools or as regards the use of the English or the French language or as regards the requirements that there shall be a session of the Parliament of Canada at least once each year, and that no House of Commons shall continue for more than five years from the day of the return of the Writs for choosing the House; provided, however, that a House of Commons may in time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection be continued by the Parliament of Canada if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of such House."

Short title and citation

This Act may be cited as the British North America (No. 2) Act, 1949 and shall be included among the Acts which may be cited as the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1949.

2 The patriation of the Canadian constitution

Even after the enactment of the Statute of Westminster, 1931, Canada still had to go through the British Parliament to amend its constitutional laws. Canadian sovereignty thus remained imperfect. To remedy the situation, constitutional negotiations took place between the federal government and the provinces to agree on a made-in-Canada procedure that would allow the Constitution to be "patriated" and henceforth amended solely in Canada. This led to the constitutional negotiations of 1981 and the Patriation of 1982.

2.1 Constitutional negotiations before patriation and the 1981 Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution

In his famous book Amending Canada's Constitution. History, Processes, Problems and Prospects, James Ross Hurley recounts no fewer than fourteen attempts to reach an agreement to patriate the Constitution, the last attempt being the successful one. This latest attempt was the end of a debate that lasted almost two years: faced with the cumulative failures of recent decades, Prime Minister Trudeau had initially decided to proceed unilaterally with the patriation of the Constitution, in 1980. Its project included a charter of rights and freedoms and a two-year process for adopting an amending formula.

Two provinces (Ontario and New Brunswick) supported this unilateral action of the federal government, but the other eight objected. Three provincial courts of appeal (Manitoba, Quebec and Newfoundland) had to rule on the constitutionality of unilateral patriation, the debate finally reaching the Supreme Court. In its Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, the Court came to the conclusion that no formal legal rule prevented the federal government from acting unilaterally, but the consent of a substantial number of provinces was required by constitutional convention.

III—Whether the convention exists

It was submitted by counsel for Canada, Ontario and New Brunswick that there is no constitutional convention, that the House of Commons and Senate of Canada will not request Her Majesty the Queen to lay before the Parliament at Westminster a measure to amend the Constitution of Canada affecting federal-provincial relationships, etc., without first obtaining the agreement of the provinces.

It was submitted by counsel for Manitoba, Newfoundland, Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island and Alberta that the convention does exist, that it requires the agreement of all the provinces and that the second question in the Manitoba and Newfoundland References should accordingly be answered in the affirmative.

Counsel for Saskatchewan agreed that the question be answered in the affirmative but on a different basis. He submitted that the convention does exist and requires a measure of provincial agreement. Counsel for Saskatchewan further submitted that the Resolution before the Court has not received a sufficient measure of provincial consent.

We wish to indicate at the outset that we find ourselves in agreement with the submissions made on this issue by counsel for Saskatchewan.

1. The class of constitutional amendments contemplated by the question

Constitutional amendments fall into three categories: (1) amendments which may be made by a provincial legislature acting alone under s. 92(1) of the B.N.A. Act; (2) amendments which may be made by the Parliament of Canada acting alone under s. 91(1) of the B.N.A. Act; (3) all other amendments.

The first two categories are irrelevant for the purposes of these References. While the wording of the second and third questions of the Manitoba and Newfoundland References may be broad enough to embrace all amendments in the third category, it is not necessary for us to consider those amendments which affect federal-provincial relationships only indirectly. In a sense, most amendments of the third category are susceptible of affecting federal-provincial relationships to some extent. But we should restrict ourselves to the consideration of amendments which

... directly affect federal-provincial relationships in the sense of changing federal and provincial legislative powers …

The reason for this is that the second and third questions of the Manitoba and Newfoundland References must be read in the light of the first question. They must be meant to contemplate the same specific class of constitutional amendments as the ones which are sought in the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada". More particularly, they must be meant to address the same type of amendments as the Charter of Rights, which abridges federal and provincial legislative powers, and the amending formula, which would provide for the amendment of the Constitution including the distribution of legislative powers.

These proposed amendments present one essential characteristic: they directly affect federal-provincial relationships in changing legislative powers and in providing for a formula to effect such change.

Therefore, in essence although not in terms, the issue raised by the second question in the Manitoba and Newfoundland References is whether there is a constitutional convention for agreement of the provinces to amendments which change legislative powers and provide for a method of effecting such change. The same issue is raised by Question B of the Quebec Reference above quoted in part.

2. Requirements for establishing a convention

The requirements for establishing a convention bear some resemblance with those which apply to customary law. Precedents and usage are necessary but do not suffice. They must be normative. We adopt the following passage of Sir W. Ivor Jennings, The Law and the Constitution (5th ed., 1959), at p. 136:

We have to ask ourselves three questions: first, what are the precedents; secondly, did the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule; and thirdly, is there a reason for the rule? A single precedent with a good reason may be enough to establish the rule. A whole string of precedents without such a reason will be of no avail, unless it is perfectly certain that the persons concerned regarded them as bound by it.

IV—Conclusion

We have reached the conclusion that the agreement of the provinces of Canada, no views being expressed as to its quantification, is constitutionally required for the passing of the "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada" and that the passing of this Resolution without such agreement would be unconstitutional in the conventional sense.

2.2 The constitutional agreement of November 1981 and the 1982 Re: Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution

In light of this Supreme Court of Canada decision, Prime Minister Trudeau decided to return to the negotiating table with the premiers of the ten provinces. At a constitutional conference held in Ottawa in November 1981, negotiations were difficult and several options emerged, but an agreement was finally reached between the federal government and the nine English-speaking provinces. Quebec, for its part, was excluded from the final agreement and made its opposition very clear.

The November 1981 agreement included the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the constitutional amendment formula, greater protection for the rights of Indigenous peoples and the constitutionalization of the principle of equalization. A lengthy correspondence between Prime Minister Trudeau and Premier Lévesque followed (the correspondence is reproduced in the appendices of James Ross Hurley's book, Amending Canada's Constitution. History, Processes, Problems and Prospects).

Ultimately, the Constitution was patriated and the Quebec government asked the courts to rule on the possibility that the substantial degree of provincial consent put forward by the Supreme Court in its 1981 Reference might either require unanimous consent by the provinces, or include a veto power for Quebec. The matter once again reached the Supreme Court, which issued its decision in the Re: Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution:

VI—Whether Quebec has a conventional power of veto

It has already been indicated, with respect to the precedents which are said to establish the conventional rule of a power of veto for Quebec, that the appellant relied upon those which had been invoked by the majority opinion in the First Reference, at pp. 891 to 894.

The reason advanced by the appellant for the existence of a conventional rule of a power of veto for Quebec is the principle of duality, this principle being however understood in a special sense.

The expression "Canadian duality" is frequently used to refer to the two larger linguistic groups in Canada and to the constitutional protection afforded to the official languages by provisions such as s. 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and s. 23 of the Manitoba Act, 1870.

Counsel for the appellant characterized this aspect of the Canadian duality as the "federal" aspect and recognized that the central government had a role to play in this respect within the framework of federal institutions as well as outside Quebec. But he also made it clear that what he meant by the principle of duality embraced much more than linguistic or cultural differences. What was meant by the principle of duality was what counsel called its "Quebec" aspect which he defined more precisely in his factum at pp. 8 and 16:

[TRANSLATION] In the context of this reference, the word "duality" covers all the circumstances that have contributed to making Quebec a distinct society, since the foundation of Canada and long before, and the range of guarantees that were made to Quebec in 1867, as a province which the Task Force on Canadian Unity has described as "the stronghold of the French-Canadian people" and the "living heart of the French presence in North America". These circumstances and these guarantees extend far beyond matters of language and culture alone: the protection of the British North America Act was extended to all aspects of Quebec society—language, certainly, but also the society's values, its law, religion, education, territory, natural resources, government and the sovereignty of its legislative assembly over everything which was at the time of a "local" nature.

In 1867, the French Canadian minority became a majority within the Quebec Legislature. This is what accounts for the special nature of this province, and it is the reason underlying the convention that the powers of its Legislature cannot be reduced without consent.

One finds another expression of the principle of duality understood in this sense in the preamble of the above quoted Decree No. 3367-81, dated December 9, 1981, the fourth paragraph of which states in concise terms:

[TRANSLATION] WHEREAS Quebec forms a distinct society within the Canadian federation;

Another more elaborate expression of the principle of duality understood in the special sense urged by counsel for the appellant is to be found in a resolution passed by the Quebec National Assembly on December 1, 1981, and more particularly in condition no. 1 of the Resolution:

[TRANSLATION] …that the National Assembly of Quebec, having in mind the right of the people of Quebec to self-determination and exercising its historical right to be a party to and approve any change in the Constitution of Canada which might affect the rights and powers of Quebec, states that it cannot approve the proposal to patriate the constitution unless it includes the following conditions:

"1. It shall be recognized that the two founding people of Canada are fundamentally equal, and that within the Canadian federation Quebec forms a society distinct by its language, culture and institutions, one which possesses all the attributes of a distinct national community;

"2. The constitutional amending formula:

a) shall either preserve Quebec's right of veto, or

b) shall be the one approved in the constitutional agreement signed by Quebec on April 16, 1981, affirming the right of Quebec not to have imposed on it any change which would reduce its powers or rights, and if such a reduction were to take place, to be given reasonable compensation as a matter of right;

These then are the precedents and the reason for the rule, according to counsel for the appellant.

It will not be necessary in our view to look further into these matters because this submission must in any event be rejected, the appellant having failed completely to demonstrate compliance with the most important requirement for establishing a convention, that is, acceptance or recognition by the actors in the precedents.

We have been referred to an abundance of material, speeches made in the course of parliamentary debates, reports of royal commissions, opinions of historians, political scientists, constitutional experts which endorse in one way or another the principle of duality within the meaning assigned to it by the appellant, and there can be no doubt that many Canadian statesmen, politicians and experts favoured this principle.

But neither in his factum nor in oral argument did counsel for the appellant quote a single statement made by any representative of the federal authorities recognizing either explicitly or by necessary implication that Quebec had a conventional power of veto over certain types of constitutional amendments. The statement made by Minister Favreau on November 20, 1964, and the passage to be found at pp. 46 and 47 of the White Paper have been quoted twice in the appellant's factum, as if they supported the veto rule as well as the unanimity one, but they refer only to unanimity and have been above dealt with in this respect.

Furthermore, a convention such as the one now asserted by Quebec would have to be recognized by other provinces. We have not been referred to and we are not aware of any statement by the actors in any of the other provinces acknowledging such a convention. Not only have we not been given any evidence of the acquiescence of other provinces but in the First Reference, three of them, Manitoba, Prince Edward Island and Alberta, explicitly pleaded in favour of the unanimity rule in their factums, a position compatible only with the principle of equality among the provinces and incompatible with a special power of veto for Quebec. It should also be noted that in the First Reference, Ontario and New Brunswick had taken the position that the constitutional amending process was not regulated by conventions involving the provinces.

In order to make up for these fundamental flaws in his submission, counsel for the appellant argued as follows in his factum:

> [TRANSLATION] In the opinion of the Attorney General, custom and a reason suffice by themselves to establish the normative nature of the rule.
> Counsel for the appellant also referred to Sir Ivor Jennings' test, adopted by this Court in the First Reference, and more particularly to the last part of this test:
> A single precedent with a good reason may be enough to establish the rule. A whole string of precedents without such a reason will be of no avail, unless it is perfectly certain that the persons concerned regarded them as bound by it.
> As we understand it, the contention was that recognition by the actors in the precedents is not an absolutely essential requirement for establishing a convention and that the last part of Jennings' test is an authority for that proposition.
> This contention is based on two sentences taken out of context and is an over-simplified and > erroneous view of Jennings' test. In these two sentences, Jennings is merely expanding on what he said in the sentence immediately preceding them about the three requirements and illustrating the interrelation between them. He is not doing away with the requirement that the actors in the precedents believe that they were bound by a rule. Indeed Jennings insists in several passages of his book, The Law and the Constitution, that recognition or acquiescence is an essential ingredient of constitutional conventions. Thus he writes, at p. 81:
> "Convention" implies some form of agreement, whether expressed or implied…
> And at page 117:
> The conventions are like most fundamental rules of any constitution in that they rest essentially upon general acquiescence.
> And at page 135:
> …if the authority itself and those connected with it believe that they ought to do so, then the convention does exist. This is the ordinary rule applied to customary law. Practice alone is not enough. It must be normative.
> In the First Reference, at pp. 852, 857 and 883, these views were approved by all the members of this Court who adopted the definition of convention given by Freedman, C.J.M. in the Manitoba Reference, including, at p. 883, the following quotation of Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (1977), at p. 9:
> a convention is a rule which is regarded as obligatory by the officials to whom it applies.
> Recognition by the actors in the precedents is not only an essential element of conventions. In our opinion, it is the most important element since it is the normative one, the formal one which enables us unmistakably to distinguish a constitutional rule from a rule of convenience or from political expediency.
> Counsel for the appellant also contended in reply that recognition by the actors in the precedents need not be explicit, and this contention appears to be supported by the following statement of Jennings already quoted above:
> "Convention" implies some form of agreement, whether expressed or implied…
> Again, Jennings' assertion must be qualified. Some conventions have been formulated in writing, for instance in the Reports of Imperial Conferences or in the preamble of the Statute of Westminster, 1931. Such conventions can be said to have been expressly agreed upon in authoritative or official form.
> The majority of constitutional conventions however have not so been reduced to writing. Does this mean that they are based on implied agreements strictly so-called in that they have never been the object of any form of utterance? We do not think so.
> Conventions are commonly asserted or claimed by some political actors in more or less informal statements, while the other actors similarly acknowledge them in principle if not always in their application to particular facts. Conventions are analysed, dissected, commented upon and sometimes criticized albeit not to the point of rejection. But, in our view, a convention could not have remained wholly inarticulate, except perhaps at the inchoate stage when it has not yet been accepted as a binding rule. We know of no example of a convention being born while remaining completely unspoken, and none was cited to us. It seems to us that the contention of appellant's counsel to the effect that conventions need not be explicitly accepted is impossible to distinguish in practice from a denial of the requirement of acceptance by the actors in the precedents. It is precisely through reported statements by numerous actors that a convention could be identified in the First Reference. Such statements provide the only true test of recognition and, once again, unmistakably to distinguish a constitutional rule from a rule of convenience or from political expediency.
> In our view, the Quebec Court of Appeal was correct in holding that the appellant had failed to establish that Quebec had a conventional power of > veto over constitutional amendments such as those in issue in the present Reference.

3 The amending formula of the Canadian Constitution

When the Canadian Constitution was finally patriated in 1982, it included a new, all-Canadian amending formula. It is a highly complicated process, with no fewer than five different ways of amending the Constitution, and a dozen different provisions. We will focus here as much on the text of the amendment formula as on a decision in which the Supreme Court of Canada discusses it at length.

3.1 Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982

The process for amending the Canadian Constitution is set out in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, and more specifically in sections 38 to 49. In addition to the five different ways in which amendments can be made (unanimity, 7/50, the bilateral procedure and unilateral amendments by the Federal Parliament or provincial legislatures), there are provisions for opting out of a constitutional amendment (with or without financial compensation), constitutional initiative, the Senate's suspensive veto, deadlines and the proclamation procedure.

> Procedure for Amending Constitution of Canada

General procedure for amending Constitution of Canada

38 (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

Majority of members

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

Expression of dissent

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

Revocation of dissent

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

Restriction on proclamation

39 (1) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) before the expiration of one year from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder, unless the legislative assembly of each province has previously adopted a resolution of assent or dissent.

Idem

(2) A proclamation shall not be issued under subsection 38(1) after the expiration of three years from the adoption of the resolution initiating the amendment procedure thereunder.

Compensation

40 Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers provincial legislative powers relating to education or other cultural matters from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

Amendment by unanimous consent

41 An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;

(c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and

(e) an amendment to this Part.

Amendment by general procedure

42 (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

(a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) subject to paragraph 41(d), the Supreme Court of Canada;

(e) the extension of existing provinces into the territories; and

(f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces.

Exception

(2) Subsections 38(2) to (4) do not apply in respect of amendments in relation to matters referred to in subsection (1).

Amendment of provisions relating to some but not all provinces

43 An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including

(a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces, and

(b) any amendment to any provision that relates to the use of the English or the French language within a province, may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies.

Amendments by Parliament

44 Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

Amendments by provincial legislatures

45 Subject to section 41, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

Initiation of amendment procedures

46 (1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41, 42 and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

Revocation of authorization

(2) A resolution of assent made for the purposes of this Part may be revoked at any time before the issue of a proclamation authorized by it.

Amendments without Senate resolution

47 (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41, 42 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue of the proclamation if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing its issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

Computation of period

(2) Any period when Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the one hundred and eighty day period referred to in subsection (1).

Advice to issue proclamation

48 The Queen's Privy Council for Canada shall advise the Governor General to issue a proclamation under this Part forthwith on the adoption of the resolutions required for an amendment made by proclamation under this Part.

Constitutional conference

49 A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada within fifteen years after this Part comes into force to review the provisions of this Part.

In addition, the Constitution Act, 1982, also contained a Part IV on "Constitutional Conference":

Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11.

Part IV – Constitutional Conference

37 (1) A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada within one year after this Part comes into force.

(2) The conference convened under subsection (1) shall have included in its agenda an item respecting constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, including the identification and definition of the rights of those peoples to be included in the Constitution of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participate in the discussions on that item.

(3) The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of the conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

This Part was automatically repealed in 1983, in accordance with section 54 of the Constitution Act 1982:

Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (UK), 1982, c 11.

54 Part IV is repealed on the day that is one year after this Part comes into force and this section may be repealed and this Act renumbered, consequentially upon the repeal of Part IV and this section, by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada.

3.2 The 2014 Reference re: Senate Reform

In 2014, more than 30 years after Patriation, the Supreme Court issued a decision in which it had to take an in-depth look at the process of amending the Constitution, in order to give answers on the procedures applicable to different scenarios for reforming or abolishing the Senate. In this decision, the Court discusses the amendment procedure at length. This is the most developed judicial opinion we have on Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982.

IV. The Part V Amending Procedures

[21] The statute that created the Senate — the Constitution Act, 1867 — forms part of the Constitution of Canada and can only be amended in accordance with the Constitution's procedures for amendment: s. 52(2) and (3), Constitution Act, 1982. Consequently, we must determine whether the changes contemplated in the Reference amend the Constitution and, if so, which amendment procedures are applicable.

[22] Before answering these questions, we discuss constitutional amendment in Canada generally. We examine in turn the nature and content of the Constitution of Canada, the concept of constitutional amendment, and the Constitution's procedures for amendment.

A. The Constitution of Canada

[23] The Constitution of Canada is "a comprehensive set of rules and principles" that provides "an exhaustive legal framework for our system of government": Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 32. It defines the powers of the constituent elements of Canada's system of government — the executive, the legislatures, and the courts — as well as the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments: Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3 ("Provincial Court Judges Reference"), at para. 108. And it governs the state's relationship with the individual. Governmental power cannot lawfully be exercised, unless it conforms to the Constitution: s. 52(1), Constitution Act, 1982; Secession Reference, at paras. 70-78; Reference re Supreme Court Act, ss. 5 and 6, 2014 SCC 21 ("Supreme Court Act Reference"), at para. 89.

[24] The Constitution of Canada is defined in s. 52(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 as follows:

(2) The Constitution of Canada includes

(a) the Canada Act 1982, including this Act;

(b) the Acts and orders referred to in the schedule; and

(c) any amendment to any Act or order referred to in paragraph (a) or (b).

The documents listed in the Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982 as forming part of the Constitution include the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 52 does not provide an exhaustive definition of the content of the Constitution of Canada: Supreme Court Act Reference, at paras. 97-100; Secession Reference, at para. 32.

[25] The Constitution implements a structure of government and must be understood by reference to "the constitutional text itself, the historical context, and previous judicial interpretations of constitutional meaning": Secession Reference, at para. 32; see generally H. Cyr, "L'absurdité du critère scriptural pour qualifier la constitution" (2012), 6 J.P.P.L. 293. The rules of constitutional interpretation require that constitutional documents be interpreted in a broad and purposive manner and placed in their proper linguistic, philosophic, and historical contexts: Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at pp. 155-56; Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 344; Supreme Court Act Reference, at para. 19. Generally, constitutional interpretation must be informed by the foundational principles of the Constitution, which include principles such as federalism, democracy, the protection of minorities, as well as constitutionalism and the rule of law: Secession Reference; Provincial Court Judges Reference; New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 319; Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 721.

[26] These rules and principles of interpretation have led this Court to conclude that the Constitution should be viewed as having an "internal architecture", or "basic constitutional structure": Secession Reference, at para. 50; OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 57; see also Supreme Court Act Reference, at para. 82. The notion of architecture expresses the principle that "[t]he individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole": Secession Reference, at para. 50; see also the discussion on this Court's approach to constitutional interpretation in M. D. Walters, "Written Constitutions and Unwritten Constitutionalism", in G. Huscroft, ed., Expounding the Constitution: Essays in Constitutional Theory (2008), 245, at pp. 264-65. In other words, the Constitution must be interpreted with a view to discerning the structure of government that it seeks to implement. The assumptions that underlie the text and the manner in which the constitutional provisions are intended to interact with one another must inform our interpretation, understanding, and application of the text.

B. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada

[27] The concept of an "amendment to the Constitution of Canada", within the meaning of Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, is informed by the nature of the Constitution and its rules of interpretation. As discussed, the Constitution should not be viewed as a mere collection of discrete textual provisions. It has an architecture, a basic structure. By extension, amendments to the Constitution are not confined to textual changes. They include changes to the Constitution's architecture.

C. The Part V Amending Procedures

[28] Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides the blueprint for how to amend the Constitution of Canada (see Appendix). It tells us what changes Parliament and the provincial legislatures can make unilaterally, what changes require substantial federal and provincial consent, and what changes require unanimous agreement.

(1) History

[29] The Part V amending formula reflects the principle that constitutional change that engages provincial interests requires both the consent of Parliament and a significant degree of provincial consent. Prior to patriation, constitutional amendment in Canada required the adoption of a law by the British Parliament following a joint resolution addressed to it by the Senate and the House of Commons, since the Constitution Act, 1867 was an Act of the British Parliament. There was no formal requirement for consultation with the provinces. However, in practice, throughout the 20th century, the federal government consulted with the provinces on constitutional amendments that directly affected federal-provincial relations, and obtained their consent before putting a joint address to the British Parliament: Canada, Minister of Justice, The Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (1965) ("Favreau"), at pp. 15-16. By the time of patriation, this practice had ripened into a constitutional convention requiring substantial consent to constitutional change directly affecting federal-provincial relations: Reference re Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753 (the "Patriation Reference"), at pp. 889-95; Reference re Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1982 CanLII 219 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 793.

[30] Beginning in the 1930s, the federal government and the provinces held a series of conferences to discuss the possibility of adopting a formal amending formula. This produced several proposals: see in particular the Fulton-Favreau formula in Favreau, at pp. 110-15; and the Victoria Charter, in Constitutional Conference: Proceedings (1971), App. B. In October 1980, amid efforts to achieve broad constitutional reform, the federal government tabled a new proposed amending formula in the House of Commons and the Senate: "Proposed Resolution for a Joint Address to Her Majesty the Queen respecting the Constitution of Canada", in The Canadian Constitution 1980: Proposed Resolution respecting the Constitution of Canada (1980). In response, the provincial premiers developed a counter-proposal that became the template for Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 — the "April Accord" of 1981: Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan (1981).

[31] The April Accord, and ultimately Part V, reflect the political consensus that the provinces must have a say in constitutional changes that engage their interests. The "underlying purpose" of these documents is "to constrain unilateral federal powers to effect constitutional change": P. J. Monahan and B. Shaw, Constitutional Law (4th ed. 2013), at p. 204; Supreme Court Act Reference, at paras. 98-100. They also consecrate the principle of "the constitutional equality of provinces as equal partners in Confederation": Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan, General Comment in Part A, at p. 1. In principle, no province stands above the others with respect to constitutional amendments, and all provinces are given the same rights in the process of amendment. The result is an amending formula designed to foster dialogue between the federal government and the provinces on matters of constitutional change, and to protect Canada's constitutional status quo until such time as reforms are agreed upon.

(2) The Amending Procedures

[32] Part V contains four categories of amending procedures. The first is the general amending procedure (s. 38, complemented by s. 42), which requires a substantial degree of consensus between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The second is the unanimous consent procedure (s. 41), which applies to certain changes deemed fundamental by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982. The third is the special arrangements procedure (s. 43), which applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces. The fourth is made up of the unilateral federal and provincial procedures, which allow unilateral amendment of aspects of government institutions that engage purely federal or provincial interests (ss. 44 and 45).

(a) The General Amending Procedure

[33] Section 38 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides:

38. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons; and

(b) resolutions of the legislative assemblies of at least two-thirds of the provinces that have, in the aggregate, according to the then latest general census, at least fifty per cent of the population of all the provinces.

(2) An amendment made under subsection (1) that derogates from the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province shall require a resolution supported by a majority of the members of each of the Senate, the House of Commons and the legislative assemblies required under subsection (1).

(3) An amendment referred to in subsection (2) shall not have effect in a province the legislative assembly of which has expressed its dissent thereto by resolution supported by a majority of its members prior to the issue of the proclamation to which the amendment relates unless that legislative assembly, subsequently, by resolution supported by a majority of its members, revokes its dissent and authorizes the amendment.

(4) A resolution of dissent made for the purposes of subsection (3) may be revoked at any time before or after the issue of the proclamation to which it relates.

[34] The process set out in s. 38 is the general rule for amendments to the Constitution of Canada. It reflects the principle that substantial provincial consent must be obtained for constitutional change that engages provincial interests. Section 38 codifies what is colloquially referred to as the "7/50" procedure — amendments to the Constitution of Canada must be authorized by resolutions of the Senate, the House of Commons, and legislative assemblies of at least seven provinces whose population represents, in the aggregate, at least half of the current population of all the provinces. Additionally, it grants to the provinces the right to "opt out" of constitutional amendments that derogate from "the legislative powers, the proprietary rights or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province".

[35] By requiring significant provincial consensus while stopping short of unanimity, s. 38 "achieves a compromise between the demands of legitimacy and flexibility": J. Cameron, "To Amend the Process of Amendment", in G.-A. Beaudoin et al., Federalism for the Future: Essential Reforms (1998), 315, at p. 324. Its "underlying purpose … is to protect the provinces from having their rights or privileges negatively affected without their consent": Monahan and Shaw, at p. 192.

[36] The s. 38 procedure represents the balance deemed appropriate by the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 for most constitutional amendments, apart from those contemplated in one of the other provisions in Part V. Section 38 is thus the procedure of general application for amendments to the Constitution of Canada. As a result, the other procedures in Part V should be construed as exceptions to the general rule.

[37] Section 42 complements s. 38 by expressly identifying certain categories of amendments to which the 7/50 procedure in s. 38(1) applies:

42. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made only in accordance with subsection 38(1):

(a) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) subject to paragraph 41(d), the Supreme Court of Canada;

(e) the extension of existing provinces into the territories; and

(f) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces.

(2) Subsections 38(2) to (4) do not apply in respect of amendments in relation to matters referred to in subsection (1).

[38] This provision serves two purposes. First, the express inclusion of certain matters in s. 42 provided the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 with greater certainty that the 7/50 procedure would apply to amendments in relation to those matters: J. D. Whyte, "Senate Reform: What Does the Constitution Say?", in J. Smith, ed., The Democratic Dilemma: Reforming the Canadian Senate (2009), 97, at p. 102. Second, the provincial right to "opt out" from certain amendments contemplated in s. 38(2) to (4) does not apply to the categories of amendments in s. 42. This ensures that amendments made under s. 42 will apply consistently to all the provinces and allows the changes contemplated in the provision to be implemented in a coherent manner throughout Canada.

[39] Section 42(1) (b) of the Constitution Act, 1982 expressly makes the general amendment procedure applicable to amendments in relation to "the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators". We discuss below the meaning of this statutory language and its bearing on the questions before us.

(b) The Unanimous Consent Procedure

[40] Section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 sets out an amending procedure requiring unanimous consent in relation to certain matters:

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;

(c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and

(e) an amendment to this Part.

[41] Section 41 requires the unanimous consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and all the provincial legislative assemblies for the categories of amendments enumerated in the provision. It "accords the highest level of constitutional protection and entrenchment" to the enumerated matters: W. J. Newman, "Living with the Amending Procedures: Prospects for Future Constitutional Reform in Canada" (2007), 37 S.C.L.R. (2d) 383, at p. 388. It is an exception to the general amending procedure. It creates an exacting amending procedure that is designed to apply to certain fundamental changes to the Constitution of Canada. Professor Pelletier aptly describes the rationale for requiring unanimity for the enumerated categories of amendments:

[translation] . . . the unanimity rule provided for in section 41 of the 1982 Act is justified by the need . . . to give each of the partners of Canada's federal compromise a veto on those topics that are considered the most essential to the survival of the state.

(B. Pelletier, La modification constitutionnelle au Canada (1996), at p. 208)

(c) The Special Arrangements Procedure

[42] Section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides:

43. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to any provision that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces, including

(a) any alteration to boundaries between provinces, and

(b) any amendment to any provision that relates to the use of the English or the French language within a province,

may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies.

[43] Section 43 applies to amendments in relation to provisions of the Constitution of Canada that apply to some, but not all, of the provinces. The determination of its scope and of the effects of its interaction with other provisions of Part V presents significant conceptual difficulties, leading Professor Scott to term it the "Rubik's Cube" of Part V: S. A. Scott, "Pussycat, Pussycat or Patriation and the New Constitutional Amendment Processes" (1982), 20 U.W.O. L. Rev. 247, at pp. 292-98. We will limit our remarks on s. 43 to what is necessary to answer the Reference questions before us.

[44] At the very least, s. 43 is triggered when a constitutional amendment relates to a provision of the Constitution of Canada that contains a "special arrangement" applicable only to one or several, but not all, of the provinces. In such cases, the use of the 7/50 procedure would overshoot the mark, by making adoption of the amendment contingent upon the consent of provinces to which the provision does not apply. Section 43 also serves to ensure that those provisions cannot be amended without the consent of the provinces for which the arrangement was devised: Monahan and Shaw, at p. 210.

(d) The Unilateral Federal and Provincial Procedures

[45] Sections 44 and 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provide for unilateral federal and provincial procedures of amendment:

44. Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

45. Subject to section 41, the legislature of each province may exclusively make laws amending the constitution of the province.

[46] These sections fulfill the same basic function as ss. 91(1) and 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867, which were repealed when the Constitution Act, 1982 was enacted: Constitutional Accord: Canadian Patriation Plan, Explanatory Notes 7 and 8; P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf), at pp. 4-31 to 4-34; Pelletier, "Réponses suggérées", at pp. 462-63; G. Tremblay, "La portée élargie de la procédure bilatérale de modification de la Constitution du Canada" (2011), 41 R.G.D. 417, at p. 428; W. J. Newman, "Defining the 'Constitution of Canada' Since 1982: The Scope of the Legislative Powers of Constitutional Amendment under Sections 44 and 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982" (2003), 22 S.C.L.R. (2d) 423, at p. 494; Pelletier, La modification constitutionnelle au Canada, at pp. 117 and 181; see also R. I. Cheffins, "The Constitution Act, 1982 and the Amending Formula: Political and Legal Implications" (1982), 4 *S.C.L.R.*43, at pp. 52-53.

[47] Sections 91(1) and 92(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 granted the federal and provincial governments the power to amend their respective constitutions, provided that the amendments did not engage the interests of the other level of government. Section 91(1) was worded broadly, allowing Parliament to amend the "Constitution of Canada", subject to certain restrictions. In 1980, the federal government asked this Court whether Parliament could unilaterally implement sweeping reforms to the Senate under s. 91(1). This Court concluded that s. 91(1) allowed Parliament to amend "the constitution of the federal government in matters of interest only to that government": Upper House Reference, at p. 71. It followed that s. 91(1) did not give Parliament the power to unilaterally make constitutional changes such as the abolition of the Senate or the modification of the Senate's essential features, since these changes engaged the interests of the provinces as well as those of the federal government: ibid., at pp. 74-75 et seq. Likewise, s. 92(1) allowed the provincial legislatures to enact amendments only in relation to "the operation of an organ of the government of the province, provided it is not otherwise entrenched as being indivisibly related to the implementation of the federal principle or to a fundamental term or condition of the union": OPSEU, at p. 40, per Beetz J.

[48] As the successors to those provisions, ss. 44 and 45 give the federal and provincial legislatures the ability to unilaterally amend certain aspects of the Constitution that relate to their own level of government, but which do not engage the interests of the other level of government. This limited ability to make changes unilaterally reflects the principle that Parliament and the provinces are equal stakeholders in the Canadian constitutional design. Neither level of government acting alone can alter the fundamental nature and role of the institutions provided for in the Constitution. This said, those institutions can be maintained and even changed to some extent under ss. 44 and 45, provided that their fundamental nature and role remain intact.

The remainder of the Senate Reference is below, in the subsection on failed Senate reforms.

4 Multilateral constitutional amendments since 1982

Since the 1982 constitutional Patriation, Canada's Constitution has been amended nine times by a complex procedure. We deliberately leave aside here the two unilateral formulas (federal and provincial), to which we'll return briefly later. What particularly interests us here are the amendments that required some degree of federal-provincial consent.

Of these nine amendments, only one (the first, in 1983) was a multilateral one, involving the 7/50 formula. All the others were bilateral amendments, between the two houses of the Federal Parliament and a given province, made under s 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982. We'll take a closer look here at each of these amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

4.1 The Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1983

Immediately after Patriation, constitutional negotiations continued, with a particular focus on issues specific to Indigenous peoples. A constitutional conference was held in 1983, as provided for in section 37 of the Constitution Act, 1982. At this conference, an agreement was reached on a multilateral amendment to Canada's Constitution, with all the provinces (except Quebec, which did not participate in the negotiations) in favour, in addition to the federal government.

Among other things, this constitutional amendment modified sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and added section 35.1 to the Act, providing for the participation of Indigenous peoples in any future exercise in which the constitutional provisions concerning them might be amended.

SCHEDULE

PROCLAMATION AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. Paragraph 25 (b) of the "Constitution Act, 1982" is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(b) any rights or freedoms that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired."

2. Section 35 of the "Constitution Act, 1982" is amended by adding thereto the following subsections:

"(3) For greater certainty, in subsection "treaty rights" includes rights that now exist by way of land claims agreements or may be so acquired.

Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the aboriginal and treaty rights referred to in subsection (1) are guaranteed equally to male and female persons."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 35 thereof, the following section:

"35.1 The government of Canada and the provincial governments are committed to the principle that, before any amendment is made to Class 24 of section 91 of the "Constitution Act, 1867", to section 25 of this Act or to this Part,

(a) a constitutional conference that includes in its agenda an item relating to the proposed amendment, composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces, will be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada; and

(b) the Prime Minister of Canada will invite representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in the discussions on that item."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 37 thereof, the following Part:

"PART IV. 1

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

37.1 – (1) In addition to the conference convened in March 1983, at least two constitutional conferences composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada, the first within three years after April 17, 1982 and the second within five years after that date.

(2) Each conference convened under sub-section (1) shall have included in its agenda constitutional matters that directly affect the aboriginal peoples of Canada, and the Prime Minister of Canada shall invite representatives of those peoples to participate in the discussions on those matters.

(3) The Prime Minister of Canada shall invite elected representatives of the governments of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories to participate in the discussions on any item on the agenda of a conference convened under subsection (1) that, in the opinion of the Prime Minister, directly affects the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

(4) Nothing in this section shall be construed so as to derogate from subsection 35 (1)."

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 54 thereof, the following section:

"54.1 Part iv.l and this section are repealed on April 18, 1987."

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following section:

"61. A reference to the "Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982" shall be deemed to include a reference to the "Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1983".

CITATION

7. This Proclamation may be cited as the "Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1983".

4.2 The Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1987 (Newfoundland Act)

The next constitutional amendment came in 1987 and applied to the province of Newfoundland. The purpose of this constitutional amendment was to extend the right to religious education to the Pentecostal Church in Newfoundland. This issue will then be the subject of further amendments for this province.

SCHEDULE

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. (1) Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act is renumbered as subsection 3(1).

(2) Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

References "(2) A reference to this Act, or a reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto."

2. (1) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is renumbered as Term 17(1).

(2) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following:

"(2) For the purposes of paragraph one of this Term, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have in Newfoundland all the same rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools and denominational colleges as any other class or classes of persons had by law in Newfound- land at the date of Union, and the words "all such schools" in paragraph (a) of paragraph one of this Term and the words "all such colleges" in paragraph (1)) of paragraph one of this Term include, respectively, the schools and the col- leges of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland."

3. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1987 (Newfoundland Act).

4.3 The Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1993 (New Brunswick Act)

The 1993 constitutional amendment in New Brunswick concerned bilingualism in the province. The main effect of this amendment was to add section 16.1 to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which provides that the "English linguistic community and the French linguistic community in New Brunswick have equality of status and equal rights and privileges, including the right to distinct educational institutions and such distinct cultural institutions as are necessary for the preservation and promotion of those communities".

SCHEDULE

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. The "Constitution Act, 1982" is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 16 thereof, the following section:

"16.1 (1) The English linguistic community and the French linguistic community in New Brunswick have equality of status and equal rights and privileges, including the right to distinct educational institutions and such distinct cultural institutions as are necessary for the preservation and promotion of those communities.

(2) The role of the legislature and government of New Brunswick to preserve and promote the status, rights and privileges referred to in subsection (1) is affirmed."

2. This Amendment may be cited as the "Constitution Amendment, 1993 (New Brunswick)".

4.4 The Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1993 (Prince Edward Island)

In the same year, the Constitution was amended once again, but this time as part of a bilateral amendment with the province of Prince Edward Island. This amendment was necessary to authorize the construction of the Confederation Bridge, in order to replace ferry services to Prince Edward Island.

Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1993 (Prince Edward Island), SI/94-50.

SCHEDULE

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. The Schedule to the Prince Edward Island Terms of Union is amended by adding thereto, after the portion that reads

"And such other charges as may be incident to, and connected with, the services which by the "British North America Act, 1867 appertain to the General Government, and as are or may be allowed to the other Provinces;"

the following

"That a fixed crossing joining the Island to the mainland may be substituted for the steam service referred to in this Schedule;

That, for greater certainty, nothing in this Schedule prevents the imposition of tolls for the use of such a fixed crossing between the Island and the mainland, or the private operation of such a crossing;"

2. This Amendment may be cited as the "Constitution Amendment, 1993 (Prince Edward Island)".

4.5 The Constitutional Amendment, 1997 (Newfoundland Act)

Newfoundland's school system was again the subject of a bilateral constitutional amendment in 1997. This amendment authorized the province to change its denominational school system. It should be noted that this amendment also enabled the use of section 47 of the Constitution Act, 1982, whereby the House of Commons was able to vote in place of the Senate, having seen a 180-day delay pass after its own resolution.

SCHEDULE

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the schedule to the Newfoundland Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"17. In lieu of section ninety-three of the Constitution Act, 1867, the following shall apply in respect of the Province of Newfoundland:

In and for the Province of Newfoundland, the Legislature shall have exclusive authority to make laws in relation to education but

(a) except as provided in paragraphs (b) and (c), schools established, maintained and operated with public funds shall be denominational schools, and any class of persons having rights under this Term as it read on January 1, 1995 shall continue to have the right to provide for religious education, activities and observances for the children of that class in those schools, and the group of classes that formed one integrated school system by agreement in 1969 may exercise the same rights under this Term as a single class of persons;

(b) subject to provincial legislation that is uniformly applicable to all schools specifying conditions for the establishment or continued operation of schools,

(i) any class of persons referred to in paragraph (a) shall have the right to have a publicly funded denominational school established, maintained and operated especially for that class, and

(ii) the Legislature may approve the establishment, maintenance and operation of a publicly funded school, whether denominational or non-denominational;

(c) where a school is established, maintained and operated pursuant to subparagraph (b)(i), the class of persons referred to in that subparagraph shall continue to have the right to provide for religious education, activities and observances and to direct the teaching of aspects of curriculum affecting religious beliefs, student admission policy and the assignment and dismissal of teachers in that school;

(d) all schools referred to in paragraphs (a) and (b) shall receive their share of public funds in accordance with scales determined on a non-discriminatory basis from time to time by the Legislature; and

(e) if the classes of persons having rights under this Term so desire, they shall have the right to elect in total not less than two thirds of the members of a school board, and any class so desiring shall have the right to elect the portion of that total that is proportionate to the population of that class in the area under the board's jurisdiction."

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1997 (Newfoundland Act).

4.6 The Constitutional Amendment, 1997 (Quebec)

That same year, the school system in the province of Quebec was also the subject of a bilateral constitutional amendment. Indeed, the Constitutional Amendment, 1997 (Quebec) allowed the province to replace its denominational school system with a linguistic one.

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the Newfoundland Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"17. (1) In lieu of section ninety-three of the Constitution Act, 1867, this Term shall apply in respect of the Province of Newfoundland.

(2) In and for the Province of Newfoundland, the Legislature shall have exclusive authority to make laws in relation to education, but shall provide for courses in religion that are not specific to a religious denomination.

(3) Religious observances shall be permitted in a school where requested by parents."

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 1998 (Newfoundland Act).

4.8 The Constitutional Amendment, 2001 (Newfoundland and Labrador)

The 2001 amendment, still in Newfoundland (and Labrador), concerned the name of this province, its purpose being to formally recognize the addition of the reference to "Labrador" in its designation.

SCHEDULE

Amendment to the Constitution of Canada

1. The Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the Newfoundland Act are amended by striking out the words "Province of Newfoundland" wherever they occur and substituting the words "Province of Newfoundland and Labrador".

2. Paragraph (g) of Term 33 of the Schedule to the Act is amended by striking out the word "Newfoundland" and substituting the words "the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador".

3. Term 38 of the Schedule to the Act is amended by striking out the words "Newfoundland veterans" wherever they occur and substituting the words "Newfoundland and Labrador veterans".

4. Term 42 of the Schedule to the Act is amended by striking out the words "Newfoundland merchant seamen" and "Newfoundland merchant seaman" wherever they occur and substituting the words "Newfoundland and Labrador merchant seamen" and "Newfoundland and Labrador merchant seaman", respectively.

5. Subsection (2) of Term 46 of the Schedule to the Act is amended by adding immediately after the word "Newfoundland" where it first occurs the words "and Labrador".

6. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, 2001 (Newfoundland and Labrador).

4.9 The Constitutional Amendment, 2022 (Saskatchewan Act)

After more than 20 years without a formal constitutional amendment, the Constitution was amended again in 2022, to abolish a tax exemption enjoyed by a rail company in the province of Saskatchewan. Of particular interest here is the fact that the amendment is retroactive to August 29, 1966, when the company initially agreed to suspend the exemption.

5 Constitutional reform failures since 1982

As the previous section has shown, complex constitutional amendments that have been successful since Patriation have been rather rare and minor. However, it is important to point out that, in the ten years that followed Patriation, two major attempts were made to reform the Constitution, with the aim of bringing Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family.

This reminds us of soon-to-be Prime Minister Brian Mulroney's words during the 1984 electoral campaign, when he spoke of allowing Quebec to endorse the Constitution Act, 1982 "with honour and enthusiasm". Despite the failure of the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords, it remains important to revisit these two major attempts to reform the Canadian Constitution.

5.1 The Meech lake accord

The Meech Lake Accord, negotiated in 1987, was first and foremost a response to Quebec's constitutional demands. Once approved by federal and provincial first ministers, the ratification process began in Quebec on June 23, 1987. However, three years later (as this deadline is mandatory for amendments covered by the 7/50 formula), some provinces had still not given their final approval to the project, which resulted in its failure.

The text of parts of the Meech Lake Accord, which never came into effect, can be found here:

> 1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:
> 2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with
> (a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centered in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and
> (b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.
> (2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1) (a) is affirmed
> (3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.
> (4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language.
> 2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:
> 25. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the senate.
> (2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

> General
> 5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:
> Courts Established by the Parliament of Canada
> 6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 101 thereof, the following heading and sections:
>
> Supreme Court of Canada
> 101A. (1) The court existing under the name of the Supreme Court of Canada is hereby continued as the general court of appeal for Canada, and as an additional court for the better administration of the laws of Canada, and shall continue to be a superior court of record.
> (2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.
> 101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who after having admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any courts in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.
> (2) At least three judge of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.
> 101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of the province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that Court.
> (2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.
> (3) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) of any of the three judges necessary to meet the requirement set out in subsection 101B(2), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the Government of Quebec.
> (4) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) otherwise than as required under subsection (3), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the government of a province other than Quebec.
> 101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E. (1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of Parliament to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2) Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces.

Constitution Act, 1982

9. Sections 40 to 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are repealed and the following substituted therefor:

40.Where an amendment is made under subsection 38(1) that transfers legislative powers from provincial legislatures to Parliament, Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to any province to which the amendment does not apply.

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the powers of the Senate and the method of selecting Senators;

(c) the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate and the residence qualifications of Senators;

(d) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province was entitled to be represented on April 17, 1982;

(e) the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada;

(f) subject to section 43, the use of the English or French language;

(g) the Supreme Court of Canada;

(h) the extension of existing provinces into the territories;

(i) notwithstanding any other law or practice, the establishment of new provinces; and

(j) an amendment to this part.

10. Section 44 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

44. Subject to section 41, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

11. Subsection 46(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

46. (1) The procedures for amendment under sections 38, 41, and 43 may be initiated either by the Senate or the House of Commons or by the legislative assembly of a province.

12. Subsection 47(1) of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

47. (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada made by proclamation under section 38, 41 or 43 may be made without a resolution of the Senate authorizing the issue if, within one hundred and eighty days after the adoption by the House of Commons of a resolution authorizing the issue, the Senate has not adopted such a resolution and if, at any time after the expiration of that period, the House of Commons again adopts the resolution.

13. Part VI of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Part VI

Constitutional Conferences

50. (1) A constitutional conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year, commencing in 1988.

(2) The conferences convened under subsection (1) shall have included on their agenda the following matters:

(a) Senate reform, including the role and functions of the Senate, its powers, the method of selecting Senators and representation in the Senate;

(b) roles and responsibilities in relation to fisheries; and

(c) such other matters as are agreed upon.

14. Subsection 52(2) of the said Act is amended by striking out the word “and” at the end of paragraph (b) thereof, by adding the word “and” at the end of paragraph (c) thereof, and by adding thereto the following paragraph:

(d) any other amendment to the Constitution of Canada.

15. Section 61 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

61. A reference to the Constitution Act, 1982, or a reference to the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto.

General

16. Nothing in Section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867 affects section 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

5.2 The Charlottetown Agreement

In response to the failure of the Meech Lake Accord, a new round of constitutional negotiations began in 1992, finally giving form to the Charlottetown Agreement. This time, to avoid criticism of the process that had given shape to the Meech Lake Accord, the negotiation process for the Agreement included the participation of Indigenous leaders and a broader process of public consultation.

To enhance the chances of this agreement materializing as a formal constitutional amendment, it was decided to submit it to a pan-Canadian constitutional referendum. This was made possible with the adoption of the Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada. The result, however, was not what had been hoped for: the Agreement was defeated by a majority of the population and in a majority of provinces. Although the referendum was not binding, the Agreement was subsequently abandoned.

> A framework should be developed to guide the use of the federal spending power in all areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Once developed, the framework could become a multilateral agreement that would receive constitutional protection using the mechanism described in Item 26 of this report. The framework should ensure that when the federal spending power is used in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, it should:
> (a) contribute to the pursuit of national objectives;

> Amendments to provisions of the Constitution related to the senate should require unanimous agreement of Parliament and the provincial legislatures, once the current set of amendments affecting the House of Commons, including Quebec's guarantee of 25 percent of the seats in the House of Commons, and amendments which can now be made under Section 42 should also require unanimity.
> Sections 41 and 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 should be amended so that the nomination and appointment process of Supreme Court judges would remain subject to the general (7/50) amending procedure. All other matters related to the Supreme Court, including its entrenchment, its role as the general court of appeal and its composition, would be matters requiring unanimity.

6 Federal unilateral amendments or attempts

As we have already seen, the Federal Parliament has the power to unilaterally amend certain features of federal institutions. This power has been used on a number of occasions since the patriation of 1982, and its limits have been tested in other attempts.

6.1 The 1985, 2011 and 2022 amendments regarding provincial representation in the House of Commons

With regard to representation in the House of Commons, three federal acts have amended certain provisions of the Canadian Constitution, all with the aim of ensuring proportional representation of the provinces in the House. The first one was the Constitution Act, 1985 (Representation):

> Constitution Act, 1985 (Representation), S.C. 1986, c. 8.

> 1. There shall he assigned to each of the provinces a number of members equal to the number obtained by dividing the total population of the provinces by two hundred and seventy-nine and by dividing the population of each province by the quotient so obtained, counting any remainder in excess of 0.50 as one after the said process of division.

> 2. If the total number of members that would be assigned to a province by the application of rule 1 is less than the total number assigned to that province on the date of coming into force of this subsection. there shall be added to the number of members so assigned such number of members as will result in the province having the same number of members as were assigned on that date."

A similar amendment was also made in 2011, with the Fair Representation Act:

Fair Representation Act, S.C. 2011, c. 26.

An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and the Canada Elections Act

SUMMARY

This enactment amends the rules in the Constitution Act, 1867 for readjusting the number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces in that House.

It amends the time periods in several provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and requires that electronic versions of maps be provided to registered parties.

It also amends the Canada Elections Act to permit a returning officer to be appointed for a new term of office in certain circumstances.

Preamble

Whereas the composition of the House of Commons must reflect the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces and the democratic representation of the Canadian people;

Whereas the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces must balance the fair and equitable representation of faster-growing provinces and the effective representation of smaller and slower-growing provinces;

Whereas the populations of faster-growing provinces are currently under-represented in the House of Commons and members of the House of Commons for those provinces therefore represent, on average, significantly more populous electoral districts than members for other provinces;

Whereas estimates of the population of Canada and of each province using modern statistical methodologies and techniques are accurate in determining those populations;

Whereas the electoral quotient for the re-adjustment that follows the completion of the 2011 decennial census should be 111,166, that number being the average population of the electoral districts on July 1, 2001, which was determined by using the estimate of the population of each province as at that date, multiplied by the average of the rates of population growth of the provinces;

Whereas the electoral quotient for the re-adjustment that follows each subsequent decennial census should be determined by multiplying the electoral quotient used for the previous readjustment by the average of the rates of population growth of the provinces;

And whereas the Constitution Act, 1985 (Representation) was enacted by Parliament by virtue of its exclusive authority, in section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982, to amend the Constitution of Canada in relation to the House of Commons so long as the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces is not disturbed;

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Short title

1. This Act may be cited as the Fair Representation Act.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

2. Subsection 51(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 is replaced by the following:

Readjustment of representation in Commons

51. (1) The number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces therein shall, on the completion of each decennial census, be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada provides from time to time, subject and according to the following rules:

Rules

1. There shall be assigned to each of the provinces a number of members equal to the number obtained by dividing the population of the province by the electoral quotient and rounding up any fractional remainder to one.

2. If the number of members assigned to a province by the application of rule 1 and section 51A is less than the total number assigned to that province on the date of the coming into force of the Constitution Act, 1985 (Representation), there shall be added to the number of members so assigned such number of members as will result in the province having the same number of members as were assigned on that date.

3. After the application of rules 1 and 2 and section 51A, there shall, in respect of each province that meets the condition set out in rule 4, be added, if necessary, a number of members such that, on the completion of the readjustment, the number obtained by dividing the number of members assigned to that province by the total number of members assigned to all the provinces is as close as possible to, without being below, the number obtained by dividing the population of that province by the total population of all the provinces.

4. Rule 3 applies to a province if, on the completion of the preceding readjustment, the number obtained by dividing the number of members assigned to that province by the total number of members assigned to all the provinces was equal to or greater than the number obtained by dividing the population of that province by the total population of all the provinces, the population of each province being its population as at July 1 of the year of the decennial census that preceded that readjustment according to the estimates prepared for the purpose of that readjustment.

5. Unless the context indicates otherwise, in these rules, the population of a province is the estimate of its population as at July 1 of the year of the most recent decennial census.

6. In these rules, “electoral quotient” means

(a) 111,166, in relation to the readjustment following the completion of the 2011 decennial census, and

(b) in relation to the readjustment following the completion of any subsequent decennial census, the number obtained by multiplying the electoral quotient that was applied in the preceding readjustment by the number that is the average of the numbers obtained by dividing the population of each province by the population of the province as at July 1 of the year of the preceding decennial census according to the estimates prepared for the purpose of the preceding readjustment, and rounding up any fractional remainder of that multiplication to one.

Population estimates

(1.1) For the purpose of the rules in subsection (1), there is required to be prepared an estimate of the population of Canada and of each province as at July 1, 2001 and July 1, 2011 — and, in each year following the 2011 decennial census in which a decennial census is taken, as at July 1 of that year — by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada provides from time to time.

A further change in this direction was also made in 2022, with the introduction of An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (electoral representation):

> Her Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (electoral representation)".
> This enactment amends section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to provide that, when the number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces in that House are readjusted on the completion of each decennial census, a province will not have fewer members assigned to it than were assigned during the 43rd Parliament. It also includes transitional measures providing for the application of that amendment to the readjustment of electoral boundaries under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act following the 2021 decennial census.

6.2 The 1999 amendment regarding the new Nunavut territory

With the creation of the new territory of Nunavut in 1999, the Constitution of Canada also had to be amended, in order to ensure the territory's representation in federal institutions. This led to the adoption of the Constitution Act, 1999 (Nunavut), a part of An Act to amend the Nunavut Act and the Constitution Act, 1867:

6.3 The failed senate reforms

However, the Federal Parliament's power to unilaterally amend the Constitution has its limits, as demonstrated by the episode of attempts to unilaterally reform various aspects of the Senate of Canada. Ultimately, the Supreme Court of Canada had to rule on this issue, which led to the Reference re Senate Reform, seen above (section 3.2). We return here to the Court's reasoning on the procedures applicable to different scenarios for reforming the upper house:

> Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32.
> […]
> V. How Can The Senate Changes Contemplated in the Reference Be Achieved?
> [49] The Reference questions ask whether Parliament, acting alone, can reform the Senate by creating consultative elections to select senatorial nominees endorsed by the populations of the various provinces and territories, by limiting senatorial tenure to fixed terms, and by removing the personal wealth and real property requirements for Senators. We will address each of these issues in turn.
> A. Consultative Elections
> [50] The text of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides for the formal appointment of Senators by the Governor General:
> 24. The Governor General shall from Time to Time, in the Queen's Name, by Instrument under the Great Seal of Canada, summon qualified Persons to the Senate; and, subject to the Provisions of this Act, every Person so summoned shall become and be a Member of the Senate and a Senator.
> 32. When a Vacancy happens in the Senate by Resignation, Death, or otherwise, the Governor General shall by Summons to a fit and qualified Person fill the Vacancy.
> In practice, constitutional convention requires the Governor General to follow the recommendations of the Prime Minister of Canada when filling Senate vacancies.
> [51] The Attorney General of Canada (supported by the attorneys general of Saskatchewan and Alberta as well as one of the amici curiae) submits that implementing consultative elections for Senators does not constitute an amendment to the Constitution of Canada. He argues that this reform would not change the text of the Constitution Act, 1867, nor the means of selecting Senators. He points out that the formal mechanism for appointing Senators — summons by the Governor General acting on the advice of the Prime Minister — would remain untouched. Alternatively, he submits that if introducing consultative elections constitutes an amendment to the Constitution, then it can be achieved unilaterally by Parliament under s. 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982.
> [52] In our view, the argument that introducing consultative elections does not constitute an amendment to the Constitution privileges form over substance. It reduces the notion of constitutional amendment to a matter of whether or not the letter of the constitutional text is modified. This narrow approach is inconsistent with the broad and purposive manner in which the Constitution is understood and interpreted, as discussed above. While the provisions regarding the appointment of Senators would remain textually untouched, the Senate's fundamental nature and role as a complementary legislative body of sober second thought would be significantly altered.
> [53] We conclude that each of the proposed consultative elections would constitute an amendment to the Constitution of Canada and require substantial provincial consent under the general amending procedure, without the provincial right to "opt out" of the amendment (s. 42). We reach this conclusion for three reasons: (1) the proposed consultative elections would fundamentally alter the architecture of the Constitution; (2) the text of Part V expressly makes the general amending procedure applicable to a change of this nature; and (3) the proposed change is beyond the scope of the unilateral federal amending procedure (s. 44).
> (1) Consultative Elections Would Fundamentally Alter the Architecture of the Constitution
> [54] The implementation of consultative elections would amend the Constitution of Canada by fundamentally altering its architecture. It would modify the Senate's role within our constitutional structure as a complementary legislative body of sober second thought.
> [55] The Constitution Act, 1867 contemplates a specific structure for the federal Parliament, "similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom": preamble. The Act creates both a lower elected and an upper appointed legislative chamber: s. 17. It expressly provides that the members of the lower chamber — the House of Commons — "shall be elected" by the population of the various provinces: s. 37. By contrast, it provides that Senators shall be "summoned" (i.e. appointed) by the Governor General: ss. 24 and 32.
> [56] The contrast between election for members of the House of Commons and executive appointment for Senators is not an accident of history. The framers of the Constitution Act, 1867 deliberately chose executive appointment of Senators in order to allow the Senate to play the specific role of a complementary legislative body of "sober second thought".
> [57] As this Court wrote in the Upper House Reference, "[i]n creating the Senate in the manner provided in the Act, it is clear that the intention was to make the Senate a thoroughly independent body which could canvass dispassionately the measures of the House of Commons": p. 77 (emphasis added). The framers sought to endow the Senate with independence from the electoral process to which members of the House of Commons were subject, in order to remove Senators from a partisan political arena that required unremitting consideration of short-term political objectives.
> [58] Correlatively, the choice of executive appointment for Senators was also intended to ensure that the Senate would be a complementary legislative body, rather than a perennial rival of the House of Commons in the legislative process. Appointed Senators would not have a popular mandate — they would not have the expectations and legitimacy that stem from popular election. This would ensure that they would confine themselves to their role as a body mainly conducting legislative review, rather than as a coequal of the House of Commons. As John A. Macdonald put it during the Parliamentary debates regarding Confederation, "[t]here is . . . a greater danger of an irreconcilable difference of opinion between the two branches of the legislature, if the upper be elective, than if it holds its commission from the Crown": 1865 Debates, February 6, 1865, at p. 37. An appointed Senate would be a body "calmly considering the legislation initiated by the popular branch, and preventing any hasty or ill considered legislation which may come from that body, but it will never set itself in opposition against the deliberate and understood wishes of the people": ibid., at p. 36 (emphasis added).
> [59] The appointed status of Senators, with its attendant assumption that appointment would prevent Senators from overstepping their role as a complementary legislative body, shapes the architecture of the Constitution Act, 1867. It explains why the framers did not deem it necessary to textually specify how the powers of the Senate relate to those of the House of Commons or how to resolve a deadlock between the two chambers. Indeed, on its face the Constitution Act, 1867 grants as much legislative power to the Senate as to the House of Commons, with the exception that the House of Commons has the exclusive power to originate appropriation and tax bills (s. 53). As Professor Smith aptly summarizes:
> [The framers'] original answer to the clash that would inevitably occur between elected chambers was to make the Senate appointed. This assured that a government enjoying the confidence of the House of Commons would normally be able to have its legislation adopted by Parliament, but gave the Senate the ability to act as a check in those rare instances when it was absolutely necessary.

(D. E. Smith, The Canadian Senate in Bicameral Perspective (2003), at p. 169; see also A. Heard, "Constitutional Doubts about Bill C-20 and Senatorial Elections", in Smith, The Democratic Dilemma, 81, at p. 95.)

[60] The proposed consultative elections would fundamentally modify the constitutional architecture we have just described and, by extension, would constitute an amendment to the Constitution. They would weaken the Senate's role of sober second thought and would give it the democratic legitimacy to systematically block the House of Commons, contrary to its constitutional design.

[61] Federal legislation providing for the consultative election of Senators would have the practical effect of subjecting Senators to the political pressures of the electoral process and of endowing them with a popular mandate. Senators selected from among the listed nominees would become popular representatives. They would have won a "true electoral contest" (Quebec Senate Reference, at para. 71), during which they would presumably have laid out a campaign platform and made electoral promises: Pelletier, "Réponses suggérées", at pp. 470-71. They would join the Senate after acquiring the mandate and legitimacy that flow from popular election.

[62] The Attorney General of Canada counters that this broad structural change would not occur because the Prime Minister would retain the ability to ignore the results of the consultative elections and to name whomever he or she wishes to the Senate. We cannot accept this argument. Bills C-20 and C-7 are designed to result in the appointment to the Senate of nominees selected by the population of the provinces and territories. Bill C-7 is the more explicit of the two bills, as it provides that the Prime Minister "must" consider the names on the lists of elected candidates. It is true that, in theory, prime ministers could ignore the election results and rarely, or indeed never, recommend to the Governor General the winners of the consultative elections. However, the purpose of the bills is clear: to bring about a Senate with a popular mandate. We cannot assume that future prime ministers will defeat this purpose by ignoring the results of costly and hard-fought consultative elections: see for example the discussion in M. D. Walters, "The Constitutional Form and Reform of the Senate: Thoughts on the Constitutionality of Bill C-7" (2013), 7 J. P.P.L. 37, at pp. 47-48. A legal analysis of the constitutional nature and effects of proposed legislation cannot be premised on the assumption that the legislation will fail to bring about the changes it seeks to achieve.

[63] In summary, the consultative election proposals set out in the Reference questions would amend the Constitution of Canada by changing the Senate's role within our constitutional structure from a complementary legislative body of sober second thought to a legislative body endowed with a popular mandate and democratic legitimacy.

(2) The Wording of Part V Indicates That the Proposal for Consultative Elections Attracts the General Amending Procedure

[64] Our view that the consultative election proposals would amend the Constitution of Canada is supported by the language of Part V. The words employed in Part V are guides to identifying the aspects of our system of government that form part of the protected content of the Constitution. Section 42(1)(b) of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that the general amending procedure (s. 38(1)) applies to constitutional amendments in relation to "the method of selecting Senators" ("le mode de sélection des sénateurs"). This broad wording covers the implementation of consultative elections, indicating that a constitutional amendment is required and making that amendment subject to the general procedure: H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel (5th ed. 2008), at p. 343; Whyte, at p. 106; see also C.-E. Côté, "L'inconstitutionnalité du projet d'élections fédérales sénatoriales" (2010), 3 R.Q.D.C. 81, at p. 83, cited in the Quebec Senate Reference, at para. 50; Walters, "The Constitutional Form and Reform of the Senate", at p. 52.

[65] The words "the method of selecting Senators" include more than the formal appointment of Senators by the Governor General. "[S]ection 42(b) refers to the method of selecting persons for appointment, not the means of appointment": Whyte, at p. 106 (emphasis in original). By employing this language, the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 extended the constitutional protection provided by the general amending procedure to the entire process by which Senators are "selected". The proposed consultative elections would produce lists of candidates, from which prime ministers would be expected to choose when making appointments to the Senate. The compilation of these lists through national or provincial and territorial elections and the Prime Minister's consideration of them prior to making recommendations to the Governor General would form part of the "method of selecting Senators". Consequently, the implementation of consultative elections falls within the scope of s. 42(1)(b) and is subject to the general amending procedure, without the provincial right to "opt out".

[66] In like vein, the Attorney General of Canada argues that consultative elections are not "in pith and substance" amendments in relation to the "method of selecting Senators". He draws upon the doctrine of pith and substance, which is employed by courts in division of powers cases to decide whether legislation was validly enacted by a level of government: see Hogg, at pp. 15-7 to 15-10. The courts look to whether legislation, in its purpose and effects, falls within one of the classes of subjects over which the Constitution gives power to the enacting body: Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837, at paras. 63-66. The Attorney General's position is that legislation implementing consultative elections would not, in its purpose and effects, constitute an amendment in relation to the "method of selecting Senators". He confines the meaning of this expression to the formal mechanism of appointment of Senators by the Governor General.

[67] As discussed, the plain meaning of the words "the method of selecting Senators" goes beyond the formal mechanism of appointment. Borrowing a doctrine from the division of powers jurisprudence does not avoid this textual difficulty. Even if the doctrine of pith and substance were relevant to the analysis, its application cannot justify a narrow reading of the relevant constitutional amending provisions. It bears repeating that ss. 38 and 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982 are intended to ensure that substantial provincial consent will be obtained for constitutional changes that engage provincial interests. The 7/50 procedure is the general rule for amendments to the Constitution of Canada. The Attorney General's invocation of the language of "pith and substance" does not alter this principle.

(3) The Implementation of Consultative Elections Falls Outside the Scope of the Unilateral Federal Amending Procedure

[68] The Attorney General of Canada argues in the alternative that, if the implementation of consultative elections requires a constitutional amendment, then it can be achieved under the unilateral federal amending procedure (s. 44). More specifically, he argues that the creation of consultative elections would be an amendment "in relation to . . . the Senate", within the meaning of s. 44.

[69] We must reject this argument. As we have seen, s. 42(1)(b) makes the general amending procedure applicable to changes to "the method of selecting Senators". Section 44 is expressly made "[s]ubject to" s. 42 — the categories of amendment captured by s. 42 are removed from the scope of s. 44. It follows that the 7/50 procedure, as opposed to the unilateral federal procedure, applies to the introduction of consultative elections. Moreover, the scope of s. 44 is limited — it does not encompass consultative elections, which would change the Senate's fundamental nature and role by endowing it with a popular mandate.

(4) Conclusion on How Consultative Elections Can Be Achieved

[70] We conclude that introducing a process of consultative elections for the nomination of Senators would change our Constitution's architecture, by endowing Senators with a popular mandate which is inconsistent with the Senate's role as a complementary legislative chamber of sober second thought. This would constitute an amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the method of selecting Senators. It thus attracts the general amending procedure, without the provincial right to "opt out": s. 42(1)(b) , Constitution Act, 1982.

B. Senatorial Tenure

[71] It is not disputed that a change in the duration of senatorial terms would amend the Constitution of Canada, by requiring a modification to the text of s. 29 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 29(2) provides:

(2) A Senator who is summoned to the Senate . . . shall . . . hold his place in the Senate until he attains the age of seventy-five years.

The question before us is which Part V procedure applies to amend this provision.

[72] The Attorney General of Canada argues that changes to senatorial tenure fall residually within the unilateral federal power of amendment in s. 44, since they are not expressly captured by the language of s. 42. He also contends that the imposition of the fixed terms contemplated in the Reference would constitute a minor change that does not engage the interests of the provinces, because those terms are equivalent in duration to the average length of the terms historically served by Senators.

[73] In essence, the Attorney General of Canada proposes a narrow textual approach to this issue. Section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides: "Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to . . . the Senate . . .". Neither s. 41 nor s. 42 expressly applies to amendments in relation to senatorial tenure. It follows, in his view, that the proposed changes to senatorial tenure are captured by the otherwise unlimited power in s. 44 to make amendments in relation to the Senate.

[74] We agree that the language of s. 42 does not encompass changes to the duration of senatorial terms. However, it does not follow that all changes to the Senate that fall outside of s. 42 come within the scope of the unilateral federal amending procedure in s. 44: see Whyte, at pp. 102-3.

[75] We are unable to agree with the Attorney General of Canada's interpretation of the scope of s. 44. As discussed, the unilateral federal amendment procedure is limited. It is not a broad procedure that encompasses all constitutional changes to the Senate which are not expressly included within another procedure in Part V. The history, language, and structure of Part V indicate that s. 38, rather than s. 44, is the general procedure for constitutional amendment. Changes that engage the interests of the provinces in the Senate as an institution forming an integral part of the federal system can only be achieved under the general amending procedure. Section 44, as an exception to the general procedure, encompasses measures that maintain or change the Senate without altering its fundamental nature and role.

[76] When discussing the scope of the unilateral federal procedure in the federal government's 1980 proposal for an amending formula, the then-Minister of Justice Jean Chrétien made statements to the effect that it would allow Parliament to make constitutional amendments for the Senate's continued maintenance and proper functioning, such as for example a modification of the Senate's quorum requirement at s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1867 : Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, No. 53, February 4, 1981, at p. 50. He made clear, however, that significant Senate reform which engages the interests of the provinces could only be achieved with their consent: ibid., at pp. 67-68.

[77] In our view, this understanding of the unilateral federal procedure applies to Part V. The Senate is a core component of the Canadian federal structure of government. As such, changes that affect its fundamental nature and role engage the interests of the stakeholders in our constitutional design — i.e. the federal government and the provinces — and cannot be achieved by Parliament acting alone.

[78] The question is thus whether the imposition of fixed terms for Senators engages the interests of the provinces by changing the fundamental nature or role of the Senate. If so, the imposition of fixed terms can only be achieved under the general amending procedure. In our view, this question must be answered in the affirmative.

[79] As discussed above, the Senate's fundamental nature and role is that of a complementary legislative body of sober second thought. The current duration of senatorial terms is directly linked to this conception of the Senate. Senators are appointed roughly for the duration of their active professional lives.[8] This security of tenure is intended to allow Senators to function with independence in conducting legislative review. This Court stated in the Upper House Reference that, "[a]t some point, a reduction of the term of office might impair the functioning of the Senate in providing what Sir John A. Macdonald described as 'the sober second thought in legislation'": p. 76. A significant change to senatorial tenure would thus affect the Senate's fundamental nature and role. It could only be achieved under the general amending procedure and falls outside the scope of the unilateral federal amending procedure.

[80] The imposition of fixed senatorial terms is a significant change to senatorial tenure. We are not persuaded by the argument that the fixed terms contemplated in the Reference are a minor change because they are equivalent in duration to the average term historically served by Senators. Rather, we agree with the submission of the amici curiae that there is an important "qualitative difference" between tenure for the rough duration of a Senator's active professional life and tenure for a fixed term: factum, at para. 88. Fixed terms provide a weaker security of tenure. They imply a finite time in office and necessarily offer a lesser degree of protection from the potential consequences of freely speaking one's mind on the legislative proposals of the House of Commons.

[81] It may be possible, as the Attorney General of Canada suggests, to devise a fixed term so lengthy that it provides a security of tenure which is functionally equivalent to that provided by life tenure. However, it is difficult to objectively identify the precise term duration that guarantees an equivalent degree of security of tenure. As Professor Desserud writes:

A one-year term would certainly not provide sufficient opportunity for the Senate to fulfill its duty to be a chamber of sober second thought. . . . The question becomes one of degree. If not one year, what about two? What about three? And so on. . . . Drawing an absolute line between when a term limit is too short and acceptably short is impossible.

(D. Desserud, "Whither 91.1? The Constitutionality of Bill C-19: An Act to Limit Senate Tenure", in J. Smith, ed., The Democratic Dilemma, 63, at p. 78)

[82] The difficulty in determining how long senatorial terms should be in order to safeguard the Senate's role as a body of sober second thought suggests that this is at heart a matter of policy. The very process of subjectively identifying a term long enough to leave intact the Senate's independence engages the interests of the provinces and requires their input. The imposition of fixed terms, even lengthy ones, constitutes a change that engages the interests of the provinces as stakeholders in Canada's constitutional design and falls within the rule of general application for constitutional change — the 7/50 procedure in s. 38.

[83] We note that although s. 42 does not apply to the imposition of fixed terms, no province would be able to exercise a right to "opt out" of a reform of tenure that garnered the requisite level of provincial consent. Such a change would constitute an institutional reform that affects the independence of the Senate and the senatorial office. It does not affect the legislative powers, property rights, or any other rights or privileges of the legislature or government of a province. Consequently, it does not trigger the right to "opt out" provided in s. 38(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

C. Property Qualifications

[84] The fourth Reference question contemplates the repeal of the provisions setting out the property qualifications for Senators. Sections 23(3) to 23(6) of the Constitution Act, 1867 provide:

23. The Qualifications of a Senator shall be as follows:

(3) He shall be legally or equitably seised as of Freehold for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Free and Common Socage, or seised or possessed for his own Use and Benefit of Lands or Tenements held in Franc-alleu or in Roture, within the Province for which he is appointed, of the Value of Four thousand Dollars, over and above all Rents, Dues, Debts, Charges, Mortgages, and Incumbrances due or payable out of or charged on or affecting the same;

(4) His Real and Personal Property shall be together worth Four thousand Dollars over and above his Debts and Liabilities;

(5) He shall be resident in the Province for which he is appointed;

(6) In the Case of Quebec he shall have his Real Property Qualification in the Electoral Division for which he is appointed, or shall be resident in that Division.

[85] The Constitution Act, 1867 established two property qualifications for Senators: a real property qualification requiring them to own land worth at least $4,000 in the province for which they are appointed (s. 23(3)), and a requirement that they have a personal net worth of at least $4,000 (s. 23(4)). The Attorney General of Canada argues that Parliament can repeal the provisions setting out these requirements through the unilateral federal amendment procedure. The Attorney General of Quebec contends that the repeal of the real property qualification in s. 23(3) would affect the operation of s. 23(6), which allows Quebec Senators to either reside in the electoral division for which they are appointed or to fulfill their real property qualification in that division. It follows, in his view, that Quebec's consent is required to repeal the provision.

[86] We conclude that the net worth requirement (s. 23(4)) can be repealed by Parliament under the unilateral federal amending procedure. However, a full repeal of the real property requirement (s. 23(3)) requires the consent of Quebec's legislative assembly, under the special arrangements procedure. Indeed, a full repeal of that provision would also constitute an amendment in relation to s. 23(6), which contains a special arrangement applicable only to the province of Quebec.

(1) The Net Worth Requirement

[87] As discussed above, the unilateral federal procedure to amend the Constitution is limited in scope. It does not permit amendments that engage the interests of the provinces by modifying the Senate's fundamental nature or role. The question is thus whether the removal of the net worth requirement would modify the Senate's fundamental nature or role.

[88] There is nothing in the material before us to suggest that removing the net worth requirement would affect the independence of Senators or otherwise affect the Senate's role as a complementary legislative chamber of sober second thought. This change is qualitatively different than implementing consultative elections for Senators or changing their security of tenure, which affect the fundamental nature and role of the Senate.

[89] Therefore, removing the net worth requirement does not engage the interests of the provinces. This is supported by the fact that none of the intervening provinces opposed the repeal of the requirement or argued that their interests were engaged by the amendment.

[90] We conclude that the repeal of s. 23(4) is precisely the type of amendment that the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982 intended to capture under s. 44. It updates the constitutional framework relating to the Senate without affecting the institution's fundamental nature and role.

(2) The Real Property Requirement

[91] Similarly, the removal of the real property requirement (s. 23(3), Constitution Act, 1867) would not alter the fundamental nature and role of the Senate. However, the removal of the real property requirement for Quebec's Senators would constitute an amendment in relation to a special arrangement. It would thus attract the special arrangements procedure and require the consent of Quebec's National Assembly (s. 43, Constitution Act, 1982).

[92] Section 22 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides that each Senator from Quebec is appointed to represent one of the province's 24 electoral divisions. Historically, this was intended to ensure that Quebec's Anglophone minorities would be represented in the Senate, by making it mandatory to appoint Senators specifically for divisions in which the majority of the population was Anglophone: J. Woehrling, "Le recours à la procédure de modification de l'article 43 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 pour satisfaire certaines revendications constitutionnelles du Québec", in P. Thibault, B. Pelletier and L. Perret, eds., Essays in Honour of Gérald-A. Beaudoin: The Challenges of Constitutionalism (2002), 449, at pp. 489-90. Section 23(6) is linked to the implementation of this special arrangement: it provides a degree of flexibility to Senators from Quebec by allowing them to either reside in the electoral division for which they are appointed or to simply fulfill their real property qualification in that division.

[93] A full repeal of s. 23(3) would render inoperative the option in s. 23(6) for Quebec Senators to fulfill their real property qualification in their respective electoral divisions, effectively making it mandatory for them to reside in the electoral divisions for which they are appointed. It would constitute an amendment in relation to s. 23(6), which contains a special arrangement applicable to a single province, and consequently would fall within the scope of the special arrangement procedure. The consent of Quebec's National Assembly is required.

[94] However, the real property qualification in s. 23(3) could be partially removed by making the provision inapplicable to Senators from all provinces except those from Quebec. This would not engage the interests of the provinces and can be achieved under the unilateral federal amending procedure.

VI. Senate Abolition: How Can It Be Achieved?

[95] Finally, the Reference asks which of two possible procedures applies to abolition of the Senate: the general amending procedure or the unanimous consent procedure?

[96] The Attorney General of Canada argues that the general amending procedure applies because abolition of the Senate falls under matters which Part V expressly says attract that procedure — amendments in relation to "the powers of the Senate" and "the number of members by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate" (s. 42(1)(b) and (c)). Abolition, it is argued, is simply a matter of "powers" and "members": it literally takes away all of the Senate's powers and all of its members. Alternatively, the Attorney General of Canada argues that since abolition of the Senate is not expressly mentioned anywhere in Part V, it falls residually under the general amending procedure.

[97] We cannot accept the Attorney General's arguments. Abolition of the Senate is not merely a matter of "powers" or "members" under s. 42(1)(b) and (c) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Rather, abolition of the Senate would fundamentally alter our constitutional architecture — by removing the bicameral form of government that gives shape to the Constitution Act, 1867 — and would amend Part V, which requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provinces (s. 41(e), Constitution Act, 1982).

A. Abolishing the Senate Does Not Fall Within Section 42(1)(b) and (c)

[98] It is argued that s. 42(1)(b) and (c), which expressly make the general amending procedure applicable to changes to the "powers" of the Senate and to the "number" of Senators allotted to each province, brings abolition of the Senate within the scope of the general amending procedure.

[99] We cannot accept this argument. It misunderstands the purpose of the express mention of the Senate in s. 42(1)(b) and (c). This provision captures Senate reform, which implies the continued existence of the Senate: Pelletier, La modification constitutionnelle au Canada, at pp. 221-24. Outright abolition falls beyond its scope.

[100] As discussed above, the references to the Senate in s. 42 were made in anticipation of future Senate reform. The Quebec Court of Appeal aptly captured this historical context and its relevance in interpreting s. 42:

The interpretation of section 42 must also take account, in particular, that because of the inability of the federal government and the provinces to agree in 1982 on a total reform of the Constitution, including the Senate, amongst other institutions, the framers decided to postpone further discussion of the matters it contains, while specifying the applicable amending procedure to incorporate an eventual consensus in the Constitution.

[Quebec Senate Reference, at para. 40]

[101] Abolition of the Senate was not on the minds of the framers of the Constitution Act, 1982. Rather, they turned their minds to the main aspects of Senate reform that were discussed in the years prior to patriation: the distribution of seats in the Senate, the powers of the Senate, and the manner of selecting Senators. They expected ongoing discussion of these aspects of Senate reform and made it clear, through their choice of words in s. 42, that these reforms would require a substantial degree of federal-provincial consensus. However, they assumed that the evolution of Canada's system of government would be characterized by a degree of continuity — that constitutional change would be incremental and that some core institutions would remain firmly anchored in our constitutional order.

[102] To interpret s. 42 as embracing Senate abolition would depart from the ordinary meaning of its language and is not supported by the historical record. The mention of amendments in relation to the powers of the Senate and the number of Senators for each province presupposes the continuing existence of a Senate and makes no room for an indirect abolition of the Senate. Within the scope of s. 42, it is possible to make significant changes to the powers of the Senate and the number of Senators. But it is outside the scope of s. 42 to altogether strip the Senate of its powers and reduce the number of Senators to zero.

B. Abolishing the Senate Would Alter the Part V Amending Formula

[103] The Attorney General of Canada argues that Senate abolition can be accomplished without amending Part V and that it therefore does not fall within the scope of s. 41(e), which requires unanimous federal-provincial consent for amendments to Part V. He argues that the Senate can be abolished without textually modifying the provisions of Part V. The references to the Senate in Part V would simply be viewed as "spent" and as devoid of legal effect.

[104] The Attorney General further submits that the Part V amending procedures would remain functional despite the presence of these "spent" provisions, since the Senate's failure to adopt a resolution authorizing a constitutional amendment can be overridden after the expiration of a 180-day period: s. 47(1), Constitution Act, 1982. Moreover, he submits that the Senate's role in the unilateral federal amending procedure (s. 44) can be eliminated under the general amending procedure, by changing the definition of Parliament in s. 17 of the Constitution Act, 1867 so as to remove the upper house.

[105] The Attorney General supplements these submissions with the argument that the effects of Senate abolition on Part V would be merely incidental and that they should not trigger the application of the unanimous consent procedure. In his view, Senate abolition would not be, "in pith and substance", an amendment in relation to Part V.

[106] We disagree with these submissions. Once more, the Attorney General privileges form over substance. Part V is replete with references to the Senate and gives the Senate a role in all of the amending procedures, except for the unilateral provincial procedure: Pelletier, La modification constitutionnelle au Canada, at pp. 220-21. Part V was drafted on the assumption that the federal Parliament would remain bicameral in nature, i.e. that there would continue to be both a lower legislative chamber and a complementary upper chamber. Removal of the upper chamber from our Constitution would alter the structure and functioning of Part V. Consequently, it requires the unanimous consent of Parliament and of all the provinces (s. 41(e)).

[107] The Attorney General of Canada's argument that the upper chamber could be removed without amending Part V fails to persuade us. As discussed, the notion of an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is not limited to textual modifications — it also embraces significant structural modifications of the Constitution. The abolition of the upper chamber would entail a significant structural modification of Part V. Amendments to the Constitution of Canada are subject to review by the Senate. The Senate can veto amendments brought under s. 44 and can delay the adoption of amendments made pursuant to ss. 38, 41, 42, and 43 by up to 180 days: s. 47 , Constitution Act, 1982 . The elimination of bicameralism would render this mechanism of review inoperative and effectively change the dynamics of the constitutional amendment process. The constitutional structure of Part V as a whole would be fundamentally altered.

[108] The argument that Senate abolition would only have "incidental" or secondary effects on Part V also fails to persuade us. The effects of Senate abolition on Part V are direct and substantial. While it is true that the Senate's role in constitutional amendment is not as central as that of the House of Commons or the provincial legislatures, its ability to delay the adoption of constitutional amendments nevertheless provides an additional mechanism to ensure that they are carefully considered. Indeed, the Senate's refusal to authorize an amendment can give the House of Commons pause and draw public attention to amendments: Smith, at p. 152.

[109] Since the effects of Senate abolition on Part V cannot be characterized as incidental, it is not necessary to decide whether there exists a doctrine — analogous to the "pith and substance" doctrine, discussed above — that justifies applying the general amending procedure to a constitutional amendment that has incidental effects on a matter coming within the unanimous consent procedure.

C. Conclusion on Abolition of the Senate

[110] The review of constitutional amendments by an upper house is an essential component of the Part V amending procedures. The Senate has a role to play in all of the Part V amending procedures, except for the unilateral provincial procedure. The process of constitutional amendment in a unicameral system would be qualitatively different from the current process. There would be one less player in the process, one less mechanism of review. It would be necessary to decide whether the amending procedure can function as currently drafted in a unicameral system, or whether it should be modified to provide for a new mechanism of review that occupies the role formerly played by the upper chamber. These issues relate to the functioning of the constitutional amendment formula and, as such, unanimous consent of Parliament and of all the provinces is required under s. 41(e) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

VII. Conclusion

[111] The majority of the changes to the Senate which are contemplated in the Reference can only be achieved through amendments to the Constitution, with substantial federal-provincial consensus. The implementation of consultative elections and senatorial term limits requires consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the legislative assemblies of at least seven provinces representing, in the aggregate, half of the population of all the provinces (s. 38 and s. 42(1)(b), Constitution Act, 1982). A full repeal of the property qualifications requires the consent of the legislative assembly of Quebec (s. 43, Constitution Act, 1982). As for Senate abolition, it requires the unanimous consent of the Senate, the House of Commons, and the legislative assemblies of all Canadian provinces (s. 41(e), Constitution Act, 1982).

6.4 The Allegiance Oath (2023-2024)

Drawing on the Quebec experience (see below, section 7.1), the Federal Parliament has also studied the possibility of abolishing the mandatory oath to the king, in 2023-2024. Indeed, in June 2023, Liberal MP René Arsenault tabled Bill C-347 – An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (oath of office). Relying on the Federal Parliament's power to unilaterally amend the Constitution, as set out in section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the text of the bill reads as follows:

Bill C-347 – An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (oath of office).

SUMMARY

This enactment amends section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to provide that every member of the Senate or House of Commons of Canada may, before taking their seat, choose to take and subscribe the oath of allegiance, an oath of office or both.

[…]

His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Constitution Act, 1867

1 Section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 is renumbered as subsection 128(1) and is amended by adding the following:

Choice of oath

(2) Notwithstanding subsection (1), every Member of the Senate or House of Commons of Canada may take and subscribe the Oath of Office contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act instead of the Oath of Allegiance or may take and subscribe both.

2 The Fifth Schedule to the Act is amended by adding the following after the Oath of Allegiance:

Oath of Office

I, A.B., do swear that I will carry out my duties in the best interest of Canada while upholding its Constitution.

The Bill was eventually defeated in its second reading in the House of Commons, in April 2024, by a vote of 197 to 113.

7 Provincial constitutional unilateralism since 2021

Despite the constitutional deadlock resulting from failed attempts at constitutional reform under the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords, a new trend seems to have emerged since 2021: that of constitutional unilateralism by provinces. This new trend is rooted in a variety of events.

7.1 Quebec: Bill 96 and the Abolition of the Oath to the King

In May 2021, the Quebec government tabled Bill 96 in the National Assembly, entitled An Act respecting French, the official and common language of Québec. Adopted and assented to a year later, this act amended the Constitution Act, 1867, and more specifically the "Quebec part" of the Canadian Constitution. This change was made possible by the amendment procedure set out in section 45 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

An Act respecting French, the official and common language of Québec, S.Q. 2022, c. 14.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

166. The Constitution Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3 (U.K.); 1982, c. 11 (U.K.)) is amended by inserting the following after section 90:

"FUNDAMENTAL CHARACTERISTICS OF QUEBEC

"90Q.1. Quebecers form a nation.

"90Q.2. French shall be the only official language of Quebec. It is also the common language of the Quebec nation."

Furthermore, at the end of 2022, Quebec decided to once again amend the Constitution Act, 1867, this time to abolish the obligation for members of the National Assembly to swear an oath to the King or Queen of Canada, in order to sit in the National Assembly:

An Act to recognize the oath provided in the Act respecting the National Assembly as the sole oath required in order to sit in the Assembly, S.Q. 2022, c. 30.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by inserting the following section after section 128:

"128Q.1. Section 128 does not apply to Quebec."

It is worth pointing out that section 128 of the Constitution Act, 1867 provides as follows:

Constitution Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Victoria, c. 3 (U.K.).

Oath of Allegiance, etc.

128 Every Member of the Senate or House of Commons of Canada shall before taking his Seat therein take and subscribe before the Governor General or some Person authorized by him, and every Member of a Legislative Council or Legislative Assembly of any Province shall before taking his Seat therein take and subscribe before the Lieutenant Governor of the Province or some Person authorized by him, the Oath of Allegiance contained in the Fifth Schedule to this Act; and every Member of the Senate of Canada and every Member of the Legislative Council of Quebec shall also, before taking his Seat therein, take and subscribe before the Governor General, or some Person authorized by him, the Declaration of Qualification contained in the same Schedule.

These two unilateral amendments made by Quebec have been added to the administrative codification of the Canadian Constitution, which can be found on the Department of Justice Canada website.

7.2 The Saskatchewan First Act

Inspired by the Quebec initiative, Saskatchewan also amended its part of the Canadian Constitution, in 2023, with the Saskatchewan First Act:

> (3) La capacité de la Saskatchewan de contrôler le développement de ses ressources naturelles non renouvelables, de ses ressources forestières et de la production d'énergie électrique est cruciale pour le bien-être et la prospérité futurs de la Saskatchewan et de sa population".

It is interesting to note here the adoption of these provisions in both official languages, as well as the express mention, by section 5 of the Saskatchewan First Act, that section 90S.1 is inserted after section 90Q.2, adopted a year earlier by Quebec. This provision, adopted by Saskatchewan, has also been added to the federal government's administrative codification.

7.3 Alberta's constitutional initiative regarding equalization

In 2021, Alberta held a referendum in which the province asked its population whether they were in favour of abolishing equalization. The referendum question was: "Should Section 36(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982 — Parliament and the Government of Canada's commitment to the principle of making equalization payments — be removed from the Constitution?" A majority of 61.7% of the population of the province voted in favour of abolishing equalization.

A month later, the Albertan government formally initiated a multilateral constitutional amendment seeking to abolish equalization. As mentioned above, constitutional reforms are initiated by parliamentary motions in Canada. The motion proposed by the Albertan government was the following:

> Alberta, Legislative Assembly, Hansard, 2nd Sess, 30th Leg, November 18, 2021, 6295.
> […]
> Government Motions
> Equalization Payments
> 101. Mr. Kenney moved:

Be it resolved that the Legislative Assembly:

(a) recognize the results of the referendum held on October 18, 2021, where 61.7 per cent of voters supported removing section 36(2) of the Constitution Act, 1982, Parliament and the government of Canada's commitment to the principle of making equalization payments,

(b) reaffirm the principle articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada in the 1998 reference re secession of Quebec that it is "the constitutional right of each participant in the federation to initiate Constitutional change" and that "this right implies a reciprocal duty on the other participants to engage in discussions to address any legitimate initiative to change the constitutional order,"

(c) authorize an amendment to the Constitution of Canada to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule set forth below, and

(d) direct the government of Alberta to take all necessary steps to secure a fair deal for Alberta in the Canadian federation, including the reform of federal transfer programs, the defence of provincial powers enumerated in the Constitution, and the right to pursue responsible development of natural resources.

SCHEDULE

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. The Constitution Act, 1982 is amended by repealing section 36(2) thereof.

2. This Amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, [year of proclamation].

[VERSION FRANÇAISE]

MODIFICATION DE LA CONSTITUTION DU CANADA

1. Le paragraphe 36(2) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 est abrogé.

2. Titre de la présente modification: Modification constitutionnelle de [l'année de la proclamation]

While the amendment was never adopted, since neither the Federal Parliament nor any other province has adopted it, the fact remains that this is unilateral action, Alberta having acted without any consultation or negotiation with its other federal partners.

7.4 Quebec's constitutional initiative regarding judicial nominations

Following in the footsteps of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and in response to recommendations made by the Advisory Committee on Quebec's Constitutional Issues within the Canadian Federation, Quebec also adopted a resolution in April 2025 concerning a possible amendment to the Constitution of Canada, this time regarding appointments to the province's superior courts. The resolution would require that judges of Quebec's superior courts to be appointed from among those members of the Barreau du Québec recommended by the government of Québec:

Le Vice-Président (M. Benjamin) : S'il vous plaît, s'il vous plaît! Merci de votre attention. Comme annoncé précédemment, nous allons maintenant procéder au vote reporté sur la motion proposée par M. le ministre responsable des Relations canadiennes et qui se lit comme suit :

« Que l'Assemblée nationale constate que le pouvoir de nomination des juges des cours supérieures des États fédérés appartient au gouverneur général en vertu de l'article 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867;

« Qu'elle constate que l'exercice de ce pouvoir est circonscrit, en ce qui concerne le Québec, par la condition voulant que les juges soient choisis parmi les membres du Barreau du Québec en vertu de l'article 98 de cette même loi;

« Qu'elle constate que l'article 98 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 vise à assurer que les juges des cours supérieures du Québec maîtrisent le droit qui y est en vigueur;

« Qu'elle souligne que le Québec est le seul État de tradition civiliste au sein de la fédération;

« Qu'elle considère qu'il y a lieu de protéger et de promouvoir cette tradition en précisant davantage la condition de nomination prévue à l'article 98;

« Qu'elle souligne qu'une telle modification peut être effectuée, conformément à l'article 43 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982, par proclamation de la gouverneure générale sous le grand sceau du Canada, autorisée par des résolutions de l'Assemblée nationale, du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes;

« Qu'elle précise qu'une telle modification ne constitue en aucune façon une reconnaissance par l'Assemblée nationale de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 qui fut adoptée sans son consentement;

« "Modification de la Constitution du Canada, Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 :

« "1° la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867 est modifiée par le remplacement de l'article 98 par le suivant :

« "'Titre II — titre de la présente modification : Modification constitutionnelle de (année de proclamation) Québec.'"»

Le vote est maintenant ouvert.

The future of this initiative remains to be seen, of course, but the duty to negotiate could be put forward by the Quebec government.

8 Questions and controversies in constitutional amendment

Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 sets out the formal procedures for constitutional amendment in Canada, but leaves several questions unresolved and gives rise to ongoing legal and political controversies, namely the use of referendums [8.1], the possibility of secession of a province [8.2], Quebec's constitutional demands [8.3], Indigenous participation in the amendment process [8.4], and the grievances of Western provinces [8.5].

8.1 The constitutional status of referendums

Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982 does not provide for direct popular participation in the constitutional amendment process. It remains silent on the necessity—or even the possibility—of organizing a referendum prior to a constitutional amendment. The authority to initiate and approve constitutional amendments lies exclusively with the federal and provincial legislative assemblies.

Although a constitutional referendum is not a mechanism outlined in Part V, political actors have, nonetheless, resorted to the use of popular votes in the past. For instance, in 1992, a nationwide referendum was held to gauge public opinion on the proposed reforms in the Charlottetown Accord. While the outcome of this referendum was not legally binding, it highlighted the potential role of direct democracy in legitimizing significant constitutional changes [8.1.1]. Some provinces have taken this principle further by adopting legislation that explicitly conditions constitutional amendments on prior approval through a referendum [8.1.2.]. Finally, it is worth considering whether a referendum might have been warranted in 1982 to allow the Canadian people to formally endorse the patriation of the Constitution [8.1.3].

8.1.1 The design and legacy of the 1992 pan-Canadian referendum

After the Prime Minister and the 10 provincial premiers reached a consensus on the proposal for constitutional reform in Charlottetown, the federal government chose to submit the agreement to the Canadian people through a national referendum on October 26, 1992.

This initiative aimed to address concerns raised about the Meech Lake Accord, which was criticized for being a closed-door process lacking public consultation and transparency. By taking this step, the federal government also emphasized the importance of securing broad public support for such a significant reform. See Patrick J Monahan, "The Sounds of Silence" in Kenneth McRoberts & Patrick J Monahan, eds, The Charlottetown Accord, the Referendum, and the Future of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993).

The referendum proclamation reads as follows:

> Proclamation Directing a Referendum Relating to the Constitution of Canada,* SI/92-180.
> Whereas subsection 3(1) of the Referendum Act, being chapter 30 of the Statutes of Canada, 1992, provides that where the Governor in Council considers that it is in the public interest to obtain by means of a referendum the opinion of electors on any question relating to the Constitution of Canada, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, direct that the opinion of electors be obtained by putting the question to the electors of Canada or of one or more provinces specified in the proclamation at a referendum called for that purpose;
> Whereas, pursuant to section 4 of that Act, no proclamation may be issued before the text of the referendum question has been approved under section 5 of that Act;
> Whereas the text of the referendum question hereinafter set out was approved by the House of Commons under section 5 of that Act on September 10, 1992 and was concurred in thereunder by the Senate on September 15, 1992;
> And Whereas, by Order in Council P.C. 1992-2045, of September 17, 1992, the Governor in Council, considering that it is in the public interest to do so, has ordered that a proclamation do issue directing that the opinion of electors be obtained by means of a referendum on the question hereinafter set out relating to the Constitution of Canada;
> Now Know You that We, by and with the advice of Our Privy Council for Canada, do by this Our Proclamation, direct that the opinion of electors be obtained by putting to the electors of the provinces of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba, British Columbia, Prince Edward Island, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Newfoundland, the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories, at a referendum called for that purpose, the following question relating to the Constitution of Canada:
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?
> YesNo"
> Of All Which Our Loving Subjects and all others whom these Presents may concern are hereby required to take notice and to govern themselves accordingly.

The Charlottetown Accord was rejected by 54.3% of Canadians electors outside Quebec. A majority of voters in British Columbia (68.3%), Manitoba (61.6%), Alberta (60.2%), Saskatchewan (55.3%), Yukon (56.3%), and Nova Scotia (51.2%) opposed the Accord. In contrast, substantial majorities in New Brunswick (61.8%), Newfoundland (63.2%), the Northwest Territories (61.3%), and Prince Edward Island (73.9%) supported it, while Ontario had a narrow approval with just a slight majority in favor (50.1%). See: See Chief Electoral Officer of Canada, The 1992 Federal Referendum: A Challenge Met: Report of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada (Ottawa: Elections Canada, 1994), at 58-59, online: https://www.elections.ca/res/rep/off/1992/1992_Referendum_Part_1_E.pdf.

Quebec held its own provincial referendum, in which 56.7% of Quebecers also voted "no". See Elections Québec, "Referendum on the Charlottetown Constitutional Accord", online: https://www.electionsquebec.qc.ca/en/results-and-statistics/referendum-on-the-charlottetown-constitutional-accord/.

Canadian electors rejected the Charlottetown Accord largely as a protest against the unpopular government of Prime Minister Brian Mulroney, with many Canadians feeling that it did not adequately address their concerns regarding national unity and decentralization. In Quebec, the rejection stemmed from a belief that the Accord failed to provide sufficient autonomy and recognition of Quebec's distinct society. On the causes of the failure of both referendums, see: Kenneth McRoberts, "Disagreeing on Fundamentals: English Canada and Quebec" in Kenneth McRoberts & Patrick J Monahan, eds, The Charlottetown Accord, the Referendum, and the Future of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993) at p 249; Robert C Vipond, "Seeing Canada Through the Referendum: Still a House Divided" (1993) 23 Publius 39; Kathy L Brock, "Learning from Failure: Lessons from Charlottetown" (1993) 4 Const Forum Const 29.

This dual-referendum dynamic exposed the complexities of addressing national and regional aspirations within the framework of constitutional reform, revealing tensions that continue to shape Canada's political landscape. While the rejection of the Charlottetown Accord marked a significant setback for constitutional renewal, it also highlighted the challenges of crafting agreements capable of satisfying the diverse interests of a country as vast and pluralistic as Canada.

The parallel organization of a nationwide referendum and a provincial referendum in Quebec also highlighted several challenges, as illustrated in the Haig case. In this decision, the Supreme Court clarified that the right to vote guaranteed under section 3 of the Charter did not extend to the right to participate in a federal referendum. Additionally, the Court confirmed that, under Canadian law, a referendum is non-binding, underscoring its consultative nature rather than its ability to impose legal obligations, unless the legislature explicitly provides otherwise. This reasoning was also adopted by the Newfoundland Court of Appeal in Hogan, following the referendum that approved a bilateral constitutional amendment to create a secular school system in 1997.

Haig v. Canada; Haig v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995

The judgment of La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier and Major JJ. was delivered by L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. -- On October 26, 1992, two referenda were held in Canada, each concerning proposed amendments to the Canadian Constitution. Graham Haig was not able to cast a ballot in either. This was unfortunate. The only issue in the present appeal is this: Was Graham Haig entitled to cast a ballot in the federal referendum?

At that specific moment in Canadian history, there was a confluence of political pressures, concerns and events. Among these was the ongoing and often politically heated constitutional dialogue. In order to seek the views of Canadians on this crucial issue of constitutional change, the federal government and the provincial governments who so desired had available a variety of options: commissions, surveys, opinion polls, referenda, etc. Quebec had legally bound itself to hold a referendum on sovereignty, while British Columbia and Alberta had articulated the possibility that they would hold provincial referenda dealing with constitutional change, and that they would consider themselves bound by the results. It was in this context that the federal government undertook to hold a referendum in those provinces where a provincial referendum would not otherwise be held. This choice was in accord with the desire and the authority of the provinces to consult their own electors as they saw fit.

In the end, only two referenda were held: one in Quebec pursuant to Quebec's provincial referendum legislation, the other in the rest of Canada pursuant to the federal referendum legislation. The model chosen by the federal government was one which was open to them under the relevant legislation, which specifically allowed for referenda to be conducted in one or more provinces. The model chosen was, at the time, thought to be politically sound by both the federal and the provincial governments.

The mechanics of the two referenda were governed by the elections legislation of each government. The federal and the Quebec elections legislation, though similar in certain respects, are not mirror images of each other, but contain different provisions on a number of issues including: the preparation of electoral lists, methods of voting, financing, referendum publicity and spending, the roles and functions of the Chief Electoral Officers and their staff, and residency requirements. The residency provisions of the Quebec elections legislation, in particular, diverge from those in the federal legislation by requiring six months residency in order to be eligible to vote. It was this residency requirement which resulted in some Quebec residents, Mr. Haig in particular, not being able to cast their vote, and which is at the heart of this case.

Were the Quebec residents who were not entitled to vote in the Quebec referendum nonetheless entitled to vote in the federal referendum? To answer this question, it is essential to more fully refer to the political events and legislative context leading up to October 26, 1992.

Facts

...

In August of 1992, Graham Haig moved from Ontario to Quebec. On the enumeration day for the federal referendum, Mr. Haig was no longer ordinarily resident in a polling division established for the federal referendum, and so, pursuant to the provisions of the Canada Elections Act, he was not included on the list of voters entitled to vote in the federal referendum. At the same time, having been domiciled in Quebec for less than six months, he did not meet the eligibility requirements under the Election Act(Quebec), and so was not included on the list of voters eligible to vote in the Quebec referendum. The result was, of course, that Mr. Haig was not enumerated and consequently could not vote in either referendum.

Section 3: The Right to Vote

The democratic rights contained in ss. 3, 4 and 5 of the Charter are quite explicitly articulated. In his discussion in "Democratic Rights", in G.-A. Beaudoin and E. Ratushny, eds., The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2nd ed. 1989), 265, Professor Beaudoin summarizes these rights at p. 266 as:

> The right to choose the government, the right to seek public office, the right to vote periodically, freely and in secret and the right for those elected to sit regularly are the bases of democratic rights.

The democratic rights guaranteed in the Charter are also positive ones. Federal and provincial governments have a mandate to hold regular elections to allow citizens to select their representatives. The failure to hold such regular elections would violate the Charter, would open the government to account for such constitutional infringements, and would undoubtedly provoke a constitutional crisis. Since the results of an election are clearly binding upon citizens in a democratic society, failure to act upon such results would entail a serious constitutional breach.

A referendum, on the other hand, is basically a consultative process, a device for the gathering of opinions. Voting in a referendum differs significantly from voting in an election. First, unless it legislatively binds itself to do so, a government is under no obligation to consult its citizens through the mechanism of a referendum. It may, as did Quebec under Bill 150, bind itself to conduct a specific referendum but, in the absence of such legislation, there is no obligation to hold this type of consultation. Second, though a referendum may carry great political weight and a government may choose to act on the basis of the results obtained, such results are non-binding in the absence of legislation requiring a government to act on the basis of the results obtained. In the absence of binding legislation, the citizens of this country would not be entitled to a legal remedy in the event of non-compliance with the results. Were a government to hold a referendum and then ignore the results, the remedy would be in the political and not the legal arena. These differences provide further evidence that the constitutionally guaranteed right to vote does not contemplate the right to vote in a referendum.

Section 3 of the Charter is clear and unambiguous as is its purpose: it is limited to the elections of provincial and federal representatives. Consequently, since a referendum is in no way such a selection, the citizens of this country cannot claim a constitutional right to vote in a referendum under s. 3 of the Charter. Accordingly, Mr. Haig's s. 3 Charter rights were not infringed because he could not cast his ballot in the federal referendum.

3) Rule of Law and Respect for Minorities

[105] At its core, this argument is that the actions of the Government of Newfoundland prior to the calling of the referendum of September 1997 and during the period from the calling of the referendum to the vote, including the method of conducting the vote, were in violation of the applicable legislation - the Election Act, R.S.N. 1990, c. E-3, as amended, and were also in violation of the principle of protection of minority rights. None of the alleged deficiencies demonstrates a failure to meet all of the requirements specified in s. 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982. So then, this argument is based on the belief that even if s. 43 could otherwise be said to be the proper amending formula, there are aspects of this case, founded on constitutional principles, which make compliance with s. 43 insufficient to amend Term 17.

[106] While it is conceded that the amending procedure does not require a referendum, the appellants argue that having chosen to make a referendum a part of the process, the Government must abide by the rule of law, applicable laws and the requirements of the Charter and any failure to do so results in an invalid amendment. Here the appellants make an analogy to administrative law and ask that the Court focus not on the result, but on the procedure to determine if the basic rules were met.

[107] In Reference re Secession of Quebec, the Supreme Court of Canada emphasized the fact that the Court has no supervisory role over political aspects of constitutional negotiations. At para. [100] the Court added: "equally, the initial impetus for negotiation, namely a clear majority on a clear question in favour of secession, is subject only to political evaluation, and properly so." The comments of the Court were made in the context of a reference. However, the general approach is equally appropriate in this case.

[108] The submission of the A. G. Canada is that the following factors would fall into that political character, at least in relation to the validity of the Constitution Amendment, 1998 (Newfoundland Act), and, therefore, that they have no place in the considerations to be made by this Court: (1) the Provincial Government's policy on educational reform; (2) the quality of the political debate regarding the proposed amendments; (3) the analysis of the results of the vote; (4) the balancing of interest of those favouring and those opposing the amendment; and (5) the specific motivations of members of the Legislative Assembly. The appellants agree respecting the first and third listed topics. As to the others, the appellants argue that the Court can and must examine the referendum process because it is undertaken under law and therefore should be subject to court scrutiny; that any violation of fundamental rights is also subject to court scrutiny and that the court is free, not to tell a member of the Legislature or Parliament how to vote, but to examine the express statements of the members to determine the significance of certain factors in that process. Specifically, the appellants note that in their statements each member spoke of the referendum when describing their reasons for voting as they did. In other words, the appellants look to the "political" statements to support their submission that while the referendum may not have been constitutionally required, it was instrumental in the voting by the members of the legislative bodies.

[109] The Court has no role in examining the motivation of members of the Legislature or the Houses of Parliament in casting their votes. The interpretation of and weight to be given to the results of the referendum is a political matter. I would add further that, at least in respect of the members of the Senate and House of Commons, the very points made by the appellants in this case were made before the Joint Committee and specifically referred to in the report of the Committee which said:

> Some of the denominational interests that testified had specific criticisms of the referendum process. They argued that the original question left the impression that unidenominational education courses would be allowed, that the actual text of the proposed resolution was released too late in the referendum process to allow for full debate, that religious denominations opposed to the amendment were denied government funding, and that scrutineers were not allowed. They also objected to government-funded advertising in favour to the resolution.

It cannot be said that the members of those bodies were unaware of the "deficiencies" pointed to by the appellants.

[110] Counsel for the appellants concedes that the trial judge dealt with the issue of unfairness only in the context of the spending issue. He did not deal with it on any other level. But these submissions were made and the appellants argue that this Court can make the necessary findings here.

[111] I agree that it is not the role of this Court to enter into the policy debate regarding the amendment of Term 17 and the subsequent measures taken respecting education in Newfoundland. The only task before this Court is the determination of the legal issues raised on the appeal.

[125] In interpreting the Constitution of Canada, one cannot ignore the history of its development. There can be no denying the evolutionary (as opposed to revolutionary) nature of the creation of Canada. Indeed, long after Canada was recognized as an independent country, it continued to evolve and mature constitutionally. However, the fact that we now have constitutional documents to which we can refer collectively as the Constitution does not eliminate all reference to our largely unwritten constitutional past. Not every nuance of the powers of the different heads of government, for example, is written in the Constitution. Even with a written document, certain underlying assumptions will be seen as being self-evident and of constitutional stature. The New Brunswick Broadcasting case required the Court to express what was unwritten. Here the appellants would have this Court defeat a constitutionally mandated process by reference to the "fundamental or original principles." However, unlike the Provincial Court Judges Reference or the New Brunswick Broadcasting case, here the Court is being asked to read in requirements, not to confirm some long accepted unwritten principle of the Constitution but to limit the application of the amending provisions to a right that was granted by the written Constitution. This is not a case where the unwritten assumptions of educational rights need to be stated by the Courts. The rights are fully explored and stated in Term 17. Term 17 is a complete statement of the denominational education rights. No other term written or unwritten of the Constitution need be called upon to interpret Term 17 or to determine how it should be amended. Neither the rule of law nor respect for minorities prevents the application of s. 43 to the amendment of Term 17. The appellants' position ignores the inescapable fact that the Constitution entrusts minority rights to the majority. The structure is designed not to prevent constitutional amendment but to ensure, by making the process more difficult than the passage of an amendment to any other bill, that the rights are given "due regard and protection." The appropriate provision in Part V of the Constitution, having been complied with, the validity of the amendment to Term 17 cannot be questioned.

It is worth considering whether the 1992 Referendum could establish a precedent that might form the foundation for recognizing a constitutional convention, rooted in the underlying constitutional principle of democracy. Such a convention could potentially mandate that any future significant constitutional reforms be subjected to a popular vote. Given that no constitutional amendment has occurred since the failure of the 1992 referendum, the question of whether actors feel bound by such a convention, is still open to debates.

For the view that a convention might exist, see Dave Guénette, "Le référendum constitutionnel dans les sociétés fragmentées – L'expérience canadienne, son ambiguïté et ses conséquences », dans Amélie Binette et Patrick Taillon, (dir.), L a démocratie référendaire dans les ensembles plurinationaux, Québec, Presses de l'Université Laval, 2018, p. 181, 194-197; Jeffrey Simpson, "The Referendum and Its Aftermath" in Kenneth McRoberts & Patrick J Monahan, eds, The Charlottetown Accord, the Referendum, and the Future of Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1993) 193 at 193; Roger Gibbins & David Thomas, "Ten Lessons from the Referendum" (1992) 15 Can Parliamentary Rev 3 at 3. 8.1.2 Provincial constitutional referendums

The provinces of Alberta and British Columbia have both enacted laws requiring mandatory constitutional referendums for any amendments to the Constitution of Canada. Each of these laws, however, includes distinct provisions.

British Columbia's law imposes an obligation on the provincial government to hold a referendum before introducing any resolution to authorize a constitutional amendment. However, since the law remains silent on the effects of the referendum's outcome, the referendum is, in principle, non-binding.

> AND WHEREAS the Constitution of Canada is the Supreme Law of Canada;
> AND WHEREAS constitutional amendment has an impact on all British Columbians;
> AND WHEREAS it is essential that the Constitution of Canada reflect the values of British Columbians and that British Columbians have an opportunity to indicate their views on any proposed constitutional amendment;
> THEREFORE HER MAJESTY, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of British Columbia, enacts as follows:
> Referendum to precede resolution for constitutional change
> 1 The government must not introduce a motion for a resolution of the Legislative Assembly authorizing an amendment to the Constitution of Canada unless a referendum has first been conducted under the Referendum Act with respect to the subject matter of that resolution.

The Alberta law, on the other hand, is more restrictive. Not only is the government required to organize a referendum before the Legislative Assembly can vote on a resolution to initiate or approve a constitutional amendment, but it is also obligated to comply with the outcome of the vote and take the steps necessary to give effect to it.

> Referendum Act*, RSA 2000, c R-8.4

> (2) If the results of a referendum are binding, the government that initiated the referendum shall, as soon as practicable, take any steps within the competence of the Government of Alberta that it considers necessary or advisable to implement the results of the referendum.
> 12 This Act does not apply to a particular proposal to amend the Constitution of Canada if the Legislative Assembly, on the motion of a member of the Executive Council, approves the substitution of a referendum on that proposal held under the Referendum Act (Canada), but
> (a) the question on the referendum under the Referendum Act (Canada) must be acceptable to the Legislative Assembly,
> (b) that referendum must be held before the resolution authorizing the amendment to the Constitution of Canada is voted on by the Legislative Assembly, and
> (c) the result of that referendum, as determined by the majority of ballots validly cast in Alberta, is binding on the Government of Alberta, which shall, as soon as practicable, take whatever steps within its competence that it considers necessary or advisable to implement that result.

It has been argued that these laws could constitute disguised amendments to the amendment formula. Indeed, since both laws technically add a step to the amendment process, they could amount to an indirect amendment to Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, which requires the unanimous consent of the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures. See: Sébastien Grammond, « Une province peut-elle subordonner l'approbation d'une modification constitutionnelle à la tenue d'un référendum ? », (1997) 38-3 Les Cahiers de droit 569; Dave Guénette, « Le référendum constitutionnel dans les sociétés fragmentées – L'expérience canadienne, son ambigüité et ses conséquences », dans Patrick Taillon et Amélie Binette (dir.), La démocratie référendaire dans les États plurinationaux, Québec, Presses de l'Université Laval, 2018, p. 181.

In addition, if a province wanted to condition its right to unilaterally amend its constitution (s. 45) on holding a binding referendum, it is uncertain that it could make such a change on its own. Indeed, according to the JCPC's decision in In re The Initiative and Referendum Act, 1919 CanLII 426 (UK JCPC), [1919] A.C. 935 a referendum with binding effects would interfere with the "office of the lieutenant governor". Given that this matter now falls under section 41(a) of the Constitution Act, 1982, such amendment may require the use of the unanimity procedure.

(p. 19) VISCOUNT HALDANE :—In this case questions were raised in the Province of Manitoba as to the validity of an Act passed by its Legislature and entitled the Initiative and Referendum Act. In consequence, under a statute which enabled him to do so, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council referred to the Court of King's Bench of the Province the two questions which follow:-

1. Had the Legislative Assembly jurisdiction to enact the said Act, and, if not, in what particular or respect has it exceeded its powers?

2. Had the Legislative Assembly jurisdiction to enact ss. 3, 4, 4a, 7, 8, 11, 12, 17 (sub-s. 1) of the said Act, or any of them; and, if so, which of them?

(p. 20) The validity of the Initiative and Referendum Act, a statute of a type which is not unknown in parts of the world with constitutions different from that of Canada, of course depends on whether the constitution of Canada as defined by the B.N.A. Act of 1867 permitted a Provincial Legislature to pass it into law for the Province. The first step in the consideration of the matter is therefore to ascertain the exact character of the legislation proposed. In substance it is this. The Legislative Assembly seeks to provide that laws for the Province may be made and repealed by the direct vote of the electors, instead of only by the Legislative Assembly whose members they elect. The machinery created for the accomplishment of this end is that first of all a number of the electors, being not less than 8% of the number of votes polled at the last election, may by petition submit a proposed law to the Legislative Assembly. In the next place, the proposed law, unless enacted without substantial change by the Assembly in the session in which it is submitted, must be submitted by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council to a vote of the electors, to be taken, at the next general Provincial election, unless a special referendum vote has been asked for in the petition. Provision is made for time being available in which to obtain the opinion of the Att'y-Gen'l, and if necessary of the Court, as to whether the proposed law is intra vires. If not it cannot be submitted. If a special referendum vote has been asked for it is usually to be taken within 6 months from the presentation of the petition. In the third place, if a proposed law has been submitted to the electors, and approved by a majority of the votes polled, it is to take effect, "subject, however, to the same powers of veto and disallowance as are provided in the B.N.A. Act or as exist in law with respect to any Act of the Legislative Assembly, as though such law were an Act of the said Assembly," on a date to be proclaimed by the Lieutenant-Governor, and to be not later than 30 days after the official announcement of the result of the vote.

The Act then, by two well-known sections, 91 and 92, distributes the powers of legislation which it confers between the Dominion Parliament and the Provincial Legislatures. Nothing in s. 91, which relates to Dominion powers, affects the question under consideration, excepting in one important respect. The residuary power of legislation, beyond those powers that are specifically distributed by the two sections, is conferred on the Dominion. Had the Provinces possessed the residuary capacity, as in the case with the States under the constitutions of the United States and Australia, this might have affected the question of the power of their Legislatures to set up new legislative bodies. But it is not so, and it is therefore unnecessary to pursue a point which is merely speculative. The language of s. 92 is important. That section commences by enacting that "in each Province the Legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters" coming - within certain classes of subjects. The only one of these classes which is relevant for the present purpose is the first enumerated, "the amendment from time to time, notwithstanding anything in this Act, of the constitution of the Province, except as regards the office of Lieutenant-Governor."

The references their Lordships have already made to the character of the office of Lieutenant-Governor, and to his position Attorney General for New South Wales v. Trethowan, [1932] A.C. 526 (C.P.); as directly representing the Sovereign in the Province, renders natural the exclusion of his office from the power conferred on the Provincial Legislature to amend the constitution of the Province. The analogy of the British constitution is that on which the entire scheme is founded, and that analogy points to the impropriety, in the absence of clear and unmistakable language, of construing s. 92 as permitting the abrogation of any power which the Crown possesses through a person who directly represents it. For when the Lieutenant-Governor gives to or withholds his assent from a Bill passed by the Legislature of the Province, it is in contemplation of law the Sovereign that so gives or withholds assent. Moreover, in accordance with the analogy of the British constitution which the Act of 1867 adopts, the Lieutenant-Governor who represents the Sovereign is a part of the Legislature. This is in terms so enacted in such sections as 69, the principle of which has been applied to Manitoba by s. 2 of the Dominion statute of 1870, which formed the new Province out of Rupert's Land and the N.W.T., and established it with the constitution provided by the Act of 1867. It follows that if the Initiative and Referendum Act has purported to alter the position of the Lieutenant-Governor in these respects, this Act was insofar ultra vires.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the language of the Act cannot be construed otherwise than as intended seriously to affect the position of the Lieutenant-Governor as an integral part of the Legislature, and to detract from rights which are important in the legal theory of that position. For if the Act is valid it compels him to submit a proposed law to a body of voters totally distinct from the Legislature of which he is the constitutional head, and renders him powerless to prevent its becoming an actual law if approved by a majority of these voters. It was argued that the words already referred to, which appear in s. 7, preserve his powers of veto and disallowance. Their Lordships are unable to assent to this contention. The only powers preserved are those which relate to Acts of the Legislative Assembly, as distinguished from Bills, and the powers of veto and disallowance referred to can only be those of the Governor-General under s. 90 of the Act of 1867, and not the powers of the Lieutenant-Governor, which are at an end when a Bill has become an Act. S. 11 of the Initiative and Referendum Act is not less difficult to reconcile with the rights of the Lieutenant-Governor. It provides that when a proposal for repeal of some law has been approved by the majority of the electors voting, that law is automatically to be deemed repealed at the end of 30 days after the Clerk of the Executive Council shall have published in the "Manitoba Gazette" a statement of the result of the vote. Thus the Lieutenant-Governor appears to be wholly excluded from the new legislative authority.

These considerations are sufficient to establish the ultra vires character of the Act. The offending provisions are in their Lordships' view so interwoven into the scheme that they are not severable. The Colonial Laws Validity Act of 1865, therefore, which was invoked in the course of the argument, does not assist the appellants. […]

8.1.3 A referendum in 1982?

Although a referendum was ultimately not included as a condition for constitutional amendments in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, the adoption of the Act itself raised the question of whether it should be subjected to a popular vote. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, then Prime Minister of Canada, brought this issue to the forefront by suggesting the possibility to hold a national referendum during a speech before the House of Commons in April 1980:

> "Speech from the Throne", Continuation of Debate on Address in Reply, House of Commons Debates, 32-1, No 1 (15 April 1980) at 36 (Rt Hon Pierre E Trudeau).
> I do not discard the idea of an eventual national referendum. If that is the only way in which we can get the people of Canada to affirm their loyalty to Canada over and above their regional loyalties, then I think we should not put the idea aside. Eventually I hope to have occasion to discuss that idea with leaders of other parties and perhaps with the premiers. Perhaps we can find some simple question having to do with constitutional reform upon which there would be a large enough measure of agreement to have a positive vote for Canada in a national referendum. But that is not for today nor indeed perhaps for this particular session, although I hope it might be for this Parliament.

Trudeau viewed the referendum not only as a tool to confer legitimacy on the proposed Constitution among Canadians, but also as a strategic last resort to overcome provincial resistance. The threat served to apply significant pressure on the premiers and could be seen as having played a pivotal role in breaking the deadlock. See Albert, Richard, Trudeau's Threat: The Referendum at Patriation (August 3, 2020), in Noura Karazivan and Jean Leclair (eds.), The Political and Constitutional Legacy of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, (Toronto: LexisNexis, 2020); Ron Graham, The Last Act: Pierre Trudeau, the Gang of Eight, and the Fight for Canada (Toronto: Penguin, 2011). Ultimately, this approach led to the landmark "Kitchen Accord," allowing an agreement to be reached without a referendum being held. See TVO Today, "The Three Amigos of the Constitution", by Steve Paikin, with Jean Chretien, Roy McMurtry and Roy Romanow, April 19, 2012, online (video): https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-15a773nqnQ. Even if a referendum was not constitutionally required and the provinces consented without one, could holding a referendum have still provided democratic value and enhanced the legitimacy of the 1982 patriation process?

8.2 The secession of a province

The secession of a province is a complex and multifaceted issue in Canada, particularly illustrated by the historical context of the Quebec sovereignty movement. The pivotal 1980 and 1995 referendums framed the questions of sovereignty and reflected the socio-political climate of their times, revealing deep divisions within Quebec and across Canada [8.2.1]. Following these referendums, the 1998 Supreme Court Reference clarified the legal parameters surrounding secession, establishing key legal foundations for any future attempts at independence and addressing the constitutional implications of a unilateral declaration of secession [8.2.2]. Today, the landscape of secessionist sentiments has evolved, with Quebec's persistent pursuit of autonomy coexisting alongside emerging movements in western provinces, where regional discontent is fostering calls for greater independence from federal governance [8.2.3].

8.2.1 The 1980 and 1995 referendums (questions, context, results)

The Parti Québécois, led by René Lévesque, came to power in 1976 with a mandate to pursue sovereignty-association, proposing a distinct relationship between Quebec and the rest of Canada. In this climate, the government called for a referendum on May 20, 1980, asking voters whether they supported Quebec becoming a sovereign state while maintaining an economic association with Canada. The referendum ultimately resulted in a defeat for the sovereignty movement, with approximately 60% voting against the proposal, but it underscored the ongoing tensions regarding Quebec's status within Canada and set the stage for future discussions on sovereignty and constitutional reform. See: Elections Québec, "Referendum on the 1980 sovereignty-association proposal for Québec", online: https://www.electionsquebec.qc.ca/en/results-and-statistics/referendum-on-the-1980-sovereignty-association-proposal-for-quebec/#anchor2

Following the 1980 referendum, discussions about Quebec's constitutional status continued. The failure of the Meech Lake Accord, which aimed to address Quebec's demands for greater autonomy within Canada, further intensified these discussions. The Commission on the Political and Constitutional Future of Québec was established to explore options for Quebec's future, ultimately recommending sovereignty as a viable path. This culminated in the introduction of An Act respecting the process for determining the political and constitutional future of Québec, also known as Bill 150, in May 1991, which sought to empower Quebecers to determine their political status through a referendum and to redefine Quebec's constitutional relationship with Canada. The Act also established special parliamentary committees to explore both the process of achieving sovereignty and any potential new constitutional arrangements with the Canadian government.

> 6. No offer of a new constitutional partnership made to the Gouvernement du Québec may be submitted to the assessment of the committee unless it is formally binding on the Government of Canada and the other provinces.

After the adoption of Bill 150, the Quebec government prepared for a referendum on sovereignty, initially scheduled to occur between June 8-22 or October 12-26, 1992. However, during this period, the Charlottetown Accord was proposed as a new constitutional agreement aimed at addressing various regional concerns, including those of Quebec. As we saw, the referendum on the Charlottetown Accord was ultimately rejected by voters across Canada, including in Quebec.

Following this, the Quebec government continued its efforts to engage citizens in discussions about sovereignty, culminating in a referendum on October 30, 1995. Voters were asked : "Do you agree that Quebec should become sovereign, after having made a formal offer to Canada for a new economic and political partnership, within the scope of the bill respecting the future of Quebec and of the agreement signed on June 12, 1995?". See: Secrétariat du Québec aux relations canadiennes, "Historical Background", at para 19, online: Gouvernement of Québec https://www.sqrc.gouv.qc.ca/relations-canadiennes/positions-historiques/politique-affirmation/rappels-historiques-en.asp

This referendum resulted in a narrow defeat for the sovereignty movement, with approximately 50.6% voting against independence.

8.2.2 The 1998 secession reference

In the aftermath of the 1995 referendum, questions emerged regarding the legality of Quebec's potential unilateral declaration of independence. The federal government sought clarity on constitutional issues related to secession, asking the Supreme Court for an opinion on whether Quebec had the right to unilaterally secede from Canada and under what conditions.

The federal government asked three reference questions to the Supreme Court of Canada on September 30, 1996 (Order in Council PC 1996-1497 (30 September 1996):

> 1. Under the Constitution of Canada, can the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
> 2. Does international law give the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally? In this > regard, is there a right to self-determination under international law that would give > the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec the right to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally?
> 3. In the event of a conflict between domestic and international law on the right of the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally, which would take precedence in Canada?

The following excerpt presents the section of the Court's judgment that specifically addresses the constitutionality of unilateral secession.

> Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217
> […]
> (4) The Operation of the Constitutional Principles in the Secession Context
> 83 Secession is the effort of a group or section of a state to withdraw itself from the political and constitutional authority of that state, with a view to achieving statehood for a new territorial unit on the international plane. In a federal state, secession typically takes the form of a territorial unit seeking to withdraw from the federation. Secession is a legal act as much as a political one. By the terms of Question 1 of this Reference, we are asked to rule on the legality of unilateral secession "[u]nder the Constitution of Canada". This is an appropriate question, as the legality of unilateral secession must be evaluated, at least in the first instance, from the perspective of the domestic legal order of the state from which the unit seeks to withdraw. As we shall see below, it is also argued that international law is a relevant standard by which the legality of a purported act of secession may be measured.
> 84 The secession of a province from Canada must be considered, in legal terms, to require an amendment to the Constitution, which perforce requires negotiation. The amendments necessary to achieve a secession could be radical and extensive. Some commentators have suggested that secession could be a change of such a magnitude that it could not be considered to be merely an amendment to the Constitution. We are not persuaded by this contention. It is of course true that the Constitution is silent as to the ability of a province to secede from Confederation but, although the Constitution neither expressly authorizes nor prohibits secession, an act of secession would purport to alter the governance of Canadian territory in a manner which undoubtedly is inconsistent with our current constitutional arrangements. The fact that those changes would be profound, or that they would purport to have a significance with respect to international law, does not negate their nature as amendments to the Constitution of Canada.
> 85 The Constitution is the expression of the sovereignty of the people of Canada. It lies within the power of the people of Canada, acting through their various governments duly elected and recognized under the Constitution, to effect whatever constitutional arrangements are desired within Canadian territory, including, should it be so desired, the secession of Quebec from Canada. As this Court held in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 745, "[t]he Constitution of a country is a statement of the will of the people to be governed in accordance with certain principles held as fundamental and certain prescriptions restrictive of the powers of the legislature and government". The manner in which such a political will could be formed and mobilized is a somewhat speculative exercise, though we are asked to assume the existence of such a political will for the purpose of answering the question before us. By the terms of this Reference, we have been asked to consider whether it would be constitutional in such a circumstance for the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.
> 86 The "unilateral" nature of the act is of cardinal importance and we must be clear as to what is understood by this term. In one sense, any step towards a constitutional amendment initiated by a single actor on the constitutional stage is "unilateral". We do not believe that this is the meaning contemplated by Question 1, nor is this the sense in which the term has been used in argument before us. Rather, what is claimed by a right to secede "unilaterally" is the right to effectuate secession without prior negotiations with the other provinces and the federal government. At issue is not the legality of the first step but the legality of the final act of purported unilateral secession. The supposed juridical basis for such an act is said to be a clear expression of democratic will in a referendum in the province of Quebec. This claim requires us to examine the possible juridical impact, if any, of such a referendum on the functioning of our Constitution, and on the claimed legality of a unilateral act of secession.
> 87 Although the Constitution does not itself address the use of a referendum procedure, and the results of a referendum have no direct role or legal effect in our constitutional scheme, a referendum undoubtedly may provide a democratic method of ascertaining the views of the electorate on important political questions on a particular occasion. The democratic principle identified above would demand that considerable weight be given to a clear expression by the people of Quebec of their will to secede from Canada, even though a referendum, in itself and without more, has no direct legal effect, and could not in itself bring about unilateral secession. Our political institutions are premised on the democratic principle, and so an expression of the democratic will of the people of a province carries weight, in that it would confer legitimacy on the efforts of the government of Quebec to initiate the Constitution's amendment process in order to secede by constitutional means. In this context, we refer to a "clear" majority as a qualitative evaluation. The referendum result, if it is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will, must be free of ambiguity both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves.
> 88 The federalism principle, in conjunction with the democratic principle, dictates that the clear repudiation of the existing constitutional order and the clear expression of the desire to pursue secession by the population of a province would give rise to a reciprocal obligation on all parties to Confederation to negotiate constitutional changes to respond to that desire. The amendment of the Constitution begins with a political process undertaken pursuant to the Constitution itself. In Canada, the initiative for constitutional amendment is the responsibility of democratically elected representatives of the participants in Confederation. Those representatives may, of course, take their cue from a referendum, but in legal terms, constitution-making in Canada, as in many countries, is undertaken by the democratically elected representatives of the people. The corollary of a legitimate attempt by one participant in Confederation to seek an amendment to the Constitution is an obligation on all parties to come to the negotiating table. The clear repudiation by the people of Quebec of the existing constitutional order would confer legitimacy on demands for secession, and place an obligation on the other provinces and the federal government to acknowledge and respect that expression of democratic will by entering into negotiations and conducting them in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles already discussed.
> 89 What is the content of this obligation to negotiate? At this juncture, we confront the difficult inter-relationship between substantive obligations flowing from the Constitution and questions of judicial competence and restraint in supervising or enforcing those obligations. This is mirrored by the distinction between the legality and the legitimacy of actions taken under the Constitution. We propose to focus first on the substantive obligations flowing from this obligation to negotiate; once the nature of those obligations has been described, it is easier to assess the appropriate means of enforcement of those obligations, and to comment on the distinction between legality and legitimacy.

90 The conduct of the parties in such negotiations would be governed by the same constitutional principles which give rise to the duty to negotiate: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. Those principles lead us to reject two absolutist propositions. One of those propositions is that there would be a legal obligation on the other provinces and federal government to accede to the secession of a province, subject only to negotiation of the logistical details of secession. This proposition is attributed either to the supposed implications of the democratic principle of the Constitution, or to the international law principle of self-determination of peoples.

91 For both theoretical and practical reasons, we cannot accept this view. We hold that Quebec could not purport to invoke a right of self-determination such as to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties: that would not be a negotiation at all. As well, it would be naive to expect that the substantive goal of secession could readily be distinguished from the practical details of secession. The devil would be in the details. The democracy principle, as we have emphasized, cannot be invoked to trump the principles of federalism and rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. No negotiations could be effective if their ultimate outcome, secession, is cast as an absolute legal entitlement based upon an obligation to give effect to that act of secession in the Constitution. Such a foregone conclusion would actually undermine the obligation to negotiate and render it hollow.

92 However, we are equally unable to accept the reverse proposition, that a clear expression of self-determination by the people of Quebec would impose no obligations upon the other provinces or the federal government. The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain indifferent to the clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. This would amount to the assertion that other constitutionally recognized principles necessarily trump the clearly expressed democratic will of the people of Quebec. Such a proposition fails to give sufficient weight to the underlying constitutional principles that must inform the amendment process, including the principles of democracy and federalism. The rights of other provinces and the federal government cannot deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. Negotiations would be necessary to address the interests of the federal government, of Quebec and the other provinces, and other participants, as well as the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec.

93 Is the rejection of both of these propositions reconcilable? Yes, once it is realized that none of the rights or principles under discussion is absolute to the exclusion of the others. This observation suggests that other parties cannot exercise their rights in such a way as to amount to an absolute denial of Quebec's rights, and similarly, that so long as Quebec exercises its rights while respecting the rights of others, it may propose secession and seek to achieve it through negotiation. The negotiation process precipitated by a decision of a clear majority of the population of Quebec on a clear question to pursue secession would require the reconciliation of various rights and obligations by the representatives of two legitimate majorities, namely, the clear majority of the population of Quebec, and the clear majority of Canada as a whole, whatever that may be. There can be no suggestion that either of these majorities "trumps" the other. A political majority that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles we have identified puts at risk the legitimacy of the exercise of its rights.

94 In such circumstances, the conduct of the parties assumes primary constitutional significance. The negotiation process must be conducted with an eye to the constitutional principles we have outlined, which must inform the actions of all the participants in the negotiation process.

95 Refusal of a party to conduct negotiations in a manner consistent with constitutional principles and values would seriously put at risk the legitimacy of that party's assertion of its rights, and perhaps the negotiation process as a whole. Those who quite legitimately insist upon the importance of upholding the rule of law cannot at the same time be oblivious to the need to act in conformity with constitutional principles and values, and so do their part to contribute to the maintenance and promotion of an environment in which the rule of law may flourish.

96 No one can predict the course that such negotiations might take. The possibility that they might not lead to an agreement amongst the parties must be recognized. Negotiations following a referendum vote in favour of seeking secession would inevitably address a wide range of issues, many of great import. After 131 years of Confederation, there exists, inevitably, a high level of integration in economic, political and social institutions across Canada. The vision of those who brought about Confederation was to create a unified country, not a loose alliance of autonomous provinces. Accordingly, while there are regional economic interests, which sometimes coincide with provincial boundaries, there are also national interests and enterprises (both public and private) that would face potential dismemberment. There is a national economy and a national debt. Arguments were raised before us regarding boundary issues. There are linguistic and cultural minorities, including aboriginal peoples, unevenly distributed across the country who look to the Constitution of Canada for the protection of their rights. Of course, secession would give rise to many issues of great complexity and difficulty. These would have to be resolved within the overall framework of the rule of law, thereby assuring Canadians resident in Quebec and elsewhere a measure of stability in what would likely be a period of considerable upheaval and uncertainty. Nobody seriously suggests that our national existence, seamless in so many aspects, could be effortlessly separated along what are now the provincial boundaries of Quebec. As the Attorney General of Saskatchewan put it in his oral submission:

A nation is built when the communities that comprise it make commitments to it, when they forego choices and opportunities on behalf of a nation, . . . when the communities that comprise it make compromises, when they offer each other guarantees, when they make transfers and perhaps most pointedly, when they receive from others the benefits of national solidarity. The threads of a thousand acts of accommodation are the fabric of a nation. . . .

97 In the circumstances, negotiations following such a referendum would undoubtedly be difficult. While the negotiators would have to contemplate the possibility of secession, there would be no absolute legal entitlement to it and no assumption that an agreement reconciling all relevant rights and obligations would actually be reached. It is foreseeable that even negotiations carried out in conformity with the underlying constitutional principles could reach an impasse. We need not speculate here as to what would then transpire. Under the Constitution, secession requires that an amendment be negotiated.

98 The respective roles of the courts and political actors in discharging the constitutional obligations we have identified follows ineluctably from the foregoing observations. In the Patriation Reference, a distinction was drawn between the law of the Constitution, which, generally speaking, will be enforced by the courts, and other constitutional rules, such as the conventions of the Constitution, which carry only political sanctions. It is also the case, however, that judicial intervention, even in relation to the law of the Constitution, is subject to the Court's appreciation of its proper role in the constitutional scheme.

99 The notion of justiciability is, as we earlier pointed out in dealing with the preliminary objection, linked to the notion of appropriate judicial restraint. We earlier made reference to the discussion of justiciability in Reference re Canada Assistance Plan, supra, at p. 545:

In exercising its discretion whether to determine a matter that is alleged to be non-justiciable, the Court's primary concern is to retain its proper role within the constitutional framework of our democratic form of government.

In Operation Dismantle, supra, at p. 459, it was pointed out that justiciability is a "doctrine . . . founded upon a concern with the appropriate role of the courts as the forum for the resolution of different types of disputes". An analogous doctrine of judicial restraint operates here. Also, as observed in Canada (Auditor General) v. Canada (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources), 1989 CanLII 73 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 49 (the Auditor General's case), at p. 91:

There is an array of issues which calls for the exercise of judicial judgment on whether the questions are properly cognizable by the courts. Ultimately, such judgment depends on the appreciation by the judiciary of its own position in the constitutional scheme.

100 The role of the Court in this Reference is limited to the identification of the relevant aspects of the Constitution in their broadest sense. We have interpreted the questions as relating to the constitutional framework within which political decisions may ultimately be made. Within that framework, the workings of the political process are complex and can only be resolved by means of political judgments and evaluations. The Court has no supervisory role over the political aspects of constitutional negotiations. Equally, the initial impetus for negotiation, namely a clear majority on a clear question in favour of secession, is subject only to political evaluation, and properly so. A right and a corresponding duty to negotiate secession cannot be built on an alleged expression of democratic will if the expression of democratic will is itself fraught with ambiguities. Only the political actors would have the information and expertise to make the appropriate judgment as to the point at which, and the circumstances in which, those ambiguities are resolved one way or the other.

101 If the circumstances giving rise to the duty to negotiate were to arise, the distinction between the strong defence of legitimate interests and the taking of positions which, in fact, ignore the legitimate interests of others is one that also defies legal analysis. The Court would not have access to all of the information available to the political actors, and the methods appropriate for the search for truth in a court of law are ill-suited to getting to the bottom of constitutional negotiations. To the extent that the questions are political in nature, it is not the role of the judiciary to interpose its own views on the different negotiating positions of the parties, even were it invited to do so. Rather, it is the obligation of the elected representatives to give concrete form to the discharge of their constitutional obligations which only they and their electors can ultimately assess. The reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests outlined above is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm, precisely because that reconciliation can only be achieved through the give and take of the negotiation process. Having established the legal framework, it would be for the democratically elected leadership of the various participants to resolve their differences.

102 The non-justiciability of political issues that lack a legal component does not deprive the surrounding constitutional framework of its binding status, nor does this mean that constitutional obligations could be breached without incurring serious legal repercussions. Where there are legal rights there are remedies, but as we explained in the Auditor General's case, supra, at p. 90, and New Brunswick Broadcasting, supra, the appropriate recourse in some circumstances lies through the workings of the political process rather than the courts.

103 To the extent that a breach of the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the principles described above undermines the legitimacy of a party's actions, it may have important ramifications at the international level. Thus, a failure of the duty to undertake negotiations and pursue them according to constitutional principles may undermine that government's claim to legitimacy which is generally a precondition for recognition by the international community. Conversely, violations of those principles by the federal or other provincial governments responding to the request for secession may undermine their legitimacy. Thus, a Quebec that had negotiated in conformity with constitutional principles and values in the face of unreasonable intransigence on the part of other participants at the federal or provincial level would be more likely to be recognized than a Quebec which did not itself act according to constitutional principles in the negotiation process. Both the legality of the acts of the parties to the negotiation process under Canadian law, and the perceived legitimacy of such action, would be important considerations in the recognition process. In this way, the adherence of the parties to the obligation to negotiate would be evaluated in an indirect manner on the international plane.

104 Accordingly, the secession of Quebec from Canada cannot be accomplished by the National Assembly, the legislature or government of Quebec unilaterally, that is to say, without principled negotiations, and be considered a lawful act. Any attempt to effect the secession of a province from Canada must be undertaken pursuant to the Constitution of Canada, or else violate the Canadian legal order. However, the continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order cannot remain unaffected by the unambiguous expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The primary means by which that expression is given effect is the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the constitutional principles that we have described herein. In the event secession negotiations are initiated, our Constitution, no less than our history, would call on the participants to work to reconcile the rights, obligations and legitimate aspirations of all Canadians within a framework that emphasizes constitutional responsibilities as much as it does constitutional rights.

105 It will be noted that Question 1 does not ask how secession could be achieved in a constitutional manner, but addresses one form of secession only, namely unilateral secession. Although the applicability of various procedures to achieve lawful secession was raised in argument, each option would require us to assume the existence of facts that at this stage are unknown. In accordance with the usual rule of prudence in constitutional cases, we refrain from pronouncing on the applicability of any particular constitutional procedure to effect secession unless and until sufficiently clear facts exist to squarely raise an issue for judicial determination.

IV. Summary of Conclusions

148 As stated at the outset, this Reference has required us to consider momentous questions that go to the heart of our system of constitutional government. We have emphasized that the Constitution is more than a written text. It embraces the entire global system of rules and principles which govern the exercise of constitutional authority. A superficial reading of selected provisions of the written constitutional enactment, without more, may be misleading. It is necessary to make a more profound investigation of the underlying principles that animate the whole of our Constitution, including the principles of federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. Those principles must inform our overall appreciation of the constitutional rights and obligations that would come into play in the event a clear majority of Quebecers votes on a clear question in favour of secession.

149 The Reference requires us to consider whether Quebec has a right to unilateral secession. Those who support the existence of such a right found their case primarily on the principle of democracy. Democracy, however, means more than simple majority rule. As reflected in our constitutional jurisprudence, democracy exists in the larger context of other constitutional values such as those already mentioned. In the 131 years since Confederation, the people of the provinces and territories have created close ties of interdependence (economically, socially, politically and culturally) based on shared values that include federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities. A democratic decision of Quebecers in favour of secession would put those relationships at risk. The Constitution vouchsafes order and stability, and accordingly secession of a province "under the Constitution" could not be achieved unilaterally, that is, without principled negotiation with other participants in Confederation within the existing constitutional framework.

150 The Constitution is not a straitjacket. Even a brief review of our constitutional history demonstrates periods of momentous and dramatic change. Our democratic institutions necessarily accommodate a continuous process of discussion and evolution, which is reflected in the constitutional right of each participant in the federation to initiate constitutional change. This right implies a reciprocal duty on the other participants to engage in discussions to address any legitimate initiative to change the constitutional order. While it is true that some attempts at constitutional amendment in recent years have faltered, a clear majority vote in Quebec on a clear question in favour of secession would confer democratic legitimacy on the secession initiative which all of the other participants in Confederation would have to recognize.

> 151 Quebec could not, despite a clear referendum result, purport to invoke a right of self-determination to dictate the terms of a proposed secession to the other parties to the federation. The democratic vote, by however strong a majority, would have no legal effect on its own and could not push aside the principles of federalism and the rule of law, the rights of individuals and minorities, or the operation of democracy in the other provinces or in Canada as a whole. Democratic rights under the Constitution cannot be divorced from constitutional obligations. Nor, however, can the reverse proposition be accepted. The continued existence and operation of the Canadian constitutional order could not be indifferent to a clear expression of a clear majority of Quebecers that they no longer wish to remain in Canada. The other provinces and the federal government would have no basis to deny the right of the government of Quebec to pursue secession, should a clear majority of the people of Quebec choose that goal, so long as in doing so, Quebec respects the rights of others. The negotiations that followed such a vote would address the potential act of secession as well as its possible terms should in fact secession proceed. There would be no conclusions predetermined by law on any issue. Negotiations would need to address the interests of the other provinces, the federal government, Quebec and indeed the rights of all Canadians both within and outside Quebec, and specifically the rights of minorities. No one suggests that it would be an easy set of negotiations.
> 152 The negotiation process would require the reconciliation of various rights and obligations by negotiation between two legitimate majorities, namely, the majority of the population of Quebec, and that of Canada as a whole. A political majority at either level that does not act in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles we have mentioned puts at risk the legitimacy of its exercise of its rights, and the ultimate acceptance of the result by the international community.
> 153 The task of the Court has been to clarify the legal framework within which political decisions are to be taken "under the Constitution", not to usurp the prerogatives of the political forces that operate within that framework. The obligations we have identified are binding obligations under the Constitution of Canada. However, it will be for the political actors to determine what constitutes "a clear majority on a clear question" in the circumstances under which a future referendum vote may be taken. Equally, in the event of demonstrated majority support for Quebec secession, the content and process of the negotiations will be for the political actors to settle. The reconciliation of the various legitimate constitutional interests is necessarily committed to the political rather than the judicial realm precisely because that reconciliation can only be achieved through the give and take of political negotiations. To the extent issues addressed in the course of negotiation are political, the courts, appreciating their proper role in the constitutional scheme, would have no supervisory role.
> 154 We have also considered whether a positive legal entitlement to secession exists under international law in the factual circumstances contemplated by Question 1, i.e., a clear democratic expression of support on a clear question for Quebec secession. Some of those who supported an affirmative answer to this question did so on the basis of the recognized right to self-determination that belongs to all "peoples". Although much of the Quebec population certainly shares many of the characteristics of a people, it is not necessary to decide the "people" issue because, whatever may be the correct determination of this issue in the context of Quebec, a right to secession only arises under the principle of self-determination of peoples at international law where "a people" is governed as part of a colonial empire; where "a people" is subject to alien subjugation, domination or exploitation; and possibly where "a people" is denied any meaningful exercise of its right to self-determination within the state of which it forms a part. In other circumstances, peoples are expected to achieve self-determination within the framework of their existing state. A state whose government represents the whole of the people or peoples resident within its territory, on a basis of equality and without discrimination, and respects the principles of self-determination in its internal arrangements, is entitled to maintain its territorial integrity under international law and to have that territorial integrity recognized by other states. Quebec does not meet the threshold of a colonial people or an oppressed people, nor can it be suggested that Quebecers have been denied meaningful access to government to pursue their political, economic, cultural and social development. In the circumstances, the National Assembly, the legislature or the government of Quebec do not enjoy a right at international law to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.
> 155 Although there is no right, under the Constitution or at international law, to unilateral secession, that is secession without negotiation on the basis just discussed, this does not rule out the possibility of an unconstitutional declaration of secession leading to a de facto secession. The ultimate success of such a secession would be dependent on recognition by the international community, which is likely to consider the legality and legitimacy of secession having regard to, amongst other facts, the conduct of Quebec and Canada, in determining whether to grant or withhold recognition. Such recognition, even if granted, would not, however, provide any retroactive justification for the act of secession, either under the Constitution of Canada or at international law.

In response to the Secession Reference, the Canadian government introduced the Clarity Act in 2000, which established guidelines for future referendums on sovereignty. This legislation required that any question posed in a referendum must be clear and that a "clear majority" would be necessary for the federal government to engage in negotiations regarding secession. Concurrently, Quebec's National Assembly passed Bill 99 in 2000, reaffirming the province's right to self-determination and asserting that any future referendum on sovereignty would be valid regardless of the federal government's interpretation of clarity.

> An Act to Give Effect to the Requirement for Clarity as Set out in the Opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Quebec Secession Reference*, SC 2000, c 26 ("Clarity Act")
> Preamble
> WHEREAS the Supreme Court of Canada has confirmed that there is no right, under international law or under the Constitution of Canada, for the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally;
> WHEREAS any proposal relating to the break-up of a democratic state is a matter of the utmost gravity and is of fundamental importance to all of its citizens;
> WHEREAS the government of any province of Canada is entitled to consult its population by referendum on any issue and is entitled to formulate the wording of its referendum question;
> WHEREAS the Supreme Court of Canada has determined that the result of a referendum on the secession of a province from Canada must be free of ambiguity both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves if that result is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will that would give rise to an obligation to enter into negotiations that might lead to secession;
> WHEREAS the Supreme Court of Canada has stated that democracy means more than simple majority rule, that a clear majority in favour of secession would be required to create an obligation to negotiate secession, and that a qualitative evaluation is required to determine whether a clear majority in favour of secession exists in the circumstances;
> WHEREAS the Supreme Court of Canada has confirmed that, in Canada, the secession of a province, to be lawful, would require an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, that such an amendment would perforce require negotiations in relation to secession involving at least the governments of all of the provinces and the Government of Canada, and that those negotiations would be governed by the principles of federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities;
> WHEREAS, in light of the finding by the Supreme Court of Canada that it would be for elected representatives to determine what constitutes a clear question and what constitutes a clear majority in a referendum held in a province on secession, the House of Commons, as the only political institution elected to represent all Canadians, has an important role in identifying what constitutes a clear question and a clear majority sufficient for the Government of Canada to enter into negotiations in relation to the secession of a province from Canada;

AND WHEREAS it is incumbent on the Government of Canada not to enter into negotiations that might lead to the secession of a province from Canada, and that could consequently entail the termination of citizenship and other rights that Canadian citizens resident in the province enjoy as full participants in Canada, unless the population of that province has clearly expressed its democratic will that the province secede from Canada;

NOW, THEREFORE, Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

House of Commons to consider question

1 (1) The House of Commons shall, within thirty days after the government of a province tables in its legislative assembly or otherwise officially releases the question that it intends to submit to its voters in a referendum relating to the proposed secession of the province from Canada, consider the question and, by resolution, set out its determination on whether the question is clear.

Extension of time

(2) Where the thirty days referred to in subsection (1) occur, in whole or in part, during a general election of members to serve in the House of Commons, the thirty days shall be extended by an additional forty days.

Considerations

(3) In considering the clarity of a referendum question, the House of Commons shall consider whether the question would result in a clear expression of the will of the population of a province on whether the province should cease to be part of Canada and become an independent state.

Where no clear expression of will

(4) For the purpose of subsection (3), a clear expression of the will of the population of a province that the province cease to be part of Canada could not result from

(a) a referendum question that merely focuses on a mandate to negotiate without soliciting a direct expression of the will of the population of that province on whether the province should cease to be part of Canada; or

(b) a referendum question that envisages other possibilities in addition to the secession of the province from Canada, such as economic or political arrangements with Canada, that obscure a direct expression of the will of the population of that province on whether the province should cease to be part of Canada.

Other views to be considered

(5) In considering the clarity of a referendum question, the House of Commons shall take into account the views of all political parties represented in the legislative assembly of the province whose government is proposing the referendum on secession, any formal statements or resolutions by the government or legislative assembly of any province or territory of Canada, any formal statements or resolutions by the Senate, any formal statements or resolutions by the representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, especially those in the province whose government is proposing the referendum on secession, and any other views it considers to be relevant.

No negotiations if question not clear

(6) The Government of Canada shall not enter into negotiations on the terms on which a province might cease to be part of Canada if the House of Commons determines, pursuant to this section, that a referendum question is not clear and, for that reason, would not result in a clear expression of the will of the population of that province on whether the province should cease to be part of Canada.

House of Commons to consider whether there is a clear will to secede

2 (1) Where the government of a province, following a referendum relating to the secession of the province from Canada, seeks to enter into negotiations on the terms on which that province might cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall, except where it has determined pursuant to section 1 that a referendum question is not clear, consider and, by resolution, set out its determination on whether, in the circumstances, there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of that province that the province cease to be part of Canada.

Factors for House of Commons to take into account

(2) In considering whether there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of a province that the province cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall take into account

(a) the size of the majority of valid votes cast in favour of the secessionist option;

(b) the percentage of eligible voters voting in the referendum; and

(c) any other matters or circumstances it considers to be relevant.

Other views to be considered

(3) In considering whether there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of a province that the province cease to be part of Canada, the House of Commons shall take into account the views of all political parties represented in the legislative assembly of the province whose government proposed the referendum on secession, any formal statements or resolutions by the government or legislative assembly of any province or territory of Canada, any formal statements or resolutions by the Senate, any formal statements or resolutions by the representatives of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, especially those in the province whose government proposed the referendum on secession, and any other views it considers to be relevant.

No negotiations unless will clear

(4) The Government of Canada shall not enter into negotiations on the terms on which a province might cease to be part of Canada unless the House of Commons determines, pursuant to this section, that there has been a clear expression of a will by a clear majority of the population of that province that the province cease to be part of Canada.

Constitutional amendments

3 (1) It is recognized that there is no right under the Constitution of Canada to effect the secession of a province from Canada unilaterally and that, therefore, an amendment to the Constitution of Canada would be required for any province to secede from Canada, which in turn would require negotiations involving at least the governments of all of the provinces and the Government of Canada.

Limitation

(2) No Minister of the Crown shall propose a constitutional amendment to effect the secession of a province from Canada unless the Government of Canada has addressed, in its negotiations, the terms of secession that are relevant in the circumstances, including the division of assets and liabilities, any changes to the borders of the province, the rights, interests and territorial claims of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, and the protection of minority rights.

An Act respecting the exercise of the fundamental rights and prerogatives of the Québec people and the Québec State*, SQ 2000, c 46

WHEREAS the Québec people, in the majority French-speaking, possesses specific characteristics and a deep-rooted historical continuity in a territory over which it exercises its rights through a modern national state, having a government, a national assembly and impartial and independent courts of justice ;

WHEREAS the constitutional foundation of the Québec State has been enriched over the years by the passage of fundamental laws and the creation of democratic institutions specific to Québec ;

WHEREAS Québec entered the Canadian federation in 1867 ;

WHEREAS Québec is firmly committed to respecting human rights and freedoms ;

WHEREAS the Abenaki, Algonquin, Attikamek, Cree, Huron, Innu, Malecite, Micmac, Mohawk, Naskapi and Inuit Nations exist within Québec, and whereas the principles associated with that recognition were set out in the resolution adopted by the National Assembly on 20 March 1985, in particular their right to autonomy within Québec ;

WHEREAS there exists a Québec English-speaking community that enjoys long-established rights;

WHEREAS Québec recognizes the contribution made by Quebecers of all origins to its development ;

WHEREAS the National Assembly is composed of Members elected by universal suffrage by the Québec people and derives its legitimacy from the Québec people in that it is the only legislative body exclusively representing the Québec people ;

WHEREAS it is incumbent upon the National Assembly, as the guardian of the historical and inalienable rights and powers of the Québec people, to defend the Québec people against any attempt to despoil it of those rights or powers or to undermine them ;

WHEREAS the National Assembly has never adhered to the Constitution Act, 1982, which was enacted despite its opposition ;

WHEREAS Québec is facing a policy of the federal government designed to call into question the legitimacy, integrity and efficient operation of its national democratic institutions, notably by the passage and proclamation of the Act to give effect to the requirement for clarity as set out in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Quebec Secession Reference (Statutes of Canada, 2000, chapter 26) ;

WHEREAS it is necessary to reaffirm the fundamental principle that the Québec people is free to take charge of its own destiny, determine its political status and pursue its economic, social and cultural development ;

WHEREAS this principle has applied on several occasions in the past, notably in the referendums held in 1980, 1992 and 1995 ;

WHEREAS the Supreme Court of Canada rendered an advisory opinion on 20 August 1998, and considering the recognition by the Government of Québec of its political importance ;

WHEREAS it is necessary to reaffirm the collective attainments of the Québec people, the responsibilities of the Québec State and the rights and prerogatives of the National Assembly with respect to all matters affecting the future of the Québec people ;

CHAPTER I

THE QUÉBEC PEOPLE

1. The right of the Québec people to self-determination is founded in fact and in law. The Québec people is the holder of rights that are universally recognized under the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples.

2. The Québec people has the inalienable right to freely decide the political regime and legal status of Québec.

3. The Québec people, acting through its own political institutions, shall determine alone the mode of exercise of its right to choose the political regime and legal status of Québec.

No condition or mode of exercise of that right, in particular the consultation of the Québec people by way of a referendum, shall have effect unless determined in accordance with the first paragraph.

4. When the Québec people is consulted by way of a referendum under the Referendum Act (chapter C-64.1), the winning option is the option that obtains a majority of the valid votes cast, namely 50% of the valid votes cast plus one.

CHAPTER II

THE QUÉBEC NATIONAL STATE

5. The Québec State derives its legitimacy from the will of the people inhabiting its territory.

The will of the people is expressed through the election of Members to the National Assembly by universal suffrage, by secret ballot under the one person, one vote system pursuant to the Election Act (chapter E-3.3), and through referendums held pursuant to the Referendum Act (chapter C-64.1).

Qualification as an elector is governed by the provisions of the Election Act.

6. The Québec State is sovereign in the areas assigned to its jurisdiction within the scope of constitutional laws and conventions.

The Québec State also holds, on behalf of the Québec people, any right established to its advantage pursuant to a constitutional convention or obligation.

It is the duty of the Government to uphold the exercise and defend the integrity of those prerogatives, at all times and in all places, including on the international scene.

7. The Québec State is free to consent to be bound by any treaty, convention or international agreement in matters under its constitutional jurisdiction.

No treaty, convention or agreement in the areas under its jurisdiction may be binding on the Québec State unless the consent of the Québec State to be bound has been formally expressed by the National Assembly or the Government, subject to the applicable legislative provisions.

> The Québec State may, in the areas under its jurisdiction, establish and maintain relations with foreign States and international organizations and ensure its representation outside Québec.
> 8. The French language is the official language of Québec.
> The duties and obligations relating to or arising from the status of the French language are established by the Charter of the French language (chapter C-11).
> The Québec State must promote the quality and influence of the French language. It shall pursue those objectives in a spirit of fairness and open-mindedness, respectful of the long-established rights of Québec's English-speaking community.
> CHAPTER III
> THE TERRITORY OF QUÉBEC
> 9. The territory of Québec and its boundaries cannot be altered except with the consent of the National Assembly.
> The Government must ensure that the territorial integrity of Québec is maintained and respected.
> 10. The Québec State exercises, throughout the territory of Québec and on behalf of the Québec people, all the powers relating to its jurisdiction and to the Québec public domain.
> The State may develop and administer the territory of Québec and, more specifically, delegate authority to administer the territory to local or regional mandated entities, as provided by law. The State shall encourage local and regional communities to take responsibility for their development.
> CHAPTER IV
> THE ABORIGINAL NATIONS OF QUÉBEC
> 11. In exercising its constitutional jurisdiction, the Québec State recognizes the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal nations of Québec.
> 2000, c. 46, s. 11.
> 12. The Government undertakes to promote the establishment and maintenance of harmonious relations with the aboriginal nations, and to foster their development and an improvement in their economic, social and cultural conditions.
> CHAPTER V
> FINAL PROVISIONS
> 13. No other parliament or government may reduce the powers, authority, sovereignty or legitimacy of the National Assembly, or impose constraint on the democratic will of the Québec people to determine its own future.

8.2.3 Secession today: Quebec, Alberta, and beyond

Since the 1995 referendum, the Parti Québécois (PQ), historically the main advocate for sovereignty, has seen fluctuations in popularity, while parties like the Coalition Avenir Québec (CAQ) have emerged, adopting a more autonomist nationalism rather than an explicit quest for independence. Simultaneously, new secessionist movements have arisen in the western provinces, where parties like the Maverick Party advocate for autonomy or secession in response to a growing sentiment of alienation from the federal government. These movements reflect a broader dynamic of discontent that extends beyond Quebec, illustrating regional tensions within Canada regarding perceptions of economic and political injustice. We will address further Western politics in Section 8.5.

8.3 Quebec's traditional demands

Quebec's traditional demands for autonomy and recognition within Canada have evolved significantly over the decades, shaped by a series of constitutional negotiations and political developments.

The period before patriation saw Quebec grappling with its identity and rights within the Canadian federation, leading to critical discussions about its status [8.3.1]. The Meech Lake Accord [8.3.2] and the Charlottetown Accord [8.3.3] aimed to address these concerns by recognizing Quebec as a distinct society, but ultimately failed to gain the necessary support. In response to these challenges, the federal government has attempted to navigate regional interests through initiatives like the Regional Veto Act and resolutions by the House of Commons [8.3.4]. More recently, the 2017 document "Québécois, notre façon d'être Canadiens" reflects ongoing efforts to redefine Quebec's place within Canada [8.3.5].

8.3.1 Before patriation

Since the establishment of the Canadian Confederation in 1867, Quebec has consistently articulated specific demands aimed at securing recognition and autonomy within the Canadian federation. These demands have evolved over time but have remained centred around the principles of cultural identity, linguistic rights, and provincial autonomy. Initially, Quebec representatives sought assurances that their unique French-speaking culture and civil law system would be preserved within the new federal framework. Over the decades, Quebec's demands included calls for greater control over its own affairs, particularly in areas such as education, health care, and social services.

As negotiations progressed toward patriation in the 1970s, Quebec's government articulated specific demands that included a veto over significant constitutional amendments and full compensation for opting out of federal programs. These demands reflected a broader aspiration for self-determination and respect for Quebec's unique position within Canada.

During the constitutional negotiations of the 1970s, the Government of Quebec made several key demands in exchange for its support for the patriation plan. These included a redefinition of the division of powers to ensure legislative paramountcy for Quebec in areas related to social policy. This would allow Quebec to exercise greater control over social programs and policies that directly affect its population. Additionally, Quebec sought full compensation from the federal government should it choose to opt out of federal programs.

Another significant demand from Quebec was for recognition as a distinct society within the new constitutional framework. This demand underscored Quebec's desire for acknowledgment of its unique cultural and historical identity within Canada. Furthermore, Quebec requested a veto over substantial constitutional amendments, particularly those involving changes such as the creation of new provinces or significant alterations to provincial powers.

On Quebec's traditional demands before patriation, see : Secrétariat du Québec aux relations canadiennes, "Historical Background", at para 19, online: Gouvernement of Québec https://www.sqrc.gouv.qc.ca/relations-canadiennes/positions-historiques/politique-affirmation/rappels-historiques-en.asp

After the federal government presented the Resolution to amend the Constitution to the House of Commons without Quebec's consent, the National Assembly of Quebec passed a motion on November 25, 1981, officially expressing the province's opposition to the resolution. See: "Résolution concernant le rapatriement unilatéral de la Constitution canadienne", online https://www.sqrc.gouv.qc.ca/relations-canadiennes/positions-historiques/motions/1980-11-21.pdf

The same day, Quebec initiated legal action to assert its right to a veto over constitutional amendments by initiating a reference before the Quebec Court of Appeal, asking the following question:

> Government of Quebec, Decree No 3215-81, dated November 25, 1981.
> "Is the consent of the Province of Quebec constitutionally required, by convention, for the adoption by the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada of a resolution the purpose of which is to cause the Canadian Constitution to be amended in such a manner as to affect:
> (i) the legislative competence of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec in virtue of the Canadian Constitution;
> (ii) the status or role of the Legislature or Government of the Province of Quebec within the Canadian federation; > and, does the objection of the Province of Quebec render the adoption of such resolution unconstitutional in the conventional sense?"

The Court of Appeal answered this question in the negative, and the Attorney General of Quebec appealed this decision. In Re: Objection by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, the Supreme Court of Canada concluded that while there was a conventional requirement for a substantial degree of provincial consent for constitutional amendments, there was no specific veto granted to Quebec under constitutional conventions. See the excerpt reproduced above in Section 2.2.

8.3.2 The Meech lake accord

Following the patriation, feelings of alienation and dissatisfaction grew among Quebecers. In this environment, the election of a Liberal government in Quebec in 1985 under Premier Robert Bourassa reignited efforts to secure constitutional recognition and reform that would better accommodate Quebec's aspirations.

The Meech Lake Accord was proposed in 1987 as a response to these ongoing grievances, aiming to bring Quebec back into the constitutional fold by addressing its specific demands. The agreement included five key conditions articulated by the Quebec government, which were seen as essential for gaining Quebec's consent to the Constitution. These conditions included recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada, enhancing Quebec's powers in immigration matters, limiting federal spending power, ensuring Quebec's participation in judicial appointments, and granting Quebec a veto over substantial constitutional amendments. As we have seen in Section 5.1, despite initial support for the Accord, it ultimately failed to achieve ratification by all provinces, leading to its collapse in 1990.

8.3.3 The Charlottetown accord

The Charlottetown Accord, proposed in 1992 aimed at addressing the longstanding demands of Quebec within the broader context of Canadian federalism. This agreement sought to reconcile the aspirations of Quebec with those of other provinces and Indigenous groups.

One of the central demands articulated by Quebec in the Accord was the recognition of its status as a distinct society within Canada. This recognition was intended to affirm Quebec's unique cultural and linguistic identity, particularly its French-speaking population, and to ensure that this identity was acknowledged in the constitutional framework. The Accord aimed to provide a formal acknowledgment that Quebec's distinctiveness warranted special consideration in federal policies and decision-making.

In addition to this recognition, the Accord proposed decentralizing powers from the federal government to the provinces. This decentralization was crucial for Quebec, as it sought greater control over areas such as health care, education, and cultural policies. By transferring powers related to forests, mines, and cultural affairs to provincial jurisdiction, the Accord aimed to empower Quebec to tailor its policies according to its specific needs and values.

Another significant aspect of Quebec's demands within the Accord was related to compensation for provinces opting out of federal programs. The agreement included provisions that would allow provinces to create their own programs while receiving financial compensation from the federal government, provided these programs aligned with national objectives. This aspect was particularly important for Quebec, as it sought to maintain its autonomy while ensuring adequate funding for its initiatives.

The Accord also addressed the need for reform of federal institutions, including changes to the Senate. It proposed transforming the Senate into an elected body that would provide equal representation for all provinces. This reform was seen as a way to enhance provincial influence within federal decision-making processes and ensure that Quebec's interests were adequately represented at the national level.

8.3.4 The federal response: resolutions and the Regional Veto Act

Following the failed Meech Lake Accord and Charlottetown Accord, and the Secession Reference, efforts were made to address Quebec's constitutional claims in a more informal manner, avoiding the complexities of formal multilateral negotiation cycles. These initiatives included the introduction of the Regional Veto Act [8.3.4.1] and the adoption of two resolutions by the House of Commons that recognized the distinct character of Quebec society [8.3.4.2].

8.3.4.1 Regional Veto Act

Enacted in 1996, the primary objective of the Regional Veto Act was to establish a framework requiring specific provincial consent before any constitutional amendments could be proposed to the federal Parliament. Under this law, any proposed changes to provisions that can be amended through the 7/50 formula, and for which there is no right of dissent, must receive prior approval from Quebec, Ontario, and British Columbia, as well as from at least two provinces each from the Atlantic region and the Prairie provinces. Since Alberta alone makes up more than 50% of the population of the Prairies, in practice, it also holds a veto power.

As such, the Regional Veto Act grants Quebec the veto power it has long sought over constitutional amendments, but it also extends similar veto rights to other regions, requiring broader provincial consent for any significant changes.

> An Act respecting Constitutional Amendments*, SC 1996, c 1
> Consent to constitutional amendments
> 1 (1) No Minister of the Crown shall propose a motion for a resolution to authorize an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, other than an amendment in respect of which the legislative assembly of a province may exercise a veto under section 41 or 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 or may express its dissent under subsection 38(3) of that Act, unless the amendment has first been consented to by a majority of the provinces that includes
> (a) Ontario;
> (b) Quebec;

(c) British Columbia;

(d) two or more of the Atlantic provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least fifty per cent of the population of all the Atlantic provinces; and

(e) two or more of the Prairie provinces that have, according to the then latest general census, combined populations of at least fifty per cent of the population of all the Prairie provinces.

Definitions

(2) In this section,

Atlantic provinces means the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Labrador; (provinces de l'Atlantique)

Prairie provinces means the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. (provinces des Prairies)

Note that the Act stipulates that a "Minister of the Crown" must obtain the necessary consents before introducing a resolution to amend the Constitution. While the government could technically bypass this requirement by having a regular Member of Parliament or Senator present the resolution, it is debatable whether such a tactic would respect the spirit of the law. See: Peter W. Hogg, Constitutional Law in Canada, vol. 1, 5th ed., (Toronto: Thomson Reuters Canada, 2016), loose-leaf, updated 2018, at p. 4-26; Patrick Taillon, "Les nouveaux obstacles juridiques au renouvellement du fédéralisme canadien", Montréal, Institut de recherche sur le Québec, 2007, p. 19.

This law also added layers of complexity to an already intricate amendment process and could potentially hinder necessary reforms. Indeed, the Regional Veto Act technically transforms the traditional 7/50 formula into a 7/90 formula by adding an additional layer of requirements that must be met before any constitutional changes can be made.

The transformation to a 7/90 formula arises because, in practice, this new requirement means that amendments must not only secure the approval of seven provinces but also ensure that these provinces collectively represent a significant majority of the Canadian population—essentially requiring consent from provinces that together account for approximately 90% of the population. Consequently, this additional step complicates and raises the threshold for constitutional amendments, making it significantly more challenging to achieve consensus across diverse regional interests. See: Andrew Heard & Tim Swartz, "The Regional Veto Formula and Its Effects on Canada's Constitutional Amendment Process" (1997) 30 Can J Polit Sci 339; Benoît Pelletier, « La modification et la réforme de la Constitution canadienne » (2017) 47-2 Revue générale de droit 459.

Moreover, some observers consider that the Regional Veto Act indirectly modifies Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, by adding an additional step to the amendment process, which would require the unanimous consent of the provinces under section 41(e) of the Constitution Act, 1982. See: Benoît Pelletier, La modification constitutionnelle au Canada, (Scarborough : Carswell, 1996) at p 327.

8.3.4.2 Resolutions

In parallel with the Regional Veto Act, the federal government sought to respond to Quebec's longstanding demands for recognition of its distinct societal character through resolutions in the House of Commons.

On November 27, 1995, in response to the close result of the 1995 Quebec referendum on sovereignty, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien introduced a first motion recognizing Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. See CANADA, Debates (Hansard), November , 1995 at p 16971. The resolution stated:

Whereas the People of Quebec have expressed the desire for recognition of Quebec's distinct society;

(1) the House recognize that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada;

(2) the House recognize that Quebec's distinct society includes its French-speaking majority, unique culture and civil law tradition;

(3) the House undertake to be guided by this reality;

(4) the House encourage all components of the legislative and executive branches of government to take note of this recognition and be guided in their conduct accordingly.

In a further acknowledgment of Quebec's status, on November 27, 2006, the House of Commons passed another resolution recognizing the Québécois as a nation within Canada. This motion, introduced by Prime Minister Stephen Harper, stated: "That this House recognize that the Québécois form a nation within a united Canada". See Hansard; 39th Parliament, 1st Session; No. 087; November 27, 2006.

Following these two federal initiatives aimed at politically recognizing the distinct character of Quebec society, Quebec took a step forward in 2022 by unilaterally amending the Constitution Act of 1867 to include a provision stating that "Quebecers form a nation" (90Q.1.) (see section 7.1)

8.3.5 2017 Québécois, notre façon d'être Canadiens

The document "Québécois, notre façon d'être canadien" was adopted in 2017 as a policy framework aimed at affirming Quebec's identity and its relationship with the rest of Canada. It outlines a vision for Quebec that emphasizes its distinct cultural and linguistic heritage while promoting a collaborative partnership within the Canadian federation. The document advocates for increased autonomy for Quebec, recognizing its unique status and the desire of Quebecers to maintain their identity while remaining part of Canada.

In response to this document, the federal government and other provinces exhibited mixed reactions. The federal government, led by Prime Minister Justin Trudeau, promptly dismissed any possibility of reopening the Canadian Constitution to address Quebec's demands.

8.4 Indigenous rights and recognition

The role of federal and provincial legislative assemblies in the amendment process is central in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, while the involvement of Indigenous communities in this process is notably absent. Instead, their role is primarily addressed in Part II of the Act, specifically in Section 35.1 which establishes a commitment to Indigenous participation by requiring a constitutional conference with federal and provincial leaders before amending provisions affecting Indigenous rights [8.4.1]. However, this participation remains limited, as it does not grant a veto over constitutional changes. The 1992 Charlottetown Accord proposed strengthening Indigenous self-governance by recognizing their inherent self-government rights and requiring Indigenous peoples' consent for amendments affecting them [8.4.2]. While the scope of s. 35.1 remains limited, one might ask whether the constitutional duty to consult, grounded in the Crown's honour, could extend to constitutional amendments and strengthen Indigenous participation in constitutional change [8.4.3].

8.4.1 Section 35.1: a "Commitment of Participation"

Section 35.1 establishes that the federal and provincial governments are bound by a "commitment of participation" requiring the Prime Minister of Canada to convene a constitutional conference with provincial premiers before making any amendments to Section 91(24) of the Constitution Act of 1867, Section 25 of the Constitution Act of 1982, or Part II of the Constitution Act of 1982. This conference must also include representatives from Indigenous peoples in Canada, allowing them to participate in discussions regarding the proposed amendments. S. 35.1 reads as follows:

> 35.1 The government of Canada and the provincial governments are committed to the principle that, before any amendment is made to Class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, to section 25 of this Act or to this Part,
> (a) a constitutional conference that includes in its agenda an item relating to the proposed amendment, composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces, will be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada; and
> (b) the Prime Minister of Canada will invite representatives of the aboriginal peoples of Canada to participate in the discussions on that item.

This provision was introduced during the first conference focused on Indigenous issues following the adoption of the Constitution Act of 1982 and was designed to address the demands of Indigenous peoples for a mechanism that would require their consent for any future constitutional changes that affect their rights. See: Constitution Amendment Proclamation, 1983, SI/84-102; Renée DUPUIS, Le statut juridique des peuples autochtones en droit canadien, (Scarborough :Carswell, 1999), p. 126.

The scope of the obligation for Indigenous peoples to participate in the amendment process remains relatively limited. Section 35.1 only establishes a procedural requirement to invite them to participate in a conference, without granting them a veto over proposed amendments. Furthermore, this requirement is framed as a "principle" rather than as a clear obligation imposed on the federal Prime Minister.

Note that s. 35.1 was added to Part II of the Constitution Act, 1982 rather than Part V (see the resolution discussed in Section 4.1). This can be explained by the fact that Part V could only be amended with unanimous consent from all provinces and federal chambers. However, unanimity could not be reached during the March 1983 First Ministers' Conference, given that Quebec's position at that time was that participating in the formal amendment of the Constitution Act, 1982 would imply recognition of a Constitution that had been enacted without Quebec's consent. See: Scholtz, Christa, "Part II and Part V: Aboriginal Peoples and Constitutional Amendment", in Emmett Macfarlane (ed), Constitutional Amendment in Canada, (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016), at p. 85-102. By placing Section 35.1 in Part II, Indigenous peoples acquired the right to participate in the amendment process without needing unanimous consent, utilizing the more accessible 7/50 procedure instead. It is also the only example of a successful use of s. 38.

For more background on s. 35.1, see Paul L. A. H. Chartrand, "Indigenous Peoples: Negotiating Constitutional Reconciliation and Legitimacy in Canada", (2011) 19 Waikato Law Review 14; Patrick Macklem & Douglas Sanderson, From Recognition to Reconciliation: Essays on the Constitutional Entrenchment of Aboriginal and Treaty Rights (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2016).

8.4.2 Towards an increased role in the amendment procedure and recognition of a right to self-government

The role of Indigenous peoples in the amendment process was again addressed during the constitutional discussions of 1992 leading to the Charlottetown Accord. The Accord proposed replacing Section 35.1 with provisions recognizing the "inherent right to self-government" for Indigenous peoples within Canada and acknowledging them as one of the three orders of government in the country. Also, under this proposal, a new s. 45.1 would have been added to Part V of the Constitution that would have allowed any changes to the Constitution directly related to Aboriginal peoples to be initiated by them and would require their "substantial consent.":

> 9. Section 35.1 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefore:
> "35.1 (1) The Aboriginal peoples of Canada have the inherent right of self-government within Canada.
> (2) The right referred to in subsection (1) shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition of the governments of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada as constituting one of three orders of government in Canada.
> (3) The exercise of the right referred to in subsection (1) includes the authority of duly constituted legislative bodies of the Aboriginal peoples, each within its own jurisdiction,
> (a) to safeguard and develop their languages, cultures, economies, identities, institutions and traditions, and
> (b) to develop, maintain and strengthen their relationship with their lands, waters and environment, so as to determine and control their development as peoples according to their own values and priorities and to ensure the integrity of their societies.
> (4) Where an issue arises in any proceedings in relation to the scope of the inherent right of self-government, or in relation to an assertion of that right, a court or tribunal
> (a) before making any final determination of the issue, shall inquire into the efforts that have been made to resolve the issue through negotiations under section 35.2 and may order the parties to take such steps as may be appropriate in the circumstances to effect a negotiated resolution; and
> (b) in making any final determination of the issue, shall take into account subsection (3).
> (5) Neither the right referred to in subsection (1) nor anything in subsection 35.2 (1) creates new aboriginal rights to land or abrogates or derogates from existing aboriginal or treaty rights to land, except as otherwise provided in self-government agreements negotiated under section 35.2.
> 33. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 45 thereof, the following section:
> "45.1 (1) An amendment to the Constitution of Canada that directly refers to, or that amends a provision that directly refers to, one or more of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada or their governments, including
> (A mechanism for obtaining aboriginal consent would be worked out prior to the tabling of a Constitution resolution in Parliament), including
> (a) section 2, as it relates to the aboriginal peoples of Canada class 24 of section 91, and sections 91A, 95E and 127 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and
> (A reference to any provision relating to aboriginal representation in the Senate would be added here),
> (b) section 25 and Part II of this Act and this section, may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where the amendment has been authorized in accordance with this Part and has received the substantial consent of the Aboriginal peoples so referred to.
> (2) Notwithstanding section 46, the procedures for amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to any matter referred to in subsection (1) may be initiated by any of the aboriginal peoples of Canada directly referred to as provided in subsection (1)."]

While this proposal never came into force, the right to self-government and self-determination of the Indigenous people has been affirmed in the preamble of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.C. 2021, c. 14 (UNDRIP Act), which provided that "the Government of Canada recognizes that all relations with Indigenous peoples must be based on the recognition and implementation of the inherent right to self-determination, including the right of self-government." According to the UNDRIP Act, Indigenous peoples have the right to "autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs." Indigenous communities can therefore implement changes to their governance structures and processes, reflecting their unique cultural, social, and political needs. See: Colleen Sheppard, "Patriation Paradigms: Sovereignty, Power, and Rights", (2023) Constitutional Forum 25, p. 30-32.

8.4.3 A constitutional duty to consult?

The failure of the Charlottetown Accord left Indigenous peoples with only the narrow role provided by Section 35.1 in the amendment process. In this context, it is interesting to examine whether the principle of the Crown's honour could grant Indigenous communities a more substantial role in the constitutional review process.

The Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that the principle of the Crown's honour gives rise to a duty to consult in good faith with Indigenous communities (and, where appropriate, to seek accommodation) before taking any actions that may adversely affect rights protected under Section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, whether those rights are claimed or established. This duty plays a central role in ensuring the protection of their ancestral and treaty rights. Such an obligation to consult and accommodate Indigenous peoples applies to all "conduct of the Crown," encompassing all actions undertaken by the executive branch. It includes both the exercise of federal government powers and those of provincial governments. See: Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73; R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075; Mikisew Cree First Nation v. Canada (Governor General in Council), 2018 SCC 40.

Historically applied in the context of executive authority, this obligation could also extend to constitutional powers. It is important to recall that in the Reference re Secession of Quebec, the Supreme Court recognized that several principles come into play in exercising constitutional powers, which may justify imposing certain obligations, including the duty to negotiate with other federal partners. The Court emphasized that one of the principles justifying such an obligation is the protection of minorities. This principle encompasses the safeguarding of Indigenous rights, underscored by the explicit guarantees added to Sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Moreover, this obligation to negotiate with Indigenous peoples could be further strengthened by Canada's adoption of the UNDRIP Act, which emphasizes the necessity for free, prior, and informed consent in matters affecting their rights. This alignment with international standards could reinforce and expand upon existing legal obligations, potentially leading to a more robust framework for engagement and negotiation with Indigenous communities during constitutional revisions.

Therefore, there could be a requirement to consult Indigenous peoples and, if necessary, accommodate them regarding any constitutional amendments that might impact rights protected by Section 35. For example, the obligation to consult would arise if the proposed amendments pertain to provincial jurisdiction over natural resources or federal jurisdiction concerning fisheries. Thus, this obligation would have a broader scope than that outlined in Section 35.1 of the Constitution Act, 1982, as it would apply to any changes likely to affect Indigenous rights protected by Section 35, rather than being limited to specific provisions.

8.5 The West wants in Western Canada has long grappled with feelings of political and economic alienation within the Canadian federation. The ongoing political tensions in the western provinces can be traced back to their integration into Canada [8.5.1]. The rise of western movements, from the emergence of the Reform Party in the late 1980s [8.5.2] to more recent separatist groups like Wexit and the Maverick Party [8.5.3], reflects persistent frustrations with federal policies. In response, governments have attempted to address these grievances through initiatives such as Alberta's Fair Deal Panel, which aimed to redefine the province's relationship with Ottawa [8.5.4].

8.5.1 Western protest politics

While modern federal Canada was officially founded in 1867 with the union of Canada East (now Quebec) and Canada West (now Ontario), along with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, six additional provinces joined at various times: Manitoba in 1870, British Columbia in 1871, Prince Edward Island in 1873, and finally Alberta and Saskatchewan in 1905, with Newfoundland joining in 1949. Generally, provinces retain ownership of their natural resources upon joining Canada, as stipulated by Section 109 of the British North America Act of 1867.

However, this was not the case for Manitoba, Alberta, and Saskatchewan, which were created through federal legislation. Consequently, when these provinces were formed by acts of Parliament, the federal government retained ownership of the natural resources within their borders. This was primarily justified by the need to finance westward expansion and the construction of the transcontinental railway. It wasn't until 1930 that these Prairie provinces gained ownership of their resources through the British North America Act, 1930, 20-21 Geo. V, c. 26 (U.K.). Thus, Manitoba had to wait 60 years for this outcome, while Alberta and Saskatchewan waited 25 years. From the outset of their integration into Canada, Western provinces perceived this situation as unjust due to the significant economic disadvantages it imposed on them.

8.5.2 The birth and rise of the reform party

The emergence and rise of the Reform Party of Canada in the late 1980s were driven by a growing discontent among Western Canadians with the existing federal political establishment. This movement was rooted in long-standing grievances regarding economic policies, regional representation, and perceived favouritism towards Eastern Canada, particularly Ontario and Quebec.

The Reform Party was officially founded in October 1987 during a convention in Winnipeg. This gathering was a culmination of efforts by various Western interest groups dissatisfied with the Progressive Conservative (PC) government led by Brian Mulroney. Key figures in this movement included Preston Manning, along with Stan Roberts and Robert Muir. They sought to create a political vehicle that would effectively voice Western concerns, particularly those related to economic policy and constitutional reform.

At its inception, the Reform Party adopted a platform that emphasized direct democracy, fiscal conservatism, and significant reforms to Canada's political institutions. A notable demand was for a "Triple-E Senate," advocating for an elected, equal, and effective Senate to enhance provincial influence in federal decision-making. The party also called for referendums, recall elections, and citizen-initiated legislation to empower ordinary Canadians in the political process. The slogan “The West Wants In” encapsulated their message of inclusion and representation for Western interests.

In 1990, the party gained further credibility when Deborah Grey won a federal by-election in Alberta, becoming its first Member of Parliament. This victory was pivotal as it demonstrated that the Reform Party could translate grassroots support into electoral success. The early 1990s were marked by growing dissatisfaction with the PC government’s handling of economic issues and constitutional debates, particularly surrounding the failed Meech Lake Accord and Charlottetown Accord. Many Western Canadians perceived these accords as favouring Quebec at their expense, intensifying feelings of alienation. The Reform Party positioned itself as a champion for Western interests, advocating against policies that they believed undermined their economic well-being.

In the 1993 federal election, this strategy paid off as the Reform Party surged to become the largest conservative party in Canada, winning 52 seats in Parliament. Despite its successes, the Reform Party faced challenges in maintaining its momentum as it attempted to transition from a regional party to a national force. In 1997, while still holding the position of Official Opposition, it ran candidates across all provinces and territories but struggled to gain traction in Eastern Canada. In 2000, it merged with other conservative factions to form the Canadian Alliance. This transition marked both an end and a new beginning for many Reform supporters, as they sought to unify Canada’s conservative movement under a more inclusive banner.

For the evolution of the “West Wants in” movement, see : Roger Gibbins, “Western Canada: ‘The West Wants In’”, in Kenneth McRoberts, Beyond Quebec: Taking Stock of Canada, (Montreal: McGill-Queen’s University Press) 1995, pp. 45-60.

8.5.3 The Wexit and the Maverick party

After the 2019 Canadian federal election, particularly in Alberta and Saskatchewan, some Western Canadians—frustrated with federal policies, especially those affecting the oil and gas industry, carbon taxation, and equalization payments—felt that the federal government was not representing their interests. Inspired by Brexit, a new movement called Wexit emerged, advocating for Western Canada to separate from the rest of the country and form an independent nation.

In 2020, this movement evolved into the Maverick Party, which still entertained the idea of independence but positioned itself primarily as a Western-rights advocacy party, focusing on constitutional reforms and greater autonomy for Alberta, Saskatchewan, and other Western provinces. Unlike the original Wexit movement, which was explicitly separatist, the Maverick Party adopted a dual-track strategy: (1) Pushing for constitutional changes to give Western provinces more control; (2) Supporting independence as a last resort if reforms failed. The party seeks to reform the equalization payment system, which it argues unfairly redistributes wealth from resource-rich provinces to others. It also supports establishing provincial control over areas like tax collection, policing, and immigration, similar to Quebec’s model. Additionally, it calls for Senate reform to give Western provinces greater representation and pipeline infrastructure protections to ensure federal policies do not hinder resource development. If these reforms fail, the party views Western independence as a viable alternative.

In the federal election in 2021, the Maverick Party only ran candidates in the Western provinces and failed to secure any seats in Parliament. Despite this setback, the Maverick Party continues to advocate for greater Western autonomy and political representation within the Canadian federation.

8.5.4 Alberta fair deal panel and aftermath

Amidst the various movements addressing the grievances of Western provinces, Alberta established the Fair Deal Panel in 2019, an initiative which arose from the province’s long-standing concerns about the equalization formula.

In 1957, the federal government established an equalization program aimed at “reducing fiscal disparities among Canada’s ten provinces.” (Library of Parliament, “Canada’s Equalization Formula”, November 10, 2008, online: https://publications.gc.ca/collections/collection_2013/bdp-lop/eb/2008-20-eng.pdf. This program was funded directly from federal tax revenues; thus, provincial governments did not make payments to contribute to it. Instead, it is the citizens who financed it through their taxes. The federal government used a self-established formula to make payments from this fund to provinces whose fiscal capacity falls below a certain threshold. In 1982, during constitutional repatriation, this program was enshrined in Part III of the Constitution Act.

Since its inception, Quebec has consistently received payments from this program. Alberta received equalization payments in the early years but has not since the early 1960s. Although Quebec generally receives much less per capita than Maritime provinces under equalization, its larger population results in annual payments amounting to several billion dollars. The substantial share Quebec receives from equalization has long fuelled a narrative suggesting that it serves as a means for the federal government to address demands from Quebec nationalists and counter support for independence. See Daniel Béland and André Lecours, “L’Alberta, l’aliénation de l’Ouest et le programme fédéral de péréquation – Identités territoriales, cadrage idéologique et inscription à l’agenda politique“, (2021) 40:3 Politique et Sociétés 177, at p 181-186.

This rhetoric was prominently featured during the 2019 electoral campaign in Alberta. Jason Kenney, then leader of the United Conservative Party, pledged to hold a referendum on equalization if elected and if certain concessions were not made to Alberta: “We will send a clear message to Justin Trudeau that if we do not get a timely completion of a coastal pipeline, if he will not withdraw anti-Alberta laws, like Bill C-69, that we are prepared to put on the table equalization, by holding a constitutional referendum to end equalization, to assert our fight for fairness to the top of the national agenda.” (Quoted in Emily Mertz, “Alberta Election Fact Check: Could Alberta end or change equalization?”, Global News, April 3rd 2019, online : globalnews.ca/news/5113104/alberta-election-fact-check-equalization-referendum/.

Immediately after his election, Jason Kenney established a “Fair Deal Panel,” aimed at consulting Albertans on how to define and secure a fair deal for the province. The panel was also tasked with exploring ways to advance Alberta’s economic interests, such as pipeline construction. Released in May 2020, the report from this committee included 25 recommendations aimed at increasing the province’s autonomy within Canada. Key proposals include creating an Alberta pension plan to replace the Canada Pension Plan, establishing a provincial police force instead of the RCMP, and securing a stronger voice in federal decision-making. The panel also emphasized economic diversification beyond the energy sector and improving market access for Alberta’s exports. Additionally, it recommended using democratic tools, such as referendums and citizen initiatives, to engage Albertans in key policy decisions. (Fair Deal Panel, “Report to Government”, May 2020, online : open.alberta.ca/dataset/d8933f27-5f81-4cbb-97c1-f56b45b09a74/resource/d5836820-d81f-4042-b24e-b04e012f4cde/download/fair-deal-panel-report-to-government-may-2020.pdf.

As discussed in Section 7.3, a key outcome of the Alberta Fair Deal Panel’s recommendations was the 2021 provincial referendum on equalization. Another significant outcome was the adoption of the Alberta Sovereignty within a United Canada Act in 2022, c A-33.8 which allows Alberta to refuse the enforcement of certain federal measures deemed by Alberta’s Legislative Assembly to be unconstitutional or harmful to the province. The constitutionality of this law remains a matter of debate, as the courts have not (yet) ruled on it. Among those who support the validity of the law, see Jesse Hartery and Geoffrey T Sigalet, “The Frontiers of Nullification and Anticommandeering: Federalism and Extrajudicial Constitutional Interpretation“, (2024) 54:4 Publius: The Journal of Federalism 628. Among those who express doubts about its constitutionality, see Martin Olszynski & Nigel Bankes, “Running Afoul the Separation, Division, and Delegation of Powers: The Alberta Sovereignty Within a United Canada Act“, ABLawg, December 6, 2022.

9 Comparative perspectives on constitutional amendment

Comparing the Constitution of Canada with constitutions abroad can deepen our understanding of our own constitution while simultaneously expanding our base of knowledge about constitutionalism, democracy, and the rule of law.

There is much we can learn from comparing the dynamics of constitutional amendment in Canada and the world. In this Section, we introduce you to a few major points of comparison in comparative constitutional amendment, with a focus on similarities and differences between Canada and select countries around the world, including Belize, the Czech Republic, France, Germany, India, South Africa, Taiwan, and the United States.

9.1 Overruling a ruling of the court

There are generally two methods to overrule a ruling of a supreme or constitutional court within a domestic constitutional order: (1) a court can overrule its prior ruling; and (2) a constitutional amendment can overrule a ruling of the court.

In Canada, legislatures possess an extraordinary power in relation to courts. They may invoke Section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to temporarily overrule or pre-empt a judicial ruling. This legislative action has only temporary effect, as it may last for up to five years, though it may be renewed indefinitely with separate legislative re-enactments.

> Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 33 (1982)
> 33 (1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.
> (2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.
> (3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.
> (4) Parliament or the legislature of a province may re-enact a declaration made under subsection (1).
> (5) Subsection (3) applies in respect of a re-enactment made under subsection (4).

No amendment in Canada has yet been enacted to overrule a ruling of the Supreme Court. The question has not yet arisen under law.

In the United States, the power of constitutional amendment has been used on several occasions to overrule the U.S. Supreme Court. The procedure to amend the U.S Constitution is far shorter and less complex than it is in Canada.

> Constitution of the United States, Article V (1789)
> The Congress, whenever two thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no state, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

The case of Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 U.S. (2 Dall.) 419 (1793) was the first to provoke the use of Article V to reverse the U.S. Supreme Court. The case involved a suit against the State of Georgia for payments due for goods supplied to Georgia in the American Revolutionary War. Georgia declined to appear in Court on grounds that, as a sovereign state, it cannot be sued without first giving its consent. The question in the case was whether a citizen of a state can sue the government of a state in a federal court. The Court ultimately ruled that Georgia could indeed be sued in federal court without its consent. The Court rested its reasoning on Article III of the Constitution.

> Constitution of the United States, Article III (1789)
> The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority;—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls;—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States;— between a State and Citizens of another State,—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.
> In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make.
> The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed.

In the end, however, the ruling in Chisolm was overruled by the Eleventh Amendment. Proposed in 1794 and ratified in 1795, the Eleventh Amendment requires a state to consent to a suit.

> Constitution of the United States, Eleventh Amendment (1795)
> The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by Citizens of another State, or by Citizens or Subjects of any Foreign State.

A similar outcome followed after the ruling of the U.S. Supreme Court in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429 (1895). In Pollock, the Court ruled that income taxes are direct taxes that must apportioned among the states according to population. Roughly 15 years later, Congress proposed an amendment in 1909 to reverse the Court. The amendment, ratified in 1913, authorizes the very opposite of what the Court has required in Pollock.

> Constitution of the United States, Sixteenth Amendment (1795)
> The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.

The American experience is not unique in the world. Other countries engage in the same practice of amending their constitution to overrule a court.

Could a constitutional amendment in Canada overrule a ruling of the Supreme Court? If yes, which of Canada's procedures of amendment would apply? Would it depend on the subject-matter of the Supreme Court's ruling? More generally, should the power of constitutional amendment be deployable in this way in the Canadian context?

9.2 The doctrine of unconstitutional constitutional amendment

In many countries around the world, supreme and constitutional courts have asserted and even exercised the extraordinary power to invalidate a constitutional amendment. Whether a constitutional amendment can be unconstitutional is something of a puzzle of logic: how can a constitutional amendment violate the very constitution it amends? The possibility of an unconstitutional constitutional amendment moreover raises a question about the role of courts: do judges possess the authority, competence, and legitimacy to review the constitutionality of a constitutional amendment? These are some of the most fascinating questions in contemporary comparative constitutionalism—and they arise in Canada in peculiarly Canadian ways.

9.2.1 Codified unamendability

Constitutions sometimes exempt certain rules from amendment. These unamendable rules are codified in the text of the constitution. They are explicitly shielded from the procedures of constitutional reform. To put it another way, these unamendable rules are immune to the power of constitutional amendment.

The most well-known unamendable rule is the "eternity clause" codified in the German Basic Law. It forbids any and all amendments to the principle of the inviolability of human dignity. The German Basic law also forbids amendments to the democratic, social, and federal character of the state. These principles are stated in Articles 1 and 20 of the German Basic Law, and they are made expressly unamendable by Article 79(3).

Human Dignity and Human Rights | German Basic Law, art. 1

1. Human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.
2. The German people therefore acknowledge inviolable and inalienable human rights as the basis of every community, of peace and of justice in the world.
3. The following basic rights shall bind the legislature, the executive and the judiciary as directly applicable law.

Constitutional Principles | German Basic Law, art. 20

1. The Federal Republic of Germany is a democratic and social federal state.
2. All state authority is derived from the people. It shall be exercised by the people through elections and other votes and through specific legislative, executive and judicial bodies.
3. The legislature shall be bound by the constitutional order, the executive and the judiciary by law and justice.
4. All Germans shall have the right to resist any person seeking to abolish this constitutional order, if no other remedy is available.

Amendment of the Basic Law | German Basic Law, art. 79(3)

Amendments to this Basic Law affecting the division of the Federation into Länder, their participation on principle in the legislative process, or the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 shall be inadmissible.

When a constitution codifies an unamendable rule, it requires enforcement by a constitutional actor. Unamendability is typically enforced by a supreme or constitutional court in the course of litigation about whether a given constitutional amendment is constitutional.

For instance, the Constitution of the Czech Republic prohibits amendments that undermine the essential elements of democracy.

Constitutional Amendment | Constitution of the Czech Republic, art. 9

1. This Constitution may be supplemented or amended only by constitutional acts.
2. Any changes in the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law are impermissible

The Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic enforced this unamendable rule when a Member of Parliament, Miloš Melčák, asked the Court to assess the constitutionality of an amendment proposing to shorten the duration of the parliamentary term. The Court invalidated the amendment for violating the prohibition in Article 9(2) on amendments that change "the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law."

The Court's ruling was delivered by Pavel Rychetský, Chairperson of the Constitutional Court.

Constitutional Court of the Czech Republic, 2009/09/10 - Pl. ÚS 27/09: Constitutional Act on Shortening the Term of Office of the Chamber of Deputies

[The complainant seeks] the annulment of constitutional Act no. 195/2009 Coll., on shortening the Fifth Term of Office of the Chamber of Deputies.

In the reasoning of his petition, the complainant states that constitutional Act no. 195/2009 Coll. is a constitutional act only formally, but substantively it contravenes the constitutional order, and in fact suspends the constitutional order – ad hoc, for one term of office, suspends its effect for a period arbitrarily chosen by the momentary qualified majority of deputies and senators, due to which, in this sense it is not an act that supplements or amends the Constitution (under Art. 9 par. 1 of the Constitution). He considers the contested constitutional act to be inconsistent with the constitutional order in the sense that it changes an essential requirement for a democratic state governed by the rule of law, which, under Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution cannot be changed. That requirement is that the free competition among political forces be subject to the same rules, and, especially, to rules set in advance.

The petition goes on to analyze in detail the significance and meaning of Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution, in connection with the guarantees of democratic, free competition among political forces. It refers to the Constitutional Court's legal opinion stated in judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 53/2000 that "Free competition among political forces is based above all on the fact that all political subjects are governed by the same rules specified, defined in advance, which are based on these basic principles. … At the same time, its decision-making may not be arbitrary, but must respect the constitutional principles that are part of the basic principles of the constitutionally guaranteed political system. If the risk of arbitrariness were not ruled out, and even mere circumvention of these regulations were possible, this would undoubtedly always lead to violation of constitutional order, its purpose and meaning, and this would force the intervention of the Constitutional Court, which is, under Art.

83 and 87, the judicial organ for protection of constitutionality and lawfulness." The petitioner considers it a defining element of a legal norm, including a constitution, essential to the understanding of a substantive law-based state, that it is binding for the future, in the same manner, on all who find themselves in a situation that arises in the future. In his opinion, the idea that statutorily provided rules could be suspended in a self-serving manner, and only for a particular instance, would mean accepting arbitrariness and violating the principle of the rule of law. At this point he also refers to the Constitutional Court's legal opinion in judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 24/04.

According to the petitioner, the contested constitutional act violated the constitutional prohibition on retroactivity, by retroactively adjusting a term of office while it was running – the term of office began as a four-year term (Art. 16 par. 1 of the Constitution) and was retroactively adjusted (shortened). The petitioner considers this retroactive effect to be true retroactivity, which is also inconsistent with the principle of legitimate expectation, and he points to the fact that the exceptional acceptance of true retroactivity in public law in the period after World War II was limited to issues of dealing with the totalitarian past, an example of which is the act on illegality of the communist regime or restitution legislation. In this matter, however, similar reasons that would justify true retroactivity do not exist.

The petitioner emphasizes the exceptional significance of the relationship between elections and the functioning of a democratic law-based state; he considers a pre-defined term of office to be important for applying the principles of the sovereignty of the people, equal opportunity, open political competition, the right of a deputy to uninterrupted exercise of a mandate during a pre-determined period, and especially for ensuring protection of the rights of a parliamentary minority. In his opinion, a possible breach of these principles can be allowed only on the basis of the Constitution, under conditions generally provided by the Constitution (those being the conditions of dissolving the Chamber of Deputies). In this regard he refers to a number of decisions in which the Constitutional Court spoke on protection of the cited principles (file no. II. ÚS 275/96, Pl. ÚS 24/04, Pl. ÚS 73/04). Insofar as the Constitutional Court, in judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 73/04, derives the limits of the judicial branch's ability to annul elections due to election offenses, on the grounds that it is impermissible to change the will of the sovereign by a decision by the judicial branch, then, according to the petitioner, it is all the less permissible for the legislative branch.

The petitioner rejects the argument that the constitution can codify everything that receives a constitutional majority, regardless of the provision that the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law cannot be changed. He states his belief that these requirements must also include the predictability of the law, which comes from it being general, as well as the opinion that the Constitutional Court already stated this thesis in judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 77/06: "In a substantive law-based state, a statute in the formal sense cannot be understood as a mere repository of a wide variety of changes made throughout the legal order. On the contrary, the substantive conception of the law-based state requires that a statute be, both in terms of form and substance, a predictable, consistent source of law." He also points out, again with reference to the Constitutional Court's case law (file no. Pl. ÚS 73/04) – the importance of fair conditions for political competition. Here he stresses the difference between shortening the term of office of the Chamber of Deputies for one instance, and the general rule for dissolving it. He is aware that in the world's democratic countries there are various constitutional models for dissolving parliaments and calling early elections. In his opinion, in terms of Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution, it is possible to enshrine such a model through a general amendment to the Constitution, but it is not possible to rely on the democratic character of a state, proceed formally within the framework of its constitution, and simultaneously suspend the essential, substantive requirements that guarantee its democratic and law-based character.

The petitioner analyzes the purpose of the mechanism for dissolving the Chamber of Deputies, tied to a vote of no confidence in the government (or a refusal to give a vote of confidence), as it is enshrined in the Constitution; he states that this mechanism makes the fall of the government conditional on a seriously intended decision by the opposition to form a government, that it aims to rule out demonstrative, non-serious attempts to destabilize the government, that it lays a precisely weighed responsibility on the participants in political competition.

In his opinion, circumventing this procedure by shortening the term of office of the Chamber of Deputies makes political competition unequal, and preserves the existing circle of competitors, because new political parties or movements will necessarily find themselves under time pressure, if they were aiming their involvement in the contest toward the regular date of elections. He emphasizes that, in terms of political competition, the time when elections to the representative body are held is not politically neutral – in the case of early elections, the only legitimate date is one that arises from procedures described in advance by the Constitution. Therefore, he considers that the contested constitutional act has violated the principle of equal opportunity in political competition (which he supports by reference to the Constitutional Court's legal opinion stated in judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 53/2000). He expressly states in this regard: "The modus operandi of constitutional offenders lies in the fact that the Constitution, or its essential requirements guaranteeing the rules of political competition, are not annulled for a particular time, but are ignored, suspended. Yet, nothing prevents the momentary constitutional majority from amending or supplementing the Constitution – it can codify any easy manner of calling early elections for the next time. A new constitutional rule would be established, to replace the existing one, the next time, and it would mean free (equal and open) competition between political forces in the future, it would conform to the constitutional order, i.e. the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law. However, the majority does not do that; for the next time it again returns to the rigid procedure of calling new elections; until such time as the momentary majority again decides that it is politically suitable – for it – to ignore the constitutional procedure again and get out of political competition through an ad hoc statute."

From a historic viewpoint the petitioner points out that the contested constitutional law is identical in content with the one adopted in 1998, and the political circumstances are also analogous. He considers the argument of "constitutional habit" established by the procedure in 1998 to be unacceptable, and outlines the political-cultural consequences of breaching constitutional principles.

In his opinion, constitutional Act no. 195/2009 Coll., because it changes the rules of free, equal and open political competition, which is among the essential requirements of a democratic, law-based state, by suspending the Constitution for one instance, retroactively and in a manner that limits the sovereignty of the people, is thus inconsistent with Art. 21 par. 2 and 4, Art. 22 of the Charter a Art. 9 par. 2, Art. 16 par. 1 and Art. 17 par. 1 of the Constitution. For all these reasons, thus presented, he proposes that constitutional Act no. 195/2009 Coll., on Shortening the Fifth Term of Office of the Chamber of Deputies, be annulled.

In judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 36/01 the Constitutional Court applied Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution in the position of a basic rule for interpretation of the Constitution and amendments to it: "The constitutional maxim in Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution has consequences not only for the framers of the constitution, but also for the Constitutional Court. The inadmissibility of changing the substantive requirements of a democratic state based on the rule of law also contains an instruction to the Constitutional Court, that no amendment to the Constitution can be interpreted in such a way that it would result in limiting an already achieved procedural level of protection for fundamental rights and freedoms." In this connection, we must also mention judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 11/02, in which the Court also included in Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution the guarantee of ruling out arbitrariness in its own interpretation of the constitutional order: "If the Constitutional Court itself, as a constitutional body, i.e. a public authority, is not to act arbitrarily, the Constitutional Court also being subject to the prohibition on arbitrary conduct, because it too, or it especially, is required to respect the framework of the constitutional state, in which arbitrary conduct by public authorities is strictly forbidden, it must feel bound by its own decisions, and can depart from them through its case law only under certain circumstances. This postulate can be described as an essential requirement for a democratic state governed by the rule of law (Art. 1 par. 1, in connection with Art. 9, par. 2 of the Constitution.)"

In a number of its decisions the Constitutional Court also outlined the meaning of the term "essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law" under Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution. In judgment file no. III. ÚS 31/97 it stated: "The concept of a democratic state under Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution is interpreted by the Constitutional Court, as well as by doctrine. In its decision in the matter file no. Pl. ÚS 19/93, the Constitutional Court included in this concept a substantive, not a formal, understanding of a state governed by the rule of law." The court also referred to doctrinaire positions, according to which the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law under Art. 9 par. 2 and 3 of the Constitution include "above all the sovereignty of the people and the principles contained in Art. 5 and 6 of the Constitution and the natural law provisions of the Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, which establish a constitutional right to resistance (Art. 23 of the Charter)" , or, in other words, these requirements are "concentrated in several articles of Chapter I of the Constitution and in Chapter I and V of the Charter, and ceremonially declared in the Preamble to the Constitution" . From a comparative perspective, the Constitutional Court also pointed to Art. 79 par. 3 of the Grundgesetz of Germany, Art. 110 par. 1 of the Constitution of the Greek Republic, and Art. 288 of the Constitution of the Portuguese Republic.

Insofar as the Constitutional Court articulates the need to include the category of constitutional acts within the term "statute" in Art. 87 par. 1 let. a) of the Constitution, in terms of reviewing them for consistency with Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution, with direct derogative consequences, it does so in connection to its case law, beginning with the key judgment file no. Pl. ÚS 19/93, and does so in accordance with the values and principles that guide constitutional systems in democratic countries. Protection of the material core of the Constitution, i.e. the imperative that the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law, under Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution, are non-changeable, is not a mere slogan or proclamation, but a constitutional provision with normative consequences. In No. 78 of The Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton wrote that "the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority." Without the projection of Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution into interpretation of Art. 87 par. 1 let. a) of the Constitution, the non-changeability of the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law would lose its normative nature and remain merely a political, or moral challenge.

Based on these reasons, the Constitutional Court concluded that constitutional Act no. 195/2009 Coll., on Shortening the Fifth Term of Office of the Chamber of Deputies, is inconsistent with the essential requirements for a democratic state governed by the rule of law under Art. 9 par. 2 of the Constitution, wherefore it annulled it as of 10 September 2009, i.e. the date this judgment is promulgated.

9.2.2 Interpretive unamendability

Courts sometimes invalidate constitutional amendments even where the constitution does not expressly shield any codified rules from amendment.

In some cases, courts strike down amendments on the basis of procedural defects in their enactment. For example, where an amendment has been enacted despite failing to secure the required number of votes in a national legislature, a court may rule that the amendment is unconstitutional.

In other cases, courts strike down amendments on grounds involving their substance. For instance, judges may interpret the principles and values of the constitution as foreclosing certain amendments even though the text of the constitution appears to give plenary power to amending actors. The latter case of substantive unconstitutionality is more controversial than the former case of procedural unconstitutionality.

Consider the case of Taiwan. The Constitution codifies no unamendable rules. And yet the Constitutional Court has invalidated constitutional amendment on both procedural and substantive grounds. The Court exercised this power for the first time, in the year 2000.

Constitutional Court of Taiwan, Judicial Yuan Interpretation No. 499 (March 24, 2000)

I. [I]n the enactment and amendment of the Additional Articles, the process of the National Assembly shall be open and transparent. … A constitutional amendment as a state act pertaining to the constitution is null and void inasmuch as a manifest and gross flaw occurs in the amendment procedure. A procedural flaw is considered manifest where the facts of the flaw can be determined without further investigation, whereas it is gross where the facts of the flaw alone render the procedure illegitimate. With such procedural flaws, a constitutional amendment violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments. The amendment process for the disputed Additional Articles, which passed the third reading by the National Assembly on September 4, 1999, contravenes the principle of openness and transparency … . With such a manifest and gross flaw, the act of disputed constitutional amendment violates the basic norm that underpins the validity of constitutional amendments.

II. [T]he Additional Articles, enacted by the National Assembly via the exercise of its amending power, are at the same level of hierarchy as the original texts of the Constitution. Some constitutional provisions are integral to the essential nature of the Constitution and underpin the constitutional normative order. If such provisions are open to change through constitutional amendment, adoption of such constitutional amendments would bring down the constitutional normative order in its entirety. Therefore, any such constitutional amendment shall be considered illegitimate, in and of itself. Among various constitutional provisions, Article 1 (the principle of a democratic republic), Article 2 (the principle of popular sovereignty), Chapter II (the protection of constitutional rights), and those providing for the separation of powers and the principle of checks and balances are integral to the essential nature of the Constitution and constitute the foundational principles of the entire constitutional order. All the constitutionally-established organs must adhere to the constitutional order of liberal democracy, as emanating from the said constitutional provisions, on which the current Constitution is founded.

III. Article 1 of the Additional Articles adopted by the Third National Assembly on September 4, 1999, stipulates that, from the Fourth National Assembly on, the seats of the Delegates shall be apportioned according to the popular votes that the candidates nominated by each political party and all the independent candidates receive in the parallel election for the Members of the Legislative Yuan, which differs from the National Assembly in function and competence. The Delegates who are to be selected pursuant to the challenged apportionment method but not directly elected by the people, are merely the representatives appointed by respective political parties according to their share of seats in the Legislative Yuan. Accordingly, this amendment is incompatible with the spirit of Article 25 of the Constitution, which provides that the National Assembly, on behalf of the people, exercises sovereign rights. It leads to a conflict between two constitutional provisions. All the powers conferred by Article 1 of the Additional Articles are presupposed to be exercised by the Delegates elected by the people. Should the Delegates, selected pursuant to the challenged apportionment method, be allowed to exercise the powers of the said Article 1, the fundamental principles of constitutional democracy would be thereby violated. Hence, the disputed Additional Article amending the method of election for the Delegates is incompatible with the constitutional order of liberal democracy.

> IV. Article 1, Paragraph 3, Second Sentence of the Additional Articles provides, "The term of office of the Third National Assembly shall be extended to the day when the term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan expires;" Article 4, Paragraph 3, First Sentence provides, "The term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan shall be extended to June 30, 2002." Thereby, the term of office of the Third National Assembly will be extended by two years and forty-two days, and the term of office of the Fourth Legislative Yuan by five months, respectively. Pursuant to the principle of popular sovereignty, the power and authority of political representatives originate directly from the authorization of the people. Hence, the legitimacy of representative democracy lies in the adherence of elected political representatives to their social contract with the electorate. Its cardinal principle is that the new election must take place at the end of the fixed electoral term unless just cause exists for not holding the election. Failing that, representative democracy will be devoid of legitimacy. J.Y. Interpretation No. 261 held that "periodic election of members of Congress is a sine qua non to reflect the will of the people and implement constitutional democracy" to that effect. The just cause for not holding the election alluded to above must be consistent with the holdings of J.Y. Interpretation No. 31, which stipulated, "The State has been undergoing a severe calamity, which has made the election of both the Second Legislative Yuan and the Second Control Yuan de facto impossible." In this case, no just cause for not holding re-elections can be found to justify the disputed extension of the terms of both the Third National Assembly and the Fourth Legislative Yuan. Such an extension of the terms as effectuated by amending the said two provisions of the Additional Articles is not in conformity with the principle set out above. Furthermore, the self-extension of its own term by the Third National Assembly contravenes the principle of conflict of interest and is also incompatible with the constitutional order of liberal democracy.

The most well-known case on the doctrine of unconstitutional constitutional amendment comes from India. In 1973, the Supreme Court held for the first time that the power to amend the constitution cannot be used to do violence to the "basic structure" of the constitution, even though the text of the constitution itself does not codify any substantive limitations on constitutional amendments. In the case that follows below, the Chief Justice explains how an amendment can be unconstitutional in the face of a constitutional text that establishes no restrictions on amendments.

> 617. The correct approach to the question of limitations which may be implied in any legislative provisions including a Constitutional document has to be made from the point of view of interpretation. It is not a novel theory or a doctrine which has to be treated as an innovation of those who evolve heterodox methods to substantiate their own thesis. The argument that there are no implied limitations because there are no express limitations is a contradiction in terms. Implied limitations can only arise where there are no express limitations.

> 618. We are equally unable to hold that in the light of the Preamble, the entire scheme of the Constitution the relevant provisions thereof and the context in which the material expressions are used in Article 368 no implied limitations arise to the exercise of the power of amendment. The respondents do not dispute, that, certain limitations arise by necessary implication e.g., the Constitution cannot be abrogated or repealed in its entirety and that the India's polity has to be a Sovereign Democratic Republic, apart from several other implications arising from Article 368 which have been noticed.
> 619. The argument that the Nation cannot grow and that the objectives set out in the Preamble cannot be achieved unless the amending power has the ambit and the width of the power of a Constituent Assembly itself or the People themselves appears to be based on grounds which do not have a solid [basis]. The Constitution makers provided for development of the country in all the fields social, economic and political. The structure of the Constitution has been erected on the concept of an egalitarian society. But the Constitution makers did not desire that it should be a society where the citizen will not enjoy the various freedoms and such rights as are the basic elements of those freedoms, e.g., the right to equality, freedom of religion etc., so that his dignity as an individual may be maintained. It has been strongly urged on behalf of the respondents that a citizen cannot have any dignity if he is economically or socially backward. No one can dispute such a statement but the whole scheme underlying the Constitution is to bring about economic and social changes without taking away the dignity of the individual. Indeed, the same has been placed on such a high pedestal that to ensure the freedoms etc. their infringement has been made justiciable by the highest court in the land.

> 620. The basic structure of the Constitution is not a vague concept and the apprehensions expressed on behalf of the respondents that neither the citizen nor the Parliament would be able to understand it are unfounded. If the historical background, the Preamble, the entire scheme of the Constitution, the relevant provisions thereof including Article 368 are kept in mind there can be no difficulty in discerning that the following can be regarded as the basic elements of the Constitutional structure. (These cannot be catalogued but can only be illustrated).
> 1. The supremacy of the Constitution.
> 2. Republican and Democratic form of Government and sovereignty of the country.
> 3. Secular and federal character of the Constitution.
> 4. Demarcation of power between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary.
> 5. The dignity of the individual (secured by the various freedoms and basic rights in Part III and the mandate to build a welfare State contained in Part IV.
> 6. The unity and the integrity of the nation.
> 621. The entire discussion from the point of view of the meaning of the expression "amendment" as employed in Article 368 and the limitations which arise by implications leads to the result that the amending power under Article 368 is neither narrow nor unlimited. On the footing on which we have proceeded the validity of the 25th amendment can be sustained if Article 368, as it originally stood and after the amendment, is read in the way we have read it. The insertion of Articles 13(4) and 368(3) and the other amendments made will not affect the result, namely, that the power in Article 368 is wide enough to permit amendment of each and every Article of the Constitution by way of addition, variation or repeal so long as its basic elements are not abrogated or denuded of their identity.

It did not take long for the Supreme Court of India to deploy the basic structure doctrine to invalidate a constitutional amendment. In one of the earliest instances, an amendment sought to limit the power of the Court to review the constitutionality of amendments. The Court heard a challenge to this amendment. In its ruling, the Court invoked the basic structure doctrine while referring to the Kesavanda case, discussed above.

Supreme Court of India, Minerva Mills Ltd. vs Union of India, 31 July 1980, 1980 AIR 1789, 1981 SCR (1) 206

> In Keshavananda Bharati this Court held by a majority that though by Article 368 Parliament is given the power to amend the Constitution. that power cannot be exercised so as to damage the basic features of the Constitution or so as to destroy its basic structure. The question for consideration in this group of petitions under article 32 is whether sections 4 and 55 of the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act, 1976 transgress that limitation, on the amending power.

Petitioner No. 1 which is a limited company owned a textile undertaking called Minerva Mills situated in the State of Karnataka. This undertaking was nationalised and taken over by the Central Government under the provisions of the Sick Textile Undertakings (Nationalisation) Act, 1974. Petitioners 2 to 6 are shareholders of Petitioner No. 1, some of whom are also unsecured creditors and some secured creditors.

Respondent 1 is the Union of India. Respondent 2 is the National Textile Corporation Limited in which the textile undertaking of Minerva Mills comes to be vested under section 3(2) of the Nationalisation Act of 1974. Respondent 3 is a subsidiary of the 2nd respondent.

On August 20, 1970, the Central Government appointed a Committee under section 15 of the Industries (Development and Regulation Act, 1951 to make a full and complete investigation of the affairs of the Minerva Mills Ltd., as it was of the opinion that there had been or was likely to be substantial fall in the volume of production. The said Committee submitted its report to the Central Government in January 1971, on the basis of which the Central Government passed an order dated October 19, 1971 under section 18A of the Act of 1951, authorising Respondent 2 to take over the management of the Minerva Mills Ltd. On the ground that its affairs were being managed in a manner highly detrimental to public interest.

By these petitions, the petitioners challenge the constitutional validity of certain provisions of the Sick Textile Undertakings (NationaLisation) Act and of the order dated October 19, 1971. We are not concerned with the merits of that challenge at this stage the petitioners further challenge the constitutionality of the Constitution (39th Amendment) Act which inserted the impugned Nationalisation Act as Entry 105 is the 9th Schedule to the Constitution. That raises a question regarding the validity of article 31B of the Constitution with which we propose to deal in another batch of petitions. Finally, the petitioners challenge the constitutionality fo sections 4 and 55 of the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act, 1976, and it is this contention alone with which we propose to deal in these petitions.

The challenge to the validity of section 4 and SS of the 42nd Amendment rests on the ratio of the majority judgment in Kesavanand Bharati (Supra). The several opinions rendered in that case have been discussed and analysed threadbare in texts and judgments too numerous to mention. All the same, we cannot avoid making a brief resume of the majority judgments since the petitioners must stand or fall by them. Those judgments, on the point now in issue, were delivered by Sikri, CJ., Shelat and Grover JJ., Hegde and Mukherjea JJ., Jaganmohan Reddy J. and Khanna J.

Sikri, CJ., held that the fundamental importance of the freedom of the individual has to be preserved for all times to come and that it could not be amended out of existence According to the learned Chief Justice, fundamental rights conferred by Part III of the Constitution cannot be abrogated, though a reasonable abridgement of those rights could be effected in public interest. There is a limitation on the power of amendment by necessary implication which was apparent from a reading of the preamble and therefore, according to the learned Chief Justice, the expression "amendment of this Constitution" in Article 368 means any addition or change in any of the provisions of the Constitution within the broad contours of the preamble, made in order to carry out the basic objectives of the Constitution. Accordingly, every provision of the Constitution was open to amendment provided the basic foundation or structure of the Constitution was not damaged or destroyed.

Shelat and Grover, JJ. held that the preamble to the Constitution contains the clue to the fundamentals of the Constitution. According to the learned Judges, Parts III and IV of the Constitution which respectively embody the fundamental rights and the directive principles have to be balanced and harmonised. This balance and harmony between two integral parts of the Constitution forms a basic element of the Constitution which cannot be altered. The word 'amendment' occurring in Article 368 must therefore be construed in such a manner as to reserve the power of the Parliament to amend the constitution, but not so as to result in damaging or destroying the structure and identity of the Constitution. There was thus an implied limitation in the amending power which precluded Parliament from abrogating or changing the identity of the Constitution or any of its basic features.

Hegde and Mukherjea, JJ. held that the Constitution of India which is essentially a social rather than a political document, is founded on a social philosophy and as such has two main features: basic and circumstantial. The basic constituent remained constant, the circumstantial was subject to change. According to the learned Judges, the broad contours of the basic elements and the fundamental features of the Constitution are delineated in the preamble and the Parliament has no power to abrogate or emasculate those basic elements or fundamental features. The building of a welfare State, the learned Judges said, is the ultimate goal of every Government but that does not mean that in order to build a welfare state, human freedoms have to suffer a total destruction. Applying these tests, the learned Judges invalidated Article 31C even in its unamended form.

Jaganmohan Reddy, J., held that the word 'amendment' was used in the sense of permitting a change, in contradistinction, to destruction, which the repeal or abrogation brings about. Therefore, the width of the power of amendment could not be enlarged by amending the amending power itself. The learned Judge held that the essential elements of the basic structure of the Constitution are reflected in its preamble and that some of the important features of the Constitution are justice, freedom of expression and equality of status and opportunity. The word 'amendment' could not possibly embrace the right to abrogate the pivotal features and the fundamental freedoms and therefore, that part of the basic structure could not be damaged or destroyed. According to the learned Judge, the provisions of Article 31C. as they stood then, conferring power on Parliament and the State Legislatures to enact laws for giving effect to the principles specified in clauses (b) and (c) of Article 39, altogether abrogated the right given by Article 14 and were for that reason unconstitutional. In conclusion, the learned Judge held that though the power of amendment was wide. it did not comprehend the power to totally abrogate or emasculate or damage any of the fundamental rights or the essential elements on the basic structure of the Constitution or to destroy the identity of the Constitution. Subject to these limitations, Parliament had the right to amend any and every provision of the Constitution.

Khanna, J. broadly agreed with the aforesaid views of the six learned Judges and held that the word 'amendment' postulated that the Constitution must survive without loss of its identity, which meant that the basic structure or framework of the Constitution must survive any amendment of the Constitution. According to the learned Judge. although it was permissible to the Parliament, in exercise of its amending power, to effect changes so as to meet the requirements of changing conditions it was not permissible to touch the foundation or to alter the basic institutional pattern. Therefore, the words "amendment of the Constitution", in spite of the width of their sweep and in spite of their amplitude, could not have the effect of empowering the Parliament to destroy or abrogate the basic structure or framework of the Constitution.

The question which we have to determine on the basis of the majority view in Keshavaananda Bharati (Supra) is whether the amendments introduced by sections 4 and 55 of the Constitution (42nd Amendment) Act, 1976 damage the basic structure of the Constitution by destroying any of its basic features or essential elements.

Section 4 of the 42nd Amendment, which was brought into force with effect from January 3, 1977 amended Article 31C of the Constitution by substituting the words and figures "all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV" for the Words and figures "the principles specified in clause (b) or clause (c) of Article 39". Article 31C. as amended by the 42nd Amendment Act reads thus:

> "31C. Notwithstanding anything contained in article 13. no law giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by article 14, A article 19 or article 31; and no law containing a declaration that it is for giving effect to such policy shall be called in question in any court on the ground that it does not give effect to such policy:

Provided that where such law is made by the Legislature of a State, the provisions of this article shall not apply thereto unless such law, having been reserved for the consideration of the President, has received his assent."

Section 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976, which was also brought into force with effect from January 3, 1977 inserted sub-sections (4) and (5) in Article 368 which read thus:

"(4) No amendment of this Constitution (including the provisions of Part III) made or purporting to have been made under this article (whether before or after the commencement of section 55 of the Constitution (Forty-second Amendment) Act, 1976) shall be called in question in any court on any ground.

(5) For the removal of doubts, it is hereby declared that there shall be no limitation whatever on the constituent power - of Parliament to amend by way of addition, variation or repeal the provisions of this Constitution under this article".

We will first take up for consideration the comparatively easier question as regards the validity of the amendments made by section 55 of the 42nd Amendment. It introduces two new clauses in Article 368, namely, clauses 4 and S. Clause S speaks for itself and is self explanatory. Its avowed purpose is the "removal of doubts" but after the decision of this Court in Kesavananda Bharati (Supra), there could be no doubt as regards the existence of limitations on the Parliament's power to amend the Constitution. In the context of the constitutional history of Article 368, the true object of the declaration contained in Article 368 is the removal of those limitations. Clause S confers upon the Parliament a vast and undefined power to amend the Constitution, even, so as to distort it out of recognition. The theme song of the majority decision in Kesavananda Bharati (Supra) is: 'Amend as you may even the solemn document which the founding fathers have committed to your care, for you know best the needs of your generation. But, the Constitution is a precious heritage; therefore, you cannot destroy its identity'. The majority conceded to the Parliament the right to make alterations in the Constitution so long as they are within its basic framework. And what fears can that judgment raise or misgivings generate if it only means this and no more: The Preamble assures to the people of India a polity whose basic structure is described therein as a Sovereign Democratic Republic; Parliament may make any amendments to the Constitution as it deems expedient so long as they do not damage or destroy India's sovereignty and its democratic, republican character. Democracy is not an empty dream. It is a meaningful concept whose essential attributes are recited in the preamble itself: Justice, social, economic and political; Liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship, and Equality of status and opportunity. Its aim, again as set out in the preamble, is to promote among the people an abiding sense of 'Fraternity assuring the dignity of the individual and the unity of the Nation'. The newly introduced clause S of Article 368 demolishes the very pillars on which the preamble rests by empowering the Parliament to exercise its constituent power without any "limitation whatever". No constituent power can conceivably go higher than the sky- high power conferred by clause (S), for it even empowers the Parliament to "repeal the provisions of this Constitution", that is to say, to abrogate the democracy and substitute for it a totally antithetical form of Government. That can most effectively be achieved, without calling a democracy by any other name, by a total denial of social, economic and political justice to the people, by emasculating liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship and by abjuring commitment to the magnificent ideal of a society of equals. The power to destroy is not a power to amend.

Since the Constitution had conferred a limited amending power on the Parliament, the Parliament cannot under the exercise of that limited power enlarge that very power into an absolute power. Indeed, a limited amending power is one of the basic features of our Constitution and therefore, the limitations on that power cannot be destroyed. In other words, Parliament cannot, under Article 368, expand its amending power so as to acquire for itself the right to repeal or abrogate the Constitution or to destroy its basic and essential features. The donee of a limited power cannot by the exercise of that power convert the limited power into an unlimited one.

The very 42nd Amendment which introduced clauses 4 and 5 in Article 368 made amendments to the preamble to which no exception can be taken. Those amendments are not only within the framework of the Constitution but they give vitality to its philosophy, they afford strength and succor to its foundation. By the aforesaid amendments, what was originally described as a 'Sovereign Democratic Republic' became a "Sovereign Socialist Secular Democratic Republic" and the resolution to promote the `unity of the Nation' was elevated into a promise to promote the "unity and integrity of the Nation". These amendments furnish the most eloquent example of how the amending power can be exercised consistently with the creed of the Constitution. They offer promise of more, they do not scuttle a precious heritage.

In Smt. Indira Nehru Gandhi v. Raj Narain, Khanna, J. struck down clause 4 of Article 329A of the Constitution which abolished the forum for adjudicating upon a dispute relating to the validity of an election, on the ground that the particular Article which was introduced by a constitutional amendment violated the principle of free and fair elections which is an essential postulate of democracy and which, in its turn, is a part of the basic structure of the Constitution. Mathew, J. also struck down the Article on the ground that it damaged the essential feature of democracy. One of us. Chandrachud. J. reached the same conclusion by holding that the provisions of the Article were an outright negation of the right of equality conferred by Article 14, a right which, more than any other, is a basic postulate of the Constitution. Thus whereas amendments made to the preamble by the 42nd Amendment itself afford an illustration of the scope of the amending power, the case last referred to affords an illustration of the limitations on the amending power.

Since, for the reasons above mentioned, clause 5 of Article 368 , transgresses the limitations on the amending power, it must be held to be unconstitutional.

The newly introduced clause 4 of Article 368 must suffer the same fate as clause 5 because the two clauses are inter-linked. Clause 5 purports to remove all limitations on the amending power while clause 4 deprives the courts of their power to call in question any amendment of the Constitution. Our Constitution is founded on a nice balance of power among the three wings of the State, namely the Executive, the Legislature and the Judiciary. It is the function of the Judges, nay their duty, to pronounce upon the validity of laws. If courts are totally deprived of that power, the fundamental rights conferred upon the people will become a mere adornment because rights without remedies are as writ in water. A controlled Constitution will then become uncontrolled. Clause (4) of Article 368 totally deprives the citizens of one of the most valuable modes of redress which is guaranteed by Article 32. The conferment of the right to destroy the identity of the Constitution coupled with the provision that no court of law shall pronounce upon the validity of such destruction seems to us a transparent case of transgression of the limitations on the amending power.

If a constitutional amendment cannot be pronounced to be invalid even if it destroys the basic structure of the Constitution, a law passed in pursuance of such an amendment will be beyond the pale of judicial review because it will receive the protection of the constitutional amendment which the courts will be powerless to strike down. Article 13 of the Constitution will then become a dead letter because even ordinary laws will escape the scrutiny of the courts on the ground that they are passed on the strength of a constitutional amendment which is not open to challenge.

Clause 4 of Article 368 is in one sense an appendage of Clause 5, though we do not like to describe it as a logical consequence of Clause 5. If it be true, as stated in clause 5, that the Parliament has unlimited power to amend the Constitution, courts can have no jurisdiction to strike down any constitutional amendment as unconstitutional. Clause 4, therefore, says nothing more or less than what clause 5 postulates. If clause 5 is beyond the amending power of the Parliament, clause 4 must be equally beyond that power and must be struck down as such.

The next question which we have to consider is whether the amendment made by section 4 of the 42nd Amendment to Article 31C of the Constitution is valid. Mr. Palkhiwala did not challenge the validity of the unamended Article 31C, and indeed that would not be done. The unamended Article 31C forms the subject matter of separate proceeding and we have indicated therein that it is constitutionally valid to the extent to which it was upheld in Keshvananda Bharati (Supra).

By the amendment introduced by section 4 of the 42nd Amendment, provision is made in Article 31C saying that no law giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing "all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV" > shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with or takes away or a bridges any of the rights conferred by Article 14, Article 19 or Article 31. It is manifest that the scope of laws which fall within Article 31C has been expanded vastly by the amendment. Whereas under > the original Article 31C, the challenge was excluded only in respect of laws giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing "the principles specified in clause (b) or clause (c) of Article 39" under the amendment.

> all laws giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing "all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV" are saved from a constitutional challenge under Articles 14 and 19. (The reference to Article 31 was deleted by the 44th Amendment as a consequence of the abolition of the right to property as a fundamental right). The question for consideration in the light of this position is whether section 4 of the 42nd Amendment has brought about a result which is basically and fundamentally different from the one arising under the unamended article. If the amendment does not bring about any such result, its validity shall have to be upheld for the same reasons for which the validity of the unamended article was upheld.

The main controversy in these petitions centres round the question whether the directive principles of State policy contained in Art IV can have primacy over the fundamental rights conferred by Part III of the Constitution. That is the heart of the matter. Every other consideration and all other contentions are in the nature of by-products of that central theme of the case. The competing claims of parts III and IV constitute the pivotal point of the case because, Article 31C as amended by section 4 of the 42nd Amendment provides in terms that a law giving effect to any directive principle cannot be challenged as void on the ground that it violates the rights conferred by Article 14 or Article 19. The 42nd Amendment by its section 4 thus subordinates the fundamental rights conferred by Articles 14 and 19 to the directive principles.

The question of questions is whether in view of the majority decision in Kesavananda Bharati it is permissible to the Parliament to so amend the Constitution as to give a position of precedence to directive principles over the fundamental rights. The answer to this question must necessarily depend upon whether Articles 14 and 19 which must now give way to laws passed in order to effectuate the policy of the State towards securing all or any of the principles of directive Policy are essential features of the basic structure of the Constitution. It is only if the rights conferred by these two articles are not a part of the basic structure of the Constitution that they can be allowed to be abrogated by a constitutional amendment. If they are a part of the basic structure they cannot be obliterated out of existence in relation to a category of laws described in Article 31C or, for the matter of that, in relation to laws of any description whatsoever, passed in order to achieve any object or policy whatsoever. This will serve to bring out the point that a total emasculation of the essential features of the Constitution is, by the ratio in Kesavananda Bharati, not permissible to the Parliament.

There is no doubt that though the courts have always attached very great importance to the preservation of human liberties, no less importance has been attached to some of the Directive Principles of State Policy enunciated in Part IV. In the words of Granville Austin,. (The Indian Constitution: Corner Stone of a Nation, p. 50) the Indian Constitution is first and foremost a social document and the majority of its provisions are aimed at furthering the goals of social revolution by establishing the conditions necessary for its achievement. Therefore the importance of Directive Principles in the scheme of our Constitution cannot ever be over-emphasized. Those principles project the high ideal which the Constitution aims to achieve. In fact Directive Principles of State policy are fundamental in the governance of the country and the Attorney General is right that there is no sphere of public life where delay can defeat justice with more telling effect than the one in which the common man seeks the realisation of his aspirations. The promise of a better to-morrow must be fulfilled to-day; day after to-morrow it runs the risk of being conveniently forgotten. Indeed so many tomorrows have come and gone without a leaf turning that today there is a lurking danger that people will work out their destiny through the compelled cult of their own "dirty hands". Words bandied about in marbled halls say much but fail to achieve as much.

But there is another competing constitutional interest which occupies an equally important place in that scheme. That interest is reflected in the provisions of Part III which confer fundamental rights some on citizens as Articles 15, 16 and 19 do and some on. all persons alike as Articles 14, 20, 21 and 22 do. As Granville Austin says: "The core of the commitment to the social revolution lies in Parts III and IV.. These are the conscience of the Constitution.

It is needless to cite decisions which have extolled and upheld the personal freedoms their majesty, and in certain circumstances, their inviolability. It may however be profitable to see how the American Supreme Court, dealing with a broadly comparable Constitution, has approached the claim for those freedoms.

The history of India's struggle for independence and the debates of the Constituent Assembly show how deeply our people value their personal liberties and how those liberties are regarded as an indispensable and integral part of our Constitution. It is significant that though Parts III and IV appear in the Constitution as two distinct fasciculus of articles, the leaders of our independence movement drew no distinction between the two kinds of State's obligations- negative and positive. "Both types of rights had developed as a common demand, products of the national and social revolutions, of their almost inseparable intertwining, and of the character of Indian politics - itself(4)". The demand for inalienable rights traces its origin in India to the 19th Century and flowered into the formation of the Indian National Congress in 1885. Indians demanded equality with their British rulers on the theory that the rights of the subjects cannot in a democracy be inferior to those of the rulers. Out of that demand grew the plants of equality and free speech. Those and other basic rights found their expression in Article 16 of The Constitution of India Bill, 1895. A series of Congress resolutions reiterated that demand between 1917 and 1919. The emergence of Mahatma Gandhi; on the political scene gave to the freedom movement a new dimension: it ceased to be merely anti-British it became a movement for the acquisition of rights of liberty for the Indian Community. Mrs. Besan't Commonwealth of India Bill, 1925 and the Madras Congress resolution of 1928 provided a striking continuity for that movement. The Motilal Nehru Committee appointed by the. Madras Congress resolution said at pp. 89-90:

> "It is obvious that our first care should be to have our Fundamental Rights guaranteed in a manner which will not permit their withdrawal under any circumstances.. Another reason why great importance attaches to a Declaration of Rights is the unfortunate existence of communal differences in the country. Certain safeguards are necessary to create and establish a sense of security among those who look upon each other with distrust and suspicion. We could not better secure the full enjoyment of religious and communal rights to all communities than by including them among the basic principles of the Constitution."

India represents a mosaic of humanity consisting of diverse religious linguistic and caste groups. The rationale behind the insistence on fundamental rights has not yet lost its relevance, alas or not, The Congress session of Karachi adopted in 1931 the Resolution on Fundamental Rights as well as on Economic and Social change. The Sapru Report of 1945 said that the fundamental rights should serve as a "standing warning" to all concerned that:

> "what the Constitution demands and expects is perfect equality between one section of the Community and another in the matter of political and civic rights, equality of liberty and security in the enjoyment of the freedom of religion, worship and the pursuit of the ordinary applications of life". (p. 260).

The Indian nation marched to freedom in this background. The Constituent Assembly resolved to enshrine the fundamental rights in the written text of the Constitution. The interlinked goals of personal liberty and economic freedom then came to be incorporated in two separate parts, nevertheless parts of an integral, indivisible scheme which was carefully and thoughtfully nursed over half a century. The seeds sown in the 19th Century saw their fruition in 1950 under the leadership of Jawaharlal Nehru and Dr. Ambedkar. To destroy the guarantees given by Part III in order purportedly to achieve the goals of Part IV is plainly to subvert the Constitution by destroying its basic structure.

Fundamental rights occupy a unique place in the lives of civilized societies and have been variously described in our Judgments as "transcendental", "inalienable" and "primordial". For us, it has been said in Kesavananda Bharti (p. 991), they constitute the ark of the constitution.

The significance of the perception that Parts III and IV together constitute the core of commitment to social revolution and they, together, are the conscience of the Constitution is to be traced to a deep understanding of the scheme of the Indian Constitution. Granville Austin's observation brings out the true position that Parts III and IV are like two wheels of a chariot, one no less important than the other. You snap one and the other will lose its efficacy. They are like a twin formula for achieving the social revolution, which is the ideal which the visionary founders of the Constitution set before themselves. In other words, the Indian Constitution is founded on the bed-rock of the balance between Parts III and IV. To give absolute primacy to one over the other is to disturb the harmony of the Constitution. This harmony and balance between fundamental rights and directive principles is an essential feature of the basic structure of the Constitution.

This is not mere semantics. The edifice of our Constitution is built upon the concepts crystallised in the Preamble. We resolved to constitute ourselves into a Socialist State which carried with it the obligation to secure to our people justice-social, economic and political. We, therefore, put part IV into our Constitution containing directive principles of State policy which specify the socialistic goal to be achieved. We promised to our people a democratic polity which carries with it the obligation of securing to the people liberty of thought, expression, belief, faith and worship; equality of status and of opportunity and the assurance that the dignity of the individual will at all costs be preserved. We, therefore, put Part III in our Constitution conferring those rights on the people. Those rights are not an end in themselves but are the means to an end. The end is specified in Part IV. Therefore, the rights conferred by Art III are subject to reasonable restrictions and the Constitution provides that enforcement of some of them may, in stated uncommon circumstances, be suspended. But just as the rights conferred by Part III would be without a radar and a compass if they were not geared to an ideal, in the same manner the attainment of the ideals set out in Part IV would become a pretence for tyranny if the price to be paid for achieving that ideal is human freedoms. One of the faiths of our founding fathers was the purity of means. Indeed, under our law, even a dacoit who has committed a murder cannot be put to death in the exercise of right of self-defence after he has made good his escape. So great is the insistence of civilised laws on the purity of means. The goals set out in Part IV have, therefore, to be achieved without the abrogation of the means provided for by Part III. It is in this sense that Parts III and IV together constitute the core of our Constitution and combine to form its conscience. Anything that destroys the balance between the two parts will ipso facto destroy an essential element of the basic structure of our Constitution.

It is in this light that the validity of the. amended Article 31C has to be examined. Article 13(2) says that the State shall not make any law which takes away or abridges the rights conferred by Part Ill and any law made in contravention of that clause shall to the extent of the contravention be void. Article 31C begins with a non- obstante clause by putting Article 13 out of harm's way. It provides for a certain consequence notwithstanding anything contained in Article 13. It then denudes Articles 14 and 19 of their functional utility by providing that the rights conferred by these Articles will be no barrier against passing laws for giving effect to the principles laid down in Part IV. On any reasonable interpretation, there can be no doubt that by the amendment introduced by section 4 of the 42nd Amendment, Articles 14 and 19 stand abrogated at least in regard to the category of laws described in Article 31C. The startling consequence which the amendment has produced is that even if a law is in total defiance of the mandate of Article 13 read with Articles 14 and 19, its validity will not be open to question so long as its object is to secure a directive principle of state Policy. We are disposed to accept, the submission of the learned Solicitor General, considering the two charts of cases submitted by him, that it is possible to conceive of laws which will not attract Article 31C since they may not bear direct and reasonable nexus with the provisions of Part IV. But, that, in our opinion, is beside the point. A large majority of laws, the bulk of them, can at any rate be easily justified as having been passed for the purpose of giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing some principle or the other laid down in Part IV. In respect of all such laws, which will cover an extensive gamut of the relevant legislative activity, the protection of Articles 15 and 19 will stand wholly withdrawn. It is then no answer to say, while determining whether the basic structure of the Constitution is altered, that at least. some laws will fall outside the scope of Article 31C.

We have to decide the matter before us not by metaphysical subtlety, nor as a matter of semantics, but by a broad and liberal approach. We must not miss the wood for the trees. A total deprivation of fundamental rights, even in a limited area, can amount to abrogation of a fundamental right just as partial deprivation in every area can. An author, who writes exclusively on foreign matters, shall have been totally deprived of the right of free speech and expression if he is prohibited from writing on foreign matters. The fact therefore that some laws may fall. Outside the scope of Article 31C is no answer to the contention that the withdrawal of protection of Articles 14 and 19 from a large number of laws destroys the basic structure of the Constitution.

It was repeatedly impressed upon us, especially by the Attorney General, that Article 38 of the Constitution is the king-pin of the directive principles and no law passed in order to give effect to the principle contained therein can ever damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution. That Article provides that the State shall strive to promote the welfare of the people by securing and protecting as effectively as it may a social order in which justice, social, economic and political, shall inform all the institutions of the national life. We are unable to agree that all the directive Principles of State Policy contained in part IV eventually verge upon Article 38. Article 38 undoubtedly contains a broad guideline, but the other directive principles are not mere illustrations of the principle contained in Article 38. Secondly, if it be true that no law passed for the purpose of giving effect to the directive principle contained in Article 38 can damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution, what was the necessity, and more so the justification. for providing by a constitutional amendment that no law which is passed for giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing any principle laid down in Part IV shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with or takes away or abridges the rights conferred by Articles 14 and 19 ? The object and purpose of the amendment of Article 31C is really to save laws which cannot be saved under Article 19(2) to (6). Laws which fall under those provisions are in the nature of reasonable restrictions on the fundamental rights in public interest and therefore they abridge but do not abrogate the fundamental rights It was in order to deal with laws which do not get the protection of Article 19(2) to (6) that Article 31 was amended to say that the provisions of Article 19, inter alia, cannot be invoked for voiding the laws of the description mentioned in Article 31C.

Articles 14 and 19 do not confer any fanciful rights. They confer rights which are elementary for the proper and effective functioning of a democracy. They are universally so regarded, as is evident from the universal Declaration of Human Rights. Many countries in the civilised world have parted with their sovereignty in the hope and belief that their citizens will enjoy human freedoms. And they preferred to be bound by the decisions and decrees of foreign tribunals on matters concerning human freedoms. If Articles 14 and 19 are put out of operation in regard to the bulk of laws which the legislatures are empowered to pass, Article 32 will be drained of its life-blood. Article 32(4) provides that the right guaranteed by Article 32 shall not be suspended except as otherwise provided for by the Constitution. Section 4 of the 42nd Amendment found an easy way to circumvent Article 32(4) by withdrawing totally the protection of Articles 14 and 19 in respect of a large category of laws, so that there will be no violation to complain of in regard to which redress can be sought under Article 32. The power to take away the protection of Article 14 is the power to discriminate without a valid basis for classification. By a long series of decisions this Court had held that Article 14 forbids class legislation but it does not forbid classification. The purpose of withdrawing the protection of Article 14, therefore, can only be to acquire the power to enact class legislation. Then again, regional chauvinism will have a field day if Article 19(1)(d) is not available to the citizens. Already, there are disturbing trends on a part of the Indian horizon. Those trends will receive strength and encouragement if laws can be passed with immunity, preventing the citizens from exercising their right to move freely throughout the territory of India. The nature and quality of the amendment introduced by section 4 of the 42nd Amendment is therefore such that it virtually tears away the heart of basic fundamental freedoms.

Article 31C speaks of laws giving effect to the policy of the "State". Article 12 which governs the interpretation of Article 3 LC provides that the word "State" in Part III includes the Government and Parliament of India and the Government and the Legislature of each of the States and all local or other authorities within the territory of India or under the control of the Government of India. Wide as the language of Article 31C is, the definition of the word "State" in Article 12 gives to Article 31C an operation of the widest amplitude. Even if a State Legislature passes a law for the purpose of giving effect to the policy by a local authority towards securing a directive principle, the law will enjoy immunity from the provisions of Articles 14 and 19. The State Legislatures are thus given an almost unfettered discretion to deprive the people of their civil liberties.

The learned Attorney General argues that the State is under an obligation to take steps for promoting the welfare of the people by bringing about a social order in which social, economic and political justice shall inform all the institutions of the national life. He says that the deprivation of some of the fundamental rights for the purpose of achieving this goal cannot possibly amount to a destruction of the basic structure of the Constitution. We are unable to accept this contention. The principles enunciated in Part IV are not the proclaimed monopoly of democracies alone. They are common to all polities, democratic or authoritarian. Every State is goal-oriented and claims to strive for securing the welfare of its people. The distinction between the different forms of Government consists in that a real democracy will endeavour to achieve its objectives through the discipline of fundamental freedoms like those conferred by Articles 14 and 19. Those are the most elementary freedoms without which a free democracy is impossible and which must therefore be preserved at all Costs. Besides, as observed by Brandies, J., the need to protect liberty is the greatest when Government's purposes are beneficent. If the discipline of Article 14 is withdrawn and if immunity from the operation of that article is conferred, not only on laws passed by the Parliament but on laws passed by the State Legislatures also, the political pressures exercised by numerically large groups can tear the country asunder by leaving it to the legislature to pick and choose favoured areas and favourite classes for preferential treatment.

The learned Attorney General and the learned Solicitor General strongly impressed upon us that Article 31C should be read down so as to save it from the challenge of unconstitutionality. It was urged that it would be legitimate to read into that Article the intendment that only such laws would be immunised from the challenge under Articles 14 and 19 as do not damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution. The principle of reading down the provisions of a law for the purpose of saving it from a constitutional challenge is well-known. But we find it impossible to accept the contention of the learned counsel in this behalf because, to do so will involve a gross distortion of the principle of reading down, depriving that doctrine of its only or true rationale when words of width are used inadvertently. The device of reading down is not to be resorted to in order to save the susceptibilities of the law makers, nor indeed to imagine a law of one's liking to have been passed. One must at least take the Parliament at its word when, especially, it undertakes a constitutional amendment.

Mr. Palkhivala read out to us an extract from the speech of the then Law Minister who, while speaking on the amendment to Article 31 C, said that the amendment was being introduced because the government did not want the "let and hindrance" of the fundamental rights. If the Parliament has manifested a clear intention to exercise an unlimited power, it is impermissible to read down the amplitude of that power so as to make it limited. The principle of reading down cannot be invoked or applied in opposition to the clear intention of the legislature. We suppose that in the history of the constitutional law, no constitutional amendment has ever been read down to mean the exact opposite of what it says and intends. In fact, to accept the argument that we should read down Article 31C, so as to make it conform to the ratio of the majority decision in Kesavanda Bharti, is to destroy the avowed purposes of Article 31C as indicated by the very heading "Saving of certain laws" under which Articles 31A, 31B and 31C are grouped. Since the amendment to Article 31C was unquestionably made with a view to empowering the legislatures to pass laws of a particular description even if those laws violate the discipline of Articles 14 and 19, it seems to us impossible to hold that we should still save Article 31C from the challenge of unconstitutionality by reading into that Article words which destroy the rationale of that Article and an intendment which is plainly contrary to its proclaimed purpose.

A part of the same argument was pressed upon us by the learned Additional Solicitor General who contended that it would still be open to the Courts under Article 31C to decide four questions: (1) Does the law secure any of the directive principles of the State policy? (ii) Is it necessary to encroach upon fundamental rights in order to secure the object of the directive principles? (iii) what is the extent of such encroachment, if any? and (iv) Does that encroachment violate the basic structure of the Constitution?

This argument is open to the same criticism to which the argument of the learned Attorney General is open and which we have just disposed of. Reading the existence of an extensive judicial review into Article 31C is really to permit the distortion of the very purpose of that article. It provides expressly that no law of a particular description shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it violate Article 14 or Article 19. It would be sheer adventurism of a most extraordinary nature to undertake the kind of judicial enquiry which, according to the learned Additional Solicitor General, the courts are free to undertake.

We must also mention, what is perhaps not fully realised, that Article 31C speaks of laws giving effect to the "Policy of the State", "towards securing all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV."' In the very nature of things it is difficult for a court to determine whether a particular law gives effect to a particular policy. Whether a law is adequate enough to give effect to the policy of the State towards securing a directives principle is always a debatable question and the courts cannot set aside the law as invalid merely because, in their opinion, the law is not adequate enough to give effect to a certain policy. In fact, though the clear intendment of Article 31C is to shut out all judicial review, the argument of the learned Additional Solicitor General calls for a doubly or trebly extensive judicial review than is even normally permissible to the courts. Be it be remembered that the power to enquire into the question whether there is a direct and B. reasonable nexus between the provisions of a law and a directive principle cannot confer upon the courts the power to sit in judgment over the policy itself of the State. At the highest, courts can, under Article 31C, satisfy themselves as to the identity of the law in the sense whether it bears direct and reasonable nexus with a directive principle. If the court is satisfied as to the existence of such nexus, the inevitable consequence provided for by Article 31C must follow. Indeed, if there is one topic on which all the 13 Judges in Kesavananda Bharati were agreed, it is this: that the only question open to judicial review under the unamended Article 31 was whether there is a direct and reasonable nexus between the impugned law and the provisions of Article 39(b) and (c). Reasonableness is evidently regarding the nexus and not regarding the law. It is therefore impossible to accept the contention that it is open to the courts to undertake the kind of enquiry suggested by the Additional Solicitor General. The attempt therefore to drape Article 31C into a democratic outfit under which an extensive judicial review would be permissible must fail.

We should have mentioned that a similar argument was advanced in regard to the amendment effected by section 55 of the 42nd Amendment to Article 368, by the addition of clauses (4) and (5) therein. It was urged that we should so construe the word "amendment" in clause (4) and the word "amend" in clause 5 as to comprehend only such amendments as do not destroy the basic structure of thy Constitution. That argument provides a striking illustration of the limitations of the doctrine of reading down. The avowed purpose. Of clauses (4) and (5) of Article 368 is to confer power upon the Parliament to amend the Constitution without any "limitation whatever". Provisions of this nature cannot be saved by reading into them words and intendment of a diametrically opposite meaning and content.

The learned Attorney General then contends that Article 31C should be upheld for the same reasons for which Article 31A(1) was upheld. Article 31A (1) was considered as a contemporaneous practical exposition of the Constitution since it was inserted by the very First Amendment which was passed in 1951 by the same body of persons who were members of the Constituent Assembly. We can understand:

> that Article 31A can be looked upon as a contemporaneous Practical exposition of the intendment of the Constitution, but the same cannot be said of Article 31C. Besides, there is a significant qualitative difference between the two Articles. Article 31A, the validity of which has been recognised over the years excludes the challenge under Articles 14 and 19 in regard to a specified category of laws. If by a constitutional amendment, the application of Articles 14 and 19 is withdrawn from a defined field of legislative activity, which is reasonably in public interest, the basic framework of the constitution may remain unimpaired. But if the protection of those articles is withdrawn in respect of an uncatalogued variety of laws, fundamental freedoms will become a 'parchment in a glass case' to be viewed as a matter of historical curiosity.
> An attempt was made to equate the provisions of Article 31 with those of Article 31A in order to lend plausibility to the contention that since Article 31A was also upheld on the ground of stare decisis Article 31 can be upheld on the same ground. We see no merit in this contention. In the first place, as we have indicated above. the five matters which are specified in Article 31A are of such quality, nature, content and character that at least a debate can reasonably arise whether abrogation of fundamental rights in respect of those matters will damage or destroy the basic structure of the Constitution. Article 31C does not deal with specific subjects. The directive principles are couched in broad and general terms for the simple reason that they specify the goals to be achieved. Secondly, the principle of stare decisis cannot be treated as a fruitful source of perpetuating curtailment of human freedoms. No court has upheld the validity of Article 31A on the ground that it does not violate the basic structure of the Constitution.

There is no decision on the validity of Article 31A which can be looked upon as a measuring rod of the extent of the amending power. To hark back to Article 31A every time that a new constitutional amendment is challenged is the surest means of ensuring a drastic erosion of the fundamental rights conferred by Part III. Such a process will insidiously undermine the efficacy of the ratio of the majority judgment in Kesavananda Bharati regarding the inviolability of the basic structure. That ratio requires that the validity of each new constitutional amendment must be judged on its own merits.

Nor indeed are we impressed by a limb of the same argument that when Article 31A was upheld on the ground of stare decisis, what was upheld was a constitutional device by which a class of subject-oriented laws was considered to be valid. The simple ground on which Article 31A was upheld, apart from the ground of contemporaneous practical exposition, was that its validity was accepted and recognised over the years and, therefore, it was not permissible to challenge its constitutionality. The principle of stare decisis does not imply the approval of the device or mechanism which is employed for the purpose of framing a legal or constitutional provision.

It was finally urged by the learned Attorney General that if we uphold the challenge to the validity of Article 31C, the validity or clauses (2) to (6) of Article 19 will be gravely imperilled because those clauses will also then be liable to be struck down as abrogating the rights conferred by Article 19(1) which are an essential feature or the Constitution. We are unable to accept this contention. Under clauses (2) to (6) of Article 19, restrictions can be imposed only if they are reasonable and then again, they can be imposed in the interest of a stated class of subjects only. It is for the courts to decide whether restrictions are reasonable and whether they are in the interest of the particular subject. Apart from other basic dissimilarities, Article 31C takes away the power of judicial review to an extent which destroys even the semblance of a comparison between its provisions and those of clauses (2) to (6) of Article 19. Human ingenuity, limitless though it may be, has yet not devised a system by which the liberty of the people can be protected except through the intervention of courts of law.

Three Articles of our Constitution, and only three, stand between the heaven of freedom into which Tagore wanted his country to awake and the abyss of unrestrained power. They are Articles 14, 19 and 21. Article 31C has removed two sides of that golden triangle which affords to the people of this country an assurance that the promise held forth by the preamble will be performed by ushering an egalitarian era through the discipline of fundamental rights, that is. without emasculation of the rights to liberty and equality which alone can help preserve the dignity of the individual.

These then are our reasons for the order which we passed on May 9, 1980 to the following effect:

> "Section 4 of the Constitution 42nd Amendment Act is beyond the amending power of the Parliament and is void since it damages the basic or essential features of the Constitution and destroys its basic structure by a total exclusion of challenge to any law on the ground that it is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by Article 14 or Article 19 of the Constitution, if the law is for giving effect to the policy of the State towards securing all or any of the principles laid down in Part IV of the Constitution."
> "Section 55 of the Constitution 42nd Amendment Act is beyond the amending power of the Parliament and is void since it removes all limitations on the power of the Parliament to amend the Constitution and confers power upon it to amend the Constitution so as to damage or destroy its basic or essential features or its basic structure."

There will be no order as to costs.

Courts have sometimes exercised restraint when faced with a claim that an amendment is unconstitutional. In these cases, they have chosen not to invalidate constitutional amendments on the basis of unwritten rules. In Belize, for example, the Court of Appeal has rejected claims that the basic structure doctrine applies in the country. (The Court of Appeal is the highest domestic court in the land.)

In 2015, the Court of Appeal overturned a ruling from the lower court, which had applied the basic structure doctrine to invalidate sections 15 and 16 of the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of Belize. The amendment provided that an appointment of a Justice of Appeal would run for one year, with the office become vacant thereafter, where no period is specified in the instrument of appointment. The lower court invalided sections 15 and 16 of the Sixth Amendment on three grounds: (1) they violate section 102 of the Constitution, guaranteeing security of tenure for Justices of Appeal; (2) they violate section 6(7) of the Constitution which requires that the court shall be independent and impartial; and (3) they violate the rule of law, part of the unwritten basic structure of the Constitution of Belize.

Here is the Court of Appeal's reasoning for overruling the lower court.

Court of Appeal of Belize, The Attorney General of Belize v. The Bar Association of Belize, Civil Appeal No. 19 of 2013 (2015)

The law before and after

The Original section 101 (1) and 102(1) of the Belize Constitution Act, Chapter 4

[13] The original sections state:

"101 (1) The Justices of Appeal shall be appointed by the Governor-General, acting in accordance with the advice of the Prime Minister given after consultation with the Leader of the Opposition, for such period as may be specified in the instrument of appointment.

102 (1) Subject to the following provisions of this section, the office of a Justice of Appeal shall become vacant upon the expiration of the period of his appointment to that office or if he resigns his office."

Sections 15 and 16 of the Belize Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act 2008

[14] The Sixth Amendment added provisos to sections 101(1) and 102(1). Section 15 addressed section 101(1) and section 16 addressed section 102 (1). The provisos are as follows:

Section 101 (1) proviso

"Provided that where no period is specified in an instrument of appointment, such appointment shall be deemed to subsist until-

(a) In the case of an instrument of appointment existing at the date of commencement of the Belize Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act, 2008 - one year after such commencement;

(b) In the case of an instrument of appointment issued after the commencement of the Belize Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act, 2008 - one year after the date of issue of such instrument."

Section 102(1) proviso

"Provided that where no period is specified in an instrument of appointment, the office of a Justice of Appeal shall become vacant upon the expiry of the period specified in the proviso to subsection (1) of section 101."

The grounds upon which the Sixth Amendment was challenged before the trial judge

[15] As shown by the Claim Form, the Sixth Amendment was challenged on ten grounds as follows:

"1. By the Act the Legislature has sought to remove two sitting Justices of the Court of Appeal in a manner contrary to the provisions of the Constitution;

2. By the Act, the Legislature has undermined the security of tenure enjoyed by two sitting Justices of the Court of Appeal, being two out of the four justices of appeal, thereby removing the independence of the Court of Appeal which is an essential prerequisite for the existence of the Rule of Law;

3. The effect of the Act is to remove two sitting justices from the Court of Appeal and to accord to the Executive the power to decide whether the two sitting Justices of Appeal will be re-appointed as judges thereby violating the Doctrine of the Separation of Powers which is the foundation of the Belize Constitution;

4. The effect of the Act is that the Legislature has effectively taken away the right, duty and jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal to hear and determine appeals pursuant to section 100 of the Belize Constitution independently and impartially; and thereby unconstitutionally changes the basic structure of the Belize Constitution;

5. The effect of the Act is that the two Justices of Appeal, for so long as they continue to sit, will be incapable of appearing to be fair and impartial and true to their solemn oath of office;

6. The Act is directed at and applies only to two Justices of the Court of Appeal, it therefore ad hominen and contrary to the Rule of Law and unconstitutional;

7. The result of the Act is to operate in order to abolish the office of two Justices of the Court of Appeal contrary to section 101 of the Belize Constitution;

8. To the extent that the Act is likely to deprive and/or deprives the Applicant and other litigants of the right to independent and impartial hearings before the Court of Appeal it is anti-democratic and therefore contrary to the fundamental principles, beliefs and needs enshrined in the Preamble and section 1 of the Belize Constitution;

9. To the extent that the Act by implication seeks to afford security of tenure to two Justices of the Court of Appeal which said security of tenure is denied to the two other Justices of the Court of Appeal, the Act is discriminatory in itself and/or in its effect;

10. To the extent that the Legislature has arrogated unto itself the power to remove two Justices from the Court of Appeal, the Act violates section 102(7) of the Constitution and thereby violates the Doctrine of the Separation of Powers which is the foundation of the Belize Constitution.

The Order made by Legall J

[16] The applicant succeeded on most of the grounds as shown by the three declarations granted by Legall J. The following order was made:

"1. A declaration is granted that sections 15 and 16 of the Belize Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act 2008, No. 13 of 2008 are unconstitutional, null and void on the ground that the said sections are contrary to the provisions of section 102 of the Constitution conferring security of tenure on Justices of Appeal.

2. A declaration is granted that sections 15 and 16 of the Belize Constitution (Sixth Amendment) Act 2008, No 13 of 2008 are unconstitutional, null and void on the ground that the said sections 15 and 16 are contrary to section 6(7) of the Constitution which requires that the court shall be independent and impartial.

3. A declaration is granted that sections 15 and 16 are contrary to the Rule of Law, a basic structure of the Constitution of Belize.

4. The parties are to bear their own costs."

Ground 4: Whether one year appointment disfigures judicial edifice

[101] I do not find it necessary to address the differing degrees of security of tenure enjoyed by Magistrates, Justices of the Supreme Court and the Justices of the Court of Appeal (101 as originally worded) since the Association has no quarrel with the security of tenure that they enjoy. The bone of contention is the Sixth Amendment. As shown above, the Amendment is a rule of interpretation, where Justices of Appeal are given Instruments of Appointment without a fixed term. It is not a provision for removal of Justices of the Court of Appeal so it is misconceived to say that the Sixth Amendment which fixes a period of appointment denies the constitutional protections against removal guaranteed by section 102(2) – (7) of the Constitution. I am fortified in my view because Justices of the Court of Appeal could be appointed for periods of one year under section 101(1) as originally worded. I therefore, accept the argument by the appellant that one year terms does not and cannot disfigure the judicial edifice.

Ground 6: Whether it is mandatory that the period of appointment be stated in the Instrument of Appointment

[102] The appellant under this ground submitted that the learned trial judge erred in law in holding that under section 101(1) of the Constitution, 'it is not mandatory that the period of appointment must be stated in the instrument of appointment but that it is the discretion of the persons mentioned in the section to specify the period in the instrument'.

[103] Legall J under the heading of 'Tenure, Independence and Impartiality', and at paragraph 13 construed the word 'may' used under section 101(1). He said:

> "An examination of section 101(1) of the Constitution, in my view, shows that it is not mandatory that the period of appointment must be stated in the instrument of appointment; but it is in the discretion of the persons mentioned in the section to specify the period in the instrument. The section states that the Justice of Appeal shall be appointed for "such period as may be specified in the Instrument of Appointment." (emphasis mine). It does not say such period as is, or shall be, specified in the instrument of appointment. Section 58 of the Interpretation Act, Chapter 1 states that "may shall be construed as permissive and empowering and "shall" imperative. It seems that the appointment could be made for such period as may be specified in the instrument of appointment or otherwise, such as in legislation. But, in my view, the framers of the Constitution could not have intended that the period of appointment could be specified by legislation, such as the amendments, some four years after the date of the instrument of appointment of Mottley P and Morrison JA. The Constitution must have intended that the appointee must know the period of his appointment either at the date of the appointment or reasonably soon thereafter, and certainly not four years after his appointment.

[104] Legall J cannot be faulted for saying the word 'may' is discretionary. However, he recognised that the appointee must know the period of his appointment and has acknowledged that the period of appointment could be specified in legislation. The use of legislation (Sixth Amendment) serves that purpose. The trial judge also said this should not be done four years after the appointment, as was done in the instant case. It was for this reason that Legall J said in paragraph 14 that:

> "The appointment of Mottley P and Morrison JA were not appointments for life, but were appointments that did not, either in the instrument or by legislation, for about four years, specify a period of the appointment. It is unacceptable to say that the amendments sought to rectify the problem, for the simple reason that it could not be the intention of the framers of section 101(1) of the Constitution that the period of appointment could be specified in legislation four years after the instruments of appointment were made. Their appointments therefore maybe considered not in accordance with the intention of section 101 of the Constitution. The claim form in this matter has not expressly requested a ruling on the validity of the appointments of the Justices of Appeal. I make no such ruling….."

[105] The trial judge as shown above, had recognised that an issue could arise as to the validity of an appointment without a period stated in the instrument of appointment or elsewhere. In my view, the four years lapse is no reason not to correct the defect in the instruments whether by legislation or a new instrument. The period of appointment had to be made known to the appointee one way or another despite four years had elapsed. The evidence in this case shows that the period is normally stated in the instrument itself but since this was not done for the two Justices in question, the appellant cannot be faulted for doing so by legislation. The learned trial judge said that it could not be the intention of the framers of section 101(1) of the Constitution that the period of appointment could be specified in legislation four years after the instruments of appointment were made. Certainly, this could not be the intention as on appointment it would be expected that the appointee would be informed of the duration of his appointment. It is precisely the reason why the omission had to be addressed. Therefore, although the word may was used in section 101(1), it was obligatory and not discretionary that the length of period of appointment be specified in the instrument of appointment.

Grounds 7 and 8: The Basic Structure Point

[106] The appellant contended that the basic structure doctrine is not part of the laws of Belize or if it does the trial judge misapplied it to the claim. Legall J granted a declaration that sections 15 and 16 are contrary to the rule of law, a basic structure of the Constitution. At paragraph 26 of the judgment he said:

> "The rule of law has, over the centuries, acquired several meanings; but at its core it means that governmental power must be exercised according to law. A corollary of this is that disputes as to the legality of acts of government are to be decided by judges who are independent of the executive. The root of the Constitution of Belize – the Preamble – states that "the people of Belize … recognize that men and institutions remain free only when freedom is founded upon … the rule of law." The rule of law is a basic feature of the Belize Constitution. The amendments in effect deem the appointment of Mottley P and Morrison JA to subsist for one year and provide that the appointment becomes vacant upon the expiry of the one year. This is inconsistent with the requirement of the rule of law that legality of acts of government are to be decided by judges who are independent and impartial and have security of tenure. This independence and impartially would be illusory, where judges are appointed for such short periods of time. The independence of judges is a part of the rule of law which forms part of the basic structure of the Constitution of Belize. In Supreme Court claims, namely British Caribbean Bank Limited v. AG No. 597 of 2011; Dean Boyce v. AG No. 646 of 2011, the court considered the basic structure doctrine in some detail. I may however be permitted to mention briefly that the basic structure doctrine holds that the fundamental principles of the Preamble of the Constitution have to be preserved for all times to come and that they cannot be amended out of existence, though a reasonable abridgment of fundamental rights could be effected for the 21 public safety or public order as fundamental rights provisions of the Constitution of Belize recognize. There is though a limitation on the power of amendment by implication by the words of the Preamble and therefore every provision of the Constitution is open to amendment, provided the foundation or basic structure of the Constitution is not removed, damaged or destroyed. The Constitutional requirement of security of tenure, and the independence and impartiality of judges are fundamental structures of the Constitution of Belize; and, in my view, the National Assembly is not possessed of the legal power to remove in relation to judges the availability of those structures. The amendments remove with respect to the two Justices of Appeal, their security of tenure and their right to independence and impartiality contrary to the Constitution."

[107] The appellant submitted that Legall J wrongly assumed that the 'basic structure doctrine' is a part of the laws of Belize and in so holding, he -

> "(a) failed to give full effect to section 69 of the Constitution which prescribes the procedure for amending the Constitution, including the entrenched provisions;
> (b) failed to take into account the uncontroverted evidence that section 69 of the Constitution was duly complied with in the course of enactment of the Sixth Amendment Act;

(c) failed to appreciate that the provisions of section 69 of the Constitution are all inclusive and exhaustive and that there is no other limitation, whether substantive or procedural, on the power of the National Assembly to alter the Constitution;"

[108] The appellant further submitted that even if it is assumed that the basic structure doctrine is part of the laws of Belize, Legall J erred in applying the said doctrine to the facts of the case, and in so doing he –

"(a) failed to give effect to his own finding that the appointments of Justices Mottley and Morrison were not appointments for life and that their appointments could have been rectified by issuing new instruments of appointment (paras 14, 16, and 22 of the decision);

(b) failed to hold that the issue of basic structure doctrine did not arise on the facts of this case;

(c) in any event, erroneously held that the Amendments were contrary to the Rule of Law and the so-called basic structure doctrine."

[109] The Association in response submitted that this Court has pronounced against the applicability of the basic structure doctrine to the laws of Belize in The Attorney General of Belize and Another v The British Caribbean Bank Limited and The Attorney General v Dean Boyce, Civil Appeal Nos 18, 19 and 21 of 2012.

[110] The present position is that the basic structure doctrine is not part of the laws of Belize. Legall J therefore erred when he granted a declaration that sections 15 and 16 are contrary to the rule of law, a basic structure of the Constitution.

[111] For the sake of argument, even if the doctrine was part of the laws of Belize, it has been shown under ground 1 that Justices of the Court of Appeal enjoy constitutional guarantees of security of tenure and judicial independence with one year appointments. Legall J therefore, erred in finding that the amendments remove with respect to the two Justices of Appeal, their security of tenure and their right to independence and impartiality contrary to the Constitution.

Like the Belizean Court of Appeal, the French Constitutional Council has exercised restraint, too, though it offered a different justification altogether. When asked to invalidate a constitutional amendment approved in an irregular constitutional referendum, the Constitutional Council held that it does not have jurisdiction to review the decisions made by the French people. The result of the Court's choice not to rule on the matter was to decline to invalidate an amendment.

Conseil constitutionnel de France, décision No. 62-20DC, Nov. 6, 1962, Rec. 27

Le Conseil constitutionnel,

Saisi par le Président du Sénat, sur la base de l'article 61 2e alinéa, de la Constitution, du texte de la loi relative à l'élection du Président de la République au suffrage universel direct et adoptée par le Peuple dans le référendum du 28 octobre 1962, aux fins d'appréciation de la conformité de ce texte à la Constitution ;

Vu la Constitution ;

Vu l'ordonnance du 7 novembre 1958 portant loi organique sur le Conseil constitutionnel ;

1. Considérant que la compétence du Conseil constitutionnel est strictement délimitée par la Constitution ainsi que par les dispositions de la loi organique du 7 novembre 1958 sur le Conseil constitutionnel prise pour l'application du titre VII de celle-ci ; que le Conseil ne saurait donc être appelé à se prononcer sur d'autres cas que ceux qui sont limitativement prévus par ces textes ;

2. Considérant que, si l'article 61 de la Constitution donne au Conseil constitutionnel mission d'apprécier la conformité à la Constitution des lois organiques et des lois ordinaires qui, respectivement, doivent ou peuvent être soumises à son examen, sans préciser si cette compétence s'étend à l'ensemble des textes de caractère législatif, qu'ils aient été adoptés par le peuple à la suite d'un référendum ou qu'ils aient été votés par le Parlement, ou si, au contraire, elle est limitée seulement à cette dernière catégorie, il résulte de l'esprit de la Constitution qui a fait du Conseil constitutionnel un organe régulateur de l'activité des pouvoirs publics que les lois que la Constitution a entendu viser dans son article 61 sont uniquement les lois votées par le Parlement et non point celles qui, adoptées par le Peuple à la suite d'un référendum, constituent l'expression directe de la souveraineté nationale ;

3. Considérant que cette interprétation résulte également des dispositions expresses de la Constitution et notamment de son article 60 qui détermine le rôle du Conseil constitutionnel en matière du référendum et de l'article 11 qui ne prévoit aucune formalité entre l'adoption d'un projet de loi par le peuple et sa promulgation par le Président de la République ;

4. Considérant, enfin, que cette même interprétation est encore expressément confirmée par les dispositions de l'article 17 de la loi organique susmentionnée du 7 novembre 1958 qui ne fait état que des « lois adoptées par le Parlement » ainsi que par celles de l'article 23 de ladite loi qui prévoit que « dans le cas où le Conseil constitutionnel déclare que la loi dont il est saisi contient une disposition contraire à la Constitution sans constater en même temps qu'elle est inséparable de l'ensemble de la loi, le Président de la République peut promulguer la loi à l'exception de cette disposition, soit demander aux Chambres une nouvelle lecture » ;

5. Considérant qu'il résulte de ce qui précède qu'aucune des dispositions de la Constitution ni de la loi organique précitée prise en vue de son application ne donne compétence au Conseil constitutionnel pour se prononcer sur la demande susvisée par laquelle le Président du Sénat lui a déféré aux fins d'appréciation de sa conformité à la Constitution le projet de loi adopté par le Peuple français par voie de référendum le 28 octobre 1962 ;

Décide :

Article premier :

Le Conseil constitutionnel n'a pas compétence pour se prononcer sur la demande susvisée du Président du Sénat.

Article 2 :

La présente décision sera publiée au Journal officiel de la République française.

ECLI : FR : CC : 1962 : 62.20.DC

The United States has likewise rejected the possibility that a properly enacted constitutional amendment to the U.S. Constitution can be unconstitutional. When asked to invalidate the Nineteenth Amendment—which protects the right to vote without regard to sex—the Supreme Court held that an amendment to the U.S. Constitution is "conclusive upon the courts."

Supreme Court of the United States, Leser v. Garnett, 258 U.S. 130 (1922)

MR. JUSTICE BRANDEIS delivered the opinion of the Court.

> On October 12, 1920, Cecilia Streett Waters and Mary D. Randolph, citizens of Maryland, applied for and were granted registration as qualified voters in Baltimore City. To have their names stricken from the list, Oscar Leser and others brought this suit in the court of common pleas. The only ground of disqualification alleged was that the applicants for registration were women, whereas the Constitution of Maryland limits the suffrage to men. Ratification of the proposed amendment to the federal > Constitution, now known as the Nineteenth, 41 Stat. 362, had been proclaimed on August 26, 1920, 41 Stat. 1823, pursuant to Revised Statutes, § 205. The Legislature of Maryland had refused to ratify it. The petitioners contended, on several grounds, that the amendment had not become part of the federal Constitution. The trial court overruled the contentions and dismissed the petition. Its judgment was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the state, 114 A. 840, and the case comes here on writ of error. That writ must be dismissed; but the petition for a writ of certiorari, also duly filed, is granted. The laws of Maryland authorize such a suit by a qualified voter against the board of registry. Whether the Nineteenth Amendment has become part of the federal Constitution is the question presented for decision.
> The first contention is that the power of amendment conferred by the federal Constitution and sought to be exercised does not extend to this amendment because of its character. The argument is that so great an addition to the electorate, if made without the state's consent, destroys its autonomy as a political body. This amendment is in character and phraseology precisely similar to the Fifteenth. For each, the same method of adoption was pursued. One cannot be valid and the other invalid. That the Fifteenth is valid, although rejected by six states, including Maryland, has been recognized and acted on for half a century. See United States v. Reese, 92 U. S. 214 ; Neale v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370 ; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347 ; Myers v. Anderson, 238 U. S. 368 . The suggestion that the Fifteenth was incorporated in the Constitution not in accordance with law, but practically as a war measure which has been validated by acquiescence, cannot be entertained.
> The second contention is that, in the constitutions of several of the 36 states named in the proclamation of the Secretary of State, there are provisions which render inoperative the alleged ratifications by their legislatures. The argument is that, by reason of these specific provisions, the legislatures were without power to ratify. But the function of a state legislature in ratifying a proposed amendment to the federal Constitution, like the function of Congress in proposing the amendment, is a federal function derived from the federal Constitution, and it transcends any limitations sought to be imposed by the people of a state. Hawke v. Smith, No. 1, 253 U. S. 221 ; Hawke v. Smith, No. 2, 253 U. S. 231 ; National Prohibition Cases, 253 U. S. 350 , 253 U. S. 386 .
> The remaining contention is that the ratifying resolutions of Tennessee and of West Virginia are inoperative because adopted in violation of the rules of legislative procedure prevailing in the respective states. The question raised may have been rendered immaterial by the fact that, since the proclamation, the legislatures of two other states -- Connecticut and Vermont -- have adopted resolutions of ratification. But a broader answer should be given to the contention. The proclamation by the Secretary certified that, from official documents on file in the Department of State, it appeared that the proposed amendment was ratified by the legislatures of 36 states, and that it "has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States." As the Legislatures of Tennessee and of West Virginia had power to adopt the resolutions of ratification, official notice to the Secretary, duly authenticated, that they had done so, was conclusive upon him, and, being certified to by his proclamation, is conclusive upon the courts. The rule declared in Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. 649 , 143 U. S. 669 -673, is applicable here. See also Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S. 547 , 162 U. S. 562 .

9.2.3 An unconstitutional constitutional amendment in Canada?

In Canada, codified unamendability is inapplicable. No part of the text of the Constitution of Canada is expressly shielded from constitutional amendment. However, a constitutional amendment may nonetheless be held unconstitutional if political actors use the wrong procedure of constitutional amendment. This is called a subject-rule mismatch.

> Richard Albert, Constitutional Amendments: Making, Breaking, and Changing Constitutions (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2019) at 219
> [A]n amendment could be ruled unconstitutional because it was made using the wrong procedure. … [S]ome constitutions—like the Constitutions of Canada and South Africa—codify multiple procedures for amendment, and each procedure is keyed to a specific set of rules, meaning that one procedure cannot be used to amend a rule that is expressly made amendable by another procedure. Courts could invalidate an amendment for having been passed using the wrong procedure. We can identify this first justification as a subject-rule mismatch.

As discussed earlier in this Chapter, the Constitution of Canada codifies five procedures of constitutional amendment. Each procedure may be used to amend specific parts or principles of the Constitution.

The possibility that an amendment may be unconstitutional arises when political actors use an amendment procedure incorrectly. For instance, the section 41(a) of the Constitution Act, 1982 specifies that any reform to Canada's status as a constitutional monarchy is possible "only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province." It would therefore be unconstitutional to transform the system of government in Canada from constitutional monarchy to parliamentary republic using the considerably simpler procedure in section 44 , which provides that "Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons."

In order to avoid the risk of an unconstitutional amendment, political actors in Canada have on several occasions asked the Supreme Court in the context of a reference to determine which amendment procedure must be used to accomplish certain constitutional reforms.

In an important reference involving reforming the Senate of Canada, the Court was asked which amendment procedure must be to enact a suite of constitutional reforms to the Senate, including how to change the method of selecting Senators. The Court agreed to answer the question, and explained why the Constitution requires any such change to be made using one specific amendment procedure in particular. See Reference re Senate Reform , 2014 SCC 32 (CanLII), [2014] 1 SCR 704.

In addition to the possibility that an amendment may give rise to a subject-rule mismatch, an amendment in Canada may also violate unwritten constitutional principles. The Supreme Court has held, similarly in the context of a reference, that an amendment to formalize the secession of a province from Canada must respect these unwritten constitutional principles: the rule of law, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and minority rights.

The Secession Reference has already been discussed earlier in this Chapter. Here, we draw attention only to the Court's recourse to interpretive unamendability to impose restrictions on the power of constitutional amendment, and in turn to give rise to the possibility of an unconstitutional constitutional amendment.

> Supreme Court of Canada, Reference re Secession of Quebec , 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217
> [49] [O]ur Constitution is primarily a written one, the product of 131 years of evolution. Behind the written word is an historical lineage stretching back through the ages, which aids in the consideration of the underlying constitutional principles. These principles inform and sustain the constitutional text: they are the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based. The following discussion addresses the four foundational constitutional principles that are most germane for resolution of this Reference: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minority rights. These defining principles function in symbiosis. No single principle can be defined in isolation from the others, nor does any one principle trump or exclude the operation of any other.

[50] Our Constitution has an internal architecture, or what the majority of this Court in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 57, called a "basic constitutional structure". The individual elements of the Constitution are linked to the others, and must be interpreted by reference to the structure of the Constitution as a whole. As we recently emphasized in the Provincial Judges Reference, certain underlying principles infuse our Constitution and breathe life into it. Speaking of the rule of law principle in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 750, we held that "the principle is clearly implicit in the very nature of a Constitution". The same may be said of the other three constitutional principles we underscore today.

[51] Although these underlying principles are not explicitly made part of the Constitution by any written provision, other than in some respects by the oblique reference in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure without them. The principles dictate major elements of the architecture of the Constitution itself and are as such its lifeblood.

[52] The principles assist in the interpretation of the text and the delineation of spheres of jurisdiction, the scope of rights and obligations, and the role of our political institutions. Equally important, observance of and respect for these principles is essential to the ongoing process of constitutional development and evolution of our Constitution as a "living tree", to invoke the famous description in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136. As this Court indicated in New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 319, Canadians have long recognized the existence and importance of unwritten constitutional principles in our system of government.

[53] Given the existence of these underlying constitutional principles, what use may the Court make of them? In the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at paras. 93 and 104, we cautioned that the recognition of these constitutional principles (the majority opinion referred to them as "organizing principles" and described one of them, judicial independence, as an "unwritten norm") could not be taken as an invitation to dispense with the written text of the Constitution. On the contrary, we confirmed that there are compelling reasons to insist upon the primacy of our written constitution. A written constitution promotes legal certainty and predictability, and it provides a foundation and a touchstone for the exercise of constitutional judicial review. However, we also observed in the Provincial Judges Reference that the effect of the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 was to incorporate certain constitutional principles by reference, a point made earlier in Fraser v. Public Service Staff Relations Board, 1985 CanLII 14 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 455, at pp. 462-63. In the Provincial Judges Reference, at para. 104, we determined that the preamble "invites the courts to turn those principles into the premises of a constitutional argument that culminates in the filling of gaps in the express terms of the constitutional text".

[54] Underlying constitutional principles may in certain circumstances give rise to substantive legal obligations (have "full legal force", as we described it in the Patriation Reference, supra, at p. 845), which constitute substantive limitations upon government action. These principles may give rise to very abstract and general obligations, or they may be more specific and precise in nature. The principles are not merely descriptive, but are also invested with a powerful normative force, and are binding upon both courts and governments. "In other words", as this Court confirmed in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 752, "in the process of Constitutional adjudication, the Court may have regard to unwritten postulates which form the very foundation of the Constitution of Canada".

[84] The secession of a province from Canada must be considered, in legal terms, to require an amendment to the Constitution, which perforce requires negotiation. The amendments necessary to achieve a secession could be radical and extensive. Some commentators have suggested that secession could be a change of such a magnitude that it could not be considered to be merely an amendment to the Constitution. We are not persuaded by this contention. It is of course true that the Constitution is silent as to the ability of a province to secede from Confederation but, although the Constitution neither expressly authorizes nor prohibits secession, an act of secession would purport to alter the governance of Canadian territory in a manner which undoubtedly is inconsistent with our current constitutional arrangements. The fact that those changes would be profound, or that they would purport to have a significance with respect to international law, does not negate their nature as amendments to the Constitution of Canada.

[85] The Constitution is the expression of the sovereignty of the people of Canada. It lies within the power of the people of Canada, acting through their various governments duly elected and recognized under the Constitution, to effect whatever constitutional arrangements are desired within Canadian territory, including, should it be so desired, the secession of Quebec from Canada. As this Court held in the Manitoba Language Rights Reference, supra, at p. 745, "[t]he Constitution of a country is a statement of the will of the people to be governed in accordance with certain principles held as fundamental and certain prescriptions restrictive of the powers of the legislature and government". The manner in which such a political will could be formed and mobilized is a somewhat speculative exercise, though we are asked to assume the existence of such a political will for the purpose of answering the question before us. By the terms of this Reference, we have been asked to consider whether it would be constitutional in such a circumstance for the National Assembly, legislature or government of Quebec to effect the secession of Quebec from Canada unilaterally.

[86] The "unilateral" nature of the act is of cardinal importance and we must be clear as to what is understood by this term. In one sense, any step towards a constitutional amendment initiated by a single actor on the constitutional stage is "unilateral". We do not believe that this is the meaning contemplated by Question 1, nor is this the sense in which the term has been used in argument before us. Rather, what is claimed by a right to secede "unilaterally" is the right to effectuate secession without prior negotiations with the other provinces and the federal government. At issue is not the legality of the first step but the legality of the final act of purported unilateral secession. The supposed juridical basis for such an act is said to be a clear expression of democratic will in a referendum in the province of Quebec. This claim requires us to examine the possible juridical impact, if any, of such a referendum on the functioning of our Constitution, and on the claimed legality of a unilateral act of secession.

[87] Although the Constitution does not itself address the use of a referendum procedure, and the results of a referendum have no direct role or legal effect in our constitutional scheme, a referendum undoubtedly may provide a democratic method of ascertaining the views of the electorate on important political questions on a particular occasion. The democratic principle identified above would demand that considerable weight be given to a clear expression by the people of Quebec of their will to secede from Canada, even though a referendum, in itself and without more, has no direct legal effect, and could not in itself bring about unilateral secession. Our political institutions are premised on the democratic principle, and so an expression of the democratic will of the people of a province carries weight, in that it would confer legitimacy on the efforts of the government of Quebec to initiate the Constitution's amendment process in order to secede by constitutional means. In this context, we refer to a "clear" majority as a qualitative evaluation. The referendum result, if it is to be taken as an expression of the democratic will, must be free of ambiguity both in terms of the question asked and in terms of the support it achieves.

[88] The federalism principle, in conjunction with the democratic principle, dictates that the clear repudiation of the existing constitutional order and the clear expression of the desire to pursue secession by the population of a province would give rise to a reciprocal obligation on all parties to Confederation to negotiate constitutional changes to respond to that desire. The amendment of the Constitution begins with a political process undertaken pursuant to the Constitution itself. In Canada, the initiative for constitutional amendment is the responsibility of democratically elected representatives of the participants in Confederation. Those representatives may, of course, take their cue from a referendum, but in legal terms, constitution-making in Canada, as in many countries, is undertaken by the democratically elected representatives of the people. The corollary of a legitimate attempt by one participant in Confederation to seek an amendment to the Constitution is an obligation on all parties to come to the negotiating table. The clear repudiation by the people of Quebec of the existing constitutional order would confer legitimacy on demands for secession, and place an obligation on the other provinces and the federal government to acknowledge and respect that expression of democratic will by entering into negotiations and conducting them in accordance with the underlying constitutional principles already discussed.

[89] What is the content of this obligation to negotiate? At this juncture, we confront the difficult inter-relationship between substantive obligations flowing from the Constitution and questions of judicial competence and restraint in supervising or enforcing those obligations. This is mirrored by the distinction between the legality and the legitimacy of actions taken under the Constitution. We propose to focus first on the substantive obligations flowing from this obligation to negotiate; once the nature of those obligations has been described, it is easier to assess the appropriate means of enforcement of those obligations, and to comment on the distinction between legality and legitimacy.

[90] The conduct of the parties in such negotiations would be governed by the same constitutional principles which give rise to the duty to negotiate: federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and the protection of minorities. Those principles lead us to reject two absolutist propositions. One of those propositions is that there would be a legal obligation on the other provinces and federal government to accede to the secession of a province, subject only to negotiation of the logistical details of secession. This proposition is attributed either to the supposed implications of the democratic principle of the Constitution, or to the international law principle of self-determination of peoples.

[95] Refusal of a party to conduct negotiations in a manner consistent with constitutional principles and values would seriously put at risk the legitimacy of that party's assertion of its rights, and perhaps the negotiation process as a whole. Those who quite legitimately insist upon the importance of upholding the rule of law cannot at the same time be oblivious to the need to act in conformity with constitutional principles and values, and so do their part to contribute to the maintenance and promotion of an environment in which the rule of law may flourish.

[103] To the extent that a breach of the constitutional duty to negotiate in accordance with the principles described above undermines the legitimacy of a party's actions, it may have important ramifications at the international level. Thus, a failure of the duty to undertake negotiations and pursue them according to constitutional principles may undermine that government's claim to legitimacy which is generally a precondition for recognition by the international community. Conversely, violations of those principles by the federal or other provincial governments responding to the request for secession may undermine their legitimacy. Thus, a Quebec that had negotiated in conformity with constitutional principles and values in the face of unreasonable intransigence on the part of other participants at the federal or provincial level would be more likely to be recognized than a Quebec which did not itself act according to constitutional principles in the negotiation process. Both the legality of the acts of the parties to the negotiation process under Canadian law, and the perceived legitimacy of such action, would be important considerations in the recognition process. In this way, the adherence of the parties to the obligation to negotiate would be evaluated in an indirect manner on the international plane.

9.2.4 Can a constitution be unconstitutional?

We have so far discussed whether a constitutional amendment can be unconstitutional. But what about an entire constitution: is it possible for a court to declare a constitution unconstitutional?

In South Africa's transition from apartheid to democracy, the Constitutional Court was required by law to evaluate the constitutionality of the country's draft constitution. In the end, the Court certified the constitutionality of the draft constitution, but not before first ruling in a separate ruling that an earlier draft of the constitution was unconstitutional.

Here, below, is the first ruling of the Court, which found the draft constitution unconstitutional.

The excerpt includes the Court's explanation of the constitution-making process and the Court's role within it. The excerpt also includes the Court's conclusion. Note that the Court was tasked with evaluating the draft constitution against a set of principles agreed-upon by the Constitutional Assembly.

The Court had two options before it: (1) certify the draft constitution, if the Court concludes that the draft constitution respects the agreed-upon set of principles; or (2) return the draft constitution to the Constitutional Assembly to revise its draft, if the Court concludes that the draft constitution fails to respect the agreed-upon set of principles.

Constitutional Court of South Africa, Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Case CCT 23/96, 6 September 1996 (citations omitted)

THE COURT

CHAPTER I. INTRODUCTION

[1] The formal purpose of this judgment is to pronounce whether or not the Court certifies that all the provisions of South Africa's proposed new constitution comply with certain principles contained in the country's current constitution. But its underlying purpose and scope are much wider. Judicial "certification" of a constitution is unprecedented and the very nature of the undertaking has to be explained. To do that, one must place the undertaking in its proper historical, political and legal context; and, in doing so, the essence of the country's constitutional transition, the respective roles of the political entities involved and the applicable legal principles and terminology must be identified and described. It is also necessary to explain the scope of the Court's certification task and the effect of this judgment, not only the extent and significance of the Court's powers, but also their limitations. Only then can one really come to grips with the certification itself.

[2] That is in itself a complex and wide-ranging exercise, dealing with a large number and variety of issues, some interrelated but many not. Virtually all of those issues were raised in written submissions and oral representations received from political parties, special interest groups and members of the public at large. But, as will be shown shortly, the certification task extends beyond considering complaints specifically drawn to the Court's attention. We certainly derived great benefit from such contributions and wish to express our appreciation to counsel for the Constitutional Assembly and the political parties, to the representatives of other bodies and to the persons who submitted written submissions or oral argument. The thoroughness of their research and the cogency of their arguments greatly eased our task. Ultimately, however, it was our duty to measure each and every provision of the new constitution, viewed both singly and in conjunction with one another, against the stated Constitutional Principles, irrespective of the attitude of any interested party. In what follows we intend not only to record our conclusions regarding that exercise, but to make plain our reasons for each such conclusion.

[3] We may however be called upon in future and in the context of a concrete dispute to deal with constitutional provisions we have had to construe in the abstract for the purposes of the certification process. In order to avoid pre-empting decisions in such cases, we have endeavoured, where possible, to be brief and to provide reasons for our decisions without saying more than is necessary.

A. HISTORICAL AND POLITICAL CONTEXT

[5] South Africa's past has been aptly described as that of "a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice" which "generated gross violations of human rights, the transgression of humanitarian principles in violent conflicts and a legacy of hatred, fear, guilt and revenge". From the outset the country maintained a colonial heritage of racial discrimination: in most of the country the franchise was reserved for white males and a rigid system of economic and social segregation was enforced. The administration of African tribal territories through vassal "traditional authorities" passed smoothly from British colonial rule to the new government, which continued its predecessor's policy.

[6] At the same time the Montesquieuan principle of a threefold separation of state power - often but an aspirational ideal - did not flourish in a South Africa which, under the banner of adherence to the Westminster system of government, actively promoted parliamentary supremacy and domination by the executive. Multi-party democracy had always been the preserve of the white minority but even there it had languished since 1948. The rallying call of apartheid proved irresistible for a white electorate embattled by the spectre of decolonisation in Africa to the north.

[7] From time to time various forms of limited participation in government were devised by the minority for the majority, most notably the "homeland policy" which was central to the apartheid system. Fundamental to that system was a denial of socio-political and economic rights to the majority in the bulk of the country, which was identified as "white South Africa", coupled with a Balkanisation of tribal territories in which Africans would theoretically become entitled to enjoy all rights. Race was the basic, all-pervading and inescapable criterion for participation by a person in all aspects of political, economic and social life.

[8] As the apartheid system gathered momentum during the 1950s and came to be enforced with increasing rigour, resistance from the disenfranchised - and increasingly disadvantaged - majority intensified. Many (and eventually most) of them demanded non-discriminatory and wholly representative government in a non-racial unitary state, tenets diametrically opposed to those of apartheid. Although there were reappraisals and adaptations on both sides as time passed, the ideological chasm remained apparently unbridgeable until relatively recently.

[9] The clash of ideologies not only resulted in strife and conflict but, as the confrontation intensified, the South African government of the day - and some of the self-governing and "independent" territories spawned by apartheid - became more and more repressive. More particularly from 1976 onwards increasingly harsh security measures gravely eroded civil liberties. The administration of urban black residential areas and most "homeland" administrations fell into disarray during the following decade. The South African government, backed by a powerful security apparatus operating with sweeping emergency powers, assumed strongly centralised and authoritarian control of the country.

[10] Then, remarkably and in the course of but a few years, the country's political leaders managed to avoid a cataclysm by negotiating a largely peaceful transition from the rigidly controlled minority regime to a wholly democratic constitutional dispensation.

After a long history of "deep conflict between a minority which reserved for itself all control over the political instruments of the state and a majority who sought to resist that domination", the overwhelming majority of South Africans across the political divide realised that the country had to be urgently rescued from imminent disaster by a negotiated commitment to a fundamentally new constitutional order premised upon open and democratic government and the universal enjoyment of fundamental human rights. That commitment is expressed in the preamble to the Interim Constitution by an acknowledgement of the > "... need to create a new order in which all South Africans will be entitled to a common South African citizenship in a sovereign and democratic constitutional state in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races so that all citizens shall be able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms".

With this end in view the IC

> "... provides a historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice, and a future founded on the recognition of human rights, democracy and peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans, irrespective of colour, race, class, belief or sex."

[11] Following upon exploratory and confidential talks across the divide, the transitional process was formally inaugurated in February 1990, when the then government of the Republic of South Africa announced its willingness to engage in negotiations with the liberation movements. Negotiations duly ensued and persevered, despite many apparent deadlocks. Some of the "independent homeland" governments gave their support to the negotiation process. Others did not but were overtaken by the momentum of the ensuing political developments and became part of the overall transition, unwillingly or by default.

[12] One of the deadlocks, a crucial one on which the negotiations all but foundered, related to the formulation of a new constitution for the country. All were agreed that such an instrument was necessary and would have to contain certain basic provisions. Those who negotiated this commitment were confronted, however, with two problems. The first arose from the fact that they were not elected to their positions in consequence of any free and verifiable elections and that it was therefore necessary to have this commitment articulated in a final constitution adopted by a credible body properly mandated to do so in consequence of free and fair elections based on universal adult suffrage. The second problem was the fear in some quarters that the constitution eventually favoured by such a body of elected representatives might not sufficiently address the anxieties and the insecurities of such constituencies and might therefore subvert the objectives of a negotiated settlement. The government and other minority groups were prepared to relinquish power to the majority but were determined to have a hand in drawing the framework for the future governance of the country. The liberation movements on the opposition side were equally adamant that only democratically elected representatives of the people could legitimately engage in forging a constitution: neither they, and certainly not the government of the day, had any claim to the requisite mandate from the electorate.

[13] The impasse was resolved by a compromise which enabled both sides to attain their basic goals without sacrificing principle. What was no less important in the political climate of the time was that it enabled them to keep faith with their respective constituencies: those who feared engulfment by a black majority and those who were determined to eradicate apartheid once and for all. In essence the settlement was quite simple. Instead of an outright transmission of power from the old order to the new, there would be a programmed two-stage transition. An interim government, established and functioning under an interim constitution agreed to by the negotiating parties, would govern the country on a coalition basis while a final constitution was being drafted. A national legislature, elected (directly and indirectly) by universal adult suffrage, would double as the constitution-making body and would draft the new constitution within a given time. But - and herein lies the key to the resolution of the deadlock - that text would have to comply with certain guidelines agreed upon in advance by the negotiating parties. What is more, an independent arbiter would have to ascertain and declare whether the new constitution indeed complied with the guidelines before it could come into force.

B. LEGAL CONTEXT AND TERMINOLOGY

[14] The settlement was ultimately concluded by the negotiating parties in November 1993. Shortly thereafter and pursuant thereto the South African Parliament duly adopted the Interim Constitution. Although the formal date of commencement of the IC was 27 April 1994 (a date agreed upon in advance by the negotiating parties), its provisions relating to the election of the transitional national legislature came into operation earlier.

[15] The importance of the deadlock-breaking agreement is highlighted by the preamble to the IC which, in its second paragraph, characterises the Constitutional Principles as "a solemn pact" in the following terms:

> "AND WHEREAS in order to secure the achievement of this goal, elected representatives of all the people of South Africa should be mandated to adopt a new Constitution in accordance with a solemn pact recorded as Constitutional Principles".

It is also clear from the language that the Constitutional Principles constitute the formal record of the "solemn pact". They are contained in IC sch 4, which is incorporated by a reference under IC 71(1)(a). Although they are numbered from I to XXXIV and are often referred to as the 34 Constitutional Principles, they list many more requirements than that. Henceforth they will be referred to collectively as the "CPs" and individually as "CP I" and so on. The wording and interpretation of the CPs will be discussed later; what is of importance at this stage is to note that they are acknowledged by the preamble to be foundational to the new constitution. As will be shown shortly, they are also crucial to the certification task with which the Court has been entrusted.

[16] IC ch 5, headed "The Adoption of the New Constitution", fixes the basic framework and rules for the drafting exercise. First, in IC 68(1), it provides as follows:

> "The National Assembly and the Senate, sitting jointly for the purposes of this Chapter, shall be the Constitutional Assembly."

The body thus created, the Constitutional Assembly, will hereafter be referred to as the "CA". In terms of IC 68(2), read with IC 68(3) and IC 73(1), the CA had to commence its task within seven days from the first sitting of the Senate and draft and adopt a new constitutional text within two years of the first sitting of the National Assembly (the "NA"). For such adoption IC 73(2) required a majority of at least two-thirds of all the members of the CA. The succeeding subsections of IC 73 make detailed provision for what transpires if the requisite majority is not obtained. In the event, such majority was indeed obtained and no more need be said about the alternative mechanisms. The constitution which the CA adopted is formally titled the "Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996" and will hereafter be referred to as the "New Text" or the "NT". Its individual provisions will be identified by the prefix "NT".

[17] IC ch 5 then addresses the issue of certification. It will be recalled that the "solemn pact" envisaged independent determination of the question whether the new constitutional text complies with the CPs. Accordingly IC 71(2) reads as follows:

> "The new constitutional text passed by the Constitutional Assembly, or any provision thereof, shall not be of any force and effect unless the Constitutional Court has certified that all the provisions of such text comply with the Constitutional Principles referred to in subsection (1)(a)."

It should be emphasised that the subsection requires that "all" the provisions be certified as complying with the CPs. Precisely what that entails will be dealt with later. Suffice it at this stage to make two points. First, that this Court's duty - and hence its power - is confined to such certification. Second, certification means a good deal more than merely checking off each individual provision of the NT against the several CPs.

[18] The provisions of IC 71(3), although not directly prescribed by the "solemn pact", form a logical additional safeguard, and warrant quotation:

> "A decision of the Constitutional Court in terms of subsection (2) certifying that the provisions of the new constitutional text comply with the Constitutional Principles, shall be final and binding, and no court of law shall have jurisdiction to enquire into or pronounce upon the validity of such text or any provision thereof."

Once this Court has certified a text in terms of IC 71(2) that is the end of the matter and compliance or non-compliance thereof with the CPs can never be raised again in any court of law, including this Court. That casts an increased burden on us in deciding on certification. Should we subsequently decide that we erred in certifying we would be powerless to correct the mistake, however manifest.

[19] One then turns to IC ch 7 to complete the survey of the constitutional provisions which give effect to the "solemn pact". That chapter deals with the judicial authority in the Republic. Among other things, it established two new organs of state, namely this Court and the Judicial Service Commission. For present purposes it is sufficient to observe that the appointment and dismissal mechanisms and the composition and powers of those two bodies constitute an attempt to create a sufficient safeguard that the decision regarding compliance of the NT with the CPs would be impartial.

C. ADOPTION OF THE NEW TEXT BY THE CONSTITUTIONAL ASSEMBLY

[20] The CA duly commenced its deliberations and all but one of the political parties represented in Parliament participated throughout. Numerous public and private sessions were held and a wide variety of experts on specific topics were consulted on an ongoing basis. In response to an intensive country-wide information campaign, including public meetings and open invitations to the general public, the CA also received numerous representations, both oral and written. Although the final text concerning some contentious issues was drafted only shortly before adoption of the NT, the CA had throughout its deliberations issued interim reports containing progressive drafts of the text and of alternative proposals on outstanding provisions. In the result political parties and other interested bodies or persons were kept up to date and had ample time to consider possible grounds for objecting to certification.

[21] On 8 May 1996 the CA adopted the NT by a majority of some 86 percent of its members. Two days later the Chairperson of the CA, acting in accordance with rule 15 of the Rules of the Constitutional Court, transmitted the draft to this Court, certifying (i) that it had been adopted by the requisite majority, and (ii) that it complied with the CPs. At the same time he requested the Court to perform its certification functions in terms of IC 71(2).

E. THE NATURE OF THE COURT'S CERTIFICATION FUNCTION

[26] Notwithstanding publication of the directions by the President, in which the issues were identified, there remained considerable misunderstanding about the Court's functions and powers in relation to certification of the NT. As a result many objections - and even some of the oral arguments - were misdirected. Apparently, therefore, there is a risk that the tenor and import of this judgment may be misunderstood by some readers unless the more egregious misapprehensions are resolved.

[27] First and foremost it must be emphasised that the Court has a judicial and not a political mandate. Its function is clearly spelt out in IC 71(2): to certify whether all the provisions of the NT comply with the CPs. That is a judicial function, a legal exercise. Admittedly a constitution, by its very nature, deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power as also with the relationship between political entities and with the relationship between the state and persons. But this Court has no power, no mandate and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the CA in drafting the NT, save to the extent that such choices may be relevant either to compliance or non-compliance with the CPs. Subject to that qualification, the wisdom or otherwise of any provision of the NT is not this Court's business.

[28] Nor do we have any power to comment upon the methodology adopted by the CA, unless and to the extent that it may amount to a breach of IC ch 5. No such infringement has been alleged, the objections being confined to complaints that submissions to it were ignored by the CA, that its deliberations at times lacked transparency, and the like. Even if such complaints were to be well-founded, which we are manifestly neither legally empowered nor practically able to determine, they would remain irrelevant to our task.

[29] There was also considerable confusion about the comparison the Court had to conduct in the performance of its duty under IC 71(2). That subsection is in itself quite unequivocal; and read in the context discussed above, there can be no doubt at all that the comparison we have to make is between the NT and the CPs. In general, and subject to an important proviso relating to CP XVIII.2, which is discussed in detail later, differences between the NT and the IC are not germane to the certification exercise the Court has to perform. It may be that reference to the IC is of assistance in trying to ascertain the meaning of a word or phrase in either the NT or the CPs, but it is generally of no consequence that some or other provision in the IC has been omitted from the NT, or has been reproduced in a different form. Provided it remained within the boundaries set by the CPs, the CA was fully entitled to do what it wished with any precedent in the IC. That is not only clear from the provisions of IC ch 5, but is inherent in the "solemn pact". The IC was expressly intended to provide "a historic bridge between the past of a deeply divided society ... and a future founded on the recognition of human rights ..." and to facilitate the "continued governance of South Africa while an elected Constitutional Assembly draws up a final Constitution". Compiled as it was by the un-mandated negotiating parties, it has no claim to lasting legitimacy or exemplary status. The CA, composed of the duly mandated representatives of the electorate, was entrusted with the onerous duty of devising a new constitution for the country, unfettered by the provisions of the IC other than those contained in the CPs.

[30] It should also be emphasised that, provided there is due compliance with the prescripts of the CPs, this Court is not called upon to express an opinion on any gaps in the NT, whether perceived by an objector or real. More specifically, there can be no valid objection if the NT contains a provision which in principle complies with the requirements of the CPs, or a particular CP, but does not spell out the details, leaving them to the legislature to flesh out appropriately later. Provided the criteria demanded by the CPs are expressed in the NT, it is quite in order to adopt such a course. The subsequent legislation will be justiciable and any of its provisions that do not come up to the constitutionally enshrined criteria will be liable to invalidation. Here it is important to note that the CPs are principles, not detailed prescripts.

F. OVERVIEW OF THE CERTIFICATION DECISION

[31] Before becoming involved in the detailed analysis of the objections to the certification of the NT, it is necessary to make a general observation. It is true we ultimately come to the conclusion that the NT cannot be certified as it stands because there are several respects in which there has been non-compliance with the CPs. But one must focus on the wood, not the trees. The NT represents a monumental achievement. Constitution making is a difficult task. Drafting a constitution for South Africa, with its many unique features, is all the more difficult. Having in addition to measure up to a set of predetermined requirements greatly complicates the exercise. Yet, in general and in respect of the overwhelming majority of its provisions, the CA has attained that goal.

CHAPTER II. INTERPRETATION OF THE CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES A. GENERAL APPROACH

[32] It is necessary to underscore again that the basic certification exercise involves measuring the NT against the CPs. The latter contain the fundamental guidelines, the prescribed boundaries, according to which and within which the CA was obliged to perform its drafting function. Because of that pivotal role of the CPs their interpretation forms the logical starting point for the certification exercise.

[33] In the light of the background described and in the context discussed above, the CPs have to be applied and interpreted along the following lines.

[34] The CPs must be applied purposively and teleologically to give expression to the commitment "to create a new order" based on "a sovereign and democratic constitutional state" in which "all citizens" are "able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms".

[35] The CPs must therefore be interpreted in a manner which is conducive to that objective. Any interpretation of any CP which might impede the realisation of this objective must be avoided.

[36] The CPs must not be interpreted with technical rigidity. They are broad constitutional strokes on the canvas of constitution making in the future.

[37] All 34 CPs must be read holistically with an integrated approach. No CP must be read in isolation from the other CPs which give it meaning and context.

[38] It accordingly follows that no CP should be interpreted in a manner which involves conflict with another. The lawmaker intended each of the CPs to live together with the others so as to give them life and form and nuance.

[39] There is a distinction to be made between what the NT may contain and what it may not. It may not transgress the fundamental discipline of the CPs; but within the space created by those CPs, interpreted purposively, the issue as to which of several permissible models should be adopted is not an issue for adjudication by this Court. That is a matter for the political judgment of the CA, and therefore properly falling within its discretion. The wisdom or correctness of that judgment is not a matter for decision by the Constitutional Court. The Court is concerned exclusively with whether the choices made by the CA comply with the CPs, and not with the merits of those choices.

[40] What follows logically from this is that it is quite unnecessary for the CA to repeat the same constitutional structures and protections which are contained in the IC. Variations and alternatives, additions and even omissions are legitimate as long as the discipline enjoined by the CPs is respected.

[41] The test to be applied is whether the provisions of the NT comply with the CPs. That means that the provisions of the NT may not be inconsistent with any CP and must give effect to each and all of them.

[42] When testing a particular provision or provisions of the NT against the provisions of the CPs it is necessary to give to the provision or provisions of the NT a meaning. More than one permissible meaning may sometimes reasonably be supported. On one construction the text concerned does not comply with the CPs, but on another it does. In such situations it is proper to adopt the interpretation that gives to the NT a construction that would make it consistent with the CPs.

[43] Such an approach has one important consequence. Certification based on a particular interpretation carries with it the implication that if the alternative construction were correct the certification by the Court in terms of IC 71 might have been withheld. In the result, a future court should approach the meaning of the relevant provision of the NT on the basis that the meaning assigned to it by the Constitutional Court in the certification process is its correct interpretation and should not be departed from save in the most compelling circumstances. If it were otherwise, an anomalous and unintended consequence would follow. A court of competent jurisdiction might in the future give a meaning to the relevant part of the NT which would have made that part of the NT not certifiable in terms of IC 71 at the time of the certification process, but there would have been no further opportunity in the interim to refuse a certification of the NT on that ground. This kind of anomaly must be avoided - and will be - if courts accept the approach which we have suggested in this paragraph.

CHAPTER VIII. CONCLUSION AND ORDER

A. CONCLUSION

[44] It is therefore our conclusion that the following provisions of the NT do not comply with the CPs:

NT 23, which fails to comply with the provisions of CP XXVIII in that the right of individual employers to engage in collective bargaining is not recognised and protected.

NT 241(1), which fails to comply with the provisions of CP IV and CP VII in that it impermissibly shields an ordinary statute from constitutional review.

NT sch 6 s 22(1)(b), which fails to comply with the provisions of CP IV and CP VII in that it impermissibly shields an ordinary statute from constitutional review.

NT 74, which fails to comply with -

CP XV in that amendments of the NT do not require "special procedures involving special majorities"; and

CP II in that the fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties protected in the NT are not "entrenched".

NT 194, which fails in respect of the Public Protector and the Auditor-General to comply with CP XXIX in that it does not adequately provide for and safeguard the independence and impartiality of these institutions.

NT 196, which fails to comply with -

CP XXIX in that the independence and impartiality of the PSC is not adequately provided for and safeguarded; and

CP XX in that the failure to specify the powers and functions of the Public Service Commission renders it impossible to certify that legitimate provincial autonomy has been recognised and promoted.

NT ch 7, which fails to comply with -

CP XXIV in that it does not provide a "framework for the structures" of local government;

CP XXV in that it does not provide for appropriate fiscal powers and functions for LG; and CP X in that it does not provide for formal legislative procedures to be adhered to by legislatures at LG level.

NT 229, which fails to comply with CP XXV in that it does not provide for "appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories of local government".

To the extent set out in this judgment the provisions relating to the powers and functions of the provinces fail to comply with CP XVIII.2 in that such powers and functions are substantially less than and inferior to the powers and functions of the provinces in the IC.

[45] We wish to conclude this judgment with two observations. The first is to reiterate that the CA has drafted a constitutional text which complies with the overwhelming majority of the requirements of the CPs. The second is that the instances of non-compliance which we have listed in the preceding paragraph, although singly and collectively important, should present no significant obstacle to the formulation of a text which complies fully with those requirements.

B. ORDER

[46] We are unable to and therefore do not certify that all of the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 comply with the Constitutional Principles contained in schedule 4 to the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993.

CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES ANNEXURE 2

I

The Constitution of South Africa shall provide for the establishment of one sovereign state, a common South African citizenship and a democratic system of government committed to achieving equality between men and women and people of all races.

II

Everyone shall enjoy all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties, which shall be provided for and protected by entrenched and justiciable provisions in the Constitution, which shall be drafted after having given due consideration to inter alia the fundamental rights contained in Chapter 3 of this Constitution.

III

The Constitution shall prohibit racial, gender and all other forms of discrimination and shall promote racial and gender equality and national unity.

IV

The Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land. It shall be binding on all organs of state at all levels of government.

V

The legal system shall ensure the equality of all before the law and an equitable legal process. Equality before the law includes laws, programmes or activities that have as their object the amelioration of the conditions of the disadvantaged, including those disadvantaged on the grounds of race, colour or gender.

VI

There shall be a separation of powers between the legislature, executive and judiciary, with appropriate checks and balances to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

VII

The judiciary shall be appropriately qualified, independent and impartial and shall have the power and jurisdiction to safeguard and enforce the Constitution and all fundamental rights.

VIII

There shall be representative government embracing multi-party democracy, regular elections, universal adult suffrage, a common voters' roll, and, in general, proportional representation.

IX

Provision shall be made for freedom of information so that there can be open and accountable administration at all levels of government.

X

Formal legislative procedures shall be adhered to by legislative organs at all levels of government.

XI

The diversity of language and culture shall be acknowledged and protected, and conditions for their promotion shall be encouraged

XII

Collective rights of self-determination in forming, joining and maintaining organs of civil society, including linguistic, cultural and religious associations, shall, on the basis of non-discrimination and free association, be recognised and protected.

XIII

1. The institution, status and role of traditional leadership, according to indigenous law, shall be recognised and protected in the Constitution. Indigenous law, like common law, shall be recognised and applied by the courts, subject to the fundamental rights contained in the Constitution and to legislation dealing specifically therewith.

2. Provisions in a provincial constitution relating to the institution, role, authority and status of a traditional monarch shall be recognised and protected in the Constitution.

XIV

Provision shall be made for participation of minority political parties in the legislative process in a manner consistent with democracy.

XV

Amendments to the Constitution shall require special procedures involving special majorities.

XVI

Government shall be structured at national, provincial and local levels.

XVII

At each level of government there shall be democratic representation. This principle shall not derogate from the provisions of Principle XIII.

XVIII

1. The powers and functions of the national government and provincial governments and the boundaries of the provinces shall be defined in the Constitution.

2. The powers and functions of the provinces defined in the Constitution, including the competence of a provincial legislature to adopt a constitution for its province, shall not be substantially less than or substantially inferior to those provided for in this Constitution.

3. The boundaries of the provinces shall be the same as those established in terms of this Constitution.

4. Amendments to the Constitution which alter the powers, boundaries, functions or institutions of provinces shall in addition to any other procedures specified in the Constitution for constitutional amendments, require the approval of a special majority of the legislatures of the provinces, alternatively, if there is such a chamber, a two-thirds majority of a chamber of Parliament composed of provincial representatives, and if the amendment concerns specific provinces only, the approval of the legislatures of such provinces will also be needed.

5. Provision shall be made for obtaining the views of a provincial legislature concerning all constitutional amendments regarding its powers, boundaries and functions.

XIX

The powers and functions at the national and provincial levels of government shall include exclusive and concurrent powers as well as the power to perform functions for other levels of government on an agency or delegation basis.

XX

Each level of government shall have appropriate and adequate legislative and executive powers and functions that will enable each level to function effectively. The allocation of powers between different levels of government shall be made on a basis which is conducive to financial viability at each level of government and to effective public administration, and which recognises the need for and promotes national unity and legitimate provincial autonomy and acknowledges cultural diversity.

XXI

The following criteria shall be applied in the allocation of powers to the national government and the provincial governments:

1. The level at which decisions can be taken most effectively in respect of the quality and rendering of services, shall be the level responsible and accountable for the quality and the rendering of the services, and such level shall accordingly be empowered by the Constitution to do so.

2. Where it is necessary for the maintenance of essential national standards, for the establishment of minimum standards required for the rendering of services, the maintenance of economic unity, the maintenance of national security or the prevention of unreasonable action taken by one province which is prejudicial to the interests of another province or the country as a whole, the Constitution shall empower the national government to intervene through legislation or such other steps as may be defined in the Constitution.

3. Where there is necessity for South Africa to speak with one voice, or to act as a single entity - in particular in relation to other states - powers should be allocated to the national government.

4. Where uniformity across the nation is required for a particular function, the legislative power over that function should be allocated predominantly, if not wholly, to the national government.

5. The determination of national economic policies, and the power to promote interprovincial commerce and to protect the common market in respect of the mobility of goods, services, capital and labour, should be allocated to the national government.

6. Provincial governments shall have powers, either exclusively or concurrently with the national government, inter alia -

(a) for the purposes of provincial planning and development and the rendering of services; and

(b) in respect of aspects of government dealing with specific socio-economic and cultural needs and the general well-being of the inhabitants of the province.

7. Where mutual co-operation is essential or desirable or where it is required to guarantee equality of opportunity or access to a government service, the powers should be allocated concurrently to the national government and the provincial governments.

8. The Constitution shall specify how powers which are not specifically allocated in the Constitution to the national government or to a provincial government, shall be dealt with as necessary ancillary powers pertaining to the powers and functions allocated either to the national government or provincial governments.

XXII

The national government shall not exercise its powers (exclusive or concurrent) so as to encroach upon the geographical, functional or institutional integrity of the provinces.

XXIII

In the event of a dispute concerning the legislative powers allocated by the Constitution concurrently to the national government and provincial governments which cannot be resolved by a court on a construction of the Constitution, precedence shall be given to the legislative powers of the national government.

XXIV

A framework for local government powers, functions and structures shall be set out in the Constitution. The comprehensive powers, functions and other features of local government shall be set out in parliamentary statutes or in provincial legislation or in both.

XXV

The national government and provincial governments shall have fiscal powers and functions which will be defined in the Constitution. The framework for local government referred to in Principle XXIV shall make provision for appropriate fiscal powers and functions for different categories of local government.

XXVI

Each level of government shall have a constitutional right to an equitable share of revenue collected nationally so as to ensure that provinces and local governments are able to provide basic services and execute the functions allocated to them.

XXVII

A Financial and Fiscal Commission, in which each province shall be represented, shall recommend equitable fiscal and financial allocations to the provincial and local governments from revenue collected nationally, after taking into account the national interest, economic disparities between the provinces as well as the population and developmental needs, administrative responsibilities and other legitimate interests of each of the provinces.

XXVIII

Notwithstanding the provisions of Principle XII, the right of employers and employees to join and form employer organisations and trade unions and to engage in collective bargaining shall be recognised and protected. Provision shall be made that every person shall have the right to fair labour practices.

XXIX

The independence and impartiality of a Public Service Commission, a Reserve Bank, an Auditor-General and a Public Protector shall be provided for and safeguarded by the Constitution in the interests of the maintenance of effective public finance and administration and a high standard of professional ethics in the public service.

XXX

1. There shall be an efficient, non-partisan, career-orientated public service broadly representative of the South African community, functioning on a basis of fairness and which shall serve all members of the public in an unbiased and impartial manner, and shall, in the exercise of its powers and in compliance with its duties, loyally execute the lawful policies of the government of the day in the performance of its administrative functions. The structures and functioning of the public service, as well as the terms and conditions of service of its members, shall be regulated by law.

2. Every member of the public service shall be entitled to a fair pension.

XXXI

Every member of the security forces (police, military and intelligence), and the security forces as a whole, shall be required to perform their functions and exercise their powers in the national interest and shall be prohibited from furthering or prejudicing party political interest.

XXXII

The Constitution shall provide that until 30 April 1999 the national executive shall be composed and shall function substantially in the manner provided for in Chapter 6 of this Constitution.

XXXIII

The Constitution shall provide that, unless Parliament is dissolved on account of its passing a vote of no-confidence in the Cabinet, no national election shall be held before 30 April 1999.

XXXIV

1. This Schedule and the recognition therein of the right of the South African people as a whole to self-determination, shall not be construed as precluding, within the framework of the said right, constitutional provision for a notion of the right to self-determination by any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage, whether in a territorial entity within the Republic or in any other recognised way.

2. The Constitution may give expression to any particular form of self-determination provided there is substantial proven support within the community concerned for such a form of self-determination.

3. If a territorial entity referred to in paragraph 1 is established in terms of this Constitution before the new constitutional text is adopted, the new Constitution shall entrench the continuation of such territorial entity, including its structures, powers and functions.

Chapter 5: Early Federalism

By David Schneiderman

1 Introduction

This chapter introduces you to the division of powers between the federal and provincial governments as laid down in Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This was Canada's fifth Constitution, since the conquest of 1759, enacted by the Britain's Imperial Parliament. The cases in this chapter will introduce you to the law of Canadian federalism, to the main legal points of contention between federal and provincial governments and, in addition, to some of the interpretive techniques adopted by the judiciary to help resolve constitutional disputes. The path taken up by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) – which was to invest provincial jurisdiction with vast authority over matters falling within 'property and civil rights' – continues to shape Canadian federalism today. It has, as a consequence, produced one of the most decentralized federations in the world.

There are a few things to note before beginning. First, the phrase 'property and civil rights' are traceable to the Quebec Act, 1774, an imperial statute which restored local law as governing civil disputes between les Canadiens, the empire's French-speaking British subjects. Also, in 1866, under the leadership of George-Étienne Cartier, Attorney General for Canada East, the government enacted a Civil Code for Lower Canada. The Code was meant to govern private law disputes associated with property, contracts and torts (as they are called in common law jurisdictions). The outlines of Canadian Confederation were clearly in view at the final stages of its drafting. As declared in the introduction to the first English-language edition of the Civil Code: 'In view of a union of the British American provinces, the codification of our laws is perhaps better calculated than any other available means to secure to Lower Canada an advantage which the proposed plan of confederation appears to have already contemplated, that of being the standard of assimilation and unity, and of entering into new political relations without undergoing disturbing alterations in her laws or institutions.' See Thomas McCord*, The Civil Code of Lower Canada Together with a Synopsis of the Changes in the Law Effect by the Civil Code of Lower Canada*, 2nd ed. (Montreal: Dawson 1870) at i-ii. This power to regulate private law matters was juxtaposed to claims by the federal government to make laws in regard to trade and commerce, criminal law, and the power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada (POGG). This latter phrase was commonly used in Royal Instructions to Governors in British North America in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, granting to the Crown's representatives' plenary power to makes laws governing their territories.

> Is it proper to liken the POGG power to a plenary authority when the provinces are allocated jurisdiction over most subjects associated with private law subjects? What does this history say about the content of s. 94, which provides for the federal uniformity of laws respecting property and civil rights for those provinces outside of Quebec that grant consent?

Second, it was thought that the federal government would supervise the exercise of provincial power through use of the federal power of reservation and disallowance (s. 90). The Lieutenant Governor of the Province, as the Crown's representative in the province, was entitled to 'reserve' (withhold) if concerned about the law's impact on a wide range of legal and policy grounds, and 'disallow' (veto) a law, so that it could not go into effect, within one year of its enactment. This power was used aggressively early on and gave rise to some important constitutional disputes. See W.P.M. Kennedy, 'The Disallowance of Provincial Acts in the Dominion of Canada' (1924) Journal of Comparative Legislation 3rd series, 6: 80 and Robert C. Vipond, Liberty and Community: Canadian Federalism and the Failure of the Constitution (Sate University of New York Press, 1991) c.5. Though we will not examine those cases in this chapter, the important thing to note is that the federal power of disallowance – equivalent to one held by the Imperial cabinet over federal laws (s. 56) – was thought by some to serve functions equivalent to judicial review. For discussion, see Gordon Bale, Chief Justice William Johnstone Ritchie: Responsible Government and Judicial Review (Ottawa: Carleton University Press, 1991), c. 10.

> If the practice of disallowing provincial laws had not been abandoned, would this method of policing jurisdictional lines of authority have been preferred over judicial review? What are the advantages of having the judicial branch review provincial measures for their constitutionality?

Finally, 'rights talk' was prevalent in this early period – it did not arrive only in 1982 with the advent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In this era, proponents of provincial autonomy, led by Ontario Premier Oliver Mowat, invoked their 'rights' in opposition to the threat of overwhelming federal power, particularly by the executive branch led by Prime Minister John A. Macdonald. Provincial rights advocates spoke in the language of 'political liberty,' which were best safeguarded in local legislatures. Provincial legislatures were the locus for the protection of individual rights to property or the rights of workers or prohibiting liquor consumption. They were better situated to 'determine limits on rights because their members would be closer to people and more sensitive to the rights of individuals than would a "foreign" official.' It followed that 'legislatures, not courts, were the appropriate bodies to the determine the limits on rights, and at the same time to protect individual liberty. They were the bodies through which political liberty was best expressed.' See Richard Risk and Robert C. Vipond, "Rights Talk in Canada and Right Feeling of the People" (1996) 14 Law and History Review 1 at 2-3, 19.

2 Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons (1881), 7 AC 96 (PC), aff'g. (1880), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 4 SCR 215

One of the first major rulings of the JCPC, concerned a challenge to provincial regulation by two insurance companies. The Government of Ontario attached mandatory conditions to policies of fire insurance in 1876. These standard conditions were "deemed to be a part of every policy of fire insurance" made in the province and were directed to be "printed on every such policy with the heading 'Statutory Conditions.'" An insurer could deviate from these conditions so long as this was done "in conspicuous type and in ink of a different colour."

Parsons brought action to recover against two different insurers for failure to compensate him for fire damage. The companies refused to pay because of Parsons' failure to disclose material information. Parsons sued to recover funds based on the companies' failure to respect the statutory conditions set out in provincial legislation. Citizens Insurance Company and Queen Insurance Company replied that the statutory conditions were ultra vires of the province.

At trial court and at the Ontario Court of Appeal, Parsons succeeded. The Supreme Court of Canada, by a 4:2 ruling, affirmed the lower court decisions. Chief Justice Ritchie, for the majority, wrote: 'I do not think the local legislatures are to be deprived of all power to deal with property and civil rights, because parliament, in the plenary exercise of its power to regulate trade and commerce, may possibly pass laws inconsistent with the exercise by the local legislatures of their powers—the exercise of the powers of the local legislatures being in such a case subject to such regulations as the Dominion may lawfully prescribe.' He could 'scarcely know how one could better illustrate the exercise of the power of the local legislatures to legislate with reference to property and civil rights, and matters of a merely local and private nature, than by a local Act of incorporation, whereby a right to hold or deal with real or personal property in a province is granted, and whereby the civil right to contract and sue and to be sued as an individual in reference thereto is also granted.' Justice Gwynne, in dissent, feared what the majority ruling forebode for federal power: 'Within this Dominion the right of exercise of National Sovereignty is vested solely in Her Majesty, the Supreme Sovereign Head of the State, and in the Parliament of which Her Majesty is an integral part; these powers are, within this Dominion, the sole administrators and guardians of the Comity of Nations. To prevent all possibility of the local legislatures creating any difficulties embarrassing to the Dominion Government, by presuming to interfere in any matter affecting trade and commerce, and by so doing violating, it might be, the Comity of Nations, all matters coming within those subjects are placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament; that the Act in question does usurp the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament, I must say I entertain no doubt. The logical result of a contrary decision would afford just grounds to despair of the stability of the Dominion. The object of the BNA Act was to lay in the Dominion Constitution the foundations of a nation, and not to give to provinces carved out of, and subordinated to, the Dominion, anything of the nature of a national or quasi national existence.'

The Premier of Ontario, Oliver Mowat, directed the provincial government's argument. He outlined his strategy in a report to the legislature in January 1882: "Some insurance Companies, however, doing business in the Province, were unwilling to be hampered by these conditions, and raised before the Courts the question of the power of a Provincial Legislature to deal with the subject.' Discussing Parsons' case, Mowat continued, 'During the litigation the plaintiff became insolvent, owing, it is said, to the delay and expense to which he had been put by the litigation of the Companies,' and that, due to his impecuniosity, no leading counsel would be employed to argue the case before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.' Due to the importance of the appeal, Mowat arranged to retain counsel to argue the case on the Province's behalf. The Premier visited London and had 'repeated interviews' with his solicitors. He also prepared a paper to assist counsel on the 'important constitutional questions involved.' Among the grounds Mowat directed his lawyers to advance was that s. 91 confers power to 'regulate' trade and commerce and that these words 'were evidently intended to indicate a limitation' of federal jurisdiction. Also, the enumerations in ss. 91 & 92 were meant to embrace 'all possible subjects of legislative action in Canada not expressly excluded by the Act. As for POGG, Mowat wrote that: 'Resort therefore should be had to the general words in the 91st section as to possible unassigned matters, in the event only of a case happening to arise which could not by any just construction be brought within any of the enumerated particulars of either section. An unnecessary reference to the general words, in order to give or support a wider interpretation of the enumerated powers of the federal authority than these might otherwise bear, is contrary to the intention and (it is submitted) to the proper construction of the Act.' From Ontario, Sessional Papers (No. 31) (1882).

Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons (1881)*, 7 AC 96 (PC), aff'g. (1880), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 4 SCR 215

> SIR MONTAGUE SMITH: The scheme of this legislation, as expressed in the first branch of s. 91, is to give to the dominion parliament authority to make laws for the good government of Canada in all matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislature. If s. 91 had stopped here, and if the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 had been altogether distinct and different from those in s. 91, no conflict of legislative authority could have arisen. The provincial legislatures would have had exclusive legislative power over the sixteen classes of subjects assigned to them, and the dominion parliament exclusive power over all other matters relating to the good government of Canada. But it must have been foreseen that this sharp and definite distinction had not been and could not be attained, and that some of the classes of subjects assigned to the provincial legislatures unavoidably ran into and were embraced by some of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91; hence an endeavour appears to have been made to provide for cases of apparent conflict; and it would seem that with this object it was declared in the second branch of the s. 91, "for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section" that (notwithstanding anything in the Act) the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada should extend to all matters coming within the classes of subjects enumerated in that section. With the same object, apparently, the paragraph at the end of s. 91 was introduced, though it may be observed that this paragraph applies in its grammatical construction only to s. 92(16).
> Notwithstanding this endeavour to give pre-eminence to the dominion parliament in cases of a conflict of powers, it is obvious that in some cases where this apparent conflict exists, the legislature could not have intended that the powers exclusively assigned to the provincial legislature should be absorbed in those given to the dominion parliament. Take as one instance the subject "marriage and divorce," contained in the enumeration of subjects in s. 91; it is evident that solemnization of marriage would come within this general description; yet "solemnization of marriage in the province" is enumerated among the classes of subjects in s. 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of s. 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the legislatures of the provinces. So "the raising of money by any mode or system of taxation" is enumerated among the classes of subjects in s. 91; but, though the description is sufficiently large and general to include "direct taxation within the province, in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial purposes," assigned to the provincial legislatures by s. 92, it obviously could not have been intended that, in this instance also, the general power should override the particular one. With regard to certain classes of subjects, therefore, generally described in s. 91, legislative power may reside as to some matters falling within the general description of these subjects in the legislatures of the provinces. In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree, and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective powers. It could not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and, in order to prevent such a result, the two sections must be read together, and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified, by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain, and give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty, it will be a wise course for those on whom it is thrown, to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for the decision of the particular question in hand.

The first question to be decided is, whether the Act impeached in the present appeal falls within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces; for if it does not, it can be of no validity, and no other question would then arise. It is only when an Act of the provincial legislature prima facie falls within one of these classes of subjects that the further questions arise, viz., whether, notwithstanding this is so, the subject of the Act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91, and whether the power of the provincial legislature is or is not thereby overborne.

The main contention on the part of the respondent was that the Ontario Act in question had relation to matters coming within the class of subjects described in s. 92(13), viz., "Property and civil rights in the province." The Act deals with policies of insurance entered into or in force in the province of Ontario for insuring property situate therein against fire, and prescribes certain conditions which are to form part of such contracts. These contracts, and the rights arising from them, it was argued, came legitimately within the class of subject, "Property and civil rights." The appellants, on the other hand, contended that civil rights meant only such rights as flowed from the law, and gave as an instance the status of persons. Their Lordships cannot think that the latter construction is the correct one. They find no sufficient reason in the language itself, nor in the other parts of the Act, for giving so narrow an interpretation to the words "civil rights." The words are sufficiently large to embrace, in their fair and ordinary meaning, rights arising from contract, and such rights are not included in express terms in any of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91.

It becomes obvious, as soon as an attempt is made to construe the general terms in which the classes of subjects of ss. 91 and 92 are described, that both sections and the other parts of the Act must be looked at to ascertain whether language of a general nature must not by necessary implication or reasonable intendment be modified and limited. In looking at s. 91, it will be found not only that there is no class including, generally, contracts and the rights arising from them, but that one class of contracts is mentioned and enumerated, viz., "18, bills of exchange and promissory notes," which it would have been unnecessary to specify if authority over all contracts and the rights arising from them had belonged to the dominion parliament.

The provision found in s. 94 of the British North America Act, which is one of the sections relating to the distribution of legislative powers, was referred to by the learned counsel on both sides as throwing light upon the sense in which the words "property and civil rights" are used. By that section the parliament of Canada is empowered to make provision for the uniformity of any laws relative to "property and civil rights" in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and to the procedure of the Courts in these three provinces, if the provincial legislatures choose to adopt the provision so made. The province of Quebec is omitted from this section for the obvious reason that the law which governs property and civil rights in Quebec is in the main the French law as it existed at the time of the cession of Canada, and not the English law which prevails in the other provinces. The words "property and civil rights" are, obviously, used in the same sense in this section as in s. 92(13), and there seems no reason for presuming that contracts and the rights arising from them were not intended to be included in this provision for uniformity. If, however, the narrow construction of the words "civil rights," contended for by the appellants were to prevail, the dominion parliament could, under its general power, legislate in regard to contracts in all and each of the provinces and as a consequence of this the province of Quebec, though now governed by its own Civil Code, founded on the French law, as regards contracts and their incidents, would be subject to have its law on that subject altered by the dominion legislature, and brought into uniformity with the English law prevailing in the other three provinces, notwithstanding that Quebec has been carefully left out of the uniformity section of the Act.

It is to be observed that the same words, "civil rights," are employed in the Act of 14 Geo. 3, c. 83, [the Quebec Act of 1774] which made provision for the Government of the province of Quebec. Sect. 8 of that Act enacted that His Majesty's Canadian subjects within the province of Quebec should enjoy their property, usages, and other civil rights, as they had before done, and that in all matters of controversy relative to property and civil rights resort should be had to the laws of Canada, and be determined agreeably to the said laws. In this statute the words "property" and "civil rights" are plainly used in their largest sense; and there is no reason for holding that in the statute under discussion they are used in a different and narrower one.

The next question for consideration is whether, assuming the Ontario Act to relate to the subject of property and civil rights, its enactments and provisions come within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91. The only one which the Appellants suggested as expressly including the subject of the Ontario Act is s. 91(2), "the regulation of trade and commerce."

A question was raised which led to much discussion in the Courts below and this bar, viz., whether the business of insuring buildings against fire was a trade. This business, when carried on for the sake of profit, may, no doubt, in some sense of the word, be called a trade. But contracts of indemnity made by insurers can scarcely be considered trading contracts, nor were insurers who made them held to be "traders" under the English bankruptcy laws; they have been made subject to those laws by special description. Whether the business of fire insurance properly falls within the description of a "trade" must, in their Lordships' view, depend upon the sense in which that word is used in the particular statute to be construed; but in the present case their Lordships do not find it necessary to rest their decision on the narrow ground that the business of insurance is not a trade.

The words "regulation of trade and commerce," in their unlimited sense are sufficiently wide, if uncontrolled by the context and other parts of the Act, to include every regulation of trade ranging from political arrangements in regard to trade with foreign governments, requiring the sanction of parliament, down to minute rules for regulating particular trades. But a consideration of the Act shews that the words were not used in this unlimited sense. In the first place the collocation of s. 91(2) with classes of subjects of national and general concern affords an indication that regulations relating to general trade and commerce were in the mind of the legislature, when conferring this power on the dominion parliament. If the words had been intended to have the full scope of which in their literal meaning they are susceptible, the specific mention of several of the other classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91 would have been unnecessary; as, s. 91(15), banking; s. 91(17), weights and measures; s. 91(18), bills of exchange and promissory notes; s. 91(19), interest; and even s. 91(21), bankruptcy and insolvency.

"Regulation of trade and commerce" may have been used in some such sense as the words "regulations of trade" in the Act of Union between England and Scotland (6 Anne, c. 11), and as these words have been used in Acts of State relating to trade and commerce. Article V of the Act of Union enacted that all the subjects of the United Kingdom should have "full freedom and intercourse of trade and navigation" to and from all places in the United Kingdom and the Colonies; and Article VI enacted that all parts of the United Kingdom from and after the Union should be under the same "prohibitions, restrictions, and regulations of trade." Parliament has at various times since the Union passed laws affecting and regulating specific trades in one part of the United Kingdom only, without its being supposed that it thereby infringed the Articles of Union. Thus the Acts for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors notoriously vary in the two kingdoms. So with regard to Acts relating to bankruptcy, and various other matters.

Construing therefore the words "regulation of trade and commerce" by the various aids to their interpretation above suggested, they would include political arrangements in regard to trade requiring the sanction of parliament, regulation of trade in matters of inter-provincial concern, and it may be that they would include general regulation of trade affecting the whole dominion. Their Lordships abstain on the present occasion from any attempt to define the limits of the authority of the dominion parliament in this direction. It is enough for the decision of the present case to say that, in their view, its authority to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce does not comprehend the power to regulate by legislation the contracts of a particular business or trade, such as the business of fire insurance in a single province, and therefore that its legislative authority does not in the present case conflict or compete with the power over property and civil rights assigned to the legislature of Ontario by s. 92(13).

Having taken this view of the present case, it becomes unnecessary to consider the question how far the general power to make regulations of trade and commerce, when competently exercised by the dominion parliament, might legally modify or affect property and civil rights in the provinces, or the legislative power of the provincial legislatures in relation to those subjects; …

On the best consideration they have been able to give to the arguments addressed to them and to the judgments of the learned judges in Canada, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the Act in question is valid. …

2.1.1 Questions

1. What interpretive techniques were employed by Sir Montague Smith to allocate jurisdiction to regulate fire insurance contracts (text, history, mutual modification)?
2. Outside of international and interprovincial trade, what room did the JCPC leave for the general regulation of trade?

3 The Regulation of Alcohol

"Liquor was a large part of Victorian life; people drank, debated drinking, and regulated drinking. Local governments regulated taverns for decades before Confederation, and had powers to impose temperance measures, such as limitations on the numbers of taverns. Fees for tavern licences and taxes on the import and manufacture of liquor were important sources of government revenue, and the tavern licences were a major source of patronage and political loyalty, especially for the Liberal government of Ontario and its leader, Oliver Mowat. After the 1860s the campaign for temperance became one of the most powerful and divisive social and political movements of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. A wide array of legislation was enacted, which spawned much work for the courts, including constitutional challenges. Some of these challenges - for example, Russell, Hodge, and the Local Prohibition Reference, have been read by students and debated by courts and scholars ever since" from R.C.B. Risk, 'Canadian Courts Under the Influence' (1990) 40 University of Toronto Law Journal 687.

3.1 Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (PC)

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH: … The general scheme of the British North America Act with regard to the distribution of legislative powers, and the general scope and effect of ss. 91 and 92, and their relation to each other, were fully considered and commented on by this Board in the case of the Citizens Insurance Company v. Parsons (1881), 7 AC 96 (PC). According to the principle of construction there pointed out, the first question to be determined is, whether the Act now in question falls within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92, and assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. If it does, then the further question would arise, viz., whether the subject of the Act does not also fall within one of the enumerated classes of subjects in s. 91, and so does not still belong to the Dominion Parliament. But if the Act does not fall within any of the classes of subjects in s. 92, no further question will remain, for it cannot be contended, and indeed was not contended at their Lordships' bar, that, if the Act does not come within one of the classes of subjects assigned to the Provincial Legislatures, the Parliament of Canada had not, by its general power "to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada," full legislative authority to pass it.

Three classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92 were referred to, under each of which, it was contended by the appellant's counsel, the present legislation fell. These were:—

9. Shop, saloon, tavern, auctioneer, and other licenses in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local, or municipal purposes.

13. Property and civil rights in the province.

16. Generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province.

With regard to the first of these classes, s. 92(9), it is to be observed that the power of granting licenses is not assigned to the Provincial Legislatures for the purpose of regulating trade, but "in order to the raising of a revenue for provincial, local, or municipal purposes."

The Act in question is not a fiscal law; it is not a law for raising revenue; on the contrary, the effect of it may be to destroy or diminish revenue; indeed it was a main objection to the Act that in the city of Fredericton it did in point of fact diminish the sources of municipal revenue. It is evident, therefore, that the matter of the Act is not within the class of subject No. 9, and consequently that it could not have been passed by the Provincial Legislature by virtue of any authority conferred upon it by that sub-section. …

Next, their Lordships cannot think that the Temperance Act in question properly belongs to the class of subjects, "Property and Civil Rights." It has in its legal aspect an obvious and close similarity to laws which place restrictions on the sale or custody of poisonous drugs, or of dangerously explosive substances. These things, as well as intoxicating liquors, can, of course, be held as property, but a law placing restrictions on their sale, custody, or removal, on the ground that the free sale or use of them is dangerous to public safety, and making it a criminal offence punishable by fine or imprisonment to violate these restrictions, cannot properly be deemed a law in relation to property in the sense in which those words are used in s. 92. What Parliament is dealing with in legislation of this kind is not a matter in relation to property and its rights, but one relating to public order and safety. That is the primary matter dealt with, and though incidentally the free use of things in which men may have property is interfered with, that incidental interference does not alter the character of the law. Upon the same considerations, the Act in question cannot be regarded as legislation in relation to civil rights. In however large a sense these words are used, it could not have been intended to prevent the Parliament of Canada from declaring and enacting certain uses of property, and certain acts in relation to property, to be criminal and wrongful. Laws which make it a criminal offence for a man wilfully to set fire to his own house on the ground that such an act endangers the public safety, or to overwork his horse on the ground of cruelty to the animal, though affecting in some sense property and the right of a man to do as he pleases with his own, cannot properly be regarded as legislation in relation to property or to civil rights. Nor could a law which prohibited or restricted the sale or exposure of cattle having a contagious disease be so regarded. Laws of this nature designed for the promotion of public order, safety, or morals, and which subject those who contravene them to criminal procedure and punishment, belong to the subject of public wrongs rather than to that of civil rights. They are of a nature which fall within the general authority of Parliament to make laws for the order and good government of Canada, and have direct relation to criminal law, which is one of the enumerated classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. It was said in the course of the judgment of this Board in the case of the Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons, that the two sections (91 and 92) must be read together, and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified by that of the other. Few, if any, laws could be made by Parliament for the peace, order, and good government of Canada which did not in some incidental way affect property and civil rights; and it could not have been intended, when assuring to the provinces exclusive legislative authority on the subjects of property and civil rights, to exclude the Parliament from the exercise of this general power whenever any such incidental interference would result from it. The true nature and character of the legislation in the particular instance under discussion must always be determined, in order to ascertain the class of subject to which it really belongs. In the present case it appears to their Lordships, for the reasons already given, that the matter of the Act in question does not properly belong to the class of subjects "Property and Civil Rights" within the meaning of ss. 92(13). …

It was lastly contended that this Act fell within s. 92(16)—"Generally all matters of a merely local or personal nature in the province."

It was not, of course, contended for the appellant that the Legislature of New Brunswick could have passed the Act in question, which embraces in its enactments all the provinces; nor was it denied, with respect to this last contention, that the Parliament of Canada might have passed an Act of the nature of that under discussion to take effect at the same time throughout the whole Dominion. Their Lordships understand the contention to be that, at least in the absence of a general law of the Parliament of Canada, the provinces might have passed a local law of a like kind, each for its own province, and that, as the prohibitory and penal parts of the Act in question were to come into force in those counties and cities only in which it was adopted in the manner prescribed, or, as it was said, "by local option," the legislation was in effect, and on its face, upon a matter of a merely local nature. …

Their Lordships cannot concur in this view. The declared object of Parliament in passing the Act is that there should be uniform legislation in all the provinces respecting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, with a view to promote temperance in the Dominion. Parliament does not treat the promotion of temperance as desirable in one province more than in another, but as desirable everywhere throughout the Dominion. The Act as soon as it was passed became a law for the whole Dominion, and the enactments of the first part, relating to the machinery for bringing the second part into force, took effect and might be put in motion at once and everywhere within it. It is true that the prohibitory and penal parts of the Act are only to come into force in any county or city upon the adoption of a petition to that effect by a majority of electors, but this conditional application of these parts of the Act does not convert the Act itself into legislation in relation to a merely local matter. The objects and scope of the legislation are still general, viz., to promote temperance by means of a uniform law throughout the Dominion.

The manner of bringing the prohibitions and penalties of the Act into force, which Parliament has thought fit to adopt, does not alter its general and uniform character. Parliament deals with the subject as one of general concern to the Dominion, upon which uniformity of legislation is desirable, and the Parliament alone can so deal with it. There is no ground or pretence for saying that the evil or vice struck at by the Act in question is local or exists only in one province, and that Parliament, under colour of general legislation, is dealing with a provincial matter only. It is therefore unnecessary to discuss the considerations which a state of circumstances of this kind might present. The present legislation is clearly meant to apply a remedy to an evil which is assumed to exist throughout the Dominion, and the local option, as it is called, no more localises the subject and scope of the Act than a provision in an Act for the prevention of contagious diseases in cattle that a public officer should proclaim in what districts it should come in effect, would make the statute itself a mere local law for each of these districts. In statutes of this kind the legislation is general, and the provision for the special application of it to particular places does not alter its character.

Their Lordships having come to the conclusion that the Act in question does not fall within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Provincial Legislatures, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the further question whether its provisions also fall within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 91. In abstaining from this discussion, they must not be understood as intimating any dissent from the opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and the other Judges, who held that the Act, as a general regulation of the traffic in intoxicating liquors throughout the Dominion, fell within the class of subject, "the regulation of trade and commerce," enumerated in that section, and was, on that ground, a valid exercise of the legislative power of the Parliament of Canada.

In the result, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, and with costs.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

3.1.1 Questions

1. Why wasn't the JCPC more specific about the federal authority to enact the Canada Temperance Act or was reliance on POGG sufficient to dispose of this constitutional question?
2. There was no provincial representation at the hearings in the Russell case. Do you think the outcome would have been different if the provinces had appeared to make argument?

3.2 Hodge v. The Queen, (1883) 9 AC 117

3.2.1 R.C.B. Risk, 'Canadian Courts Under the Influence' (1990) 40 University of Toronto Law Journal 687 at 709-10

"The next major case was Hodge, which was decided by the Privy Council in late 1883, about a year and a half after Russell. It was a challenge to Ontario's Crooks Act, named after the Ontario Provincial Treasurer who steered the act through the legislature to its final passage in 1876. It transferred the powers over liquor licensing from the municipalities to newly created Boards of Licence Commissioners, appointed and controlled by the provincial government, and added powers to enable the boards to the numbers of licences issued. The control over the boards greatly increased the government's patronage powers, which Mowat used openly and shrewdly to encourage loyalty to the provincial Liberal party. Hodge, proprietor of a tavern the St. James Hotel in Toronto, was convicted for violating his liquor licence by permitting billiards to be played after 7:00 p.m. on a Saturday night, after which hour the tavern should have been shut. Hodge advanced three grounds to challenge his conviction: (1) the act conflicted with the federal power over trade and commerce; (2) the provincial legislature could not delegate law-making powers to the Boards of Commissioners; and (3) the province could not impose imprisonment with hard labour as a punishment, because section 92(15) of the BNA Act spoke only of imprisonment. The trial judge was persuaded by the argument about delegation, but the Court of Appeal and the Privy Council dismissed all three contentions. None had much chance of succeeding, and it was the reasoning that was crucial, not the results. … The argument about delegation was based on the fact that the Canadian legislatures were created by the British Parliament: they were therefore delegates and not sovereign legislatures, and they were limited by the maxim delegatus non potest delegare."

The third argument about punishment was prompted by the sentence imposed on another the tavern keeper, Frawley, who was charged with operating his tavern entirely without a licence. Because this was his second offence, he was sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. Frawley challenged this sentence which raised the third ground of appeal: that the province could not impose imprisonment with hard labour as a punishment due to s. 92(15) which spoke only of 'the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty or imprisonment for enforcing any law of the Province.'

Hodge v. The Queen, (1883) 9 AC 117

LORD FITZGERALD: … The appellants contended that the legislature of Ontario had no power to pass any Act to regulate the liquor traffic; that the whole power to pass such an Act was conferred on the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken from the provincial legislature, by s. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867; and that it did not come within any of the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the provincial legislatures by s. 92. The class in s. 91 which the Liquor License Act, 1877, was said to infringe was s. 91(2), "The Regulation of Trade and Commerce," and it was urged that the decision of this Board in Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (PC) was conclusive that the whole subject of the liquor traffic was given to the Dominion Parliament, and consequently taken away from the provincial legislature. It appears to their Lordships, however, that the decision of this tribunal in that case has not the effect supposed, and that, when properly considered, it should be taken rather as an authority in support of the judgment of the Court of Appeal.

The sole question there was, whether it was competent to the Dominion Parliament, under its general powers to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion, to pass the Canada Temperance Act, 1878, which was intended to be applicable to the several Provinces of the Dominion, or to such parts of the Provinces as should locally adopt it. It was not doubted that the Dominion Parliament had such > authority, under s. 91 unless the subject fell within some one or more of the classes of subjects, which by s. 92 were assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the Provinces. …

> It appears to their Lordships that Russell v. The Queen, when properly understood, is not an authority in support of the appellant's contention, and their Lordships do not intend to vary or depart from the reasons expressed for their judgment in that case. The principle which that case and the case of the Citizens Insurance Company illustrate is, that subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within s. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within s. 91.
>
> Their Lordships proceed now to consider the subject matter and legislative character of ss. 4 and 5 of the Liquor License Act of 1877. That Act is so far confined in its operation to municipalities in the province of Ontario, and is entirely local in its character and operation. It authorizes the appointment of License Commissioners to act in each municipality, and empowers them to pass, under the name of resolutions, what we know as by-laws, or rules to define the conditions and qualifications requisite for obtaining tavern or shop licenses for sale by retail of spirituous liquors within the municipality; for limiting the number of licenses; for declaring that a limited number of persons qualified to have tavern licenses may be exempted from having all the tavern accommodation required by law, and for regulating licensed taverns and shops, for defining the duties and powers of license inspectors, and to impose penalties for infraction of their resolutions. These seem to be all matters of a merely local nature in the Province, and to be similar to, though not identical in all respects with, the powers then belonging to municipal institutions under the previously existing laws passed by the local parliaments.
> Their Lordships consider that the powers intended to be conferred by the Act in question, when properly understood, are to make regulations in the nature of police or municipal regulations of a merely local character for the good government of taverns, & c., licensed for the sale of liquors by retail, and such as are calculated to preserve, in the municipality, peace and public decency, and repress drunkenness and disorderly and riotous conduct. As such they cannot be said to interfere with the general regulation of trade and commerce which belongs to the Dominion Parliament, and do not conflict with the provisions of the Canada Temperance Act, which does not appear to have as yet been locally adopted. …
> Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that, in relation to ss. 4 and 5 of the Act in question, the legislature of Ontario acted within [ss. 92(8), (15) and (16) of] the Imperial Act of 1867, and that in this respect there is no conflict with the powers of the Dominion Parliament.
>
> Assuming that the local legislature had power to legislate to the full extent of the resolutions passed by the License Commissioners, and to have enforced the observance of their enactments by penalties and imprisonment with or without hard labour, it was further contended that the Imperial Parliament had conferred no authority on the local legislature to delegate those powers to the License Commissioners, or any other persons. In other words, that the power conferred by the Imperial Parliament on the local legislature should be exercised in full by that body, and by that body alone. The maxim delegatus non potest delegare was relied on.
> It appears to their Lordships, however, that the objection thus raised by the appellants is founded on an entire misconception of the true character and position of the provincial legislatures. They are in no sense delegates of or acting under any mandate from the Imperial Parliament. When the British North America Act enacted that there should be a legislature for Ontario, and that its legislative assembly should have exclusive authority to make laws for the Province and for provincial purposes in relation to the matters enumerated in s. 92, it conferred powers not in any sense to be exercised by delegation from or as agents of the Imperial Parliament, but authority as plenary and as ample within the limits prescribed by s. 92 as the Imperial Parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subjects and area the local legislature is supreme, and has the same authority as the Imperial Parliament, or the Parliament of the Dominion, would have had under like circumstances to confide to a municipal institution or body of its own creation authority to make by-laws or resolutions as to subjects specified in the enactment, and with the object of carrying the enactment into operation and effect. …
> If, as their Lordships have decided, the subjects of legislation come within the powers of the provincial legislature, then s. 92(15) of the British North America Act, which provides for "the imposition of punishment by fine, penalty, or imprisonment, for enforcing any law of the Province made in relation to any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section," is applicable to the case before us, and is not in conflict with s. 91(27); under these very general terms, "the imposition of punishment by imprisonment for enforcing any law," it seems to their Lordships that there is imported an authority to add to the confinement or restraint in prison that which is generally incident to it —"hard labour"; in other words, that "imprisonment" there means restraint by confinement in a prison, with or without its usual accompaniment, "hard labour." …
>
> Their Lordships do not think it necessary or useful to advert to some minor points of discussion, and are, on the whole, of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario should be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs, and will so humbly advise Her Majesty.
> Appeal dismissed

3.2.2 Questions

1. Lord Fitzgerald introduced the 'double aspect' doctrine in Hodge. Does this grant license to governments to duplicate laws at both levels? Does this make it more difficult for citizens to know which level of government is responsible for what?
2. Note that the JCPC uses the language of 'supremacy,' and not of 'sovereignty,' to describe federal and provincial authority. Why is the term sovereignty avoided?

3.3 Note: The McCarthy Act Reference

Emboldened by the ruling in Russell, Prime Minister Macdonald concluded that it gave the federal government exclusive power over liquor licensing. In the Speech from the Throne at the opening of Parliament in February 1883, Macdonald promised legislation that would 'prevent the unrestrained sale of intoxicating liquors, and to regulate the granting of shop, saloon and tavern licenses." When pressed by Edward Blake, leader of the opposition and a champion of provincial rights, Macdonald declared that Russell made it 'quite clear to every lawyer, and any man who is not a lawyer, who reads that judgment, that the very reasons on which the Privy Council decided … are the reasons showing that the Provincial legislature had not a right to deal with that subject under the Crooks Act [upheld in Hodge], except as a matter of revenue.' During the prior election campaign, Macdonald promised, 'if he carried the country, as he would do (cheers), he would tell Mr. Mowat – that little tyrant, who had attempted control public opinion by taking hold of every little office, from that of a Division Court bailiff to a tavern-keeper – that he would get a Bill passed at Ottawa returning to the municipalities the power taken away from them by the Licence Act (cheers).' See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1st sess., 5th Parl. (1883) p. 237, 239.

In the following May, Parliament enacted the McCarthy Act. The Act established licensing requirements for hotel, saloon, shop, vessel, and wholesale sales to be administered by the Dominion and the Conservative party. It was quickly referred to the Supreme Court, which decided in early 1885 that it was ultra vires, except for wholesale sales and sales on vessels. On appeal, the Privy Council held that it was ultra vires entirely. Like the result in Hodge, the result was hardly startling. Unfortunately, however, in accordance with the prevailing practice about references, no written reasons were given. We do have some indication of what may have swayed the members of the JCPC due to the transcript of oral argument. Sir Farrer Herschell for the Dominion argued that there was 'no distinction in principle between Russell v. The Queen and this case. Both deal with intemperance as being an evil affecting the whole Dominion.' This distinguishing feature was the 'machinery of the legislation' and not the 'purpose and object of the legislation.' Sir Montague Smith expressed doubt: "Russell v. The Queen was a prohibitive Act applying to the whole Dominion regardless of what had been done, and prohibiting the liquor traffic; the question is, whether this is not regulating in each province the local traffic. This Act is not really to prohibit, but to limit, not to prevent the liquor traffic, but to regulate it." Lord Watson also was suspect, when posing a question form the bench: "Do you maintain that the terms of sec. 91(2), give to the Dominion legislative power to prohibit or abolish a particular trade? … If it had been 'Trade and Commerce those words might imply abolition as well as regulation, but where the power given is expressly confined to 'regulation' of the liquor trade, could they abolish it?"

During the course of argument, Lord Watson later raised this point: 'In one province there may exist an evil peculiar to that province, wholly local, and apparently sec. 92 gives the local legislature the right to deal with it; then it may attain such dimensions as to threaten danger to the whole Dominion, and in that case I should be sorry to doubt that there is power given to the Dominion Parliament to intervene."

Edward Blake, appearing for the Brewers and Distillers Association. Complained that there should be no distinction between regulation and prohibition. Section 91(2) is among the numerous powers available to the federal government to enact laws for "social and moral" purposes or on "grounds of safety order and peace." The power of taxation, for instance, is available so that "some imports are pretty well taxed to death. … Therefore regulation of trade and commerce does and must include prohibition: and that there is no inference against the prohibition of a particular trade to be drawn from the use of the word regulation." See Canada, Sessional Papers, no. 85 (1885).

The distinction between prohibition and regulation, though not widely understood and accepted in earlier cases, emerges as an important categorical mode of argumentation. The question then arose: did the provinces have power to prohibit or was the power given by Russell exclusive?

Mowat decided to force the question in 1890 by enacting a statute (SC 1890, c. 56) that, by s. 18, gave municipalities power to impose prohibition in the same terms that had existed at Confederation—which was a power to prohibit only retail sales. By agreement with the Dominion government, seven questions were referred to the Supreme Court; the first six were abstract questions about the powers to prohibit sales, manufacturing, and import, and the seventh asked whether the 1890 Act was valid.

The Supreme Court 3:2 held, relying upon s. 91(2), that the provinces had no power to impose prohibition. This was a major victory for those Justices, like Gwynne J. who liked to channel the political preferences of Prime Minister John A. Macdonald. Relying on s. 91(2), the majority offered a vision of a powerful Dominion that was threatened by provincial authority. Justice Gwynne, writing for the majority, declared that: "we must keep ever present to our minds the fact that the main object of these provincial statesmen, who were the authors and founders of our new constitution, in framing their project of confederation, was to devise a scheme by which the best features of the constitution of the United States of America, rejecting the bad should be grafted upon the British constitution; and to vest in the provincial legislatures exclusive jurisdiction over all matters of a purely provincial, local, municipal and domestic character, and in the general or central legislature exclusive jurisdiction over all matters in which, as being of a general, quasi-national and sovereign character, the inhabitants of the several provinces might be said to have a common interest distinct from the particular interest they would have in matters affecting the local, municipal and domestic affairs of the particular province in which each should reside.

That this was the main design of the scheme of confederation proposed by the framers of our constitution, and as intended by the resolutions adopted by them, is abundantly apparent from the speeches accompanying the submission of the resolutions to the legislatures of the provinces for their adoption. The late Sir John A. Macdonald …" in 1895 CanLII 95 (SCC) at 205.

An appeal was taken to the Privy Council.

3.4 AG Ontario v. AG Canada (The Local Prohibition Reference), [1896] AC 348 (PC)

LORD WATSON: … The seventh question raises the issue, whether, in the circumstances which have just been detailed, the provincial legislature had authority to enact s. 18. In order to determine that issue, it becomes necessary to consider, in the first place, whether the Parliament of Canada had jurisdiction to enact the Canada Temperance Act; and, if so, to consider in the second place, whether, after that Act became the law of each province of the Dominion, there yet remained power with the Legislature of Ontario to enact the provisions of s. 18.

The authority of the Dominion Parliament to make laws for the suppression of liquor traffic in the provinces is maintained, in the first place, upon the ground that such legislation deals with matters affecting "the peace, order, and good government of Canada," within the meaning of the introductory and general enactments of s. 91 of the British North America Act; and, in the second place, upon the ground that it concerns "the regulation of trade and commerce," being No. 2 of the enumerated classes of subjects which are placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Parliament by that section. These sources of jurisdictions are in themselves distinct, and are to be found in different enactments.

It was apparently contemplated by the framers of the Imperial Act of 1867 that the due exercise of the enumerated powers conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by s. 91 might, occasionally and incidentally, involve legislation upon matters which are prima facie committed exclusively to the provincial legislatures by s. 92. In order to provide against that contingency, the concluding part of s. 91 enacts that "any matter coming within any of the classes of subjects enumerated in this section shall not be deemed to come within the class of matters of a local or private nature comprised in the enumeration of the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces." It was observed by this Board in Citizens' Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 7 AC 96 at 108 (PC) that the paragraph just quoted "applies in its grammatical construction only to s. 92(16)." The observation was not material to the question arising in that case, and it does not appear to their Lordships to be strictly accurate. It appears to them that the language of the exception in s. 91 was meant to include and correctly describes all the matters enumerated in the sixteen heads of s. 92, as being, from a provincial point of view, of a local or private nature. It also appears to their Lordships that the exception was not meant to derogate from the legislative authority given to provincial legislatures by these sixteen sub-sections, save to the extent of enabling the Parliament of Canada to deal with matters local or private in those cases where such legislation is necessarily incidental to the exercise of the powers conferred upon it by the enumerative heads of clause 91. That view was stated and illustrated by Sir Montague Smith in Citizens' Insurance v. Parsons and [several other cases].

The general authority given to the Canadian Parliament by the introductory enactments of s. 91 is "to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the provinces"; and it is declared, but not so as to restrict the generality of these words, that the exclusive authority of the Canadian Parliament extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects which are enumerated in the clause. There may, therefore, be matters not included in the enumeration, upon which the Parliament of Canada has power to legislate, because they concern the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion. But to those matters which are not specified among the enumerated subjects of legislation, the exception from s. 92, which is enacted by the concluding words of s. 91, has no application: and, in legislating with regard to such matters, the Dominion Parliament has no authority to encroach upon any class of subjects which is exclusively assigned to provincial legislatures by s. 92. These enactments appear to their Lordships to indicate that the exercise of legislative power by the Parliament of Canada, in regard to all matters not enumerated in s. 91, ought to be strictly confined to such matters as are unquestionably of Canadian interest and importance, and ought not to trench upon provincial legislation with respect to any of the classes of subjects enumerated in s. 92. To attach any other construction to the general power which, in supplement of its enumerated powers, is conferred upon the Parliament of Canada by s. 91, would, in their Lordships' opinion, not only be contrary to the intendment of the Act, but would practically destroy the autonomy of the provinces. If it were once conceded that the Parliament of Canada has authority to make laws applicable to the whole Dominion, in relation to matters which in each province are substantially of local or private interest, upon the assumption that these matters also concern the peace, order, and good government of the Dominion, there is hardly a subject enumerated in s. 92 upon which it might not legislate, to the exclusion of the provincial legislatures.

In construing the introductory enactments of s. 91, with respect to matters other than those enumerated, which concern the peace, order, and good government of Canada, it must be kept in view that s. 94, which empowers the Parliament of Canada to make provision for the uniformity of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick does not extend to the province of Quebec; and also that the Dominion legislation thereby authorized is expressly declared to be of no effect unless and until it has been adopted and enacted by the provincial legislature. These enactments would be idle and abortive, if it were held that the Parliament of Canada derives jurisdiction from the introductory provisions of s. 91, to deal with any matter which is in substance local or provincial, and does not truly affect the interest of the Dominion as a whole. Their Lordships do not doubt that some matters, in their origin local and provincial, might attain such dimensions as to affect the body politic of the Dominion, and to justify the Canadian Parliament in passing laws for their regulation or abolition in the interest of the Dominion. But great caution must be observed in distinguishing between that which is local and provincial, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures, and that which has ceased to be merely local or provincial, and has become matter of national concern, in such sense as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. An Act restricting the right to carry weapons of offence, or their sale to young persons, within the province would be within the authority of the provincial legislature. But traffic in arms, or the possession of them under such circumstances as to raise a suspicion that they were to be used for seditious purposes, or against a foreign State, are matters which, their Lordships conceive, might be competently dealt with by the Parliament of the Dominion.

The judgment of this Board in Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 AC 829 (PC) has relieved their Lordships from the difficult duty of considering whether the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 relates to the peace, order, and good government of Canada, in such sense as to bring its provisions within the competency of the Canadian Parliament. In that case the controversy related to the validity of the Canada Temperance Act of 1878; and neither the Dominion nor the Provinces were represented in the argument. It arose between a private prosecutor and a person who had been convicted, at his instance, of violating the provisions of the Canadian Act within a district of New Brunswick, in which the prohibitory clauses of the Act had been adopted. But the provisions of the Act of 1878 were in all material respects the same with those which are now embodied in the Canada Temperance Act of 1886; and the reasons which were assigned for sustaining the validity of the earlier, are, in their Lordships' opinion, equally applicable to the later Act. It therefore appears to them that the decision in Russell v. The Queen must be accepted as an authority to the extent to which it goes, namely, that the restrictive provisions of the Act of 1886, when they have been duly brought into operation in any provincial area within the Dominion, must receive effect as valid enactments relating to the peace, order, and good government of Canada.

That point being settled by decision, it becomes necessary to consider whether the Parliament of Canada had authority to pass the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 as being an Act for the "regulation of trade and commerce" within the meaning of s. 91(2). If it were so, the Parliament of Canada would, under the exception from s. 92 which has already been noticed, be at liberty to exercise its legislative authority, although in so doing it should interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces. The scope and effect of s. 91(2) were discussed by this Board at some length in Citizens' Insurance Co. v. Parsons, where it was decided that, in the absence of legislation upon the subject by the Canadian Parliament, the Legislature of Ontario had authority to impose conditions, as being matters of civil right, upon the business of fire insurance, which was admitted to be a trade, so long as those conditions only affected provincial trade. Their Lordships do not find it necessary to reopen that discussion in the present case. The object of the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 is, not to regulate retail transactions between those who trade in liquor and their customers, but to abolish all such transactions within every provincial area in which its enactments have been adopted by a majority of the local electors. A power to regulate, naturally, if not necessarily, assumes, unless it is enlarged by the context, the conservation of the thing which is to be made the subject of regulation. In that view, their Lordships are unable to regard the prohibitive enactments of the Canadian statute of 1886 as regulations of trade and commerce. They see no reason to modify the opinion which was recently expressed on their behalf by Lord Davey in Municipal Corporation of the City of Toronto v. Virgo, [1896] AC 88 at 93 (PC) in these terms: "Their Lordships think there is marked distinction to be drawn between the prohibition or prevention of a trade and the regulation or governance of it, and indeed a power to regulate and govern seems to imply the continued existence of that which is to be regulated or governed."

The authority of the Legislature of Ontario to enact s. 18 of [the 1890 Act] was asserted by the appellant on various grounds. [Arguments based upon s. 92(8), the power to create municipal institutions and s. 92(9), the power of licensing for the purposes of raising revenue, were dismissed.] …

The only enactments of s. 92 which appear to their Lordships to have any relation to the authority of provincial legislatures to make laws for the suppression of the liquor traffic are to be found in ss. 92(13) and (16), which assign to their exclusive jurisdiction, (1.) "property and civil rights in the province," and (2.) "generally all matters of a merely local or private nature in the province." A law which prohibits retail transactions and restricts the consumption of liquor within the ambit of the province, and does not affect transactions in liquor between persons in the province and persons in other provinces or in foreign countries, concerns property in the province which would be the subject-matter of the transactions if they were not prohibited, and also the civil rights of persons in the province. It is not impossible that the vice of intemperance may prevail in particular localities within a province to such an extent as to constitute its cure by restricting or prohibiting the sale of liquor a matter of a merely local or private nature, and therefore falling prima facie within s. 92(16). In that state of matters, it is conceded that the Parliament of Canada could not imperatively enact a prohibitory law adapted and confined to the requirements of localities within the province where prohibition was urgently needed. …

It is not necessary for the purposes of the present appeal to determine whether provincial legislation for the suppression of the liquor traffic, confined to matters which are provincial or local within the meaning of ss. 92(13) and (16), is authorized by the one or by the other of these heads. It cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, be logically held to fall within both of them. In s. 92, ss. (16) appears to them to have the same office which the general enactment with respect to matters concerning the peace, order, and good government of Canada, so far as supplementary of the enumerated subjects, fulfils in s. 91. It assigns to the provincial legislature all matters in a provincial sense local or private which have been omitted from the preceding enumeration, and, although its terms are wide enough to cover, they were obviously not meant to include, provincial legislation in relation to the classes of subjects already enumerated.

In the able and elaborate argument addressed to their Lordships on behalf of the respondents it was practically conceded that a provincial legislature must have power to deal with the restriction of the liquor traffic from a local and provincial point of view, unless it be held that the whole subject of restriction or abolition is exclusively committed to the Parliament of Canada as being within the regulation of trade and commerce. In that case the subject, in so far at least as it had been regulated by Canadian legislation, would, by virtue of the concluding enactment of s. 91, be excepted from the matters committed to provincial legislatures by s. 92. Upon the assumption that s. 91(2) does not embrace the right to suppress a trade, Mr. Blake maintained that, whilst the restriction of the liquor traffic may be competently made matter of legislation in a provincial as well as a Canadian aspect, yet the Parliament of Canada has, by enacting the Canada Temperance Act of 1886, occupied the whole possible field of legislation in either aspect, so as completely to exclude legislation by a province. That appears to their Lordships to be the real point of controversy raised by the question with which they are at present dealing; and, before discussing the point, it may be expedient to consider the relation in which Dominion and provincial legislation stand to each other.

It has been frequently recognised by this Board, and it may now be regarded as settled law, that according to the scheme of the British North America Act the enactments of the Parliament of Canada, in so far as these are within its competency, must override provincial legislation. But the Dominion Parliament has no authority conferred upon it by the Act to repeal directly any provincial statute, whether it does or does not come within the limits of jurisdiction prescribed by s. 92. The repeal of a provincial Act by the Parliament of Canada can only be effected by repugnancy between its provisions and the enactments of the Dominion; and if the existence of such repugnancy should become a matter of dispute, the controversy cannot be settled by the action either of the Dominion or of the provincial legislature, but must be submitted to the judicial tribunals of the country. In their Lordships' opinion the express repeal of the old provincial Act of 1864 by the Canada Temperance Act of 1886 was not within the authority of the Parliament of Canada. …

In like manner, the express repeal, in the Canada Temperance Act of 1886, of liquor prohibitions adopted by a municipality in the province of Ontario under the sanction of provincial legislation, does not appear to their Lordships to be within the authority of the Dominion Parliament.

The question must next be considered whether the provincial enactments of s. 18 to any, and if so to what, extent come into collision with the provisions of the Canadian Act of 1886. In so far as they do, provincial must yield to Dominion legislation, and must remain in abeyance unless and until the Act of 1886 is repealed by the parliament which passed it.

The prohibitions of the Dominion Act have in some respects an effect which may extend beyond the limits of a province, and they are all of a very stringent character. …

On the other hand, the prohibitions which s. 18 authorizes municipalities to impose within their respective limits do not appear to their Lordships to affect any transactions in liquor which have not their beginning and their end within the province of Ontario. …

It thus appears that, in their local application within the province of Ontario, there would be considerable difference between the two laws; but it is obvious that their provisions could not be in force within the same district or province at one and the same time. In the opinion of their Lordships the question of conflict between their provisions which arises in this case does not depend upon their identity or non-identity, but upon a feature which is common to both. Neither statute is imperative, their prohibitions being of no force or effect until they have been voluntarily adopted and applied by the vote of a majority of the electors in a district or municipality. In Russell v. The Queen it was observed by this Board, with reference to the Canada Temperance Act of 1878, "The Act as soon as it was passed became a law for the whole Dominion, and the enactments of the first part, relating to the machinery for bringing the second part into force, took effect and might be put in motion at once and everywhere within it." No fault can be found with the accuracy of that statement. Mutatis mutandis, it is equally true as a description of the provisions of s. 18. But in neither case can the statement mean more than this, that, on the passing of the Act, each district or municipality within the Dominion or the province, as the case might be, became vested with a right to adopt and enforce certain prohibitions if it thought fit to do so. But the prohibitions of these Acts, which constitute their object and their essence, cannot with the least degree of accuracy be said to be in force anywhere until they have been locally adopted.

If the prohibitions of the Canada Temperance Act had been made imperative throughout the Dominion, their Lordships might have been constrained by previous authority to hold that the jurisdiction of the Legislature of Ontario to pass s. 18 or any similar law had been superseded. In that case no provincial prohibitions such as are sanctioned by s. 18 could have been enforced by a municipality without coming into conflict with the paramount law of Canada. For the same reason, provincial prohibitions in force within a particular district will necessarily become inoperative whenever the prohibitory clauses of the Act of 1886 have been adopted by that district. But their Lordships can discover no adequate grounds for holding that there exists repugnancy between the two laws in districts of the province of Ontario where the prohibitions of the Canadian Act are not and may never be in force. …

Their Lordships, for these reasons, … are of opinion that the Ontario Legislature had jurisdiction to enact s. 18, subject to this necessary qualification [the Province lacked the jurisdiction to prohibit the importation of liquor], that its provisions are or will become inoperative in any district of the province which has already adopted, or may subsequently adopt, the second part of the Canada Temperance Act of 1886.

3.4.1 Questions and Notes

1. What motivated Lord Watson to confine the availability of POGG authority in the opening words of s. 91 only to matters rising to national dimensions?
2. Though he never used the term, did Lord Watson find there was a 'double aspect' to the subject of liquor prohibition?
3. Are you convinced that s. 91(2) encompasses only the power to regulate and not to prohibit?
4. Note that Lord Watson, in the last paragraph, applies an older rule of federal paramountcy. It does not represent modern trends. He concludes that whenever two laws are in operation, the provincial law will yield to the federal one. The modern paramountcy rule is less broad than that. Operational conflict, for instance, renders a provincial law inoperative only to the extent of the inconsistency. See discussion in Chapter 6, Part 7.
5. Richard Burdon Haldane appeared in numerous Canadian appeals before the JCPC. He was elevated to the House of Lords and eventually also sat on Privy Council appeals, holding the pen in a number of decisive Canadian cases that you will read below. This is what he wrote in tribute to Lord Watson upon his passing:

"He was an Imperial judge of the very first order. The function of such a judge, sitting in the supreme tribunal of the Empire, is to do more than decide what abstract and familiar legal conceptions should be applied to particular cases. His function is to be a statesman as well as a jurist, to fill in the gaps which Parliament has deliberately left in the skeleton constitutions and laws that it has provided for the British Colonies. The Imperial legislature has taken the view that these constitutions and laws must, if they are to be acceptable, be in a large measure unwritten, elastic, and capable of being silently developed and even altered as the Colony develops and alters. This imposes a task of immense importance and difficulty upon the Privy Council judges, and it was this task which Lord Watson had to face when some fifteen years ago he found himself face to face with what threatened to be a critical period in the history of Canada. Lord Carnarvon's Confederation Act of 1867, which had given separate legislatures and executives to the Provinces, had by no means completely defined the relations of these legislatures and their Lieutenant-Governors to the Parliament and Governor-General of the Dominion. Two views were being contended for. The one was that, excepting in such cases as were specially provided for, a general principle ought to be recognised which would tend to make the Government of Ottawa paramount, and the Governments of the Provinces subordinate. The other was that of federalism through and through, in executive as well as legislative concerns, whenever the contrary had not been expressly said by the Imperial Parliament. The Provincial Governments naturally pressed this latter view very strongly. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, which had been established under the Confederation Act, and was originally intended by all parties to be the practically final Court of Appeal for Canada, took the other view. Great unrest was the result, followed by a series of appeals to the Privy Council, à I happened to be engaged in a number of these cases, and had to give assistance as I could to the various Prime Ministers of the Provinces who came over to argue in person. Lord Watson made the business of laying down the new law that was necessary his own. He completely altered the tendency of the decisions of the Supreme Court, and established in the first place the sovereignty (subject to the power to interfere of the Imperial Parliament alone) of the legislatures of Ontario, Quebec and the other Provinces. He then worked out as a principle the direct relation, in point of exercise of the prerogative, of the Lieutenant-Governors to the Crown. In a series of masterly judgments he expounded and established the real constitution of Canada. The liquor laws, the Indian reserve lands, the title to regalia, including the precious metals, were brought before a Judicial Committee, in which he took the leading part, for consideration as to which of the rival claims to legislate ought to prevail. Nowhere is his memory likely to be more gratefully preserved than in those distant Canadian Provinces whose rights of self-government he placed on a basis that was both intelligible and firm." 4 Canada (AG) v Alberta (AG), 1921 CanLII 399, [1922] 1 AC 191 (UKJCPC) [Reference Re the Board Commerce Act 1919]

Viscount HALDANE: …

The first question to be answered is whether the Dominion Parliament could validly enact such a law. Their Lordships observe that the law is not one enacted to meet special conditions in war time. It was passed in 1919, after peace had been declared, and it is not confined to any temporary purpose, but is to continue without limit in time, and to apply throughout Canada. No doubt the initial words of sec. 91 of the B.N.A. Act, confer on the Parliament of Canada power to deal with subjects which concern the Dominion generally, provided that they are not withheld from the powers of that Parliament to legislate, by any of the express heads in sec. 92, untrammelled by the enumeration of special heads in sec. 91. It may well be that the subjects of undue combination and hoarding are matters in which the Dominion has a great practical interest. In special circumstances, such as those of a great war, such an interest might conceivably become of such paramount and overriding importance as to amount to what lies outside the heads in sec. 92, and is not covered by them. The decision in Russell v. The Queen (1882), 7 App. Cas. 829, appears to recognise this as constitutionally possible, even in time of peace; but it is quite another matter to say that under normal circumstances general Canadian policy can justify interference, on such a scale as the statutes in controversy involve, with the property and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Provinces. It is to the Legislatures of the Provinces that the regulation and restriction of their civil rights have in general been exclusively confided, and as to these the provincial Legislatures possess quasi-sovereign authority. It can, therefore, be only under necessity in highly exceptional circumstances, such as cannot be assumed to exist in the present case, that the liberty of the inhabitants of the Provinces may be restricted by the Parliament of Canada, and that the Dominion can intervene in the interests of Canada as a whole in questions such as the present one. For, normally, the subject matter to be dealt with in the case would be one falling within sec. 92. Nor do the words in sec. 91, the Regulation of Trade and Commerce, if taken by themselves, assist the present Dominion contention. It may well be, if the Parliament of Canada had, by reason of an altogether exceptional situation, capacity to, interfere, that these words would apply so as to enable that Parliament to oust the exclusive character of the provincial powers under sec. 92. In the case of Dominion companies their Lordships in deciding the case of John Deere Plow Company v. Wharton (annotated), 1914 CanLII 603 (UK JCPC), 18 D.L.R. 353 at 359, [1915] A.C. 330 expressed the opinion that the language of sec. 91 (2) could have the effect of aiding Dominion powers conferred by the general language of sec. 91. But that was because the regulation of the trading of Dominion companies was sought to be invoked only in furtherance of a general power which the Dominion Parliament possessed independently of it. Where there was no such power in that Parliament, as in the case of the Dominion Insurance Act, it was held otherwise, and that the authority of the Dominion Parliament to legislate for the regulation of trade and commerce did not, by itself, enable interference with particular trades in which Canadians would, apart from any right of interference conferred by these words above, be free to engage in the Provinces. This result was the outcome of a series of well-known decisions of earlier dates which are now so familiar that they need not be cited.

For analogous reasons the words of head 27 of sec. 91 do not assist the argument for the Dominion. It is one thing to, construe the words "the Criminal Law, except the Constitution of Courts of Criminal Jurisdiction, but including the 'Procedure in criminal matters," as enabling the Dominion Parliament to exercise exclusive legislative power where the subject matter is one by which its very nature belongs to the domain of criminal jurisprudence. A general law, to take an example, making incest a crime, belongs to, this class. It is quite another thing, first to attempt to interfere with a class of subject committed exclusively to the Provincial Legislature, and then to justify this by enacting ancillary provisions, designated as new phases of Dominion Criminal law which require a title to so interfere as basis of their application. …

As their Lordships have already indicated, the jurisdiction attempted to be conferred on the new Board of Commerce appears to them to be ultra vires for the reasons now discussed. It implies a claim of title, in the cases of non-traders as well as of traders, to make orders prohibiting the accumulation of certain articles required for everyday life, and the withholding of such articles from sale at prices to be defined by the Board, whenever they exceed the amount of the material which appears to the Board to be required for domestic purposes or for the ordinary purposes of business. The Board is also given jurisdiction to regulate profits and dealings which may give rise to profit. The power sought to be given to the Board applies to articles produced for his own use by the householder himself, as well as to articles accumulated, not for the market but for the purposes of their own processes of manufacture by manufacturers. The Board is empowered to inquire into individual cases and to deal with them individually, and not merely as the result of applying principles to be laid down as of general application. This would cover such instances as those of coal mines and of local provincial undertakings for meeting provincial requirements of social life.

Legislation setting up a Board of Commerce with such powers appears to their Lordships to be beyond the powers conferred by sec. 91. They find confirmation of this view in sec. 41 of the Board of Commerce Act, which enables the Dominion Executive to review and alter the decisions of the Board. It has already been observed that circumstances are conceivable, such as those of war or famine, when the peace, order and good government of the Dominion might be imperilled under conditions so exceptional that they require legislation of a character in reality beyond anything provided for by the enumerated heads in either sec. 92 or sec. 91 itself. Such a case, if it were to arise would have to be considered closely before the conclusion could properly be reached that it was one which could not be treated as falling under any of the heads enumerated. Still, it is a conceivable case, and although great caution is required in referring to it, even in general terms, it ought not, in the view their Lordships take of the B.N.A. Act, read as a whole, to be excluded from what is possible. For throughout the provisions of that Act there is apparent the recognition that subjects which would normally belong exclusively to a specifically assigned class of subject may, under different circumstances and in another aspect, assume a further significance. Such an aspect may conceivably become of paramount importance, and of dimensions that give rise to other aspects. This is a principle which, although recognised in earlier decisions, … has always been applied with reluctance, and its recognition as relevant can be justified only after scrutiny sufficient to render it clear that the circumstances are abnormal. In the case before them, however important [the policy] may seem to the Parliament of Canada … , their Lordships do not find any evidence that the standard of necessity referred to has been reached, or that the attainment of the end sought is practicable … without the cooperation of the Provincial Legislatures. It may well be that it is within the power of the Dominion Parliament to call, for example, for statistical and other information which may be valuable for guidance in questions affecting Canada as a whole. Such information may be required before any power to regulate trade and commerce can be properly exercised, even where such power is construed in a fashion much narrower than that in which it was sought to interpret it in the argument at the Bar for the Attorney-General for Canada. But even this consideration affords no justification for interpreting the words of sec. 91 (2) in a fashion which would, as was said in the argument on the other side, make them confer capacity to regulate particular trades and businesses.

For the reasons now given their Lordships are of opinion that the first of the questions brought before them must be answered in the negative. As a consequence the second question does not arise…

4.1 Questions and Notes

1. Was Viscount Haldane faithful to Lord Watson's 'national dimensions' formulation for the POGG power? How did he depart from that formulation?
2. Haldane speaks of a subject attaining a federal 'aspect' which renders that subject of 'paramount importance.' Is this what Lord Fitzgerald had in mind in Hodge?
3. Note that Viscount Haldane's shrinking of federal trade and commerce authority – it would only be available 'in aid' of other enumerations – was not followed in JCPC rulings after 1928 (the year of Haldane' death). Nor was Haldane, himself, entirely faithful to this interpretation. See discussion in David Schneiderman, "Harold Laski, Viscount Haldane, and the Law of the Canadian Constitution in the Early Twentieth Century" (1998) 48 University of Toronto Law Journal 521 at 555.

5 Fort Frances Pulp and Paper Co v Manitoba Free Press Co, 1923 CanLII 429, [1923] AC 695 (UKJCPC)

Viscount HALDANE: …

It is clear that in normal circumstances the Dominion Parliament could not have so legislated as to set up the machinery of control over the paper manufacturers which is now in question. The recent decision of the Judicial Committee in the Board of Commerce Case, Att'y-Gen'l of Canada v. Att'y-Gen'l of Alberta, 1921 CanLII 399 (UK JCPC), 60 D.L.R. 513, [1922] 1 A.C. 191, as well as earlier decisions, shew that as the Dominion Parliament cannot ordinarily legislate so as to interfere with property and civil rights in the Provinces, it could not have done what the two statutes under consideration purport to do had the situation been normal. But it does not follow that in a very different case, such as that of sudden danger to social order arising from the outbreak of a great war, the Parliament of the Dominion cannot act under other powers which may well be implied in the constitution. The reasons given in the Board of Commerce case recognise exceptional cases where such a power may be implied.

In the event of war, when the national life may require for its preservation the employment of very exceptional means, the provision of peace, order and good government for the country as a whole may involve effort on behalf of the whole nation, in which the interests of individuals may have to be subordinated to that of the community in a fashion which requires sec. 91 to be interpreted as providing for such an emergency. The general control of property and civil rights for normal purposes remains with the Provincial Legislatures. But questions may arise by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concern nothing, short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

The overriding powers enumerated in sec. 91, as well as the general words at the commencement of the section, may then become applicable to new and special aspects which they cover of subjects assigned otherwise exclusively to the Provinces. It may be, for example, impossible to deal adequately with the new questions which arise without the imposition of special regulations on trade and commerce of a kind that only what the emergency has created places within the competency of the Dominion Parliament. It is proprietary and civil rights in new relations, which they do not present in normal times, that have to be dealt with; and these relations, which affect Canada as an entirety, fall within sec. 91 because in their fullness they extend beyond what sec. 92 can really cover. The kind of power adequate for dealing with them is only to be found in that part of the constitution which establishes power in the state as a whole. For it is not one that can be reliably provided for by depending on collective action of the legislatures of the individual Provinces agreeing for the purpose. That the basic instrument on which the character of the entire constitution depends should be construed as providing for such centralised power in an emergency situation follows from the manifestation in the language of the Act of the principle that the instrument has among its purposes to provide for the State regarded as a whole, and for the expression and influence of its public opinion as such. This principle of a power so implied has received effect also in countries with a written and apparently rigid constitution such as the United States, where the strictly federal character of the national basic agreement has retained the residuary powers not expressly conferred on the Federal Government for the component Slates. The operation of the scheme of interpretation is all the more to be looked for in a constitution such as that established by the B.N.A. Act, where the residuary powers are given to the Dominion Central Government, and the preamble of the statute declares the intention to be that the Dominion should have a constitution similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom.

Their Lordships, therefore, entertain no doubt that however the wording of secs. 91 and 92 may have laid down a framework under which, as a general principle, the Dominion Parliament is to be excluded from trenching on property and civil rights in the Provinces of Canada, yet in a sufficiently great emergency such as that arising out of war, there is implied the power to deal adequately with that emergency for the safety of the Dominion as a whole. The enumeration in sec. 92 is not in any way repealed in the event of such an occurrence, but a new aspect of the business of Government is recognised as emerging, an aspect which is not covered or precluded by the general words in which powers are assigned to the legislatures of the Provinces as individual units. Where an exact line of demarcation will lie in such cases it may not be easy to lay down a priori, nor is it necessary. For in the solution of the problem regard must be had to the broadened field covered, in case of exceptional necessity, by the language of sec. 91, in which the interests of the Dominion generally are protected. As to these interests the Dominion Government, which in its Parliament represents the people as a whole, must be deemed to be left with considerable freedom to judge.

The other point which arises is whether such exceptional necessity as must be taken to have existed when the war broke out, and almost of necessity for some period subsequent to its outbreak, continued through the whole of the time within which the questions in the present case arose.

When war has broken out it may be requisite to make special provision to ensure the maintenance of law and order in a country, even when it is in no immediate danger of invasion. Public opinion may become excitable, and one of the causes of this may conceivably be want of uninterrupted information in newspapers. Steps may have to be taken to ensure supplies of these and to avoid shortage, and the effect of the economic and other disturbance occasioned originally by the war may thus continue for some time after it is terminated. The question of the extent to which provision for circumstances such as these may have to be maintained is one on which a Court of law is loathe to enter. No authority other than the central government is in a position to deal with a problem which is essentially one of statesmanship. It may be that it has become clear that the crisis which arose is wholly at an end and that there is no justification for the continued exercise of an exceptional interference which becomes ultra vires when it is no longer called for. In such a case the law as laid down for distribution of powers in the ruling instrument would have to be invoked. But very clear evidence that the crisis had wholly passed away would be required to justify the judiciary, even when the question raised was one of ultra vires which it had to decide, in overruling the decision of the Government that exceptional measures were still requisite. In saying what is almost obvious, their Lordships observe themselves to be in accord with the view taken under analogous circumstances by the Supreme Court of the United States, and expressed in such decisions as that in October, 1919, in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries (1919), 251 U.S. Rep. 146.

When then, in the present instance, can it be said that the necessity altogether ceased for maintaining the exceptional measure of control over the newspaper print industry introduced while the war was at its height? At what date did the disturbed state of Canada which the war had produced so entirely pass away that the legislative measures relied on in the present case became ultra vires? It is enough to say that there is no clear and unmistakable evidence that the Government was in error in thinking that the necessity was still in existence at the dates on which the action in question was taken by the Paper Control Tribunal. No doubt late in 1919 statements were made to the effect that the war itself was at an end. For example, in the Order in Council made at Ottawa on December 20, 1919, it is stated that it must:

> "be realised that although no proclamation has been issued declaring that the was no longer exists, actual war conditions have in fact long ago ceased to exist, and consequently existence of war can no longer be urged as a reason in fact for maintaining these extraordinary regulations as necessary or advisable for the security of Canada."

The Order in Council then goes on to say that in consequence of the armistice of November, 1918, the Expeditionary Force had since been withdrawn and demobilised, and the country generally is devoting its energies to re-establishment in the ordinary avocations of peace. In these circumstances, it states, the Minister of Justice considers that the time has arrived when the emergency Government legislation should cease to operate. (This was in December, 1919). The order then goes on to declare repealed all orders and regulations of the Governor in Council which depend for their sanction upon sec. 6 of the War Measures Act, 1914, and repeals them as from January 1, 1920. But from this repeal it expressly excepts, among other orders and regulations specified, those relating to paper control, which are to remain in force until the end of another Session of Parliament.

It will be observed that this Order in Council deals only with the results following from the cessation of actual war conditions. It excepts from repeal certain measures concerned with consequential conditions arising out of war, which may obviously continue to produce effects remaining in operation after war itself is over.

Their Lordships find themselves unable to say that the Dominion Government had no good reason for thus temporarily continuing the paper control after actual war had ceased, but while the effects of war conditions might still be operative. …

5.1 Questions

1. Why was Viscount Haldane so deferential to federal authority in Fort Frances? Did the fact that Haldane served as Secretary of State, and reorganized the British Army and Navy in the lead up to the first World War, play a role?
2. Haldane invites litigants to challenge continuing exercises of the federal emergency power should they have 'clear and unmistakable evidence' that the emergency has passed. Was Haldane welcoming the introduction of social science evidence into Canadian constitutional litigation? Is this a helpful innovation? What standard of review would Haldane have applied in order to determine that the lingering effects of an emergency had ended?

6 Toronto Electric Commissioners v Snider, 1925 CanLII 331, [1925] AC 396 (UKJCPC)

Lord HALDANE: …

Their Lordships are of opinion that, on authority as well as on principle, they are today precluded from accepting the arguments that the Dominion Act in controversy can be justified as being an exercise of the Dominion power under s. 91 in relation to criminal law. What the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act … aimed at accomplishing was to enable the Dominion Government to appoint anywhere in Canada a Board of Conciliation and Investigation to which the dispute between an employer and his employees might be referred. The Board was to have power to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel the production of documents. It could under the Act enter premises, interrogate the persons there, and inspect the work. It rendered it unlawful for an employer to lock-out or for a workman to strike, on account of the dispute, prior to or during the reference, and imposed an obligation on employees and employers to give 30 days' notice of any intended change affecting wages or hours. … It is obvious that these provisions dealt with civil rights, and it was not within the power of the Dominion Parliament to make this otherwise by imposing merely ancillary penalties. The penalties for breach of the restrictions did not [lessen] the statute['s] … interference with civil rights in its pith and substance. The Act is not one which aims at making striking generally a new crime. Moreover, the employer retains under the general common law a right to lock-out, only slightly interfered with by the penalty. In this connection their Lordships are therefore of opinion that the validity of the Act cannot be sustained. …

Nor does the invocation of the specific power in s. 91 to regulate trade and commerce assist the Dominion contention. …

It is, in their Lordships' opinion, now clear that, excepting so far as the power can be invoked in aid of capacity conferred independently under other words in s. 91, the power to regulate trade and commerce cannot be relied on as enabling the Dominion Parliament to regulate civil rights in the Provinces.

A more difficult question arises with reference to the initial words of s. 91, which enable the Parliament of Canada to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada in matters falling outside the provincial powers specifically conferred by s. 92. …

It appears to their Lordships that it is not now open to them to treat Russell v. The Queen as having established the general principle that the mere fact that Dominion legislation is for the general advantage of Canada or is such that it will meet a mere want which is felt throughout the Dominion, renders it competent if it cannot be brought within the heads enumerated specifically in s. 91. Unless this is so, if the subject-matter falls within any of the enumerated heads in s. 92, such legislation belongs exclusively to provincial competency. No doubt there may be cases arising out of some extraordinary peril to the national life of Canada, as a whole, such as the cases arising out of a war, where legislation is required of an order that passes beyond the heads of exclusive provincial competency. Such cases may be dealt with under the words at the commencement; of s. 91, conferring general powers in relation to peace, order and good government, simply because such cases are not otherwise provided for. But instances of this, as was pointed out in the judgment in Fort Frances Pulp & Paper Co. v. Manitoba Free Press, 1923 CanLII 429 (UK JCPC), [1923] 3 D.L.R. 629, [1923] A.C. 695, are highly exceptional. Their Lordships think that the decision in Russell v. The Queen can only be supported today, not on the footing of having laid down an interpretation, such as has sometimes been invoked of the general words at the beginning of s. 91, but on the assumption of the Board, apparently made at the time of deciding the case of Russell v. The Queen, that the evil of intemperance at that time amounted in Canada to one so great and so general that at least for the period it was a menace to the national life of Canada so serious and pressing that the National Parliament was called on to intervene to protect the nation from disaster. An epidemic of pestilence might conceivably have been regarded as analogous. It is plain from the decision in the case, Att'y-Gen'l of Canada v.

Att'y-Gen'l of Alberto, supra, that the evil of profiteering could not have been so invoked, for provincial powers, if exercised, were adequate to it. Their Lordships find it difficult to explain the decision in Russell v. The Queen as more than a decision of this order upon facts, considered to have been established at its date rather than upon general law. …

As the result of consideration, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that they ought humbly to advise the Sovereign that the appeal should be allowed, and that judgment should be entered for the appellants for the declaration and injunction claimed. …

6.1 Questions and Notes

1. The federal law in Snider had been in force for 18 years before it was declared ultra vires. It seemed to be working quite well, bringing some peace to industrial disputes. Why would Lord Haldane (now Lord Chancellor in the first British Labour government) upset this regime which was, by then, well settled law?
2. Are you convinced by Haldane's interpretation of Russell v. The Queen?
3. What explains Haldane's penchant for preferring provincial authority? Some attribute this to Haldane's Scottish roots in civil law, others to his preoccupation with Hegelian philosophy, or to his economic liberalism (he authored a book on Adam Smith in 1887). After the First World War, however, Haldane famously declared that 'We are all Socialists now' and served as the first Lord Chancellor for the new Labour Government. Consider whether the following excerpt provides a convincing explanation:

"Federalistic feeling' was described as 'curiously widespread' in Britain in the early part of the twentieth century... [The theory of political pluralism] merged these economic and political streams, attacking the all-absorptive state and promoting the inherent worthiness of group associations. . . [Political scientist Harold Laski was one of the leading figures of the British political pluralist movement.] Laski believed that citizens derived meaning and identity from the plurality of groups with which they were associated. The individual was portrayed as a complex of multiple loyalties and belongings with many forms of association competing for his or her allegiance. He described the individual as 'a point towards which a thousand associations converge.' Whether we will it or not, he wrote, we are all a 'bundle of hyphens.' . . .

If the state had no privileged existence over group life, it could not legitimately attempt to absorb or control the diverse allegiances of its citizens. Each of these associations - 'the club, trade-union, church, society, town, country, university' - has a 'group-life, a group-will, to enrich the imagination.' English law treated organized groups largely as incapable of having an existence independent of the state - group life was contingent upon, rather than independent of, state recognition…

The modern state was in need of more, not less, decentralization. To consider Ottawa or Washington as reserves of nascent power capable of resolving conflict by simple generalizable solutions was to risk local stagnation. Centralized government, wrote Laski, 'cannot grasp ... the genius of place:' 'To multiply the centres of authority is to multiply the channels of discussion and so promote the diffusion of healthy and independent opinion.' In contrast, the vices of centralized government for Laski were numerous:

> It is so baffled by the very vastness of its business as necessarily to be narrow and despotic and over-formal in character. It tends to substitute for a real effort to grapple with special problems an attempt to apply wide generalisations that are in fact irrelevant. It involves the decay of local energy by taking real power from its hands. It puts real responsibility in a situation where, from its very flavour of generality, an unreal experiment is postulated. It prevents the saving grace of experiment. It invites the congestion of business...

For the pluralists, then, self-government was exercised preferably at local levels where the implications of social policy choices could be felt and better understood. The object of the pluralist state was to partition power along these lines so that the diversity of group life could be given expression. Functional devolution along territorial and non-territorial lines not only facilitated the expression of individual moral development through participation in associational life, it also created a 'corporate sense of responsibility' or 'training in self-government.' Like Hegel (and Mill), Laski believed that local self-government was 'educative in perhaps a higher degree, at least contingently, than any other part of government.' This training in self-government would lead, ultimately, to connections being made between associational life and 'the general background of social life.'

In a highly decentralized society, what role remained for the national state? On this, Laski moved from a position of radical polyarchy in 1915 to one of centralized authority for the performance of key public functions in 1925. For just as associations had social functions to fulfil, so did the state. 'The state exists as the most adequate means we have yet invented for the promotion of an end we deem good,' admitted Laski…

[Lord Haldane befriended Laski and wrote, in his review of Laski's 1922 book The Foundation of Sovereignty and Other Essays, that Laski] had 'achieved a remarkable success' with this book. Regarding the personality of associations, Laski had 'no difficulty in showing that the reluctance of our jurisprudence to treat an association as a person that can be made responsible in law has given rise to many obscurities and difficulties.' Haldane contrasted the monistic with the pluralistic view of the state and concluded that the doctrine of political pluralism 'is an ethical ideal' greatly superior to the monistic state. It is those 'institutions which have genuine popular power expressed in them that become organs of ethical ideals and of true citizenship, and so the superiority of the pluralistic State becomes evident,' wrote Haldane. Decentralization, therefore, was 'essential.' Haldane also could agree with Laski's desire to remodel government from time to time, not only in the direction of devolution, but also in the other direction: 'In wartime, a highly centralized control may be essential. In peacetime it may be politically and ethically very undesirable.'…

The true nature of state sovereignty, then, was not revealed in the arguments of either the monists or the pluralists. The 'real source of sovereignty,' according to Haldane, was 'general opinion,' which lay behind the institutional apparatus of state and society. Acknowledging merit in the monist case, Haldane argued that the minds that constitute the general will cohere into a 'unitary and monistic' form represented by the state, though this is not the exclusive vehicle of public opinion. Its 'forms of expression may be diverse,' Haldane conceded to the pluralists. The true source of sovereignty, though, was constituted neither wholly in the state nor in group life; rather, it could be found in 'public opinion,' which he equated with the general will…

The distribution of sovereignty to organizational groups did not exclude the general will 'which may manifest itself as supreme, and may arm Govt. with extended authority on occasion.' The general will, as an expression of homogeneous opinion, could emerge to supersede the heterogeneity of sovereignty in such extreme circumstances. Ernest Barker, in his modified defence of the pluralists, agreed: 'If it comes to a pinch, we shall forget that we are anything but citizens."

Chapter 6: Characterization of Laws and Interpretation Doctrines

By Asha Kaushal and Jodi Lazare

1 Foundations

Sections 91 through 95 of the Constitution Act, 1867, divide legislative power between the federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures. These provisions provide legislative authority in relation to 'matters coming within classes of subjects', tasking courts to determine the matter and then assign it to one of the classes of subjects.

This describes the two main components of federalism analysis: characterization and classification. Courts must first characterize the legislation in order to next classify the legislation under the appropriate head of power. In Re Impact Assessment Act and Murray Hall, the Court insisted that these two stages should be kept analytically separate. Courts and commentators alike have found this extraordinarily difficult to achieve; but these recent judgments nonetheless reiterate the importance of analytical separation. This chapter is concerned with the characterization stage, while subsequent chapters examine the classification stage and the various heads of power in detail.

The characterization inquiry always begins with pith and substance analysis. Sometimes that analysis will conclusively determine the validity of the legislation. Where pith and substance analysis is not conclusive, however, courts will turn to other interpretation doctrines and the inquiry will continue. All of these interpretation doctrines are considered part of the characterization stage of analysis.

The first task for courts is to determine the 'matter' of the legislation. They use 'pith and substance doctrine' to do so. The term 'matter' is derived from the wording of sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The introductory parts of sections 91 and 92, which allocate power between the federal government and the provincial and territorial governments, read as follows:

> 91 It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,
> 92 In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,

The 'matter' is the concern of the characterization stage, while the 'classes of subjects' or heads of power are the concern of the classification stage. The term 'matter' has been variously described by courts and commentators to refer to the 'dominant characteristic', 'main thrust', 'true character', 'leading feature', or 'real character'.

Courts will consider several aspects of the statute in their determination, including those that go beyond the four corners of the legislation, as Sopinka J explained in Morgentaler. These include purpose and effects, but also legislative debates and speeches, reports, and related legislation.

As you read the case excerpts below, think about how the pith and substance approaches they embody differ from one another as well as what they have in common.

Legislation will often deal with several subjects in relation to a given matter. For example, a federal statute that is centrally concerned with the matter of banking may also deal with insurance and civil rights of action. Both insurance and civil rights of action fall under provincial classes of subjects. In such circumstances, pith and substance analysis takes on heightened importance. If the banking statute is mischaracterized, then it will likely also be misclassified as falling under provincial jurisdiction. Some of the other interpretation doctrines may be relevant in such a situation. The first section, below, focuses squarely on pith and substance doctrine.

2 Pith and substance

In recent years, the Court has clarified the pith and substance doctrine. In Reference re Impact Assessment Act, 2023 SCC 23, reflecting on the multiple articulations of pith and substance put forward by the parties, intervenors, and judges in the court below, Chief Justice Wagner pressed the distinction between characterization and classification analyses.

> [65] When formulating the pith and substance of a law, litigants and courts may be inclined to glance ahead to the classification step and the catalogue of potential heads of power. It is imperative, however, that the characterization and classification analyses be kept distinct (References re GGPPA, at para. 56). In determining the pith and substance of a law, courts must not refer to the heads of power contained within the Constitution Act, 1867. Only after precisely stating the matter to which the law relates should a court proceed to the classification phase of the analysis and consider specific heads of power.
> [66] The judges in the court below, the parties and the interveners adopt differing articulations of the impugned scheme's pith and substance. With respect, several of these articulations erroneously combine or conflate the characterization of the scheme with its classification.
> [67] The Attorney General of Canada submits that the pith and substance of the IAA is to "establish a federal environmental assessment process to safeguard against adverse environmental effects in relation to matters within federal jurisdiction" (A.F., at para. 47). The latter part of this characterization — "in relation to matters within federal jurisdiction" — predetermines the classification of the matter of the scheme under federal heads of power. It amounts to a statement that the main thrust of the scheme is to do what it does in a constitutionally valid manner.
> [68] The majority of the Court of Appeal fell into the same error when it concluded, as part of its characterization inquiry, that the scheme's purpose and effects reveal an "impermissible degree of federal jurisdictional overreach" (para. 373). This is the language of classification; the characterization step of the analysis must focus exclusively on the "pith and substance" or "dominant characteristic" of the law.

This approach requires judges to characterize the pith and substance of the legislation without regard to its classification under the possible heads of power.

2.1 Murray Hall v Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10

In 2018, the federal government decriminalized the recreational sale and use of cannabis in Canada. This national decriminalization effort required a complex legislative scheme and provincial and territorial cooperation. Provinces passed legislation governing the retail sale and storage of cannabis. The Cannabis Act, SC 2018 c. 16, is the federal legislation that decriminalizes cannabis by excluding it from the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, SC 1996, c. 19. Sections 8 and 9 of the Cannabis Act prohibit the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants but exempts four plants from those prohibitions:

Possession

8 (1) Unless authorized under this Act, it is prohibited …

(e) for an individual to possess more than four cannabis plants that are not budding or flowering; …

Production

12 Cultivation, propagation and harvesting — 18 years of age or older

(4) Unless authorized under this Act, it is prohibited for an individual who is 18 years of age or older to cultivate, propagate or harvest, or to offer to cultivate, propagate or harvest, …

(b) more than four cannabis plants at any one time in their dwelling house.

On June 12, 2018, the Quebec legislature passed Cannabis Regulation Act, CQLR, c. C-5.3. Sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the cultivation of such plants in a dwelling-house altogether. These prohibitions were accompanied by fines. Sections 5 and 10 read as follows:

5. It is prohibited to possess a cannabis plant.

Anyone who contravenes the first paragraph commits an offence and is liable to a fine of $250 to $750. Those amounts are doubled for a subsequent offence.

10. It is prohibited to cultivate cannabis for personal purposes.

That prohibition against cultivating cannabis applies, in particular, to the planting of seeds and plants, the propagation of plants from cuttings, the cultivation of plants and the harvesting of their production.

Anyone who contravenes the first paragraph by cultivating four cannabis plants or less in their dwelling-house commits an offence and is liable to a fine of $250 to $750. Those amounts are doubled for a subsequent offence.

In October 2018, Janick Murray-Hall brought a claim in the Quebec Superior Court arguing that section 5 and 10 of the provincial Act were ultra vires the jurisdiction of Québec. The resulting unanimous decision, Murray Hall v Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10 delivered by Wagner CJC, helpfully sets out a singular pith and substance analysis.

[22] To decide whether a law or some of its provisions are constitutionally valid under the division of powers, courts must first characterize the law or provisions and then, on that basis, classify them by reference to the heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, [2020] 2 SCR 283, at para. 26, citing Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783, at para. 15).

[23] At the characterization stage, what must be determined is the pith and substance of the law (Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, at para. 28, citing Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, at para. 26). In its jurisprudence, the Court has described the aim of this exercise as being to identify the "dominant purpose" of the law (RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, at para. 29), its "dominant or most important characteristic" (Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 3, at pp. 62-63) or its "leading feature or true character" (R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463, at pp. 481-82). At the classification stage, in turn, what must be determined is whether the pith and substance thereby defined comes within one of the heads of power of the enacting legislature (Reference re Firearms Act, at para. 25).

[24] To ascertain the pith and substance of a law, courts look at its purpose and effects (Reference re Firearms Act, at para. 16). This essentially interpretative exercise is meant to be neither technical nor formalistic, to use the words of the late Professor Peter W. Hogg (Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 1, at p. 15-12, cited in Ward v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 SCR 569, at para. 18). Indeed, in addition to the words used in the law itself, courts may consider the circumstances surrounding its enactment (Ward, at para. 17, citing Reference re Firearms Act, at paras. 17-18, and Morgentaler, at p. 483).

[25] To analyze the purpose of a law, courts rely on intrinsic evidence, that is, the actual text of the law, including its preamble and purpose clauses, as well as extrinsic evidence, such as parliamentary debates and minutes of parliamentary committees (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 27; Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, [2002] 2 SCR 146, at paras. 53-54; Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 SCR 457 ("Reference re AHRA"), at paras. 22 and 184). In looking at the effects of the law, courts consider both its legal effects, namely those related directly to the provisions of the law itself, and its practical effects, that is, the "side" effects arising from its application (Kitkatla Band, at para. 54, citing Morgentaler, at pp. 482-83).

[26] That being said, I would nonetheless emphasize that textual analysis is the focus of the characterization exercise. As Kasirer J. noted in Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, "[i]n the final analysis, it is the substance of the legislation that needs to be characterized, not speeches in Parliament or utterances in the press" (para. 165).

[27] I will devote the next few sections to these two stages of the analysis — characterization and classification — in order to determine whether the Court of Appeal correctly held that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are constitutionally valid.

(2) Characterization of the Impugned Provisions

[28] In my view, the pith and substance of the impugned provisions is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly in order to protect the health and security of the public, and of young persons in particular, from cannabis harm. It follows that the prohibitions against the possession of cannabis plants and their cultivation at home set out in ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are a means of serving the public health and security objectives pursued by that Act. With a few slight differences, my conclusion at the characterization stage is the same as that of the Court of Appeal.

[29] Before embarking on the analysis, I will provide a brief overview of the principles that apply in characterizing provisions that are alleged to be an integral part of a regulatory scheme. It is helpful to clarify the extent to which courts should analyze a law as a whole in order to characterize some of its provisions. The question is relevant in this case because the parties' disagreement at the characterization stage essentially stems from the emphasis they place, respectively, on the impugned provisions and on the provincial Act considered in its entirety. Mr. Murray-Hall focuses on the provisions themselves and criticizes the Court of Appeal for not truly considering the possibility that their purpose differs from that of the Act as a whole. The Attorney General of Quebec instead stresses the role played by the provisions in the scheme, endorsing the Court of Appeal's statement that [translation] "their real purpose emerges only when they are analyzed in the overall context of the [provincial Act]" (para. 43).

[30] Where, as in this case, only very specific provisions are being challenged and not the entire law, certain principles apply. A court should begin by characterizing the provisions rather than considering the validity of the law as a whole, a principle articulated by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Attorney General of Canada v. Canadian National Transportation, Ltd., 1983 CanLII 36 (SCC), [1983] 2 SCR 206. However,

Dickson J. added, this does not mean that the provisions must be read in isolation. A contextual analysis of the provisions is necessary when they are part of a regulatory scheme. Dickson J.'s remarks in this regard are as follows:

> It is obvious at the outset that a constitutionally invalid provision will not be saved by being put into an otherwise valid statute, even if the statute comprises a regulatory scheme under the general trade and commerce branch of s. 91(2). The correct approach, where there is some doubt that the impugned provision has the same constitutional characterization as the Act in which it is found, is to start with the challenged section rather than with a demonstration of the validity of the statute as a whole. I do not think, however, this means that the section in question must be read in isolation. If the claim to constitutional validity is based on the contention that the impugned provision is part of a regulatory scheme it would seem necessary to read it in its context. If it can in fact be seen as part of such a scheme, attention will then shift to the constitutionality of the scheme as a whole. [Emphasis added; p. 270.]

[31] This Court has repeatedly emphasized the need to consider the impugned provisions in light of their interaction with the scheme to which they belong. In Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 SCR 693 ("Quebec (Attorney General) 2015"), one of the issues was whether a provision requiring the destruction of long-gun registration data related to the same matter — public safety — as the legislation repealing the registration scheme. Writing for the majority, Cromwell and Karakatsanis JJ. stated the following: ". . . the 'matter' of the provision must be considered in the context of the larger scheme, as its relationship to that scheme may be an important consideration in determining its pith and substance . . ." (para. 30).

[32] The principle enunciated by McLachlin C.J. in Ward, where the issue was whether a section of federal fisheries regulations prohibiting the sale of young seals was constitutionally valid, is also relevant: "The question is not whether the Regulations prohibit the sale so much as why it is prohibited" (para. 19 (emphasis in original)). In that case, therefore, the Court could not simply focus on the fact that the impugned provision imposed a prohibition on sale, trade or barter, which could have suggested that it fell within provincial jurisdiction over property or trade. When the why of the prohibition and its interaction with the rest of the scheme were considered, it became apparent that the purpose of the prohibition was to curtail commercial hunting and that Parliament was validly exercising its fisheries power.

[33] I would also note that reading the impugned provisions in the context of the scheme into which they are integrated is crucial in distinguishing the purpose of the law from the means chosen to achieve it. Indeed, in Ward, McLachlin C.J. cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose" (para. 25).

[34] Bearing in mind the principles laid down in National Transportation and the note of caution sounded in Ward, I will now characterize ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act. I will consider the purpose of these provisions first and then their effects.

(a) Purpose of the Impugned Provisions

(i) Intrinsic Evidence

[35] Sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act set out absolute prohibitions against, respectively, the possession and the cultivation of cannabis plants in a dwelling-house, accompanied by fines of $250 to $750. If we simply focused on the wording of these provisions, as the appellant urges us to do, the concept of prohibition is what would stand out.

[36] However, it is essential to analyze ss. 5 and 10 in light of their context and not just their wording, because it is the Attorney General of Quebec's contention that they are an integral part of the regulatory scheme established by the provincial Act. To echo the words of McLachlin C.J. in Ward, it is not just a matter of finding that the prohibitions against possession and cultivation exist; it is important to look at why they are incorporated into the provincial Act's very specific regulatory scheme.

[37] It is also my view that the impugned provisions must not be read "separately" or "individually" on the pretext that they may relate to a very different matter than the rest of the provisions. As the Court of Appeal said, [translation] "[t]he constitutionality of sections 5 and 10 of the [provincial Act] cannot properly be analyzed in isolation, separately from the [Act] as a whole" (para. 41). Of course, it is quite possible that some provisions of a law may be of "a completely different order" than its other provisions (Westendorp v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 43, at p. 51). But such a conclusion cannot be reached without a contextual analysis of the impugned provisions. Logically, it cannot be determined whether there is a marked difference between the purpose of ss. 5 and 10 and that of the rest of the provincial Act's provisions, as Mr. Murray-Hall alleges, without having considered the Act as a whole.

[38] An overview of the provincial Act reveals the scope of the regulatory scheme introduced by the Quebec legislature. Like the Court of Appeal, I see this undertaking as involving the creation of a state monopoly that oversees each step leading up to the purchase of cannabis by citizens in order to protect the health and security of the public. The prohibitions set out in ss. 5 and 10, along with the other controls put in place by the Act, are the machinery of this undertaking. Specifically, prohibiting the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants contributes to the effectiveness of the state monopoly by steering consumers to the only legally authorized source of supply, that is, the state-owned enterprise.

[39] It is helpful to recall that, at the same time the provincial Act was enacted, the Quebec legislature amended the Act respecting the Société des alcools du Québec, CQLR, c. S-13, to create the SQDC, a subsidiary of the Société des alcools du Québec that would ensure the sale of cannabis "from a health protection perspective, in order to integrate consumers into, and maintain them in, the legal market without encouraging cannabis consumption" (s. 16.1 para. 1; see also s. 3 of Bill 157).

[40] The provincial Act sets out the various aspects governing the exercise of the SQDC's monopoly on the sale of cannabis (s. 25), including control over the location of retail outlets (ss. 27 and 33), control of the quality of the products offered (ss. 29, 44 and 45), a prohibition against selling to persons under 21 years of age (ss. 34 to 39), education of consumers on the health risks of cannabis (ss. 30, 31 para. 2, 41 and 57 para. 2), and compliance with display, signage and packaging standards (ss. 40 to 42, 56 and 57). In my view, the prohibitions and control mechanisms provided for by the provincial Act must be regarded as means chosen to achieve the purposes stated in the first paragraph of s. 1, that is, "to prevent and reduce cannabis harm in order to protect the health and security of the public and of young persons in particular" and "to ensure the preservation of the cannabis market's integrity". These prohibitions and control mechanisms follow logically from the stated purposes because they make it possible, as the second paragraph of the same section says, to regulate "the possession, cultivation, use, sale and promotion of cannabis".

[41] Like the provisions just mentioned, ss. 5 and 10 are part of the monopolistic logic intended by the Quebec legislature, and the prohibitions they impose are a means of achieving the objectives of public health and security.

[42] In reality, the impossibility of possessing and cultivating cannabis plants at home without risking penal sanctions has the effect of steering Quebec consumers to the safe source of supply that is the SQDC. As a result, they receive quality-controlled products and advice from sales employees who have been trained on the risks associated with cannabis consumption (on the first point, see ss. 29, 44 and 45 of the provincial Act and the Regulation to determine other classes of cannabis that may be sold by the Société québécoise du cannabis and certain standards respecting the composition and characteristics of cannabis, CQLR, c. C-5.3, r. 0.1; on the second point, see s. 1 and Sch. I of the Regulation respecting training on the retail sale of cannabis and information to be communicated to a purchaser in the course of a cannabis sale, CQLR, c. C-5.3, r. 1). The fact that consumers buy from the SQDC also means that they are subject to a series of requirements, the most important of which seems to me to be the one setting a minimum age of 21 years for purchasing cannabis from the SQDC.

[43] The essence of the position advanced by the appellant in this Court is that the purpose of the provincial Act could have been achieved by regulating — rather than completely prohibiting — home cannabis cultivation, for example by allowing the possession and cultivation for personal purposes of one, two or three cannabis plants. He argues that, by choosing absolute prohibitions instead, the provincial legislature interfered unduly in the exercise of the federal criminal law power. I note that the absolute nature of the prohibitions was also raised by the trial judge, who saw it as an indication that the Quebec legislature [translation] "in fact sought to mitigate the repeal of the former provisions criminalizing the personal cultivation and possession of cannabis plants" (para. 45).

[44] In my opinion, however, this distinction between the absolute prohibitions being challenged and the more flexible prohibitions mentioned with respect to the permitted number of plants is of no assistance to the appellant. Even if it is accepted that the objective of protecting the health and security of the public could have been achieved by regulating home cannabis cultivation less strictly and not only by completely prohibiting it, this argument is far from being determinative in identifying the pith and substance of the impugned provisions. When two approaches are considered to be potentially effective, it falls to legislative bodies to choose the one that is most likely to further the intended objectives. Indeed, this Court has pointed out on several occasions that considerations relating to the efficacy or wisdom of the means chosen are not helpful at the characterization stage (Ward, at paras. 18 and 22; Reference re Firearms Act, at para. 18, citing Morgentaler, at pp. 487-88; Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837, at para. 90; Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 373, at p. 425).

[45] In short, when viewed together with the other provisions of the provincial Act, ss. 5 and 10 do not have the separate and independent objective of prohibiting the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants for personal purposes. The prohibitions themselves must be seen as one means among a broad range of measures that the Quebec legislature has deemed necessary in order to achieve the provincial Act's public health and security objectives. In particular, the prohibitions act as strong incentives for the integration of "consumers into . . . the legal market" that ensures, among other things, control of the quality of the products offered, education on the risks of cannabis consumption and compliance with rules on the minimum age for purchasing cannabis (see s. 16.1 para. 1 of the Act respecting the Société des alcools du Québec; see also R.F., at para. 12).

(ii) Extrinsic Evidence

[46] In my view, the usefulness of the legislative debates in this appeal is relative. I adopt the Court of Appeal's observation that [translation] "[r]eading them tends . . . to show that the remarks made about the impugned provisions are consistent with the purpose identified earlier in analyzing the intrinsic evidence" (para. 72). The remarks made by the members of the Quebec legislature thus serve to confirm what was already apparent from the interaction between the impugned provisions and the rest of the prohibitions and control mechanisms provided for by the provincial Act, namely that the prohibitions against possession and cultivation at home help to ensure that consumers will buy from the SQDC.

[47] It can be seen from the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health and Social Services that the members of the Quebec legislature considered two approaches to home cultivation: one relying on an absolute prohibition against the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants to ensure that consumers would buy from the state, and the other relying on tolerance of these practices as a lever in the fight against organized crime and the "empowerment" of low-income consumers (see National Assembly, Journal des débats de la Commission permanente de la santé et des services sociaux, vol. 44, No. 189, 1st Sess., 41st Leg., March 21, 2018, at pp. 22 (S. Jolin-Barrette) and 35 (M. Massé); National Assembly, Journal des débats de la Commission permanente de la santé et des services sociaux, vol. 44, No. 191, 1st Sess., 41st Leg., March 27, 2018, at p. 3 (S. Pagé)). The Quebec legislature clearly chose the first of these two approaches.

[48] A comment made by a member of the opposition, which the Minister responsible for Public Health later endorsed, is revealing: [translation] "Out of a concern for public security, out of a concern for public health, out of a concern for proceeding gradually, we make the choice, as a state, not to allow home cultivation, and for purposes of public health and security, we want to guide consumers to the stores of a subsidiary of the state-owned enterprise to make sure that cannabis is consumed responsibly" (Journal des débats de la Commission permanente de la santé et des services sociaux, March 21, 2018, at p. 22 (S. Jolin-Barrette)). The legislature's intention was to promote responsible consumption of the substance by establishing a scheme in which individuals, denied the option of cultivating their own cannabis, would be steered to SQDC outlets.

(b) Effects of the Impugned Provisions

[58] The effects of the impugned provisions are clear, and I agree with the manner in which the Superior Court described them in its reasons:

> [translation] ... the practical consequence of applying ss. 5 and 10 is one, to prevent citizens from possessing and cultivating cannabis plants for personal purposes and two, to force consumers to purchase cannabis from the SQDC.
> The legal consequences of the provincial provisions are one, to prohibit the possession of cannabis plants and the personal cultivation of cannabis and two, to impose penal sanctions for any violation. They also result in penal consequences for acts that were formerly criminal under federal legislation, the CDSA . [paras. 49-50]

[59] I would add, however, that while the impugned provisions do bring otherwise decriminalized conduct into the sphere of penal law, the consequences flowing from a contravention are very different from those arising under the provisions of the CDSA . Persons who contravene ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act are liable to fines that could be said to be relatively modest, since they range from $250 to $750.

[60] Together, the legal and practical effects described above confirm the conclusion I reached earlier after analyzing the intrinsic and extrinsic evidence. The purpose of ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act is not to suppress possession and cultivation at home as such, but rather to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly in order to protect the health and security of the public from cannabis harm.

[61] One final point concerning the effects of the impugned provisions warrants further comment. The intervener the Canadian Association for Progress in Justice submits that the colourability of the impugned provisions may be revealed by considering their effects, in addition to looking at the legislative debates. Specifically, it argues that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act and a series of criminal offences set out in the federal Act have the combined effect of recriminalizing conduct that has nonetheless been decriminalized. The provincial prohibitions allegedly transform cannabis plants possessed or cultivated by individuals in Quebec into a form of "illicit cannabis" within the meaning of s. 2 of the federal Act, which defines this term as follows: ". . . cannabis that is or was sold, produced or distributed by a person prohibited from doing so under this Act or any provincial Act . . . ." The possession, distribution, cultivation and production of "illicit cannabis" are the subject of criminal offences under ss. 8(1)(b), 9(1)(a)(iv), 12(4)(a) and 13(1), respectively, of the federal Act. According to the intervener, the impugned provisions of the provincial Act therefore create not only regulatory offences but also criminal offences because of the "illicit" nature of the plants cultivated in Quebec dwelling-houses.

[62] I accept the premise that considering the legislative debates and analyzing effects may be helpful in establishing the colourability of a law. The Court stated this itself in Reference re Firearms Act, noting that "the effects of the law may suggest a purpose other than that which is stated in the law" and that a law "is sometimes said to be 'colourable'" where its effects diverge substantially from its stated aim (para. 18).

That being said, however, I cannot accept the argument that the recriminalization of conduct that has been decriminalized in this case is an effect of the provincial provisions, when their interaction with the federal Act is taken into account. Parliament drafted the definition of "illicit cannabis" by reference to provincial legislation and in such a way that conduct for which penal sanctions are imposed by the provinces is subject to the criminal prohibitions set out in ss. 8(1)(b), 9(1)(a)(iv), 12(4)(a) and 13(1) of the federal Act. The possibility that the possession or cultivation of one to four cannabis plants at home could be recriminalized therefore arises solely from the decision made by Parliament to contemplate provincial regulatory action in s. 2 of the federal Act. To put it simply, any possible recriminalization results not from the provincial provisions but only from the federal provisions.

[63] To accept the intervener's argument would mean that the enactment by a province of any prohibition against cannabis for regulatory purposes would be ultra vires because it would already be covered by the definition of "illicit cannabis" and by the possible application of the criminal prohibitions set out in ss. 8(1)(b), 9(1)(a)(iv), 12(4)(a) and 13(1) of the federal Act. In practical terms, this would negate the provinces' power to regulate the use of this substance. Such a result would be contrary to the view of federalism espoused by this Court and to the clear intention of Parliament. On this last point, Parliament obviously assumed that the provinces would be able to legislate with respect to cannabis within their fields of jurisdiction — hence the reference to provincial legislation in the definition of "illicit cannabis".

(c) Conclusion on Pith and Substance

[64] For the reasons given above, I conclude that the pith and substance of ss. 5 and 10 is to ensure the effectiveness of the state monopoly on the sale of cannabis in order to protect the health and security of the public, and of young persons in particular, from the harm caused by this substance. Prohibiting the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants is not in itself the purpose of the impugned provisions, but rather a means of steering consumers to the only source of supply considered to be reliable and safe.

2.2 References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11

In References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11, Chief Justice Wagner set out the overarching principles of the pith and substance doctrine, explaining its purpose and reviewing three central features of the pith and substance analysis:

(1) Overarching Principles

[51] At the first stage of the division of powers analysis, a court must consider the purpose and effects of the challenged statute or provision in order to identify its "pith and substance", or true subject matter: 2018 Securities Reference, at para. 86; Reference re Genetic Non-Discrimination Act, 2020 SCC 17, at paras. 28 and 166. The court does so with a view to identifying the statute's or provision's main thrust, or dominant or most important characteristic: Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, at para. 31. To determine the purpose of the challenged statute or provision, the court can consider both intrinsic evidence, such as the legislation's preamble or purpose clauses, and extrinsic evidence, such as Hansard or minutes of parliamentary committees: Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), 2002 SCC 31, [2002] 2 SCR 146, at para. 53; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 27. In considering the effects of the challenged legislation, the court can consider both the legal effects, those that flow directly from the provisions of the statute itself, and the practical effects, the "side" effects that flow from the application of the statute: Kitkatla, at para. 54; R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463, at p. 480. The characterization process is not technical or formalistic. A court can look at the background and circumstances of a statute's enactment as well as at the words used in it: Ward v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 17, [2002] 1 SCR 569, at para. 18.

[52] Three further points with respect to the identification of the pith and substance are important here. First, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision must be described as precisely as possible. A vague or general description is unhelpful, as it can result in the law being superficially assigned to both federal and provincial heads of powers or may exaggerate the extent to which the law extends into the other level of government's sphere of jurisdiction: Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35; Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, [2010] 3 SCR 457 ("Assisted Human Reproduction Act"), at para. 190. However, precision should not be confused with narrowness. Instead, the pith and substance of a challenged statute or provision should capture the law's essential character in terms that are as precise as the law will allow: Genetic Non-Discrimination, at para. 32. It is only in this manner that a court can determine what the law is in fact "all about": Desgagnés Transport, at para. 35, quoting A. S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 490.

[53] Second, it is permissible in some circumstances for a court to include the legislative choice of means in the definition of a statute's pith and substance, as long as it does not lose sight of the fact that the goal of the analysis is to identify the true subject matter of the challenged statute or provision. In the courts below, a central issue was the permissibility of including the means of the statute in the definition of the subject matter of the GGPPA. In Ward and other cases, this Court cautioned against "confus[ing] the purpose of the legislation with the means used to carry out that purpose": Ward, at para. 25; see also Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 SCR 693, at para. 29; Goodwin v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2015 SCC 46, [2015] 3 SCR 250, at para. 24. However, those cases did not establish a blanket prohibition on considering the means in characterizing the pith and substance of a law. Rather, they stand for the basic proposition that Parliament's or a provincial legislature's choice of means is not determinative of the legislation's true subject matter, although it may sometimes be permissible to consider the choice of means in defining a statute's purpose. This Court has in fact frequently included references to legislative means when defining the pith and substance of laws: Ward, at para. 28; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783 ("Firearms"), at paras. 4 and 19; Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, 2005 SCC 56, [2002] 2 SCR 669, at para. 34; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 106. And there may be cases in which an impugned statute's dominant characteristic or main thrust is so closely tied to its means that treating the means as irrelevant to the identification of the pith and substance would make it difficult to define the matter of a statute or a provision precisely. In such a case, a broad pith and substance that does not include the means would be the very type of vague and general characterization, like "health" or "the environment", that this Court described as unhelpful in Desgagnés Transport, at paras. 35 and 167 (citing Assisted Human Reproduction Act, at para. 190).

[54] Even this Court's jurisprudence on the national concern doctrine illustrates that there is nothing impermissible about defining a matter with reference to the legislative means. In Munro v. National Capital Commission, 1966 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1966] SCR 663, the Court defined the matter in terms of both the overarching objective — ensuring that "the nature and character of the seat of the Government of Canada may be in accordance with its national significance" — and the legislative means for achieving this objective — "development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region": pp. 669 and 671. Similarly, in Crown Zellerbach, the Court did not define the matter of the statute broadly in terms of marine pollution. The definition of the matter was in fact a combination of the overarching purpose — controlling marine pollution — and the particular means that had been chosen — controlling the dumping of substances into the sea: pp. 436-37. La Forest J., dissenting, pointed out that regulating the dumping of substances into the sea was only one of multiple means to control marine pollution, given that pollution could also enter the sea through fresh water and through the air: p. 457.

[55] … [In] some cases the choice of means may be so central to the legislative objective that the main thrust of a statute or provision, properly understood, is to achieve a result in a particular way, which would justify including the means in identifying the pith and substance….

[56] Third, the characterization and classification stages of the division of powers analysis are and must be kept distinct. In other words, the pith and substance of a statute or a provision must be identified without regard to the heads of legislative competence. As Binnie J. noted in Chatterjee v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2009 SCC 19, [2009] 1 SCR 624, at para. 16, a failure to keep these two stages of the analysis distinct would create "a danger that the whole exercise will become blurred and overly oriented towards results". The characterization exercise must ultimately be rooted in the purpose and the effects of the impugned statute or provision.

2.3 R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463

R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463 is an older example of the practical application of the pith and substance analysis. It marked the full acceptance of extrinsic evidence that goes 'beyond the four corners of the Act' for pith and substance doctrine. The case also goes through the classification stage of the analysis, but there was no controversy around the established principle that prohibiting abortion was the proper subject of the criminal law. As you read the excerpt below, consider whether the Sopinka J separates the characterization stage from the classification stage of analysis.

At issue in Morgentaler was the constitutionality of a Nova Scotian provincial law that made it an offence to perform an abortion outside a hospital. This prohibition on abortions outside of hospitals raised the spectre of invalidity because five years prior, in 1988, the Court had ruled that the Criminal Code provisions criminalizing abortion were unconstitutional because they violated women's Charter guarantee of security of the person (R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30). That 1988 decision meant that it was no longer a criminal offence to obtain or perform an abortion. In 1989, Dr. Henry Morgentaler confirmed that he planned to establish an abortion clinic in Halifax. The provincial legislation making it an offence to perform an abortion outside a hospital quickly followed. Thus, the crux of the issue concerned the 'true nature' or 'precise matter' of the provincial legislation.

> On March 16, 1989, the … Governor in Council approved two identical regulations, one under the Health Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 195 (N.S. Reg. 33/89), and one under the Hospitals Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 208 (N.S. Reg. 34/89), which prohibited the performance of an abortion anywhere other than in a place approved as a hospital under the Hospitals Act. At the same time it made a regulation (N.S. Reg. 32/89) pursuant to the Health Services and Insurance Act, R.S.N.S. 1989, c. 197, denying medical services insurance coverage for abortions performed outside a hospital. These regulations are referred to collectively as the "March regulations".
> … [O]n June 6, 1989, when the Minister of Health and Fitness introduced the Medical Services Act for first reading. The Act progressed rapidly through the legislature. It received third reading and Royal Assent on June 15, the last day of the legislative session. The relevant portions of the Act are as follows:
> 2 The purpose of this Act is to prohibit the privatization of the provision of certain medical services in order to maintain a single high-quality health-care delivery system for all Nova Scotians.
> 3 In this Act,
>
> (a) "designated medical service" means a medical service designated pursuant to the regulations;
> ...
> 4 No person shall perform or assist in the performance of a designated medical service other than in a hospital approved as a hospital pursuant to the Hospitals Act.
> 5 Notwithstanding the Health Services and Insurance Act, a person who performs or for whom is performed a medical service contrary to this Act is not entitled to reimbursement pursuant to that Act.
> 6 (1) Every person who contravenes this Act is guilty of an offence and liable upon summary conviction to a fine of not less than ten thousand dollars nor more than fifty thousand dollars.
>
> ...
> 7 Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, where designated medical services are being performed contrary to this Act, the Minister may, at any time, apply to a judge of the Supreme Court for an injunction, and the judge may make any order that in the opinion of the judge the case requires.
>
> 8 (1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister, may make regulations
>
> (a) after consultation by the Minister with the Medical Society of Nova Scotia, designating a medical service for the purpose of this Act;
> ...
>
> The Medical Society was consulted after the passage of the Act, and a list of medical services was finalized. On July 20, 1989, the Medical Services Designation Regulation, N.S. Reg. 152/89, was made, designating the following medical services for the purposes of the Act:
> (a) Arthroscopy
> (b) Colonoscopy (which, for greater certainty, does not include flexible sigmoidoscopy)
> (c) Upper Gastro-Intestinal Endoscopy
> (d) Abortion, including a therapeutic abortion, but not including emergency services related to a spontaneous abortion or related to complications arising from a previously performed abortion
> (e) Lithotripsy
> (f) Liposuction
> (g) Nuclear Medicine
> (h) Installation or Removal of Intraocular Lenses
> (i) Eletromyography, including Nerve Conduction Studies
>
> The March regulations were revoked on the same day by N.S. Regs. 149-151/89. Item (d) of the new regulation continued the March regulations' prohibition of the performance of abortions outside hospitals. Section 5 of the Act continued the denial of health insurance coverage for abortions performed in violation of the prohibition.
> Despite these actions, Dr. Morgentaler opened his clinic in Halifax as predicted. At first the clinic only provided counselling and referrals to Dr. Morgentaler's Montreal clinic. On October 26, 1989, however, Dr. Morgentaler defied the Nova Scotia legislation by performing seven abortions. He announced that he had done so at a press conference later that day. Several days later he performed seven more abortions. He was charged with 14 counts of unlawfully performing a designated medical service, to wit, an abortion, other than in a hospital approved as such under the Hospitals Act, contrary to s. 6 of the Medical Services Act. Dr. Morgentaler publicly announced his resolve to continue his activities in contravention of the Act, and on November 6, 1989 the government of Nova Scotia obtained an interim injunction under s. 7 of the Act to restrain him from further violations of the Act pending the resolution of the charges and the constitutional challenge in court: Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v. Morgentaler (1989), 1989 CanLII 5201 (NS SC), 64 D.L.R. (4th) 297 (N.S.S.C.T.D.), aff'd (1990), 1990 CanLII 7937 (NS CA), 69 D.L.R. (4th) 559 (N.S.S.C.A.D.), leave to appeal refused [1990] 2 SCR ix.

When the case proceeded to trial in June 1990, Dr. Morgentaler did not dispute that he had performed the abortions as alleged. He argued, instead, that the Act and the regulation were inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada and consequently of no force or effect, on the grounds that they violate women's Charter rights to security of the person and equality and that they are an unlawful encroachment on the federal Parliament's exclusive criminal law jurisdiction. He also argued that the regulation was an abuse of discretion by the provincial cabinet and therefore in excess of its jurisdiction.

B. Classification of Laws

(1) "What's the `Matter'?"

Classification of a law for purposes of federalism involves first identifying the "matter" of the law and then assigning it to one of the "classes of subjects" in respect to which the federal and provincial governments have legislative authority under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. This process of classification is "an interlocking one, in which the British North America Act and the challenged legislation react on one another and fix each other's meaning": B. Laskin, "Tests for the Validity of Legislation: What's the `Matter'?" (1955), 11 U.T.L.J. 114, at p. 127. Courts apply considerations of policy along with legal principle; the task requires "a nice balance of legal skill, respect for established rules, and plain common sense. It is not and never can be an exact science": F. R. Scott, Civil Liberties and Canadian Federalism (1959), at p. 26.

A law's "matter" is its leading feature or true character, often described as its pith and substance: Union Colliery Co. of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580 (P.C.), at p. 587; see also Whitbread v. Walley, 1990 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 1273, at p. 1286. There is no single test for a law's pith and substance. The approach must be flexible and a technical, formalistic approach is to be avoided. See Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), vol. 1, at p. 15-13. While both the purpose and effect of the law are relevant considerations in the process of characterization (see, e.g., Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1938 CanLII 251 (UK JCPC), [1939] A.C. 117 (P.C.) (the Alberta Bank Taxation Reference), at p. 130; Starr v. Houlden, 1990 CanLII 112 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1366, at pp. 1389, 1392), it is often the case that the legislation's dominant purpose or aim is the key to constitutional validity. Rand J. put it this way in Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] SCR 285, at pp. 302-3:

> The detailed distribution made by ss. 91 and 92 places limits to direct and immediate purposes of provincial action.... The settled principle that calls for a determination of the "real character", the "pith and substance", of what purports to be enacted and whether it is "colourable" or is intended to effect its ostensible object, means that the true nature of the legislative act, its substance in purpose, must lie within s. 92 or some other endowment of provincial power.

Edwards Books and Art Ltd.*, 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, at pp. 744-45, 747 and 751 (Dickson C.J.), at p. 788 (Beetz J.), and at p. 807 (Wilson J.).

(2) Purpose and Effect

(a) "Legal Effect" or Strict Legal Operation

Evidence of the "effect" of legislation can be relevant in two ways: to establish "legal effect" and to establish "practical effect". The analysis of pith and substance necessarily starts with looking at the legislation itself, in order to determine its legal effect. "Legal effect" or "strict legal operation" refers to how the legislation as a whole affects the rights and liabilities of those subject to its terms, and is determined from the terms of the legislation itself. See Hogg, supra, at pp. 15-13 and 15-15. Legal effect is often a good indicator of the purpose of the legislation (see, e.g., Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1947 CanLII 347 (UK JCPC), [1947] A.C. 503 (P.C.) (the Alberta Bill of Rights case), and Saumur v. City of Quebec, 1953 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1953] 2 SCR 299, at p. 326, Rand J.)), but is relevant in constitutional characterization even when it is not fully intended or appreciated by the enacting body. Thus in Starr v. Houlden, supra, the terms of reference of the Patricia Starr inquiry were held to duplicate the purposes and functions of a police investigation and preliminary inquiry into criminal allegations against specific individuals, which are criminal law matters, even though the province may not have intended that result.

The analysis of pith and substance is not, however, restricted to the four corners of the legislation (see, e.g., Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 373, at pp. 388-89). Thus the court "will look beyond the direct legal effects to inquire into the social or economic purposes which the statute was enacted to achieve", its background and the circumstances surrounding its enactment (Hogg, supra, at p. 15-13) and, in appropriate cases, will consider evidence of the second form of "effect", the actual or predicted practical effect of the legislation in operation (Alberta Bank Taxation Reference, supra, at p. 130). The ultimate long-term, practical effect of the legislation will in some cases be irrelevant. See Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra, at p. 389.

(b)The Use of Extrinsic Materials

In determining the background, context and purpose of challenged legislation, the court is entitled to refer to extrinsic evidence of various kinds provided it is relevant and not inherently unreliable: Reference re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, 1981 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 714, at p. 723, per Dickson J. This clearly includes related legislation (such as, in this case, the March regulations and the former s. 251 of the Criminal Code), and evidence of the "mischief" at which the legislation is directed: Alberta Bank Taxation Reference, supra, at pp. 130-33. It also includes legislative history, in the sense of the events that occurred during drafting and enactment; as Ritchie J., concurring in Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra, wrote at p. 437, it is "not only permissible but essential" to consider the material the legislature had before it when the statute was enacted.

The former exclusionary rule regarding evidence of legislative history has gradually been relaxed (Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, 1984 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 297, at pp. 317-19), but until recently the courts have balked at admitting evidence of legislative debates and speeches. Such evidence was described by Dickson J. in Reference re Residential Tenancies Act, 1979, supra, at p. 721 as "inadmissible as having little evidential weight", and was excluded in Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, at p. 319, and Attorney General of Canada v. Reader's Digest Association (Canada) Ltd., 1961 CanLII 84 (SCC), [1961] SCR 775. The main criticism of such evidence has been that it cannot represent the "intent" of the legislature, an incorporeal body, but that is equally true of other forms of legislative history. Provided that the court remains mindful of the limited reliability and weight of Hansard evidence, it should be admitted as relevant to both the background and the purpose of legislation. Indeed, its admissibility in constitutional cases to aid in determining the background and purpose of legislation now appears well established. See Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra, at p. 470, per Beetz J. (dissenting); R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at p. 749; Starr v. Houlden, supra, at pp. 1375-76, 1404 (distribution of powers); R. v.

Whyte, 1988 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 3, at pp. 24-25; Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, at pp. 983-84 (Charter); and R. v. Mercure, 1988 CanLII 107 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 234, at pp. 249-251 (language rights). I would adopt the following passage from Hogg, supra, as an accurate summary of the state of the law on this point (at pp. 15-14 and 15-15):

> In determining the "purpose" of a statute in this special sense, there is no doubt as to the propriety of reference to the state of law before the statute and the defect in the law (the "mischief") which the statute purports to correct. These may be referred to under ordinary rules of statutory interpretation. Until recently, there was doubt about the propriety of reference to parliamentary debates (Hansard) and other sources of the "legislative history" of the statute. The relevance of legislative history is obvious: it helps to place the statute in its context, gives some explanation of its provisions, and articulates the policy of the government that proposed it. Legislative history has usually been held inadmissible in Canada under ordinary rules of statutory interpretation. But the interpretation of a particular provision of a statute is an entirely different process from the characterization of the entire statute for purposes of judicial review. There seems to be no good reason why legislative history should not be resorted to for the latter purpose, and, despite some earlier authority to the contrary, it is now established that reports of royal commissions and law reform commissions, government policy papers and even parliamentary debates are indeed admissible. [Footnotes omitted.]

I would therefore hold, as did Freeman J.A. in the Court of Appeal, that the excerpts from Hansard were properly admitted by the trial judge in this case. In a nutshell, this evidence demonstrates that members of all parties in the House understood the central feature of the proposed law to be prohibition of Dr. Morgentaler's proposed clinic on the basis of a common and almost unanimous opposition to abortion clinics per se. I will return to the evidence below.

(c) Practical Effect

In the present case the Attorney General of Nova Scotia submits that the evidence shows that the future administration of the Act will not result in a restriction on abortion services; the respondent submits the opposite. This raises the question of the relevance of evidence of practical effect. I have noted that the legal effect of the terms of legislation is always relevant. Barring material amendments, it does not change over time. The practical effect of legislation, on the other hand, has a less secure status in constitutional analysis. Practical effect consists of the actual or predicted results of the legislation's operation and administration (see, e.g., Saumur, supra). Courts are often asked to adjudicate the constitutionality of legislation which is not yet in force or which, as here, has only been in force a short time. In such cases any prediction of future practical effect is necessarily short-term, since the court is not equipped to predict accurately the future consequential impact of legislation.

In the Anti-Inflation Act reference, supra, Laskin C.J. was willing to admit evidence of the circumstances in which the legislation was passed (at p. 391), but did not admit evidence of its predicted operation and effect, finding that "no general principle of admissibility or inadmissibility can or ought to be propounded by this Court" (at p. 389). The difficulty with practical effect is that whereas in one context practical effect may reveal the true purpose of the legislation (see Saumur, supra), in another context it may be incidental and entirely irrelevant even though it is drastic (Attorney-General for Saskatchewan v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1948 CanLII 317 (UK JCPC), [1949] A.C. 110 (P.C.), Canadian Indemnity Co. v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, supra, Whitbread v. Walley, supra, at p. 1286); and in yet another context provincial and federal enactments with the same practical impact may both stand if the matter to which they relate has two "aspects" of roughly equivalent importance, one within federal and the other within provincial competence (Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117 (P.C.), at p. 130; Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749).

In the majority of cases the only relevance of practical effect is to demonstrate an ultra vires purpose by revealing a serious impact upon a matter outside the enacting body's legislative authority and thus either contradicting an appearance of intra vires or confirming an impression of ultra vires. It was in light of the difficult status of practical effect (particularly as exemplified in Walter v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1969 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1969] SCR 383, wherein provincial legislation banning communal landholding was held intra vires even though the legislation drastically infringed the Hutterite community's religious freedom) that Wilson J., concurring in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, held that legislative purpose is the focal point in distribution of powers analysis. One of the issues in that case was whether the Lord's Day Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-13, was enacted pursuant to Parliament's criminal law power. Dickson J. (as he then was), writing for the majority, held that the Act was valid criminal law because its purpose was to compel religious observance of a Sunday sabbath (at p. 352), and emphasized that his conclusion depended on the identification of the purpose of the Act (at p. 355). Wilson J. held, in a passage not in conflict with Dickson J.'s approach to division of powers, that the pith and substance of legislation is determined through "an examination of the primary legislative purpose with a view to distinguishing the central thrust of the enactment from its merely incidental effects" (at p. 357). She concluded, at p. 358, that:

> Only when the effects of the legislation so directly impinge on some other subject matter as to reflect some alternative or ulterior purpose do the effects themselves take on analytic significance.

If, however, pith and substance can be determined without reference to evidence of practical effect, the absence of evidence that the legislation has a practical effect in line with this characterization will not displace the conclusion as to the legislation's invalidity. In such a case, "evidence as to the likely effect of legislation would not add anything useful to the task of characterization, but would merely bear on the wisdom or efficacy of the statute. In those cases the evidence is not relevant" (Hogg, supra, at p. 15-16). See also Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra, at pp. 424-25. Such evidence will not change the legislation's "matter", and only goes to the effectiveness of the statute to fulfil its object. The court is not concerned with the wisdom of a statute, and the government surely cannot justify legislation already determined to be ultra vires by arguing that it will not realize its aim or objective. Moreover, as I have said, legislation is often considered before experience has shown its actual impact, and prediction of future impact is necessarily short-term. I would adapt what La Forest J. said in another context (R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, at p. 803) to this situation: "[i]t is undesirable that an Act be found constitutional today and unconstitutional tomorrow" simply because of the absence of conclusive evidence as to future impact or the possibility of a change in practical effect.

An examination of the terms and legal effect of the Medical Services Act and the Medical Services Designation Regulation, their history and purpose and the circumstances surrounding their enactment leads to the conclusion that the legislation's central purpose and dominant characteristic is the restriction of abortion as a socially undesirable practice which should be suppressed or punished. Although the evidence of the legislation's practical effect is equivocal, it is not necessary to establish that its immediate or future practical impact will actually be to restrict access to abortions in order to sustain this conclusion.

(1) Legal Effect: the Four Corners of the Legislation

Starting with the terms of the legislation, the Medical Services Act makes it an offence subject to significant fines (s. 6) to perform abortions or other services designated by the Medical Services Designation Regulation outside a hospital approved as such under the Hospitals Act (s. 4). It is impossible to tell from the legislation itself whether this amounts to a total prohibition of abortion (which all parties concede would be ultra vires the province), since extrinsic evidence is necessary to establish that abortions are available in Nova Scotia hospitals. The Act also denies public health insurance coverage for the performer and recipient of such services (s. 5), and provides for injunctive relief against violations of its terms (s. 7). It is entitled "An Act to Restrict the Privatization of Medical Services", and its purpose is expressed to be the prohibition of the privatization of certain medical services in order to maintain a single high-quality health care delivery system in the province (s. 2). The allegation of ultra vires and the decisions in the courts below focused on the offence provisions of the legislation. No argument was directed toward the "de-insurance" section in this Court (s. 5). Although the "de-insurance" and injunction provisions clearly enhance the practical clout of the prohibition, they do not require independent consideration in the context of this case. It is sufficient for the purposes of characterizing this legislation to concentrate on the prohibition of the performance of a designated service outside a hospital. It is apparent from the combined effect of the offence and the regulation that one purpose of the legislation is to prohibit the establishment of free-standing abortion clinics.

The majority in the Court of Appeal conceded that the province had the legislative authority to pass a law in the present form. I acknowledge that the legislation has the legal effect of preventing privatization by prohibiting the private (i.e., outside a hospital) provision of the designated services. But the legislation expressly prohibits the performance of abortions in certain circumstances with penal consequences, a subject, as I have said, traditionally regarded as part of the criminal law. In Scowby v. Glendinning, 1986 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 226, a majority of this Court held provincial legislation creating an offence of arbitrary arrest or detention and a right to relief in the form of habeas corpus to be suspect on its face since arbitrary arrest or detention and the availability of habeas corpus in such circumstances have been dealt with by Parliament in the criminal law "almost since the advent of Confederation" (at p. 240). Likewise, one of the reasons behind this Court's invalidation of a municipal by-law prohibiting street prostitution in Westendorp v. The Queen, 1983 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1983] 1 SCR 43, was that conduct relating to prostitution has long been regarded as criminal. The present legislation, prohibiting traditionally criminal conduct, is therefore of questionable validity on its face: cf. Rio Hotel Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Liquor Licensing Board), 1987 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 59, at p. 80, per Estey J. (concurring in the result).

This conclusion makes it unnecessary to invoke the "colourability doctrine", but since it figured prominently in the courts below and in argument before us, I will address it briefly. The respondent attacks the legislation on the basis that it is colourable criminal law. The "colourability doctrine" in the distribution of powers is invoked when a law looks as though it deals with a matter within jurisdiction, but in essence is addressed to a matter outside jurisdiction: Starr v. Houlden, supra, at p. 1403; Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, at p. 332; Ladore v. Bennett, 1939 CanLII 270 (UK JCPC), [1939] A.C. 468 (P.C.), at p. 482. There is no need to invoke the doctrine in this case because while the Act states in its title and s. 2 that its aim is to prohibit the privatization of medical services, there are doubts about the legislation's vires on its face due to the fact that it appears to occupy ground historically occupied by the criminal law. Moreover the ordinary approach to pith and substance entitles the Court to look beyond the terms of the legislation. As Rand J. declared in the Margarine Reference, supra, at p. 48, a statement of purpose is at most "a fact to be taken into account, the weight to be given to it depending on all the circumstances".

In any event, the colourability doctrine really just restates the basic rule, applicable in this case as much as any other, that form alone is not controlling in the determination of constitutional character, and that the court will examine the substance of the legislation to determine what the legislature is really doing:

> [t]he legislative bodies cannot, by statutory recitals, settle the classification of their own statutes for purposes of the distribution of powers.... Selection of the aspect that matters is the exclusive prerogative of the court, and the so-called doctrine of colourability is simply an instance of this rule....
> See W. R. Lederman, "The Balanced Interpretation of the Federal Distribution of Legislative Powers in Canada" (1965), reprinted in Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (1981), 266, at p. 282; see also A. S. Abel, "The Neglected Logic of 91 and 92" (1969), 19 U.T.L.J. 487, at p. 494; Attorney-General for Ontario v. Reciprocal Insurers, 1924 CanLII 460 (UK JCPC), [1924] A.C. 328 (P.C.), at p. 337; and Central Canada Potash Co. v. Saskatchewan, 1978 CanLII 21 (SCC), [1979] 1 SCR 42, at p. 76. Under either the basic approach to pith and substance or the "colourability doctrine", therefore, we need to look beyond the four corners of the legislation to see what it is really about. As stated by Laskin C.J. in Potash, supra, at p. 76, "[i]t is nothing new for this Court, or indeed, for any Court in this country seized of a constitutional issue, to go behind the words used by a Legislature and to see what it is that it is doing".

(2) Beyond the Four Corners

Duplication of Criminal Code Provisions

Once the legal effect of legislation is ascertained, it can be compared with that of any relevant legislation passed by the other level of government. The majority of the Court of Appeal found that the present legislation effectively duplicated s. 251 (now s. 287) of the Criminal Code. Freeman J.A. held, at pp. 367 and 371-72, that:

Using s. 251 as a starting point, even a cursory examination discloses that the Medical Services Act has an impact and effect on abortions in private clinics virtually indistinguishable from that of s. 251.

> If a distinction exists, it is a philosophical one too subtle to alter the outcome. Under either piece of legislation, a doctor who performed an abortion in a private clinic might find a policeman in the waiting room. He or she could be convicted on precisely the same evidence under either enactment.

Provincial legislation has been held invalid when it employs language "virtually indistinguishable" from that found in the Criminal Code: Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, 1978 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 662, at p. 699; Rio Hotel Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Liquor Licensing Board), supra, at pp. 70-71 and 80; and Starr v. Houlden, supra, at pp. 1402 and 1405-6. However, even when the legal effect of federal and provincial legislation is virtually identical this does not necessarily determine validity, since the provinces can enact provisions with the same legal effect as federal legislation provided this is done in pursuit of a provincial head of power: O'Grady v. Sparling, 1960 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1960] SCR 804; Smith v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1960] SCR 776; Stephens v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1960] SCR 823; R. v. Chiasson (1982), 1982 CanLII 2959 (NB CA), 39 N.B.R. (2d) 631 (C.A.), at p. 636, aff'd 1984 CanLII 136 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 266. The duplication of Criminal Code language may raise an inference that the province has stepped into the realm of the criminal law; the more exact the reproduction, the stronger the inference that this is the dominant purpose of the enactment.

The guiding principle is that the provinces may not invade the criminal field by attempting to stiffen, supplement or replace the criminal law (Reference re Freedom of Informed Choice (Abortions) Act (1985), 1985 CanLII 2909 (SK CA), 44 Sask. R. 104 (C.A.)) or to fill perceived defects or gaps therein (Scowby v. Glendinning, supra, at p. 238). The legal effect of s. 251 and the present legislation, each taken as a whole, is quite different: among other things, s. 251 made it an offence for a woman to obtain an abortion, and prescribed the burdensome "therapeutic abortion committee" system and the "life or health" criterion for a legal abortion, none of which are present in the Act and regulation; and the present legislation prohibits other services besides abortion and directly concerns public health insurance coverage. Freeman J.A. was clearly right, however, that in so far as it prohibits abortion clinics the legal effect of the medical services legislation is completely embraced by s. 251 and, had the latter provision not been struck down, the present legislation would have been redundant in that respect. Section 251 is now, of course, inoperative. The absence of operative federal legislation does not enlarge provincial jurisdiction, though. It simply means that if the provincial legislation is found to be intra vires, no problem of paramountcy arises.

In my opinion the overlap of legal effects between the now defunct criminal provision and the Nova Scotia legislation is capable of supporting an inference that the legislation was designed to serve a criminal law purpose. It is a piece in the puzzle which along with the other evidence may demonstrate the true purpose of the legislation.

Background and Surrounding Circumstances

The events leading up to and including the enactment of the Act and regulation do not support the appellant's assertions that the pith and substance of the legislation relate to provincial jurisdiction over health. On the contrary, they strengthen the inference that the impugned Act and regulation were designed to serve a criminal law purpose.

(i) The Course of Events

It is clear that the catalyst for government action was the rumour and later announcement of Dr. Morgentaler's intention to open his clinic. The Crown concedes this. The respondent was clearly, as the trial judge concluded, a "mischief" against which the legislation was directed. The government knew of Dr. Morgentaler's intention to open a clinic by some time in January 1989. It responded with the March regulations, which prohibited abortions outside hospitals and "de-insured" such services. The direct and exclusive aim of this action was to stop the Morgentaler clinic and no one disputes that. The Minister of Health made this clear upon announcing the regulations:

> ... Cabinet has today approved two new regulations relating to the provision of abortion services.
> As all members know, it is not the policy of this government to endorse or support in any way the provision of these services through free-standing clinics or other facilities which do not fall within the category of an approved hospital.

(Nova Scotia, House of Assembly, Debates and Proceedings (March 16, 1989), at p. 1008.)

The March regulations singled out abortion, and the Morgentaler clinic in particular.

In May 1989, the March regulations were challenged in court by CARAL on the ground that they were unconstitutional: see Canadian Abortion Rights Action League Inc. v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General), supra. Shortly before the date when that action was first to come on for hearing (June 22, 1989), and days before the close of the legislative session, the government introduced and rushed the Act through the House of Assembly. It was introduced on June 6 and received third and final reading and royal assent on June 15. The legislation was enacted in what can only be considered great haste. The Act, considered along with the services that were proposed to be designated, accomplished all the purposes of the March regulations. Yet instead of singling out abortion, it took the form of a general "floating" prohibition of the performance of medical services other than in a hospital, which would crystallize upon the designation of several services among which abortion was to be found. On July 20, 1989, the Executive Council made the Medical Services Designation Regulation and simultaneously revoked the March Regulations. I am in complete agreement with Freeman J.A.'s characterization of the course of events, at pp. 376-77, which I reproduce again here for convenience:

> 2. The "March regulations" were obviously aimed at Morgentaler clinics. Hon. David Nantes, Health Minister, made that clear when he announced them to the legislature .... The Medical Services Act was presented to the legislature following a court challenge to the March regulations. It was introduced on June 6, 1989, and passed, with the appearance of last-minute haste, the day the House closed on June 15, 1989. The March regulations were encompassed by the Medical Services Act and its regulation. They were revoked, no longer necessary, on July 20, 1989, the day the regulation was passed under the Medical Services Act.

Neither the timing nor the overlap of subject matter can be viewed as coincidental. It is reasonable to infer, as did the trial judge, that the government believed that the new legislation would accomplish the purpose of the March regulations, and intended it to do so. The March regulations were the first response to Dr. Morgentaler's announcement, and the subsequent legislation was the continuation and consolidation of that response. Together they constituted a hastily devised plan aimed directly at ridding the province of Dr. Morgentaler and his proposed clinic. The course of events suggests that this purpose was the principal purpose of the legislation and contributes to the impression that privatization and quality assurance were only incidental concerns at best.

(ii) Hansard

I have reviewed the evidence of the legislative debates on the Medical Services Act, and have concluded that they give a clear picture of what the members of the House, both government and opposition, saw as being in issue. Both the trial judge and Freeman J.A. referred extensively to excerpts from Hansard. The following passage from the trial judge's reasons, at pp. 300-301, fairly captures the flavour of the proceedings:

> During the debate at the time of second reading on June 12, 1989, the Opposition Health Critic, Sandra Jolly, says at page 4678:
> "... It is a dilemma that is both complex and emotional and the Liberal caucus of Nova Scotia agrees with the Minister of Health and Fitness that the Morgentaler clinic should not be set up in this province. I want to make that point very clear. (Applause)
>
> "The Liberal caucus is of the opinion that it is unnecessary for the clinic to come to Nova Scotia, so in that part of the bill, we do agree with the current government. We are in agreement and we have stated that right from the very beginning, that we do not feel that the clinic is required here. What concerns me is that the government has very hurriedly put together this legislation, and what they are doing is not only trying to work at keeping the Morgentaler clinic out, but we really do see it as a regression or a step backwards in regard to medical services for the people of Nova Scotia."
> The Opposition critic went on at length expressing concerns about the broad implications of the Bill.
> When the Minister of Health had a chance to respond, he states: (at page 4716):
>
> "I heard the most weak-kneed, weak-hearted support for the question of the control of free-standing abortion clinics that I heard yet in this entire session of the Legislature. It was always the Liberal caucus that has this position, we have this position. Well, I am going to make mine personal and say I, as the Minister of Health and I, as an MLA, am not supportive of free-standing abortion clinics." (Applause)
>
> On June 5, 1989, the day before the proposed Act was introduced in First Reading, the Minister of Health and Fitness, in discussions concerning the budget estimates for the Department of Health said at p. 785:
> "... we have adopted a policy as government that we are not going to be supportive [of free-standing abortion clinics] and we will do everything in our effort to stop them. That is what we have said and that is what we are doing, if we need more steps, if we have to take more steps, we are going to take them. I am going to be carrying out that policy at the direction of my government and I am going to be supportive of that policy."
> Freeman J.A. made reference, among others, to the following excerpts, at pp. 375-76:

Paul MacEwan, member for Cape Breton Nova, said:

> "So certainly, you know, if this government wants to pose as being the great champion of those that want to keep Mr. Morgentaler out of Nova Scotia, let it be noted that it was the very last thing that they thought of before they adjourned the House for the year....
>
> "Now we are led to believe that this is a bill that is not really just to restrict the privatization of medical services, whatever that is, but it is a bill to make it impossible or to make it unlikely I suppose that the abortion clinic that Morgentaler wants to establish can be set up ..."

Following the remarks by members of opposition parties Mr. Nantes spoke again:

> "I do not think you can play both sides of this issue. You cannot criticize the health care system and say, we do it all wrong and talk about clinics and all that sort of thing without coming out on this particular element. Do you support or do you not support a free-standing abortion clinic? I want you to know that not only can I speak personally, but also, I think we represent the consensus and overwhelming view of this side of the legislature. (Applause)
> "I think I am even prepared to go a little further and say that I do think it represents the majority view of quite a number of members on the other side of the house, also." (Applause)

The Hansard evidence demonstrates both that the prohibition of Dr. Morgentaler's clinic was the central concern of the members of the legislature who spoke, and that there was a common and emphatically expressed opposition to free-standing abortion clinics per se. The Morgentaler clinic was viewed, it appears, as a public evil which should be eliminated. The concerns to which the appellant submits the legislation is primarily directed -- privatization, cost and quality of health care, and a policy of preventing a two-tier system of access to medical services -- were conspicuously absent throughout most of the legislative proceedings. They were emphasized by the Minister, Mr. Nantes, on moving second reading of the bill on June 12, 1989. This does not, however, in my view, detract significantly from the overall impression left by the debates.

Of course, one must be mindful of the limited use to which such evidence can be put, as I discussed earlier. To quote Kennedy Prov. Ct. J., at first instance, at p. 301:

I recognize that it would be folly for a court to conclude that everything that is said in a political forum has meaning in relation to the characterization of the legislation produced by that body.

Nonetheless, I see no reason to interfere with Freeman J.A.'s assessment of the tone of the proceedings, at p. 367:

> One need not look beyond the pages of Hansard ... to realize the sense of moral outrage of representatives in the House of Assembly engendered by the prospect of Morgentaler clinics in Nova Scotia. Moral considerations attach not only to the performance of abortions, but to where they are performed and under what circumstances.

The appellant argues that even if the object of the legislation was to suppress free-standing abortion clinics on grounds of public morals, this is not fatal to provincial jurisdiction. Although there has been some recognition of a provincial "morality" power, it is clear that the exercise of such a power must be firmly anchored in an independent provincial head of power: Rio Hotel Ltd. v. New Brunswick, supra, at pp. 71-80; Attorney General for Canada and Dupond v. City of Montreal, 1978 CanLII 201 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 770; R. Pepin, "Le pouvoir des provinces canadiennes de légiférer sur la moralité publique" (1988), 19 R.G.D. 865; Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 307, at p. 364.

While legislation which authorizes the establishment and enforcement of a local standard of morality does not ipso facto "invade the field of criminal law" (see Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, supra, at pp. 691-92), it cannot be denied that interdiction of conduct in the interest of public morals was and remains one of the classic ends of the criminal law, as established in the Margarine Reference, supra, at p. 50: see Westendorp v. The Queen, supra, and Johnson v. Attorney General of Alberta, 1954 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1954] SCR 127, at pp. 148-49.

As Wilson J. recognized in Morgentaler (1988), supra, at p. 171, a woman's decision to have an abortion is "profound[ly] social and ethical;" indeed it is "essentially a moral decision" (cf. M.L. McConnell, "`Even by Commonsense Morality': Morgentaler, Borowski and the Constitution of Canada" (1989), 68 Can. Bar Rev. 765, at p. 766) and it seems clear to me that the present legislation, whose primary purpose is to prohibit abortions except in certain circumstances, treats of a moral issue.

In view of the foregoing, there is a strong inference that the purpose of the legislation and its true nature relate to a matter within the federal head of power in respect of criminal law. In order to determine whether this is its dominant purpose or characteristic, it is necessary to compare the above indicia of federal subject matter with indications of provincial objectives.

(iii) Searching for Provincial Objectives

At trial the appellant presented evidence that the Act's objectives were to prevent privatization and the consequent development of a two-tier system of medical service delivery, to ensure the delivery of high-quality health care, and to rationalize the delivery of medical services so as to avoid duplication and reduce public costs. The principal Crown witness on these points, John Malcom, the Health Department Administrator, testified that Nova Scotia's health care system evolved around the public hospital and that there have never been private, "for-profit" medical clinics in the province. He said that Nova Scotia has a policy of equal access to health care services, and that duplication of health care services creates a two-tier system. Moreover, his evidence was that rationalization of health care services was the most cost-effective approach.

It may be that this evidence represented the policy of the government of Nova Scotia at one time. The respondent correctly pointed out, however, that this evidence was not established at trial to have been the basis for the impugned legislation. Indeed, Kennedy Prov. Ct. J. considered the evidence and found that any privatization concerns were "incidental to the paramount purpose of the legislation" (at p. 302). I see no good reason to question this finding.

First, as to the health and safety of women and the argument that the in-hospital requirement was enacted because of a concern over quality assurance, there is no evidence in the record to indicate that abortions performed in clinics like Dr. Morgentaler's pose any danger to the health of women. Counsel conceded that the quality of medical service in free-standing abortion clinics is comparable to that available in hospitals. I also note that in Morgentaler (1988), supra, Beetz J. held that studies, experience and expert evidence established that abortions can safely be performed in clinics and that the in-hospital requirement was no longer justified from a medical point of view. Since the appellant agrees that the quality of medical service in clinics is comparable to that in hospitals, the argument that the legislation was directed at quality assurance and women's health and safety is deprived of any force.

Second, the government did not express concerns about privatization in relation to this legislation or the March regulations until the Act was moved for second reading. Again, I would adopt Freeman J.A.'s statement of the relevant facts, at pp. 376-77:

> 1. Privatization of medical services had not been enunciated as a government objective prior to the introduction of the Medical Services Act. It was not mentioned in the Throne Speech on February 23, 1989. The Throne Speech did say that a Royal Commission Report was being awaited. The order-in-council establishing the Royal Commission made no reference to privatization.

3. In explaining the desirability of avoiding the pitfalls of privatization, the Crown relied heavily on economic considerations. The report of the Royal Commission on Health Costs was being awaited, as the Throne Speech noted. In passing the Medical Services Act on June 15, 1989, the legislature elected to do so without the benefit of observations or recommendations by the Royal Commission....

On February 23, 1989, just three weeks before the adoption of the March regulations, the Throne Speech was delivered. Although it discussed health care policy, it made no mention of a policy with respect to privatization. As Freeman J.A. observes, it did refer to the Royal Commission on Health Care, which had been established in 1987 to undertake a thorough examination of the province's health care system. The Throne Speech indicated that the government was awaiting the Commission's report.

That report was delivered in December 1989. Its recommendations were inconsistent with a policy of opposing privatization. It recommended, inter alia, moving as many services as possible out of hospitals and minimizing the length of hospital stays, in order to reduce public health care costs. It stated, in part, that while institutions should continue to be the focal points of health care delivery in Nova Scotia:

... there is increasing understanding that many health care services can be provided safely and appropriately outside of institutional settings.

John Malcom, the Crown health care policy expert, testified, on cross-examination, that the directions enunciated in the report were consistent with the approach the Department of Health had been taking. The Throne Speech of 1990, delivered two months after the report, discussed the report, and again -- understandably, in light of the Commission's recommendations -- made no mention of a policy of opposing the private delivery of health care services.

Third, it is significant that there is no evidence of any prior study or consultation regarding the cost-effectiveness or quality of medical services delivered in private clinics. Again, Freeman J.A.'s words, at p. 377, are apropos and I repeat them for convenience:

5. The Department of Health had been engaged in discussions with the Medical Society of Nova Scotia to have more health care services delivered outside of hospitals. The Medical Society was not consulted about the Act prior to its introduction. The evidence suggests the Act runs counter to the direction of the talks.

The Medical Society was not consulted until after the legislation was introduced, and then only to discuss the services to be designated. This would not be particularly significant on its own, but, according to the evidence of Dr. Vincent Audain, who was the president of the Medical Society at the relevant time, the Medical Society had been engaged in discussions with government toward moving more health care services outside hospitals. Dr. Audain learned of the Act through a telephone message the day the bill was introduced. He testified that the Society was perturbed by this unexpected action and suspected that the motive behind it was the "abortion issue". The Society passed a resolution, which it communicated to the government, condemning the legislation on the basis that it would have a negative impact on the delivery of medical care, would add to the cost of hospital care and conflict with emerging technological advances in medicine. The legislation was seen to contradict the government's stated policy goals of moving more services outside hospitals. Furthermore, according to Dr. Audain, when the Medical Society was consulted in June 1989 as to the medical services to be designated, the restriction of abortion was non-negotiable.

Although the Crown's expert witness, Mr. Malcom, testified as to the adequacy of access to abortion in Nova Scotia, no studies or consultation on the delivery of, access to, or cost-effectiveness of abortion services in hospitals or clinics were conducted, and the Crown relied at trial on dated statistical evidence as to the adequacy of existing facilities. The appellant argued, on the basis of Mr. Malcom's opinion evidence, that quality assurance is best ensured through the Canadian Council on Hospital Accreditation. There is no evidence, however, that the government had inquired into either the quality of services provided in hospitals vis-à-vis clinics or the existence of standards for the delivery of abortion services.

The appellant refers to a meeting of the House of Assembly's Committee on Community Services at the abortion unit of the Victoria General Hospital ("VGH"), in Halifax, on May 30, 1989, as evidence of prior consultation. Eighty-three per cent of all abortions performed in Nova Scotia are performed at this hospital. The topic of the meeting was the VGH's termination of pregnancy unit. The Committee met with the head of the gynaecology department, the head of the abortion unit and the charge nurse of the ambulatory care unit. The head of the abortion unit said that in his view Nova Scotia adequately met its own abortion needs and a Morgentaler clinic was unnecessary; however, he also said that such a clinic would serve all the Atlantic provinces. The three guests generally praised the efficiency and safety of existing abortion services, although it was revealed that average delays at the VGH were from a week to ten days, the medical staff willing to perform abortions at the hospital had fallen from ten to five, the quarters were cramped, and the greatest concern was a lack of information and counselling for both patients and doctors. Little hard data was provided. The meeting, indeed, seems to have provided more of a political platform for the expression of the views of the politicians on the committee than a forum for consultation and fact-finding regarding the issues the legislation was purported to address.

The lack of prior study or consultation is not raised to show that the province acted indiscreetly or ineffectually in pursuing provincial objectives, but rather to indicate that the evidence simply does not support the submission that these provincial objectives were the basis for the legislative action in question.

Another factor I consider relevant is that the "cost-effectiveness" rationale appears to be divorced from reality. Dr. Morgentaler's clinic will not represent a direct increase in the cost to the province of the provision of health care services. The parties dispute the actual cost of abortion services in and out of hospitals, but I do not propose to enter into that argument. In response to questions from the bench, appellant's counsel agreed that the fee paid to the respondent in respect of abortion services would be the same as that provided to a doctor who performed an abortion in a hospital. Consequently the establishment of an abortion clinic would not result in an increased direct cost to the province in the form of doctors' fees. The appellant's argument, as developed through Mr. Malcom's evidence, was that the duplication of services would lower the number of abortions performed in hospitals and eventually lead to an increase in the cost per procedure. The evidence did not establish, however, that the erosion in the number of abortions performed in hospitals would be great enough to have this effect.

A fifth consideration is the list of designated medical services itself. There is no apparent link between the different services. The only common denominator suggested by the appellant is that the government anticipated that these services might be attractive to private facilities. The appellant argued at trial and maintained before us, however, that the government's policy was to oppose the performance of any and all surgical procedures outside hospital. If that were the case, one might wonder why the Act did not prohibit the performance of surgical procedures generally outside a hospital. Designating nine apparently unrelated procedures does not accomplish this purpose.

If the means employed by a legislature to achieve its purported objectives do not logically advance those objectives, this may indicate that the purported purpose masks the legislation's true purpose. In Westendorp v. The Queen, supra, Laskin C.J. held that it was specious to regard a by-law which prohibited street prostitution as relating to control of the streets, since if that were its true purpose, "it would have dealt with congregation of persons on the streets or with obstruction, unrelated to what the congregating or obstructing persons say or otherwise do" (at p. 51). Here, one would expect that if the province's policy were to prohibit the performance of any surgical procedures outside hospitals, the legislation would have simply done so.

> Finally, although I put little weight on this factor, I agree with both courts below that the relatively severe penalties provided for by the Act are relevant to its constitutional characterization. Section 6(1) of the Act prescribes fines of $10,000 to $50,000 for each infraction of the Act. Kennedy Prov. Ct. J. and Freeman J.A. considered the relative severity of the fines as one indication that the fines were not simply measures to enforce a regulatory scheme, but penalties to punish abortion clinics as inherently wrong. Of course, s. 92(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867 allows the provinces to impose punishment to enforce valid provincial law, and the mere addition of penal sanctions to an otherwise valid provincial legislative scheme does not make the legislation criminal law: Smith v. The Queen, supra, at p. 800; Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, supra, at p. 697; Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra, at p. 965. However, the unusual severity of penalties may be taken into account in characterizing legislation: Westendorp v. The Queen, supra, at p. 51.
> D. Conclusion
> (1) Pith and Substance
> This legislation deals, by its terms, with a subject historically considered to be part of the criminal law -- the prohibition of the performance of abortions with penal consequences. It is thus suspect on its face. Its legal effect partially reproduces that of the now defunct s. 251 of the Criminal Code, in so far as both precluded the establishment and operation of free-standing abortion clinics. Its legislative history, the course of events leading up to the Act's passage and the making of N.S. Reg. 152/89, the Hansard excerpts and the absence of evidence that privatization and the cost and quality of health care services were anything more than incidental concerns, lead to the conclusion that the Medical Services Act and the Medical Services Designation Regulation were aimed primarily at suppressing the perceived public harm or evil of abortion clinics. The legislation meets the tests set out in the Margarine Reference, supra, and of Morgentaler (1975) and Morgentaler (1988), supra. The primary objective of the legislation was to prohibit abortions outside hospitals as socially undesirable conduct, and any concern with the safety and security of pregnant women or with health care policy, hospitals or the regulation of the medical profession was merely ancillary. This legislation involves the regulation of the place where an abortion may be obtained, not from the viewpoint of health care policy, but from the viewpoint of public wrongs or crimes, to echo Cannon J.'s words in Reference re Alberta Statutes, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] SCR 100, at p. 144 (appeal dismissed as moot in Alberta Bank Taxation Reference, supra, at pp. 127-28):
> I agree with the submission of the Attorney-General for Canada that this bill deals with the regulation of the press of Alberta, not from the viewpoint of private wrongs or civil injuries resulting from any alleged infringement or privation of civil rights which belong to individuals, considered as individuals but from the viewpoint of public wrongs or crimes, i.e., involving a violation of the public rights and duties to the whole community, considered as a community, in its social aggregate capacity. [Emphasis added.]
> Paraphrasing what Lamer J. said in Starr v. Houlden, supra, at p. 1405: I find unpersuasive the argument that this legislation is solidly anchored in s. 92(7), (13) or (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867. There is nothing on the surface of the legislation or in the background facts leading up to its enactment to convince me that it is designed to protect the integrity of Nova Scotia's health care system by preventing the emergence of a two-tiered system of delivery, to ensure the delivery of high-quality health care, or to rationalize the delivery of medical services so as to avoid duplication and reduce public health care costs. Any such objectives are clearly incidental to the central feature of the legislation, which is the prohibition of abortions outside hospitals as socially undesirable conduct subject to punishment.
> (2) Practical Effect
> This legislation will certainly restrict abortion in the sense that it makes abortions unavailable in any place other than hospitals. But will it lead to a practical restriction of access to abortion in Nova Scotia? Will the present hospital system be able and willing to accommodate all the women who desire to terminate a pregnancy, given among other things that the hospital in which 83 percent of all abortions are performed has lost half of its medical staff willing to perform the procedure? These are questions that the trial judge did not answer, and on which the parties are resolutely divided. Women may not wish to have an abortion in a hospital for any number of legitimate reasons. Clearly restrictions as to place can have the effect of restricting abortions in practice, and indeed it was the operation of s. 251 of the Criminal Code in restricting abortions to certain hospitals that contributed largely to its demise. One of the reasons that the former s. 251 of the Criminal Code was struck down in Morgentaler (1988), supra, was that the in-hospital requirement in that section led to unacceptable delays, undue stress and trauma, and a severe practical restriction of access to abortion services. Several years of experience under s. 251 showed that the combined decisions and actions of individual anti-abortion hospital boards could render access to legal abortion non-existent in large areas of the country. Something similar may occur in Nova Scotia but that is something we have no way of predicting. One of the effects of the legislation is consolidation of abortions in the hands of the provincial government, largely in one provincially controlled institution. This renders free access to abortion vulnerable to administrative erosion.
> Having applied the ordinary tests as to the matter of the present legislation, I am able to conclude that the legislation was an ultra vires invasion of the field of criminal law. I am able to reach this conclusion without predicting the ultimate practical effect of this legislation, and it is consequently unnecessary to adjudicate the intractable dispute between the parties as to whether this legislation will, in fact, restrict access to abortion in Nova Scotia. The appellant's evidence that the legislation will not have the practical effect of restricting abortions is simply evidence that the legislation will not actually accomplish what it set out to do. In view of my conclusion as to the pith and substance of the legislation, I am not concerned with whether the legislation is effective and such evidence can no more be used to validate ultra vires legislation than to invalidate intra vires legislation, as was held in Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra.
> As a result, the Act and regulation are ultra vires in their entirety.

2.4 The presumption of constitutionality

The presumption of constitutionality is a principle of statutory interpretation and a "cardinal principle" of our division of powers jurisprudence. In this excerpt from Reference re Impact Assessment Act, 2023 SCC 23, Wagner CJ explains the delicate dance between presumption and shield:

> [69] The presumption of constitutionality "remains a cardinal principle of our division of powers jurisprudence" (Murray-Hall v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10, at para. 79; Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, 1957 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1957] SCR 198, at p. 255; Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, 1978 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 662, at pp. 687-88; Reference re Firearms Act, at para. 25; see also Severn v. The Queen (1878), 1878 CanLII 29 (SCC), 2 SCR 70, at p. 103; Rogers Communications Inc. v. Châteauguay (City), 2016 SCC 23, [2016] 1 SCR 467, at para. 81). Several consequences flow from the application of the presumption of constitutionality in federalism cases. Two of these consequences are germane for our purposes.
> [70] First, according to this presumption, "every legislative provision is presumed to be intra vires the level of government that enacted it" (Murray-Hall, at para. 79; P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at § 15:13). In other words, a court should approach any question as to the validity of legislation "on the assumption that it was validly enacted", unless the party challenging the validity of the legislation demonstrates otherwise (McNeil, at pp. 687-88; Reference re The Farm Products Marketing Act, at p. 255; Murray-Hall, at para. 80).

> [71] Second, the presumption of constitutionality functions as a principle of statutory interpretation. It directs a court to assume that "a legislative body does not intend to exceed its powers under the Constitution" (Osborne v. Canada (Treasury Board), 1991 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 69, at p. 103). As this Court explained in McKay v. The Queen, 1965 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1965] SCR 798, at pp. 803-4:
> > ... if an enactment, whether of Parliament or of a legislature or of a subordinate body to which legislative power is delegated, is capable of receiving a meaning according to which its operation is restricted to matters within the power of the enacting body it shall be interpreted accordingly. An alternative form in which the rule is expressed is that if words in a statute are fairly susceptible of two constructions of which one will result in the statute being intra vires and the other will have the contrary result the former is to be adopted.
> [72] Therefore, when characterizing a challenged law, a court faced with "competing, plausible characterizations . . . should normally choose that one that would support the validity of the law" (Hogg and Wright, at § 15:13; see also Siemens v. Manitoba (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 3, [2003] 1 SCR 6, at para. 33; Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, [2019] 4 SCR 228, at para. 28). And "where a law is open to both a narrow and a wide interpretation, and under the wide interpretation the law's application would extend beyond the powers of the enacting legislative body, the court should 'read down' the law so as to confine it to those applications that are within the power of the enacting legislative body" (Hogg and Wright, at § 15:13).
> [73] I emphasize, however, that the presumption of constitutionality is not an impermeable shield that protects legislation from constitutional review by courts. Nor can courts employ the presumption of constitutionality to rewrite legislative text as they see fit in order to bring it into compliance with the Constitution. Courts cannot rely on the presumption of constitutionality to disregard a statute that speaks clearly and is ultra vires its enacting body. As Justice Gonthier held in Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, 2001 SCC 67, [2001] 3 SCR 113, at para. 66, the presumption of constitutionality "only applies when both competing interpretations are reasonably open to the court". In that case, Justice Gonthier declined to interpret the impugned provisions as being consistent with constitutional norms because doing so "would be repugnant to the text and context of the federal legislation" (para. 66; see also McKay, at pp. 803-4; J. M. Keyes and C. Diamond, "Constitutional Inconsistency in Legislation — Interpretation and the Ambiguous Role of Ambiguity" (2017), 48 Ottawa L. Rev. 313, at pp. 321-22). Thus, while the presumption of constitutionality is a "cardinal principle" that must be borne in mind, it does not displace the duty of courts to meaningfully review the constitutionality of legislation.
> [74] Similarly, a court cannot circumvent its duty to meaningfully review the constitutionality of legislation by suggesting that, insofar as an administrative decision maker applies a law unconstitutionally, the application of that law may be judicially reviewed. The constitutional validity of a law and its administrative application are distinct concepts. Where a constitutionally valid law grants a decision maker broad and imprecise discretion, that discretion must be exercised reasonably and in accordance with the purpose for which it was given (References re GGPPA, at para. 73). But where a law is ultra vires and therefore unconstitutional, it cannot be saved by the prospect of administrative judicial review. As Lamer C.J. and Iacobucci J. explained in Hydro-Québec, at para. 73:
> > ... the constitutional validity of a statute cannot depend on the ebb and flow of existing government practice or the manner in which discretionary powers appear thus far to be exercised. It is the boundaries to the exercise of that discretion and the scope of the regulatory power created by the impugned legislation that are at issue here. It is no answer to a charge that a law is unconstitutional to say that it is only used sparingly. If it is unconstitutional, it cannot be used at all. [Emphasis in original.]

2.5 The colourability doctrine

In Morgentaler, Justice Sopinka reasoned that the "colourability doctrine" did not apply to Nova Scotia's legislation. His discussion and explanation of the doctrine is nonetheless informative:

> … The "colourability doctrine" in the distribution of powers is invoked when a law looks as though it deals with a matter within jurisdiction, but in essence is addressed to a matter outside jurisdiction: Starr v. Houlden, supra, at p. 1403; Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, supra, at p. 332; Ladore v. Bennett, 1939 CanLII 270 (UK JCPC), [1939] A.C. 468 (P.C.), at p. 482. …
> In any event, the colourability doctrine really just restates the basic rule, applicable in this case as much as any other, that form alone is not controlling in the determination of constitutional character, and that the court will examine the substance of the legislation to determine what the legislature is really doing:
> > [t]he legislative bodies cannot, by statutory recitals, settle the classification of their own statutes for purposes of the distribution of powers.... Selection of the aspect that matters is the exclusive prerogative of the court, and the so-called doctrine of colourability is simply an instance of this rule....
> See W. R. Lederman, "The Balanced Interpretation of the Federal Distribution of Legislative Powers in Canada" (1965), reprinted in Lederman, Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (1981), 266, at p. 282….

In other words, it might be (and was) argued that Nova Scotia's law was colourable in nature as its purported purpose—the provision of health services and protection of the health care system—did not correspond with its actual purpose—to prohibit abortion as a social evil. For the Court, however, as the doctrine of pith and substance led to the same result, it was not necessary to invoke the doctrine of colourability.

The colourability doctrine is not, however, irrelevant. Almost a decade after Morgentaler, in Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2000] 1 SCR 783, the Supreme Court again described the doctrine and its function, writing (at para 18): "a law may say that it intends to do one thing and actually do something else. Where the effects of the law diverge substantially from the stated aim, it is sometimes said to be 'colourable'."

Then, after another period of abeyance, the colourability doctrine reappeared in Murray Hall v Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10:

> [50] The concept of "colourable legislation" refers to legislation that seemingly deals with a matter within the jurisdiction of the enacting level of government but that is actually addressed to a matter outside that jurisdiction (Morgentaler, at p. 496). It has long been accepted that recourse may be had to extrinsic evidence, insofar as it reflects the legislative intent, in order to determine the alleged "colourability" of legislation (Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, 1984 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 297, at pp. 318-19).
> [51] The appellant submits that the members of the Quebec legislature demonstrated on a number of occasions that their intent was to thwart Parliament's chosen approach to home cultivation and thus to enact, in "colourable" form, the provisions of the CDSA that formerly prohibited the possession and cultivation of cannabis. This argument cannot be accepted.
> [52] It is true that some uneasiness was expressed within the walls of the National Assembly over the decriminalization bill, which was introduced on the sole initiative of the federal government. The members of the Quebec legislature also deemed it appropriate to reiterate the dangerousness of cannabis because of the risk — perceived or recognized — that this substance would be normalized by the passage of the federal Act. The appellant refers us to the speech made by the Minister responsible for Public Health during the last stages leading to the passage of the final version of Bill 157:

> [translation] This bill positions and prepares Quebec for the imminent legalization of cannabis, unilaterally imposed, let us be honest, Madam President, by the federal government. I want citizens to clearly understand that neither the Quebec government nor the members of the opposition nor anyone here in Quebec requested this. It ended up on our agenda following a decision of the federal government. So, we had to work with extremely tight deadlines and a high degree of uncertainty with respect to federal intentions. To say that it was a real challenge is an understatement, Madam President. Our ultimate goal, the same from the outset, was to offer the best possible regulation of this substance on our territory, given the stakes. And, I would like to repeat, Madam President, that cannabis is not a benign, harmless substance. I say to young persons: It is not a great idea to smoke cannabis. [Emphasis added.]
> (National Assembly, Journal des débats, vol. 44, No. 346, 1st Sess., 41st Leg., June 6, 2018, at pp. 21972-73 (L. Charlebois))

[53] Statements like these are, however, far from sufficient for a finding of colourability. As Cromwell and Karakatsanis JJ. noted in Quebec (Attorney General) 2015, "[c]ourts are, for good reasons, reluctant to find legislation to be colourable" (para. 31). If the colourability doctrine were applied less narrowly, there would be a danger that courts would overstep their judicial role and make decisions based on policy considerations, thereby expressing "disapproval of either the policy of the statute or the means by which the legislation seeks to carry it out" (ibid.).

[54] In my view, the Minister's statements do not show an intent to recriminalize what Parliament sought to decriminalize. Rather, they reflect a general concern about the risks arising from cannabis consumption, particularly for younger individuals. As the Court of Appeal pointed out, this concern was expressed repeatedly in the House of Commons when Bill C-45 was being examined (para. 102). Quite a few members of Parliament noted that "Canadians, including children and youth", have some of the highest rates of cannabis use in the world and that the effects of cannabis may be particularly dangerous for young people who use it (ibid., quoting House of Commons Debates, vol. 148, No. 183, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., May 30, 2017, at p. 11706 (M. Mendicino)). Viewed in such a context, the Minister's statements simply show that concerns about the harmful effects of cannabis on health did not disappear merely because this substance was decriminalized. In other words, the concerns expressed by members of Parliament while debating Bill C-45 were echoed in the National Assembly of Quebec.

[55] A parallel was drawn by the trial judge between the circumstances of this case and those of Morgentaler, in which the pith and substance of a Nova Scotia statute that prohibited abortion, other than in a hospital, was not control over private health care institutions but rather the restriction of abortion as a socially undesirable practice that should be suppressed or punished. Among other things, Morgentaler reiterated "[t]he guiding principle . . . that the provinces may not invade the criminal field by attempting to stiffen, supplement or replace the criminal law . . . or to fill perceived defects or gaps therein" (p. 498). In the present case, the appellant argues that this principle is undermined by ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act, which are designed to remedy the repeal of the provisions that once criminalized the personal production of cannabis.

[56] I agree with the Court of Appeal that the circumstances of this case differ from those of Morgentaler. The statements made by the members of the provincial legislature in Morgentaler showed direct opposition to freestanding abortion clinics as a "public evil" to be eliminated and left no ambiguity regarding the intent behind the impugned legislation (p. 503). Moreover, many important concerns relating to the stated purpose of the statute — for example, health care costs or objections to a two-tier system of access to medical services — had not been mentioned during the legislative debates. The same cannot be said of the conduct of the debates that led to the enactment of the provincial Act and the provisions challenged in this case. When the prohibitions against the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants were debated by the members of the Quebec legislature, they were clearly viewed from the perspective of the stated purposes of the Act, that is, preserving the cannabis market's integrity and protecting the health and security of the public.

2.6 Questions

1. In Morgentaler, Sopinka J cautioned against a formalistic approach to the pith and substance determination. He described the process of classification as 'interlocking', in which the validity of legislation and the enumerated classes of subjects 'react on one another and fix each other's meaning', and observed that figuring out the matter 'is not and never can be an exact science'.

   How does Sopinka J's description of pith and substance analysis differ from Wagner CJC's more recent prescriptions in Re IAA and Murray Hall? Which one do you think most accurately describes the task of figuring out the matter of a statute? Do you think it is possible to characterize legislation without regard to the heads of power or is this an artificial demarcation?

2. Regardless of the method, pith and substance doctrine is arguably most helpful when judges agree on the matter of the legislation. In Re GGPPA, for example, there were several minority opinions, each with their own pith and substance for the legislation and none of them the same.

   Do you think that the authoritative weight of a judgment should be impacted by whether the judges could agree on the pith and substance of the legislation? In Re GGPPA, do you think it would have helped or hindered the judges to characterize the legislation with reference to the heads of power? Why or why not?

3. Make a list of the aspects of the legislation that courts may consider in their determination of a statute's pith and substance. Separate them into the internal aspects derived from within the four corners of the legislation and the external aspects derived from the context and legislative history of the legislation. Are all of these aspects equally relevant? If not, which parts of the legislation and its context are most helpful in settling on the true character or leading feature of the legislation?

4. The 'colourability doctrine' referred to in Morgentaler and Re Firearms Act makes only rare appearances in federalism cases. It could be argued that characterizing legislation as 'colourable' acts as a kind of political sanction. As Sopinka J observed in Morgentaler, pith and substance doctrine is equally competent to the task of determining the substance of the legislation. What do you think colourability adds to the characterization analysis? Why do you think courts have been loath to use the doctrine?

For early discussions about pith and substance doctrine, see: Bora Laskin, "Tests for the Validity of Legislation: What's the `Matter'?" (1955), 11 U.T.L.J. 114; F. R. Scott, "Civil Liberties and Canadian Federalism" (1959); W. R. Lederman, "The Balanced Interpretation of the Federal Distribution of Legislative Powers in Canada" (1965); Paul Weiler, "The Supreme Court and the Law of Canadian Federalism" (1973) 23 UTLJ 307 at 340-41.

3 Double aspect

Overlap between the contents of the respective levels of governments' powers is inevitable. Courts have had to craft ways to accommodate that overlap, where both the federal and provincial governments adopt laws dealing with similar, or even the same, subject matter, but where both levels of government are acting within their areas of jurisdiction. This is inevitable, because some subjects, or activities, have both federal and provincial aspects and can therefore be the subject of both federal and provincial legislation.

The regulation of public roads, or, more specifically, driving under the influence of alcohol, is a good example of the potential for legislative overlap because roads have both federal and provincial aspects. The federal government can adopt legislation related to roads using the criminal law power found in section 91(27). For example, the criminal prohibition on drunk driving (s. 320.14(1)(b)) of the Criminal Code) is a valid federal law governing the use of public roadways. At the same time, provinces, pursuant to their jurisdiction over property and civil rights, in section 92(13) adopt similar prohibitions on driving with a certain blood-alcohol limit.

Courts have dealt with such overlap using the double aspect doctrine. The origins of this doctrine date back to an 1883 Privy Council case, Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117, which observed: "subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within Sect. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within Sect. 91." In other words, to quote Justices Binnie and LeBel in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22:

> 30 Also, some matters are by their very nature impossible to categorize under a single head of power: they may have both provincial and federal aspects. Thus the fact that a matter may for one purpose and in one aspect fall within federal jurisdiction does not mean that it cannot, for another purpose and in another aspect, fall within provincial competence: Hodge v. The Queen (1883), 9 App. Cas. 117 (P.C.), at p. 130; Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749 ("Bell Canada (1988)"), at p. 765. The double aspect doctrine, as it is known, which applies in the course of a pith and substance analysis, ensures that the policies of the elected legislators of both levels of government are respected. A classic example is that of dangerous driving: Parliament may make laws in relation to the "public order" aspect, and provincial legislatures in relation to its "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" aspect (O'Grady v. Sparling, 1960 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1960] SCR 804). The double aspect doctrine recognizes that both Parliament and the provincial legislatures can adopt valid legislation on a single subject depending on the perspective from which the legislation is considered, that is, depending on the various "aspects" of the "matter" in question.

In Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, the dissenting judges explain the double aspect doctrine as the ability to look at a particular matter, activity, or set of facts, from two different legal perspectives:

> [101] … [The] double aspect doctrine can be viewed at three different levels: (1) that of the facts themselves regardless of their legal characterization; (2) that of the legal perspectives represented by the various rules (statutory, regulatory, etc.) — each of which has its own pith and substance — adopted by the central government or the provinces to govern the fact situations; and (3) that of the power — in the context of the constitutional division of powers — to adopt a given rule. The double aspect doctrine relates first to the two different normative aspects at level (2) that certain facts at level (1) might have, it being understood that because of the pith and substance of each of these aspects, each one may, at level (3), be connected primarily with a different power, one of which may be federal while the other is provincial. In other words, the double aspect doctrine does not involve a dual connection with different powers at level (3) of a single legal perspective that necessarily has a single pith and substance and is necessarily situated at level (2). This possibility of a dual connection exists in our law…. We will see below that the failure by the Chief Justice to consider the location of aerodromes from both legal perspectives — of the regulation of aeronautics on the one hand, and of zoning or, more broadly, of land use planning in and development of the territory on the other — prevents her from recognizing that the double aspect doctrine applies in this case [emphasis added].

3.1 Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161

In Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, Justice Dickson, as he then was, relied on the double aspect doctrine to reason that two statutes, one federal and one provincial, dealing with the same activity (insider trading in securities) could both be valid:

> The facts are of little importance. Multiple Access Limited (the Company) is a public company incorporated under the laws of Canada having its head office in Metropolitan Toronto and capital stock listed for trading by the public on the Toronto Stock Exchange. The defendant McCutcheon was President and Director, Lowrie a director and the other defendants senior managing officers of the Company. By an order of Addy J., on a motion made by two shareholders of the Company pursuant to s. 114(1) of The Securities Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 426, it was ordered that the Ontario Securities Commission commence action, in the name of and on behalf of the Company, to enforce the liability created by the alleged "insider trading" of the defendants.
> It is alleged that (i) it was known to the defendants but not the public that the Company made a formal written offer to purchase certain radio and television assets of Canadian Marconi Limited for a purchase price of $18 million dollars, (ii) the offer was accepted, (iii) the defendants made use of such confidential knowledge to their own advantage by purchasing securities in the capital stock of the Company at $1.76, and the stock rose to $7 and later to $10. The cause of action is based on the allegation that the defendants were 'insiders' of the Company as that term is defined in The Securities Act of Ontario, s. 109(1)(c) and, as such, were liable to the Company for losses suffered as a result of the use of confidential information in connection with transactions relating to the capital securities of the Company in accordance with ss. 113 and 114 of The Securities Act.
> The defendants, in their statement of defence, maintained that ss. 113 and 114 of The Securities Act of Ontario were duplications of ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act and therefore, with respect to the plaintiff, ss. 113 and 114 are suspended and inoperative due to the doctrine of paramountcy, and also ultra vires the Legislature of Ontario with respect to the plaintiff, a federally incorporated Company.
> I turn now to the main question. Does the 'matter' (or pith and substance) of the insider trading provisions of the federal act fall within a "class of subject" (or head of power) allocated to Parliament? Counsel for the Company and for the Attorney General of Ontario contends that s. 100.4 applies to a very large class of individuals or companies and the apparent purpose of the section is to impose possible civil liability on members of a large class of persons who are involved in transactions relating to the securities of the company. These provisions, it is said, do not relate to the status of a federal company or to domestic or internal constitution of the company but rather create civil rights or obligations which can only be the subject matter of provincial legislation in relation to property and civil rights in a province.
> With respect, I do not agree. Sections 100.4 and 100.5 put teeth into s. 100 of the Act. Viewed in isolation it can no doubt be argued that their matter is the trading in securities. Viewed in context, however, they are, in my opinion, company law. They fit properly and comfortably into Part I of the Canada Corporations Act. The provisions deal with obligations attached to the ownership of shares in a federal company, which extend to shareholders, officers and employees of such companies, a subject matter that is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. The provisions are also directed to the relationship between management and shareholders of federal companies. Their enactment by Parliament is in the discharge of its company law power.
> [Dickson J. then proceeds to review the case law in support of the validity of the federal regulation of the trade in securities.]
> Providing safeguards against the malfeasance of the managers is strictly within what might properly be called the constitution of the company. The proper relationship between a company and its insiders is central to the law of companies and, from the inception of companies, that relationship has been regulated by the legislation sanctioning the company's incorporation. I agree with the submission of counsel for the Attorney General of Canada that the impugned provisions of the Canada Corporations Act are directed at preserving the integrity of federal companies and protecting the shareholders of such companies; they aim at practices, injurious to a company or to shareholders at large of a company, by persons who because they hold positions of trust or otherwise are privy to information not available to all shareholders.

> Insiders should not benefit, either at the expense of the company or at the expense of other shareholders, from their access to confidential information intended to be available only for a corporate purpose and not for the personal benefit of anyone. Information so acquired is at the expense of the enterprise. Confidential company information is a corporate asset the benefit of which is intended to benefit the company, its shareholders and creditors. See Brudney "Insiders, Outsiders and Informational Advantages under the Federal Securities Laws", (1979) 93 Harv. L. Rev. 322, at p. 344.
> It is true that the net cast by s. 100.4 of the Canada Corporations Act is a broad one but it must be broad if it is to be effective. Section 100.4 speaks of insiders, employees, associates, and affiliates. It may catch more than just directors or managers. There is no reason in principle why this should be fatal to constitutional integrity. Practical considerations no doubt dictated that the net be broad if confidential information, vital to the financial integrity of the company, were to be adequately protected from those unprincipled insiders who were in a position to be privy to such information.
>
> Because "[t]he language of [ss. 91 and 92] and of the various heads which they contain obviously cannot be construed as having been intended to embody the exact disjunctions of a perfect logical scheme" (John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, supra, at p. 338 per Viscount Haldane), a statute may fall under several heads of either s. 91 or s. 92. For example, a provincial statute will often fall under both s. 92(13), property and civil rights and s. 92(16), a purely local matter, given the broad generality of the language. There is, of course, no constitutional difficulty in this. The constitutional difficulty arises, however, when a statute may be characterized, as often happens, as coming within a federal as well as a provincial head of power. "To put the same point in another way, our community life—social, economic, political, and cultural—is very complex and will not fit neatly into any scheme of categories or classes without considerable overlap and ambiguity occurring. There are inevitable difficulties arising from this that we must live with so long as we have a federal constitution" (Lederman, "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada" (1963), 9 McGill L.J. 185). As Professor Ziegel has stated "[s]ecurities legislation clearly has a double character ("Constitutional Aspects of Canadian Companies" in Canadian Company Law (1967), chapter 5, at p. 167) and, "there is no simple dichotomy between legislation of a company law character and legislation affecting property and civil rights in the province. Viewed in its proper social and economic context the legislation may well have a double character" (at pp. 192-93).
> I incline to the view that the impugned insider trading provisions have both a securities law and a companies law aspect and would adopt as the test for applying the double aspect doctrine to validate both sets of legislative provisions, that formulated by Professor Lederman:
>
> > But if the contrast between the relative importance of the two features is not so sharp, what then? Here we come upon the double-aspect theory of interpretation, which constitutes the second way in which the courts have dealt with inevitably overlapping categories. When the court considers that the federal and provincial features of the challenged rule are of roughly equivalent importance so that neither should be ignored respecting the division of legislative powers, the decision is made that the challenged rule could be enacted by either the federal Parliament or provincial legislature. In the language of the Privy Council, "subjects which in one aspect and for one purpose fall within sect. 92, may in another aspect and for another purpose fall within sect. 91".
> > ("Classification of Laws and the British North America Act" in The Courts and the Canadian Constitution (1964), 177, at p. 193).
>
> The double aspect doctrine is applicable, as Professor Lederman says, when the contrast between the relative importance of the two features is not so sharp. When, as here, the corporate-security federal and provincial characteristics of the insider trading legislation are roughly equal in importance there would seem little reason, when considering validity, to kill one and let the other live.
> Although the application of the double aspect doctrine has been most prevalent in the highway traffic field there is ample precedent for its use in the field of provincial securities regulations. Kerwin C.J. in Smith v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1960] SCR 776 applied the doctrine to prospectuses (at p. 781):
>
> > Parliament undoubtedly had power to enact s. 343 of the Criminal Code, but a prospectus may in one aspect and for one purpose be the subject of valid provincial legislation, while, in another aspect and for another purpose, it may be the subject of valid federal legislation: Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan. Since the Provincial Legislature has power to prescribe certain information to be supplied to the Commission and since the Legislature has power to provide for punishment of infractions, the enactments of the Legislature and of Parliament may co-exist.
> Concurrent matters or fields have also been recognized, among others, in the realms of temperance, insolvency, highways, and aspects of Sunday observance (at pages 169-182).

Justice Dickson then approvingly referred to duplication as 'the ultimate in harmony":

> With Mr. Justice Henry I would say that duplication is, to borrow Professor Lederman's phrase, "the ultimate in harmony". The resulting "untidiness" or "diseconomy" of duplication is the price we pay for a federal system in which economy "often has to be subordinated to […] provincial autonomy" (Hogg, at p. 110). Mere duplication without actual conflict or contradiction is not sufficient to invoke the doctrine of paramountcy and render otherwise valid provincial legislation inoperative.
> > As Dr. J.A. Corry has pointed out, our country is increasingly moving away from the older classical federalism of 'water-tight compartments' with provincial legislatures and federal parliament carefully keeping clear of one another. We seem to be moving towards a co-operative federalism. "The co-ordinate governments no longer work in splendid isolation from one another but are increasingly engaged in cooperative ventures in which each relies heavily on the other." See J.A. Corry, "Constitutional Trends and Federalism", in the volume of essays Evolving Canadian Federalism (Durham, N.C., U.S.A., 1958), p. 96.
> The multiplication of concurrent fields is one of the facets of this trend (pages 190-91).

4 Incidental effects

The pith and substance analysis focuses on the "dominant purpose" or "central thrust" of the legislation under review. But legislation will often have other less central, or secondary, features or effects, some of which might overlap with the other government's jurisdiction. The case law tells us that these kinds of incidental effects are permissible, provided they do not detract from a law or provision's central purpose, or pith and substance. Moreover, a law's incidental effects on a subject of the other government's jurisdiction does not undermine its constitutionality, or vires, if the law's pith and substance properly aligns with the jurisdiction of the government that adopted it.

Chief Justice McLachlin explains the doctrine of incidental effects in Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38 (at para 36):

> The incidental effects rule … applies when a provision, in pith and substance, lies within the competence of the enacting body but touches on a subject assigned to the other level of government. It holds that such a provision will not be invalid merely because it has an incidental effect on a legislative competence that falls beyond the jurisdiction of its enacting body.

In Canadian Western Bank v Alberta, 1007 SCC 22, the Court explained the doctrine of incidental effects as a "corollary" of pith and substance analysis. Justices Binnie and LeBel explained:

> 28 The fundamental corollary to this approach to constitutional analysis is that legislation whose pith and substance falls within the jurisdiction of the legislature that enacted it may, at least to a certain extent, affect matters beyond the legislature's jurisdiction without necessarily being unconstitutional. At this stage of the analysis of constitutionality, the "dominant purpose" of the legislation is still decisive. Its secondary objectives and effects have no impact on its constitutionality: "merely incidental effects will not disturb the constitutionality of an otherwise intra vires law" (Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), [2000] 1 SCR 494, 2000 SCC 21, at para. 23). By "incidental" is meant effects that may be of significant practical importance but are collateral and secondary to the mandate of the enacting legislature: see British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., [2005] 2 SCR 473, 2005 SCC 49, at para. 28. Such incidental intrusions into matters subject to the other level of government's authority are proper and to be expected: General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at p. 670. In Bank of Toronto v. Lambe (1887), 12 App. Cas. 575, by way of further example, and in contrast to the Alberta Banks case already mentioned, the Privy Council upheld the validity of legislation levying a tax on banks, holding that the pith and substance of the legislation was indeed to generate revenue for the province, and its essential purpose was therefore in relation to direct taxation, not banks or banking. See P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), vol. 1, at para. 15.5(a).
> 29 The "pith and substance" doctrine is founded on the recognition that it is in practice impossible for a legislature to exercise its jurisdiction over a matter effectively without incidentally affecting matters within the jurisdiction of another level of government. For example, as Brun and Tremblay point out, it would be impossible for Parliament to make effective laws in relation to copyright without affecting property and civil rights, or for provincial legislatures to make effective laws in relation to civil law matters without incidentally affecting the status of foreign nationals (H. Brun and G. Tremblay, Droit constitutionnel (4th ed. 2002), at p. 451)

In any constitutional analysis pursuant to the division of powers, the pith and substance, or characterization, is the starting point from which the rest of the analysis flows. The incidental effects doctrine means that for the purpose of characterization, incidental effects, provided they remain incidental and are not central to the impugned law, can safely be ignored. As the Court said in CWB, "[W]here problems results from incidental effects arise, it may often be possible to resolve them by a firm application of the pith and substance analysis" (at para. 31).

5 Ancillary powers doctrine

Incidental effects doctrine sometimes bumps up against ancillary powers doctrine—and not only because ancillary powers doctrine has sometimes gone by the name "necessarily incidental doctrine". Ancillary powers doctrine is distinguished from incidental effects doctrine in two primary ways: first, ancillary powers doctrine is generally used to save a provision, or a set of provisions, that are part of a larger, valid legislative scheme; and second, ancillary powers doctrine applies to provisions that are otherwise invalid or outside the authority of the enacting legislature.

Indeed, the Supreme Court of Canada has come a long way from Lord Atkin's characterization of the division of powers as "watertight compartments", with no room for overlap between subjects of federal and provincial jurisdiction. The ancillary powers doctrine confirms that the "dominant tide" of constitutional interpretation has shifted toward a more flexible and cooperative form of federalism. It functions to uphold statutory provisions which, if adopted in isolation, would be ultra vires the adopting legislature. However, where an ultra vires provision is contained within a valid broader legislative scheme, and is "ancillary" to that scheme's operation, the ancillary powers doctrine can save, or justify, the impugned provision(s). Unlike the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and federal paramountcy examined later in this chapter, ancillary powers is a validity doctrine; where prima facie ultra vires provisions do not meet the test laid out in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, the provision will be invalidated or declared of no force or effect.

5.1 General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641

General Motors of Canada Ltd. (GM) is a car and truck manufacturer. City National Leasing (CNL) leases cars and trucks on a nation-wide basis. CNL purchases most of its vehicles for lease from GM franchises. In order to finance those purchases, CNL received interest rate support from General Motors Acceptance Corporation (GMAC). As Dickson CJC set out:

> CNL alleges that during that time GM, directly or indirectly, had been paying "preferential" interest rate support to competitors of CNL in respect of competitors' purchases of GM manufactured automobiles and trucks, in addition to the interest rate support available to CNL. It is further alleged that the exclusion of CNL from the preferential interest rate support program from 1970 to 1980 was a practice of price discrimination contrary to s. 34(1)(a) of the Act, giving CNL an action under s. 31.1. CNL claims that it lost profits equivalent to monies saved by its competitors, and that it is entitled to recover from GM damages equivalent to the lost profits and compound interest thereon. CNL also sued GM for breach of contract for damages arising after March 1980.

The case concerned the Combines Investigation Act, RSC 1970, c. C-23, the precursor of the Competition Act, RSC 1985, c. C-34.

> THE CHIEF JUSTICE -- The principal issue in this appeal is the constitutional validity of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23. Section 31.1 creates a civil cause of action for certain infractions of the Combines Investigation Act. It is this fact which makes the section constitutionally suspect: a civil cause of action is within the domain of the provinces to create. The essential question raised by this appeal is whether s. 31.1 can, nevertheless, be upheld as constitutionally valid by virtue of its relationship with the Combines Investigation Act. Answering this question requires addressing two issues: first, is the Act valid under the federal trade and commerce power, expressed in s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867; and second, is s. 31.1 integrated with the Act in such a way that it too is intra vires under s. 91(2).
> For the reasons which follow, I have found s. 31.1 to be intra vires the federal Parliament. In answering the two aforementioned issues, I have decided, first, that the Combines Investigation Act is valid under the federal trade and commerce power, in particular, it is valid under the "second branch" of that power, the power over "general" trade and commerce. Second, I have found that s. 31.1 is constitutionally valid by virtue of being functionally related to the Act.

> (b) the failure of any person to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under this Act,

Among the offences covered by Part V of the Act, referred to in s. 31.1(1)(a) above, are those set out in s. 34(1) which reads:

> 34. (1) Every one engaged in a business who > is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

The following two constitutional questions were stated by the Court:

> Is the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23 (the "Act"), as amended, either in whole or in part, within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada under s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867?
>
> Is section 31.1 of the Act within the legislative competence of the Parliament of Canada?

In Canadian National Transportation, supra, I considered the relevant approach for determining the constitutional validity of a section of the Combines Investigation Act under the general trade and commerce power at p. 270:

> It is obvious at the outset that a constitutionally invalid provision will not be saved by being put into an otherwise valid statute, even if the statute comprises a regulatory scheme under the general trade and commerce branch of s. 91(2). The correct approach, where there is some doubt that the impugned provision has the same constitutional characterization as the Act in which it is found, is to start with the challenged section rather than with a demonstration of the validity of the statute as a whole. I do not think, however, this means that the section in question must be read in isolation. If the claim to constitutional validity is based on the contention that the impugned provision is part of a regulatory scheme it would seem necessary to read it in its context. If it can in fact be seen as part of such a scheme, attention will then shift to the constitutionality of the scheme as a whole.

The conclusion was then reached, on the basis of the above analysis, that s. 32(1)(c) was not an isolated provision but part of a regulatory scheme.

The approach just outlined was essentially that suggested by Laskin C.J. in Vapor Canada, supra, in the context of s. 7(e) of the Trade Marks Act (at p. 159):

> Since s. 7(e) is not a trade mark provision, its inclusion in the Trade Marks Act does not stamp it with validity merely because that Act in its main provisions is quantitatively unchallenged. I come back to the question whether s. 7, and particularly s. 7(e), can stand as part of the scheme of the Trade Marks Act and other related federal legislation. If it can stand alone, it needs no other support; if not, it may take on a valid constitutional cast by the context and association in which it is fixed as complementary provision [sic] serving to reinforce other admittedly valid provisions. [Emphasis added.]

In my view, in circumstances such as exist in the case at bar, it will normally be necessary to consider both the impugned provision and the Act as a whole (or a significant part of it) when undertaking a constitutional analysis. This approach coheres with that undertaken in Canadian National Transportation, supra, and Vapor Canada, supra. The first step should be to consider whether and to what extent the impugned provision can be characterized as intruding into provincial powers. If it cannot be characterized as intruding at all, i.e., if in its pith and substance the provision is federal law, and if the act to which it is attached is constitutionally valid (or if the provision is severable or if it is attached to a severable and constitutionally valid part of the act) then the investigation need go no further. In that situation both the provision and the act are constitutionally unimpeachable. If, as may occur in some instances, the impugned provision is found to be constitutionally unimpeachable while the act containing it is not, then the act must be assessed on it own. In these instances, it is clear that the claim of invalidity should originally have been made against the act and not against the particular provision. In most cases like the present, however, it will be concluded that the impugned provision can be characterized, prima facie, as intruding to some extent on provincial powers: the question is to what extent. I emphasize that in answering this initial question the court is considering the provision on its own and not assessing the act; thus the answer it reaches does not provide a conclusion with respect to the ultimate constitutional validity of the provision. The purpose is merely to ascertain the degree to which the provision could be said to intrude on provincial powers, so that this intrusion can be weighed in light of the possible justification for the section.

Such a justification will result from the impugned provision's relationship to valid legislation. Thus the next step in the process is to ascertain the existence of valid legislation. In considering cases argued under the general trade and commerce power, such as the present, this step involves ascertaining whether the act, or a severable part of the act which includes the impugned provision, contains a regulatory scheme. The presence of a scheme of legislation is one of the most basic characteristics, although not a sine qua non, of valid trade and commerce legislation. Most provisions upheld under the second branch of s. 91(2) will be connected to a regulatory scheme. In cases where a regulatory scheme is not found the court will then have to consider whether the legislation to which the provision is attached can nonetheless be supported by virtue of the existence of the other requirements for a valid exercise of the general trade and commerce power.

A regulatory scheme may be found in only a part of the act in question, if that part can stand alone, or it may found in the entire act. The portion of the statute necessary to establish the existence of a regulatory scheme will not always be easy to discern. In those instances where a challenged provision, taken alone, comprehends a complete regulatory mechanism, the provision itself constitutes the appropriate starting point. In other cases, it will be necessary to examine the entire statute before a regulatory scheme may be identified. Once the presence of a regulatory scheme has been shown it will be necessary, using the factors outlined in Vapor Canada, supra, and Canadian National Transportation, supra, to determine its constitutional validity. Only after this has been done should the court turn to more careful consideration of the relationship between the particular impugned provision and the scheme.

The final question is whether the provision can be constitutionally justified by reason of its connection with valid legislation. As Laskin C.J. remarked in Vapor Canada, supra, inclusion of an invalid provision in a valid statute does not necessarily stamp the provision with validity. Here the court must focus on the relationship between the valid legislation and the impugned provision. Answering the question first requires deciding what test of "fit" is appropriate for such a determination. By "fit" I refer to how well the provision is integrated into the scheme of the legislation and how important it is for the efficacy of the legislation. The same test will not be appropriate in all circumstances. In arriving at the correct standard the court must consider the degree to which the provision intrudes on provincial powers. The case law, to which I turn below, shows that in certain circumstances a stricter requirement is in order, while in others, a looser test is acceptable. For example, if the impugned provision only encroaches marginally on provincial powers, then a "functional" relationship may be sufficient to justify the provision. Alternatively, if the impugned provision is highly intrusive vis-à-vis provincial powers then a stricter test is appropriate. A careful case by case assessment of the proper test is the best approach.

In determining the proper test it should be remembered that in a federal system it is inevitable that, in pursuing valid objectives, the legislation of each level of government will impact occasionally on the sphere of power of the other level of government; overlap of legislation is to be expected and accommodated in a federal state. Thus a certain degree of judicial restraint in proposing strict tests which will result in striking down such legislation is appropriate. I reiterate what I said on this general theme (although in a slightly different context) in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 18:

> The history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers. It is true that doctrines like interjurisdictional and Crown immunity and concepts like "watertight compartments" qualify the extent of that interplay. But it must be recognized that these doctrines and concepts have not been the dominant tide of constitutional doctrines: rather they have been an undertow against the strong pull of pith and substance, the aspect doctrine and, in recent years, a very restrained approach to concurrency and paramountcy issues.
> The above comments also emphasize that the question in this appeal of how far federal legislation may validly impinge on provincial powers is one part of the general notion of the "pith and substance" of legislation; i.e., the doctrine that a law which is federal in its true nature will be upheld even if it affects matters which appear to be a proper subject for provincial legislation (and vice versa). On page 334 of his book Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985), Professor Hogg explains this in the following way:
> > The pith and substance doctrine enables a law that is classified as "in relation to" a matter within the competence of the enacting body to have incidental or ancillary effects on matters outside the competence of the enacting body.
> I emphasize that these comments should not be seen as altering the balance of constitutional powers. Both provincial and federal governments have equal ability to legislate in ways that may incidentally affect the other government's sphere of power. I quote from Professor Hogg again, where at p. 336 he states: "I think it is plain both on principle and on authority that the provincial enumerated powers have exactly the same capacity as the federal enumerated powers to `affect' matters allocated to the other level of government."

In the present appeal, the appellant focusses its attack on a particular section of the Act. The issue is not whether the Act as a whole is rendered ultra vires because it reaches too far, but whether a particular provision is sufficiently integrated into the Act to sustain its constitutionality. In numerous cases courts have considered the nature of the relationship which is required, between a provision which encroaches on provincial jurisdiction and a valid statute, for the provision to be upheld. In different contexts courts have set down slightly different requirements, viz.: "rational and functional connection" in Papp v. Papp, 1969 CanLII 219 (ON CA), [1970] 1 O.R. 331; R. v. Zelensky, 1978 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 940, and Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161; "ancillary", "necessarily incidental" and "truly necessary" in the Regional Municipality of Peel v. MacKenzie, supra; "intimate connection", "an integral part" and "necessarily incidental" in Northern Telecom Ltd v. Communications Workers of Canada, 1979 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 115; "integral part" in Clark v. Canadian National Railway Co., 1988 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 680; "a valid constitutional cast by the context and association in which it is fixed as a complementary provision" in Vapor Canada, supra; and "truly necessary" in R. v. Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Ltd., 1979 CanLII 187 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 695. I believe the approach I have outlined is consistent with the results of this jurisprudence. These cases are best understood as setting out the proper test for the particular context in issue, rather than attempting to articulate a test of general application with reference to all contexts. Thus the tests they set out are not identical. As the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers varies, so does the test required to ensure that an appropriate constitutional balance is maintained. In surveying past jurisprudence it is to be expected that some example of patterns between the appropriate test of fit, and the head of power under which the federal legislation is valid, will be found. Such patterns exist not only because of a possible degree of similarity between the federal legislation which falls under any one head of power, but also for the reason that certain federal heads of power, for example, s. 92(10), are narrow and distinct powers which relate to particular works and undertakings and are thus quite susceptible to having provisions "tacked-on" to legislation which is validated under them, while other federal heads of power, for example, trade and commerce, are broad and therefore less likely to give rise to highly intrusive provisions.

The steps in the analysis may be summarized as follows: First, the court must determine whether the impugned provision can be viewed as intruding on provincial powers, and if so to what extent (if it does not intrude, then the only possible issue is the validity of the act). Second, the court must establish whether the act (or a severable part of it) is valid; in cases under the second branch of s. 91(2) this will normally involve finding the presence of a regulatory scheme and then ascertaining whether that scheme meets the requirements articulated in Vapor Canada, supra, and in Canadian National Transportation, supra. If the scheme is not valid, that is the end of the inquiry. If the scheme of regulation is declared valid, the court must then determine whether the impugned provision is sufficiently integrated with the scheme that it can be upheld by virtue of that relationship. This requires considering the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers, in order to decide on the proper standard for such a relationship. If the provision passes this integration test, it is intra vires Parliament as an exercise of the general trade and commerce power. If the provision is not sufficiently integrated into the scheme of regulation, it cannot be sustained under the second branch of s. 91(2). I note that in certain cases it may be possible to dispense with some of the aforementioned steps if a clear answer to one of them will be dispositive of the issue. For example, if the provision in question has no relation to the regulatory scheme then the question of its validity may be quickly answered on that ground alone. The approach taken in a number of past cases is more easily understood if this possibility is recognized.

Does Section 31.1 Encroach on Provincial Powers?

The first step, therefore, in assessing the validity of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act is to determine whether the impugned provision can be seen as encroaching on provincial powers, and if so, to what extent. As section 31.1 creates a civil right of action it is not difficult to conclude that the provision does, on its face, appear to encroach on provincial power to some extent. The creation of civil actions is generally a matter within provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This provincial power over civil rights is a significant power and one that is not lightly encroached upon. In assessing the seriousness of this encroachment, however, three facts must be taken into consideration. The first is that s. 31.1 is only a remedial provision; its purpose is to help enforce the substantive aspects of the Act, but it is not in itself a substantive part of the Act. By their nature, remedial provisions are typically less intrusive vis-à-vis provincial powers. The second important fact is the limited scope of the action. Section 31.1 does not create a general cause of action; its application is carefully limited by the provisions of the Act. The third relevant fact is that it is well-established that the federal government is not constitutionally precluded from creating rights of civil action where such measures may be shown to be warranted. This Court has sustained federally-created civil actions in a variety of contexts: see Nykorak v. Attorney General of Canada, 1962 CanLII 38 (SCC), [1962] SCR 331 (allowing the federal Crown to sue a private party for the loss of services of a member of the armed forces); Jackson and Jackson, 1972 CanLII 141 (SCC), [1973] SCR 205; Zacks v. Zacks, 1973 CanLII 137 (SCC), [1973] SCR 891 (upholding the corollary relief provisions of the Divorce Act respecting alimony, maintenance or custody); and Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, supra (upholding a civil remedy against directors and officers of federally incorporated companies who engaged in insider trading). In the last mentioned case, at pages 182-83, the following passage, adopted by six of the seven members of the Court, appears:

One reservation with respect to the impugned sections of the federal act may be in the imposition of civil liability in s. 100.4(1). Does this imposition of civil liability in a federal statute so invade the provincial domain as to render the sections imposing liability ultra vires? This, in essence, was the argument of the appellants. But as Professors Anisman and Hogg point out: "Judicial decisions concerning a number of disparate matters such as federal elections, railways, federal corporations and even divorce have upheld Parliament's jurisdiction to provide civil relief in order to effectuate its legislative policies" ("Constitutional Aspects of Federal Securities Legislation" in Proposals for a Securities Market Law for Canada (1979), vol. 3, chap. III, at p. 192). In my opinion, ss. 100.4 and 100.5 have a general corporate purpose and a "rational, functional connection" with company law. The sections in my view are intra vires the Parliament of Canada.

It is clear that the inclusion of a private right of action in a federal enactment is not constitutionally fatal. The following excerpt from p. 415 of Cushing v. Dupuy (1880), 5 App. Cas. 409, a case cited by Sir Montague Smith at p. 113 in Parsons, supra, is apposite:

> It was contended for the Appellant that the provisions of the Insolvency Act interfered with property and civil rights, and was therefore ultra vires. This objection was very faintly urged. ...
>
> It would be impossible to advance a step in the construction of a scheme for the administration of insolvent estates without interfering with and modifying some of the ordinary rights of property, and other civil rights, nor without providing some mode of special procedure for the vesting, realisation, and distribution of the estate, and the settlement of the liabilities of the insolvent.
>
> In sum, the impugned provision encroaches on an important provincial power; however, the provision is a remedial one; federal encroachment in this manner is not unprecedented and, in this case; encroachment has been limited by the restrictions of the Act.

The second step in determining the validity of s. 31.1 is to establish whether the Act contains a regulatory scheme. …

The Validity of s. 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act

Having found that the Combines Investigation Act contains a regulatory scheme, valid under s. 91(2) of the Constitution Act, 1867, the only issue remaining to be addressed is the constitutional validity of s. 31.1. As I have already noted, mere inclusion in a valid legislative scheme does not ipso facto confer constitutional validity upon a particular provision. The provision must be sufficiently related to that scheme for it to be constitutionally justified. The degree of relationship that is required is a function of the extent of the provision's intrusion into provincial powers. I have already discussed this issue and concluded that s. 31.1 intrudes, though in a limited way, on the important provincial power over civil rights. In this light, I do not think that a strict test, such as "truly necessary" or "integral", is appropriate. On the other hand, it is not enough that the section be merely "tacked on" to admittedly valid legislation. The correct approach in this case is to ask whether the provision is functionally related to the general objective of the legislation, and to the structure and the content of the scheme. A similar test has been applied in other cases, as I have noted, and I think it is also the proper test for the circumstances of this appeal.

The nature of this relationship is addressed in this last stage of constitutional analysis. If section 31.1 cannot be characterized as functionally related to the scheme of combines regulation, it will be ultra vires. Neither the respondent nor the Attorney General of Canada submitted that s. 31.1 could be sustained under a head of power other than s. 91(2).

I am of the opinion that the necessary link between s. 31.1 and the Act exists. Section 31.1 is an integral, well-conceived component of the economic regulation strategy found in the Combines Investigation Act. Even if a much stricter test of fit were applied -- for instance, one of "necessarily incidental" -- s. 31.1 would still pass the test. Under the test of "functionally related" the section is clearly valid.

Section 31.1 is one of the arsenal of remedies created by the Act to discourage anti-competitive practices. Section 31.1 simply serves to reinforce other sanctions of the Act. The other remedial responses include orders of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission (Part IV.1), interim injunctions (Part IV), and criminal sanctions (Part V). Like the other remedies, s. 31.1 is intimately linked to the Combines Investigation Act. It takes on meaning only by reference to other provisions of the Act and has no independent content. As a result, the section is carefully bounded by the parameters of the Combines Investigation Act. It provides a private remedy only for particular violations of the Act and does not create a private right of action at large.

Section 31.1 of the Combines Investigation Act is also fundamentally integrated into the purpose and underlying philosophy of the Combines Investigation Act. There is a close congruence between the goal of enhancing healthy competition in the economy and s. 31.1 which creates a private remedy dependent for its effectiveness on individual initiative. The very exercise of the remedy in s. 31.1 by a company against a competitor whose behaviour has transgressed the code of conduct established by the Act may be said to reflect and promote the spirit of competition informing the Combines Investigation Act. In my view, the intimate tie between the purpose of the Act and a privately initiated and privately conducted enforcement mechanism is a strong indication that s. 31.1 is enmeshed in the fabric in the Act.

It is important to note that s. 31.1 does not create a general action for damages. Before any person can recover under s. 31.1 he or she must have suffered loss or damage as a result of (i) conduct contrary to Part V of the Act or (ii) the failure of the defendant to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under the Act. Section 31.1(2) of the Act provides in part that in any action under subs. (1) against a person, the record of proceedings in any court in which that person was convicted of an offence under Part V or convicted of or punished for failure to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under the Act is, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, proof that the person against whom the action is brought engaged in conduct that was contrary to a provision of Part V or failed to comply with an order of the Commission or a court under the Act. It seems to me that s. 31.1 is fully integrated into the Act, indeed, it is a core provision of the very pith and substance of the Act. …

For these reasons, I conclude that s. 31.1 is an integral part of the Combines Investigation Act scheme regulating anti-competitive conduct. The relationship between the section and the Act easily meets the test for the section to be upheld. This finding should not be interpreted as authority for upholding all provisions creating private civil action that are attached to a valid trade and commerce regulatory scheme or any other particular type of scheme. Section 31.1 is carefully constructed and restricted by the terms of the Combines Investigation Act.

This conclusion rebuts the appellant's argument that s. 31.1 tilts the constitutional balance between the federal domain and the domain of the provinces in favour of Parliament. Satisfying all of the concerns which I have discussed ensures that the constitutional balance will not be upset.

> For all of the foregoing reasons I am of the view that s. 31.1 is intra vires Parliament by virtue of its relationship to the scheme of economic regulation found in the Combines Investigation Act.

In General Motors, Chief Justice Dickson set out the general framework for applying the ancillary powers doctrine (referred to as "necessarily incidental" in the decision). Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, expands on the required fit between the ultra vires provision and the valid regulatory scheme for the ancillary powers doctrine to apply. Lacombe also helpfully sets out the relationships between various interpretative doctrines, including the incidental effects and ancillary powers doctrines. The case deals with construction of an aerodrome contrary to municipal zoning regulations.

Lacombe concerned the operation of an aerodrome on Gobeil Lake, a popular vacation spot in Quebec. Mr. Lacombe operated a float plane business that carried out activities on Gobeil Lake. After receiving complaints about aviation activities on the lake, in 1995, the municipality passed Bylaw No. 260. Bylaw No. 260, which amended Bylaw No. 210, prohibited the construction and use of aerodromes in Zone 33-RF, which encompassed parts of the municipality and included Gobeil Lake. Since Bylaw No. 260 amended Bylaw No. 210, the case raised the issue of ancillary powers. Specifically: was Bylaw No. 260 sufficiently connected to Bylaw No. 210 to benefit from its validity?

5.2 Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38

> [31] Although the amendments brought by by-law No. 260 relate to the federal authority over aeronautics rather than the provincial competence of zoning, they may nevertheless be found valid if they are "ancillary" to the exercise of a provincial power.
> (1) The Ancillary Powers Doctrine
> [32] The ancillary powers doctrine may be briefly described. Recognizing that a degree of jurisdictional overlap is inevitable in our constitutional order, the law accepts the validity of measures that lie outside a legislature's competence, if these measures constitute an integral part of a legislative scheme that comes within provincial jurisdiction: General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing, 1989 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 641, at pp. 668-70.
> [33] The Constitutions of the United States and Australia expressly provide for the exercise of ancillary powers: Constitution of the United States of America, art. I, § 8, cl. 18; Commonwealth of Australia Constitution Act, s. 51(xxxix). However, Canada's Constitution is silent on the issue: Papp v. Papp, 1969 CanLII 219 (ON CA), [1970] 1 O.R. 331 (C.A.), at p. 336. On occasion, in the past, it has been held that this silence, coupled with the wording of ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, deprives Canadian legislative bodies of the ability to make use of competencies assigned to the other level of government: Attorney General of Nova Scotia v. Attorney General of Canada, 1950 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1951] SCR 31, per Rinfret C.J.; St. Catharines Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1887), 1887 CanLII 3 (SCC), 13 SCR 577, at p. 637.
> [34] However, it is now well established that both Parliament and the legislatures may avail themselves of ancillary legislative powers: Attorney-General of Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion of Canada, [1894] A.C. 189 (P.C.) (the "Insolvency Reference"), at pp. 200-201; Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada v. Attorney-General of Canada, [1907] A.C. 65 (P.C.); Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for British Columbia, 1929 CanLII 439 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 111 (P.C.), at p. 118; Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for the Province of Quebec, 1946 CanLII 354 (UK JCPC), [1947] A.C. 33 (P.C.), at p. 43; Fowler v. The Queen, 1980 CanLII 201 (SCC), [1980] 2 SCR 213, at p. 226; Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, at p. 183.
> [35] The ancillary powers doctrine permits one level of government to trench on the jurisdiction of the other in order to enact a comprehensive regulatory scheme. In pith and substance, provisions enacted pursuant to the ancillary powers doctrine fall outside the enumerated powers of their enacting body: General Motors, at pp. 667-70. Consequently, the invocation of ancillary powers runs contrary to the notion that Parliament and the legislatures have sole authority to legislate within the jurisdiction allocated to them by the Constitution Act, 1867. Because of this, the availability of ancillary powers is limited to situations in which the intrusion on the powers of the other level of government is justified by the important role that the extrajurisdictional provision plays in a valid legislative scheme. The relation cannot be insubstantial: Nykorak v. Attorney General of Canada, 1962 CanLII 38 (SCC), [1962] SCR 331, at p. 335; Gold Seal Ltd. v. Attorney-General for the Province of Alberta (1921), 1921 CanLII 25 (SCC), 62 SCR 424, at p. 460; Global Securities, at para. 23.
> [36] The ancillary powers doctrine is not to be confused with the incidental effects rule. The ancillary powers doctrine applies where, as here, a provision is, in pith and substance, outside the competence of its enacting body. The potentially invalid provision will be saved where it is an important part of a broader legislative scheme that is within the competence of the enacting body. The incidental effects rule, by contrast, applies when a provision, in pith and substance, lies within the competence of the enacting body but touches on a subject assigned to the other level of government. It holds that such a provision will not be invalid merely because it has an incidental effect on a legislative competence that falls beyond the jurisdiction of its enacting body. Mere incidental effects will not warrant the invocation of ancillary powers.
> [37] Nor is the ancillary powers doctrine to be confused with the double aspect doctrine. In Canadian Western Bank, at para. 30, Binnie and LeBel JJ. explained that the double aspect doctrine recognizes the overlapping jurisdiction of the two levels of government: ". . . some matters are by their very nature impossible to categorize under a single head of power: they may have both provincial and federal aspects. Thus, the fact that a matter may for one purpose and in one aspect fall within federal jurisdiction does not mean that it cannot, for another purpose and in another aspect, fall within provincial competence . . . ." By contrast, ancillary powers apply only where a legislative provision does not come within those heads of power assigned to its enacting body under the Constitution Act, 1867.
> [38] In summary, only the ancillary powers doctrine concerns legislation that, in pith and substance, falls outside the jurisdiction of its enacting body. Laws raising a double aspect come within the jurisdiction of their enacting body, but intrude on the jurisdiction of the other level of government because of the overlap in the constitutional division of powers. Similarly, the incidental effects rule applies where the main thrust of the law comes within the jurisdiction of its enacting body, but the law has subsidiary effects that cannot come within the jurisdiction of that body.
> [39] The jurisprudence reveals that there has been some debate about the precise nature of the connection required to validate a provision under the ancillary powers doctrine.
> [40] In an earlier era, when constitutional powers were thought of in terms of watertight compartments, a strict necessity test prevailed. The view then was that "it is within the competence of the Dominion Parliament to provide for matters which, though otherwise within the competence of the Provincial legislature, are necessarily incidental to effective legislation by the Parliament of the Dominion on a subject of legislation expressly enumerated in s. 91": Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for the Province of Quebec, at p. 43 (emphasis added), per Lord Porter. See also Insolvency Reference, at pp. 200-201; Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for British Columbia, at p. 118; Attorney General of Canada v. C.P.R., 1958 CanLII 41 (SCC), [1958] SCR 285, at p. 290. The necessity standard continued to be affirmed into the 1980s: R. v. Thomas Fuller Construction Co. (1958) Ltd., 1979 CanLII 187 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 695, per Pigeon J.; and Regional Municipality of Peel v. MacKenzie, 1982 CanLII 53 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 9, per Martland J.

[41] As a more flexible conception of division of powers took hold, the necessity test gave way to a rational, functional connection test. In Papp, decided in 1970, Laskin J.A. (as he then was) stated that the test for the integration of an otherwise ultra vires legislative provision was "whether there is a rational, functional connection between what is admittedly good and what is challenged" (p. 336). A jurisdictional overhang would be permitted where the impugned portions of the law were complementary to the overarching purpose of the legislative scheme. The more flexible rational functional test was affirmed in R. v. Zelensky, 1978 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 940, and in McCutcheon, at p. 183.

[42] In General Motors, Dickson C.J. proposed a qualification on the rational functional test: the necessity test should apply to serious intrusions on the powers of the other branch of government, while the rational functional test should apply to lesser intrusions. The required degree of integration increases in proportion to the seriousness of the encroachment. Where the impugned legislation encroaches only slightly on the jurisdiction of the other level of government, a rational, functional connection is required. As the degree of intrusion grows more serious, the required degree of integration tends toward a test of necessity. A particularly serious encroachment will attract a standard of strict necessity. See Reference re Goods and Services Tax, 1992 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 445 ("GST Reference"), at pp. 469-70, on the application of this continuum.

[43] The General Motors test has been applied, mutatis mutandis, in all subsequent decisions of this Court in which the possibility of ancillary jurisdiction was canvassed: see the GST Reference; Kitkatla; Global Securities; Kirkbi AG v. Ritvik Holdings Inc., 2005 SCC 65, [2005] 3 SCR 302; Canadian Western Bank. It has been criticized on the basis that it involves a difficult distinction between serious and less serious intrusions (one's view of the seriousness of an intrusion may vary depending on whether one is intruding or being intruded upon, for example), and on the basis that it is not really a logical synthesis of the Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for the Province of Quebec and Papp lines of authority. It has also been pointed out that in applying the combined test, this Court has always backed away from a test of strict necessity, almost always applying the more flexible rational functional test. See P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 1, at p. 15-39 et seq. (The exception in this Court's jurisprudence being the GST Reference, at p. 471, where Lamer C.J. accepted that the non-revenue-generating provisions of the GST Act intruded substantially on provincial jurisdiction. Even then, he upheld their validity not because they were necessary, but merely because they were "highly integrated".)

[44] It is unnecessary to decide the merits of these criticisms in the present appeal because the legislation here at issue does not constitute a serious intrusion on federal jurisdiction. In my view, the rational functional test is applicable to this case.

[45] Under the rational functional test used by Laskin J.A. in Papp, and repeatedly affirmed in the jurisprudence of this Court, ancillary powers will only save a provision that is rationally and functionally connected to the purpose of the legislative scheme that it purportedly furthers. It is not enough that the measure supplement the legislative scheme; it must actively further it.

[46] In Kirkbi, for example, LeBel J. found a "functional relationship" on the basis that "the passing-off action plays a clear role in the federal scheme", filling a gap and thus avoiding inconsistencies in patent protection and uncertainty (para. 36). Similarly, in Papp, Laskin J.A. stated: "I can pose the issue shortly, if not more illuminatingly, by asking whether the custody provisions of the Divorce Act complement rather than supplement the admittedly valid divorce portions" (p. 336).

(2) Application of the Ancillary Powers Doctrine

[47] The question is whether the amendments brought by by-law No. 260, which in pith and substance lie outside the provincial power, are nevertheless valid because they are ancillary to valid provincial provisions — in other words, whether the amendments are rationally and functionally connected to valid provincial zoning objectives in the sense described in the preceding section.

[48] As is illustrated by the above cited examples from the jurisprudence, the application of ancillary powers to habilitate prima facie invalid legislation requires that the impugned provision, both rationally and in its function, further the purposes of the valid legislative scheme of which it is said to be part. One may ask, as LeBel J. did in Kirkbi, whether there is a "functional relationship" between the scheme and the impugned provision. One might also ask whether the intruding measure "fills a gap" in the legislative scheme, or whether it serves some other purpose related to the scheme, such as avoiding inconsistent application or uncertainty. Regardless of the precise wording of the test, the basic purpose of this inquiry is to determine whether the impugned measure not only supplements, but complements, the legislative scheme; it is not enough that the measure be merely supplemental: Papp.

[49] This brings us to the inquiry at hand. The starting point is the purpose of the legislative scheme that by-law No. 260 is alleged to further. This scheme is found in by-law No. 210, the broader zoning framework of the municipality of Sacré-Cœur. By-law No. 210 is generally valid legislation in relation to land use planning: see Ontario Home Builders' Association v. York Region Board of Education, 1996 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 929, at para. 50. The question is whether the general ban on aerodromes in zone 33-RF introduced by by-law No. 260 is rationally and functionally connected to by-law No. 210, such that it should be sustained as a functional part of the whole — notwithstanding its prima facie constitutional invalidity. In my view, the answer to this question is no.

[50] Zoning legislation, such as by-law No. 210, has as its purpose the regulation of land use, having regard to the underlying characteristics and uses of the land in question: see Johannesson, at pp. 319-20, per Estey J. It functions by establishing zones, or regions, where particular activities may be conducted, having regard to the nature of the territory and related factors. It thus seeks to establish a rational and fair basis upon which land users may predicate their behaviour. It generally seeks to treat similar areas similarly, and avoids stand-alone one-off prohibitions. The underlying purpose of zoning legislation, such as by-law No. 210, is to rationalize land use for the benefit of the general populace.

[51] A close examination of the purposes and effects of by-law No. 260 reveals that it does not further the objectives of zoning law generally, or by-law No. 210 in particular.

[52] As discussed earlier in the context of the pith and substance of the amendments brought by by-law No. 260, the Province asserts that by-law No. 260 was passed to protect the use of Gobeil Lake and similar areas by vacationers. However, by-law No. 260 does not confine its ban on aerodromes to vacation areas. Rather, it bans aerodromes throughout the municipality, which spans a variety of land uses.

[53] The lack of connection between by-law No. 260 and the general zoning purposes of by-law No. 210 is evidenced by the lack of correlation between the nature of the areas affected and the ban on aerodromes.

[54] By-law No. 260 treats similar parcels of land differently by expressly permitting aerodromes in zone 61-RF, but not in the adjacent zone 33-RF. These two zones are identical in essentially banning all but a few land uses. The only difference between the zoning of 33-RF and 61-RF is that the latter permits aerodromes. If the purpose of the broader zoning scheme in zone 33-RF — to protect use by vacationers — is established by these land use restrictions, then the same must hold for zone 61-RF. Yet it does not.

[55] Conversely, by-law No. 260 treats different parcels the same by broadly banning water aerodromes throughout the municipality, not only in areas used by vacationers. Again, this broad prohibition does not correlate with the land uses in the area covered.

[56] Like the impugned law in Johannesson, by-law No. 260 purports to regulate the location of aerodromes without reference to the underlying land use regime. It does not function as zoning legislation, but rather, is a stand-alone prohibition. It treats similar parcels differently, and different parcels the same, belying the first principle of zoning legislation.

[57] At the end of the day, what is missing is evidence of any purpose for by-law No. 260 other than the prohibition of certain aeronautical activities in a significant portion of the municipality. There is no evidence of a gap in by-law No. 210 that by-law No. 260 fills. There is no evidence of a feature of by-law No. 210 that by-law No. 260 enhances; no evidence of an inconsistency or uncertainty that it removes from by-law No. 210's operation. There is no evidence that by-law No. 260 is an integrated feature of the zoning scheme, viewed as a whole. Indeed, it is difficult to say that by-law No. 260 is even supplemental to the zoning scheme, given its arbitrary focus on banning aeronautics without regard to underlying land use, and in any event supplementation would not be enough to save it: Papp. In sum, there simply is not the kind of connection one finds in the cases where invalid legislation has been resuscitated through the ancillary powers doctrine.

[58] I conclude that the amendments brought by by-law No. 260 do not meet the rational functional connection test in General Motors. It has not been shown that the amendments further the zoning purposes of by-law No. 210, in either purpose or effect. These amendments are simply, on their face and in their impact, measures directed at removing aviation activities from a significant part of the municipality. No redeeming connection is established, and the impugned legislation cannot be habilitated by invoking ancillary powers.

In Lacombe, the Supreme Court of Canada revisited the "fit test" from General Motors and set out the requirement that the impugned provision must be "rationally and functionally connected" to the broader legislative scheme. In Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61, the Court offered further guidance on how to assess the scope of the intrusion of the ultra vires provision into the competing level of government's jurisdiction.

5.3 Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act, 2010 SCC 61

After significant consultation and review, the federal government enacted the Assisted Human Reproduction Act, S.C. 2004, c. 2 in March 2004. The lengthy Act covered a wide swath of activities, including human cloning, the commercialization of human reproductive material, the manipulation and use of human reproductive material and in vitro embryos, transgenic engineering, and the repayment of expenses to donors and surrogates. Sections 5 to 9 referred to prohibited activities, such as the sale of eggs or sperm and cloning. Sections 10 to 13, meanwhile, referenced a number of controlled activities—activities that would be prohibited only if they were unregulated. The remainder of the Act established an agency that administered and enforced the Act and regulated activities and penalties, among other things.

C. Are the Administrative Provisions of the Act (Sections 14 to 61 and 65 to 68) Ancillary to the Prohibition Regime in Sections 5 to 13?

[124] The criminal prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13 are followed by a number of sections that provide for their administration and enforcement. Sections 14 to 19 set up a system of information management. Sections 20 to 39 of the Act establish the Assisted Human Reproduction Agency of Canada. Sections 40 to 59 charge the Agency with administering and enforcing the Act and regulations, and authorize it to issue licences for certain activities related to assisted reproduction. Finally, ss. 60 and 61 provide for penalties, ss. 65 to 67 authorize the promulgation of regulations, and s. 68 addresses the equivalency agreements with the provinces.

[125] In pith and substance, many of these provisions do not come within Parliament's criminal law power. However, the Attorney General of Canada argues that these provisions (the "ancillary provisions") support the criminal law prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13 of the Act and are valid under the doctrine of ancillary powers (also known as the ancillary doctrine: see Global Securities Corp. v. British Columbia (Securities Commission), 2000 SCC 21, [2000] 1 SCR 494, at para. 45).

[126] The ancillary powers doctrine holds that legislative provisions which, in pith and substance, fall outside the jurisdiction of the government that enacted them, may be upheld on the basis of their connection to a valid legislative scheme. This doctrine addresses the reality in federal states that one level of government will often be unable to legislate effectively on matters within its jurisdiction without trenching on subjects that belong to the other level of government. At the same time, however, the doctrine of ancillary powers seeks to maintain the basic division of federal and provincial powers established by the Constitution Act, 1867.

[127] The Court has developed a rational, functional test to describe the required connection, with the caveat that a test of necessity will apply where the encroachment on the jurisdiction of the other level of government is substantial: General Motors, at pp. 667-70; Reference re Goods and Services Tax, 1992 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 445, at pp. 469-70; Kirkbi AG v. Ritvik Holdings Inc. The idea of proportionality underlies the idea of a rational and functional standard for some cases and standard of necessity for others. The more an ancillary provision intrudes on the competency of the other level of government, the higher the threshold for upholding it on the basis of the ancillary powers doctrine. Though this test has been criticized as too dependent on a subjective classification of the severity of the intrusion (see Hogg, at p. 15-43), for the purposes of this decision it need not be revisited.

[128] In General Motors, Dickson C.J. noted a number of factors that would determine the severity of an extrajurisdictional incursion. These factors may be summarized as follows.

[129] The first factor concerns the scope of the heads of power in play — whether they are broad or narrow. Dickson C.J. focussed on the head of power that validates the scheme in which the impugned provision appears. Broad heads of power lend themselves to jurisdictional overlap, and are "therefore less likely to give rise to highly intrusive provisions" (General Motors, at p. 671). This stands in contrast to narrow heads of power, which are "quite susceptible to having provisions 'tacked-on' to legislation which is validated under them" (ibid.). Dickson C.J. thus concluded that the intrusion on the powers of the other level of government will usually be less serious where the impugned provision appears in a legislative scheme that is validated under a broad head of power. This logic suggests that it is also important to consider the head of power that the impugned provision is said to infringe. If it intrudes upon a broad head of power, the intrusion will generally be less serious because it does not overwhelm the jurisdiction of the other level of government. Conversely, an intrusion on a narrow legislative competency will be more serious because it threatens to obliterate that head of power.

[130] The second factor concerns the nature of the impugned provision. In General Motors, Dickson C.J. considered the intrusion on provincial powers less serious because the nature of the impugned provision in that case was remedial. The provision was designed "to help enforce the substantive aspects of the Act, but it [was] not in itself a substantive part of the Act" (p. 673). Dickson C.J. also noted that the incursion on the jurisdiction of the other level of government would be less serious where the impugned provision was limited in scope, and did not create general rights. Another relevant aspect of the nature of the impugned provision is whether it is intended to replace legislation introduced by the other level of government, or merely supplement it. An intrusion will be less serious when the impugned provision is meant to coexist with legislation enacted by the other level of government.

[131] Finally, Dickson C.J. considered whether the impugned provision's enacting body had a history of legislating on the matter in question. A history of legislation in the area supports the legitimacy of the impugned provisions and suggests they will not prove unduly intrusive on the other level of government. Thus the enacting body is "not constitutionally precluded" from enacting similar legislation "where such measures may be shown to be warranted" (p. 673). In General Motors, it sufficed that Parliament had a history of intruding on provincial jurisdiction by creating rights of civil action. This track record demonstrated that the inclusion of such a right was "not constitutionally fatal" (p. 674).

[132] Dickson C.J.'s list of factors did not purport to be exhaustive, and the assessment of the seriousness of an intrusion must ultimately be grounded in the facts of each case. However, the General Motors factors align well with the facts of the present appeal.

[133] Before turning to the question of how seriously the ancillary provisions intrude on provincial jurisdiction, it is useful to describe the nature of the intrusions. Some of the ancillary provisions are criminal in nature and do not significantly intrude on provincial powers. The provisions for enforcement (ss. 45 to 59), promulgation of regulations (ss. 65 to 67), and imposition of penalties (ss. 60 and 61) are essentially part of the criminal prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13. Indeed, many of them are rough analogues to provisions in the Criminal Code. The organizational provisions in ss. 20 to 39 are similar in nature. However, other provisions intrude directly on provincial powers. Of particular significance are the information management provisions in ss. 14 to 19, which define standards of consent and privacy, charge the Agency with managing personal health information, and establish rules for the medical profession. Additionally, the administrative provisions in ss. 40 to 44 endow the Agency with broad powers to grant licences that affect the who, where, when, and how of assisted reproduction.

[134] The question is whether these provisions, taken as a whole, represent a minor incursion on provincial powers, or a substantial one. The first consideration is the scope of the provincial head of power in play. In the present appeal, the ancillary provisions generally fall under the provincial powers over property and civil rights (s. 92(13)) and matters of a merely local or private nature (s. 92(16)). Both of these heads of power are very broad, and they are often seen as sources of residual jurisdiction: see Hogg, at pp. 17-2 and 17-3. The breadth of these heads of power renders the intrusion less serious.

[135] This brings us to the second factor, the nature of the ancillary provisions. None of these provisions purport to create a substantive right. Rather, as explained below, they function merely to assist in enforcing the Act. Without the prohibition regime in ss. 5 to 13, these provisions would serve no purpose; they would establish an agency with nothing to enforce. Consent is obtained, information flows, and privacy is protected — all to ensure the smooth functioning of the criminal prohibitions. Moreover, the ancillary provisions are tailored to a small corner of the vast topography of the provincial power over health: namely, the harmful aspects of assisted human reproduction, insofar as they are specifically targeted by the Act and regulations. The impact of the law on provincial powers is real, but it is confined in a manner consistent with the purpose of the Act. Furthermore, the ancillary provisions are designed to supplement, rather than exclude, provincial legislation. The Act imposes federal rules on the practice of assisted reproduction, but it does not prevent the provinces from regulating this field, especially for the promotion of its beneficial aspects. This conclusion is underscored by the equivalency provision in s. 68, which provides that the Governor in Council may consent to suspending certain portions of the Act and regulations in favour of equivalent provincial laws. The nature of the ancillary provisions points in the direction of a minor intrusion on provincial powers.

[136] Finally, I turn to Parliament's history of legislating in the field occupied by the ancillary provisions. Parliament has long sought to address issues of morality, health, and security. As discussed above, it has also invoked the criminal law power to uphold regulatory schemes. Of particular relevance is Parliament's history of administering and enforcing these statutes, often by way of licensing bodies like the Agency: see Firearms Reference; Hydro-Québec. These historical comparisons suggest that the ancillary provisions constitute only a minor intrusion on provincial powers.

[137] In light of these factors, I conclude that the ancillary provisions constitute a minor incursion on provincial jurisdiction. Accordingly, the rational and functional connection test should be applied in this case.

[138] The rational and functional connection test assesses the relationship between the ancillary provisions and the otherwise valid legislative scheme in which they appear. The ancillary provisions must support the scheme in a way that is rational in purpose and functional in effect. This means that they must "complement rather than supplement" the legislative scheme: Papp v. Papp, 1969 CanLII 219 (ON CA), [1970] 1 O.R. 331 (C.A.), at p. 336. It also means they must be appropriately tailored to fill "gaps" in the legislative scheme that might otherwise lead to inconsistency, uncertainty, or ineffectiveness: Kirkbi AG v. Ritvik Holdings Inc. It need not be shown that the scheme would fail without the ancillary provisions; that would be a test of necessity. Rather, the ancillary provisions must themselves perform a function that complements the other provisions in the scheme, and they cannot have been tacked on merely as a matter of convenience.

[139] The rational, functional connection test recognizes the need to protect the supremacy of each level of government in the areas of jurisdiction assigned to it by the Constitution Act, 1867. However, it also recognizes that these heads of power are no longer watertight. The complexity of modern legislation will often render it impossible for one level of government to fulfill its constitutional mandate without trespassing on the jurisdiction of the other level. The Court's endorsement of a flexible, cooperative approach to federalism suggests that this kind of pragmatic lawmaking should be encouraged: see Dickson C.J. in OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 18; Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, at para. 42.

[140] The final question is whether the ancillary provisions are rationally and functionally connected to the valid criminal law provisions in ss. 5 to 13 of the Act.

[141] The first set of ancillary provisions are ss. 14 to 19, which address access to information. These provisions harness the flow of information, first to deal appropriately with consent and related privacy issues, and second to facilitate compliance with the Act. Both these goals are rationally connected to the scheme in ss. 5 to 13. The only purpose of these information management provisions is to further the scheme. Functionally, they fill gaps that would otherwise undermine the operation of the prohibition regime.

[142] Consent is central to the scheme established by the Act. Section 2(d) declares that "the principle of free and informed consent must be promoted and applied as a fundamental condition of the use of human reproductive technologies". This concern is reflected in the consent provisions of s. 8, which bar the use of human reproductive material to create an embryo, or the use of an in vitro embryo, unless the donor consents. The importance of consent is intimately tied to moral concerns, as discussed earlier.

[143] Sections 14 to 19 contain a number of provisions to ensure that participants give consent, have sufficient information to make this consent meaningful, and that their privacy is protected throughout. These provisions ensure that donors are aware of the requirements and protections of the Act and have adequate counselling services so as to give full and informed consent (s. 14(2)). Additionally, they provide for disclosure of relevant health information to participants in, and offspring of the processes (s. 18(3), (4) and (7)) so that they, too, will have the necessary information to manage their own reproductive lives. Furthermore, the information management provisions provide for the withdrawal of consent, requiring the destruction of personal information and reproductive material (s. 16(2) and (3)). Finally, these provisions also protect privacy interests, so that the laudable ends of informed consent do not unduly compromise human dignity (ss. 15(1) and 18(2)).

[144] Compliance is also central to the operation of the Act, because a prohibition regime would be useless if it did not have a mechanism to ensure that its provisions are respected. Sections 14 to 19 achieve this end by coordinating information sharing between the relevant actors: donors, practitioners, the Agency, and the public. With regard to donors, s. 14(2) provides that they will be informed of the prohibitions and protections of the Act, ensuring that they have sufficient information to comply with the Act and demand compliance of practitioners. As for practitioners and other licensees, s. 14(1) provides that they will have sufficient information about donors to avoid contravening the prohibitions in the Act (e.g., by accepting a donation of reproductive material from an underage donor, in contravention of s. 9). Sections 15 and 16 cover the disclosure of personal information to the Agency, the courts and insurers, while s. 17 charges the Agency with maintaining a personal health information registry to assist in administering and enforcing the Act (see also s. 18(1)). Finally, s. 19 gives the public a right to access certain information about the Agency's activities, thereby promoting compliance by subjecting enforcement of the Act to public scrutiny.

> [145] It is not difficult to see how the collection of information will help to ensure that the Act's prohibitions are respected and, if defied, that such conduct will be effectively prosecuted.
> [146] I conclude that ss. 14 to 19 are closely tied to the valid criminal prohibitions in ss. 5 to 13. These prohibitions fill a gap by addressing the practical considerations inherent in the functioning of the legislative scheme. Because they do so in a tailored manner, they constitute a proper exercise of ancillary powers.

In the end, there were three different judgments in Reference re Assisted Human Reproduction Act. Each made different validity findings with respect to the provisions at issue.

5.4 Questions

1. The three doctrines described above—pith and substance doctrine, incidental effects doctrine, and ancillary doctrine—are fundamentally cooperative in nature. They are concerned with narrow interpretation, generous overlap, and saving provisions which might otherwise be ultra vires. As you read about the next two doctrines, paramountcy and interjurisdictional immunity, consider whether they are animated by different considerations or prioritize different interpretative values. Consider, in particular, the extent to which the outcome in each case could be different if the decision maker took a less cooperative stance and looked through a different interpretation doctrine.
2. To what extent do you think that the outcomes in any of these cases turns on judicial values? What might some of those values be? For example, would the Multiple Access decision take a different approach to double aspect doctrine if Justice Dickson prioritized provincial rights and autonomy? Efficiency? Predictability?

For helpful discussions of values and models of federalism, see: Richard Simeon, "Criteria for Choice in Federal Systems" (1982-83) 8 Queen's LJ 131; Bruce Ryder, "The Demise and Rise of the Classical Paradigm in Canadian Federalism: Promoting Autonomy for the Provinces and First Nations" (1991) 36:2 McGill LJ 309; Jean Leclair, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism" (2003) 28 Queen's LJ 411; Wade Wright, "Federalism(s) in the Supreme Court During the McLachlin Years" (2018) 86 SCLR (2d) 213.

Sometimes, the nature or scale of the intrusion or conflict may require something more than firm application of pith and substance doctrine, generous tolerance of double aspects, or close connection to an otherwise valid legislative scheme. In such circumstances, courts rely on two other doctrines: interjurisdictional immunity doctrine and paramountcy doctrine.

6 Interjurisdictional immunity doctrine

Whereas the double aspect doctrine relates to matters with both federal and provincial dimensions, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, or "IJI", says that some matters can only be dealt with by a single level of government. These matters are immune, in other words, from the application of legislation adopted by the other level of government. Although the doctrine has not always been consistently applied, aeronautics tends to me the most frequent example of where the doctrine of IJI limits, or immunizes, activities from the application of provincial laws. In Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, for example, a majority of the Supreme Court ruled that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity meant that an aerodrome, or small airport, the operation of which lies exclusively under federal jurisdiction, was immune from the application of valid provincial legislation governing the use of agricultural land. Another area of relatively frequent application is telecommunications—a subject of federal jurisdiction, or, a federal "undertaking".

The scope of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been narrowed over the years, largely in recognition of the need for a flexible form of federalism and the related erosion of the concept of exclusivity in the division of powers. Indeed, interjurisdictional immunity reflects the "watertight compartments" approach to the division of powers set out by the Privy Council in 1937. But the doctrine is still alive, and it is worth understanding how it works and when it applies.

Importantly, as the interjurisdictional immunity cases demonstrate, where an activity is found to be immune from the operation of a valid law adopted by the level of government without jurisdiction over that activity, the law remains valid, or intra vires. But where interjurisdictional immunity applies, the law becomes inapplicable to the activity in question. This is so regardless of whether any legislation from the competing area of government governs the activity. Interjurisdictional immunity, then, is not about managing conflicting laws, nor is it a doctrine of validity. Rather, it deals with the applicability of valid laws to certain activities, or "undertakings", as the following cases illustrate.

Robin Elliot described the interjurisdictional immunity case law as cases where otherwise valid provincial legislation was held not to apply in certain contexts because of the strongly federal character of those contexts. The doctrine originated in cases about federally incorporated companies and then expanded to reach federally regulated undertakings, works, things, or persons. An "undertaking" is not a physical thing but an arrangement in which physical things are used. Some examples of undertakings include telecommunications, radio and television, pipelines, and aeronautics. In CWB, the Court confirmed that interjurisdictional immunity did not extend to all federal activities.

Section 91(29), read together with section 92(10), of the Constitution Act, 1867, plays an important role here:

> s. 91... it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,-
> 29. Such Classes of Subjects as are expressly excepted in the Enumeration of the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces.
> 92. In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,-
> 10. Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are of the following Classes:-
> (a) Lines of Steam or other Ships, Railways, Canals, Telegraphs, and other Works and Undertakings connecting the Province with any other or others of the Provinces, or extending beyond the Limits of the Province:
> (b) Lines of Steam Ships between the Province and any British or Foreign Country:
> (c) Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general Advantage of Canada or for the Advantage of Two or more of the Provinces.

An early case, McKay et al. v The Queen, 1965 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1965] SCR 798, provides a helpful example of the rationale for interjurisdictional immunity. The McKays were convicted for displaying a sign on their on their property in contravention of a municipal zoning bylaw. The bylaw prohibited all signs except for real estate signs, trespassing signs, and safety signs. Their sign urged people to vote for a particular candidate during a federal election. The McKays argued that the bylaw was not intended to forbid the display of such a sign during a federal election.

> The majority found that the bylaw was inapplicable to the McKays. The Court split 5:4 and the decision generated significant debate and some criticism. In the excerpt below, Cartwright J explains the rationale for reading down the bylaw (pp. 804-807).

> A municipal corporation which derives its legislative power from an act of the Provincial Legislature, of course, cannot have power to enact a provision which would be ultra vires of that legislature.
> In the case at bar the learned Justice of the Peace and the Court of Appeal have given effect to the by-law as if it provided:
> > During an election to Parliament no owner of property in an R2 zone in Etobicoke shall display on his property any sign soliciting votes for a candidate at such election. I cannot think that it was the intention of the Council to so enact or that it was the intention of the Legislature to empower it to do so. Such an enactment would, in my opinion, be ultra vires of the provincial legislature. The power of the legislature to enact such a law, if it exists, must be found in s. 92 of the British North America Act. It is argued for the respondent that it falls within head 13, " Property and Civil Rights in the Province." Whether or not the right of an elector at a federal election to seek by lawful means to influence his fellow electors to vote for the candidate of his choice is aptly described as a civil right need not be discussed; it is clearly not a civil right in the province. It is a right enjoyed by the elector not as a resident of Ontario but as a citizen of Canada.
>
> A political activity in the federal field which has theretofore been lawful can, in my opinion, be prohibited only by Parliament. This rule is, I think, implicit in every judgment delivered in this Court in the recent case of Oil Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union Local 16-601 V. Imperial Oil Ltd. et al. The division of opinion in that case was not as to the soundness of the rule but as to whether the legislation there in question infringed it. The reasons of the majority, who upheld the provincial legislation which was under consideration, were given by Mart-land J. and by Ritchie J. Martland J. said, at page 594:
> > The legislation, however, does not affect the right of any individual to engage in any form of political activity which he may desire. It does not prevent a trade union from engaging in political activities.
> Ritchie J. said at page 608:
>
> > The impugned legislation does not, in my view, have the effect of in any sense precluding any trade union from indulging in political activity or from collecting political party funds from its members.
> If by-law 11737 is construed as it has been by the learned Justice of the Peace and by the Court of Appeal, it does not merely affect, it destroys the right of the appellants to engage in a form of political activity in the federal field which has heretofore been possessed and exercised by electors without question.
>
> I incline to agree with Mr. Brewin's submission that Parliament has "occupied the field" in enacting The Canada Elections Act and particularly s. 71 which reads as follows:
> > 71. Every printed advertisement, handbill, placard, poster or dodger having reference to any election shall bear the name and address of its printer and publisher, and any person printing, publishing, distributing or posting up, or causing to be printed, published, distributed or posted up, any such document unless it bears such name and address is guilty of an offence against this Act punishable on summary conviction as provided in this Act, and if he is a candidate or the official agent of a candidate is further guilty of an illegal practice.
> This indicates that Parliament contemplates that persons other than candidates may post up placards and posters having reference to an election and subjects the practice to a limited form of regulation. The impugned by-law forbids such posting up altogether on residential property, which will often be the only place on which the owner of that property has the right to post up such a placard. However, I do not find it necessary to reach a definite conclusion on this branch of Mr. Brewin's argument. In my opinion, the legislature has no power to enact a prohibition of the sort which by-law 11737, as construed by the Court of Appeal, contains as such a prohibition would be a law in relation to proceedings at a federal election and not in relation to any subject-matter within the provincial power. As was said by Lord Watson in Union Colliery v. Bryden :
> > The abstinence of the Dominion Parliament from legislating to the full limit of its powers, could not have the effect of transferring to any provincial legislature the legislative power which had been assigned to the Dominion by s. 91 of the Act of 1867.
> While that case dealt with an attempted invasion by the provincial legislature of a field exclusively reserved to Parliament by head 25 of s. 91 of the British North America Act, the subject matter of elections to Parliament appears to me to be from its very nature one which cannot be regarded as coming within any of the classes of subjects assigned to the legislatures of the provinces by section 92. As to this I agree with the following statement of Taschereau J., as he then was, in Valin v. Langlois:
> > It is admitted, and is beyond doubt, that the Parliament of Canada has the exclusive power of legislation over Dominion controverted elections. By the lex Parliamentaria, as well as by the 41st, 91st, and 92nd sections of the British North America Act, this power is as complete as if it was specially and by name contained in the enumeration of the federal powers of section 91, just as promissory notes, Insolvency, &c., are.
>
> It will be noted that the Judicial Committee in refusing leave to appeal stated that, although the questions dealt with in the judgment of this Court were undoubtedly of great importance, leave should be refused because the judgment sought to be appealed was clearly right; see Valin v. Langlois, particularly at page 122.
>
> It is scarcely necessary to add that, just as the legislature cannot do indirectly what it cannot do directly, it cannot by using general words effect a result which would be beyond its powers if brought about by precise words. An enactment in general words which, if literally construed, would bring about such a result is one to which the maxim, Verba generalia restringuntur ad habilitatem rei vel personae, is peculiarly applicable.
>
> Earlier in these reasons I have stated that counsel for the appellants did not question the validity of the by-law or of the enabling provincial legislation, I should make it plain that this admission on his part depended upon the acceptance of his argument that on its proper construction the by-law did not prohibit the display of the sign in regard to which the appellants were convicted. It was implicit in his argument that if the by-law should be construed so as to prohibit that display it would be pro tanto invalid.
> For these reasons I agree with the conclusion of Hughes J, that on its proper construction by-law number 11737 does not prohibit the display of the sign displayed by the appellants during the period mentioned in the charge against them. [Emphasis added]

The text emphasized in the excerpt above cautions that legislatures should not be able to do indirectly what they are not authorized to do directly. In other words, if a narrowly framed law would be ultra vires an enacting legislature, then a more broadly framed law should not avoid that ultra vires outcome. For example, if the municipality made a bylaw prohibiting all federal election campaign signs, that would be struck down as encroaching federal jurisdiction over elections. If, however, the municipality made a bylaw prohibiting all signs without exception under its property and civil rights jurisdiction, the breadth and generality of that bylaw ought not shield it from being struck down.

6.1 Bell Canada v. Quebec (CSST), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749

In Bell Canada v. Quebec (CSST), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749, the Court had to decide whether Quebec's legislation governing occupational health and safety could apply to Bell Canada, a federal undertaking. Importantly, the decision explains how severely the impugned law must impact the activity in question in order of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to render the impugned law inapplicable.

17. To facilitate an understanding of the judgments of the lower courts and the arguments put forward by the parties, I think it is best to summarize at the outset the rules which have so far been applied by the courts and in accordance with which this Court must resolve the question stated at the start of these reasons and presented by the three appeals. These rules are well known and most of them need only be stated in the form of propositions: a more critical study of them can be made when it comes time to apply them to the circumstances of the case at bar, namely the classification of the impugned legislation.

Proposition One

18. General legislative jurisdiction over health belongs to the provinces, subject to the limited jurisdiction of Parliament ancillary to the powers expressly conferred by s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 or the emergency power relating to the peace, order and good government of Canada: Schneider v. The Queen, 1982 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 112, at p. 137, reasons of Dickson J.--as he then was--writing for seven judges of this Court. This jurisdiction has historically been seen as resting with the provinces under s. 92(16) of the Constitution Act, 1867, "Generally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province", although the considerable dimensions of this jurisdiction were probably not foreseen in 1867.

Proposition Two

19. In principle, labour relations and working conditions fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures: these matters fall into the class of subjects mentioned in s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, "Property and Civil Rights in the Province": Toronto Electric Commissioners v. Snider, 1925 CanLII 331 (UK JCPC), [1925] A.C. 396 ("Snider").

Proposition Three

20. Notwithstanding the rule stated in proposition two, Parliament is vested with exclusive legislative jurisdiction over labour relations and working conditions when that jurisdiction is an integral part of its primary and exclusive jurisdiction over another class of subjects, as is the case with labour relations and working conditions in the federal undertakings covered by ss. 91(29) and 92(10)a., b. and c. of the Constitution Act, 1867, that is undertakings such as Alltrans Express Ltd., Canadian National and Bell Canada. It follows that this primary and exclusive jurisdiction precludes the application to those undertakings of provincial statutes relating to labour relations and working conditions, since such matters are an essential part of the very management and operation of such undertakings, as with any commercial or industrial undertaking: Reference re Minimum Wage Act of Saskatchewan, 1948 CanLII 36 (SCC), [1948] SCR 248 (the "Postal Service Case 1948"); Reference re Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, 1955 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1955] SCR 529 (the "Stevedoring Case"); Commission du salaire minimum v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, 1966 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1966] SCR 767 ("Bell Canada 1966"). This third proposition reflects, at least in part, a constitutional theory which commentators who have criticized it have called the theory of "interjurisdictional immunity". I will return to this below.

21. It should however be noted that the rules stated in this third proposition appear to constitute only one facet of a more general rule: works, such as federal railways, things, such as land reserved for Indians, and persons, such as Indians, who are within the special and exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament, are still subject to provincial statutes that are general in their application, whether municipal legislation, legislation on adoption, hunting or the distribution of family property, provided however that the application of these provincial laws does not bear upon those subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction: Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Corporation of the Parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, [1899] A.C. 367 ("Bonsecours"); Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare, 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751 ("Natural Parents"); Dick v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309; Derrickson v. Derrickson, 1986 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 285.

Whether ss. 33, 36, 37 and 40 to 45 of an Act respecting occupational health and safety (R.S.Q., c. S-2.1) are constitutionally applicable to Bell Canada?

[…]

192. I will now consider propositions two and three.

193. The Act deals with the following matters: working conditions, labour relations and the management of undertakings. Under proposition two, these subjects in principle fall into the class of subject mentioned in s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867: "Property and Civil Rights in the Province". The Act is therefore intra vires, valid and applicable to undertakings which it may constitutionally cover.

194. However, consistent with proposition three and by exception to proposition two, the Act characterized as above cannot be applied to the federal undertakings mentioned in s. 91(29) and s. 92(10)a., b. and c. of the Constitution Act, 1867, without regulating essential parts of those undertakings and without making the Act, as a consequence of such an application, a statute dealing with matters that fall within the classes of subjects mentioned in those subsections. The Act is therefore not applicable to undertakings such as Bell Canada and Canadian National.

195. However, it will be necessary to look further at proposition three and the cases on which it is based.

[…]

4. Impairment of Federal Undertakings

305. As I observed earlier, appellants and the Attorney General of Quebec argued that the Act does not impair the operations and functioning of Bell Canada.

306. This argument might be relevant if it were held that the application of the Act does not bear upon working conditions and labour relations as well as the management of a federal undertaking. Yet precisely because it must be held that the Act encroaches on a field that falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament and is, for this reason, not applicable to federal undertakings, it is not relevant whether the Act impairs or not the operations and functioning of Bell Canada and Canadian National. It suffices that the application of the Act bear upon the undertaking in what makes it specifically of federal jurisdiction for that undertaking to fall outside the ambit of this legislation. The same must be said of the Regulations in Alltrans.

307. I believe this analysis is consistent with that used in Bell Canada 1966. What was immediately at issue in that case was the requirement that the undertaking pay a levy of some $50,000 a year from 1959 to 1965, and it is unlikely that Bell Canada would not have ample funds to pay such amounts. It can also be assumed that Bell Canada was already paying its employees at least the minimum wage specified by the provincial statute. The undertaking was therefore not impaired by application of the provincial statute. Nonetheless, at p. 770 Martland J. cited s. 13 of the Minimum Wage Act, which gave the Commission the power to determine by ordinance the minimum wage, terms of payment, working hours, conditions of apprenticeship "and the other working conditions deemed in conformity with the spirit of the act". Martland J. noted that the Commission had in fact adopted such an ordinance which, by its terms, applied to Bell Canada. He subsequently concluded that the power to regulate wages and working conditions, such as the wage scale of the undertaking, affects a vital part of the management and operation of the undertaking. What was held inapplicable to Bell Canada was thus not only the regulations imposing a levy of $50,000 which gave rise to the case, but also the ordinance enacted pursuant to s. 13, the regulatory power created by that section and the Minimum Wage Act as a whole.

308. Appellants and the Attorney General of Quebec argued in the case at bar that the re-assignment of a pregnant worker would not impair the undertaking, especially as the pregnant worker would eventually have to leave her work in any case, at least temporarily. I am quite prepared to admit that the exercise of this right by a pregnant worker would not go so far as to impair or paralyze the undertaking. However, given that it deprives the undertaking of part of its work force in the long distance communication sector requiring the aid of an operator, I would not be ready to concede that such a right of re-assignment does not by its very nature affect a vital or essential part of the Bell Canada undertaking.

310. I am therefore of the view that the test of impairment is insufficient and is not conclusive in cases where, without going so far as to impair or paralyze federal undertakings, such application affects a vital part of those undertakings.

[…]

314. The impairment test is not necessary in cases in which, without going so far as to impair the federal undertaking, the application of the provincial law affects a vital part of the undertaking. This appears to be the notion which Professor Hogg quite properly mentions at p. 329 of his text, subject to our disagreement on another point:

From the company cases a similar idea of immunity was carried over to cases concerning federally regulated undertakings.

315. Professor Hogg comments, in a footnote:

> The issue is not quite the same. The federal incorporation power does not authorize regulation of the activities of federally-incorporated companies, and therefore there can be no immunity from provincial laws regulating the activities of such companies. Undertakings (whether incorporated federally or provincially or outside Canada or even if unincorporated) operating in fields of federal legislative competence are, by definition, subject to federal regulation of their activities, and therefore some immunity from provincial laws purporting to regulate the activities of such undertakings is possible. I argue later that no immunity is necessary, but, if there is to be some immunity, one would expect it to be narrower for undertakings whose only "federal" characteristic is that they are federally-incorporated companies than for undertakings operating within fields of federal legislative competence.

316. In order for the inapplicability of provincial legislation rule to be given effect, it is sufficient that the provincial statute which purports to apply to the federal undertaking affects a vital or essential part of that undertaking, without necessarily going as far as impairing or paralyzing it. Moreover, appellants and the Attorney General of Quebec only put forward the impairment argument because they contend that the Act has no effect on working conditions and labour relations or on the management of Bell Canada. It is on this assumption that, according to a certain line of authority, they would have to show that the Act does not impair a federal undertaking. As I reject this assumption, I would ordinarily have nothing more to say on the point.

317. However, I think it is worth making certain clarifications regarding the concept of impairment. If the application of a provincial statute to a federal undertaking has the effect of impairing or paralyzing it, that a fortiori is an almost certain sign that such application bears upon the specifically federal nature of the undertaking and constitutes an encroachment on the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament. It is for this reason that it would appear to me to be useful to show how various provisions of the Act are in fact likely to impair the operations and functioning of federal undertakings, which is an additional reason for regarding it as inapplicable to those undertakings, regardless of any conflict between federal and provincial legislation.

330 Before passing on to the next heading and then to my conclusions, I must qualify the opinion I have expressed throughout these reasons, that the Act as a whole is inapplicable to federal undertakings. It is clear, for example, that the provisions creating the C.S.S.T. remain applicable for the purposes of administering other legislation, which may apply to federal undertakings. It is also possible that regulations adopted pursuant to other statutes, which under the transitional provisions of the Act are deemed to be adopted pursuant to the Act, continue to be applicable to federal undertakings. This was not raised in the written or oral arguments. I must also mention that there was no discussion of the severability of the Act in terms of applying it to federal undertakings. What I have said regarding the Act as a whole must therefore be limited to the provisions I have analysed in order to characterize and classify it, which were the only ones discussed by the parties.

Justice Beetz was well-known for taking a hard line in disputes over the division of powers and often ruled in favour of a clear division between federal and provincial powers. Indeed, by lowering the threshold for the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to where a law "affects" the operation of the affected undertaking, Bell had the effect of expanding the doctrine. For some, that expansion went too far. In Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, the Supreme Court of Canada seized the opportunity to limit the doctrine's application going forward. The decision, authored by Binnie and LeBel JJ, remains authoritative.

6.2 Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22

1 The framers of the Constitution Act, 1867 must have thought that the content of the federal power over "Banking, Incorporation of Banks, and the Issue of Paper Money" (s. 91(15)) was tolerably clear. Banking, according to one early authority, is more or less what "com[es] within the legitimate business of a banker" (Tennant v. Union Bank of Canada, [1894] A.C. 31 (P.C.), at p. 46). Bankers today are not limited in their activities to the activities their predecessors pursued in the nineteenth century. In recent years, they have persuaded Parliament to open the door to lines of business formerly closed to them, such as the promotion (though not underwriting) of certain lines of insurance. Indeed, more generally, there has been a blurring of the traditional "four pillars" of the Canadian financial services industry, which formerly were neatly divided into banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and security dealers, the first under federal regulation and the last three regulated by the provinces.

2 The question that arises on this appeal is the extent to which banks, as federally regulated financial institutions, must comply with provincial laws regulating the promotion and sale of insurance. Specifically, we are required to consider whether and to what extent the market conduct rules enacted for consumer protection in Alberta's Insurance Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. I-3, govern the promotion of credit-related insurance by banks as now permitted under the Bank Act, S.C. 1991, c. 46, as amended.

3 The appellant banks say that the provincial insurance regulations strike at the core of what banking is all about, namely enhancing the security of loan portfolios. As the appellants' counsel puts it, "the primary character of this insurance, tied as it is to the provision of loans by banks of their own loans, is security collateral for bank loans" (transcript, at p. 23) and such promotion therefore "lies at the core of what the bank does, lend money and take security" (transcript, at p. 11). Further, "the lending of money and the promotion of security are intimately tied together and together go to the core of banking" (transcript, at p. 13). The regulations cannot, the appellants say, be allowed to affect such a vital part of their banking undertaking. Alternatively, the appellants argue, the provincial regulations are in operational conflict with the Bank Act and its regulations, and the application of the provincial law would frustrate Parliament's purpose.

4 We agree with the conclusion of the courts in Alberta that the appellants' claim to interjurisdictional immunity should be rejected. The fact that Parliament allows a bank to enter into a provincially regulated line of business such as insurance cannot, by federal statute, unilaterally broaden the scope of the exclusive legislative power granted by the Constitution Act, 1867. When promoting insurance, the banks are participating in the business of insurance and only secondarily furthering the security of their loan portfolios, as the evidentiary record clearly established. This means, it is true, that banks will have to comply with both federal and provincial laws, but when federally regulated entities take part in provincially regulated activities there will inevitably result a measure of jurisdictional overlap. Nevertheless, the paramountcy doctrine is not engaged. Absent conflict with a valid federal law, valid provincial legislation will apply. Here there is no operational conflict. Compliance by the banks with provincial insurance laws will complement, not frustrate, the federal purpose. On both branches of the appellants' argument, the appeal should be dismissed.

II. Facts

5 Revisions to the Bank Act in 1991 permitted banks to engage in the promotion of certain types of insurance, an activity from which, historically, they had been excluded. The Canadian Bankers Association chronicled this evolution in a consumer information booklet entitled Your Guide to Financial Services: An overview of Canadian financial products and services (1999), as follows:

> Up until the mid-20th century, the bank's main function was to act as society's "financial intermediary," pooling the funds of savers through deposit-taking and making them available to borrowers. While their core services are still deposits and loans, banks have expanded to offer hundreds of different products and services to a diverse clientele. Offerings include basic savings and chequing accounts, RRSPs, money orders, foreign exchange, letters of credit, mortgages, financial planning, insurance products such as creditor life insurance and investment products. [Emphasis added; p. 5.]

6 Specifically, the Bank Act and its Insurance Business (Banks and Bank Holding Companies) Regulations, SOR/92-330 ("IBRs"), now authorize banks to promote at their branches eight kinds of insurance ("authorized insurance") as follows:

7 The evidence showed that a large percentage of the banks' customers purchase credit-related insurance. Therefore, even though the purchase is optional, the fact is that promotion of insurance as collateral may to some extent increase the security of the banks' overall loan portfolio. The trial judge considered this effect to be small. He found that banks generally insist on adequate collateral before the loan is made, and the decision to grant credit is not afterwards reconsidered if the borrower declines the offer of optional insurance. From the bank's perspective, its position is already fully protected. The availability of yet more collateral in the form of after-acquired insurance may therefore simply pile Mount Pelion on Olympus.

8 The trial judge noted that of these eight types of insurance "products" only mortgage insurance and export credit insurance actually insure against the risk of default in the payment of a loan. In contrast, credit-card related insurance and travel insurance, including personal accident insurance, have no significant connection to the amount of a loan owed to a bank and are payable irrespective of any default. While he recognized that insurance against the risk of a customer's disability or of loss of life or of employment enhances the safety of the bank's loan portfolio, the risk insured against is not default on the payment of the loan but the insured's disability or loss of life or of employment. The insurance, which is entirely optional for the borrower, is promoted on the basis of providing the borrower (not the bank) with peace of mind. The insurer will generally be required to pay the proceeds of the insurance directly to the bank in the event the risk materializes, even if the loan remains in good standing and there is no question about the insured's ability to pay. As the trial judge noted, "[r]emoving the necessity for the bank to pursue widows and orphans can undoubtedly improve the bank-customer relationship, although it is difficult to determine how big a factor this would be" ((2003), 343 A.R. 89, 2003 ABQB 795, at para. 41).

9 The trial judge added that the way in which banks promote insurance varies somewhat from product to product. Credit card and travel insurance coverage are generally sold as a feature of credit cards. Mortgage insurance is promoted in concert with the granting of mortgages (although it is mandatory under s. 418 of the Bank Act in the case of a high-ratio mortgage worth more than 75 percent of the value of the mortgaged residence). The insurance relating to a calamity in the life of a debtor (disability, unemployment and death) is sometimes promoted at the time the loan is taken out but is also promoted quite independently by direct mail or through telemarketers. If the borrower answers certain health questions in the negative, the insurance is automatically approved through a group policy.

10 In 2000, Alberta enacted changes to its Insurance Act purporting to make federally chartered banks subject to the provincial licensing scheme governing the promotion of insurance products. Under s. 454, a bank wanting to promote insurance must obtain a "restricted insurance agent's certificate of authority". The banks thereby became subject to market standards regulation including, for example, s. 486 that requires training procedures to be in place, s. 500 that targets misrepresentations about the levels of premiums, and ss. 480 and 764 that provide sanctions for non-compliance and improper market conduct. In addition, the statute empowers the provincial Minister of Finance to make regulations respecting the ethical, operational and trade practices of agents. It is consumer protection legislation.

11 Upon the coming into force of the Insurance Act, the appellant banks sought a declaration that their promotion of insurance is "banking" under s. 91(15) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and that the Insurance Act and its associated regulations are constitutionally inapplicable and/or inoperative to the banks' promotion of insurance.

1. Are Alberta's Insurance Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. I-3, and the regulations made thereunder, in whole or in part, constitutionally inapplicable to the promotion by banks of an "authorized type of insurance" or "personal accident insurance" as defined in the Insurance Business (Banks and Bank Holding Companies) Regulations, SOR/92-330, by reason of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity?

20 In the present appeal, we are not confronted with a dispute between the federal government and Alberta. Rather, the appellant banks are independently making the claim to carry on their insurance activities in Alberta free of the insurance regulations imposed on all other promoters and vendors of insurance products in the province. The banks assert that as federal undertakings they are "immune" from provincial insurance regulation aimed generally at fair market practices and consumer protection in the province. At the same time, the appellants acknowledge that for 125 years the regulation of insurance has been held generally to be a matter of "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" within provincial jurisdiction under s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867; see Citizens Insurance Co. of Canada v. Parsons (1881), 1880 CanLII 6 (SCC), 7 App. Cas. 96 (P.C.); Canadian Indemnity Co. v. Attorney-General of British Columbia, 1976 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1977] 2 SCR 504; and Canadian Pioneer Management Ltd. v. Labour Relations Board of Saskatchewan, 1979 CanLII 180 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 433. The appellants' argument is that when banks promote credit-related insurance, they are carrying on the business of banking, not the business of insurance. As the Attorney General of Canada put it in oral argument, the issue is "whether the authorized creditor insurance products are themselves so vital and essential to lending that they join lending at the core of banking" (transcript, at p. 34). On that issue, as stated, the Alberta courts flatly rejected the banks' position. We agree.

B. Principle of Federalism

21 The disposition of this case requires the consideration and application of important constitutional doctrines governing the operation of Canadian federalism. Despite the doubts sometimes expressed about the nature of Canadian federalism, it is beyond question that federalism has been a "fundamental guiding principle" of our constitutional order since the time of Confederation, as our Court emphasized in the Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 55.

22 As the Court noted in that decision, federalism was the legal response of the framers of the Constitution to the political and cultural realities that existed at Confederation. It thus represented a legal recognition of the diversity of the original members. The division of powers, one of the basic components of federalism, was designed to uphold this diversity within a single nation. Broad powers were conferred on provincial legislatures, while at the same time Canada's unity was ensured by reserving to Parliament powers better exercised in relation to the country as a whole. Each head of power was assigned to the level of government best placed to exercise the power. The fundamental objectives of federalism were, and still are, to reconcile unity with diversity, promote democratic participation by reserving meaningful powers to the local or regional level and to foster co-operation among governments and legislatures for the common good.

23 To attain these objectives, a certain degree of predictability with regard to the division of powers between Parliament and the provincial legislatures is essential. For this reason, the powers of each of these levels of government were enumerated in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 or provided for elsewhere in that Act. As is true of any other part of our Constitution — this "living tree" as it is described in the famous image from Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136 — the interpretation of these powers and of how they interrelate must evolve and must be tailored to the changing political and cultural realities of Canadian society. It is also important to note that the fundamental principles of our constitutional order, which include federalism, continue to guide the definition and application of the powers as well as their interplay. Thus, the very functioning of Canada's federal system must continually be reassessed in light of the fundamental values it was designed to serve.

24 As the final arbiters of the division of powers, the courts have developed certain constitutional doctrines, which, like the interpretations of the powers to which they apply, are based on the guiding principles of our constitutional order. The constitutional doctrines permit an appropriate balance to be struck in the recognition and management of the inevitable overlaps in rules made at the two levels of legislative power, while recognizing the need to preserve sufficient predictability in the operation of the division of powers. The doctrines must also be designed to reconcile the legitimate diversity of regional experimentation with the need for national unity. Finally, they must include a recognition that the task of maintaining the balance of powers in practice falls primarily to governments, and constitutional doctrine must facilitate, not undermine what this Court has called "co-operative federalism" (Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 453, at para. 162; Reference re Employment Insurance Act (Can.), ss. 22 and 23, [2005] 2 SCR 669, 2005 SCC 56, at para. 10). We will now turn to the issue of how, in our view, the main constitutional doctrines and the interplay between them should be construed so as to facilitate the achievement of the objectives of Canada's federal structure.

Constitutional Doctrines and How They Interrelate

31 When problems resulting from incidental effects arise, it may often be possible to resolve them by a firm application of the pith and substance analysis. The scale of the alleged incidental effects may indeed put a law in a different light so as to place it in another constitutional head of power. The usual interpretation techniques of constitutional interpretation, such as reading down, may then play a useful role in determining on a case-by-case basis what falls exclusively to a given level of government. In this manner, the courts incrementally define the scope of the relevant heads of power. The flexible nature of the pith and substance analysis makes it perfectly suited to the modern views of federalism in our constitutional jurisprudence.

32 That being said, it must also be acknowledged that, in certain circumstances, the powers of one level of government must be protected against intrusions, even incidental ones, by the other level. For this purpose, the courts have developed two doctrines. The first, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, recognizes that our Constitution is based on an allocation of exclusive powers to both levels of government, not concurrent powers, although these powers are bound to interact in the realities of the life of our Constitution. The second, the doctrine of federal paramountcy, recognizes that where laws of the federal and provincial levels come into conflict, there must be a rule to resolve the impasse. Under our system, the federal law prevails. We will now discuss these doctrines, beginning with interjurisdictional immunity.

(2) The Doctrine of Interjurisdictional Immunity and its Sources

33 Interjurisdictional immunity is a doctrine of limited application, but its existence is supported both textually and by the principles of federalism. The leading modern formulation of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is found in the judgment of this Court in Bell Canada (1988) where Beetz J. wrote that "classes of subject" in ss. 91 and 92 must be assured a "basic, minimum and unassailable content" (p. 839) immune from the application of legislation enacted by the other level of government. Immunity from such intrusion, Beetz J. observed in the context of a federal undertaking, is an integral and vital part of [Parliament's] primary legislative authority over federal undertakings. If this power is exclusive, it is because the Constitution, which could have been different but is not, expressly specifies this to be the case; and it is because this power is exclusive that it pre-empts that of the legislatures both as to their legislation of general and specific application, in so far as such laws affect a vital part of a federal undertaking. [p. 840]

34 The doctrine is rooted in references to "exclusivity" throughout ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. The opening paragraph of s. 91 refers to the "exclusive [l]egislative [a]uthority of the Parliament of Canada" in relation to matters coming within the listed "[c]lasses of [s]ubjects" including "Banking, Incorporation of Banks, and the Issue of Paper Money" (s. 91(15)). If that authority is truly exclusive, the reasoning goes, it cannot be invaded by provincial legislation even if the federal power remains unexercised. "The abstinence of the Dominion Parliament from legislating to the full limit of its powers, could not have the effect of transferring to any provincial legislature the legislative power which had been assigned to the Dominion by s. 91 of the [Constitution Act, 1867]": Union Colliery Co. of British Columbia v. Bryden, [1899] A.C. 580 (P.C.), at p. 588. Equally, s. 92 (headed "Exclusive Powers of Provincial Legislatures") is introduced by the words "In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next herein-after enumerated", including "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" (s. 92(13)) and "Generally all Matters of a merely local or private Nature in the Province" (s. 92(16)). The notion of exclusivity and the reciprocal notion of non-encroachment by one level of legislature on the field of exclusive competence of the other gave rise to Lord Atkin's famous "watertight compartments" metaphor, where he wrote of Canadian federalism that "[w]hile the ship of state now sails on larger ventures and into foreign waters she still retains the watertight compartments which are an essential part of her original structure" (Attorney-General for Canada v. Attorney-General for Ontario, 1937 CanLII 362 (UK JCPC), [1937] A.C. 326 (P.C.), at p. 354). Its modern application expresses a continuing concern about risk of erosion of provincial as well as federal competences (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 766). At the same time, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity seeks to avoid, when possible, situations of concurrency of powers (Laskin C.J., in Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare, 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751, at p. 764).

(3) The Dominant Tide of Constitutional Interpretation Does Not Favour Interjurisdictional Immunity

35 Despite the efforts to find a proper role for the doctrine, the application of interjurisdictional immunity has given rise to concerns by reason of its potential impact on Canadian constitutional arrangements. In theory, the doctrine is reciprocal: it applies both to protect provincial heads of power and provincially regulated undertakings from federal encroachment, and to protect federal heads of power and federally regulated undertakings from provincial encroachment. However, it would appear that the jurisprudential application of the doctrine has produced somewhat "asymmetrical" results. Its application to federal laws in order to avoid encroachment on provincial legislative authority has often consisted of "reading down" the federal enactment or federal power without too much doctrinal discussion, e.g., Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 307, Dominion Stores Ltd. v. The Queen, 1979 CanLII 57 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 844, and Labatt Breweries of Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada, 1979 CanLII 190 (SCC), [1980] 1 SCR 914. In general, though, the doctrine has been invoked in favour of federal immunity at the expense of provincial legislation: Hogg, at p. 15-34.

36 A view of federalism that puts greater emphasis on the legitimate interplay between federal and provincial powers was championed by the late Chief Justice Dickson, who described the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity as "not . . . particularly compelling" (OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 17):

> The history of Canadian constitutional law has been to allow for a fair amount of interplay and indeed overlap between federal and provincial powers. It is true that doctrines like interjurisdictional and Crown immunity and concepts like "watertight compartments" qualify the extent of that interplay. But it must be recognized that these doctrines and concepts have not been the dominant tide of constitutional doctrines; rather they have been an undertow against the strong pull of pith and substance, the aspect doctrine and, in recent years, a very restrained approach to concurrency and paramountcy issues. [p. 18]

This statement was reproduced in Dickson C.J.'s judgment (for a unanimous bench that included Beetz J.) in General Motors, at p. 669.

37 The "dominant tide" finds its principled underpinning in the concern that a court should favour, where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government. In the absence of conflicting enactments of the other level of government, the Court should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest. Professor Paul Weiler wrote over 30 years ago that > the court should refuse to try to protect alleged, but as yet unoccupied, enclaves of governmental power against the intrusions of another representative legislature which has ventured into the area. Instead, the court should try to restrict itself to the lesser but still important role of interpreting statutes of different jurisdictions in the same area, in order to avoid conflict, and applying a doctrine of paramountcy in the few situations which are left.

("The Supreme Court and the Law of Canadian Federalism" (1973), 23 U.T.L.J. 307, at p. 308)

38 In our view, the sweeping immunity argued for by the banks in this appeal is not acceptable in the Canadian federal structure. The argument exposes the dangers of allowing the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to exceed its proper (and very restricted) limit and to frustrate the application of the pith and substance analysis and of the double aspect doctrine. The latter have the ability to resolve most problems relating to the validity of the exercise of legislative powers under the heads of power applicable to the activities in question.

39 It is not without interest that the present doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, which is the result of a long process of constitutional evolution, was originally developed in a very special context, namely to protect federally incorporated companies from provincial legislation affecting the essence of the powers conferred on them as a result of their incorporation (John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, 1914 CanLII 603 (UK JCPC), [1915] A.C. 330 (P.C.); Great West Saddlery Co. v. The King, 1921 CanLII 408 (UK JCPC), [1921] 2 A.C. 91 (P.C.)). Since the creation of corporations by letters patent issued by the Crown constituted an exercise of the Crown's prerogative to create corporations, it would have seemed natural to the Privy Council to extend the Crown's immunity to the entities it incorporated. Thus, to apply a province's general statutes to these corporations could be conceived as interfering with the exercise of the prerogative of incorporation.

40 The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity was subsequently applied to protect "essential" parts of federal "undertakings" (Attorney-General for Ontario v. Winner, 1954 CanLII 289 (UK JCPC), [1954] 4 D.L.R. 657 (P.C.); see also Toronto Corporation v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, [1905] A.C. 52 (P.C.) ("Toronto Corporation")). Still later, the courts resorted to interjurisdictional immunity to shield Aboriginal peoples and their lands from provincial legislation of general application affecting certain aspects of their special status (Natural Parents; Derrickson v. Derrickson, 1986 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 285).

41 Thus, broadly speaking, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity was used to protect that which makes certain works or undertakings, things (e.g., Aboriginal lands) or persons (e.g., Aboriginal peoples and corporations created by the federal Crown) specifically of federal jurisdiction. As Gonthier J. observed in Commission de transport de la Communauté urbaine de Québec v. Canada (National Battlefields Commission), 1990 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 838:

> The immunity pertaining to federal status applies to things or persons falling within federal jurisdiction, some specifically federal aspects of which would be affected by provincial legislation. This is so because these specifically federal aspects are an integral part of federal jurisdiction over such things or persons and this jurisdiction is meant to be exclusive. [Emphasis added; p. 853.]

Of course, what is of specific federal interest may well be the federally regulated activity itself rather than the identity of the participants. In Natural Parents, at p. 760, Laskin C.J. observed:

> It cannot be said therefore that because a provincial statute is general in its operation, in the sense that its terms are not expressly restricted to matters within provincial competence, it may embrace matters within exclusive federal competence. ... This is because to construe the provincial legislation to embrace such activities would have it encroaching on an exclusive federal legislative area. [Emphasis added.]

(Cited with approval by Beetz J. in Bell Canada (1988), at p. 834.)

In Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437, in the course of considering federal jurisdiction over maritime law, the Court acknowledged that the doctrine could potentially apply to all "activities" within Parliament's jurisdiction. See also McKay v. The Queen, 1965 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1965] SCR 798, where the issue was the applicability of a municipal sign law to a federal activity, namely a federal election; OPSEU, per Beetz J., at p. 30; and Scowby v. Glendinning, 1986 CanLII 30 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 226, per La Forest J., at p. 257.

42 While the text and logic of our federal structure justifies the application of interjurisdictional immunity to certain federal "activities", nevertheless, a broad application of the doctrine to "activities" creates practical problems of application much greater than in the case of works or undertakings, things or persons, whose limits are more readily defined. A broad application also appears inconsistent, as stated, with the flexible federalism that the constitutional doctrines of pith and substance, double aspect and federal paramountcy are designed to promote. See

F. Gélinas, "La doctrine des immunités interjuridictionnelles dans le partage des compétences: éléments de systématisation", in Mélanges Jean Beetz (1995), at p. 471, and Hogg, at para. 15.8(c). It is these doctrines that have proved to be most consistent with contemporary views of Canadian federalism, which recognize that overlapping powers are unavoidable. Canadian federalism is not simply a matter of legalisms. The Constitution, though a legal document, serves as a framework for life and for political action within a federal state, in which the courts have rightly observed the importance of co-operation among government actors to ensure that federalism operates flexibly.

43 Excessive reliance on the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity would create serious uncertainty. It is based on the attribution to every legislative head of power of a "core" of indeterminate scope — difficult to define, except over time by means of judicial interpretations triggered serendipitously on a case-by-case basis. The requirement to develop an abstract definition of a "core" is not compatible, generally speaking, with the tradition of Canadian constitutional interpretation, which favours an incremental approach. While it is true that the enumerations of ss. 91 and 92 contain a number of powers that are precise and not really open to discussion, other powers are far less precise, such as those relating to the criminal law, trade and commerce and matters of a local or private nature in a province. Since the time of Confederation, courts have refrained from trying to define the possible scope of such powers in advance and for all time: Citizens Insurance, at p. 109; John Deere Plow, at p. 339. For example, while the courts have not eviscerated the federal trade and commerce power, they have, in interpreting it, sought to avoid draining of their content the provincial powers over civil law and matters of a local or private nature. A generalized application of interjurisdictional immunity related to "trade and commerce" would have led to an altogether different and more rigid and centralized form of federalism. It was by proceeding with caution on a case-by-case basis that the courts were gradually able to define the content of the heads of power of Parliament and the legislatures, without denying the unavoidable interplay between them, always having regard to the evolution of the problems for which the division of legislative powers must now provide solutions.

44 Moreover, as stated, interjurisdictional immunity means that despite the absence of law enacted at one level of government, the laws enacted by the other level cannot have even incidental effects on the so-called "core" of jurisdiction. This increases the risk of creating "legal vacuums", as this Court recognized in Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, [2001] 3 SCR 113, 2001 SCC 67, at para. 52. Generally speaking, such "vacuums" are not desirable.

45 Further, a broad use of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity runs the risk of creating an unintentional centralizing tendency in constitutional interpretation. As stated, this doctrine has in the past most often protected federal heads of power from incidental intrusion by provincial legislatures. The "asymmetrical" application of interjurisdictional immunity is incompatible with the flexibility and co-ordination required by contemporary Canadian federalism. Commentators have noted that an extensive application of this doctrine to protect federal heads of power and undertakings is both unnecessary and "undesirable in a federation where so many laws for the protection of workers, consumers and the environment (for example) are enacted and enforced at the provincial level" (Hogg, at p. 15-30; see also Weiler, at p. 312; J. Leclair, "The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity" (2003), 28 Queen's L.J. 411). The asymmetrical effect of interjurisdictional immunity can also be seen as undermining the principles of subsidiarity, i.e. that decisions "are often best [made] at a level of government that is not only effective, but also closest to the citizens affected" (114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 SCR 241, 2001 SCC 40, at para. 3).

46 Finally, the doctrine would seem as a general rule to be superfluous in that Parliament can always, if it sees fit to do so, make its legislation sufficiently precise to leave those subject to it with no doubt as to the residual or incidental application of provincial legislation. As we shall see, sufficient confirmation of this can be found in the history and operation of the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

47 For all these reasons, although the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has a proper part to play in appropriate circumstances, we intend now to make it clear that the Court does not favour an intensive reliance on the doctrine, nor should we accept the invitation of the appellants to turn it into a doctrine of first recourse in a division of powers dispute.

D. A More Restricted Approach to Interjurisdictional Immunity

(1) Impairment Versus Affects

48 Even in situations where the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is properly available, we must consider the level of the intrusion on the "core" of the power of the other level of government which would trigger its application. In Bell Canada (1988), Beetz J. wrote, at pp. 859-60:

In order for the inapplicability of provincial legislation rule to be given effect, it is sufficient that the provincial statute which purports to apply to the federal undertaking affects a vital or essential part of that undertaking, without necessarily going as far as impairing or paralyzing it. [Emphasis added.]

Our colleague Bastarache J. agrees with the substitution in Bell Canada (1988) of "affects" for "impairs". He writes:

... the meaning of the word "affects" should be interpreted as a kind of middle ground between the perhaps overly vague or broad standard of "touches on" and the older and overly restrictive standard of "sterilizes" or "impairs". Without requiring complete paralysis of the core of the federal power or the operations of the undertaking, the impact of the application of the by-law must be sufficiently severe and serious to trigger immunity.

(British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., [2007] 2 SCR 86, 2007 SCC 23, at para. 139)

With great respect, we cannot agree. We believe that the law as it stood prior to Bell Canada (1988) better reflected our federal scheme. In our opinion, it is not enough for the provincial legislation simply to "affect" that which makes a federal subject or object of rights specifically of federal jurisdiction. The difference between "affects" and "impairs" is that the former does not imply any adverse consequence whereas the latter does. The shift in Bell Canada (1988) from "impairs" to "affects" is not consistent with the view subsequently adopted in Mangat that "[t]he existence of a double aspect to the subject matter . . . favours the application of the paramountcy doctrine rather than the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity" (para. 52). Nor is the shift consistent with the earlier application by Beetz J. himself of the "impairment" test in Dick v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309, at pp. 323-24. It is when the adverse impact of a law adopted by one level of government increases in severity from "affecting" to "impairing" (without necessarily "sterilizing" or "paralyzing") that the "core" competence of the other level of government (or the vital or essential part of an undertaking it duly constitutes) is placed in jeopardy, and not before.

49 In Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, Dickson C.J. and Lamer and Wilson JJ. observed in passing that a distinction could be drawn between the direct application of provincial law (where the operative verb is "affects") and the indirect application (where the operative verb may still be "impairs") (p. 957). This further exercise in line drawing signalled a measure of dissatisfaction with the "affects" test without doing anything about it. At this point, we should complete the reassessment begun in Irwin Toy and hold that, in the absence of impairment, interjurisdictional immunity does not apply.

(2) Identification of the "Basic, Minimum and Unassailable" Content of a Legislative Power

50 One of the important contributions of Bell Canada (1988) was to limit the scope of the doctrine to the "basic, minimum and unassailable content" (p. 839) sometimes referred to as the "core" of the legislative power in question. (By "minimum", we understand that Beetz J. meant the minimum content necessary to make the power effective for the purpose for which it was conferred.) This is necessary, according to Beetz J., to give effect to what he called "the principle of federalism underlying the Canadian Constitution" (p. 766). Thus, the success of the appellants' argument in this appeal depended in part on locating the promotion of "peace of mind" insurance at the core of banking. For the reasons already discussed, and particularized below, we do not believe that this aspect of the appellants' argument can be sustained.

(3) The Vital or Essential Part of an Undertaking

51 In the exercise of their legislative powers, federal and provincial legislators bring into existence "undertakings". The appellant banks are "federal undertakings" constituted pursuant to the s. 91(15) banking power. In Bell Canada (1988), Beetz J. spoke of interjurisdictional immunity in relation to "essential and vital elements" of such undertakings (pp. 839 and 859-60). In our view, some text writers and certainly the appellants have been inclined to give too wide a scope to what should be considered "vital or essential" to a federal undertaking. We believe that Beetz J. chose his words carefully and intended to use "vital" in its ordinary grammatical sense of "[e]ssential to the existence of something; absolutely indispensable or necessary; extremely important, crucial" (Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (5th ed. 2002), vol. 2, at p. 3548). The word "essential" has a similar meaning, e.g. "[a]bsolutely indispensable or necessary" (vol. 1, at p. 860). The words "vital" and "essential" were not randomly chosen. The expression "vital part" was used as a limitation on the scope of interjurisdictional immunity by Abbott J. in Reference re Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, 1955 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1955] SCR 529, at p. 592, and by Martland J. in Commission du salaire minimum v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, 1966 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1966] SCR 767 ("Bell Canada (1966)"), at p. 774. Martland J. also referred to an "essential part of the operation of such an undertaking", at p. 777. What is "vital" or "essential" is, by definition, not co-extensive with every element of an undertaking incorporated federally or subject to federal regulation. In the case of federal undertakings, Beetz J. referred to a "general rule" that there is no interjurisdictional immunity, provided that "the application of [the] provincial laws does not bear upon those [federal] subjects in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction" (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 762 (emphasis added)). In the present appeal, for example, the appellants' argument inflates out of all proportion what could reasonably be considered "vital or essential" to their banking undertaking. The promotion of "peace of mind" insurance can hardly be considered "absolutely indispensable or necessary" to banking activities unless such words are to be emptied of their ordinary meaning.

52 In this respect, following the sage common law adage that it is wise to look at what the courts do as distinguished from what they say, a useful approach to understanding the limited scope of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in respect of undertakings is to see how it has been applied to the facts. A comparison between Bell Canada (1988) and the present case is instructive. In Bell Canada (1988), the Court concluded that the application of a provincial Act respecting occupational health and safety could not apply to a federal telephone undertaking because such application would "enter directly and massively into the field of working conditions and labour relations . . . and . . . management and operation" of the federal utility (p. 798). Amongst other things, the provincial Act would impose "a system of partial co-management of the undertaking by the workers and the employer" (p. 810), thereby regulating the federal undertaking in a manner not sanctioned by Parliament. To the same effect is Canadian National Railway Co. v. Courtois, 1988 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 868, released concurrently with Bell Canada (1988), where the same provincial Act was declared inapplicable to a federally regulated railway (p. 890). In the third case of the 1988 trilogy, Alltrans Express Ltd. v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board), 1988 CanLII 83 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 897, the Court held that the preventative (as distinguished from compensatory) aspects of the B.C. provincial Workers Compensation Act could not apply to an interprovincial and international trucking undertaking because to do so would intrude on the management of the federally regulated undertaking, including the "B.C. Board's power to order an employer to close down all or part of the place of employment to prevent injuries" (p. 911). These cases may usefully be contrasted with Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Corporation of the Parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, [1899] A.C. 367 (P.C.), where it was held not to be vital or essential for the federal government to regulate the clearance of trash and debris from the ditch on the south side of the railway undertaking's roadbed. (See also Ontario v. Canadian Pacific Ltd., 1995 CanLII 111 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 1028.) Yet it seems that clearing debris from the roadbed is at least as essential to the operations of a rail service as is selling optional "peace of mind" insurance to bank borrowers.

53 Nor do the other authorities relied on by the appellants, in our view, justify their expansive view of the elements that are vital and essential to their banking operations. It is simply not credible, in our view, to suggest that the promotion of "peace of mind" insurance is "absolutely indispensable or necessary" to enable the banks to carry out their undertakings in what makes them specifically of federal jurisdiction.

67 In our view, the above review of the case law cited by the appellants, the respondent and interveners shows that not only should the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity be applied with restraint, but with rare exceptions it has been so applied. Although the doctrine is in principle applicable to all federal and provincial heads of legislative authority, the case law demonstrates that its natural area of operation is in relation to those heads of legislative authority that confer on Parliament power over enumerated federal things, people, works or undertakings. In most cases, a pith and substance analysis and the application of the doctrine of paramountcy have resolved difficulties in a satisfactory manner.

G. Order of Application of the Constitutional Doctrines

76 The above review of constitutional doctrines inevitably raises questions about the logical order in which they should be applied. It would be difficult to avoid beginning with the "pith and substance" analysis, which serves to determine whether the legislation in question is in fact valid. The other two doctrines serve merely to determine whether a valid law is applicable or operative in specific circumstances.

77 Although our colleague Bastarache J. takes a different view on this point, we do not think it appropriate to always begin by considering the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. To do so could mire the Court in a rather abstract discussion of "cores" and "vital and essential" parts to little practical effect. As we have already noted, interjurisdictional immunity is of limited application and should in general be reserved for situations already covered by precedent. This means, in practice, that it will be largely reserved for those heads of power that deal with federal things, persons or undertakings, or where in the past its application has been considered absolutely indispensable or necessary to enable Parliament or a provincial legislature to achieve the purpose for which exclusive legislative jurisdiction was conferred, as discerned from the constitutional division of powers as a whole, or what is absolutely indispensable or necessary to enable an undertaking to carry out its mandate in what makes it specifically of federal (or provincial) jurisdiction. If a case can be resolved by the application of a pith and substance analysis, and federal paramountcy where necessary, it would be preferable to take that approach, as this Court did in Mangat.

78 In the result, while in theory a consideration of interjurisdictional immunity is apt for consideration after the pith and substance analysis, in practice the absence of prior case law favouring its application to the subject matter at hand will generally justify a court proceeding directly to the consideration of federal paramountcy.

Following Canadian Western Bank, interjurisdictional immunity has become a doctrine of last resort, except in situations where the case law has already applied it in the same situation, or to the same activity or undertaking.

Where the doctrine is applicable, Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39 sets out the framework for its application.

6.3 Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39

I. Introduction

[1] Air transportation is an indispensable part of modern life. Yet as our dependence on aircraft has grown, the demands of aviation have increasingly collided with other interests. Aircraft must take off and land. For this they need soil or water. The soil or water they use is not available for other purposes. The question posed in this and the companion appeal, Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 SCR 453, is which level of government has the final say on where airfields and aerodromes may be located.

[2] The federal government has jurisdiction over matters relating to air travel under its general power "to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada": s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, also known as the "POGG" power. In these appeals, the province of Quebec argues that notwithstanding this settled proposition, provincial legislation governing the placement of airfields and aerodromes should prevail. In essence, this dispute pits the local interest in land use planning against the national interest in a unified system of aeronautical navigation.

[3] The case concerns an aerodrome that was built by two private citizens on land zoned as agricultural and was registered under the federal Aeronautics Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-2. The Province says this violates its law and the aerodrome must be removed. The Canadian Owners and Pilots Association ("COPA") and the Attorney General of Canada argue that the Province should not be able to shut down the aerodrome, for a variety of reasons. First, they say that the provincial legislation, insofar as it affects the location of aerodromes, is ultra vires, and hence invalid. Second, they say that the location of aeronautical facilities lies at the protected core of the federal aeronautics power, which the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity protects from any adverse provincial effect. Third, they say that, in any event, if the provincial legislation were valid and applicable, it would be inoperative under the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

[4] Like the Quebec Court of Appeal, I conclude that the provincial legislation limiting non-agricultural land uses in designated agricultural regions is valid. However, I find that the provincial law impairs the protected core of the federal jurisdiction over aeronautics, and is inapplicable to the extent that it prohibits aerodromes in agricultural zones. My conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider federal paramountcy, but in any event, I find that this doctrine has no application on the facts of this case. Consequently, I would dismiss the appeal on the basis of interjurisdictional immunity.

B. Interjurisdictional Immunity

[25] The next question is whether s. 26 of the Act, having been found valid, applies in a situation where it impacts on the federal power over aeronautics. The Attorney General of Canada and COPA argue that it does not. They rely on the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, which they submit protects core federal competences from impairment by provincial legislation.

[26] Interjurisdictional immunity was initially developed in the context of federal undertakings (Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Corporation of the Parish of Notre Dame de Bonsecours, [1899] A.C. 367 (P.C.)) and federally incorporated companies (see John Deere Plow Co. v. Wharton, 1914 CanLII 603 (UK JCPC), [1915] A.C. 330 (P.C.); Great West Saddlery Co. v. The King, 1921 CanLII 408 (UK JCPC), [1921] 2 A.C. 91 (P.C.); Attorney-General for Manitoba v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1928 CanLII 513 (UK JCPC), [1929] A.C. 260 (P.C.)). However, the doctrine was then applied more widely, and was understood to protect a certain minimum content of every federal head of power: Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749, at p. 839; OPSEU v. Ontario (Attorney General), 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2, at p. 18, per Dickson C.J.; Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437. Following Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, the prevailing view is that the application of interjurisdictional immunity is generally limited to the cores of every legislative head of power already identified in the jurisprudence (paras. 43 and 77).

[27] The first step is to determine whether the provincial law — s. 26 of the Act — trenches on the protected "core" of a federal competence. If it does, the second step is to determine whether the provincial law's effect on the exercise of the protected federal power is sufficiently serious to invoke the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

(1) Does Section 26 of the Provincial Act Trench on the Protected Core of a Federal Competence?

[28] The jurisprudence establishes that Parliament has power over aeronautics. Because commercial aviation was not foreseen in 1867, aviation is not articulated as a head of power under s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867. However, it has been held to be a matter of national importance and hence supported under the federal POGG power.

[29] The matter was settled in 1951 in Johannesson v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul, 1951 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1952] 1 SCR 292. In five separate opinions, the Supreme Court of Canada unanimously held that Parliament has exclusive jurisdiction to regulate the field of aviation, confirming earlier dicta that aerial navigation is a matter of national interest and importance: In re Regulation and Control of Aeronautics in Canada, 1931 CanLII 466 (UK JCPC), [1932] A.C. 54 (P.C.).

[30] Johannesson established that Parliament not only has power over aeronautics, but has exclusive jurisdiction to determine the location of aerodromes. As Estey J. explained, "the aerodrome, as the place of taking off and landing, [is] an essential part of aeronautics and aerial navigation" (p. 319).

[31] This proposition was most recently affirmed in Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), 1997 CanLII 361 (SCC), [1997] 2 SCR 581, at para. 72, per Iacobucci J.: the federal aeronautics jurisdiction "encompasses not only the regulation of the operation of aircraft, but also the regulation of the operation of airports". Elaborating, Iacobucci J. held that this aspect of federal jurisdiction extends to the location and design of airports. See also Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, 1978 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1979] 1 SCR 754, at pp. 770-71.

[32] The Attorney General of British Columbia, intervener, conceded that airports come under the POGG power because of their national dimension, but argued that local aerodromes are excluded from POGG because they are not themselves matters of national importance. In support, he noted that the Aeronautics Act distinguishes between aerodromes and airports, and argued that most interprovincial and international flights pass through airports, rather than aerodromes.

[33] This argument cannot prevail. As Kellock J. noted in Johannesson, the local aspects of aviation come under federal jurisdiction because the subject matter of aerial navigation is "non-severable". Using the term "airport" interchangeably with "aerodrome", he held that "just as it is impossible to separate intra-provincial flying from inter-provincial flying, the location and regulation of airports cannot be identified with either or separated from aerial navigation as a whole" (p. 314). This view reflects the reality that Canada's airports and aerodromes constitute a network of landing places that together facilitate air transportation and ensure safety.

[34] It is thus clear that the federal jurisdiction over aeronautics encompasses the power to determine the location of aerodromes. The next question is whether this power lies at the protected core of the federal power.

[35] The test is whether the subject comes within the essential jurisdiction — the "basic, minimum and unassailable content" — of the legislative power in question: Bell Canada, at p. 839; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 50. The core of a federal power is the authority that is absolutely necessary to enable Parliament "to achieve the purpose for which exclusive legislative jurisdiction was conferred": Canadian Western Bank, at para. 77.

[36] In Canadian Western Bank, Binnie and LeBel JJ. explained that the jurisprudence will frequently serve as a useful guide to identify the core of a federal head of power, and they concluded that interjurisdictional immunity should "in general be reserved for situations already covered by precedent" (para. 77).

[37] Here precedent is available and resolves the issue. This Court has repeatedly and consistently held that the location of aerodromes lies within the core of the federal aeronautics power. In Johannesson, which concerned a municipal by-law that prevented the plaintiff from constructing an aerodrome on the outskirts of Winnipeg, the Court held that the location of aerodromes is an essential and indivisible part of aeronautics. As noted above, Estey J. held that aerodromes are "an essential part of aeronautics and aerial navigation" (p. 319). The location of aerodromes attracts the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity because it is essential to the federal power, and hence falls within its core: see Canadian Western Bank, at para. 54; Construction Montcalm, at pp. 770-71; Air Canada, at para. 72; Greater Toronto Airports Authority v. Mississauga (City) (2000), 2000 CanLII 16948 (ON CA), 50 O.R. (3d) 641 (Ont. C.A.); Comox Strathcona (Regional District) v. Hansen, 2005 BCSC 220, [2005] 7 W.W.R. 249; Venchiarutti v. Longhurst (1989), 1989 CanLII 4293 (ON SC), 69 O.R. (2d) 19 (H.C.J.), aff'd (1992), 1992 CanLII 8680 (ON CA), 8 O.R. (3d) 422 (C.A.).

[38] Again in Construction Montcalm this Court held that while some provincial laws will be applicable to airports because they do not impair an essential part of a federal competence, the location of an airport comes within Parliament's core of exclusive federal jurisdiction: "To decide whether to build an airport and where to build it involves aspects of airport construction which undoubtedly constitute matters of exclusive federal concern" (p. 770 (emphasis added)).

[39] The Province sought to undermine the strength of these precedents on the basis that lower courts have declined to follow Johannesson on two occasions: Re The Queen in Right of British Columbia and Van Gool (1987), 1987 CanLII 2756 (BC CA), 36 D.L.R. (4th) 481 (B.C.C.A.); St-Louis. This Court's decision in OPSEU constructively overruled Van Gool: see Hansen, at paras. 21-23. As for St-Louis, I agree with the Quebec Court of Appeal in the companion case of Lacombe v. Sacré-Cœur (Municipalité de), 2008 QCCA 426, [2008] R.J.Q. 598, that it must be rejected because it wrongly held that incidental effects cannot trigger the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity: see Bell Canada, at p. 842, per Beetz J.

[40] I conclude that the location of aerodromes lies at the core of the federal aeronautics power. Long-standing precedent establishes that where aircraft may take off and land is a matter protected by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Since s. 26 of the ARPALAA purports to limit where aerodromes can be located, it follows that it trenches on the core of the federal aeronautics power.

[41] The remaining question is whether the impact of s. 26 on the federal power is sufficiently serious to attract the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

(2) Does Section 26 of the Act Unacceptably Interfere With a Federal Competency?

[42] It is not enough that s. 26 of the ARPALAA strike at the heart of a federal competency; it must be shown that this interference is constitutionally unacceptable. This raises the issue of how serious an interference must be to render a provincial law inapplicable.

[43] After a period of inconsistency, it is now settled that the test is whether the provincial law impairs the federal exercise of the core competence: Canadian Western Bank, per Binnie and LeBel JJ. This decision resolved a debate about whether the provincial law must "sterilize" the essential content of a federal power (the language used in Dick v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 80 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 309, at pp. 323-24), or whether it is sufficient that the provincial law "affect" a vital part of the management and operation of the undertaking (Commission du Salaire minimum v. Bell Telephone Co. of Canada, 1966 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1966] SCR 767, at p. 774; Bell Canada, at pp. 859-60). See also Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, at p. 955, per Dickson C.J., Lamer J. (as he then was) and Wilson J.

[44] The impairment test established in Canadian Western Bank marks a midpoint between sterilization and mere effects. The move away from the "affects" test of Bell Canada reflects growing resistance to the broad application of interjurisdictional immunity based on modern conceptions of cooperative federalism and a perceived need to promote efficacy over formalism. As Binnie and LeBel JJ. put it in Canadian Western Bank, "[t]he Constitution, though a legal document, serves as a framework for life and for political action within a federal state, in which the courts have rightly observed the importance of co-operation among government actors to ensure that federalism operates flexibly" (para. 42). (See also Dickson C.J. in OPSEU, at p. 18.) To quote Binnie and LeBel JJ. in Canadian Western Bank:

> A broad application [of interjurisdictional immunity] . . . appears inconsistent, as stated, with the flexible federalism that the constitutional doctrines of pith and substance, double aspect and federal paramountcy are designed to promote. . . . It is these doctrines that have proved to be most consistent with contemporary views of Canadian federalism, which recognize that overlapping powers are unavoidable. [para. 42]

[45] "Impairment" is a higher standard than "affects". It suggests an impact that not only affects the core federal power, but does so in a way that seriously or significantly trammels the federal power. In an era of cooperative, flexible federalism, application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity requires a significant or serious intrusion on the exercise of the federal power. It need not paralyze it, but it must be serious.

[46] The question is whether applying s. 26 of the ARPALAA to prohibit aerodromes would impair the exercise of the core of a federal power, in this case Parliament's ability to decide when and where aerodromes should be built.

[47] I conclude that the s. 26 prohibition does impair the federal power to decide when and where aerodromes should be built. It prohibits the building of aerodromes in designated agricultural regions unless prior authorization has been obtained from the Commission. As the facts of this case illustrate, the effect may be to prevent the establishment of a new aerodrome or require the demolition of an existing one. This is not a minor effect on the federal power to determine where aerodromes are built.

[48] Section 26 of the ARPALAA significantly restricts, or impairs, Parliament's power to determine where aerodromes may be constructed. Section 26 of the ARPALAA does not sterilize Parliament's power to legislate on aeronautics; the doctrine of paramountcy would permit Parliament to legislatively override provincial zoning legislation for the purpose of establishing aerodromes. But the ARPALAA would nevertheless seriously affect the manner in which the power can be exercised. Instead of the current permissive regime, Parliament would be obliged to legislate for the specific location of particular aerodromes. Such a substantial restriction of Parliament's legislative freedom constitutes an impairment of the federal power. Though the focus of the inquiry must be on the power itself, it is worth noting that the practical effect of the ARPALAA is hardly trivial. It effectively removes 63,000 km^2, the total area of the designated agricultural regions, from the territory that Parliament has designated for aeronautical uses. This is not an insignificant amount of land, and much of it is strategically located.

[49] The Province advances two arguments in support of its contention that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity does not render s. 26 of the ARPALAA inapplicable to aerodromes.

[50] First, the Province argues that s. 26 of the ARPALAA does not impair the federal power because Parliament remains free to designate particular locations where airfields should be constructed, overriding the provincial law by the doctrine of federal paramountcy. In essence, this argument asserts that the doctrine of paramountcy suffices to render the intrusion on the core federal power insignificant. With respect, I do not agree.

[51] First, the argument effectively applies a sterilization test to interjurisdictional immunity. It asserts that the doctrine does not apply because the federal power will not be sterilized, given the doctrine of paramountcy. This test is contrary to Canadian Western Bank.

[52] Second, it impermissibly mingles the distinct doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and paramountcy, in a way that distorts the former. In those circumstances where interjurisdictional immunity applies, the doctrine asks whether the core of the legislative power has been impaired, not whether or how Parliament has, in fact, chosen to exercise that power.

[53] Third, this argument does not answer the fact that the impact of s. 26 is to impair the federal aeronautics power to designate land for the construction of airfields. If Parliament wished to override s. 26 of the ARPALAA by way of federal paramountcy, it would be forced to establish a legislative conflict with each of the Commission's decisions regarding aerodromes, since the doctrine of paramountcy deals with conflict in the exercise of power in the situation where there is overlapping federal and provincial legislation: Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 SCR 188, at para. 11. Parliament would not be free to introduce broad, permissive legislation, should it so choose (and as it has chosen to do). Acceptance of this argument would narrow Parliament's legislative options and impede the exercise of its core jurisdiction. See Re Orangeville Airport Ltd. and Town of Caledon (1976), 1976 CanLII 743 (ON CA), 11 O.R. (2d) 546 (C.A.), at p. 550, per MacKinnon J.A. (as he then was). It might also result in rival systems of regulation, which would be a "source of uncertainty and endless disputes" (Bell Canada, at p. 843, per Beetz J.) and a "jurisdictional nightmare" (British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 SCR 86, at para. 140, per Bastarache J.).

[54] The Province's second argument is that interjurisdictional immunity does not apply to the case at bar because s. 26 of the ARPALAA raises a double aspect. The Province relies on the statement in Lafarge Canada, at para. 4, that interjurisdictional immunity "should not be used where, as here, the legislative subject matter (waterfront development) presents a double aspect" — one provincial, one federal.

[55] This comment should be read in the context of the reasons as a whole. Binnie and LeBel JJ. went on to consider the application of interjurisdictional immunity, despite having identified a clear double aspect (para. 43). Indeed, at para. 42 of Lafarge Canada, they cited with approval Bell Canada, at pp. 839 and 859-60, in which it was found that interjurisdictional immunity actually rendered the impugned legislation inapplicable, even though the law in question raised a double aspect.

[56] The Province's real objection appears to be that a law which presents a double aspect, and which is valid in its provincial aspect, should not have its application cut down merely because it impairs the core of a federal competence. Why, the Province asks, should a valid provincial law not apply, simply because Parliament has duplicative authority under the Constitution Act, 1867? If Parliament wants to prevent the impact, let it enact positive legislation creating an operative conflict and rely on the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

[57] This objection misapprehends the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. The interjurisdictional immunity analysis presumes the validity of a law and focuses exclusively on the law's effects on the core of a federal power: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 48. What matters, from the perspective of interjurisdictional immunity, is that the law has the effect of impairing the core of a federal competency. In those cases where the doctrine applies, it serves to protect the immunized core of federal power from any provincial impairment.

[58] The Province's argument that interjurisdictional immunity cannot apply to laws possessing a double aspect is, at bottom, a challenge to the very existence of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Among the reasons for rejecting a challenge to the existence of the doctrine is that the text of the Constitution Act, 1867, itself refers to exclusivity: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 34. The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been criticized, but has not been removed from the federalism analysis. The more appropriate response is the one articulated in Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge Canada: the doctrine remains part of Canadian law but in a form constrained by principle and precedent. In this way, it balances the need for intergovernmental flexibility with the need for predictable results in areas of core federal authority.

[59] For these reasons, even if s. 26 of the ARPALAA raises a double aspect (a matter which I need not decide), I conclude that the Province's position must be rejected.

[60] To sum up, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is applicable in this case. The location of aerodromes lies at the core of the federal competence over aeronautics. Section 26 of the Act impinges on this core in a way that impairs this federal power. If s. 26 applied, it would force the federal Parliament to choose between accepting that the province can forbid the placement of aerodromes on the one hand, or specifically legislating to override the provincial law on the other hand. This would seriously impair the federal power over aviation, effectively forcing the federal Parliament to adopt a different and more burdensome scheme for establishing aerodromes than it has in fact chosen to do.

[61] To be sure, this result limits the ability of provincial and municipal authorities to unilaterally address the challenges that aviation poses to agricultural land use regulation. However, as Binnie and LeBel JJ. noted in Canadian Western Bank, at para. 54, Parliament's exclusive power to decide the location of aircraft landing facilities is vital to the viability of aviation in Canada. As stated in Lafarge Canada: "The transportation needs of the country cannot be allowed to be hobbled by local interests. Nothing would be more futile than a ship denied the space to land or collect its cargo and condemned like the Flying Dutchman to forever travel the seas" (para. 64).

Most recently, in Opsis Airport Services Inc. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2025 SCC 17 (CanLII), the Court clarified the two conditions that must be met to trigger the application of interjurisdictional immunity.

6.4 Opsis Airport Services Inc. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2025 SCC 17 (CanLII)

The Court —

[1] These appeals afford this Court an opportunity to look once again at the contours of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Since the landmark case of Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, the Court has continued, for the reasons mentioned in that case, to take a cautious approach to the applicability and scope of this doctrine. Despite this Court's hesitation to make increased use of this doctrine, our jurisprudence shows that it still remains useful. The reasons that follow are in line with the decisions rendered by this Court since Canadian Western Bank.

[2] In the two cases in question, the appellants received statements of offence charging them with having contravened certain provisions of the Private Security Act, CQLR, c. S-3.5 ("PSA"), a statute enacted by the Quebec legislature. It is common ground that the appellants did not comply with the requirements of the PSA. However, the appellants contested their statements of offence on the basis that the PSA is inapplicable to them by virtue of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. … Some aspects of the licensing scheme established by the PSA have the effect of giving the administrative body created by the provincial legislature the final say on the manner in which the appellants' security activities falling within the core of an exclusive federal power are conducted. These impairing aspects of the PSA cannot be severed from the rest of the statute, which means that the statute must be declared wholly inapplicable to the appellants pursuant to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. …

I. Background

A. Opsis Case

[3] The appellant Opsis Airport Services Inc. ("Opsis") is an enterprise that provides airport security services. It was retained by the Aéroports de Montréal corporation to operate the emergency call centre at the Pierre Elliott Trudeau International Airport. Opsis's responsibilities at that airport include: operating the call centre's computer systems, interpreting the various signals from the surveillance monitors, providing camera surveillance of various interior and exterior locations to detect anomalies or identify why an alarm has sounded, and answering emergency calls. … Opsis's activities are highly regulated by federal legislation. In particular, the Canadian Aviation Security Regulations, 2012, SOR/2011-318, under the Aeronautics Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-2, impose numerous requirements on the operator of an aerodrome like the Pierre Elliott Trudeau International Airport. …

[4] The dispute between the respondents and Opsis arose when the latter received two statements of offence charging it with having [TRANSLATION] "operated an enterprise that carries on a private security activity without holding an agency licence of the appropriate class", thereby contravening ss. 4 and 114 PSA ….

B. QMS Case

[5] The appellant Quebec Maritime Services Inc. ("QMS") is an enterprise that works in the international marine transportation sector. It performs loading operations on transatlantic ships out of the Pointe-au-Pic terminal in La Malbaie. The role of the appellant Michel Fillion, as an employee, is to monitor and control access to this port facility. … QMS's activities at the Pointe-au-Pic terminal are highly regulated by federal legislation, including the Canada Shipping Act, 2001, S.C. 2001, c. 26, and the Marine Transportation Security Act, S.C. 1994, c. 40, under which a large number of regulations have been made. …

[6] The dispute between the respondents and QMS and its employee, Mr. Fillion, arose following the receipt of statements of offence served by the Bureau de la sécurité privée ("Bureau"). Mr. Fillion was charged with having [TRANSLATION] "carried on a private security activity without holding an agent licence of the appropriate class", thereby contravening ss. 16 and 116 PSA …. QMS was charged with having [translation] "employed a person referred to in section 16 who did not hold an agent licence as required under that section", thereby contravening s. 117 PSA (p. 88).

IV. Issues

[27] …

2. Should the PSA be declared constitutionally inapplicable to the appellants pursuant to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity?

[…]

VI. Should the PSA Be Declared Constitutionally Inapplicable to the Appellants Pursuant to the Doctrine of Interjurisdictional Immunity?

A. General Principles

[32] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity serves to protect the core of an exclusive power — either federal or provincial — from being impaired by the other level of government. It is rooted in the notion of exclusivity that appears in the text of ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 34) and is thus anchored in our law, since the primacy of the written Constitution is "one of the fundamental tenets of our constitutional framework" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 14, [2015] 1 SCR 693, at para. 18; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 53).

[33] In Canadian Western Bank, this Court stated that the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should be applied with restraint (para. 67). This approach can be explained by the tension that exists between this doctrine and the modern conception of cooperative federalism, which favours, "where possible, the ordinary operation of statutes enacted by both levels of government" (para. 37 (emphasis in original); Bank of Montreal v. Marcotte, 2014 SCC 55, [2014] 2 SCR 725, at para. 63).

[34] Though it is "constrained by principle and precedent", the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity continues to play an essential role in relation to federalism, because it makes it possible to "balanc[e] the need for intergovernmental flexibility with the need for predictable results" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 SCR 536 ("COPA"), at para. 58).

[35] When the doctrine applies, "the impugned provisions remain valid but are declared inapplicable to matters that would fall under the core of the exclusive head of power of the other order of government" (Desgagnés Transport Inc. v. Wärtsilä Canada Inc., 2019 SCC 58, [2019] 4 SCR 228, at para. 90; Marcotte, at para. 64). This involves reading down the impugned provisions (Sharp v. Autorité des marchés financiers, 2023 SCC 29, at para. 113, quoting P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at §§ 15:15-15:16, and citing H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel (6th ed. 2014), at para. VI-2.56).

[36] The application of the doctrine depends on two conditions being met: (1) intrusion on the core of an exclusive head of power and (2) impairment of the core of the exclusive head of power. Each of these conditions, as will be discussed below, significantly limits the scope of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

(1) First Condition: Intrusion on the Core of an Exclusive Head of Power

[37] For the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to apply, the first requirement is that the impugned provision or provisions intrude on the core of an exclusive head of power of the other level of government. The core of a power is its "basic, minimum and unassailable" content (Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749 ("Bell Canada (1988)"), at p. 839; Canadian Western Bank, at para. 50; COPA, at para. 35; Desgagnés Transport, at para. 93). This notion serves to identify and delineate "the authority that is absolutely necessary" to enable Parliament or a provincial legislature to effectively achieve the purpose for which the power was conferred (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 77; COPA, at para. 35; Desgagnés Transport, at para. 93). The consideration of evidence can sometimes assist in determining the core of an exclusive head of power (see, e.g., Rogers Communications Inc. v. Châteauguay (City), 2016 SCC 23, [2016] 1 SCR 467, at para. 66).

[38] It is clear that the concept of core is "necessarily narrower" than the concept of the scope of the power (Desgagnés Transport, at para. 95; see also Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at para. VI-2.62). The jurisprudence will frequently serve as a "useful guide" in identifying the core of an exclusive head of power (COPA, at para. 36, citing Canadian Western Bank, at para. 77; Marine Services, at para. 55). It was noted in Canadian Western Bank that the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity should "in general" be reserved for situations already covered by precedent (para. 77). As the Quebec Court of Appeal has rightly observed, the words used by Binnie and LeBel JJ. in that case reflect an intention "to favour the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity when a precedent exists, without, however, necessarily prohibiting it in the other situations" (Attorney General of Quebec v. IMTT-Québec inc., 2019 QCCA 1598, 30 C.E.L.R. (4th) 1, at para. 173).

[39] The jurisprudence subsequent to Canadian Western Bank has maintained the flexibility of the approach adopted by the Court (see, e.g., Rogers, at para. 61, where the adverb "generally" is used, and Desgagnés Transport, at para. 93, where the adverb "usually" is used). In Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 SCR 134, McLachlin C.J. also noted that the fact that the core of a power has never been recognized in the jurisprudence "is not determinative", since it remains possible that new exclusive fields of jurisdiction will be identified in the future (para. 67).

(2) Second Condition: Impairment of the Core of the Exclusive Head of Power

[40] Since Canadian Western Bank, it has been well settled that not every degree of intrusion will trigger the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity: there must be an impairment (para. 48; COPA, at para. 43; Desgagnés Transport, at para. 92). Impairment implies that there are adverse consequences, and it must therefore involve more than mere effects, without necessarily amounting to paralysis or sterilization (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 48). The core of the exclusive power of Parliament or a provincial legislature must be seriously or significantly trammeled (COPA, at para. 45; Marine Services, at paras. 56, 60 and 64; Marcotte, at para. 64; Rogers, at paras. 59 and 70).

[41] The impairment test strikes an appropriate balance and continues to reflect a "growing resistance to the broad application of interjurisdictional immunity based on modern conceptions of cooperative federalism and a perceived need to promote efficacy over formalism" (COPA, at para. 44). Moreover, for the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to apply, it is not necessary to show that there is a conflict between the laws of the two levels of government or even that "the government benefiting from the immunity [is] exercising its exclusive authority" (PHS, at para. 59; see also Canadian Western Bank, at para. 34; COPA, at para. 52; Brun, Tremblay and Brouillet, at para. VI-2.66; G. Régimbald and D. Newman, The Law of the Canadian Constitution (2nd ed. 2017), at §5.91).

[42] Determining whether the core of an exclusive power has been impaired is a question of law: the analysis focuses solely on the effects of the statute of the other level of government on the core of an exclusive power (COPA, at para. 57). Even though the evidence adduced by the parties will in most cases be helpful, the analysis does not depend on it. Indeed, "the focus of the inquiry must be on the power itself" (para. 48).

[43] It has been said in our jurisprudence that an impairment must relate to the core of the exclusive power of the other level of government or to "the vital or essential part of an undertaking it duly constitutes" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 48; see also paras. 51-52). …. However, it must be emphasized that the focal point of the doctrine is the core of the exclusive power. From this perspective, assessing how the impugned statute affects "the vital or essential part" of an undertaking is rather an approach that can indicate in concrete terms that the impugned statute has an impairing effect on the core of the exclusive power (J. G. Furey, "Interjurisdictional Immunity: The Pendulum Has Swung" (2008), 42 S.C.L.R. (2d) 597, at p. 601).

[44] This is in fact what was suggested in Bell Canada (1988), which still contains some relevant teachings despite those regarding the necessary degree of intrusion being rendered obsolete by Canadian Western Bank. Beetz J. clearly stated that consideration of a statute's effects on the activities of an undertaking may provide a strong indication of whether there is an unacceptable degree of intrusion:

> If the application of a provincial statute to a federal undertaking has the effect of impairing or paralyzing it, that a fortiori is an almost certain sign that such application bears upon the specifically federal nature of the undertaking and constitutes an encroachment on the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament. [p. 860]

[45] … ultimately, considering the effects of an impugned statute on a vital or essential part of an undertaking relates to the analysis of the second condition that must be met for the doctrine to apply, namely an impairment of the core of an exclusive power.

[46] Even where the evidence is silent in this regard, it is possible to take into account the effects of the impugned statute's application that may amount to an impairment:

> In deciding what constitutes impairment the Court cannot disregard potential impairment or effects, especially when, as here, far-reaching provincial statutes are at issue here designed to be accompanied by a large number of regulations, ordinances or remedial orders, or which can have major as well as minor effects on the undertaking, effects which cannot be foreseen at the time the Court must rule on whether the statute is applicable, as is true for example with exercise of the right of refusal.
> (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 862)

[47] While much water has flowed under the bridge since Beetz J. made these remarks, they remain relevant. COPA provides a good illustration of this point. In that case, two private citizens had built an aerodrome that was registered under a statute enacted by Parliament. The aerodrome was situated in a designated agricultural region. However, a provision of a provincial statute relating to the preservation of agricultural land prohibited the use of a lot in such a region for any purpose other than agriculture without the prior authorization of an administrative body (para. 9). The Court held that this provincial provision "does impair the federal power to decide when and where aerodromes should be built" (para. 47). Discussing the nature of the impairment, McLachlin C.J. did not confine her analysis to the particular facts of the appeal in COPA; she considered the effects of the application of the provision in issue:

[…]

[48] Similar reasoning was applied by Gonthier J. in Commission de transport de la Communauté urbaine de Québec v. Canada (National Battlefields Commission), 1990 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 838, where the effects of the application of a permit system created by a provincial statute were considered. Gonthier J. found that, if it applied, "[t]he consequence . . . would be to make the setting up, substance and maintenance of the federal transport service subject to the largely discretionary control of the Commission des transports and the government, when these aspects are within exclusive federal jurisdiction" (p. 860). ….

[…]

[50] We agree with that approach. Predictability is key to "the proper functioning of the division of powers" (PHS, at para. 65, citing Canadian Western Bank, at paras. 23-24), and for predictability to be ensured, it is important to take into account the effects of the application of the impugned statute, whether they have materialized or not. This must be so because the analysis is essentially based on the interpretation of the statute of the other level of government. There is no valid reason to take a "wait and see" position (see Halton, at para. 76) when the interpretation of a legislative provision or scheme clearly reveals the potential (Bell Canada (1988), at p. 862) for impairment of the core of an exclusive power.

B. Application to the Facts

(1) Preliminary Remarks

[51] We note that a court must conduct a pith and substance analysis "before inquiring into the application of the doctrines of interjurisdictional immunity and federal paramountcy, both of which are predicated on the constitutional validity of the impugned statute or measure" (Rogers, at para. 35; see also Canadian Western Bank, at para. 76; Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 SCR 327, at para. 17). In these appeals, it is not in dispute that the PSA's purpose is to regulate the private security industry and that this statute comes within provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights (s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867; C.A. reasons (Opsis), at para. 134; C.A. reasons (QMS), at para. 95). Its validity is not in issue.

[52] In addition, this Court has previously suggested that it is "generally" preferable for federal paramountcy to be considered before interjurisdictional immunity in "the absence of prior case law favouring its application to the subject matter at hand" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 78). This suggestion was made in order to favour, where possible, the concurrent application of statutes enacted by both levels of government. However, some authors have criticized this suggestion, noting that a statute's applicability should be considered before its operability (see Hogg and Wright, at § 15:16; R. Elliot, "Interjurisdictional Immunity after Canadian Western Bank and Lafarge Canada Inc.: The Supreme Court Muddies the Doctrinal Waters — Again" (2008), 43 S.C.L.R. (2d) 433, at pp. 495-96). It must in fact be recognized that, in most cases, this latter approach will be the most logical and appropriate one. Indeed, in all of our decisions subsequent to Canadian Western Bank that have dealt with both doctrines, namely British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 SCR 86, COPA, Marine Services, Marcotte and Desgagnés Transport, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been addressed first. That being said, it is not out of the question that, in some circumstances, it will be expedient to consider the doctrine of federal paramountcy before that of interjurisdictional immunity. It sometimes also happens that only the doctrine of federal paramountcy is relied upon. A party is not required to raise the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity first, or even at all, if it chooses to base its challenge exclusively on the doctrine of federal paramountcy.

[53] Here, the debate has focused on the applicability of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, …. In this context, it is appropriate to proceed directly to consider the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity.

(2) First Condition

(a) Opsis Case

[54] Aeronautics falls within Parliament's exclusive jurisdiction as part of its power to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada (s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867). It has been recognized to be a matter of national importance (see COPA, at paras. 28-31, citing Johannesson v. Rural Municipality of West St. Paul, 1951 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1952] 1 SCR 292, and Air Canada v. Ontario (Liquor Control Board), 1997 CanLII 361 (SCC), [1997] 2 SCR 581, at para. 72).

[55] A number of precedents have dealt more specifically with the relationship between this exclusive federal jurisdiction and airports. It is now accepted that "the federal aeronautics jurisdiction encompasses not only the regulation of the operation of aircraft, but also the regulation of the operation of airports" (Air Canada, at para. 72; COPA, at para. 31). As McLachlin C.J. noted, "Canada's airports and aerodromes constitute a network of landing places that together facilitate air transportation and ensure safety" (COPA, at para. 33). Estey J. also recognized several decades ago that "in any practical consideration it is impossible to separate the flying in the air from the taking off and landing on the ground and it is, therefore, wholly impractical, particularly when considering the matter of jurisdiction, to treat them as independent one from the other" (Johannesson, at p. 319; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Lacombe, 2010 SCC 38, [2010] 2 SCR 453, at para. 27).

[57] It can be inferred from the guidance provided in our jurisprudence that airport security, insofar as it is related to the security of air transportation itself, is at the core of the aeronautics power. This is self-evident, because [TRANSLATION] "[w]ithout safety and security measures, there would simply be no civil aviation" (C.A. reasons (Opsis), at para. 12, per Ruel J.A., dissenting; see also para. 67). Indeed, this observation echoes the statement in Canadian Western Bank that "interprovincial and international carriers have a vital and essential interest in being able to land at an airport or having access to a safe harbour" (para. 54).

[58] The tasks associated with Opsis's mandate at the Pierre Elliott Trudeau International Airport include providing camera surveillance of interior and exterior locations at the airport and operating the computer systems of the call centre, which receives some of its calls from the control tower (A.R., vol. II, at p. 137; Sup. Ct. reasons (Opsis), at para. 73). These activities unquestionably fall within the core of the aeronautics power because they are related to the security of air transportation itself. The application of the PSA to Opsis's activities leads to the conclusion that the first condition for the applicability of the doctrine is met. There is an intrusion on the core of an exclusive head of power.

(b) QMS Case

[59] Parliament has jurisdiction over navigation and shipping under s. 91(10) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It is a broad power that "encompasses those aspects of navigation and shipping that engage national concerns which must be uniformly regulated across the country, regardless of their territorial scope" (Marine Services, at para. 61, quoting Tessier Ltée v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 2012 SCC 23, [2012] 2 SCR 3, at para. 22). This Court has held that "dockside unloading and storage operations are 'integral' to shipping" (Lafarge, at para. 35, quoting ITO — International Terminal Operators Ltd. v. Miida Electronics Inc., 1986 CanLII 91 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 752). In Lafarge, Binnie and LeBel JJ. stated the following about this exclusive head of power:

> Historically, the federal navigation and shipping power has been broadly construed (Queddy River Driving Boom Co. v. Davidson (1883), 1883 CanLII 60 (SCC), 10 SCR 222). The transportation needs of the country cannot be allowed to be hobbled by local interests. Nothing would be more futile than a ship denied the space to land or collect its cargo and condemned like the Flying Dutchman to forever travel the seas. Authority for the proposition that transportation undertakings need facilities to pick up and drop cargo, if any is required, is to be found in Attorney-General for Ontario v. Winner, 1954 CanLII 289 (UK JCPC), [1954] A.C. 541 (P.C.). Effective regulation of harbour facilities are as essential to shipping as airports to aeronautics. [para. 64]

[60] Even without any specific precedent in this regard, there is no doubt that the security of marine facilities and their operations is at the core of the federal navigation and shipping power. A port facility plays the same role for ships that an aerodrome does for aircraft. As in the case of air transportation, [TRANSLATION] "[w]ithout robust and uniform safety and security measures, there could be no navigation and marine commerce" (C.A. reasons (QMS), at para. 60, per Ruel J.A., dissenting). The security of marine facilities is therefore a condition that is absolutely necessary for Parliament to "achieve the purpose for which exclusive legislative jurisdiction was conferred" (COPA, at para. 35, quoting Canadian Western Bank, at para. 77).

[61] QMS's international longshoring activities at the Pointe-au-Pic terminal — and by extension the security guard activities carried on by its employee, Mr. Fillion — fall squarely within the core of this exclusive federal power. Indeed, the monitoring tasks performed by Mr. Fillion are part of a security plan required by federal marine security regulations, whose conformity must be approved by Transport Canada. The link between the security of marine facilities and QMS's operations, whose purpose is to ensure the security of the Pointe-au-Pic terminal, is therefore clear. The application of the PSA to the appellants QMS and Mr. Fillion thus constitutes, as in the Opsis case, an intrusion on the core of an exclusive head of power.

(3) Second Condition

(a) Methodological Clarifications

[62] In these appeals, the respondents argue that the Court should apply a narrow approach that examines only the provisions on obtaining agency and agent licences to determine whether there is an impairment. They contend that this should be the case because the other aspects of the PSA are not [TRANSLATION] "in issue" (R.F. (Opsis), Attorney General of Quebec, at paras. 98-99; R.F. (QMS), at paras. 31-32).

[63] Respectfully, a licensing scheme like the one established by the PSA does not lend itself to a siloed analysis. There is very often no point in obtaining a licence if it cannot be kept or renewed. As a matter of logic, therefore, a licensing scheme will generally be "taken as a whole" (National Battlefields Commission, at p. 860), although this may vary depending on the specifics of a dispute and the impugned legislation. That being said, given the narrow scope of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity, its application must be limited to the specific provisions of the impugned statute that impair the core of the exclusive power (Marcotte, at para. 65; IMTT, at para. 274; see also COPA, at paras. 15-16).

(b) Impugned Aspects of the PSA and the Regulations Thereunder

[64] Although the appellants are asking that the PSA as a whole be declared inapplicable, their arguments are focused on specific provisions that, in their opinion, constitute sources of impairment of the core of an exclusive federal power. To facilitate the analysis, we will deal separately with the various impugned aspects of the PSA in order to precisely identify the sources of impairment. It must nevertheless be borne in mind that the impugned provisions are interrelated and are part of the whole formed by the PSA, as will be discussed in the last part of these reasons.

(i) Requirements for Obtaining an Agency Licence

[65] As mentioned above (at paras. 21 et seq.), issuing an agency licence under the PSA is subject to various conditions. …. Similar requirements apply to the owner of the enterprise, to every director and to every partner or shareholder having a major interest in the enterprise (s. 8). …

[66] An enterprise must meet these administrative requirements in order to carry on activities referred to in the PSA. Given the mandatory nature of these requirements, when they are applied to an enterprise whose activities fall within the core of one of Parliament's exclusive fields of jurisdiction, they necessarily intrude on the core of such jurisdiction. This is not to say that the mere existence of a licensing scheme is sufficient to find an impairment that triggers the application of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity (Procureure générale du Québec v. Leclerc, 2018 QCCA 1567, at paras. 79-82; Halton, at para. 73, citing Regina v. TNT Canada Inc., 1986 CanLII 2632 (ON CA), 58 O.R. (2d) 410 (C.A.)). However, this might be the case, for example where the requirements for obtaining a licence are so unreasonable that they constitute an impairment. Similarly, if training costs for the enterprise's employees are inordinately high, it will be possible to say that the licence is so restrictive that it can "be characterized as a colourable attempt to regulate or 'sterilize'" activities falling within the core of an exclusive power (Aeroguard Co. v. British Columbia (Attorney General) (1998), 1998 CanLII 2300 (BC SC), 50 B.C.L.R. (3d) 88 (S.C.), at para. 23). This will also be the case where obtaining a licence is subject to the exercise of a broad discretion that has the effect of giving the other level of government the final say on the possibility of carrying on activities falling with the core of an exclusive power (see National Battlefields Commission, at pp. 859-60; IMTT, at paras. 218-22; Halton, at paras. 75-77). Everything depends on the legislative context in question.

[67] Here, it cannot be said that the conditions for obtaining a licence adversely affect the activities of an enterprise like Opsis. Several of these conditions are intended only to ensure that private security services are provided by enterprises with a minimum level of financial health. The conditions relating to representatives, owners, major shareholders or partners and directors are also not very onerous. …

[68] The conditions for obtaining an agency licence do not in themselves have any impact on the manner in which Opsis must conduct its activities or on the airport security standards with which it must comply. From this perspective, there is no basis — at this stage of the analysis — for finding an impairment of the core of an exclusive power of Parliament. …

(ii) Requirements for Obtaining an Agent Licence

[69] Most of the preceding comments can also be applied to the requirements for obtaining an agent licence. …

[…]

(ii) Requirements Relating to Standards of Conduct

[71] Section 30 para. 1(5) PSA provides in particular that the Bureau has the power to "suspend, cancel or refuse to renew the agent licence of a licence holder" where the holder "has violated the standards of conduct determined by regulation".

[73] The majority of the Court of Appeal found that the standards of conduct established by regulation are of general application and do not permit the Bureau to control the manner in which the employees of Opsis or QMS must carry on their activities (C.A. reasons (Opsis), at para. 176; C.A. reasons (QMS), at para. 185). To conclude otherwise would be to rely on "hypotheticals and conjectures" (C.A. reasons (Opsis), at para. 176; see also C.A. reasons (QMS), at paras. 222-23). The respondents share this view. The appellants instead urge the Court to adopt the position of the dissenting judge, who found that by seeking to take action in relation to agent licence holders as regards these standards of conduct, the Bureau [TRANSLATION] "would necessarily find itself having to regulate and applying the rules of aeronautical safety and security" (C.A. reasons (Opsis), at para. 81). He reached the same conclusion in the QMS case as regards the core of maritime jurisdiction (para. 64).

[74] We come to the same conclusion as the dissenting judge. The power to suspend, cancel or refuse to renew an agent licence conferred on the Bureau by s. 30 PSA clearly reveals the potential for impairment. ….

[75] The agent licensing scheme established by the PSA thus allows an administrative body created by the provincial legislature to have "the final say" on the manner in which activities — including those of the appellants — falling within the core of an exclusive federal power must be conducted, as was the case in COPA (paras. 1 and 46-48). In other words, such activities are "at the mercy" of the Bureau (National Battlefields Commission, at p. 859). But one of the purposes of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is precisely to prevent one level of government from being able to "achieve indirectly what it lacks the authority to achieve directly" (K. Wilkins, "Exclusively Yours: Reconsidering Interjurisdictional Immunity" (2019), 52 U.B.C. L. Rev. 697, at p. 712). We therefore have no difficulty in concluding that … there is in the instant cases an impairment of the core of Parliament's exclusive aeronautics and maritime jurisdiction.

(iv) Power of the Bureau To Issue Directives Regarding an Agency Licence Holder's Activities

[76] To "protect the public", the Bureau may, in particular, issue "directives to an agency licence holder regarding the agency licence holder's activities" (s. 42(1) PSA). … Section 29(4) PSA provides that if an agency licence holder "fails to follow the directives issued by the Bureau", its licence may be suspended, cancelled or not renewed.

[77] The majority of the Court of Appeal noted that this power represents at most a [TRANSLATION] "purely speculative impairment" as there is no certainty that the Bureau will exercise it and, furthermore, that if it does, it will exercise it in a manner that impairs the core of the federal aeronautics power (C.A. reasons (Opsis), at paras. 202-3 (emphasis deleted)).

[78] Respectfully, we cannot accept that view for reasons similar to those just stated. Like the Bureau's powers in relation to standards of conduct, the power to issue to an agency licence holder "directives . . . regarding the agency licence holder's activities" gives the Bureau a broad discretion. This power is a sword of Damocles hanging over the head of an enterprise like Opsis, given that the Bureau has the authority to dictate how it must carry on its airport security activities and that, it if fails to comply, it may lose its agency licence (s. 29(4) PSA) and thus no longer be able to carry on private security activities (s. 4 PSA). It therefore seems clear that the application of s. 29(4) … has the effect of subjecting Opsis's activities falling within the core of an exclusive power of Parliament to the control of an administrative body created by the provincial legislature. Here again, we have no difficulty in concluding that there is an impairment of the core of Parliament's exclusive aeronautics power.

(4) Scope of the Declaration of Inapplicability

[80] To summarize, two aspects of the PSA's licensing scheme meet the second condition for the applicability of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in these two appeals. ….

[81] We must now determine whether only these two aspects of the PSA should be declared inapplicable to the appellants or whether it is instead appropriate to declare that the entire licensing scheme created by this statute is inapplicable to them. Given that the impairing provisions cannot be severed from the coherent whole formed by the PSA, this second avenue, in our view, is to be preferred.

[82] The fact is that the two impairing aspects of the PSA are related to the Bureau's essential function, namely its mission to protect the public, including by ensuring the enforcement of the PSA and the regulations thereunder (s. 41). Morissette J.A. rightly pointed out that the PSA gives the Bureau [TRANSLATION] "functions analogous to that of a professional order" (Société québécoise des infrastructures, at para. 12). …

[83] If the Bureau loses its power to suspend, cancel or refuse to renew the agent licence of a holder who violates the standards of conduct determined by regulation (s. 30 para. 1(5) PSA), this would significantly limit its ability to supervise private security activities. The same is true as regards the exercise of this power where an agency licence holder fails to follow the directives issued to it by the Bureau (s. 29(4)). The absence of these two impairing aspects of the PSA would deprive the Bureau of important tools to accomplish its primary mission of protecting the public. …

[84] From this perspective, it seems clear that the Quebec legislature would not have enacted the PSA without the impairing provisions, which are truly unseverable from the rest of the statute and essential to the whole of which they form part. Since a targeted declaration of inapplicability might change the nature of the legislative scheme intended by the legislature, the appropriate remedy is to read down the statute as a whole so that the appellants are excluded from its scope (see, by analogy, Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38, [2020] 3 SCR 629, at para. 114; R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 SCR 96, at paras. 50-51).

VII. Conclusion

[85] In light of our conclusions …. The PSA is declared constitutionally inapplicable to the appellants pursuant to the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. ….

6.5 Questions

In Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, the Court confirmed that interjurisdictional immunity doctrine could, in principle, protect a provincial (rather than a federal) core. Ultimately, however, the Court found that interjurisdictional immunity did not apply.

PHS concerned the continued operation of Insite, a safe drug injection site in Vancouver's Downtown Eastside neighbourhood. Insite provides a supervised environment with trained staff and clean equipment so that drug users may safely inject their illicit drugs. Drug users must bring their own drugs. Evidence showed that Insite reduced overdose deaths, injuries, and the spread of infectious diseases from shared equipment. In order for the Province of British Columbia to continue to operate Insite, it required the extension of its federal exemption under section 56 of the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act (CDSA). Otherwise, the drugs on site would be prohibited. The federal government at the time refused to extend the exemption, which would have triggered the closure of Insite.

The Province of British Columbia made several constitutional arguments, one of which concerned the inapplicability of sections 4 and 5 of the CDSA. They argued that the core of provincial jurisdiction over health care was protected from federal intrusion by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. In other words, they reversed the usual direction of interjurisdictional immunity doctrine to claim a protected provincial core, one that would permit the continued operation of Insite without an extension of the CDSA exemption.

[57] British Columbia, Mr. Wilson, Ms. Tomic and PHS argue that Insite is shielded from the operation of the CDSA by virtue of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. The argument, accepted by the majority of the Court of Appeal, is that decisions about what treatment may be offered in provincial health facilities lie at the core of the provincial jurisdiction in the area of health care, and are therefore protected from federal intrusions by the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. Accordingly, they say that ss. 4(1) and 5(1) of the CDSA are of no force or effect to the extent that they impair the Province's ability to make decisions about health care services.

[58] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is premised on the idea that there is a "basic, minimum and unassailable content" to the heads of powers in ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 that must be protected from impairment by the other level of government: Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749, at p. 839. In cases where interjurisdictional immunity is found to apply, the law enacted by the other level of government remains valid, but has no application with regard to the identified "core".

> [59] It is not necessary to show that there is a conflict between the laws adopted by the two levels of government for interjurisdictional immunity to apply: Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 SCR 536, at para. 52 ("COPA"). Indeed, it is not even necessary for the government benefiting from the immunity to be exercising its exclusive authority: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 34.
> [60] The doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been applied to circumscribed areas of activity referred to in the cases as undertakings. These include aviation, ports, interprovincial rail and federal communications works. The doctrine has also been applied to federal things like Aboriginal land, and federally regulated persons such as Aboriginal peoples: Derrickson v. Derrickson, 1986 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 285; Natural Parents v. Superintendent of Child Welfare, 1975 CanLII 143 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 751; see also Canadian Western Bank, at para. 41. It has never been applied to a broad and amorphous area of jurisdiction.
> [61] Recent jurisprudence has tended to confine the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity. In Canadian Western Bank, the majority stated that "although the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has a proper part to play in appropriate circumstances, we intend now to make it clear that the Court does not favour an intensive reliance on the doctrine, nor should we accept the invitation of the appellants to turn it into a doctrine of first recourse in a division of powers dispute" (para. 47). More recently, in COPA, the majority held that the doctrine "has not been removed from the federalism analysis", but rather remains "in a form constrained by principle and precedent" (para. 58).
> [62] This caution reflects three related concerns. First, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is in tension with the dominant approach that permits concurrent federal and provincial legislation with respect to a matter, provided the legislation is directed at a legitimate federal or provincial aspect, as the case may be. This model of federalism recognizes that in practice there is significant overlap between the federal and provincial areas of jurisdiction, and provides that both governments should be permitted to legislate for their own valid purposes in these areas of overlap.
> [63] Second, the doctrine is in tension with the emergent practice of cooperative federalism, which increasingly features interlocking federal and provincial legislative schemes. In the spirit of cooperative federalism, courts "should avoid blocking the application of measures which are taken to be enacted in furtherance of the public interest": Canadian Western Bank, at para. 37. Where possible, courts should allow both levels of government to jointly regulate areas that fall within their jurisdiction: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 37.
> [64] Third, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity may overshoot the federal or provincial power in which it is grounded and create legislative "no go" zones where neither level of government regulates. Since it is not necessary for the government benefiting from the immunity to actually regulate in the field in question, extension of the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity risks creating "legal vacuums": Canadian Western Bank, at para. 44.
>
> [65] While the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity has been narrowed, it has not been abolished. Predictability, important to the proper functioning of the division of powers, requires recognition of previously established exclusive cores of power: Canadian Western Bank, at paras. 23-24. Nor, in principle, is the doctrine confined to federal powers: Canadian Western Bank. However, in areas of overlapping jurisdiction, the modern trend is to strike a balance between the federal and provincial governments, through the application of pith and substance analysis and a restrained application of federal paramountcy. Therefore, before applying the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity in a new area, courts should ask whether the constitutional issue can be resolved on some other basis.
> [66] The question in this case is whether the delivery of health care services constitutes a protected core of the provincial power over health care in s. 92(7), (13) and (16) of the Constitution Act, 1867, and is therefore immune from federal interference. I conclude that it is not, for three related reasons.
>
> [67] First, the proposed core of the provincial power over health has never been recognized in the jurisprudence. This is not determinative since new areas of exclusive jurisdiction could in theory be identified in the future. However, as noted above, courts are reluctant to identify new areas where interjurisdictional immunity applies.
> [68] Second, and more importantly, the claimants in this case have failed to identify a delineated "core" of an exclusively provincial power. The provincial health power is broad and extensive. It extends to thousands of activities and to a host of different venues. Such a vast core would sit ill with the restrained application of the doctrine called for by the jurisprudence. To complicate the matter, Parliament has power to legislate with respect to federal matters, notably criminal law, that touch on health. For instance, it has historic jurisdiction to prohibit medical treatments that are dangerous, or that it perceives as "socially undesirable" behaviour: R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30; Morgentaler v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 8 (SCC), [1976] 1 SCR 616; R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463. The federal role in the domain of health makes it impossible to precisely define what falls in or out of the proposed provincial "core". Overlapping federal jurisdiction and the sheer size and diversity of provincial health power render daunting the task of drawing a bright line around a protected provincial core of health where federal legislation may not tread.
> [69] Third, application of interjurisdictional immunity to a protected core of the provincial health power has the potential to create legal vacuums. Excluding the federal criminal law power from a protected provincial core power would mean that Parliament could not legislate on controversial medical procedures, such as human cloning or euthanasia. The provinces might choose not to legislate in these areas, and indeed might not have the power to do so. The result might be a legislative vacuum, inimical to the very concept of the division of powers.
> [70] In summary, the doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity is narrow. Its premise of fixed watertight cores is in tension with the evolution of Canadian constitutional interpretation towards the more flexible concepts of double aspect and cooperative federalism. To apply it here would disturb settled competencies and introduce uncertainties for new ones. Quite simply, the doctrine is neither necessary nor helpful in the resolution of the contest here between the federal government and the provincial government.

PHS was ultimately decided on Charter grounds. This case was heard and decided by the Court one year after the COPA decision.

1. Are you persuaded by the different outcomes in COPA and PHS? Are those outcomes explained by the fact that aerodromes are settled federal undertakings while safe injection sites are a new and novel subject matter?
2. What would you characterize as the "core" of provincial jurisdiction in PHS? Do you think that the "core" needs to be capable of precise articulation?
3. While it is true that we are in an era of cooperative federalism, should that necessarily preclude a role for interjurisdictional immunity doctrine and confine it to matters of precedent? Do you think there is a role for interjurisdictional immunity doctrine that might bring the meaning of the exclusivity of the heads of power into the modern age?
4. Does it change your mind if interjurisdictional immunity is not asymmetrical, in light of what the Court said in PHS? Do you think that different provinces and territories may have different perspectives on the interjurisdictional immunity doctrine, depending on their location and position in the federation?
5. In the ongoing scholarly debates and judicial interpretations about interjurisdictional immunity and its place among interpretation doctrines, which position do you find most persuasive? Why?

7 Federal paramountcy

We have seen that interjurisdictional immunity doctrine is of limited application and, unless the jurisprudence has already applied to the same activity, is a doctrine of last resort. What, then, should courts do when both levels of government have adopted valid legislation governing the same activity, as we know they can, pursuant to the double aspect doctrine? Multiple Access v McCutcheon tells us (at p 182) that where this is the case, there is no good reason to "to kill one and let the other live". In other words, provided both laws can peacefully coexist, courts should allow them to live and let live. But what of the situation where two laws, one federal and one provincial, say conflicting things? In addition to defining a conflict, the doctrine of federal paramountcy governs how to deal with conflicting legislation.

As discussed above, public roads may be the quintessential example of a matter with a double aspect. Both Parliament and the provinces have jurisdiction to adopt legislation governing roads. Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles et al., 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5, an early case on federal paramountcy, provides some clarity on how to deal with potentially conflicting federal and provincial legislation governing roads.

7.1 Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles et al., 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5

On August 22, 1972, Gordon Russell Ross was convicted under s. 234 of the Criminal Code of driving while his ability was impaired. As varied on appeal, his sentence provides:

> The accused shall be prohibited from driving for a period of six months except Monday to Friday, 8:00 a.m. to 5:45 p.m., in the course of employment and going to and from work.

The order thus made on January 3, 1973 further provided that Ross' operator's licence was not to be suspended and that the Registrar of Motor Vehicles be advised of the order. However, s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 202, provides that, subject to s. 25, the licence of a person who is convicted of an offence under any of several sections of the Criminal Code including s. 222 (now 234) is thereupon suspended for a period of, upon the first offence, three months, but where personal injury, death or damage to property occurred in connection with the offence, six months. A six or twelve-month suspension is provided for a second offence. Section 25 contemplates the issue in some cases of a restricted licence for the last three months of a six-month suspension or the last six months of a twelve-month suspension, upon the recommendation of the provincial judge, leaving mandatory the complete suspension for the first three or six months.

On January 29, 1973, Ross instituted an action in the Supreme Court of Ontario claiming against the Registrar of Motor Vehicles and the Attorney General for Ontario a declaration that s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act is inoperative and that the suspension of his operator's licence is of no effect.

In 1941, a substantially similar question concerning the validity and effect of provincial motor vehicle legislation was raised in the case of Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan. Although a conclusion on the appeal could have been reached on a question of jurisdiction of the court below, this Court went on unanimously to determine that the operation and validity of provincial legislation suspending driving licences upon conviction of certain offences under the Criminal Code remained unaffected by the enactment, by the Parliament of Canada, of a provision for the making of orders prohibiting a convicted person from driving a motor vehicle during a period not exceeding three years. This enactment was subs. 7 of s. 285 of the Criminal Code then in force.

The first sentence of the subsection had been enacted the previous year (c. 44, s. 16). At that time, s. 285 included all the Criminal Code offences specifically pertaining to the operation of motor vehicles. The subsections mentioned in subs. 7 related to negligent driving, hit and run, driving while impaired and dangerous driving respectively. Duff C.J. said (at pp. 402, 403):

> …Primarily, responsibility for the regulation of highway traffic, including authority to prescribe the conditions and the manner of the use of motor vehicles on highways and the operation of a system of licences for the purpose of securing the observance of regulations respecting these matters in the interest of the public generally, is committed to the local legislatures.

Sections 84(1)(a) and (c) are enactments dealing with licences. The legislature has thought fit to regard convictions of the classes specified as a proper ground for suspending the licence of the convict. Such legislation, I think, is concerned with the subject of licensing, over which it is essential that the Province should primarily have control. In exercising such control it must, of course, abstain from legislating on matters within the enumerated subjects of section 91. Suspension of a driving licence does involve a prohibition against driving; but so long as the purpose of the provincial legislation and its immediate effect are exclusively to prescribe the conditions under which licences are granted, forfeited, or suspended, I do not think, speaking generally, it is necessarily impeachable as repugnant to section 285(7) of the Criminal Code in the sense above mentioned.

It is, of course, beyond dispute that where an offence is created by competent Dominion legislation in exercise of the authority under section 91(27), the penalty or penalties attached to that offence, as well as the offence itself, become matters within that paragraph of section 91 which are excluded from provincial jurisdiction.

There is, however, no adequate ground for the conclusion that these particular enactments (section 84(1)(a) and (c)) are in their true character attempts to prescribe penalties for the offences mentioned, rather than enactments in regulation of licences.

The provisions of the Criminal Code presently in force concerning the making of orders prohibiting a person from driving are in s. 238.

As amended by 1972, c. 13, s. 18, the first four subsections read as follows:

> 238. (1) Where an accused is convicted of an offence under section 203, 204 or 219 committed by means of a motor vehicle or of an offence under section 233, 234, 235, 236 or subsection (3) of this section, the court, judge, justice or magistrate, as the case may be, may, in addition to any other punishment that may be imposed for that offence, make an order prohibiting him from driving a motor vehicle in Canada at all times or at such times and places as may be specified in the order
> (a) during any period that the court, judge, or magistrate considers proper, if he is liable to imprisonment for life in respect of that offence, or
> (b) during any period not exceeding three years, if he is not liable to imprisonment for life in respect of that offence.
> (2) Where an order is made pursuant to subsection (1), a copy of the order certified under the hand of the justice or magistrate or under the hand of the judge or the clerk of the court and sealed with the seal, if any, of the court, shall

(a) where the accused holds a permit or licence to drive a motor vehicle, be sent to the registrar of motor vehicles for the province in which the licence or permit was issued, or

(b) where the accused does not hold a permit or licence to drive a motor vehicle, be sent to the registrar of motor vehicles for the province in which the accused resides.

(3) Every one who drives a motor vehicle in Canada while he is disqualified or prohibited from driving a motor vehicle by reason of

(a) the legal suspension or cancellation, in any province, of his permit or licence or of his right to secure a permit or licence to drive a motor vehicle in that province, or

(b) an order made pursuant to subsection (1), is guilty of

(c) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years, or

(d) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(3.1) Subsection (3) does not apply to a person who drives a motor vehicle in Canada while he is disqualified or prohibited from driving a motor vehicle by reason of the legal suspension or cancellation, in any province, of his permit or licence or of his right to secure a permit or licence to drive a motor vehicle in that province, where that suspension or cancellation is inconsistent with an order made with respect to him under subsection (1).

… The direction that Ross' operator's licence was not to be suspended shows that the judge who made the prohibitory order considered not only that the prohibition may be limited as to time and place, but also that the person to whom the order is directed should enjoy the right to drive at specified time and place, irrespective of provincial legislation concerning the suspension of driving privileges. In terms, the Criminal Code merely provides for the making of prohibitory orders limited as to time and place. If such an order is made in respect of a period of time during which a provincial licence suspension is in effect, there is, strictly speaking, no repugnancy. Both legislations can fully operate simultaneously. It is true that this means that as long as the provincial licence suspension is in effect, the person concerned gets no benefit from the indulgence granted under the federal legislation. But, is the situation any different in law from that which was considered in the Egan case namely, that due to the provincial legislation, the right to drive was lost by reason of the conviction, although the convicting magistrate had made no prohibitory order whatsoever?

Reference was made in this case to s. 5(1) of the Criminal Code which reads:

5. (1) Where an enactment creates an offence and authorizes a punishment to be imposed in respect thereof,

(a) a person shall be deemed not to be guilty until he is convicted thereof; and

(b) a person who is convicted of that offence is not liable to any punishment in respect thereof other than the punishment prescribed by this Act or by the enactment that creates the offence.

It should now be taken as settled that civil consequences of a criminal act are not to be considered as "punishment" so as to bring the matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of Parliament. In Lymburn v. Mayland Lord Atkin said (at p. 36):

…Registered persons must enter into a personal bond, and may be required to enter into a surety bond each in the sum of $500, conditioned for payment if the registered person amongst other events, is (in the former bond) "charged with", (in the later bond) "convicted of", a criminal offence, or found to have committed an offence against the Act or the regulations made thereunder. It was contended on behalf of the Attorney-General for the Dominion that to impose a condition making the bond fall due upon conviction for a criminal offence was to encroach upon the sole right of the Dominion to legislate in respect of the criminal law. It indirectly imposed an additional punishment for a criminal offence. Their Lordships do not consider this objection well founded. If the legislation be otherwise intra vires, the imposition of such an ordinary condition in a bond taken to secure good conduct does not appear to invade in any degree the field of criminal law.

Subs. (3.1) indicates that in enacting the 1972 amendments, Parliament was conscious of the differences that could arise between prohibitory orders and licence suspensions. The subsection goes no further that to provide that in such case, the penalty provided under the Criminal Code for driving while under suspension shall not apply.

In O'Grady v. Sparling the question of repugnancy between Criminal Code provisions and provincial motor vehicle legislation was considered by the full Court. The problem was whether provincial legislation making it an offence to drive "without due care and attention" was repugnant to s. 221.1 (now s. 233.1) of the Criminal Code. It was determined that the federal enactment did not make a crime of inadvertent negligence and provincial legislation making any negligence in driving an offence was valid. Only the two dissenting judges considered that "by necessary implication", the Criminal Code said not only what kinds or degrees of negligence shall be punishable, but also what kinds or degrees shall not. In other words, the majority decided that Parliament did not implicitly permit conduct which did not come within the description of the Criminal Code offence. Therefore, the legislatures could validly prohibit such conduct under penalty as long as this was done for a proper provincial purpose. This was reaffirmed in Mann v. The Queen. I would also point out that in The Queen v. Boisjoly, this Court held that an oath that was simply not prohibited could not be considered as "permitted by law" within the meaning of s. 114 (now s. 122) of the Criminal Code.

In my view, it should be said in the present case that Parliament did not by the amendments to s. 238 of the Criminal Code purport to deal generally with the right to drive a motor vehicle after a conviction for certain offences. The only change effected was that a larger area of discretion was given to the convicting magistrate. Instead of being authorized only to make an order prohibiting driving for a definite length of time not exceeding the period stated, the magistrate was empowered to issue an order limited as to time and place. No authorization was given to make an order such as made in the present case, directing that the licence of the person convicted be not suspended. It seems clear to me that this order was made by an inferior court completely without jurisdiction and is to be ignored.

On my view of the enactment, I can see no reason for which it could be considered as going beyond parliament's competence. Apparently, the contention that Parliament thereby invaded provincial jurisdiction was advanced solely on the basis that s. 238 might operate to prevent the application of provincial legislation either of itself or by virtue of orders made thereunder.

It may be of some interest to observe that under the Australian constitution, a principle was developed to determine whether a field of legislation is to be considered as occupied by federal legislation so as to exclude or make inoperative State legislation. The rule was stated by Dixon J. in Ex Parte McLean (at p. 483), in the following statement that was subsequently approved by the Privy Council (O'Sullivan v. Noarlunga Ltd., at p. 28):

…The inconsistency does not lie in the mere coexistence of two laws which are susceptible of simultaneous obedience. It depends upon the intention of the paramount Legislature to express by its enactment, completely, exhaustively, or exclusively, what shall be the law governing the particular conduct or matter to which its attention is directed. When a Federal statute discloses such an intention, it is inconsistent with it > for the law of a State to govern the same conduct or matter.

> Of course, if we were to apply that rule, it would have to be said that Parliament did not purport to state exhaustively the law respecting motor driving licences, or the suspension or cancellation for driving offences. Therefore, the question whether this could validly be done by Parliament does not arise.
> For those reasons, I would answer the questions of law stated in the order of the Supreme Court of Ontario by stating that s. 21 of the Highway Traffic Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 202 is valid and operative legislation, and that s. 238 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34 as amended is also valid. I would make no order as to costs as none were demanded.

Like interjurisdictional immunity, the doctrine of federal paramountcy is not primarily concerned with whether legislation is valid. Rather, it examines whether legislation can operate in the presence of a competing law governing the same activity. Whether, in other words, two laws—one federal and provincial—can operate side by side, or whether the operation of the federal law makes the provincial law inoperable to the extent of the conflict.

Ross suggests that the concept of a conflict between federal and provincial legislation is narrow, leaving plenty of room for legislation to operate concurrently. The majority uses the concept of "repugnancy" as the guiding factor. Thus, only where the operation of a provincial law is repugnant to federal legislation, does the provincial law become inoperable to the extent of the repugnancy.

In Multiple Access v McCutcheon, an excerpt of which discusses the double aspect doctrine, above, Justice Dickson (as he then was) expands on the federal paramountcy doctrine and sets out an early iteration of the framework for applying the doctrine.

7.2 Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161

> Having found ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act to be intra vires the Parliament of Canada and ss. 113 and 114 of the Ontario Securities Act to be intra vires the Legislature of Ontario there remains but to respond to the third and final question. Are sections 113 and 114 of the Ontario Act suspended and rendered inoperative in respect of corporations incorporated under the laws of Canada. This is the issue Mr. Justice Henry faced at trial:
>
> The next issue that arises before me is whether the insider trading provisions in Sections 113 and 114 of The Securities Act are suspended by the operation of the insider trading provisions in Sections 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-32.
> He said:
>
> > It is common ground that the corporate Plaintiff is a federally incorporated company, that it was competent to Parliament and the Legislature to enact respectively these provisions so that each is intra vires.
> >
> > There was no dispute between Counsel that the two sets of provisions are for all material purposes identical, with the exception that if proceedings are taken under the federal provisions, the agency that will have carriage of the proceedings is the director of the Corporations Branch of the federal Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whereas if proceedings are undertaken under the provincial Securities Act, the Ontario Securities Commission has carriage of the proceedings. It was also not a matter of dispute that if both sets of provisions are in operation together, both would apply to the circumstances of this case.
> > Although the appellant argues, weakly, that there are minor differences in the legislation, Henry J. found an identity of purpose, conduct and remedy. Does mere duplication constitute "the conflict" required by the paramountcy doctrine in order to render a provincial statutory provision inoperative? This is the issue upon which Mr. Justice Henry at trial and Mr. Justice Morden in the Divisional Court parted ways. The same difference of opinion is reflected by the commentators.
>
> Mr. Justice Henry chose a more narrow and if I may say so, more modern, test of conflict with the concomitant result of leaving to the provinces ample legislative room. He adopted the test propounded by Mr. Justice Martland in Smith v. The Queen, supra, at p. 800:
>
> > It may happen that some acts might be punishable under both provisions and in this sense that these provisions overlap. However, even in such cases, there is no conflict in the sense that compliance with one law involves breach of the other. It would appear, therefore that they can operate concurrently.
>
> Parenthetically, and interestingly, the test adopted by Martland J. in Smith v. The Queen was the very test propounded by the Attorney General of Canada in Smith. If one refers to the factum of the federal Attorney General in Smith, prepared by W.R. Jackett and S. Samuels, one will find the following passage (at p. 8):
>
> > It might happen that the same facts might be punishable under both provisions. In this sense they overlap. However there is no conflict in the sense that compliance with one law involves breach of the other. That being so, it is submitted that they can live together and are not only both valid but are operative concurrently.
>
> The express contradiction test was reaffirmed in Construction Montcalm Inc. v. Minimum Wage Commission, supra, by Mr. Justice Beetz (at p. 780):
> > Montcalm's third submission cannot succeed unless the impugned provisions are in conflict with the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act: Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5. Here again, it was incumbent upon Montcalm to establish that it could not comply with provincial law without committing a breach of the federal Act. Montcalm did not even attempt any such demonstration. It argues in its factum that the federal Act provides not only for wages but also for overtime, unfair labour practices, etc., and that, in several instances, such provisions 'may' differ from those of provincial law. This is not good enough. Montcalm had to prove that federal and provincial law were in actual conflict for the purposes of this case. It did not so prove.
> > See also Robinson v. Countrywide Factors Ltd., 1977 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1978] 1 SCR 753.
>
> On the basis of the "overwhelming weight of recent authority" Mr. Justice Henry found that the two sets of statutory provisions could "live together and operate concurrently". Any "diseconomies" resulting from the proliferation of laws and administration were inherent in the federal system. Double liability would be avoided by "cooperation between administrators and the ordinary supervision of the courts over duplication of proceedings before them".
> Mr. Justice Henry and Professor Hogg are of one mind. Professor Hogg writes:
> > There is no reason why duplication should be a case of inconsistency once the negative implication or covering the field test is rejected. On the contrary, duplication is "the ultimate in harmony". The argument that it is untidy, wasteful and confusing to have two laws when only one is needed reflects a value which in a federal system often has to be subordinated to that of provincial autonomy. Nor does the latter value > disappear when provincial law merely duplicates federal law, because the suspension of a provincial law may create a gap in a provincial scheme of regulation which would have to be filled by federal law—a situation as productive of untidiness, waste and confusion as duplication.

> (Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, supra, at p. 110)

He continued (at p. 111):

> In any event, arguments against duplication of federal and provincial laws can have little weight once overlapping is admitted. After all, overlapping legislation is duplicative to the extent of the overlap; and yet it is clear that provincial law is not inoperative to the extent of its overlap with federal law. It must be remembered too that the differences between the federal and provincial laws in O'Grady and Stephens were small, and in Smith and Mann they were virtually non-existent. If paramountcy does not apply when 999 cases out of 1,000 are covered by both laws, why should paramountcy apply when all 1,000 are covered by both laws? It is submitted that duplication is not a test of inconsistency. The one case which decides that it is should be treated as overruled by the recent decisions, especially Smith and Mann.
> Morden J. adopts the older and more prevalent view of the commentators that "The authorities establish one of the implications of Dominion paramountcy to be that provincial duplicative legislation is suspended and inoperative. Simple duplication by a province is not permitted" (Lederman, "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada, supra, at p. 195; see also Abel, Laskiris Canadian Constitutional Law (1975), at p. 117: "If member and federal measures are substantial duplicates, every situation covered by the one is likewise covered by the other and there is no provincial room left, given full operation of the federal law"). Morden J. finds that "Resort to one statute, from a practical point of view, precludes the other from having any application."

The conflict between the reasons of Mr. Justice Henry and the reasons of Mr. Justice Morden lies in large measures upon the opinion of the latter that the paramountcy doctrine became applicable because a plaintiff could resort to one set of provisions only and, having done so, there would be no scope for the other to have operational effect. That is unquestionably an important consideration but it is not, in my view, conclusive. The provincial legislation merely duplicates the federal; it does not contradict it. The fact that a plaintiff may have a choice of remedies does not mean that the provisions of both levels of government cannot "live together" and operate concurrently. In the Smith case the provincial and federal provisions were virtually identical in substance, and the law authorities could prosecute the proscribed conduct as a provincial offence or as a federal offence under the Criminal Code.

I agree with the submissions of counsel for Saskatchewan that it would be ironic if a province, by adding elements of differentiation in its legislation (which do not conflict with federal provisions governing the same conduct but which, in effect, go further than the federal) could create valid operative provisions whereas in regard to the same legislative field, it could not merely duplicate the federal provisions; the cases where overlapping provincial legislation has not been rendered inoperative cannot be validly distinguished on the basis that in each of them there were elements of difference between the provincial and the federal legislation; there is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament.

The respondents strenuously support Mr. Justice Morden's reasons in this Court. Counsel for the respondent McCutcheon argues "Where two actions are brought under the federal and provincial legislation against the insider, either concurrently or seriatim, the Court will not permit both to proceed to judgment […] Both pieces of legislation cannot operate concurrently in that resort to one precludes resort to the other. The legislation under which one action is commenced operates to prevent the application of the other. In such case, the two statutes meet and are in conflict". I am not of that opinion.

With Mr. Justice Henry I would say that duplication is, to borrow Professor Lederman's phrase, "the ultimate in harmony". The resulting "untidiness" or "diseconomy" of duplication is the price we pay for a federal system in which economy "often has to be subordinated to […] provincial autonomy" (Hogg, at p. 110). Mere duplication without actual conflict or contradiction is not sufficient to invoke the doctrine of paramountcy and render otherwise valid provincial legislation inoperative.

The following passage from Professor Lederman's article "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada", supra, at p. 199 (fn. 39) is apposite:

> As Dr. J.A. Corry has pointed out, our country is increasingly moving away from the older classical federalism of 'water-tight compartments' with provincial legislatures and federal parliament carefully keeping clear of one another. We seem to be moving towards a co-operative federalism. "The co-ordinate governments no longer work in splendid isolation from one another but are increasingly engaged in cooperative ventures in which each relies heavily on the other." See J.A. Corry, "Constitutional Trends and Federalism", in the volume of essays Evolving Canadian Federalism (Durham, N.C., U.S.A., 1958), p. 96. The multiplication of concurrent fields is one of the facets of this trend.

In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other. The courts are well able to prevent double recovery in the theoretical and unlikely event of plaintiffs trying to obtain relief under both sets of provisions. The fact that a court must authorize proceedings under the Ontario Act provides a safeguard against double recovery if the company has already proceeded under the federal Act. In addition the Court at the final stage of finding and quantifying liability could prevent double recovery if in fact compensation and an accounting had already been made by a defendant. No court would permit double recovery.

I find that ss. 113 and 114 of The Securities Act of Ontario are not suspended or rendered inoperative in respect of corporations incorporated under the laws of Canada by ss. 100.4 and 100.5 of the Canada Corporations Act.

As in Ross, Multiple Access v McCutcheon seems to suggest that unless two statutes actually "conflict in operation", the provincial law will remain operable in the face of a potential conflict. The key questions, then, are:

- Does one law say 'yes' and the other says 'no'?
- Are the same citizens … being told to do inconsistent things?
- Is compliance with one defiance of the other?

In sum, per Multiple Access v McCutcheon, the doctrine federal paramountcy has a limited application; duplicative laws, rather than conflicting, are "the ultimate in harmony".

In reading Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121, think about what Justice La Forest adds to the analysis in determining whether the federal paramountcy doctrine should apply.

7.3 Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LA FOREST J. -- The principal issue in this appeal is whether a security interest created pursuant to ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act may constitutionally be subjected to the procedures for enforcement of security interests prescribed by the Saskatchewan Limitation of Civil Rights Act. It also raises the constitutional validity of the relevant provisions of both the federal and provincial Acts.

Facts

The respondent, Arthur Hall, a farmer in Saskatchewan, contracted loans from the appellant Bank of Montreal in the early 1980s. As collateral, Mr. Hall granted two mortgages on his real property in favour of the Bank. The loans were also secured by a security interest in a piece of farm machinery, a 1980 Versatile swather, pursuant to s. 88 of the Bank Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. B-1, subsequently s. 178 of the Banks and Banking Law Revision Act, 1980, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 40, now s. 178 of the Bank Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. B-1.

Mr. Hall defaulted on his loan, and in August 1984, the Bank, pursuant to the provisions of the Bank Act, seized the swather and commenced an action to enforce its real property mortgage loan agreement. By way of defence to the foreclosure proceedings, Mr. Hall alleged that the Bank had not served the Notice of Intention to Seize required under the provisions of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. L-16, and accordingly sought to have the foreclosure proceedings dismissed. He also brought action for cancellation of the security agreement and to recover all monies paid thereon as provided by this Act. The Bank of Montreal countered by alleging that it was not subject to the Act in respect of proceedings taken under the Bank Act.

In November 1985, the parties, by Notice of Motion filed before the Court of Queen's Bench for Saskatchewan, applied for a determination of the question whether the plaintiff, as a chartered bank, was required to comply with The Limitation of Civil Rights Act in enforcing a security interest under the Bank Act.

The Question of Paramountcy

Do sections 178 and 179 of the Bank Act conflict with ss. 19 to 36 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act so as to render inoperative ss. 19 to 36 in respect of security taken pursuant to s. 178 by a chartered bank?

The decision of this Court in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, supra, has delimited the circumstances that will justify application of the doctrine of paramountcy, whereby otherwise validly enacted provincial legislation will be held to be inoperative to the extent that it conflicts with federal legislation. In a widely quoted passage, Dickson J., as he then was, espoused the view that the doctrine of paramountcy would only need to be invoked in instances where it is impossible to comply with both legislative enactments. He stated, at p. 191:

> In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other.

Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon was a case involving duplicative federal and provincial legislation. This Court rejected the view that such enactments could not operate concurrently simply because resort to the one would preclude resort to the other. On the contrary, Dickson J., borrowing the phrase coined by Professor Lederman in his seminal article "The Concurrent Operation of Federal and Provincial Laws in Canada" (1963), 9 McGill L.J. 185, expressed the view that in a federal system such legislation was expressive of the "ultimate in harmony". In the following excerpt Dickson J. provides a cogent and succinct rationale for this view, at pp. 189-90:

> ... the cases where overlapping provincial legislation has not been rendered inoperative cannot be validly distinguished on the basis that in each of them there were elements of difference between the provincial and the federal legislation; there is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament. [Emphasis added.]

On the basis of these principles, the question before me is thus reducible to asking whether there is an "actual conflict in operation" between the Bank Act and The Limitation of Civil Rights Act in the sense that the legislative purpose of Parliament stands to be displaced in the event that the appellant bank is required to defer to the provincial legislation in order to realize on its security. This calls for an examination of the provincial legislation.

As is apparent from s. 20, the purpose of ss. 21 to 35 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act is to prescribe, in a comprehensive manner, the procedure which a secured creditor must follow in Saskatchewan in order to take possession of his security. Failure to follow the prescribed procedure results in the imposition of a sweeping penalty provision; s. 27 provides, in these circumstances, for the determination of the security agreement and the release of the debtor from all liability. I shall assume for the purposes of this appeal that the Court of Appeal correctly interpreted the provision as applying to federally created securities.

The most salient feature of the procedure set out in ss. 21 to 35 of the Act, as I understand it, is that it is designed to ensure that a judge determine the terms and conditions under which a creditor may repossess and seize articles. Section 33 makes this clear. It is a judge who is to decide if, when, and under what circumstances the pledged article is to be returned to the secured party.

The contrast with the comprehensive regime provided for in ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act could not be more striking. The essence of that regime, it hardly needs repeating, is to assign to the bank, on the taking out of the security, right and title to the goods in question, and to confer, on default of the debtor, an immediate right to seize and sell those goods, subject only to the conditions and requirements set out in the Bank Act.

On a comparison of the two enactments, can it be said that there is an "actual conflict in operation" between them, giving that phrase the meaning above described? I am led inescapably to the conclusion that there is. The Bank Act provides that a lender may, on the default of his borrower, seize his security, whereas The Limitation of Civil Rights Act forbids a creditor from immediately repossessing the secured article on pain of determination of the security interest. There could be no clearer instance of a case where compliance with the federal statute necessarily entails defiance of its provincial counterpart. The necessary corollary to this conclusion is that to require the bank to defer to the provincial legislation is to displace the legislative intent of Parliament. As the dissenting judge, Wakeling J., put it in the Court of Appeal, at pp. 34-35:

> The provincial legislation obviously intends that the unqualified right of seizure granted to the bank is to be restricted. It does so by saying a bank may exercise the right of seizure given by s. 178(3) but only by leave of a judge, who will apply criteria formulated by the Province as to when and under what circumstances seizure can take place.
> I do not think it is open to a provincial legislature to qualify in this way a right given and defined in a federal statute; see Attorney-General for Alberta and Winstanley v. Atlas Lumber Co., 1940 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1941] SCR 87, per Duff C.J., at p. 95.

I am not, with respect, dissuaded from this conclusion by the reasoning of the majority in the Court of Appeal to the effect that requiring a bank to defer to the provisions of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act would, in any given instance, have, in all likelihood, the sole effect of delaying the bank's ability to take possession of its security. As Sherstobitoff J.A. put it, at p. 40:

> The Limitations [sic] of Civil Rights Act simply requires that a creditor give notice to a debtor before seizure of property so as to enable the debtor to make application to the court. The application and resulting order may have the effect of delaying the taking of possession by the creditor. It does not affect the amount of the indebtedness or liability for payment of same except in cases of noncompliance with the terms of the Act so as to bring s. 27 into play. Put simply, it requires the Bank to follow certain procedures before realizing upon its security, and nothing more.

The reasoning of the majority on this point cannot be determinative of the question of paramountcy. Such a view, with respect, rests on a misinterpretation of what was said in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon. For, as we have seen, dual compliance will be impossible when application of the provincial statute can fairly be said to frustrate Parliament's legislative purpose. In this instance, as I have already noted, Parliament's legislative purpose in defining the unique security interest created by ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act was manifestly that of creating a security interest susceptible of uniform enforcement by the banks nationwide, that is to say a lending regime sui generis in which, to borrow the phrase of Muldoon J. in Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. R., supra, at p. 159, the "bank obtains and may assert its right to the goods and their proceeds against the world, except as only Parliament itself may reduce or modify those rights" (emphasis added). This, of course, is merely another way of saying that Parliament, in its wisdom, wished to guard against creating a lending regime whereby the rights of the banks would be made to depend solely on provincial legislation governing the realization and enforcement of security interests.

I can only conclude that it was Parliament's manifest legislative purpose that the sole realization scheme applicable to the s. 178 security interest be that contained in the Bank Act itself. Again, as I pointed out earlier, I am firmly of the view that the security interest and realization procedure must, in essence, be viewed as a single whole in that both components of the legislation are fully integral to Parliament's legislative purpose in creating this form of financing. In other words, a s. 178 security interest would no longer be cognizable as such the moment provincial legislation might operate to superadd conditions governing realization over and above those found within the confines of the Bank Act. To allow this would be to set at naught the very purpose behind the creation of the s. 178 security interest.

Accordingly, the determination that there is no repugnancy cannot be made to rest on the sole consideration that, at the end of the day, the bank might very well be able to realize on its security if it defers to the provisions of the provincial legislation. A showing that conflict can be avoided if a provincial Act is followed to the exclusion of a federal Act can hardly be determinative of the question whether the provincial and federal acts are in conflict, and, hence, repugnant. That conclusion, in my view, would simply beg the question. The focus of the inquiry, rather, must be on the broader question whether operation of the provincial Act is compatible with the federal legislative purpose. Absent this compatibility, dual compliance is impossible. Such is the case here. The two statutes differ to such a degree in the approach taken to the problem of realization that the provincial cannot substitute for the federal.

I have dealt with this case on the basis of paramountcy to meet the arguments put forward by counsel. But the issue can, I think, be answered more directly. At the end of the day, I agree with counsel for the Attorney General of Canada that this is simply a case where Parliament, under its power to regulate banking, has enacted a complete code that at once defines and provides for the realization of a security interest. There is no room left for the operation of the provincial legislation and that legislation should, accordingly, be construed as inapplicable to the extent that it trenches on valid federal banking legislation.

In response to the third question, then, I would hold that ss. 19 to 36 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act, if interpreted to include a s. 178 security, conflict with ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act so as to render ss. 19 to 36 inoperative in respect of the security taken pursuant to s. 178 by a chartered bank. To put it another way, ss. 19 to 36 of The Limitation of Civil Rights Act are inapplicable to security taken pursuant to ss. 178 and 179 of the Bank Act.

Disposition

I would allow the appeal and set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and reply to the legal question put to the Chambers Judge in the same manner as he did, with costs throughout.

Unlike the earlier paramountcy cases, in Bank of Montreal v Hall, Justice La Forest makes explicit reference to Parliament's purpose in adopting the conflicting legislation. Following from this, it looks like there are two different questions at play in the application of the federal paramountcy doctrine. In Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, the Court sets out both questions, laying out a clearer framework for applying the doctrine.

7.4 Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

1 MAJOR J. — The question on this appeal is whether Saskatchewan legislation, and in particular s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act, S.S. 2001, c. T-14.1, is sufficiently inconsistent with s. 30 of the federal Tobacco Act, S.C. 1997, c. 13, so as to be rendered inoperative pursuant to the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy. At the end of the hearing, the Court concluded that that question should be answered in the negative and allowed the appeal, with reasons to follow.

I. Facts

2 In 1997, Parliament enacted the Tobacco Act. Section 4 of the statute speaks to its purpose as follows:

> 4. The purpose of this Act is to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern and, in particular,
>
> (a) to protect the health of Canadians in light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases;
> (b) to protect young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products and the consequent dependence on them;
> (c) to protect the health of young persons by restricting access to tobacco products; and
> (d) to enhance public awareness of the health hazards of using tobacco products.

3 Section 19 of the Tobacco Act prohibits the promotion of tobacco products and tobacco product-related brand elements, except as authorized elsewhere in the Tobacco Act or its regulations. Section 18 of the Tobacco Act defines "promotion" as:

> ... a representation about a product or service by any means, whether directly or indirectly, including any communication of information about a product or service and its price and distribution, that is likely to influence and shape attitudes, beliefs and behaviours about the product or service.

4 The provisions that follow s. 19 both prohibit specific types of tobacco product promotion, and permit other types of promotion that s. 19 would otherwise prohibit. Among those provisions, s. 30(1) provides that, "[s]ubject to the regulations, any person may display, at retail, a tobacco product or an accessory that displays a tobacco product-related brand element." Section 30(2) further provides that retailers may post signs indicating the availability and price of tobacco products.

5 On March 11, 2002, The Tobacco Control Act came into force in Saskatchewan. Section 6 of that Act bans all advertising, display and promotion of tobacco or tobacco-related products in any premises in which persons under 18 years of age are permitted.

6 The respondent sued the appellant in the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, seeking two forms of relief: a declaration that s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is inoperative in light of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act, and a declaration that ss. 6 and 7 of The Tobacco Control Act are of no force and effect in light of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The respondent applied pursuant to Rule 188 of The Queen's Bench Rules of Saskatchewan for a summary determination by the court as to whether s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is inoperative in light of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act by virtue of the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy.

III. Analysis

11 The doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy dictates that where there is an inconsistency between validly enacted but overlapping provincial and federal legislation, the provincial legislation is inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency. Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, is often cited for the proposition that there is an inconsistency for the purposes of the doctrine if it is impossible to comply simultaneously with both provincial and federal enactments. Dickson J. (as he then was) wrote, at p. 191:

> In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other.

See also Rio Hotel Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Liquor Licensing Board), 1987 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 59, at p. 65; M & D Farm Ltd. v. Manitoba Agricultural Credit Corp., 1999 CanLII 648 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 961, at paras. 17 and 41-42; and 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 SCR 241, 2001 SCC 40, at para. 35.

12 However, subsequent cases indicate that impossibility of dual compliance is not the sole mark of inconsistency. Provincial legislation that displaces or frustrates Parliament's legislative purpose is also inconsistent for the purposes of the doctrine. In Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121, at p. 155, La Forest J. wrote:

> A showing that conflict can be avoided if a provincial Act is followed to the exclusion of a federal Act can hardly be determinative of the question whether the provincial and federal acts are in conflict, and, hence, repugnant. That conclusion, in my view, would simply beg the question. The focus of the inquiry, rather, must be on the broader question whether operation of the provincial Act is compatible with the federal legislative purpose.

See also Spraytech, at para. 35, and Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, [2001] 3 SCR 113, 2001 SCC 67, at paras. 69-70.

13 This concern about frustration of Parliament's legislative purpose may find its roots in McCutcheon, in which Dickson J. stated, at p. 190:

> ... [T]here is no true repugnancy in the case of merely duplicative provisions since it does not matter which statute is applied; the legislative purpose of Parliament will be fulfilled regardless of which statute is invoked by a remedy-seeker; application of the provincial law does not displace the legislative purpose of Parliament. [Emphasis added.]

14 In my view, the overarching principle to be derived from McCutcheon and later cases is that a provincial enactment must not frustrate the purpose of a federal enactment, whether by making it impossible to comply with the latter or by some other means. In this way, impossibility of dual compliance is sufficient but not the only test for inconsistency.

15 It follows that in determining whether s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act is sufficiently inconsistent with s. 30 of the Tobacco Act so as to be rendered inoperative through the paramountcy doctrine, two questions arise. First, can a person simultaneously comply with s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act and s. 30 of the Tobacco Act? Second, does s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act frustrate Parliament's purpose in enacting s. 30 of the Tobacco Act?

16 Before answering those questions, it is necessary to examine the character of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act.

17 Read in the context of the Tobacco Act as a whole, it is clear that the purpose and effect of s. 30 is to define with greater precision the prohibition on the promotion of tobacco products contained in s. 19. Specifically, it serves to exclude from the wide net of s. 19 promotion by way of retail display. In this way, it is like ss. 22(2), 26(1) and 28(1) of the Tobacco Act, which also exclude from the s. 19 prohibition certain types of tobacco product promotion that it might otherwise capture. This demarcation of the s. 19 prohibition represents a measured approach to protecting "young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products", one of the purposes of the Tobacco Act set out in s. 4.

18 However, in demarcating the scope of the s. 19 prohibition through s. 30, Parliament did not grant, and could not have granted, retailers a positive entitlement to display tobacco products. That is so for two reasons.

19 First, like the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20, before it, the Tobacco Act is directed at a public health evil and contains prohibitions accompanied by penal sanctions. Accordingly, and as the Saskatchewan courts correctly concluded in light of this Court's decision in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, it falls within the scope of Parliament's criminal law power contained in s. 91(27) of the Constitution Act, 1867. It might be noted that no argument was made regarding the possibility that the legislation was adopted under the "peace, order, and good government" clause of s. 91, nor could any have been made, given the concessions on the basis of which this chambers motion proceeded. As the criminal law power is essentially prohibitory in character, provisions enacted pursuant to it, such as s. 30 of the Tobacco Act, do not ordinarily create freestanding rights that limit the ability of the provinces to legislate in the area more strictly than Parliament. This limited reach of s. 91(27) is well understood: see, for example, O'Grady v. Sparling, 1960 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1960] SCR 804; Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5; and Spraytech.

20 Second, it is difficult to imagine how granting retailers a freestanding right to display tobacco products would assist Parliament in providing "a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern" (Tobacco Act, s. 4). To put it slightly differently, an interpretation of s. 30 as granting retailers an entitlement to display tobacco products is unsupported by, and perhaps even contrary to, the stated purposes of the Tobacco Act.

> 21 I do not accept the respondent's argument that Parliament, in enacting s. 30, intended to make the retail display of tobacco products subject only to its own regulations. In my view, to impute to Parliament such an intention to "occup[y] the field" in the absence of very clear statutory language to that effect would be to stray from the path of judicial restraint in questions of paramountcy that this Court has taken since at least O'Grady (p. 820).
> A. Impossibility of Dual Compliance
> 22 It is plain that dual compliance is possible in this case. A retailer can easily comply with both s. 30 of the Tobacco Act and s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act in one of two ways: by admitting no one under 18 years of age on to the premises or by not displaying tobacco or tobacco-related products.
>
> 23 Similarly, a judge called upon to apply one of the statutes does not face any difficulty in doing so occasioned by the existence of the other. The judge, like this Court, can proceed on the understanding that The Tobacco Control Act simply prohibits what Parliament has opted not to prohibit in its own legislation and regulations.
>
> 24 For an impossibility of dual compliance to exist, s. 30 of the Tobacco Act would have to require retailers to do what s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act prohibits — i.e., to display tobacco or tobacco-related products to young persons.
>
> B. Frustration of Legislative Purpose
> 25 Section 6 of The Tobacco Control Act does not frustrate the legislative purpose underlying s. 30 of the Tobacco Act. Both the general purpose of the Tobacco Act (to address a national public health problem) and the specific purpose of s. 30 (to circumscribe the Tobacco Act's general prohibition on promotion of tobacco products set out in s. 19) remain fulfilled. Indeed, s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act appears to further at least two of the stated purposes of the Tobacco Act, namely, "to protect young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products" (s. 4(b)) and "to protect the health of young persons by restricting access to tobacco products" (s. 4(c)).
> 26 The conclusion that s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act does not frustrate the purpose of s. 30 of the Tobacco Act is consistent with the position of the Attorney General of Canada, who intervened in this appeal to submit that the Tobacco Act and The Tobacco Control Act were enacted for the same health-related purposes and that there is no inconsistency between the two provisions at issue. While the submissions of the federal government are obviously not determinative of the legal question of inconsistency, there is precedent from this Court for bearing in mind the other level of government's position in resolving federalism issues: see Kitkatla Band v. British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture), [2002] 2 SCR 146, 2002 SCC 31, at paras. 72-73.
> IV. Conclusion
> 27 There is no inconsistency between s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act and s. 30 of the Tobacco Act that would render the former inoperative pursuant to the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy. The appeal is allowed with costs to the appellant throughout.
>
> 28 The constitutional question is answered as follows:
>
> Is s. 6 of The Tobacco Control Act, S.S. 2001, c. T-14.1, constitutionally inoperative under the doctrine of federal legislative paramountcy, having regard to s. 30 of the Tobacco Act, S.C. 1997, c. 13?
>
> No.
> Appeal allowed with costs.

Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan leaves us with two questions to determine whether federal paramountcy applies so that a provincial law is inoperable.

- First, is there an impossibility of dual compliance?
- Second, does the operation of the provincial law frustrate Parliament's purpose in adopting the legislation?

If the answer to either of the questions is yes, the provincial law ceases to operate to the extent of the conflict. Remember, where that is the case, the law is merely inoperable to the extent of the conflict, and not invalid.

7.5 Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51

One of the more recent developments at the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to federal paramountcy deals with a conflict between the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act and Alberta's Traffic Safety Act. Moloney was driving uninsured in Alberta and injured someone in a car accident. The Province of Alberta compensated the injured person and then sought to recover that amount from Moloney. He made an assignment into bankruptcy and was ultimately discharged. According to the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, upon discharge from bankruptcy, Moloney was released from all debts that were claims provable in bankruptcy. However, the provincial Traffic Safety Act, which governs driving, permits the Province of Alberta to suspend licenses and permits until such compensated amounts are paid. Alberta suspended Moloney's license and vehicle permits. Moloney argued that the provincial Act frustrated the federal purpose of bankruptcy. Alberta argued that the provincial Act was regulatory in nature and did not purport to enforce a discharged debt.

In reading the following excerpt, consider whether and how Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, changes the federal paramountcy doctrine. Justice Gascon authored the majority judgment.

> [2] The alleged conflict in this case concerns, on the one hand, the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), and on the other hand, Alberta's Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6 ("TSA"). It stems from a car accident caused by the respondent while he was uninsured, contrary to s. 54 of the TSA. The province of Alberta compensated the individual injured in the accident and sought to recover the amount of the compensation from the respondent. The latter, however, made an assignment in bankruptcy and was eventually discharged. The BIA governs bankruptcy and provides that, upon discharge, the respondent is released from all debts that are claims provable in bankruptcy. The TSA governs the activity of driving, including vehicle permits and driver's licences, and allows the province to suspend the respondent's licence and permits until he pays the amount of the compensation.
> [3] As a result of his bankruptcy and subsequent discharge, the respondent did not pay the amount of the compensation in full; because of this failure to pay, Alberta suspended his vehicle permits and driver's licence. The respondent contested this suspension, arguing that the TSA conflicted with the BIA, in that it frustrated the purposes of bankruptcy. The province replied that there was no conflict since the TSA was regulatory in nature and did not purport to enforce a discharged debt. The Court of Queen's Bench and the Court of Appeal found that there was a conflict between the federal and provincial laws. Relying on the doctrine of federal paramountcy, they declared the impugned provision of the TSA to be inoperative to the extent of the conflict. I agree with the outcome reached by the lower courts, and I would dismiss the appeal.
> II. Facts

[4] The car accident caused by the respondent occurred in 1989. In 1996, the individual injured in the accident obtained judgment against the respondent in the amount of $194,875. The Administrator appointed under the Motor Vehicle Accident Claims Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. M-22 ("MVACA"), indemnified the injured party for the amount of the judgment debt and was assigned the debt in accordance with the MVACA. Initially, the respondent made arrangements with the Administrator to pay the debt in instalments. Some years later, however, in January 2008, he made an assignment in bankruptcy. He listed the Administrator's claim in his Statement of Affairs. It is not disputed that the judgment debt assigned to the Administrator was a claim provable in bankruptcy. It was, by far, the respondent's most substantial debt and, in fact, the reason for his financial difficulties. At the time of the assignment, the outstanding amount due to the Administrator stood at $195,823.

[5] In June 2011, the respondent obtained an absolute discharge, which no one opposed. In October of the same year, he received a letter from the Director, Driver Fitness and Monitoring, notifying him that, by application of s. 102(1) of the TSA, his operator's licence and vehicle registration privileges would be suspended until payment of the outstanding amount of the judgment debt. Later, in November, his lawyer received another letter, this time from Motor Vehicle Accident Recoveries, advising the respondent that he "remains indebted for the judgment debt obtained against him . . . 'until the judgment is satisfied or discharged, otherwise than by a discharge in bankruptcy'" (A.R., at p. 49). The letter proposed that new payment arrangements be made, failing which the suspension of his driving privileges would continue.

[6] Given this situation, in March 2012, the respondent sought an order from the Court of Queen's Bench to stay the suspension of his driving privileges. He claimed that he had been discharged in bankruptcy and that s. 178 of the BIA precluded the Administrator from enforcing the judgment debt.

[12] The Chief Justice formulated the following constitutional question:

> Is s. 102(2) of the Alberta Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6, constitutionally inoperative by reason of the doctrine of federal paramountcy?

[14] Each level of government — Parliament, on the one hand, and the provincial legislatures, on the other — has exclusive authority to enact legislation with respect to certain subject matters. Sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 assign each power to the level of government best suited to exercise it: Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 58. Broad powers were given to the provincial legislatures with respect to local matters, in recognition of regional diversity, while powers relating to matters of national importance were given to Parliament, to ensure unity: Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, at para. 22.

[15]Legislative powers are exclusive, and one government is not subordinate to the other: Secession Reference, at para. 58, citing Re the Initiative and Referendum Act, 1919 CanLII 426 (UK JCPC), [1919] A.C. 935 (P.C.), at p. 942. However, the legislative matrix is not as clearly defined as ss. 91 and 92 might suggest. It is often impossible for one level of government to legislate effectively within its jurisdiction without affecting matters that are within the other level's jurisdiction: Western Bank, at para. 29; H. Brun, G. Tremblay and E. Brouillet, Droit constitutionnel (6th ed. 2014), at p. 465. Furthermore, it is often impossible to make a statute fall squarely within a single head of power: Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, at pp. 180-81. This leads to overlap in the exercise of provincial and federal powers. The tendency has been to allow these overlaps to occur as long as each level of government properly pursues objectives that fall within its jurisdiction: Reference re Securities Act, 2011 SCC 66, [2011] 3 SCR 837, at para. 57; Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 SCR 134, at para. 62; Western Bank, at paras. 37 and 42. This tendency reflects the theory of co-operative federalism: Western Bank, at para. 24; Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 453, at para. 162.

[16] That said, there comes a point where legislative overlap jeopardizes the balance between unity and diversity. In certain circumstances, the powers of one level of government must be protected against intrusions, even incidental ones, by the other level: Western Bank, at para. 32. To protect against such intrusions, the Court has developed various constitutional doctrines. For the purposes of this appeal, I need only refer to one: the doctrine of federal paramountcy. This doctrine "recognizes that where laws of the federal and provincial levels come into conflict, there must be a rule to resolve the impasse": Western Bank, at para. 32. When there is a genuine "inconsistency" between federal and provincial legislation, that is, when "the operational effects of provincial legislation are incompatible with federal legislation", the federal law prevails: Marine Services International Ltd. v. Ryan Estate, 2013 SCC 44, [2013] 3 SCR 53, at para. 65, quoting Western Bank, at para. 69; see also Marine Services, at paras. 66-68; Multiple Access, at p. 168. The question thus becomes how to determine whether such a conflict exists.

[17] First and foremost, it is necessary to ensure that the overlapping federal and provincial laws are independently valid: Western Bank, at para. 76; Husky Oil, at para. 87. This means determining the pith and substance of the impugned provisions by looking at their purpose and effect: Western Bank, at para. 27; Reference re Firearms Act (Can.), 2000 SCC 31, [2000] 1 SCR 783, at para. 16. Once a provision's true purpose is identified, its validity will depend on whether it falls within the powers of the enacting government: Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, 2001 SCC 67, [2001] 3 SCR 113, at para. 24. If the legislation of one level of government is invalid, no conflict can ever arise, which puts an end to the inquiry. If both laws are independently valid, however, the court must determine whether their concurrent operation results in a conflict.

[18] A conflict is said to arise in one of two situations, which form the two branches of the paramountcy test: (1) there is an operational conflict because it is impossible to comply with both laws, or (2) although it is possible to comply with both laws, the operation of the provincial law frustrates the purpose of the federal enactment.

[19] What is considered to be the first branch of the test was described as follows in Multiple Access, the seminal decision of the Court on this issue:

> In principle, there would seem to be no good reasons to speak of paramountcy and preclusion except where there is actual conflict in operation as where one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no"; "the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things"; compliance with one is defiance of the other. [Emphasis added; p. 191.]

In Western Bank, Binnie and LeBel JJ. referred to this passage as "the fundamental test for determining whether there is sufficient incompatibility to trigger the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy" (para. 71). Under that test, the question is whether there is an actual conflict in operation, that is, whether both laws "can operate side by side without conflict" (Marine Services, at para. 76) or whether both "laws can apply concurrently, and citizens can comply with either of them without violating the other": Western Bank, at para. 72; see also Sun Indalex Finance, LLC v. United Steelworkers, 2013 SCC 6, [2013] 1 SCR 271, at para. 60; Marine Services, at para. 68; British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 SCR 86, at paras. 77 and 81-82; Garland v. Consumers' Gas Co., 2004 SCC 25, [2004] 1 SCR 629, at para. 53; Smith v. The Queen, 1960 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1960] SCR 776, at p. 800, per Martland J.

[20] In her concurring reasons, my colleague Côté J. formulates this first branch of the test as impossibility of dual compliance as a result of or caused by "an express conflict" (paras. 93 and 122). She cites in support (paras. 102-3) this Court's use of the terms "express contradiction" in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40, [2001] 2 SCR 241, at para. 34, and M & D Farm Ltd. v. Manitoba Agricultural Credit Corp., 1999 CanLII 648 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 961, at para. 17, as well as the use by Bastarache J. of the terms "express or 'operational conflict'" in Western Bank (para. 126) and Lafarge (para. 113). She insists that under this first branch, the express conflict or express contradiction must be found merely on the basis of the "actual words" of the provisions at issue (paras. 105 and 108) and their "literal" sense or requirement (para. 97). She considers that prior cases in which this Court found that an operational conflict existed either mischaracterized the test (at paras. 116-17, she cites Lafarge) or conflated it with the second branch pertaining to frustration of purpose (at paras. 115 and 118, she cites Husky Oil and M & D Farm).

[21] I respectfully disagree with these propositions and with my colleague's assessment of this Court's past cases on the first branch of the paramountcy test. I would not characterize these as being "not helpful authority" (para. 118) and as having "confused" the two branches (para. 114). Rather, in my view, this Court's decisions on operational conflict have been coherent and consistent since Multiple Access.

[22] First, the expression "express contradiction" used in those cases originated in Multiple Access. Dickson J. initially used it — at p. 187, in discussing prior decisions of the Court — to describe the test that he ultimately formulated, in the above-quoted passage, as that of "actual conflict in operation" or operational conflict (p. 191). An express contradiction is nothing more than a clear, direct or definite conflict in operation, as opposed to an indirect or imprecise one. It is not an additional condition for a finding of actual conflict in operation.

[23] Second, I find no indication in the Court's decisions pertaining to this first branch that the assessment of an actual conflict in operation is limited to the actual words or to the literal meaning of the words of the provisions at issue; quite the contrary. In its recent decision in Marine Services for instance, in assessing whether there was an actual conflict in operation under the first branch (paras. 71-83), the Court did not limit itself to a mere literal reading of the provisions at issue. Rather, it found that a proper reading of the provisions based on the modern approach to statutory interpretation (paras. 77-79) led to the conclusion that the provincial and federal laws could operate side by side without conflict (para. 76). With respect, my colleague misreads my remarks when she states that I support in this regard a broad interpretation of ambiguous federal statutes under this first branch (paras. 111-13). This is not so. Marine Services emphasizes that it is the proper meaning of the provision that remains central to the analysis, not merely its literal sense. As I explain below, the provisions at issue in this case are not ambiguous, and I do not give them a broad interpretation to find their ordinary and undisputed meaning. The harmonious interpretation referred to by my colleague is a rule of constitutional interpretation that applies to both branches of the paramountcy test, not merely the first one: Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 SCR 419, at para. 68. It has, however, no bearing on the actual conflict in operation that is, in my view, established here when both laws operate.

[24] Finally, I consider that in Husky Oil (para. 87) and M & D Farm (para. 40), Gonthier J. and Binnie J. respectively referred to the "actual conflict in operation" concept drawn from Multiple Access without confusing the two branches of the paramountcy test. As for the reasons of Binnie and LeBel JJ. in Lafarge, issued on the same day as Western Bank (in which they also penned the majority reasons), I find it hard to suggest that they misstated the test or conflated its two branches, which they in fact analyzed separately (the first at paras. 81-82 and the second at paras. 83-85). On operational conflict, their reference to an "impossibility of . . . simultaneous application" (Lafarge, at para. 77) echoed the similar comments made in Western Bank to the effect that the test amounts to assessing whether "the [two] laws can apply concurrently" (Western Bank, at para. 72): see also, on the concept of possible concurrent "application" of both laws, Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 SCR 188, at para. 23.

[25] If there is no conflict under the first branch of the test, one may still be found under the second branch. In Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121, the Court formulated what is now considered to be the second branch of the test. It framed the question as being "whether operation of the provincial Act is compatible with the federal legislative purpose" (p. 155). In other words, the effect of the provincial law may frustrate the purpose of the federal law, even though it does "not entail a direct violation of the federal law's provisions": Western Bank, at para. 73.

[26] That said, the case law assists in identifying typical situations where overlapping legislation will not lead to a conflict. For instance, duplicative federal and provincial provisions will generally not conflict: Bank of Montreal v. Marcotte, 2014 SCC 55, [2014] 2 SCR 725, at para. 80; Western Bank, at para. 72; Multiple Access, at p. 190; Hall, at p. 151. Nor will a conflict arise where a provincial law is more restrictive than a federal law: Lemare Lake, at para. 25; Marine Services, at paras. 76 and 84; Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 SCR 536 ("COPA"), at paras. 67 and 74; Western Bank, at para. 103; Rothmans, at paras. 18 ff.; Spraytech, at para. 35; Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, at p. 964. The application of a more restrictive provincial law may, however, frustrate the federal purpose if the federal law, instead of being merely permissive, provides for a positive entitlement: Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Human Resources and Social Development), 2011 SCC 60, [2011] 3 SCR 635, at paras. 32-33 and 36; Lafarge, at paras. 84-85; Mangat, at para. 72; Hall, at p. 153. As will become evident from the discussion below, this appeal involves two laws that directly contradict each other, rather than a provincial law which does not fully contradict the federal one, but is only more restrictive than it: see M & D Farm; Clarke v. Clarke, 1990 CanLII 86 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 795.

[27] Be it under the first or the second branch, the burden of proof rests on the party alleging the conflict. Discharging that burden is not an easy task, and the standard is always high. In keeping with co-operative federalism, the doctrine of paramountcy is applied with restraint. It is presumed that Parliament intends its laws to co-exist with provincial laws. Absent a genuine inconsistency, courts will favour an interpretation of the federal legislation that allows the concurrent operation of both laws: Western Bank, at paras. 74-75, citing Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 307 ("Law Society of B.C."), at p. 356; see also Rothmans, at para. 21; O'Grady v. Sparling, 1960 CanLII 70 (SCC), [1960] SCR 804, at pp. 811 and 820. Conflict must be defined narrowly, so that each level of government may act as freely as possible within its respective sphere of authority: Husky Oil, at para. 162, per Iacobucci J. (dissenting, but not on this particular point), referring to Deloitte Haskins and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 785, at pp. 807-8, per Wilson J.

[28] This is not to say, however, that courts must refrain from applying the doctrine where the two laws are genuinely inconsistent. In the assessment of such inconsistency for the purposes of paramountcy, a provincial intention to interfere with the federal jurisdiction is neither necessary nor sufficient. In fact, an intention to intrude may call into question the independent validity of the provincial law: Husky Oil, at paras. 44-45. The focus of the paramountcy analysis is instead on the effect of the provincial law, rather than its purpose:

> ... there need not be any provincial intention to intrude into the exclusive federal sphere of bankruptcy . . . in order to render the provincial law inapplicable. It is sufficient that the effect of provincial legislation is to do so. [Emphasis added.]

(Husky Oil, at para. 39)

Assessing the effect of the provincial law requires looking at the substance of the law, rather than its form. The province cannot do indirectly what it is precluded from doing directly: Husky Oil, at para. 39.

[29] In sum, if the operation of the provincial law has the effect of making it impossible to comply with the federal law, or if it is technically possible to comply with both laws, but the operation of the provincial law still has the effect of frustrating Parliament's purpose, there is a conflict. Such a conflict results in the provincial law being inoperative, but only to the extent of the conflict with the federal law: Western Bank, at para. 69; Rothmans, at para. 11; Mangat, at para. 74. In practice, this means that the provincial law remains valid, but will be read down so as to not conflict with the federal law, though only for as long as the conflict exists: Husky Oil, at para. 81; E. Colvin, "Constitutional Law — Paramountcy — Duplication and Express Contradiction — Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon" (1983), 17 U.B.C. L. Rev. 347, at p. 348.

[…]

[31] The first step of the analysis is to ensure that the impugned federal and provincial provisions are independently valid. Early in the proceedings, the parties recognized the validity of the relevant provisions of the BIA and the TSA. Before this Court, they again conceded the validity of both laws. The only question is whether their concurrent operation results in a conflict. This requires analyzing the legislative schemes at issue at the outset so as to reach a proper understanding of the provisions that are allegedly in conflict.

(a) The Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act

[32] Parliament enacted the BIA pursuant to its jurisdiction over matters of bankruptcy and insolvency under s. 91(21) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The BIA, notably through the specific provisions discussed below, furthers two purposes: the equitable distribution of the bankrupt's assets among his or her creditors and the bankrupt's financial rehabilitation (Husky Oil, at para. 7).

[33] The first purpose of bankruptcy, the equitable distribution of assets, is achieved through a single proceeding model. Under this model, creditors of the bankrupt wishing to enforce a claim provable in bankruptcy must participate in one collective proceeding. This ensures that the assets of the bankrupt are distributed fairly amongst the creditors. As a general rule, all creditors rank equally and share rateably in the bankrupt's assets: s. 141 of the BIA; Husky Oil, at para. 9. In Century Services Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 SCC 60, [2010] 3 SCR 379, at para. 22, the majority of the Court, per Deschamps J., explained the underlying rationale for this model:

> The single proceeding model avoids the inefficiency and chaos that would attend insolvency if each creditor initiated proceedings to recover its debt. Grouping all possible actions against the debtor into a single proceeding controlled in a single forum facilitates negotiation with creditors because it places them all on an equal footing, rather than exposing them to the risk that a more aggressive creditor will realize its claims against the debtor's limited assets while the other creditors attempt a compromise.
> Avoiding inefficiencies and chaos, and favouring an orderly collective process, maximizes global recovery for all creditors: Husky Oil, at para. 7; R. J. Wood, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law (2009), at p. 3.

[34] For this model to be viable, creditors must not be allowed to enforce their provable claims individually, that is, outside the collective proceeding. Section 69.3 of the BIA thus provides for an automatic stay of proceedings, which is effective as of the first day of bankruptcy:

> 69.3 (1) Subject to subsections (1.1) and (2) and sections 69.4 and 69.5, on the bankruptcy of any debtor, no creditor has any remedy against the debtor or the debtor's property, or shall commence or continue any action, execution or other proceedings, for the recovery of a claim provable in bankruptcy.

(See R. v. Fitzgibbon, 1990 CanLII 102 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1005, at pp. 1015-16.)

[35] Yet there are exceptions to the principle of equitable distribution. Section 136 of the BIA provides that some creditors will be paid in priority. These creditors are referred to as "preferred creditors". There are also creditors that are paid only after all ordinary creditors have been satisfied: ss. 137(1), 139 and 140.1 of the BIA. Furthermore, the automatic stay of proceedings does not prevent secured creditors from realizing their security interest: s. 69.3(2) of the BIA; Husky Oil, at para. 9. A court may also grant leave permitting a creditor to begin separate proceedings and enforce a claim: s. 69.4 of the BIA. These exceptions reflect the policy choices made by Parliament in furthering this purpose of bankruptcy.

[36] The second purpose of the BIA, the financial rehabilitation of the debtor, is achieved through the discharge of the debtor's outstanding debts at the end of the bankruptcy: Husky Oil, at para. 7. Section 178(2) of the BIA provides:

> (2) Subject to subsection (1), an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy.

From the perspective of the creditors, the discharge means they are unable to enforce their provable claims: Schreyer v. Schreyer, 2011 SCC 35, [2011] 2 SCR 605, at para. 21. This, in effect, gives the insolvent person a "fresh start", in that he or she is "freed from the burdens of pre-existing indebtedness": Wood, at p. 273; see also Industrial Acceptance Corp. v. Lalonde, 1952 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1952] 2 SCR 109, at p. 120. This fresh start is not only designed for the well-being of the bankrupt debtor and his or her family; rehabilitation helps the discharged bankrupt to reintegrate into economic life so he or she can become a productive member of society: Wood, at pp. 274-75; L. W. Houlden, G. B. Morawetz and J. Sarra, Bankruptcy and Insolvency Law of Canada (4th ed. rev. (loose-leaf)), at p. 6-283. In many cases of consumer bankruptcy, the debtor has very few or no assets to distribute to his or her creditors. In those cases, rehabilitation becomes the primary objective of bankruptcy: Wood, at p. 37.

[37] Although it is an important purpose of the BIA, financial rehabilitation also has its limits. Section 178(1) of the BIA lists debts that are not released by discharge and that survive bankruptcy. Furthermore, s. 172 provides that an order of discharge may be denied, suspended, or granted subject to conditions. These provisions demonstrate Parliament's attempt to balance financial rehabilitation with other policy objectives, such as confidence in the credit system, that require certain debts to survive bankruptcy: Wood, at pp. 273 and 289.

[38] Discharge is the main rehabilitative tool contained in the BIA, but it is not the only one. As Professor Wood, at p. 273, observes:

> The bankruptcy discharge is one of the primary mechanisms through which bankruptcy law attempts to provide for the economic rehabilitation of the debtor. However, it is not the only means by which bankruptcy law seeks to meet this objective. The exclusion of exempt property from distribution to creditors, the surplus income provisions, and mandatory credit counselling also are directed towards this goal.

[39] Another means of rehabilitation is the automatic stay of proceedings contained in s. 69.3 of the BIA. The stay not only ensures that creditors are redirected into the collective proceeding described above, it also ensures that creditors are precluded from seizing property that is exempt from distribution to creditors. This is an important part of the bankrupt's financial rehabilitation:

> The rehabilitation of the bankrupt is not the result only of his discharge. It begins when he is put into bankruptcy with measures designed to give him the minimum needed for subsistence.

(Vachon v. Canada Employment and Immigration Commission, 1985 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 417, at p. 430)

[40] In many aspects, the BIA is a complete code governing bankruptcy. It sets out which claims are treated as provable claims and which assets are distributed to creditors, and how. It then sets out which claims are released on discharge and which claims survive bankruptcy. That said, the fact remains that the operation of the BIA depends upon the survival of various provincial rights: Husky Oil, at para. 85; Hall, at p. 155. In this regard, s. 72(1) of the BIA provides:

> 72. (1) The provisions of this Act shall not be deemed to abrogate or supersede the substantive provisions of any other law or statute relating to property and civil rights that are not in conflict with this Act, and the trustee is entitled to avail himself of all rights and remedies provided by that law or statute as supplementary to and in addition to the rights and remedies provided by this Act.

On the one hand, given the procedural nature of the BIA, the bankruptcy regime relies heavily on the continued existence of provincial substantive rights, and thus the continued operation of provincial laws: Wood, at pp. 7-8; Husky Oil, at para. 30. The ownership of certain assets and the existence of particular liabilities depend upon provincial law: P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 25-8. On the other hand, the BIA cannot operate without affecting property and civil rights. Section 72(1) confirms this by stating that, where there is a genuine inconsistency between provincial laws regarding property and civil rights and federal bankruptcy legislation, the BIA prevails: see GMAC Commercial Credit Corp. — Canada v. T.C.T. Logistics Inc., 2006 SCC 35, [2006] 2 SCR 123, at para. 47.

[41] In the context of this appeal, we are specifically concerned with an alleged conflict between, on the one hand, one provision of the BIA, namely s. 178, the purpose of which is to ensure the financial rehabilitation of the debtor, and, on the other hand, one provision (s. 102) of the provincial scheme, to which I will now turn.

(b) The Alberta Traffic Safety Act

[42] The TSA is the provincial scheme with which the BIA is alleged to conflict. Pursuant to s. 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1867, provincial legislatures have the power to legislate with regard to property and civil rights. The Court has long recognized that this power includes traffic regulation and the authority to set conditions for driver's licences and vehicle permits: Ross v. Registrar of Motor Vehicles, 1973 CanLII 176 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 5, at pp. 13-14; O'Grady, at p. 810; Provincial Secretary of Prince Edward Island v. Egan, 1941 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1941] SCR 396, at pp. 402 and 415; see also Thomson v. Alberta (Transportation and Safety Board), 2003 ABCA 256, 232 D.L.R. (4th) 237, at para. 25. The TSA is a comprehensive legislative scheme for traffic regulation, "covering virtually all aspects of the regulation of highways and motor vehicles in Alberta", with the aim of ensuring road safety: Thomson, at para. 5; Alberta Legislative Assembly, Alberta Hansard, 3rd Sess., 24th Leg., April 12, 1999, at p. 927.

[43] Under s. 54(1) of the TSA, no one is allowed to drive or have a motor vehicle on a public road unless the vehicle is insured. Under s. 54(4), a person who contravenes s. 54(1) is liable to a fine or imprisonment. The Registrar of Motor Vehicle Services may also disqualify a person from driving and cancel his or her vehicle registration until that person shows proof of insurance: s. 54(5) and (7).

[44] In the event that an uninsured driver causes an accident, Alberta has implemented a compensation program governed by the MVACA. A victim injured in the accident may sue the uninsured driver for damages. If the victim is successful but the uninsured driver does not pay, the victim may then apply to the Administrator under the MVACA for compensation in the amount of the unsatisfied judgment: s. 5(1). If authorized, the payment is drawn from the General Revenue Fund of the province: s. 5(2). The judgment is then assigned to the Administrator, who can take steps to enforce it against the judgment debtor. The Administrator is thus deemed to be the judgment creditor: s. 5(7).

[45] Section 102 of the TSA, the provision at issue in this appeal, complements the MVACA program. It allows the Registrar to suspend the debtor's driver's licence and vehicle permits until the judgment debt is paid, up to a maximum amount of $200,000:

[…]

(2) The Conflict Between the BIA and the TSA

(a) Operational Conflict

[60] The Court of Appeal concluded that there was no operational conflict, although it used that term throughout its judgment in reference to conflict generally. It explained that the respondent could resist the payment by foregoing his driving privileges and choosing not to drive (para. 10). The reasons of the Court of Appeal, as well as the submissions of the parties, save for those of the Superintendent of Bankruptcy, relate almost exclusively to the second branch of the applicable test. I believe the Court of Appeal and the parties are mistaken on this point. I therefore respectfully disagree with my colleague Côté J., who holds in her concurring reasons that there is no operational conflict, since a bankrupt "can either opt not to drive or voluntarily pay the discharged debt" (para. 123). In a case like this one, the test for operational conflict cannot be limited to asking whether the respondent can comply with both laws by renouncing the protection afforded to him or her under the federal law or the privilege he or she is otherwise entitled to under the provincial law. In that regard, the debtor's response to the suspension of his or her driving privileges is not determinative. In analyzing the operational conflict at issue in this case, we cannot disregard the fact that whether the debtor pays or not, the province, as a creditor, is still compelling payment of a provable claim that has been released, which is in direct contradiction with s. 178(2) of the BIA:

> If [the respondent] pays the debt, then the provincial law will have required him to pay a debt that has been released by the federal law. If [he] does not pay the debt, then the provincial law will have punished him — by withholding his driver's licence — for failing to pay a debt that has been released by the federal law.

(Gorguis v. Saskatchewan Government Insurance, 2011 SKQB 132, 372 Sask. R. 152, at para. 25; sent back for rehearing by the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, which did not address the court's comments on this point (2013 SKCA 32, 414 Sask. R. 5).)

Thus, the laws at issue give inconsistent answers to the question whether there is an enforceable obligation: one law says yes and the other says no.

[61] On the one hand, s. 178(2) of the BIA provides that "an order of discharge releases the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy". In my view, it is undisputed that a discharge under s. 178 of the BIA releases a debtor, thus preventing creditors from enforcing claims that are provable in bankruptcy. My colleague appears to suggest (at para. 96) that, since the actual words of the section say "nothing more" than that the bankrupt is discharged, or since the discharge merely releases provable claims, an interpretation to the effect that the release of such claims means that they cannot be enforced would "add words to the provision". With respect, this amounts to depriving the words of s. 178(2) of their obvious and ordinary meaning. In Schreyer, LeBel J. wrote that, "[a]s is clear from the words of s. 178(2) BIA, the discharge operates to release the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy". He added that, "[f]or creditors, the discharge means that they 'cease to be able to enforce claims against the bankrupt that are provable in bankruptcy'" (para. 21). I know of no authority that suggests that the words "order of discharge" or "releases" in that context mean anything other than that the provable claim is unenforceable. To give the words used in s. 178(2) their proper meaning is not to interpret the provision broadly.

[62] On the other hand, s. 102(2) of the TSA empowers the province to continue to pressure a debtor by withholding his or her driving privileges "until the judgment is satisfied or discharged, otherwise than by a discharge in bankruptcy". As I mentioned above in my analysis of the legislative schemes, the language of this provision is clear: it provides for the satisfaction of the judgment debt by excluding the impact of a discharge in bankruptcy.

[63] One law consequently provides for the release of all claims provable in bankruptcy and prohibits creditors from enforcing them, while the other disregards this release and allows for the use of a debt enforcement mechanism on such a claim by precisely excluding a discharge in bankruptcy. This is a true incompatibility. Both laws cannot operate concurrently (Sun Indalex, at para. 60; Lafarge, at para. 82; M & D Farm, at para. 41; Multiple Access, at p. 191), "apply concurrently" (Western Bank, at para. 72) or "operate side by side without conflict" (Marine Services, at para. 76). The facts of this appeal indeed show an actual conflict in operation of the two provisions. This is a case where the provincial law says "yes" ("Alberta can enforce this provable claim"), while the federal law says "no" ("Alberta cannot enforce this provable claim"). The provincial law gives the province a right that the federal law denies, and maintains a liability from which the debtor has been released under the federal law. This conflict can hardly be characterized as "indirect" as my colleague suggests (paras. 92 and 128). Nor can I characterize as merely "implicit" the clear prohibition in s. 178(2) against enforcing provable claims that have been discharged. It is not in dispute that s. 178(2) is a prohibitive provision; considering the meaning of the words "order of discharge" and "releases", what the provision "exactly" prohibits is the enforcement of discharged provable claims. There is no other "possible ramification" in terms of what this section prohibits.

[64] There was indeed much discussion about the effect of a discharge in the parties' submissions. To avoid a finding of conflict, Alberta submitted that in bankruptcy, the debt is not extinguished but merely "released". It asserted that the BIA precludes only the "civil enforcement" of the debt through "civil process"; it does not affect the province's ability to insist on licensing requirements.

[65] In Schreyer, LeBel J. described the effect of discharge. While recognizing that the debt is not extinguished, he explained that a discharge prevents creditors from enforcing those claims that are provable in bankruptcy:

> ... every claim is swept into the bankruptcy and . . . the bankrupt is released from all of them upon being discharged unless the law sets out a clear exclusion or exemption. ...

The only reservation I have with the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case at bar relates to its numerous statements that the operation of s. 178(2) BIA has the effect of "extinguishing" the equalization claim. With respect, this provision does not purport to extinguish claims that are provable in bankruptcy pursuant to s. 121 BIA, but "releases" the debtor from such claims: see, on this point, Re Kryspin (1983), 1983 CanLII 1703 (ON SC), 40 O.R. (2d) 424 (H.C.J.), at pp. 438-39; and Ross, Re (2003), 2003 CanLII 64260 (ON SC), 50 C.B.R. (4th) 274 (Ont. S.C.J.), at para. 15. As is clear from the words of s. 178(2) BIA, the discharge operates to release the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy. For creditors, the discharge means that they "cease to be able to enforce claims against the bankrupt that are provable in bankruptcy". [Emphasis added; paras 20-21.]

(Citing Houlden, Morawetz and Sarra, at p. 6-283.)

[66] This description is consistent with the term "releases" found in s. 178(2), which means "[l]iberation from an obligation, duty, or demand; the act of giving up a right or claim to the person against whom it could have been enforced": Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014), at p. 1480. As a result of s. 178(2), creditors are deemed to give up their right to enforce their provable claims. The verb "enforce", as used by LeBel J. and Houlden, Morawetz and Sarra, means "to compel obedience": Black's Law Dictionary, at p. 645. The non-extinguishment of the debt may be relevant in some cases, such as those involving the liability of a third party (see Buchanan v. Superline Fuels Inc., 2007 NSCA 68, 255 N.S.R. (2d) 286; Miller, Re (2001), 2001 CanLII 28479 (ON SC), 27 C.B.R. (4th) 107 (Ont. S.C.J.)). This is, however, of no practical relevance to this appeal. Section 178(2) is clear: a creditor cannot compel the debtor to pay a debt that was released on discharge.

[67] In this appeal, the payment which the province seeks to recover is a provable claim. In substance, the purpose and effect of s. 102 are to compel payment of that provable claim. That claim was properly released, since neither the province's judgment debt, nor the resulting regulatory charge, is exempt from discharge under s. 178(1). As a provable claim is subject to s. 178(2), the province is precluded from compelling payment of the judgment debt.

[68] Contrary to the appellant's contention, nothing suggests that s. 178(2) merely precludes civil enforcement of provable claims. Accepting the appellant's argument would amount to adding words to the provision that do not exist, and that the legislator did not include. While being expressly precluded from compelling payment of a discharged provable claim, the province could create an administrative scheme that had the effect of coercing a discharged debtor to pay a debt that has been released. The appellant's argument must be rejected. Pursuant to s. 178(2) of the BIA, creditors are precluded from compelling payment of a claim provable in bankruptcy, through either civil or administrative processes.

[69] Neither can the question under the operational conflict branch of the paramountcy test be whether it is possible to refrain from applying the provincial law in order to avoid the alleged conflict with the federal law. To argue that the province is not required to use s. 102 in the context of bankruptcy, or that it can choose not to withhold the respondent's driving privileges, leads to a superficial application of the operational conflict test. To suggest that a conflict can be avoided by complying with the federal law to the exclusion of the provincial law cannot be a valid answer to the question whether there is "actual conflict in operation", as the majority of the Court put it in Multiple Access: see also COPA, at para. 64. To so conclude would render the first branch of the paramountcy test meaningless, since it is virtually always possible to avoid the application of a provincial law so as not to cause a conflict with a federal law. Furthermore, any provincial law that could survive the first branch under the latter argument would necessarily also survive the second branch. If it is possible to avoid operational conflict simply by declining to apply the provincial law, the same could be done to avoid any frustration of the federal purpose under the second branch.

[70] In fact, this would be tantamount to rendering the provincial law inoperative to the extent of the conflict even before a conflict is found. Under the doctrine of paramountcy, this is precisely the remedy that courts grant once a conflict is found; it is not a tool courts can use to avoid finding a conflict. The remedy of not applying the provincial law cannot be determinative of whether a conflict exists in the first place. In this case, whether or not the province has discretion not to apply s. 102 is irrelevant: see Lafarge, at para. 75. The province chose to take advantage of the scheme. The question is whether it can do so while also complying with the BIA.

[71] This view, with which my colleague disagrees, appears to me to be consistent with this Court's jurisprudence on operational conflict. For instance, in M & D Farm, the creditor held a mortgage on the debtors' family farm. After defaulting on the mortgage, the debtors obtained a stay of proceedings under the federal Farm Debt Review Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 25 (2nd Supp.). While the stay was still in effect, the creditor sought, and was granted, leave under the provincial Family Farm Protection Act, C.C.S.M., c. F15, which authorized the immediate commencement of foreclosure proceedings. The question arose as to whether there was a conflict between the federal stay and the provincial leave. The Court concluded that there was an operational conflict (pp. 982-85), and this conclusion was later reaffirmed in Lafarge, at para. 82, and again in Lemare Lake, at para. 18. As I read M & D Farm, the fact that the debtors could choose to voluntarily pay the mortgage debt, as my colleague suggests, did not mean that there was no operational conflict. Nor was conflict avoided because the creditor could have chosen not to seek leave to commence foreclosure proceedings. There was an operational conflict because the provincial law expressly authorized the very proceedings that the federal stay precluded.

[72] More recently, in Sun Indalex, Deschamps J., with Moldaver J. concurring, found that there was an operational conflict (the Court was unanimous on this point). On the one hand, there was an order made under the federal Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, which authorized an insolvent company to obtain debtor-in-possession ("DIP") financing and granted priority to the DIP lender. On the other hand, the provincial Personal Property Security Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.10, gave priority to the administrator of the company's employee pension plans: para. 60. Deschamps J. did not avoid the operational conflict by concluding, for instance, that the debtor could have chosen not to seek DIP financing in the first place.

[73] My analysis does not "expan[d] the definition of conflict in the first branch" of the paramountcy test, nor does it "conflat[e]" its two branches, contrary to what my colleague indicates (paras. 93 and 106). In my view, this analysis instead applies the principles developed by this Court on federal paramountcy to the operational conflict situation at issue here, where the federal law includes a prohibition that the provincial law effectively disregards. I discuss the two legislative schemes separately from the application of the two branches of the paramountcy test. My analysis of the operational conflict focuses on the existence of an actual and direct conflict between the provisions at issue. The two branches are not "conflated" simply because, in a situation like the current one, the wording of s. 178(2) and the clear prohibition it contains happen to exemplify the goal behind the provision and one of the key objectives of the BIA, that is, the financial rehabilitation of the debtor. I consider that my colleague's remarks to the effect that impossibility of dual compliance is a "secondary consideration" in my discussion of operational conflict (para. 99) are misplaced as well. The classic statement of the test for operational conflict in Multiple Access that she cites with approval (para. 100) is precisely the one I am relying upon here. It is in light of that statement that I find there is no real possibility of dual compliance as understood by this Court. Indeed, the opposite conclusion would depend on a creditor refusing to apply (or a debtor refusing to comply with) the provincial law, or, alternatively, on a debtor renouncing (or a creditor refusing to comply with) the protection afforded by the federal law. To find a possibility of dual compliance with the conflicting laws at issue — on the basis of hypotheticals that call for "single" compliance, by any one of the actors involved, with one law but not with the other — would be inconsistent with this Court's precedents on federal paramountcy.

[74] In this regard, this case is distinguishable from precedents like Rothmans and COPA, on which my colleague relies. Those cases both dealt with provincial laws that took a more restrictive approach to matters covered by permissive federal laws. In each of them, the relevant statutes were held not to create an operational conflict. In COPA, the federal Aeronautics Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. A-2, allowed private citizens to build airports, while the provincial Act respecting the preservation of agricultural land and agricultural activities, R.S.Q., c. P-41.1, prohibited such activities on agricultural land absent an administrative authorization: para. 8. In Rothmans, s. 30 of the federal Tobacco Act, S.C. 1997, c. 13, permitted the display of tobacco products at retail, while the provincial Tobacco Control Act, S.S. 2001, c. T-14.1, banned the advertising, display and promotion of tobacco products in places where persons under 18 years of age were allowed. Rothmans and COPA did not involve a direct contradiction between the two applicable laws as does the instant case. They merely involved one law that imposed stricter conditions in allowing activities that were also permitted by the government at the other level. In the case at bar, the question with respect to operational conflict is whether debts incurred while driving uninsured can be enforced even though the debtor has been discharged from bankruptcy. On this question, the two laws directly contradict each other.

[75] I therefore conclude that s. 102 of the TSA allows the province, or a third party creditor, to enforce a provable claim that has been released. To that extent, it conflicts with s. 178(2) of the BIA. It is impossible for the province to apply s. 102 without contravening s. 178(2) and, as a result, for the respondent to simultaneously be liable to pay the judgment debt under the provincial scheme and be released from that same claim pursuant to s. 178(2): Lafarge, at para. 82; M & D Farm, at para. 41. Section 178 is a complete code in that it sets out which debts are released on discharge and which debts survive bankruptcy. In effect, s. 102 creates a new class of exempt debts that is not listed in s. 178(1). Hence, in the words used by my colleague in her reasons (paras. 95, 110 and 128), "the provincial law allows the very same thing" — the enforcement of a debt released under s. 178(2) of the BIA — that "the federal law prohibits". The result is an operational conflict between the provincial and federal provisions.

[76] Although this conclusion makes it unnecessary to discuss the second branch of the test, I will nonetheless address it in order to respond to the province's arguments.

(b) Frustration of Federal Purpose

(i) Financial Rehabilitation

[77] Like the lower courts, I find that the province's use of its administrative powers relating to driving privileges to burden the respondent until he repays a discharged debt frustrates the financial rehabilitation of the bankrupt. The effect of s. 102 directly contradicts and defeats the purpose of the discharge provided for in s. 178(2):

> The BIA permits an honest but unfortunate debtor to obtain a discharge from debts subject to reasonable conditions. The Act is designed to permit a bankrupt to receive, after a specified period a complete discharge of all his or her debts in order that he or she may be able to integrate into the business life of the country as a useful citizen free from the crushing burden of debts . . . . [Emphasis added.]

(Houlden, Morawetz and Sarra, at p. 1-2.1)

As explained already, the language of s. 178(2) makes it clear that the purpose of this provision is to give effect to one of the goals underlying the BIA regime — the financial rehabilitation of the debtor — by releasing "the bankrupt from all claims provable in bankruptcy". In other words, s. 178(2) is aimed precisely at providing the bankrupt with a fresh start. The facts of this case establish that the province's use of s. 102 despite the respondent's discharge undermines this purpose.

[78] The respondent was a truck driver. In 1996, after the accident, the province was assigned the judgment rendered against him in the amount of $194,875. In 2008, after attempting to pay the debt in instalments for about 12 years, he made an assignment in bankruptcy. At that time, the outstanding amount of the debt had increased to $195,823; it was, by far, the largest of the respondent's financial liabilities. In 12 years, the respondent had not been able to keep up with his interest payments. The crushing burden of the province's claim against him was the main reason for his bankruptcy. In 2012, at the time his application for discharge was heard, the respondent had only managed to pay the judgment debt down to $192,103.79. By the effect of s. 102, he was exiting bankruptcy while carrying the same financial burden that had caused his bankruptcy four years earlier. If s. 102 is allowed to operate despite the respondent's discharge, the respondent is not offered the opportunity to rehabilitate that Parliament intended to give him. This is particularly compelling in the respondent's case. As a truck driver, his ability to gain a livelihood is tied to his ability to drive. But more generally, inability to drive can constitute a significant impediment to any person's capacity to earn income: see Lucar, Re (2001), 2001 CanLII 28289 (ON SC), 32 C.B.R. (4th) 270 (Ont. S.C.J.), at paras. 22-23.

[79] In furthering financial rehabilitation, Parliament expressly selected which debts survive bankruptcy and which are discharged: s. 178(1) and (2). It did so having regard to competing policy objectives. This is a delicate exercise, because the more claims that survive bankruptcy, the more difficult it becomes for a debtor to rehabilitate: AbitibiBowater, at para. 35; Schreyer, at para. 19. In 1970, the Study Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency Legislation emphasized this concern:

> ... much of the rehabilitative effect of his discharge and release from debts is lost, when a bankrupt is left with substantial debts after his discharge. Indeed, in some cases, it may almost be regarded as a mockery of the bankruptcy system to take all of the sizable property of a debtor, distribute it among the creditors and then leave the debtor to cope with some of his largest creditors from whose debts he has not been released.

(Bankruptcy and Insolvency: Report of the Study Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency Legislation (1970), at para. 3.2.085)

When operating in the context of bankruptcy, s. 102 undermines this balancing exercise and imperils the bankrupt's ability to rehabilitate. In effect, s. 102 creates a new class of debts that survive bankruptcy. As such, it leaves the debtor with a substantial financial liability that was not contemplated by Parliament. Had Parliament intended judgment debts arising from motor vehicle accidents, or the resulting regulatory charges, to survive bankruptcy, it would have stated so expressly in s. 178(1) of the BIA. It did not. Together, s. 178(1) and (2) are comprehensive. It is beyond the province's constitutional authority to interfere with Parliament's discretion in that regard.

[80] Notwithstanding this, Alberta asserts that, like any creditor, the province is allowed to form a new binding contract with the discharged bankrupt for the repayment of the debt. In its view, the respondent's driving privileges can serve as fresh consideration for such a contract. I disagree. Like the Court of Appeal, I conclude that this alleged fresh consideration is neither genuine nor consistent with the purpose of s. 178(2).

[81] As a general rule, a creditor cannot cause a debtor to revive an obligation from which the debtor was released, unless the creditor offers fresh consideration: Wood, at p. 301. Between private parties, it is arguable that a debtor may freely agree to revive a discharged debt in exchange for the creditor's provision of goods or services. The province, however, is unlike any private creditor. While a private creditor is under no obligation to provide goods or services, the province cannot withhold the respondent's driving privileges arbitrarily. Suspension of privileges by administrative bodies must be based on a legal rule: see Roncarelli v. Duplessis, 1959 CanLII 50 (SCC), [1959] SCR 121, at pp. 141-42; British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 SCR 473, at para. 59; Secession Reference, at para. 71; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3, at para. 10. In the case at bar, the effect and purpose of s. 102 are to compel payment of a discharged debt, which conflicts with s. 178(2). As a result, s. 102 is, to that extent, inoperative and cannot ground the province's authority to withhold the respondent's privileges. If those privileges are being suspended on the sole basis that the respondent refuses to satisfy a judgment debt that was released in bankruptcy, the province is acting without authority. The province's promise to refrain from doing what it has no authority to do cannot constitute fresh consideration capable of supporting any contract. This includes a contract for the repayment of a discharged debt. More importantly, the respondent need not enter into such a contract in order to recover his driving privileges, because the province has no authority to withhold them.

[82] Finally, Alberta's other assertion, to the effect that Parliament's power over bankruptcy and insolvency matters does not extend to the regulation of driving privileges, does not entail that the province can withhold those privileges on the basis of an unpaid released debt. In my view, the province is conflating the scope of Parliament's authority and the consequences of the conflict between the BIA and the TSA. The financial responsibility of drivers is a valid matter of provincial concern and jurisdiction, and the province can set the conditions for driving privileges with this consideration in mind. Nonetheless, when the province denies a person's driving privileges on the sole basis that he or she refuses to pay a debt that was discharged in bankruptcy, the province's condition conflicts with s. 178(2) of the BIA and is, to that extent, inoperative. To so conclude does not transfer the power to regulate driving privileges to Parliament. The obligation to grant those privileges flows from the provisions of the provincial law that remain operative.

[83] The rehabilitative purpose of s. 178(2) is not meant to give debtors a fresh start in all aspects of their lives. Bankruptcy does not purport to erase all the consequences of a bankrupt's past conduct. However, by ensuring that all provable claims are treated as part of the bankruptcy regime, the BIA gives debtors an opportunity to rehabilitate themselves financially. While this does not amount to erasing all regulatory consequences of their past conduct, it is certainly meant to free them from the financial burden of past indebtedness.

(ii) Equitable Distribution

[84] The Court of Appeal concluded that the TSA also disrupts the equitable distribution purpose of the BIA. In that court's view, the province's legislative scheme allows it to obtain more than the ordinary dividend paid under the bankruptcy regime, which is contrary to the objective of the BIA to "treat all creditors of the same class equally" (para. 50). For its part, the province asserts that s. 102 does not alter the priorities set out in the BIA, since payment for the privilege of driving does not draw on the estate of the bankrupt that is available to other creditors.

[85] I disagree with this conclusion of the Court of Appeal. The purpose of s. 178, the only provision of the BIA that is at issue in this appeal, is to give the discharged bankrupt a fresh start. The section sets out the limits of this fresh start by excluding specific debts from being released by the order of discharge (s. 178(1)), and it provides for the consequences of that order by releasing the bankrupt from all other provable claims (s. 178(2)). Section 178 does not further the purpose of equitable distribution of assets. What the Court of Appeal points to are the consequences of survival of the judgment debt as a result of s. 102 of the TSA, despite the discharge contemplated in s. 178. This concerns the financial rehabilitation purpose of the BIA and nothing more.

[86] This Court has repeatedly cautioned against giving "too broad a scope to paramountcy on the basis of frustration of federal purpose": Lemare Lake, at para. 23, quoting Marcotte, at para. 72; Marine Services, at para. 69; Western Bank, at para. 74. In the federal paramountcy analysis, it is therefore always essential to ascertain the exact purpose of the specific provision of the federal law that is at issue. The Court of Appeal does not cite any authority supporting the assertion that s. 178 has purposes other than the debtor's financial rehabilitation. Although other provisions of the BIA, discussed earlier in these reasons and dealing mostly with the property of the bankrupt and the administration of the bankrupt's estate, are meant to ensure this equitable distribution purpose, those provisions are not at issue in the case at bar. At best, the assertion made by the Court of Appeal unduly broadens the BIA's equitable distribution purpose and the related single proceeding model. This is contrary to the presumption of constitutionality according to which, "[w]hen a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, such an interpretation is to be applied in preference to another applicable construction which would bring about a conflict between the two statutes": Western Bank, at para. 75, quoting Law Society of B.C., at p. 356; Marine Services, at para. 69.

[87] Professor Wood, at p. 3, explains as follows the rationale behind the collective proceeding through which equitable distribution is achieved:

> The race to grab assets in the absence of a collective insolvency regime does not provide an environment within which an efficient and orderly liquidation can occur. The process is inefficient because each creditor must separately attempt to enforce their claims against the debtor's assets, and this produces duplication in enforcement costs. The piecemeal selling off of assets also results in a much smaller recovery than if a single person were in control of the liquidation. Similarly, the race to seize assets does not produce an environment within which negotiations with creditors can easily occur. A reasonable creditor who is inclined to negotiate with the debtor will be unlikely to do so if other creditors are actively taking steps to make away with the debtor's realizable assets; instead, the creditor will feel compelled to join the wild dash to seize assets. Although some of the creditors (those who are able to strike first) are better off in such a scenario, the creditors as a group receive less than if a more orderly liquidation or negotiated arrangement had taken place.

(See also Husky Oil, at para. 7.)

[88] The single proceeding model is focused on ensuring the orderly distribution of assets and reducing inefficiencies, and ultimately on maximizing global recovery for creditors. If, after the bankrupt's discharge, that is, after the administration of the estate and the orderly distribution contemplated by the BIA, the province is allowed to compel a bankrupt to make payments outside the collective proceeding and to obtain property that would not, in any event, be distributed to the creditors as part of the bankruptcy process, I fail to see how the single proceeding model is disrupted. The assets to be distributed to creditors remain the same, and they are still allocated according to the bankruptcy scheme and any priorities it dictates. Whether or not s. 102 of the TSA operates after the discharge does not impact the orderly distribution to creditors, nor does it affect the pool of assets to be distributed to them. In this regard, the judgment debt is not "preferred" or given any kind of priority under the BIA scheme; it is quite simply unaffected by the bankruptcy process as a result of the provincial scheme in the same way as the other debts listed in s. 178(1) that are not released by the order of discharge. The operation of s. 102 does not cause any chaos or inefficiencies in the bankruptcy process. If anything, allowing s. 102 to operate increases global recovery for the other creditors while leaving the single proceeding intact.

[89] Thus, although it is clear that the purpose of s. 178(2) is to ensure the debtor's financial rehabilitation and that s. 102 frustrates that purpose, I am not convinced that the operation of the provincial scheme in the context of this appeal interferes with the equitable distribution of assets, a purpose that is undoubtedly served by other provisions of the BIA, but not by s. 178.

VI. Disposition

[90] In my view, the doctrine of paramountcy dictates that s. 102 of the TSA is inoperative to the extent that it conflicts with the BIA, and in particular s. 178(2). Therefore, the province cannot withhold the respondent's driving privileges on the basis of an unsatisfied but discharged judgment debt. I would dismiss the appeal with costs and answer the constitutional question as follows:

> Is s. 102(2) of the Alberta Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6, constitutionally inoperative by reason of the doctrine of federal paramountcy?

Answer: Yes, s. 102 of the Alberta Traffic Safety Act is inoperative to the extent that it is used to enforce a debt discharged in bankruptcy.

Justice Côté authored the concurring opinion, which was joined by Chief Justice McLachlin. As you read their concurrence, consider which framework and outcome you find most persuasive? Which judgment hews most closely to precedent?

The reasons of McLachlin C.J. and Côté J. were delivered by [91] Côté J. — I agree that what is at the core of this appeal is the frustration of a federal purpose. Therefore, I concur with Gascon J. insofar as he finds that s. 102 of the Alberta Traffic Safety Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. T-6 ("TSA"), frustrates the purpose of financial rehabilitation that underlies s. 178(2) of the federal Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. B-3 ("BIA"), and that s. 102 is accordingly inoperative to the extent of the conflict by reason of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. However, I do not believe that there is an operational conflict to speak of in this appeal.

[92] There is no doubt in my mind that s. 102 of the TSA allows Alberta to do indirectly what it is implicitly prohibited from doing under s. 178(2) of the BIA, but in light of the indirect nature of the conflict, this issue is properly dealt with on the basis of the second branch of the federal paramountcy test, not the first.

[93] In my respectful view, Gascon J.'s analysis contrasts with the clear standard that has been adopted for the purpose of determining whether an operational conflict exists in the context of the federal paramountcy test: impossibility of dual compliance as a result of an express conflict. My colleague's approach conflates the two branches of the federal paramountcy test, or at a minimum blurs the difference between them and returns the jurisprudence to the state it was at before the second branch was recognized as a separate branch. And it has an additional serious adverse effect: by expanding the definition of conflict in the first branch, it increases the number of situations in which a federal law might be found to pre-empt a provincial law without an in-depth analysis of Parliament's intent.

[94] To support his approach, my colleague relies on cases that were decided before "frustration of purpose" was recognized as a separate branch of the test. He also relies on subsequent decisions in which the two branches were confused. In my view, M & D Farm Ltd. v. Manitoba Agricultural Credit Corp., 1999 CanLII 648 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 961 ("M & D Farm"), and British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Lafarge Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 23, [2007] 2 SCR 86 ("Lafarge"), cannot be found to represent a consistent and coherent approach to the interplay between the two branches.

[95] In the case at bar, it is clear from the provisions themselves that as a result of how the two legislatures decided to exercise their respective powers, dual compliance is not impossible. The provincial and federal provisions at issue do not expressly conflict; they are different in terms of their contents and of the remedies that they provide. One of them does not permit what the other specifically prohibits.

[96] Under s. 178 of the BIA, a bankrupt is discharged from all claims provable in bankruptcy. That section says nothing more. One must be careful, in light of the federal purpose of financial rehabilitation, not to add words to the provision.

[97] Thus, s. 102 of the TSA does not revive an extinguished claim per se; if a debtor chooses not to drive, the province simply cannot enforce its claim. Rather, s. 102 allows the province to suspend a driver's licence, which gives it some leverage to compel payment of the debt if the driver decides to drive. The bankrupt is still discharged in the literal sense of the words of s. 178(2) of the BIA. This is not a situation of express conflict in which one law says "yes" while the other says "no". The two statutes answer different questions. In the end, the literal requirement of the federal statute is, strictly speaking, met. It therefore follows that the two acts can operate side by side without conflict. To conclude otherwise would be to disregard the distinct contents of the two provisions and the remedies that they provide.

[98] This is why I am of the view that this appeal must be decided on the basis of the frustration of a federal purpose, an issue in respect of which the applicable standard is higher, and that requires an in-depth analysis of Parliament's intent.

VII. Impossibility of Dual Compliance

[99] In my colleague's discussion of operational conflict, impossibility of dual compliance, instead of being at the forefront of the analysis, seems to be a secondary consideration. Yet it is the undisputed standard for determining whether an operational conflict exists, and one that very few cases will meet.

[100] In the jurisprudence, impossibility of dual compliance has become synonymous with operational conflict: see e.g. P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 16-4 ("Impossibility of dual compliance"). This may largely be due to this Court's repeated emphasis on the definition of operational conflict articulated by Dickson J. (as he then was) in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161 ("Multiple Access"): ". . . there is actual conflict in operation . . . where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no'; 'the same citizens are being told to do inconsistent things'; compliance with one is defiance of the other" (p. 191 (emphasis added)).

[101] In Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 SCR 188 ("Rothmans"), Major J. stressed that Multiple Access is "often cited for the proposition that there is an inconsistency for the purposes of the doctrine if it is impossible to comply simultaneously with both provincial and federal enactments" (para. 11). Major J. also described an operational conflict as a situation in which the provincial law "mak[es] it impossible to comply" with the federal law (para. 14). Binnie and LeBel JJ. would subsequently state in Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, that provincial and federal laws are incompatible where "it is impossible to comply with both laws" (para. 75). Impossibility of dual compliance continues to be the standard for conceptualizing operational conflict and determining whether one exists: see e.g. Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 SCR 536 ("COPA"), at para. 64.

[102] The requirement of an "express contradiction", discussed in 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), 2001 SCC 40, [2001] 2 SCR 241 ("Spraytech"), at para. 34, is inseparable from impossibility of dual compliance as a clear expression of the prudent measure of restraint displayed in the line of cases in which the first branch of the federal paramountcy test was developed. It echoes the proposition that for the two laws to conflict, each one has to say exactly the opposite of what the other says (one law says "yes" and the other says "no"). A less direct conflict is simply not enough.

[103] In Canadian Western Bank, Bastarache J. indicated that the only type of conflict capable of triggering the first branch is one that is "express" (para. 126). See also Lafarge, at para. 113. In M & D Farm, on which my colleague relies extensively, Binnie J., writing for the Court, acknowledged that the federal enactment will prevail only in the event of "an express contradiction" (para. 17). The Court had also previously used the expression "direct conflict" to characterize this requirement: Rio Hotel Ltd. v. New Brunswick (Liquor Licensing Board), 1987 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 59, at pp. 64-65. Peter W. Hogg states that the requirement is "a very tight restriction on the paramountcy doctrine, since cases where the provincial law expressly contradicts the federal law are few and far between": "Paramountcy and Tobacco" (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 335, at p. 338 (emphasis added). In the absence of an express conflict, the two provisions are deemed to be capable of operating side by side. This idea also underlies the reasons of the majority in COPA, who found that there was no operational conflict, because the federal statute did not require the construction of an aerodrome, whereas the provincial law prohibited it (para. 65).

[104] In light of the modern jurisprudence, this restrained approach to operational conflict is therefore inescapable. There are good reasons for maintaining such a strict standard for operational conflict. Iacobucci J. (dissenting, but not on this point) explained the rationale behind it in Husky Oil Operations Ltd. v. Minister of National Revenue, 1995 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 453:

> In closing, although I find there to be no conflict between s. 133(1) and the Bankruptcy Act, I posit that, even if there were to be some element of conflict, this must be evaluated in light of the fact that the provincial legislation is intra vires. Legislation that is intra vires is permitted to have an incidental and ancillary effect on a federal sphere. I would emphasize again that this Court has traditionally declined to invoke the paramountcy doctrine in the absence of actual operational conflict. I am uncomfortable with the "water-tight" approach to federal bankruptcy legislation propounded by the respondents. To interpret the quartet as requiring the invalidation of provincial laws which have any effect on the bankruptcy process is to undermine the theory of co-operative federalism upon which (particularly post-war) Canada has been built. In Deloitte Haskins [and Sells Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board, 1985 CanLII 82 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 785], at pp. 807-8, Wilson J. recognized it to be appropriate to adopt as narrow a definition of operational conflict as possible in order to allow each level of government as much area of activity as possible within its respective sphere of authority. [Emphasis added; para. 162.]

Such a high standard is consistent with co-operative federalism and with the idea, as eloquently expressed by my colleague Abella J. for the majority in NIL/TU,O Child and Family Services Society v. B.C. Government and Service Employees' Union, 2010 SCC 45, [2010] 2 SCR 696, that "[t]oday's constitutional landscape is painted with the brush of co-operative federalism", which requires that courts accept an overlap "between the exercise of federal and provincial competencies" as inevitable (para. 42). If, in practice, the wording of the statutes makes it possible to comply with both of them, then co-operative federalism requires this Court to find that the federal and provincial statutes are compatible, at least at the first stage of the analysis. If there is a doubt in this regard, the issue should be addressed at the second stage, since an interpretation of the federal and provincial legislation that results in a finding of compatibility should be favoured at the first stage.

[105] This is where I cannot agree with my colleague. Rather than assessing the possibility of dual compliance and the existence or absence of an express operational conflict, Gascon J. begins by characterizing the effect of s. 102 of the TSA. In his view, that effect is to permit the enforcement of a discharged debt. He then finds that compelling the payment of such a debt is prohibited by s. 178(2) of the BIA, as its purpose is to give the bankrupt a fresh start. My colleague interprets s. 178(2) of the BIA broadly on the basis of Parliament's intent to foster the financial rehabilitation of the bankrupt, and this results in a conflict. In other words, rather than considering whether to comply with one statute is to defy the other, he considers whether the effects of the provincial statute seem to be incompatible with the federal prohibition. Instead of considering only the actual words of both provisions, he takes into account their purposes and their effects.

[106] As I mentioned above, his analysis thus conflates the two branches of the federal paramountcy test, or at a minimum blurs the difference between them and returns the jurisprudence to the state it was at before the second branch was recognized as a separate branch.

[107] With all due respect, as the Chief Justice stated in COPA, the two branches of the modern federal paramountcy test relate to "two different forms of conflict" (para. 64). See also Marine Services International Ltd. v. Ryan Estate, 2013 SCC 44, [2013] 3 SCR 53 ("Marine Services"), at para. 68. While it is true that they overlap, it is not true that a finding of an operational conflict in the first branch will necessarily entail a finding of frustration of a federal purpose in the second branch. An overlap between the two forms of conflict does not mean the branches are necessarily redundant. The party that invokes the frustration of a federal purpose bears the burden of proof, and the standard of proof is high: COPA, at para. 66. The federal scheme may be drafted in a manner that does not match the record of Parliament's intent, but that results in an express conflict with a provincial law. If the frustration of a federal purpose can be used to find that an operational conflict exists, there is really no point in having two branches of the test. If the Court wishes to merge the two branches, it cannot do so without overruling Rothmans, COPA and Marine Services on this point.

[108] The first branch of the federal paramountcy test is concerned with incompatibility of the provisions, that is, an incompatibility that is evident on the face of the provisions themselves. An analysis in this regard takes the federal statute as a starting point and focusses on its actual wording. This analysis requires an inquiry, based on the wording of the federal statute, into whether there is room for the provincial law to operate. In this context, the content of each of the laws and the remedies that they provide are of considerable importance.

[109] For all these reasons, even a superficial possibility of dual compliance will suffice for a court to conclude that there is no operational conflict: Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, 2001 SCC 67, [2001] 3 SCR 113 ("Mangat"), at para. 72. By the same logic, a duplication of federal and provincial legislation will not on its own amount to operational conflict: Multiple Access, at p. 190, per Dickson J. for the majority. In addition, where federal legislation is broad and permissive, a restrictive provincial scheme will usually be deemed not to conflict with it, because it will be possible to comply with both of them by conforming to the more restrictive provincial law: Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canada (Human Resources and Social Development), 2011 SCC 60, [2011] 3 SCR 635, at para. 20. Such was the case in Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121 ("Bank of Montreal"), Spraytech, Rothmans and COPA.

[110] If the federal law is prohibitive, as in the case at bar, the question becomes what exactly it prohibits. If the provincial law allows the very same thing the federal law prohibits, there is an operational conflict. If it does not do so, the analysis shifts to the second branch.

[111] My colleague contends, relying on Marine Services, that the modern approach to statutory interpretation applies to ambiguous federal statutes. According to him, the analysis regarding an express conflict cannot be limited to a literal reading of the statute. Parliament's intent can thus be used to find that an operational conflict exists where there would otherwise be none.

[112] With all due respect, Marine Services does not stand for that proposition; rather, it reaffirms the idea that co-operative federalism supports an interpretation of the federal and provincial legislation that results in a finding of compatibility at the first stage of the test. In Marine Services, this Court resolved the ambiguity in the Marine Liability Act, S.C. 2001, c. 6, by finding that "[a]n interpretation recognizing the absence of conflict between the statutes is borne out by the broader context, the scheme and object of the MLA and Parliament's intent" (para. 79). Yet Gascon J. is doing the opposite, that is, concluding that an operational conflict exists even though there is an interpretation of the two laws that results in a finding of compatibility.

[113] If permissive federal legislation is to be interpreted restrictively in order to avoid an operational conflict, I see no reason to generally treat ambiguous provisions differently. Following my colleague's approach, the frustration of federal purpose analysis can result in findings of two different forms of conflict. That is clearly not the conclusion this Court reached in Bank of Montreal. It should be noted that the federal provision at issue in that case could easily have been characterized as being ambiguous. Thus, a broader interpretation could have been adopted to the effect that Parliament's intent resulted in an operational conflict; instead, the Court considered it necessary to extend the federal paramountcy test by creating the frustration of purpose branch. Whereas Parliament's intent had originally been irrelevant to the federal paramountcy test, it would now be the touchstone of this new branch.

[114] The Court has never really addressed the interrelation between the two branches. In many cases from both before and after Rothmans, Canadian Western Bank and COPA, it seems to me that the two branches have been confused, as the Court has concluded that there was an operational conflict in the context of the first branch while referring to the federal purpose.

[115] For instance, Gonthier J., writing for the majority in Husky Oil, found that there was a "clear operational conflict in that ss. 133(1) and (3) in their operation together entail a reordering or subverting of the federal order of priorities under the Bankruptcy Act" (para. 87). As the Ontario Court of Appeal noted in its reasons in the companion case, Canada (Superintendent of Bankruptcy) v. 407 ETR Concession Company Ltd., 2013 ONCA 769, 118 O.R. (3d) 161, the decision of the majority in Husky Oil is best understood as one involving frustration of federal purpose rather than operational conflict:

Although not so described in the case, in my view, the majority in Husky Oil is best understood as a decision involving frustration of a federal purpose rather than an operational conflict. Firstly, the majority did not rely on Multiple Access but on Hall, a case which is now viewed as a frustration of purpose decision. Secondly, the majority relied on the effect of the provincial legislation and indirect conflict to ground its paramountcy analysis and not the strict operational conflict test found in Multiple Access. [para. 75]

[116] In Lafarge, the majority did recognize the two branches of the federal paramountcy test, but stated the test incorrectly:

> We restated the requirements for federal paramountcy in our reasons in Canadian Western Bank. The party raising the issue must establish the existence of valid federal and provincial laws and the impossibility of their simultaneous application by reason of an operational conflict or because such application would frustrate the purpose of the enactment, as explained by our Court in Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, [2005] 1 SCR 188, 2005 SCC 13, at paras. 11-14. (See also Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, [2001] 3 SCR 113, 2001 SCC 67, at paras. 68-71; Bank of Montreal v. Hall, 1990 CanLII 157 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 121.) [para. 77]

[117] The conflation of frustration of a purpose with impossibility of dual compliance is even more apparent at para. 75 of that case, where the majority stated that the two statutes "would create an operational conflict that would flout the federal purpose". Interestingly, the majority did not refer to an operational conflict in terms of impossibility of dual compliance or a situation in which one enactment says "yes" and the other says "no". They merely applied M & D Farm and found that there was an operational conflict, just as my colleague proposes to do in the case at bar. In my opinion, Lafarge should also be understood as a decision involving the frustration of a federal purpose rather than an operational conflict.

[118] Although M & D Farm was decided on the basis of an operational conflict, it is not helpful authority on the modern doctrine of federal paramountcy either, as Binnie J. made no distinction between the first and second branches of the federal paramountcy test. At the time that case was decided, the concept of frustration of purpose had been referred to in Bank of Montreal, but this Court had not yet explicitly recognized the two branches of the federal paramountcy test. Although the Court found in M & D Farm that there was an operational conflict, in doing so it relied on passages from Bank of Montreal in which La Forest J. had inquired into whether "requir[ing] the bank to defer to the provincial legislation is to displace the legislative intent of Parliament" (Bank of Montreal, at p. 153; see M & D Farm, at para. 41). I agree that there was in fact an operational conflict in M & D Farm, but for different reasons, as I will explain below.

[119] Finally, in Mangat, the federal legislation (Immigration Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-2) permitted non-lawyers to appear on behalf of clients before the Immigration and Refugee Board (ss. 30 and 69(1)). The provincial legislation (Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1987, c. 25) prohibited non-lawyers from practising law. As defined in s. 1 of the Legal Profession Act, the expression "practice of law" included "appearing as counsel or advocate" in the expectation of a fee. Mr. Mangat was an immigration consultant. The Law Society of British Columbia applied for a permanent injunction to prevent him from practising law. The Court found the law to be inoperative, but used the term "operational conflict" in respect of both branches of the paramountcy test:

> In this case, there is an operational conflict as the provincial legislation prohibits non-lawyers to appear for a fee before a tribunal but the federal legislation authorizes non-lawyers to appear as counsel for a fee. At a superficial level, a person who seeks to comply with both enactments can succeed either by becoming a member in good standing of the Law Society of British Columbia or by not charging a fee. Complying with the stricter statute necessarily involves complying with the other statute. However, following the expanded interpretation given in cases like M & D Farm and Bank of Montreal, supra, dual compliance is impossible. . . .
> This case should be distinguished from 114957 Canada Ltée (Spraytech, Société d'arrosage) v. Hudson (Town), [2001] 2 SCR 241, 2001 SCC 40. In that case, it was possible to comply with the federal, provincial, and municipal statutes or regulations without defeating Parliament's purpose. As previously shown, in this case, it is impossible to comply with the provincial statute without frustrating Parliament's purpose. [Emphasis added; paras. 72-73.]

[120] In my view, the Court actually found in that case that there was no operational conflict (as that concept is understood today), as it noted in the above passage that the statutes at issue allowed dual compliance at a "superficial level"; the words "superficial level" corresponded to the operational conflict branch. And it then found that dual compliance was not possible on the basis of an "expanded interpretation", citing M & D Farm and Bank of Montreal; the words "expanded interpretation" referred to the frustration of purpose branch.

[121] In light of the above cases, I find it difficult to conclude, as my colleague urges me to do, that the approach taken by this Court on this issue has been entirely consistent.

[122] Although this Court's past decisions are not always helpful when it comes to drawing a distinction between the two branches, they do support three propositions: (1) that the applicable standard for the first branch is impossibility of dual compliance caused by an express conflict, (2) that this is a high standard that should be applied with restraint, and only in very few cases, and (3) that the two branches are distinct and address different forms of conflict.

[123] Consequently, I find that the analysis at the first stage should really be as simple as the Alberta Court of Appeal put it, and it is no surprise to me that both parties made next to no submissions on the point. The determining question is whether the province's legislation provides a path on which dual compliance is possible. Because such a path exists in this case as a result of the wording of the two provisions, dual compliance cannot be found to be impossible. Unlike in M & D Farm, the two statutes in the instant case have different contents and provide for different remedies. Since the bankrupt is under no compulsion in this regard, he or she can either opt not to drive or voluntarily pay the discharged debt, in which case there will be no operational conflict between the provincial and federal laws. The only thing Alberta can do is suspend a bankrupt's driver's licence.

[124] It is important to note that although operational conflict and frustration of purpose are described as two "branches" of a single test, either one is sufficient to trigger the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy. Where enactments are found to be in operational conflict, the inquiry can end there without further investigation into the purposes of the enactments. A high standard at the first stage merely means that in most cases, the purpose and effects of the legislation at issue will need to be analyzed at the second stage.

[125] Requiring courts to deal with the issue in the second branch has many advantages. For the frustration of purpose analysis, the federal legislative intent with which the provincial law is alleged to be incompatible must be established by the party relying on it. Clear proof of intent is required. The party must first establish the purpose of the relevant federal statute and then prove that the provincial law is incompatible with or frustrates this purpose: COPA, at para. 66.

[126] In the second branch, the court can proceed with a careful analysis of Parliament's intent and, if possible, interpret the federal law so as not to interfere with the provincial law: Canadian Western Bank, at para. 75. Before concluding that the provincial law is inoperative, the court can also consider whether the federal government supports the operation of that law. In Rothmans, this Court emphasized that in resolving federalism issues, a court must bear in mind the position of the government at the other level (para. 26). In that case, the federal government intervened in favour of the provincial law, arguing that it had been enacted for the same health-related purpose as the federal law. The Court found that there was no frustration of purpose.

[127] Considering that the doctrine of federal paramountcy operates at the expense of provincial jurisdiction and reduces legislative overlap, these principles encourage governments at both levels to take the lead in defining the scope of their legislative powers. They facilitate intergovernmental dialogue and serve as safeguards of provincial autonomy. In my view, the approach I suggest is more consistent with the principle of co-operative federalism as applied in Canadian Western Bank. It also sets a clear precedent by reaffirming that a provincial law will rarely be found to be inoperative in the first branch of the analysis.

[128] My colleague concludes that this approach would render the first branch of the federal paramountcy test meaningless; in his opinion, it is virtually always possible to avoid the application of a provincial law so as not to cause a conflict with a federal law. I disagree that the "impossibility" standard, if applied strictly, would render the first branch of the federal paramountcy test meaningless. If the provincial law allows or requires something that the federal law explicitly prohibits, or if the conflict is direct rather than indirect, there will be an operational conflict. But that is just not the case here. In fact, the effect of my colleague's approach is to render the second branch meaningless, since a frustration of federal purpose analysis can now be used to interpret federal statutes broadly in order to find that an operational conflict exists where there would otherwise be none.

[129] Following my approach, one would still find that there was an operational conflict in M & D Farm, in which the federal law imposed an absolute stay of proceedings on the very procedures the provincial statute allowed to commence or to continue. In that case, the express requirement of the federal statute was in direct conflict with the provincial law. On the one hand, the federal Farm Debt Review Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 25 (2nd Supp.), permitted a farmer to obtain a stay of a creditor's proceedings and required the creditor, before demanding payment, to give notice that it intended to commence foreclosure proceedings. On the other hand, under the provincial statute, the creditor could obtain an order authorizing the immediate commencement of such proceedings. Unlike in the case at bar, the two statutes had similar contents and provided for similar remedies: both dealt specifically with the process for realizing on farmers' debts, and both established procedures for commencing or continuing proceedings against farmers.

[130] The approach I suggest would also result in a finding that there was an operational conflict in Sun Indalex Finance, LLC v. United Steelworkers, 2013 SCC 6, [2013] 1 SCR 271, in which the federal statute, the Companies' Creditors Arrangement Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-36, gave a court the power to order that a security or charge rank in priority over the claim of any secured creditor of the company, whereas the provincial statute created a priority in favour of the administrator of the company's employee pension plan. The federal legislation was not only permissive, but granted the court a very specific power; the provincial legislature was left little leeway to interfere with this power. Because the provincial statute provided, on a mandatory basis, for a different order of priority, it was impossible to comply with both laws without rendering the court's power under the federal statute meaningless.

[131] I would add that what is "virtually always possible", as my colleague puts it, at para. 69, is to find some conflict in the application of two laws. This is why the case law requires something more, namely impossibility of dual compliance and an express conflict. It is also why the focus is on the wording of the federal statute and not on its every possible ramification.

[132] In the end, the issue in this case is whether the effect of the province withholding driving privileges in this manner produces a conflict with the purposes of the BIA, thereby accomplishing indirectly what the province cannot do directly. Thus, it is on the basis of the second branch of the federal paramountcy test, not the first, that this appeal must be decided.

[133] I adopt my colleague's analysis and conclusion on this point. As the frustration of one federal purpose is sufficient to trigger the application of the doctrine of federal paramountcy, I need not address the second proposed ground for frustration of purpose, that of equitable distribution.

In the Court's most recent application of paramountcy doctrine, Chief Justice Wagner assessed the operability of sections 5 and 10 of the provincial Act, which completely prohibited the possession of cannabis plants and their cultivation for personal purposes in a dwelling-house. You will recall from the earlier excerpt of Murray Hall that the federal Cannabis Act, SC 2018, c 16 permitted individuals to possess and cultivate up to four cannabis plants at any one time.

7.6 Murray-Hall v Quebec (Attorney General), 2023 SCC 10

[83] In this second part, I will address whether the doctrine of federal paramountcy applies in this case, which would mean that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act would be declared to be of no force or effect only to the extent of their inconsistency with the federal Act. Like the Court of Appeal, I am of the view that the impugned provisions are operative. The application of the absolute prohibitions set out in the provincial Act does not frustrate the federal purpose identified by the appellant. Contrary to what he argues, the purpose of the federal Act is not to create — with a view to reducing illicit activities in relation to cannabis — positive rights to possess and cultivate up to four cannabis plants for personal purposes. Such an interpretation of the purpose of the federal Act does not reflect the essentially prohibitory nature of the criminal law power and is not supported by the wording of that Act.

[84] By way of introduction, I will outline the circumstances in which the doctrine of federal paramountcy applies. There is an inconsistency that justifies giving precedence to a federal law over a valid provincial law when there is an operational conflict or when the purpose of the federal law is frustrated. In the former case, the operational conflict means that it is impossible to comply with both laws simultaneously, such as "where one enactment says 'yes' and the other says 'no'", as it was put in Multiple Access Ltd. v. McCutcheon, 1982 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 161, at p. 191. In the latter case, "imposing an obligation to comply with provincial legislation would in effect frustrate the purpose of a federal law" (Canadian Western Bank, at para. 73). As Major J. noted in Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 SCR 188, at paras. 14-15, the existence of either of these situations is enough to trigger the application of the federal paramountcy doctrine, but this does not mean that proving their existence is easy.

[85] Indeed, the burden of proof that rests on the party alleging an operational conflict or a conflict of purposes is a high one (Alberta (Attorney General) v. Moloney, 2015 SCC 51, [2015] 3 SCR 327, at para. 27; Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 SCR 419, at paras. 21-23). This requirement arises from the cardinal rule of constitutional interpretation that "[w]hen a federal statute can be properly interpreted so as not to interfere with a provincial statute, such an interpretation is to be applied in preference to another applicable construction which would bring about a conflict between the two statutes" (Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1982 CanLII 29 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 307, at p. 356). I am also of the view that the need for the greatest possible precision in the analysis of operability takes on particular importance in circumstances such as those in this case, where the legislative subject matter has a double aspect. It is essential "to avoid eroding the importance attached to provincial autonomy", a concern I expressed in, among other cases, References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11, at para. 128.

[86] For the reasons that follow, and in light of the "restrained" approach to paramountcy that guides the Court, I am of the view that the appellant has not met his burden of proof.

[87] I want to dispel at once any notion that there is an operational conflict between the impugned provisions and the federal Act. When questioned by the Court on this point, the appellant in fact conceded that it is possible to obey both laws, which suggests that there is no operational conflict. By not possessing or cultivating cannabis plants in their homes, individuals in Quebec can thus easily comply with both the federal Act, which exempts the possession and cultivation of up to four cannabis plants from the application of its scheme of criminal offences, and the provincial Act, which prohibits the possession and cultivation of any cannabis plant in a dwelling-house.

[88] Therefore, the only question to be answered is rather whether a federal purpose is being frustrated, which in this case involves first establishing the purpose of the federal Act and then determining whether the provisions of the provincial Act are incompatible with that purpose (Quebec (Attorney General) v. Canadian Owners and Pilots Association, 2010 SCC 39, [2010] 2 SCR 536, at para. 66).

[89] The appellant's position on the frustration of the federal Act's purpose can be briefly summarized. He alleges that the incompatibility results from the fact that the provincial Act does not merely limit what the federal Act allows, namely the cultivation and possession of up to four cannabis plants in a dwelling-house, but instead prohibits it completely. In making such an argument, the appellant assumes that ss. 8(1)(e) and 12(4)(b) of the federal Act have in fact created a positive right to self-cultivate cannabis. According to the appellant, positively and expressly authorizing the home cultivation of a maximum of four cannabis plants is the purpose of the federal provisions. In its more refined form, this argument amounts to suggesting that granting Canadians a positive right to possess or cultivate up to four cannabis plants is the specific purpose of ss. 8(1)(e) and 12(4)(b). Such a purpose is allegedly being pursued in order to achieve other more general purposes of the federal Act set out in s. 7 of that Act, including eliminating or reducing the illicit cannabis market (s. 7(c)) (see the distinction drawn between a specific purpose and a general purpose in Rothmans, at para. 25).

[90] In my opinion, the appellant's position cannot be accepted. The purpose of the federal Act's provisions is not to create a positive right to self-cultivate cannabis as part of a broader objective of limiting the influence of organized crime. Such a purpose would be inconsistent with the fact that "the criminal law power is essentially prohibitory in character" (Rothmans, at para. 19), a fact that has been recognized in Canadian law since the leading case of Proprietary Articles Trade Association v. Attorney General for Canada, 1931 CanLII 385 (UK JCPC), [1931] A.C. 310 (P.C.). As McLachlin C.J. noted in Reference re AHRA, "[t]he federal criminal law power may only be used to prohibit conduct" (para. 38). It follows that when exceptions are carved out for practices that Parliament does not wish to prohibit, this "only means that a particular practice is not prohibited, not that the practice is positively allowed by the federal law" (ibid. (emphasis deleted)).

[91] It is true that, in everyday language and even in the speeches of some parliamentarians, the creation of exceptions or exemptions under a scheme of criminal offences is often described as a "legalization" effort. However, this way of speaking is incorrect and falsely suggests that positive rights authorizing particular conduct have been granted to the public. In this case, the statement by the federal Minister of Health that "limited home growing should be allowed" therefore cannot be seen as a clear expression of Parliament's intent to confer a positive right to self-cultivation (House of Commons Debates, vol. 148, No. 314, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., June 13, 2018, at p. 20875). I would also point out that courts must be careful when relying on parliamentary debates as an expression of legislative intent. The use of this type of extrinsic evidence must be approached "with caution" given the fact that "statements by members of Parliament can be poor indicators of parliamentary purpose" (R. v. Sharma, 2022 SCC 39, at para. 89).

[92] Furthermore, I note that nothing in the language of ss. 8(1)(e) and 12(4)(b) indicates that Parliament's intention was to authorize the self-cultivation of cannabis. On the contrary, these provisions read as classic criminal law: they contain a prohibition and a penalty, and they are directed at an evil relating to public health and safety. They include exemptions for the cultivation and possession of one to four cannabis plants. Their wording leaves no ambiguity regarding the fact that the possession and cultivation of one to four cannabis plants were simply excluded from the scope of the criminal offences provided for in the federal Act. Pointing to the absence of provisions conferring an express right to cultivate cannabis for personal purposes, the Court of Appeal correctly found that [translation] "it seems more accurate to say not that the [federal Act] legalized certain aspects related to the use of this substance, but rather that it decriminalized them" (para. 117).

[93] The appellant attaches great importance to the fact that s. 7(c) of the federal Act is framed in much more positive or permissive terms, since it states that one of the purposes of the Act is to "provide for the licit production of cannabis to reduce illicit activities in relation to cannabis". He sees this as an indication that Parliament truly intended to confer a positive right to self-cultivate. Once again, I cannot accept the appellant's contentions.

[94] First, it is not clear that Parliament, through the term "licit production" in s. 7(c), was referring specifically to the home production of cannabis. Rather, I believe that this term conveys a general intention to allow production within the legal framework established by the federal Act. The concept of "licit production" could also be seen, a contrario, as the converse of the concept of "illicit cannabis", which s. 2 of the federal Act defines as any "cannabis that is or was sold, produced or distributed by a person prohibited from doing so under this Act or any provincial Act or that was imported by a person prohibited from doing so under this Act."

[95] Second, even if it is accepted that the concept of "licit production" may refer to home production, the words "provide for" in s. 7(c) cannot be read as indicating that Parliament granted authorization or permission that created positive rights. They cannot be read in this way because, as I noted above, the creation of positive rights is not a valid exercise of the criminal law power and because the federal Act must be presumed to be constitutionally valid in our review of the operability of the provincial provisions.

[96] The guidance provided in Rothmans is relevant for the purposes of this appeal. In my view, the principles arising from that case are determinative of the issue of the operability of the impugned provisions. The question in Rothmans was whether provincial legislation that prohibited the promotion of tobacco products in any place accessible to young persons frustrated the purpose of federal legislation that prohibited the promotion of tobacco products except in retail businesses. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal had found that the provincial legislation negated the authorization otherwise afforded by the federal legislation for the promotion of tobacco in retail businesses. This Court came to a different conclusion, stating that "Parliament did not grant, and could not have granted, retailers a positive entitlement to display tobacco products" (para. 18 (emphasis added)). In addition, statutes enacted pursuant to the criminal law power "do not ordinarily create freestanding rights that limit the ability of the provinces to legislate in the area more strictly than Parliament" (para. 19 (emphasis added)).

[97] The principle to be drawn from these excerpts is that the making of exceptions or exemptions under a criminal law scheme cannot serve to confer positive rights to engage in the activities covered by those exceptions or exemptions. This is an important point in a case like the one before us. The provinces can legitimately undertake regulatory initiatives to provide a framework for decriminalized activities without thereby frustrating a purpose — the creation of positive rights — that by definition is outside the scope of the federal criminal law power.

[98] I acknowledge that the circumstances of Rothmans differed from those of this case in one important respect. In Rothmans, the exemption for the retail display of tobacco products did not seem closely related to the achievement of the criminal law purpose of the legislation as a whole, which was to address a national public health problem. As the Court stated in that case, even if it were to be accepted that the federal legislation granted retailers a positive right to display tobacco products, it would be difficult to imagine that such a right could actually help combat a public health evil (para. 20). In the instant case, on the other hand, it could be argued that the exemptions for the possession and cultivation of cannabis plants at home play a direct part in achieving a criminal law purpose, namely discouraging the illicit trade of cannabis. By this logic, the recognition of a positive right to self-cultivate could thus assist in limiting the demand for cannabis from illicit sources or criminal organizations, a purpose that would be undermined by the application of the absolute prohibitions enacted by the Quebec legislature.

[99] However, I cannot accept that exceptions or exemptions made under a scheme of criminal offences may give rise to positive rights, even where the exceptions or exemptions are closely related to the achievement of criminal law purposes. In recent years, the Court has circumscribed the scope of the federal criminal law power. In Reference re AHRA, for example, McLachlin C.J. cautioned that "a limitless definition [of what constitutes a valid criminal law purpose], combined with the doctrine of paramountcy, has the potential to upset the constitutional balance of federal-provincial powers" (para. 43). In my opinion, modifying the principles from Rothmans would present a similar risk to the constitutional balance of the federal system. The recognition of positive rights created out of exceptions or exemptions closely related to a valid criminal law purpose would improperly extend the scope of the federal criminal law power.

[100] The principles that emerge from Rothmans are relevant without having to be modified in any way and are applicable to this appeal. This means that the exemptions set out in ss. 8(1)(e) and 12(4)(b) of the federal Act are not sources of positive rights, despite the fact that they appear to be closely related to the criminal law purpose of combating illicit activities.

[101] Although this is not in itself determinative in deciding the question of operability, I would observe that the objectives pursued by Parliament and the provincial legislature are consistent. Protecting the health and security of the public and of young persons in particular, combating organized crime and ensuring access to quality-controlled products are all considerations that clearly motivated the enactment of the federal Act and the provincial Act.

[102] I note in this regard that the provincial prohibitions directly address several of the objectives set out in s. 7 of the federal Act. The provincial Act's absolute prohibitions against possession and cultivation presumably protect the health of young persons by restricting access to cannabis (s. 7(a)), since home cultivation by persons of full age could make this substance more accessible to minors living under the same roof. The prohibitions also prevent inducements to use cannabis (s. 7(b)), since the presence of cannabis plants in the home may de facto be considered an inducement. They assist in controlling the quality of the products offered (s. 7(f)), since home-cultivated cannabis is not subject to quality standards, such as the maximum concentration of the main active compound in cannabis, tetrahydrocannabinol ("THC"). They clearly contribute to public awareness of the health risks associated with cannabis consumption (s. 7(g)), since consumers can be provided with information more easily if they are within a regulated selling framework.

[103] Finally, I would add that even though Parliament and the provincial legislature have taken different approaches to self-cultivation, the provincial Act reflects a concern with combating organized crime, just as the federal Act does (s. 7(c) and (d)). The provincial legislature was of the view that, by contributing to the creation of a single market, the absolute prohibitions against possession and cultivation at home would serve to limit trafficking in cannabis from unauthorized sources. Furthermore, it is not this Court's role to decide which of the two approaches — prohibiting personal production or tolerating it — is most likely to reduce illicit activities in relation to cannabis. It is sufficient to note that this objective is what guided the legislative action of both levels of government in this case.

[104] Accordingly, I conclude that ss. 5 and 10 of the provincial Act do not frustrate the purposes stated in the federal Act, including that of reducing the presence of criminal organizations in the cannabis market, and that they are operative under the doctrine of federal paramountcy. The provincial Act's public health and security objectives and its prohibitions are, to a large degree, in harmony with the objectives of the federal Act, and there is no basis for finding a conflict of purposes.

7.7 Questions

1. How can we reconcile BMO v Hall with earlier cases such as Ross that upheld provincial laws so long as one could comply with both laws by complying with the stricter one? For example, in Ross, the driver could comply with the provincial license suspension simply by not driving at all. Similarly, in BMO, the bank could have provided notice of its intention to seize its collateral and then seized the farm machinery after that notice period had expired. It would simply have delayed the bank in realizing on its security interest. Does that delay constitute conflict?
2. Do you think Moloney clarifies the doctrine of paramountcy or further muddies the waters? Is it helpful to think about an older understanding of conflict which focused on the impossibility of dual effect? This understanding queries whether a judge could give effect to both provisions (for example, s. 102 of the TSA and s. 178(2) of the BIA)—which a judge could not do in Moloney. Is the impossibility of dual effect captured by either branch of paramountcy doctrine?
3. Justice Côté's concurring opinion in Moloney stated that the province should not be able to do indirectly what it cannot do directly. Recall this phrase from the McKay case about whether municipal bylaws (and, by extension, provincial legislation) could prohibit election signs on property as part of provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights.
4. How would you characterize the operational conflict definition applied by the Supreme Court in Murray Hall? Is it the same definition as the one used by the Supreme Court in Ross? Has the case law consistently applied the same definition of conflict?
5. Do you agree with how the Court in Murray Hall interpreted the Rothmans case? Are you persuaded by the concept of a positive entitlement or a positive right? If not, how would you characterize the sections 8 and 12 of the federal Cannabis Act, which permit the possession and cultivation of up to four cannabis plants? Is there an alternative explanation for the outcome in Murray Hall?

For an overview of these doctrines, see: Eugénie Brouillet & Bruce Ryder, "Key Doctrines in Canadian Legal Federalism" in Peter Oliver, Patrick Macklem & Nathalie Des Rosiers, eds, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2017).

8 Conclusion

Pith and substance analysis is the starting point and the heart of any division of powers question. The first question is: what is the matter? The answer to that first question may raise several others: does the legislation intrude on the other government's jurisdiction? If so, is that intrusion 'merely incidental'? If not, are the intruding provisions connected to an otherwise valid legislative scheme? Is the intrusion of a 'core' activity or undertaking of the other government? Is there duplication? Is that duplication harmonious or conflictual? What is the nature of the conflict?

It is important to remember that these interpretative doctrines constitute the toolbox of federalism analysis. Mastery of the tools in this toolbox is the prerequisite to the categorization stage, which comes only after the pith and substance of legislation has been determined. As you read the chapters which follow, consider the extent to which you think these two stages of federalism analysis can be held apart.

Chapter 7: Peace, Order, and Good Government

By Sujit Choudhry

1 The Historical Development of the POGG Power

Section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867 sets out the "Classes of Subjects" that fall within the legislative authority of the Federal Parliament. However, the opening words of the section grant to the federal government a general power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of the country. The classes of subjects (or heads of power) set out in s. 91 are provided "for greater Certainty" and do not "restrict the Generality" of the federal government's law-making power:

> 91 It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate and House of Commons, to make Laws for the Peace, Order, and good Government of Canada, in relation to all Matters not coming within the Classes of Subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces; and for greater Certainty, but not so as to restrict the Generality of the foregoing Terms of this Section, it is hereby declared that (notwithstanding anything in this Act) the exclusive Legislative Authority of the Parliament of Canada extends to all Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated;

In Russell v. The Queen and the Local Prohibition Reference, which are discussed in the Early Federalism chapter, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (JCPC) interpreted the POGG power broadly so that Parliament had the power to regulate matters "of general concern to the Dominion where uniformity of legislation is desirable" (Russell), or "matters, in their origin local and provincial [which] might attain such dimension as to affect the body politic of the Dominion" – i.e., "that has ceased to be merely local or provincial, and has become matter of national concern". However, in the early part of the 20th Century the JCPC adopted a narrower reading of scope of POGG, limiting its application to emergency situations or to matters not addressed under the division of powers (Toronto Electric Commission v. Snider). The JCPC also defined such situations very narrowly. In Reference re Natural Products Marketing Act) the JCPC refused to accept that the Great Depression was an economic emergency that would support federal legislative intervention under the POGG power.

However, in the latter half of the 20th Century, beginning with the decision of Viscount Simon in AG Ontario v Canada Temperance Federation, 1946 CanLII 351 (UK JCPC), [1946] AC 193, there has been a re-emergence of the national concern or national dimension doctrine (terms that are used interchangeably).

With the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council in 1949, the Supreme Court of Canada (SCC) became Canada's final court of appeal. In decisions dealing with aeronautics and the national capital region, the SCC applied the national concern doctrine in a broad way. The SCC also applied the rarely used "gap" branch of the POGG to uphold federal legislation on official languages.

Johannesson v Rural Municipality of West St Paul, 1951 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1952] 1 SCR 292, struck down a municipal bylaw controlling the location of airports. The majority of the court held that aeronautics was a national concern that fell within exclusive federal jurisdiction, and therefore precluded the provinces from legislating "in relation to" aeronautics.

In an earlier decision of the JCPC, Aeronautics Reference, 1931 CanLII 466 (UK JCPC), [1932] AC 54 (PC), the Court had held that the federal government had jurisdiction to regulate aeronautics under the treaty power in s 132 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 132 conferred on Parliament the power to enact legislation implementing Imperial treaties entered into on behalf of Canada. However, once the Government of Canada assumed responsibility for the conduct of its own foreign affairs and began to enter treaties on its own behalf s 132 no longer provided a constitutional basis for federal laws implementing treaties that affected matters within provincial jurisdiction.

Five judges, in separate judgments, held that the federal government had exclusive jurisdiction over aeronautics under the POGG power. Justice Locke's reasons were representative:

> There has been since the First World War an immense development in the use of aircraft flying between the various provinces of Canada and between Canada and other countries. … The maintenance and extension of this traffic, particularly to the North, is essential to the opening up of the country and the development of the resources of the nation. It requires merely a statement of these well recognized facts to demonstrate that the field of aeronautics is one which concerns the country as a whole. It is an activity, which to adopt the language of Lord Simon in the Attorney General for Ontario v Canada Temperance Federation, must from its inherent nature be a concern of the Dominion as a whole. The field of legislation is not, in my opinion, capable of division in any practical way.

In Munro v National Capital Commission, 1966 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1966] SCR 663, Mr. Munro's property had been expropriated by the NCC as part of its development plan for the National Capital Region. Munro argued that the federal legislation, empowering the NCC to expropriate property, was a planning and zoning law that fell within provincial jurisdiction under s 92(13), property and civil rights. The SCC, however, held, unanimously, that the National Capital Act, RSC 1985, c N-3, was valid federal legislation under the POGG power. The purpose of the National Capital Commission (NCC) was to "prepare plans for and assist in the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region in order that the nature and character of the seat of the Government of Canada may be in accordance with its national significance."

Cartwright J, writing for the SCC, held that the development of the National Capital Region was a "single matter of national concern." His judgment also foreshadowed what would become the "provincial inability" test in later national concern cases.

In Jones v AG of New Brunswick, 1974 CanLII 164 (SCC), [1975] 2 SCR 182, the SCC upheld the constitutionality of the federal Official Languages Act, which provided for the equal status of French and English in federal institutions. Laskin CJ, writing for the entire court, noting that federal institutions are "clearly beyond provincial reach" held that even if the subject matter of the federal law did not fall under a particular federal head of power, it was covered by the opening words of s. 91 because "of the purely residuary character of the legislative power thereby conferred." This power to legislate in relation to residual matters is sometimes referred to as the “gap” branch of POGG.

In the modern era, the principal function of the “gap” branch has been used to uphold federal legislative authority over those parts of Canada which are physically outside the provinces – for example, the territories (Nunavut, the Northwest Territories, and the Yukon), the territorial sea, and the continental shelf.

2 The Anti-Inflation Reference: POGG and economic regulation

2.1 Introduction

A major turning point in the modern case-law on the national concern and emergency branches was the Anti-Inflation Reference, 1976 CanLII 16 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 373, which considered the constitutionality of the Anti-Inflation Act, SC 1974-75-76, c 75. The Act established a system of price, profit, and income controls. It applied to private sector firms with more than 500 employees, members of designated professions, construction firms with more than 20 employees, and other private sector firms declared to be of strategic importance to the scheme. Most of these private sector firms fell within provincial jurisdiction.

The Act was also binding on the federal public sector, but applicable to the public sector of each province only if an agreement was made between the federal government and the government of the province. 8 of 10 provinces entered into such agreements.

The Act was carefully drafted, to assert its validity under either the national concern branch or the emergency branch. The long title and preamble of the Act were as follows:

> An Act to provide for the restraint of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation in Canada
> WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada recognizes that inflation in Canada at current levels is contrary to the interests of all Canadians and that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern;
> AND WHEREAS to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation. …

The Act was temporary – it expired after three years.

The Governor in Council directed a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to determine whether the Act was ultra vires and whether the Ontario agreement, purporting to make the Act applicable to the Ontario public sector, was valid.

A 7-2 majority (Justice Laskin CH, Judson, Spence, Dickson, Ritchie, Martland, and Pigeon JJ vs. Beetz and de Grandpré JJ) held upheld the Act under the emergency branch of the POGG power.

A different 5 judge majority (Ritchie, Martland, Pigeon, Beetz, and de Grandpré JJ) refused to uphold the Act under the national dimension branch. Four judges declined to consider the issue, because they had upheld the Act under the emergency branch.

Strictly speaking, Beetz J’s decision is obiter, because the case was decided on the emergency power. Nevertheless, it became one of the major modern statements on the national concern branch. The Supreme Court’s decision marked the end of the Court’s expansion of the national concern branch, when the federal government attempted to deploy it in a core area of provincial jurisdiction – the regulation of intraprovincial economic activity. Although the Court broadened the scope of the national concern branch to encompass the regulation of environmental pollution (in Crown Zellerbach and References re Greenhouse Gas Pricing Act, below), the Anti-Inflation Reference remains the leading decision on the national concern branch and economic policy. Moreover, Beetz J’s arguments have been relied on by the Court to hold that the environment is not a matter of national concern.

2.2 LASKIN CJ (Judson, Spence, and Dickson JJ concurring)

> [Laskin CJC first addressed the extrinsic evidence that had been filed by the federal government.]
> The Attorney-General of Canada, having the carriage of the Reference, included in the case (1) the Order of Reference and the annexes thereto; (2) the federal Government’s White Paper, entitled “Attack on Inflation,” being the policy statement of the Minister of Finance tabled in the House of Commons on October 14, 1975, as a prelude to the introduction of the Bill, which became the Anti-Inflation Act, and to the Guidelines promulgated thereunder; and (3) the monthly bulletin of Statistics Canada for October, 1975, containing, inter alia, various consumer price indices showing the index position for certain periods up to and including September of 1975. Leave was given in the order for directions of April 6, 1976, to other interested parties to file additional materials, and the Canadian Labour Congress included as an appendix to its factum an untitled study by Professor Richard G. Lipsey, now a professor of economics at Queen’s University, Kingston, Ontario, in which he dealt with (1) the harm caused by inflation, (2) Canadian inflationary experience, (3) the state of the Canadian economy in 1975, and (4) various policy options in dealing with inflation, among them a prices and incomes policy. Telegrams from a large number of economists supporting the analysis made by Professor Lipsey were also submitted by the Canadian Labour Congress. The Attorney-General of Canada, following the filing of Professor Lipsey’s study and as permitted by the order for directions, filed in answer a transcript of a speech delivered on September 22, 1975, by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Gerald Bouey. The Attorney-General of Ontario filed, after the permitted period for submitting answering material, a comment, prepared by the Ontario Office of Economic Policy, on the 1975 Economic Environment and the Anti-Inflation Programme, designed to show the need for national action; and it also submitted a critique of Professor Lipsey’s study, directed to the emphases of that study and to its interpretation of the historical context in which the federal anti-inflation programme was instituted.
> In order to assess how relevant and, if relevant, what weight should be assigned to the extrinsic material, it is necessary to examine the ambit of the legislative power under which the Anti-Inflation Act was enacted. … It may well be that in most situations it is unnecessary to go beyond the terms of the impugned legislation to determine its validity. Yet, even where this has been deemed sufficient Courts have thought it proper to consider the operation and effect of the legislation as providing a key to its purpose, especially where the allegation is that the legislation has been cast in a colourable form. …
> [N]o general principle of admissibility or inadmissibility can or ought to be propounded by this Court, and … questions of resort to extrinsic evidence and what kind of extrinsic evidence may be admitted must depend on the constitutional issues on which it is sought to adduce such evidence. …
> The present case is … one in which federal legislation is challenged as involving unconstitutional regulation, and I am of the opinion that extrinsic material, bearing on the circumstances in which the legislation was passed, may be considered by the Court in determining whether the legislation rests on a valid constitutional base. There is no issue in this case as to the meaning of the terms of the legislation nor, in my opinion, is there any issue as to the object of the legislation. As will appear from what follows, the arguments of the proponents and the opponents of the Anti-Inflation Act turn substantially on whether the social and economic circumstances upon which Parliament can be said to have proceeded in passing the Act were such as to provide support for the Act in the power of Parliament to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada. The extrinsic material proffered in this case was directed to this question and may, hence, be properly considered thereon.

—II—

I turn, therefore, for the purposes of the present case and in order to answer the first question referred to this Court, to an examination of the constitutional basis for the Anti-Inflation Act … Simply put, the Anti-Inflation Act is supported by the Attorney-General of Canada under the opening words of s. 91 of the British North America Act, 1867 as being a law for the peace, order and good government of Canada in relation to matters not coming within the classes of subjects assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces. …

The Attorney-General of Canada, supported by the Attorney-General of Ontario, put his position in support of the Anti-Inflation Act on alternative bases. He relied, primarily, on the Canada Temperance Federation case, contending that the Act, directed to containment and reduction of inflation, concerned a matter which went beyond local or private or provincial concern and was of a nature which engaged vital national interests, among them the integrity of the Canadian monetary system which was unchallengeably within exclusive federal protection and control. He urged, in the alternative, that there was an economic crisis amounting to an emergency or exceptional peril to economic stability sufficient to warrant federal intervention, and, if not an existing peril, there was a reasonable apprehension of an impending one that justified federal intervention through the legislation in question which was designed to support measures and policies of a fiscal and monetary character which were undoubtedly within Parliament's legislative authority. …

Since there was, in general, a concession by those opposing the legislation that it would be valid if it were what I may call crisis legislation, and since the proponents of the legislation urged this as an alternative ground on which its validity should be sustained, it appears to me to be the wise course to consider first whether the Anti-Inflation Act can be supported on that footing. If it is sustainable as crisis legislation, it becomes unnecessary to consider the broader ground advanced in its support [i.e., under the national concern doctrine], and this because, especially in constitutional cases, Courts should not, as a rule, go any farther than is necessary to determine the main issue before them.

The competing arguments on the question whether the Act is supportable as crisis legislation raised four main issues: (1) Did the Anti-Inflation Act itself belie the federal contention because of the form of the Act and, in particular, because of the exclusion of the provincial public sector from its imperative scope, notwithstanding that it is framed as a temporary measure albeit subject to extension of its operation? (2) Is the federal contention assisted by the preamble to the statute? (3) Does the extrinsic evidence put before the Court, and other matters of which the Court can take judicial notice without extrinsic material to back it up, show that there was a rational basis for the Act as a crisis measure? (4) Is it a tenable argument that exceptional character could be lent to the legislation as rising beyond local or provincial concerns because Parliament could reasonably take the view that it was a necessary measure to fortify action in other related areas of admittedly federal authority, such as that of monetary policy?

I have referred to the first of these issues earlier in these reasons. It goes to the form of the Anti-Inflation Act and to the question whether the scope of the compulsory application of the Anti-Inflation Act may be taken to indicate that the Parliament of Canada did not act through any sense of crisis or urgency in enacting it. I note that the federal public service, a very large public service, is governed by the Act and the Guidelines, that private employers of five hundred or more persons are subject to the Act and Guidelines, that the construction industry is particularly dealt with by making those who employ twenty or more persons in that industry subject to the Act and Guidelines and that the Act and Guidelines apply also to persons in various professions, including architects, accountants, dentists, engineers, lawyers, doctors and management consultants. Again, the Act provides for bringing within the Act and Guidelines businesses, irrespective of numbers employed, which are declared by Order in Council to be of strategic importance to the containment and reduction of inflation in Canada. Having regard to the enormous administrative problems which the programme entails, the coverage is comprehensive indeed in its immediately obligatory provisions. What is left out of compulsory coverage is the provincial public sector, including the municipal public sector, but provision is made for bringing this area into the programme under the Guidelines by agreements under s. 4(3) or s. 4(4) or s. 5.

I do not regard the provisions respecting the provincial public sector as an indicator that the Government and Parliament of Canada were not seized with urgency or manifested a lack of any sense of crisis in the establishment of the programme. Provincial governmental concern about rising inflation and concurrent unemployment was a matter of public record prior to the inauguration of the programme, and this Court was provided with copies of agreements that eight of the ten Provinces had made with the federal Government for the application therein of the federal Guidelines. Only British Columbia and Saskatchewan had not entered into agreements. With private industry and private services bound to the extent that they are, and with the federal public service also bound, I see it as a reasonable policy from the standpoint of administration to allow the Provinces to contract into the programme in respect of the provincial public sector under their own administration if this was their preference rather than by simply accepting, as they could, the federal administration. Since the "contracting in" is envisaged on the basis of the federal Guidelines the national character of the programme is underlined.

One of the submissions made by counsel [opposing the legislation] concerned provincial co-operation, but it was put in terms of an objection to the validity of the federal legislation, the proposition being that inflation was too sweeping a subject to be dealt with by a single authority, i.e., the federal Parliament, and that the proper constitutional approach, at least as a first approach, was through federal–provincial co-operation in terms of their respective powers under the respective enumerations in ss. 91 and 92. If this is meant to suggest that Parliament cannot act in relation to inflation even in a crisis situation, I must disagree. No doubt, federal–provincial co-operation along the lines suggested might have been attempted, but it does not follow that the federal policy that was adopted is vulnerable because a co-operative scheme on a legislative power basis was not tried first. Co-operative federalism may be consequential upon a lack of federal legislative power, but it is not a ground for denying it. …

The Attorney-General of Canada … emphasized the words [in the preamble] "that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern" and as well the following words that "to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation" (the italicized words were especially emphasized). I do not regard it as telling against the Attorney-General's alternative position that the very word "emergency" was not used. Forceful language would not carry the day for the Attorney-General of Canada if the circumstances attending its use did not support the constitutional significance sought to be drawn from it. Of course, the absence of any preamble would weaken the assertion of crisis conditions, and I have already drawn attention to the fact that no preamble suggesting a critical economic situation, indeed no preamble at all was included in the legislation challenged in the Board of Commerce case.

The preamble in the present case is sufficiently indicative that Parliament was introducing a far-reaching programme prompted by what in its view was a serious national condition. The validity of the Anti-Inflation Act does not, however, stand or fall on that preamble, but the preamble does provide a base for assessing the gravity of the circumstances which called forth the legislation.

This brings me to the third of the four issues above-mentioned, namely, the relevancy and weight of the extrinsic evidence and the assistance to be derived from judicial notice. When, as in this case, an issue is raised that exceptional circumstances underlie resort to a legislative power which may properly be invoked in such circumstances, the Court may be asked to consider extrinsic material bearing on the circumstances alleged, both in support of and in denial of the lawful exercise of legislative authority. In considering such material and assessing its weight, the Court does not look at it in terms of whether it provides proof of the exceptional circumstances as a matter of fact. The matter concerns social and economic policy and hence governmental and legislative judgment. It may be that the existence of exceptional circumstances is so notorious as to enable the Court, of its own motion, to take judicial notice of them without reliance on extrinsic material to inform it. Where this is not so evident, the extrinsic material need go only so far as to persuade the Court that there is a rational basis for the legislation which it is attributing to the head of power invoked in this case in support of its validity.

There is before this Court material from Statistics Canada, upon which the Court is justified in relying, which, proceeding from a base of 100 in 1971, shows that the purchasing power of the dollar dropped … What the Consumer Price Index shows, and Professor Lipsey himself relies on its figures, is that for the first time in many years Canada had a double digit inflation rate for successive years, i.e., in 1974 and 1975, the index rising 10.9% in 1974 above its reading for 1973 and being 10.8% higher in 1975 than it was in 1974. Some monthly drops slightly below double digit rises do not materially affect the relevance of the annual figures.

There have been inflationary periods before in our history but, again referring to Professor Lipsey's study, "the problem of the coexistence of high unemployment and high inflation rates was not, however, encountered before the late 1960's." These twin conditions continued to the time that the Government and Parliament acted in establishing its prices and incomes policy under the Anti-Inflation Act and Guidelines, and were the prime reason for the policy. …

There is another consideration that arises from the submissions, particularly those of the Canadian Labour Congress, in opposition to the validity of the Anti-Inflation Act as a measure justified by crisis circumstances. The consideration I refer to is based on Professor Lipsey's study and on his conclusion that the policy adopted in the Anti-Inflation Act is not one that can, on the basis of experience elsewhere and on his appraisal as an economist, be expected to reduce the rate of inflation by more than one to two per cent. The answer to this submission is simple, and it is an answer that has been consistently given by the Courts, namely, that the wisdom or expediency or likely success of a particular policy expressed in legislation is not subject to judicial review. Hence, it is not for the Court to say in this case that because the means adopted to realize a desirable end, i.e., the containment and reduction of inflation in Canada, may not be effectual, those means are beyond the legislative power of Parliament.

I would not exclude the possibility that the means chosen to deal with an alleged evil may be some indicator of whether that evil exists as a foundation for legislation. Professor Lipsey is candid enough to say in his study that whether "a problem is serious enough to be described as a crisis must be partly a matter of judgment." The general question to which his study is directed is, to use his words, "could an economist say that the Canadian economy faced an economic crisis, or was in a critical situation, in October 1975?" He answers this question in the negative on the basis, inter alia, of comparative assessment of different periods, and he is supported in this view by many other economists. The Court cannot, however, be concluded by the judgment of an economist, distinguished as he is in the opinion of his peers, on a question of the validity of the exercise of the legislative power invoked in this case. The economic judgment can be taken into account as an element in arriving at an answer to the question whether there is a rational basis for the governmental and legislative judgment exercised in the enactment of the Anti-Inflation Act. It cannot determine the answer.

In my opinion, this Court would be unjustified in concluding, on the submissions in this case and on all the material put before it, that the Parliament of Canada did not have a rational basis for regarding the Anti-Inflation Act as a measure which, in its judgment, was temporarily necessary to meet a situation of economic crisis imperilling the well-being of the people of Canada as a whole and requiring Parliament's stern intervention in the interests of the country as a whole. That there may have been other periods of crisis in which no similar action was taken is beside the point.

The rationality of the judgment so exercised is, in my view, supported by a consideration of the fourth of the issues which I enumerated above. The fact that there had been rising inflation at the time federal action was taken, that inflation is regarded as a monetary phenomenon and that monetary policy is admittedly within exclusive federal jurisdiction persuades me that the Parliament of Canada was entitled, in the circumstances then prevailing and to which I have already referred, to act as it did from the springboard of its jurisdiction over monetary policy and, I venture to add, with additional support from its power in relation to the regulation of trade and commerce. The Government White Paper refers to a prices and incomes policy as one element in a four-pronged programme of which the first engages its fiscal and monetary authority; and although the White Paper states that the Government rejects the use of severe monetary and fiscal restraints to stop inflation because of the alleged heavy immediate cost in unemployment and foregone output, it could seek to blend policies in those areas with a prices and incomes policy under the circumstances revealed by the extrinsic material. …

For all the foregoing reasons, I would hold that the Anti-Inflation Act is valid legislation for the peace, order and good government of Canada and does not, in the circumstances under which it was enacted and having regard to its temporary character, invade provincial legislative jurisdiction. …

2.3 BEETZ J (de Grandpré J concurring) (dissenting):

… The control and regulation of local trade and of commodity pricing and of profit margins in the provincial sectors have consistently been held to lie, short of a national emergency, within exclusive provincial jurisdiction. … The same is true generally of the contract of employment, including wages, whether concluded on an individual basis or collectively in the context of labour relations. …

The Anti-Inflation Act, therefore, and the Guidelines directly and ostensibly interfere with classes of matters which have invariably been held to come within exclusive provincial jurisdiction, more particularly property and civil rights and the law of contract. They do not interfere with provincial jurisdiction in an incidental or ancillary way, but in a frontal way and on a large scale. Prima facie, the Anti-Inflation Act is pro tanto ultra vires of the Parliament of Canada which, under s. 91 of the Constitution, cannot make laws in relation to matters "coming within the classes of subjects by this Act assigned exclusively to the Legislatures of the Provinces." …

I

The first submission made by counsel for Canada and for Ontario is that the subject-matter of the Anti-Inflation Act is the containment and the reduction of inflation. This subject-matter, it is argued, goes beyond local provincial concern or interest and is from its inherent nature the concern of Canada as a whole and falls within the competence of Parliament as a matter affecting the peace, order and good government of Canada. It was further submitted that the competence of Parliament over the subject of inflation may be supported by reference to the following heads of s. 91 of the Constitution: [ss 91(2), (3), (4), (14), (15), (16), (19), and (20)].

If the first submission is to be accepted, then it must be conceded that the Anti-Inflation Act could be compellingly extended to the provincial public sector. Parliament has not done so in this case as a matter of legislative policy but, it could decide to control and regulate at least the maximum salaries paid to all provincial public servants notwithstanding any provincial appropriations, budgets and laws. Parliament could also regulate wages paid by municipalities, educational institutions, hospitals and other provincial services as well as tuition or other fees charged by some of these institutions for their services. Parliament could occupy the whole field of rent controls. Since in time of inflation there can be a great deal of speculation in certain precious possessions such as land or works of arts, Parliament could move to prevent or control that speculation not only in regulating the trade or the price of those possessions but by any other efficient method reasonably connected with the control of inflation. For example Parliament could presumably enact legislation analogous to mortmain legislation and even extend it to individuals. Parliament could control all inventories in the largest as in the smallest undertakings, industries and trades. Parliament could ration not only food but practically everything else in order to prevent hoarding and unfair profits. One could even go further and argue that since inflation and productivity are greatly interdependent, Parliament could regulate productivity, establish quotas and impose the output of goods or services which corporations, industries, factories, groups, areas, villages, farmers, workers, should produce in any given period. Indeed, since practically any activity or lack of activity affects the gross national product, the value of the Canadian dollar and, therefore, inflation, it is difficult to see what would be beyond the reach of Parliament. Furthermore, all those powers would belong to Parliament permanently; only a constitutional amendment could reduce them. Finally, the power to regulate and control inflation as such would belong to Parliament to the exclusion of the Legislatures if, as is contended, that power were to vest in Parliament in the same manner as the power to control and regulate aeronautics or radio communication or the power to develop and conserve the national capital (Aeronautics, Radio, Johannesson and Munro cases): the Provinces could probably continue to regulate profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation if Parliament saw fit to leave them any room; but they could not regulate them in relation to inflation which would have become an area of exclusive federal jurisdiction.

Such are the constitutional imports of the first submission in terms of the so-called subject-matter of inflation.

Its effects on the principles which underlie the distribution of other powers between Parliament and the Legislatures are even more far-reaching assuming there would be much left of the distribution of powers if Parliament has exclusive authority in relation to the "containment and reduction of inflation."

If the first submission is correct, then it could also be said that the promotion of economic growth or the limits to growth or the protection of the environment have become global problems and now constitute subject-matters of national concern going beyond local provincial concern or interest and coming within the exclusive legislative authority of Parliament. It could equally be argued that older subjects such as the business of insurance or labour relations, which are not specifically listed in the enumeration of federal and provincial powers and have been held substantially to come within provincial jurisdiction have outgrown provincial authority whenever the business of insurance or labour have become national in scope. It is not difficult to speculate as to where this line of reasoning would lead: a fundamental feature of the Constitution, its federal nature, the distribution of powers between Parliament and the provincial Legislatures, would disappear not gradually but rapidly. …

This submission is predicated upon the proposition that the subject-matter of the Anti-Inflation Act, its pith and substance, is inflation or the containment and reduction of inflation. …

The "containment and reduction of inflation" can be achieved by various means including monetary policies—a federal field; the reduction of public expenditures—federal, provincial and municipal; and the restraint of profits, prices and wages—a federal or a provincial field depending on the sector.

I have no reason to doubt that the Anti-Inflation Act is part of a more general programme aimed at inflation and which may include fiscal and monetary measures and Government expenditure policies. I am prepared to accept that inflation was the occasion or the reason for its enactment. But I do not agree that inflation is the subject-matter of the Act. In order to characterize an enactment, one must look at its operation, at its effects and at the scale of its effects rather than at its ultimate purpose where the purpose is practically all-embracing. If for instance Parliament is to enact a tax law or a monetary law as a part of an anti-inflation programme no one will think that such laws have ceased to be a tax law or a monetary law and that they have become subsumed into their ultimate purpose so that they should rather be characterized as "anti-inflation laws," an expression which, in terms of actual content, is not meaningful. They plainly remain and continue to be called a tax law or a monetary law, although they have been enacted by reason of an inflationary situation. When the Bank of Canada changes its rate of interest, it must obviously take inflation into account; even if inflation is the main reason for such a measure, this measure will still be characterized by everyone as a central banking measure relating to interest. The same would also be said of a measure relating to the issue of currency; although it may have been dictated by inflationary trends, it remains a measure relating to currency, coinage or the issue of paper money. Similarly, the Anti-Inflation Act is, as its preamble states, clearly a law relating to the control of profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation, that is, with respect to the provincial private sector, a law relating to the regulation of local trade, to contract and to property and civil rights in the Provinces, enacted as part of a programme to combat inflation. Property and civil rights in the Provinces are, for the greater part, the pith and substance or the subject-matter of the Anti-Inflation Act. According to the Constitution, Parliament may fight inflation with the powers put at its disposal by the specific heads enumerated in s. 91 or by such powers as are outside of s. 92. But it cannot, apart from a declaration of national emergency or from a constitutional amendment, fight inflation with powers exclusively reserved to the Provinces, such as the power to make laws in relation to property and civil rights. This is what Parliament has in fact attempted to do in enacting the Anti-Inflation Act.

The authorities relied upon by Counsel for Canada and Ontario in support of the first submission are connected with the constitutional doctrine that became known as the national concern doctrine or national dimension doctrine. …

In my view, the incorporation of companies for objects other than provincial, the regulation and control of aeronautics and of radio, the development, conservation and improvement of the National Capital Region are clear instances of distinct subject-matters which do not fall within any of the enumerated heads of s. 92 and which, by nature, are of national concern.

I fail to see how the authorities which so decide lend support to the first submission. They had the effect of adding by judicial process new matters or new classes of matters to the federal list of powers. However, this was done only in cases where a new matter was not an aggregate but had a degree of unity that made it indivisible, an identity which made it distinct from provincial matters and a sufficient consistence to retain the bounds of form. The scale upon which these new matters enabled Parliament to touch on provincial matters had also to be taken into consideration before they were recognized as federal matters: if an enumerated federal power designated in broad terms such as the trade and commerce power had to be construed so as not to embrace and smother provincial powers (Parsons ' case) and destroy the equilibrium of the Constitution, the Courts must be all the more careful not to add hitherto unnamed powers of a diffuse nature to the list of federal powers.

The "containment and reduction of inflation" does not pass muster as a new subject matter. It is an aggregate of several subjects some of which form a substantial part of provincial jurisdiction. It is totally lacking in specificity. It is so pervasive that it knows no bounds. Its recognition as a federal head of power would render most provincial powers nugatory.

I should add that inflation is a very ancient phenomenon, several thousand years old, as old probably as the history of currency. The Fathers of Confederation were quite aware of it. …

For those reasons, the first submission fails.

II

The second submission made in support of the validity of the Anti-Inflation Act is that the inflationary situation was in October of 1975, and still is such as to constitute a national emergency of the same significance as war, pestilence or insurrection and that there is in Parliament an implied power to deal with the emergency for the safety of Canada as a whole; that such situation of exceptional necessity justified the enactment of the impugned legislation.

Before I deal with this second submission I should state at the outset that I am prepared to assume the validity of the following propositions:

- the power of Parliament under the national emergency doctrine is not confined to war situations or to situations of transition from war to peace; an emergency of the nature contemplated by the doctrine may arise in peace time;
- inflation may constitute such an emergency;
- Parliament may validly exercise its national emergency powers before an emergency actually occurs; a state of apprehended emergency or crisis suffices to justify Parliament in taking preventive measures including measures to contain and reduce inflation where inflation amounts to state of apprehended crisis.

In order to decide whether the Anti-Inflation Act is valid as a national emergency measure, one must first consider the way in which the emergency doctrine operates in the Canadian Constitution; one must find, in the second place whether the Anti-Inflation Act was in fact enacted on the basis that it was a measure to deal with a national emergency in the constitutional sense.

In referring to the emergency doctrine, the Judicial Committee has sometimes used expressions which would at first appear to indicate that there is no difference between the national dimension or national concern doctrine and the emergency doctrine, the latter being but an instance of the first, or that the distribution of powers between Parliament and the provincial Legislatures is not altered by a state of emergency, or again that when Parliament deals with a matter which in normal times would be an exclusively provincial matter, it does so under a federal aspect or in a new relation which lies outside of s. 92 of the Constitution. …

I disagree with the proposition that the national concern or national dimension doctrine and the emergency doctrine amount to the same. Even if it could be said that "where an emergency exists it is the emergency which gives the matter its dimension of national concern or interest" (Le Dain, op. cit., p. 291) the emergency does not give the matter the same dimensions as the national concern doctrine applied for instance in the Aeronautics case or in the Munro case. The national concern doctrine illustrated by these cases applies in practice as if certain heads such as aeronautics or the development and conservation of the national capital were added to the categories of subject-matters enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution when it is found by the Courts that, in substance, a class of subjects not enumerated in either s. 91 or s. 92 lies outside the first fifteen heads enumerated in s. 92 and is not of a merely local or private nature. Whenever the national concern theory is applied, the effect is permanent although it is limited by the identity of the subject newly recognized to be of national dimensions. By contrast, the power of Parliament to make laws in a great crisis knows no limits other than those which are dictated by the nature of the crisis. But one of those limits is the temporary nature of the crisis. …

… if one looks at the practical effects of the exercise of the emergency power, one must conclude that it operates so as to give to Parliament for all purposes necessary to deal with the emergency, concurrent and paramount jurisdiction over matters which would normally fall within exclusive provincial jurisdiction. To that extent, the exercise of that power amounts to a temporary pro tanto amendment of a federal Constitution by the unilateral action of Parliament. The legitimacy of that power is derived from the Constitution: when the security and the continuation of the Constitution and of the nation are at stake, the kind of power commensurate with the situation "is only to be found in that part of the constitution which establishes power in the state as a whole" (Viscount Haldane in the Fort Frances case, p. 704).

The extraordinary nature and the constitutional features of the emergency power of Parliament dictate the manner and form in which it should be invoked and exercised. It should not be an ordinary manner and form. At the very least, it cannot be a manner and form which admits of the slightest degree of ambiguity to be resolved by interpretation. In cases where the existence of an emergency may be a matter of controversy, it is imperative that Parliament should not have recourse to its emergency power except in the most explicit terms indicating that it is acting on the basis of that power. Parliament cannot enter the normally forbidden area of provincial jurisdiction unless it gives an unmistakable signal that it is acting pursuant to its extraordinary power. Such a signal is not conclusive to support the legitimacy of the action of Parliament but its absence is fatal. It is the duty of the Courts to uphold the Constitution, not to seal its suspension, and they cannot decide that a suspension is legitimate unless the highly exceptional power to suspend it has been expressly invoked by Parliament. Also, they cannot entertain a submission implicitly asking them to make findings of fact justifying even a temporary interference with the normal constitutional process unless Parliament has first assumed responsibility for affirming in plain words that the facts are such as to justify the interference. The responsibility of the Courts begins after the affirmation has been made. If there is no such affirmation, the Constitution receives its normal application. Otherwise, it is the Courts which are indirectly called upon to proclaim the state of emergency whereas it is essential that this be done by a politically responsible body.

We have not been referred to a single judicial decision, and I know of none, ratifying the exercise by Parliament of its national emergency power where the constitutional foundation for the exercise of that power had not been given clear utterance to. And, apart from judicial decisions, I know of no precedent where it could be said that Parliament had attempted to exercise such an extraordinary power by way of suggestion or innuendo.

The use of the national emergency power enables Parliament to override provincial laws in potentially every field: it must be explicit.

This is not to say that Parliament is bound to use ritual words. Words such as "emergency" are not necessarily required and they may indeed be used in a non-constitutional sense since Parliament can enact emergency or urgent legislation in fields prima facie coming within its normal authority. …

… What is required from Parliament when it purports to exercise its extraordinary emergency power in any situation where a dispute could arise as to the existence of the emergency and as to the constitutional foundation of its action, is an indication, I would even say a proclamation, in the title, the preamble or the text of the instrument, which cannot possibly leave any doubt that, given the nature of the crisis, Parliament in fact purports to act on the basis of that power. The Statutes of Canada and the Canada Gazette contain several examples of laws, proclamations and Orders in Council which leave room for no doubt that they have been enacted pursuant to the exceptional emergency power of Parliament, or issued or passed under the authority of an Act of Parliament enacted by virtue of that power. Those dealing with wartime or post-wartime conditions usually present no difficulty given the global aspect of modern warfare, the total conscription of activities which it is susceptible to impose upon nations, and the general recognition of the factual situation. …

The Anti-Inflation Act fails in my opinion to pass the test of explicitness required to signal that it has been enacted pursuant to the national emergency power of Parliament.

The preamble has been much relied upon:

> WHEREAS the Parliament of Canada recognizes that inflation in Canada at current levels is contrary to the interests of all Canadians and that the containment and reduction of inflation has become a matter of serious national concern;

> AND WHEREAS to accomplish such containment and reduction of inflation it is necessary to restrain profit margins, prices, dividends and compensation;
> The words "a matter of serious national concern" have been emphasized.
> I remain unimpressed.
> The death penalty is a matter of national concern. So is abortion. So is the killing or maiming of innumerable people by impaired drivers. So is the traffic in narcotics and drugs. One can conceive of several drastic measures, all coming within the ordinary jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, and which could be preceded by a preamble reciting that a given situation had become a matter of serious national concern. I fail to see how the adding of the word "serious" can convey the meaning that Parliament has decided to embark upon an exercise of its extraordinary emergency power. …
> There is nothing in the rest of the Act and in the Guidelines to show that they have been passed to deal with a national emergency. There is much, on the other hand, within the Act and the Guidelines, in terms of actual or potential exemptions which is inconsistent with the nature of a global war launched on inflation considered as a great emergency. It would not be within our province to judge the efficacy and wisdom of the legislation if it were truly enacted to deal with an extraordinary crisis but its lack of comprehensiveness may be indicative of its ordinary character.
> [Beetz J reviewed the various exemptions under the Act and the optional application to the provincial public sector by provincial consent.]
>
> It may be argued that those exemptions and options were put into the Act and the Guidelines in order to make their administration lighter and easier or as a matter of federal–provincial comity. Still, a situation of national emergency does not, at first sight, lend itself to opting in and opting out formulae nor to large scale exemptions.
> We have been invited to go outside the Act and the Guidelines and consider extrinsic evidence and take judicial notice of facts of public knowledge.
>
> It is a fact for instance that provincial Governments were seriously concerned about rising inflation and that eight of the ten Provinces have entered into agreements with the Government of Canada for the application of the federal guidelines. But I cannot regard that concern and these agreements as a recognition that Parliament was acting under its national emergency power when it enacted the Anti-Inflation Act. Only Parliament, or under a law of Parliament, the Government of Canada, can assume responsibility for declaring a state of national emergency; it would be delicate and probably unwarranted for the Courts to count Provinces and to evaluate the degree of provincial support in such a matter. …
> We were provided with a wealth of extrinsic material the consideration of which, it was expected, would enable us to make a finding of fact as to whether or not inflation had reached a level which justified Parliament's reliance on its extraordinary power or as to whether or not there was a rational basis for Parliament to judge that it could rely upon that power. I do not reach that point, of course, since I hold the view that Parliament did not rely upon its extraordinary power. It seems to me, however, that, if we are entitled to look at extrinsic material such as a policy statement tabled in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance, statistics, an economic study, a speech delivered by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, it is not improper for us to read Hansard in this case, in order not to construe and apply the provisions of the Anti-Inflation Act, but to ascertain its constitutional pivot. A perusal of the debates reveals that between October 14, 1975, when the policy statement was tabled—the Anti-Inflation Bill C-73 was read for the first time in the Commons on October 16, 1975—and the third reading and the passing of the Bill in the Senate on December 10, 1975, the question was raised repeatedly in both Houses and in Committee as to what was the constitutional foundation of the Bill and as to whether it was not necessary expressly to declare a state of emergency in order to insure its constitutionality. The replies vary but slightly; their general tenor is to the effect that Parliament has jurisdiction to pass the bill as drafted under the peace, order and good government power—which is rather unrevealing—in addition to other specific federal powers enumerated in s. 91 of the Constitution. …
> Reliance upon those statements is not essential to my conclusions. However, they reinforce my opinion that the Anti-Inflation Act was enacted in this form because it was believed, erroneously, that Parliament had the ordinary power to enact it under the national concern or national dimension doctrine, that is, a basis which coincides identically with the first submission made to us by counsel for Canada. Parliament did not purport to enact it under the extraordinary power which it possesses in time of national crisis.
> The Anti-Inflation Act is in my opinion ultra vires of Parliament in so far at least as it applies to the provincial private sector; but severability having not been pleaded by counsel for Canada, I would declare the Act ultra vires of Parliament in whole.

2.4 RITCHIE J (Martland and Pigeon JJ concurring)

> [Ritchie J, with Martland and Pigeon JJ concurring, agreed with Beetz J that the national concern doctrine did not apply. He went on to find that the legislation was justified under the national emergency doctrine, relying on the Act's preamble and the government's White Paper to show that Parliament was motivated "by a sense of urgent necessity created by highly exceptional circumstances." In his view, the opponents of the legislation had failed to show by "very clear evidence that an emergency had not arisen when the statute was enacted.]

2.5 Other implications of the Anti-Inflation Reference

2.5.1 Extrinsic Evidence

The Anti-Inflation Reference admitted social-science briefs in constitutional cases where legislative facts are in issue. Re Residential Tenancies Act, 1981 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 714 elaborated on the admissibility of extrinsic evidence in constitutional cases in (at 723):

> We should be loathe, it seems to me, to enunciate any inflexible rule governing the admissibility of extrinsic materials in constitutional references. The effect of such a rule might well be to exclude logically relevant and highly probative evidence. It is preferable, I think, to follow the practice adopted in the Anti-Inflation Reference and give timely directions establishing the evidence or extraneous materials to be admitted to serve the ends of the Court in the particular reference. Generally speaking, for the purpose of constitutional characterization of an Act we should not deny ourselves such assistance as Royal Commission reports or Law Reform Commission reports underlying and forming the basis of the legislation under study, may afford. The weight to be given such reports is, of course, an entirely different matter. They may carry great, little, or no weight, but at least they should, in my view, generally be admitted as an aid in determining the social and economic conditions under which the Act was enacted. … The mischief at which the Act was directed, the background against which the legislation was enacted and institutional framework in which the Act is to operate are all logically relevant.

Reference re Upper Churchill Water Rights Reversion Act, 1984 CanLII 17 (SCC), [1984] 1 S.C.R. 297 at 318, emphasized that the purpose to which extrinsic evidence could be put: "in constitutional cases, particularly where there are allegations of colourability, extrinsic evidence may be considered to ascertain not only the operation and effect of the impugned legislation but its true object and purpose as well." In that case, the SCC refused to admit as evidence speeches that were made in the Newfoundland Legislative Assembly at the time the relevant law was enacted. The SCC thought that the speeches of individual political actors could not be said to represent the intent of the legislature. However, in R v Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463 at 484-85 (which is discussed in other chapters) the SCC decided that Hansard evidence could be admitted:

> Provided that the court remains mindful of the limited reliability and weight of Hansard evidence, it should be admitted as relevant to both the background and the purpose of legislation. Indeed, its admissibility in constitutional cases to aid in determining the background and purpose of legislation now appears well established.

2.5.2 The federal Emergencies Act

Parliament enacted new legislation to deal with national emergencies in 1988: the Emergencies Act, RSC 1985, c 22 (4th Supp), enacted SC 1988, c 29. Several features of the Act reflect the concern expressed by Beetz J in the Anti-Inflation Reference: that the exercise of the emergency power "amounts to a temporary pro tanto amendment of a federal Constitution by the unilateral action of Parliament". They also reflect Laskin CJC's view that there must be a "rational basis" for the emergency.

First, section 3 defines a "national emergency" as > an urgent and critical situation of a temporary nature that

>
> (a) seriously endangers the lives, health or safety of Canadians and is of such proportions or nature as to exceed the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it, or
> (b) seriously threatens the ability of the Government of Canada to preserve the sovereignty, security and territorial integrity of Canada > and that cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada.

The definition establishes two kinds of emergency. The first kind of emergency that "seriously endangers the lives, health or safety of Canadians" includes the requirement that the emergency be "of such proportions or nature as to exceed the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it". This definition presupposes that the provinces, in the first instance, will respond to these emergencies. It also requires that the federal government demonstrate that the situation exceed provincial capacity or authority. Provincial authority refers to legal powers, whereas capacity refers to operational capabilities (for example, personnel, equipment, expertise). The definition does not refer to situations where provinces have capacity and authority but choose not to act. The second kind of emergency – threats to Canada's sovereignty, security and territorial integrity – do not incorporate this requirement, as they are external threats that the federal government has core responsibility for addressing through its power over national defence under s. 91(7) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

In addition, the requirement that the situation "cannot be effectively dealt with under any other law of Canada" also raises questions of federalism, in cases where provinces enforce federal laws. The principal area where this occurs is criminal law, local and provincial police, the RCMP, when acting as contract police for provinces or municipalities, enforce the federal Criminal Code.

Second, the Act sets out four kinds of emergencies: public welfare, public order, international, and war emergencies. What is notably absent from this list is economic emergencies, which was at the heart of the Anti-Inflation Reference. Moreover, each kind of emergency must be a national emergency, and meet additional criteria. Public welfare and public order emergencies fall in areas of provincial jurisdiction. Section 5 defines a "public welfare emergency" as:

> an emergency that is caused by a real or imminent
> (a) fire, flood, drought, storm, earthquake or other natural phenomenon,
> (b) disease in human beings, animals or plants, or
> (c) accident or pollution
> and that results or may result in a danger to life or property, social disruption or a breakdown in the flow of essential goods, services or resources, so serious as to be a national emergency.

Section 16 defines a "public order emergency" as "an emergency that arises from threats to the security of Canada and that is so serious as to be a national emergency", and further defines "threats to the security of Canada" as having the same meaning as under the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act.

Third, the Act vests the federal Cabinet (Governor in Council) with the power to declare an emergency, but only if it has "reasonable grounds" doing so – akin to a reasonable basis. The declaration must concisely describe the state of affairs constituting the emergency and it must be confirmed by Parliament. The declaration must be temporary, which reflects the extraordinary nature of the emergency power. The "reasonable grounds" requirement

Fourth, a declaration of an emergency cannot be made without prior consultation with affected provincial governments. The nature of provincial consultation varies. It is mandatory for public welfare and public order emergencies. If the federal government declares a public order or public welfare emergency in a single province, that province must consent.

For many years, the Emergencies Act was not used – for example, after 9/11, and in response to the global public health emergency caused by the COVID-19 pandemic. But in February 2022, the federal Cabinet declared a public order emergency across Canada, in response to protests regarding public health restrictions to address COVID-19, which at their peak blocked several major border crossings (including the Ambassador Bridge in Windsor) and occupied downtown Ottawa. Pursuant to its emergency powers, Cabinet promulgated regulations that prohibited participation in a public assembly that may reasonably be expected to lead to a breach of the peace, and travel to/within such assemblies. It also issued a regulation that sought gather financial information about those participating in the unlawful assemblies and to freeze their assets.

Cabinet's invocation of the Act was successfully challenged on administrative law grounds in the Federal Court: Canadian Front Line Nurses et al. v. AGC, 2024 FC 42. Federalism was a central theme. According to the Court, Cabinet had not justified its "conclusion that it [i.e. the protests] could not have been effectively dealt with under other laws of Canada … or that it exceeded the capacity or authority of a province to deal with it" in the face of the evidence (para. 254). For example, Cabinet asserted that the purported emergency "exists throughout Canada" but had not justified this conclusion in the face of evidence that showed this assertion was "an overstatement of the situation known to the Government at that time" (para. 248). The Court also rejected the AG of Canada's argument that "new blockades could emerge", because Cabinet had not justified this conclusion in the face of "the evidence available to Cabinet … that these were being dealt with by local and provincial authorities, through arrests and superior court injunctions, aside from the impasse which remained in Ottawa" (paras. 248, 249). As for Ottawa, Cabinet had not addressed the fact that "there appears to have been no obstacle to assembling the large number of police officers from a variety of other forces ultimately required to assist the OPS [Ottawa Police Service] to remove the blockade participants", and the impasse was a product of "the overwhelming volume of protesters" and "a failure of leadership and determination, together with a mistaken assumption that the protest would be short lived."(paras. 250, 252).

At the time of writing, the Federal Court's decision is on appeal to the Federal Court of Appeal.

3 Crown Zellerbach: Environmental Pollution

Prior to References Re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11 (discussed below), the leading modern case on the national dimension doctrine was R. v. Crown Zellerbach, 1988 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 401. It is also a leading case on the scope of federal jurisdiction over environmental pollution.

The majority judgment was issued by Le Dain J (Dickson C.J. and McIntyre, Wilson JJ concurring). La Forest J. (Beetz and Lamer JJ) dissented. The debate between Le Dain and La Forest JJ anticipated many of the themes in References Re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act (which is included later in this chapter), including the interprovincial and international character of pollution and the provincial inability test.

3.1 LE DAIN J (Dickson C.J. and McIntyre, Wilson JJ concurring)

[1] The question raised by this appeal is whether federal legislative jurisdiction to regulate the dumping of substances at sea, as a measure for the prevention of marine pollution, extends to the regulation of dumping in provincial marine waters. In issue is the validity of s. 4(1) of the Ocean Dumping Control Act, S.C. 1974-75-76, c. 55, which prohibits the dumping of any substance at sea except in accordance with the terms and conditions of a permit, the sea being defined for the purposes of the Act as including the internal waters of Canada other than fresh waters. …

[3] The general purpose of the Ocean Dumping Control Act is to regulate the dumping of substances at sea in order to prevent various kinds of harm to the marine environment. The Act would appear to have been enacted in fulfillment of Canada's obligations under the Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter, which was signed by Canada on December 29, 1972. That is not expressly stated in the Act, but there are several references to the Convention in the Act … .

[4] The concerns of the Act are reflected in the nature of the prohibited and restricted substances in Schedules I and II and in the factors to be taken into account by the Minister of the Environment in granting permits to dump, which are set out in ss. 9 and 10 of the Act and in Schedule III. What these provisions indicate is that the Act is concerned with marine pollution and its effect on marine life, human health and the amenities of the marine environment. There is also reference to the effect of dumping on navigation and shipping and other legitimate uses of the sea. …

[12] The respondent [i.e. Crown Zellerbach] carries on logging operations on Vancouver Island in connection with its forest products business in British Columbia and maintains a log dump on a water lot leased from the provincial Crown for the purpose of log booming and storage in Beaver Cove, off Johnstone Strait, on the northeast side of Vancouver Island. The waters of Beaver Cove are inter fauces terrae, or as put in the stated case, "Beaver Cove is of such size that a person standing on the shoreline of either side of Beaver Cove can easily and reasonably discern between shore and shore of Beaver Cove." On August 16 and 17, 1980 the respondent, using an 80-foot crane operating from a moored scow, dredged woodwaste from the ocean floor immediately adjacent to the shoreline at the site of its log dump in Beaver Cove and deposited it in the deeper waters of the cove approximately 60 to 80 feet seaward of where the woodwaste had been dredged. The purpose of the dredging and dumping was to allow a new A-frame structure for log dumping to be floated on a barge to the shoreline for installation there and to give clearance for the dumping of bundled logs from the A-frame structure into the waters of the log dump area. The woodwaste consisted of waterlogged logging debris such as bark, wood and slabs. There is no evidence of any dispersal of the woodwaste or any effect on navigation or marine life. At the relevant time the only permit held by the respondent under the Act was one issued on or about July 28, 1980, effective until July 25, 1981, to dump at a site in Johnstone Strait some 2.2 nautical miles from the place where the woodwaste was dumped. …

[Crown Zellerbach was charged with dumping of substances at "sea" accept in accordance with the terms and conditions of a permit. In defence to the charge, Crown Zellerbach challenged the constitutionality of the Act in its application to provincial marine waters, on federalism grounds]

[16]… The respondent concedes, as it must, that Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate dumping in waters lying outside the territorial limits of any province. It also concedes that Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate the dumping of substances in provincial waters to prevent pollution of those waters that is harmful to fisheries … . It further concedes, in view of the opinion expressed in this Court in Interprovincial Co-operatives Ltd. v. The Queen, 1975 CanLII 212 (SCC), [1976] 1 SCR 477, that Parliament has jurisdiction to regulate the dumping in provincial waters of substances that can be shown to cause pollution in extra-provincial waters. What the respondent challenges is federal jurisdiction to control the dumping in provincial waters of substances that are not shown to have a pollutant effect in extra-provincial waters. The respondent contends that on the admitted facts that is precisely the present case. The respondent submits that in so far as s. 4(1) of the Act can only be read as purporting to apply to such dumping it is ultra vires and, alternatively, that it should be read, if possible, so as not to apply to such dumping. In either case the appeal must fail. The Attorney General of British Columbia, who supported the attack on s. 4(1), as applied to the dumping of waste in Beaver Cove, and with whom the Attorney General of Quebec agreed, made a similar submission that s. 4(1) should be read down so as not to apply to dumping in provincial waters. …

[17] In this Court … [the Attorney General of Canada's] principal submission in this court was that the control of dumping in provincial marine waters, for the reasons indicated in the Act, was part of a single matter of national concern or dimension which fell within the federal peace, order and good government power. He characterized this matter as the prevention of ocean or marine pollution. …

[18] … The respondent, on the other hand, contends that by its terms the Act is directed at dumping which need not necessarily have a pollutant effect. It prohibits the dumping of any substance, including a substance not specified in Schedule I or Schedule II, except in accordance with the terms and conditions of a permit. In my opinion, despite this apparent scope, the Act, viewed as a whole, may be properly characterized as directed to the control or regulation of marine pollution, in so far as that may be relevant to the question of legislative jurisdiction. The chosen and perhaps only effective, regulatory model makes it necessary, in order to prevent marine pollution, to prohibit the dumping of any substance without a permit. … The Act is concerned with the dumping of substances which may be shown or presumed to have an adverse effect on the marine environment. The Minister and not the person proposing to do the dumping must be the judge of this… There is no suggestion that the Act purports to authorize the prohibition of dumping without regard to perceived adverse effect or the likelihood of such effect on the marine environment. The nature of the marine environment and its protection from adverse effect from dumping is a complex matter which must be left to expert judgment. …

[22] I agree with Schmidt Prov. Ct. J. and the British Columbia Court of Appeal that federal legislative jurisdiction with respect to seacoast and inland fisheries is not sufficient by itself to support the constitutional validity of s. 4(1) of the Act because that section, viewed in the context of the Act as a whole, fails to meet the test laid down in Fowler and Northwest Falling. While the effect on fisheries of marine pollution caused by the dumping of waste is clearly one of the concerns of the Act it is not the only effect of such pollution with which the Act is concerned. A basis for federal legislative jurisdiction to control marine pollution generally in provincial waters cannot be found in any of the specified heads of federal jurisdiction in s. 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, whether taken individually or collectively. …

[23] It is necessary then to consider the national dimensions or national concern doctrine (as it is now generally referred to) of the federal peace, order and good government power as a possible basis for the constitutional validity of s. 4(1) of the Act, as applied to the control of dumping in provincial marine waters.

[Le Dain J then turned to the national concern doctrine, and gave the following summary:]

[33] From this survey of the opinion expressed in this Court concerning the national concern doctrine of the federal peace, order and good government power I draw the following conclusions as to what now appears to be firmly established:

1. The national concern doctrine is separate and distinct from the national emergency doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, which is chiefly distinguishable by the fact that it provides a constitutional basis for what is necessarily legislation of a temporary nature;

2. The national concern doctrine applies to both new matters which did not exist at Confederation and to matters which, although originally matters of a local or private nature in a province, have since, in the absence of national emergency, become matters of national concern;

3. For a matter to qualify as a matter of national concern in either sense it must have a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern and a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution;

4. In determining whether a matter has attained the required degree of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern it is relevant to consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter.

[34] This last factor, generally referred to as the "provincial inability" test and noted with apparent approval in this Court in Labatt, Schneider and Wetmore, was suggested, as Professor Hogg acknowledges, by Professor Gibson in his article, "Measuring `National Dimensions'" (1976), 7 Man. L.J. 15, as the most satisfactory rationale of the cases in which the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power has been applied as a basis of federal jurisdiction. As expounded by Professor Gibson, the test would appear to involve a limited or qualified application of federal jurisdiction. As put by Professor Gibson at pp. 34-35, "By this approach, a national dimension would exist whenever a significant aspect of a problem is beyond provincial reach because it falls within the jurisdiction of another province or of the federal Parliament. It is important to emphasize however that the entire problem would not fall within federal competence in such circumstances. Only that aspect of the problem that is beyond provincial control would do so. Since the "P.O. & G.G." clause bestows only residual powers, the existence of a national dimension justifies no more federal legislation than is necessary to fill the gap in provincial powers. For example, federal jurisdiction to legislate for pollution of interprovincial waterways or to control "pollution price-wars" would (in the absence of other independent sources of federal competence) extend only to measures to reduce the risk that citizens of one province would be harmed by the non-co-operation of another province or provinces." To similar effect, he said in his conclusion at p. 36: "Having regard to the residual nature of the power, it is the writer's thesis that "national dimensions" are possessed by only those aspects of legislative problems which are beyond the ability of the provincial legislatures to deal because they involve either federal competence or that of another province. Where it would be possible to deal fully with the problem by co-operative action of two or more legislatures, the "national dimension" concerns only the risk of non-co-operation, and justifies only federal legislation addressed to that risk." …

[35] As expressed by Professor Hogg in the first and second editions of his Constitutional Law of Canada, the "provincial inability" test would appear to be adopted simply as a reason for finding that a particular matter is one of national concern falling within the peace, order and good government power: that provincial failure to deal effectively with the intra-provincial aspects of the matter could have an adverse effect on extra-provincial interests. In this sense, the "provincial inability" test is one of the indicia for determining whether a matter has that character of singleness or indivisibility required to bring it within the national concern doctrine. It is because of the interrelatedness of the intra-provincial and extra-provincial aspects of the matter that it requires a single or uniform legislative treatment. The "provincial inability" test must not, however, go so far as to provide a rationale for the general notion, hitherto rejected in the cases, that there must be a plenary jurisdiction in one order of government or the other to deal with any legislative problem. In the context of the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power, its utility lies, in my opinion, in assisting in the determination whether a matter has the requisite singleness or indivisibility from a functional as well as a conceptual point of view. …

[37] Marine pollution, because of its predominantly extra-provincial as well as international character and implications, is clearly a matter of concern to Canada as whole. The question is whether the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in marine waters, including provincial marine waters, is a single, indivisible matter, distinct from the control of pollution by the dumping of substances in other provincial waters. The Ocean Dumping Control Act reflects a distinction between the pollution of salt water and the pollution of fresh water. The question, as I conceive it, is whether that distinction is sufficient to make the control of marine pollution by the dumping of substances a single, indivisible matter falling within the national concern doctrine of the peace, order and good government power.

[38] Marine pollution by the dumping of substances is clearly treated by the Convention on the Prevention of Marine Pollution by Dumping of Wastes and other Matter as a distinct and separate form of water pollution having its own characteristics and scientific considerations. This impression is reinforced by the United Nations Report of the Joint Group of Experts on the Scientific Aspects of Marine Pollution, Reports and Studies No. 15, The Review of the Health of the Oceans (UNESCO 1982) (hereinafter referred to as the "UN Report"), which forms part of the materials placed before the Court in the argument. It is to be noted, however, that, unlike the Ocean Dumping Control Act, the Convention does not require regulation of pollution by the dumping of waste in the internal marine waters of a state. Article III, para. 3, of the Convention defines the "sea" as "all marine waters other than the internal waters of the States." The internal marine waters of a state are those which lie landward of the baseline of the territorial sea, which is determined in accordance with the rules laid down in the United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (1982). The limitation of the undertaking in the Convention, presumably for reasons of state policy, to the control of dumping in the territorial sea and the open sea cannot, in my opinion, obscure the obviously close relationship, which is emphasized in the UN Report, between pollution in coastal waters, including the internal marine waters of a state, and pollution in the territorial sea. Moreover, there is much force, in my opinion, in the appellant's contention that the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state creates an unacceptable degree of uncertainty for the application of regulatory and penal provisions. This, and not simply the possibility or likelihood of the movement of pollutants across that line, is what constitutes the essential indivisibility of the matter of marine pollution by the dumping of substances.

[39] There remains the question whether the pollution of marine waters by the dumping of substances is sufficiently distinguishable from the pollution of fresh waters by such dumping to meet the requirement of singleness or indivisibility. In many cases the pollution of fresh waters will have a pollutant effect in the marine waters into which they flow, and this is noted by the UN Report, but that report, as I have suggested, emphasizes that marine pollution, because of the differences in the composition and action of marine waters and fresh waters, has its own characteristics and scientific considerations that distinguish it from fresh water pollution. Moreover, the distinction between salt water and fresh water as limiting the application of the Ocean Dumping Control Act meets the consideration emphasized by a majority of this Court in the Anti-Inflation Act reference—that in order for a matter to qualify as one of national concern falling within the federal peace, order and good government power it must have ascertainable and reasonable limits, in so far as its impact on provincial jurisdiction is concerned.

[La Forest J wrote a dissenting opinion. In his view, the POGG power could only justify federal legislation to control marine pollution in two circumstances: (a) an emergency (which did not exist), and (b) in relation to marine waters lying outside provincial jurisdiction (which fell under federal jurisdiction under the "gap" branch of POGG – i.e. the federal residual power).]

3.2 LA FOREST J. (Beetz and Lamer JJ) (dissenting)

[56] I start with the proposition that what is sought to be regulated in the present case is an activity wholly within the province, taking place on provincially owned land. Only local works and undertakings are involved, and there is no evidence that the substance made subject to the prohibition in s. 4(1) is either deleterious in any way or has any impact beyond the limits of the province. It is not difficult, on this basis, to conclude that the matter is one that falls within provincial legislative power unless it can somehow be established that it falls within Parliament's general power to legislate for the peace, order and good government of Canada.

Peace, Order and Good Government

[57] There are several applications of the peace, order and good government power that may have relevance to the control of ocean pollution. One is its application in times of emergency. The federal Parliament clearly has power to deal with a grave emergency without regard to the ordinary division of legislative power under the Constitution. The most obvious manifestation of this power is in times of war or civil insurrection, but it has in recent years also been applied in peacetime to justify the control of rampant inflation; see Re: Anti-Inflation Act, supra. But while there can be no doubt that the control of ocean pollution poses a serious problem, no one has argued that it has reached such grave proportions as to require the displacement of the ordinary division of legislative power under the Constitution.

[58] A second manner in which the power to legislate respecting peace, order and good government may be invoked in the present context is to control that area of the sea lying beyond the limits of the provinces. The federal government may not only regulate the territorial sea and other areas over which Canada exercises sovereignty, either under its power to legislate respecting its public property, or under the general power respecting peace, order and good government under s. 91 (Reference re Offshore Mineral Rights of British Columbia, 1967 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1967] SCR 792) or under s. 4 of the Constitution Act, 1871 (U.K.), 34 & 35 Vict., c. 28. I have no doubt that it may also, as an aspect of its international sovereignty, exercise legislative jurisdiction for the control of pollution beyond its borders; see Reference re Newfoundland Continental Shelf, 1984 CanLII 132 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 86.

[59] In legislating under its general power for the control of pollution in areas of the ocean falling outside provincial jurisdiction, the federal Parliament is not confined to regulating activities taking place within those areas. It may take steps to prevent activities in a province, such as dumping substances in provincial waters that pollute or have the potential to pollute the sea outside the province. Indeed, the exercise of such jurisdiction, it would seem to me, is not limited to coastal and internal waters but extends to the control of deposits in fresh water that have the effect of polluting outside a province. Reference may be made here to Interprovincial Co-operatives Ltd. v. The Queen, supra, where a majority of this Court upheld the view that the federal Parliament had exclusive legislative jurisdiction to deal with a problem that resulted from the depositing of a pollutant in a river in one province that had injurious effects in another province. This is but an application of the doctrine of national dimensions triggering the operation of the peace, order and good government clause.

[60] It should require no demonstration that water moves in hydrologic cycles and that effective pollution control requires regulating pollution at its source. That source may, in fact, be situated outside the waters themselves. … Given the way substances seep into the ground and the movement of surface and ground waters into rivers and ultimately into the sea, this can potentially cover a very large area. Indeed, since the pollution of the ocean in an important measure results from aerial pollution rather than from substances deposited in waters, similar regulations could be made in respect of substances that so pollute the air as to cause damage to the ocean or generally outside the provinces. …

[61] The power above described can be complemented by provisions made pursuant to the criminal law power. … The combination of the criminal law power with its power to control pollution that has extra-provincial dimensions gives the federal Parliament very wide scope to control ocean pollution. … a combination of the general federal legislative power and the criminal power could go a long way towards prohibiting the pollution of internal waters as well as those in territorial waters and the high seas.

[62] In fact, as I see it, the potential breadth of federal power to control pollution by use of its general power is so great that, even without resort to the specific argument made by the appellant, the constitutional challenge in the end may be the development of judicial strategies to confine its ambit. It must be remembered that the peace, order and good government clause may comprise not only prohibitions, like criminal law, but regulation. Regulation to control pollution, which is incidentally only part of the even larger global problem of managing the environment, could arguably include not only emission standards but the control of the substances used in manufacture, as well as the techniques of production generally, in so far as these may have an impact on pollution. This has profound implications for the federal-provincial balance mandated by the Constitution. The challenge for the courts, as in the past, will be to allow the federal Parliament sufficient scope to acquit itself of its duties to deal with national and international problems while respecting the scheme of federalism provided by the Constitution.

[63] These considerations underline the importance of linking the prohibition to the purpose sought to be achieved. At times, that link can readily be inferred, for example in the case of dumping noxious fluid into coastal waters. In other cases, such as the depositing of noxious solid material inland, cogent proof will be required. …

[64] However widely one interprets the federal power to control ocean pollution along the preceding line of analysis, it will not serve to support the provision impugned here, one that … is a blanket prohibition against depositing any substance in waters without regard to its nature or amount, and one moreover where there is [no attempt to link the proscribed conduct to actual or potential harm] to what is sought to be protected …. [T]here is no evidence to indicate that the full range of activities caught by the provision cause the harm sought to be prevented. … Here, Parliament may undoubtedly prohibit the dumping of anything into federal waters, but unless a more comprehensive theory for applying the national dimensions doctrine can be found, prohibitions against dumping substances into provincial waters must be linked to some federal power. …

[72]… I shall … attempt to look at it in terms of the qualities or attributes that are said to mark the subjects that have been held to fall within the peace, order and good government clause as being matters of national concern. Such a subject, it has been said, must be marked by a singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility that clearly distinguishes it from matters of provincial concern. In my view, ocean pollution fails to meet this test for a variety of reasons. In addition to those applicable to environmental pollution generally, the following specific difficulties may be noted. First of all, marine waters are not wholly bounded by the coast; in many areas, they extend upstream into rivers for many miles. … . Apart from this, the line between salt and fresh water cannot be demarcated clearly … . In any event, it is not so much the waters, whether fresh or salt, with which we are concerned, but their pollution. And the pollution of marine water is contributed to by the vast amounts of effluents that are poured or seep into fresh waters everywhere … . Nor is the pollution of the ocean confined to pollution emanating from substances deposited in water. In important respects, the pollution of the sea results from emissions into the air, which are then transported over many miles and deposited into the sea … . I cannot, therefore, see ocean pollution as a sufficiently discrete subject upon which to found the kind of legislative power sought here. It is an attempt to create a federal pollution control power on unclear geographical grounds and limited to part only of the causes of ocean pollution. Such a power then simply amounts to a truncated federal pollution control power only partially effective to meet its supposed necessary purpose, unless of course one is willing to extend it to pollution emanating from fresh water and the air, when for reasons already given such an extension could completely swallow up provincial power, no link being necessary to establish the federal purpose.

[73] This leads me to another factor considered in identifying a subject as falling within the general federal power as a matter of national domain: its impact on provincial legislative power. Here, it must be remembered that in its supposed application within the province the provision virtually prevents a province from dealing with certain of its own public property without federal consent. A wide variety of activities along the coast or in the adjoining sea involves the deposit of some substances in the sea. In fact, where large cities like Vancouver are situated by the sea, this has substantial relevance to recreational, industrial and municipal concerns of all kinds. As a matter of fact, the most polluted areas of the sea adjoin the coast; see UN Report, op. cit., at pp. 3-4. Among the major causes of this are various types of construction, such as hotels and harbours, the development of mineral resources and recreational activities (ibid., at p. 3). These are matters of immediate concern to the province. They necessarily affect activities over which the provinces have exercised some kind of jurisdiction over the years. Whether or not the "newness" of the subject is a necessary criterion for inventing new areas of jurisdiction under the peace, order and good government clause, it is certainly a relevant consideration if it means removing from the provinces areas of jurisdiction which they previously exercised. As I mentioned, pollution, including coastal pollution, is no new phenomenon, and neither are many of the kinds of activities that result in pollution.

[74] A further relevant matter, it is said, is the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control of intra-provincial aspects of the matter. I have some difficulty following all the implications of this, but taking it at face value, we are dealing here with a situation where, as we saw earlier, Parliament has extensive powers to deal with conditions that lead to ocean pollution wherever they occur. The difficulty with the impugned provision is that it seeks to deal with activities that cannot be demonstrated either to pollute or to have a reasonable potential of polluting the ocean. The prohibition applies to an inert substance regarding which there is no proof that it either moves or pollutes. The prohibition in fact would apply to the moving of rock from one area of provincial property to another. I cannot accept that the federal Parliament has such wide legislative power over local matters having local import taking place on provincially owned property. …

3.3 Commentary

Do you agree with Le Dain J's conclusion that marine pollution is sufficiently indivisible to constitute a matter of national concern? Consider the views expressed by Jean Leclair, "The Elusive Quest for the Quintessential 'National Interest'", (2005) 38 UBC L Rev 353 at 360-66 (footnotes omitted):

> [A]lthough Justice Le Dain asserts that a matter must be both functionally and conceptually indivisible to be of a national dimension, his own application of the test is limited to an examination of the first dimension of indivisibility. By emphasizing functional indivisibility, he seems to forget that the purpose of the national interest doctrine is not to confer [on] Parliament a property right over a particular matter, but rather a power to regulate in relation to such a matter. In Crown Zellerbach, the Court had to decide whether marine pollution was a matter of national interest. Justice Le Dain concluded that it was, based on the fact that it was difficult to ascertain "by visual observation the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state," and because marine pollution "… has its own characteristics and scientific considerations that distinguish it from fresh water pollution." Justice Le Dain limited his inquiry to the functional, if not the physical, dimension of the indivisibility criterion. However, as correctly underlined by the dissenting Justice La Forest, "it is not so much the waters, whether fresh or salt, with which we are concerned, but their pollution." Justice La Forest had previously emphasized that "… effective pollution control requires regulating pollution at its source." In other words, a conceptual approach to indivisibility was required, as Parliament had claimed the exclusive power to regulate the sources of marine pollution … .
> Had Justice Le Dain conducted a careful analysis of the legislative means necessary to regulate the wide range of polluting activities, he would have recognized that treating marine pollution as a matter of national interest would greatly affect provincial spheres of enumerated powers. Indeed, the exclusive authority to regulate the sources of marine pollution is a carte blanche to regulate every conceivable activity known to humankind, be they inter- or intra-provincial in nature. …
> However, this interpretation is most erroneous. The conceptual indivisibility test must be applied using the approach of Justice Beetz in Anti-Inflation; that is, to the matter said to be of national interest (tobacco use), and not to the legislative means employed to ensure its regulation (control of advertising). In other words, the conceptual indivisibility of a particular matter should hinge upon whether the totality of legislative means necessary for its overall regulation amounts to an important invasion of provincial spheres of power. Otherwise, the central government could adopt a law said to be confined to a very limited aspect of a particular trade, argue successfully that it was sufficiently indivisible to qualify as a matter of national interest and, after having established its "… exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to that matter," Parliament could select, this time in all impunity, any other legislative means it would find appropriate to adopt. …
> [In addition,] Justice Le Dain's functional test is extremely obscure. Recall that in order to determine the existence of indivisibility, one must "consider what would be the effect on extra-provincial interests of a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of the intra-provincial aspects of the matter." Is Justice Le Dain referring to political incapacity, political unwillingness, or legal inability to deal with a problem? …
> Notwithstanding the problems described above, the most troubling aspect of Justice Le Dain's test is that it gives the impression that Canada's federal system was designed to achieve functional efficiency to the exclusion of other normative concerns. Functional efficiency, though important, has never been the sole normative concern of our federal regime. In reality, Canadian federalism has been much more preoccupied with establishing a just and coherent balance between the legitimate demands of both national and regional communities. …
> Justice Le Dain's functional approach, with its obviously centralist slant, is impervious to this need for diversity. By unduly favouring federal exclusivity to the detriment of federal/provincial concurrency, Justice Le Dain also puts into jeopardy federalism's capacity to promote "… democratic participation by distributing power to the government thought to be most suited to achieving the particular societal objective having regard to th[e] diversity [of the component parts of Confederation]." Moreover, by placing the interests of the national community before those of the regions, Justice Le Dain's centralist approach could very well hamper, in certain circumstances, Quebec's ability to exercise "… the considerable provincial powers conferred by the Constitution Act, 1867 in such a way as to promote [its] language and culture."

Sujit Choudhry, by contrast, defended the provincial inability test and the holding in Crown Zellerbach ("Recasting Social Canada: A Reconsideration of Federal Jurisdiction Over Social Policy" (2002) 52 UTLJ 163 at 227, 236-8):

> [T]he provincial inability test reflects the Dickson court's central contribution, and its major legacy, to the enduring problem of legal federalism. The basic intuition underlying the test is that the federal government can act only in those circumstances in which the provinces are unable to act. Although the Court provided little in the way of theoretical explanation to justify this principle, the test is consistent with at least the following account of the nature of the Canadian political community. Canada consists not of one political community but, rather, of a multiplicity of political communities, which often disagree on questions of public policy but which nevertheless have come together and have created common institutions with the power to act on matters of common interest. To the question of when matters are of common interest, the answer provided by the Dickson court is those subject-matters where the provinces are unable to act alone—that is, when pursuing their self-interest requires them to act together. On this conception, the Canadian federation is imagined as a scheme for mutual advantage. …

But what does the provincial inability test mean? …

"Externality" is a term used by economists to describe situations in which an entity (a person, a corporation) does not bear all of the costs, or receive all of the benefits, of decisions they take. In cases of negative externalities, some or all of the costs of a decision are borne by another entity; in cases of positive externalities, some or all of the benefits of a decision are received by another party. The basic idea behind an externality is that the disjuncture between the entity that makes a decision and the entities that bear the costs or receive the benefits of a decision means that that decision is made differently than it would be where the costs and benefits were strictly private. In cases of negative externalities, because costs can be shifted onto other entities, an entity may engage in more of an externality-causing activity than they otherwise would. The opposite is true for positive externalities.

… Governments can make decisions that impose costs on other governments. In a federation, a province can externalize the costs of its public policies onto other provinces, or onto the federal government. A case study of the former can be found in Interprovincial Co-Operatives Ltd. v. Dryden Chemicals Ltd. [1975 CanLII 212 (SCC), [1976] 1 SCR 477]. In that case, two companies, one operating in Saskatchewan, the other in Ontario, operated chlor-alkali plants close to rivers that flow into Manitoba. The allegation was that both companies discharged mercury into these rivers, which then carried the mercury into Manitoba, where it was ingested by fish. According to the Manitoba government, the mercury ultimately had a negative impact upon the commercial fishery by rendering fish unfit for human consumption.

… Crown Zellerbach … clearly contemplated that this kind of scenario would count as an example of provincial inability. But, on further reflection, we find that "provincial inability" is a bit of a misnomer. Consider the legal position of Manitoba. Because of the territorial limits on provincial jurisdiction, Manitoba lacked the legal power to regulate mercury discharges in waters outside its borders. Manitoba, therefore, was clearly unable to regulate pollution that harmed interests within the province. As the Court said, it was "impossible to hold that … Manitoba can … require the shutting down of plants erected and operated in another province." But no one seriously doubted that Ontario and Saskatchewan possessed jurisdiction to regulate the mercury discharges; the operative assumption throughout the judgment was that mercury discharges were legal under Ontario and Saskatchewan law. At most, we can say that those provinces were not unable but merely unwilling to regulate these discharges.

…There was no provincial inability as such. Nonetheless, in Crown Zellerbach … the Court considered that this scenario warranted shifting jurisdiction to the federal government. And, indeed, this was the holding of the plurality (per Ritchie J) in Interprovincial Co-operatives. Why did the Court reach this conclusion? One obvious solution would have been a negotiated or cooperative arrangement whereby Saskatchewan and Ontario regulated industries within their borders for Manitoba's benefit. The Court must have reasoned that because of the incentives at play, there were reasons to doubt that bilateral or multilateral bargains to address inter-provincial spillovers would be easy to achieve. If so, federal jurisdiction under the national dimensions doctrine was premised on the risk of inter-provincial non-cooperation. And this is exactly what Gibson said, in passages quoted with approval by Le Dain J in Crown Zellerbach.

4 Friends of the Oldman River: Environmental Assessment

In Friends of the Oldman River Society v Canada (Minister of Transport), 1992 CanLII 110 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 3,the Supreme Court held that the environment, and environmental control, lacked the requisite distinctiveness to be matters of national concern. It addressed this issue in the context of jurisdiction over environmental assessment – an issue it revised in Reference re Impact Assessment Act, 2023 SCC 23.

LA FOREST J (Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin and Iacobucci JJ. concurring)

… s. 6 of the Department of the Environment Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-10, empowered the Minister for the purposes of carrying out his duties relating to environmental quality, by order, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to establish guidelines for use by federal departments, agencies and regulatory bodies in carrying out their duties, functions and powers. Pursuant to this provision the Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order ("Guidelines Order") was established and approved in June 1984, SOR/84-467. In general terms, these guidelines require all federal departments and agencies that have a decision-making authority for any proposal, i.e., any initiative, undertaking or activity that may have an environmental effect on an area of federal responsibility, to initially screen such proposal to determine whether it may give rise to any potentially adverse environmental effects. If a proposal could have a significant adverse effect on the environment, provision is made for public review by an environmental assessment panel whose members must be unbiased, free of political influence and possessed of special knowledge and experience relevant to the technical, environmental and social effects of the proposal.

The present case raises the constitutional and statutory validity of the Guidelines Order as well as its nature and applicability. These issues arise in a context where the respondent Society, an environmental group from Alberta, by applications for certiorari and mandamus, seeks to compel two federal departments, the Department of Transport and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, to conduct a public environmental assessment pursuant to the Guidelines Order in respect of a dam constructed on the Oldman River by the Government of Alberta. … since the project affects navigable waters, fisheries, Indians and Indian lands, federal interests are involved. Specifically, the Society argues that the Minister of Transport must approve the project under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. N-22, and in doing so is required to provide for public assessment of the project pursuant to the Guidelines Order. It also argues that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has a similar duty in the performance of his functions under the Fisheries Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. F-14.

… Alberta argues that Parliament has no plenary jurisdiction over the environment, it being a matter of legislative jurisdiction shared by both levels of government, and that the Guidelines Order has crossed the line which circumscribes Parliament's authority over the environment. The appellant Ministers argue that in pith and substance the Guidelines Order is merely a process to facilitate federal decision-making on matters that fall within Parliament's jurisdiction -- a proposition with which the respondent substantially agrees.

The substance of Alberta's argument is that the Guidelines Order purports to give the Government of Canada general authority over the environment in such a way as to trench on the province's exclusive legislative domain. Alberta argues that the Guidelines Order attempts to regulate the environmental effects of matters largely within the control of the province and, consequently, cannot constitutionally be a concern of Parliament. In particular, it is said that Parliament is incompetent to deal with the environmental effects of provincial works such as the Oldman River Dam.

I agree that the Constitution Act, 1867 has not assigned the matter of "environment" sui generis to either the provinces or Parliament. The environment, as understood in its generic sense, encompasses the physical, economic and social environment touching several of the heads of power assigned to the respective levels of government. … I earlier referred to the environment as a diffuse subject, echoing what I said in R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., supra, to the effect that environmental control, as a subject matter, does not have the requisite distinctiveness to meet the test under the "national concern" doctrine as articulated by Beetz J. in Reference re Anti-Inflation Act, supra. Although I was writing for the minority in Crown Zellerbach, this opinion was not contested by the majority. The majority simply decided that marine pollution was a matter of national concern because it was predominately extra-provincial and international in character and implications, and possessed sufficiently distinct and separate characteristics as to make it subject to Parliament's residual power.

It must be recognized that the environment is not an independent matter of legislation under the Constitution Act, 1867 and that it is a constitutionally abstruse matter which does not comfortably fit within the existing division of powers without considerable overlap and uncertainty. …

In my view the solution to this case can more readily be found by looking first at the catalogue of powers in the Constitution Act, 1867 and considering how they may be employed to meet or avoid environmental concerns. When viewed in this manner it will be seen that in exercising their respective legislative powers, both levels of government may affect the environment, either by acting or not acting. This can best be understood by looking at specific powers. A revealing example is the federal Parliament's exclusive legislative power over interprovincial railways under ss. 92(10)(a) and 91(29) of the Constitution Act, 1867. The regulation of federal railways has been entrusted to the National Transportation Agency pursuant to the National Transportation Act, 1987 …

This gives some insight into the scope of Parliament's legislative jurisdiction over railways and the manner in which it is charged with the responsibility of weighing both the national and local socio-economic ramifications of its decisions. Moreover, it cannot be seriously questioned that Parliament may deal with biophysical environmental concerns touching upon the operation of railways so long as it is legislation relating to railways. This could involve issues such as emission standards or noise abatement provisions.

To continue with the example, one might postulate the location and construction of a new line which would require approval under the relevant provisions of the Railway Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. R-3. That line may cut through ecologically sensitive habitats such as wetlands and forests. The possibility of derailment may pose a serious hazard to the health and safety of nearby communities if dangerous commodities are to be carried on the line. On the other hand, it may bring considerable economic benefit to those communities through job creation and the multiplier effect that will have in the local economy. The regulatory authority might require that the line circumvent residential districts in the interests of noise abatement and safety. In my view, all of these considerations may validly be taken into account in arriving at a final decision on whether or not to grant the necessary approval. To suggest otherwise would lead to the most astonishing results, and it defies reason to assert that Parliament is constitutionally barred from weighing the broad environmental repercussions, including socio-economic concerns, when legislating with respect to decisions of this nature.

The same can be said for several other subject matters of legislation, including one of those before the Court, namely navigation and shipping. [omitted] …

The provinces may similarly act in relation to the environment under any legislative power in s. 92. Legislation in relation to local works or undertakings, for example, will often take into account environmental concerns. What is not particularly helpful in sorting out the respective levels of constitutional authority over a work such as the Oldman River dam, however, is the characterization of it as a "provincial project" or an undertaking "primarily subject to provincial regulation" as the appellant Alberta sought to do. That begs the question and posits an erroneous principle that seems to hold that there exists a general doctrine of interjurisdictional immunity to shield provincial works or undertakings from otherwise valid federal legislation. …

What is important is to determine whether either level of government may legislate. One may legislate in regard to provincial aspects, the other federal aspects. Although local projects will generally fall within provincial responsibility, federal participation will be required if the project impinges on an area of federal jurisdiction as is the case here. …

5 References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act

5.1 Introduction

The major modern case on the national dimension doctrine is References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act, 2021 SCC 11 – the GGPPA.

As explained below, Part 1 of the GGPPA establishes a consumer carbon price (a fuel charge), and Part 2 sets out a pricing mechanism for large industrial emitters. In addition, the GGPPA functions as "backstop" to both limbs of the GGGPA.

On March 2025, the newly elected federal government announced the elimination of the consumer carbon price, and removed the "backstop" – the requirement that provinces and territories have a consumer carbon price. Nonetheless, the case is an important statement on the scope of federal authority over greenhouse gas emissions, which remain in force for large industrial emitters.

5.2 WAGNER CJ (Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ concurring):

A. Basic Architecture of the GGPPA

[26] The GGPPA comprises four parts and four schedules. Part 1 of the GGPPA establishes a fuel charge that applies to producers, distributors and importers of various types of carbon-based fuel. Part 2 sets out a pricing mechanism for industrial GHG emissions by large emissions-intensive industrial facilities. Part 3 authorizes the Governor in Council to make regulations providing for the application of provincial law concerning GHG emissions to federal works and undertakings, federal land and Indigenous land located in that province, as well as to internal waters located in or contiguous with the province. And Part 4 requires the Minister of the Environment to prepare an annual report on the administration of the GGPPA and have it tabled in Parliament. Only the first two parts and the four schedules are at issue in these appeals. The parties do not challenge the constitutionality of Parts 3 and 4 of the GGPPA.

[27] Because the GGPPA operates as a backstop, the GHG pricing mechanism described in Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA does not automatically apply in all provinces and territories. A province or territory will only be subject to Part 1 or 2 of the GGPPA if the Governor in Council determines that its GHG pricing mechanism is insufficiently stringent. However, the GGPPA itself always applies in the sense that provincial and territorial GHG pricing mechanisms are always subject to assessment to ensure they are sufficiently stringent. At the time of the hearing of these appeals, Ontario, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Yukon and Nunavut were subject to both Parts 1 and 2 of the GGPPA. Alberta was subject only to Part 1, and Prince Edward Island only to Part 2. After the hearing, the GGPPA was amended such that Part 1 no longer applies to New Brunswick: Regulations Amending Part 1 of Schedule 1 and Schedule 2 to the Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act and the Fuel Charge Regulations, SOR/2020-261. The federal government has also announced that Ontario will be subject only to Part 1, but the GGPPA has not yet been amended to reflect this announcement.

B. Characterization of the GGPPA …

[57] In this case, the judges in the courts below, the parties and the interveners have proposed various formulations of the GGPPA's pith and substance. These formulations can be grouped in three basic categories: (1) a broad formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is the regulation of GHG emissions; (2) a national standards-based formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is to establish minimum national standards to reduce GHG [i.e. greenhouse gas] emissions; and (3) a national standards pricing-based formulation to the effect that the GGPPA's pith and substance is to establish minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I would adopt a national standards pricing-based formulation of the pith and substance of the GGPPA. In my view, the true subject matter of the GGPPA is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. Allow me to explain why. …

[Wagner CJ concluded that establishing minimum national standards for GHG pricing, as opposed to GHG emissions generally, was the pith and substance of the GGPPA based on: (a) intrinsic evidence, consisting of its title ("Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act") and the preamble; (b) extrinsic evidence, including the policy process leading up to the enactment of the GGPPA, in which GHG pricing emerged as the central policy proposal, as opposed to federal regulation of GHG emissions, and the legislative debates surrounding the GGPPA, where the focus was also on GHG pricing, not regulating GHG emissions; (c) legal effects, which are to create a GHG pricing scheme for Canada, and not to regulate GHG-emitting activities or otherwise reduce GHG emissions, and to function as a backstop that will only come into force of a province or territory does not have a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing system; and (d) practical effects, which to date consisted of a flexible federal approach to assessing if provincial pricing regimes were of comparable stringency.]. …

(2) Clarifying the National Concern Doctrine

[111] As can be seen from the decisions of the courts below and from the parties' arguments, there is significant uncertainty regarding a number of issues that are central to the national concern doctrine. This is unsurprising, given that there are very few recent cases concerning the doctrine, which in turn flows from the fact that one of its defining features is its restrictive application. This case presents an opportunity to clarify these issues. …

[113] Throughout my analysis on these issues, I will be relying in part on this Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence, and in particular on 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference. As the Court has observed, the national concern doctrine and the trade and commerce power pose similar challenges to federalism. In both contexts, the Court has interpreted the federal power narrowly to ensure that it does not overwhelm provincial jurisdiction and undermine the federal-provincial division of powers… Although the Court has not addressed the national concern doctrine in any detail for many years, the more recent cases of 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference, in which it applied the general branch of the trade and commerce power, offer useful insight and are consistent with the modern approach to federalism. However, my citing these cases should not be taken as an invitation to conflate the two powers. …

(a) "Matter" of National Concern …

[119] Therefore, the matter to consider in this national concern analysis is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. I agree with the majority of the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan that stringency in this context is not limited to the charge per unit of GHG emissions. It encompasses the scope or breadth of application of the charge in the sense of the fuels, operations and activities to which the charge applies and the authority to implement regulatory schemes that are necessary in order to implement such a charge: para. 139.

(b) Exclusive Federal Jurisdiction Based on the National Concern Doctrine

[120] There is no doubt that a finding that a matter is of national concern confers exclusive jurisdiction over that matter on Parliament… However, the nature and consequences of this exclusive federal jurisdiction is contested by the parties in this case and requires clarification. Understanding the consequences of the recognition of a new matter of national concern is critical in order to properly undertake the scale of impact analysis at the third step of the national concern test. …

[125] A closely related question concerns the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to a matter of national concern. The double aspect doctrine "recognizes that the same fact situations can be regulated from different perspectives, one of which may relate to a provincial power and the other to a federal power…. If a fact situation can be regulated from different federal and provincial perspectives and each level of government has a compelling interest in enacting legal rules in relation to that situation, the double aspect doctrine may apply….

[126] In my view, the double aspect doctrine can apply in cases in which the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine, but whether or not it does apply will vary from case to case. …

[129] The double aspect doctrine takes on particular significance where, as in the case at bar, Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard imposed by legislation that operates as a backstop. The recognition of a matter of national concern such as this will inevitably result in a double aspect situation. This is in fact the very premise of a federal scheme that imposes minimum national standards: Canada and the provinces are both free to legislate in relation to the same fact situation — in this case by imposing GHG pricing — but the federal law is paramount. …

[131] Beetz J.'s caution about the double aspect doctrine [in Bell Canada v. Quebec (Commission de la santé et de la sécurité du travail), 1988 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 749] thus applies with particular force where Canada asserts jurisdiction over a matter that involves a minimum national standard. In such a case, even if the national concern test would otherwise be met, Beetz J.'s caution should act as an additional check. The court must be satisfied that Canada in fact has a "compelling interest" in enacting legal rules over the federal aspect of the activity at issue and that the "multiplicity of aspects is real and not merely nominal" …. As I will explain in greater detail below, the court must be satisfied at the scale of impact step that the consequences of finding that the proposed matter is one of national concern are reconcilable with the division of powers.

(3) National Concern Test

[132] I will now turn to the specifics of the test for identifying matters that are inherently of national concern. As I will explain below, the applicable framework involves a three-step process: the threshold question; the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility analysis; and the scale of impact analysis. …

(a) Threshold Question

[142] Courts must approach a finding that the federal government has jurisdiction on the basis of the national concern doctrine with great caution. The analysis therefore begins by asking, as a threshold question, whether the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration under the doctrine. This invites a common-sense inquiry into the national importance of the proposed matter.

[143]… Although this inquiry was not identified as a distinct step of the analysis in Crown Zellerbach, it serves an important purpose. The threshold question ensures that the national concern doctrine cannot be invoked too lightly and provides essential context for the analysis that follows. Requiring that this question be asked as the first step of the test is an appropriate, incremental development in the law to ensure that federal power under the national concern doctrine is properly constrained.

[144] At the threshold step, Canada must adduce evidence to satisfy the court that the matter is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole to warrant consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. If Canada discharges this burden, the analysis proceeds. This approach does not open the door to the recognition of federal jurisdiction simply on the basis that a legislative field is "important"; it operates to limit the application of the national concern doctrine.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[147]… the proposed federal matter must be specific and readily identifiable. … The specific and identifiable matter must also be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. It is clearly not enough for a matter to be quantitatively different from matters of provincial concern — the mere growth or extent of a problem across Canada is insufficient to justify federal jurisdiction …

[148] One key consideration for determining whether the matter is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern is whether it is predominantly extraprovincial and international in character, having regard both to its inherent nature and to its effects. The case law demonstrates that this inquiry is central to the national concern doctrine. The finding that marine pollution is extraprovincial and international in its character and implications was critical to the recognition of a matter of national concern in Crown Zellerbach … In Ontario Hydro, the judges were unanimous in grounding the federal government's jurisdiction over atomic energy based on the POGG power in the potential for catastrophic interprovincial and international harm. By contrast, in Hydro-Québec, the judges who considered the issue concluded that the fact that the statute regulated substances whose effects were entirely intraprovincial and localized was a barrier to its recognition as a matter of national concern. However, they accepted that a matter dealing with toxic substances that originate in a particular province may nonetheless be predominantly extraprovincial and international in character if the substances in question have serious effects that can cross provincial boundaries….

[149] International agreements may in some cases indicate that a matter is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. … Significantly, the existence of treaty obligations is not determinative of federal jurisdiction: there is no freestanding federal treaty implementation power and Parliament's jurisdiction to implement treaties signed by the federal government depends on the ordinary division of powers … Treaty obligations and international agreements can be relevant to the national concern analysis, however. Depending on their content, they may help to show that a matter has an extraprovincial and international character, thereby supporting a finding that it is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern.

[150] Furthermore, to be qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, the matter must not be an aggregate of provincial matters …. The federal legislative role must be distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces. Once again, the Court's trade and commerce jurisprudence is helpful in this regard. The Court's opinions with respect to securities regulation show that a regulatory field with an international or extraprovincial dimension can also have local features. While there are aspects of securities regulation that are national in character and have genuine national goals, much of this sphere is primarily focused on local concerns related to investor protection and market fairness: 2011 Securities Reference, at paras. 115 and 124-28; 2018 Securities Reference, at paras. 105-6. As the 2011 Securities Reference and the 2018 Securities Reference confirm, federal legislation will not be qualitatively distinct if it overshoots regulation of a national aspect of the field and instead duplicates provincial regulation or regulates issues that are primarily of local concern.

[151] Thus, the first principle underpinning the requirement of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility is that federal jurisdiction may only be recognized over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. At this stage, the court should inquire into whether the matter is predominantly extraprovincial and international in its nature or its effects, into the content of any international agreements in relation to the matter, and into whether the matter involves a federal legislative role that is distinct from and not duplicative of that of the provinces.

[152] I will now turn to the second principle, that is, that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. This Court's jurisprudence in relation to the general branch of the trade and commerce power is helpful on this point, too. The starting point for this analysis should be the provincial inability test expressed through the fourth and fifth indicia discussed in General Motors, at p. 662: (1) the legislation should be of a nature that the provinces jointly or severally would be constitutionally incapable of enacting; and (2) the failure to include one or more provinces or localities in a legislative scheme would jeopardize the successful operation of the scheme in other parts of the country. For provincial inability to be established for the purposes of the national concern doctrine, both of these factors are required.

[153] But there is a third factor that is required in the context of the national concern doctrine in order to establish provincial inability: a province's failure to deal with the matter must have grave extraprovincial consequences. …

[155] The requirement of grave extraprovincial consequences sets a high bar for a finding of provincial inability for the purposes of the national concern doctrine. This requirement can be satisfied by actual harm or by a serious risk of harm being sustained in the future. It may include serious harm to human life and health or to the environment, though it is not necessarily limited to such consequences. Mere inefficiency or additional financial costs stemming from divided or overlapping jurisdiction is clearly insufficient …Moreover, as I noted above, the onus is on Canada to establish that provincial inability is made out, and evidence is required, "for the questions of provincial inability and the harm that flows therefrom are both factual in part"….

[157] In conclusion, there are two principles that apply in relation to singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility: first, federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern; and second, federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. Provincial inability will be established only if the matter is of a nature that the provinces cannot address either jointly or severally, because the failure of one or more provinces to cooperate would prevent the other provinces from successfully addressing it, and if a province's failure to deal with the matter within its own borders would have grave extraprovincial consequences. …

(c) Scale of Impact

[160] At the final step of the national concern test, Canada must show that the proposed matter has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" ...

[161] The purpose of the scale of impact analysis is to prevent federal overreach: S. Choudhry, Constitutional Law and the Politics of Carbon Pricing in Canada (2019), IRPP Study 74, at p. 15; 2011 Securities Reference, at para. 61. In other words, it is designed to protect against unjustified intrusions on provincial autonomy. In accordance with this purpose, at this stage of the analysis, the intrusion upon provincial autonomy that would result from empowering Parliament to act is balanced against the extent of the impact on the interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. Identifying a new matter of national concern will be justified only if the latter outweighs the former.

(d) Summary of the Framework

[162] In summary, finding that a matter is one of national concern involves a three-step analysis.

[163] First, Canada must establish that the matter is of sufficient concern to the country as a whole to warrant consideration as a possible matter of national concern. This question arises in every case, regardless of whether the matter can be characterized as historically new. If Canada discharges its burden at the step of this threshold inquiry, the analysis will proceed.

[164] Second, the court must undertake the analysis explained in Crown Zellerbach through the language of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". More important than this terminology, however, are the principles underpinning the inquiry. The first of these principles is that, to prevent federal overreach, jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The second principle to be considered at this stage of the inquiry is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter.

[165] If these two principles are satisfied, the court will proceed to the third and final step and determine whether the scale of impact of the proposed matter of national concern is reconcilable with the division of powers.

[166] The onus is on Canada throughout this analysis, and evidence is required. Where a proposed federal matter satisfies the requirements of all three steps of the framework, there is a principled basis to conclude that the matter is one that, by its nature, transcends the provinces and should be recognized as a matter of national concern.

(4) Application to the GGPPA

(a) Threshold Question

[167] Canada has adduced evidence that clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of sufficient concern to Canada as a whole that it warrants consideration in accordance with the national concern doctrine. To begin, this matter's importance to Canada as a whole must be understood in light of the seriousness of the underlying problem. All parties to this proceeding agree that climate change is an existential challenge. It is a threat of the highest order to the country, and indeed to the world. This context, on its own, provides some assurance that in the case at bar, Canada is not seeking to invoke the national concern doctrine too lightly. The undisputed existence of a threat to the future of humanity cannot be ignored.

[168] That being said, the matter at issue here is not the regulation of GHG emissions generally, and Canada is not seeking to have all potential forms of GHG regulation classified as matters of national concern. Rather, the specific question before the Court is whether establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is a matter of national concern.

[169] The history of efforts to address climate change in Canada reflects the critical role of carbon pricing strategies in policies to reduce GHG emissions. As discussed above, Canada and all the provinces committed, in the Vancouver Declaration, to including carbon pricing in the country's efforts to reduce GHG emissions. The subsequently established Working Group on Carbon Pricing Mechanisms recognized in its final report that many experts regard carbon pricing as a necessary tool for efficiently reducing GHG emissions: … The Working Group's final report had the support of all provinces and of Canada at the time it was published, and its affirmation of the importance of carbon pricing is supported by the record in this case. Similarly, the Specific Mitigation Opportunities Working Group, one of the other three working groups established under the Vancouver Declaration, listed, in its final report, "broad, economy-wide carbon pricing" as one of "three essential elements of a comprehensive approach to mitigating GHG emissions…

[170] Furthermore, there is a broad consensus among expert international bodies such as the World Bank, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development and the International Monetary Fund that carbon pricing is a critical measure for the reduction of GHG emissions. ….

[171] In summary, the evidence clearly shows that establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of concern to Canada as a whole. This matter is critical to our response to an existential threat to human life in Canada and around the world. As a result, it readily passes the threshold test and warrants consideration as a possible matter of national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[172] As I explained above, the first principle to be considered in the singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility inquiry is that federal jurisdiction based on the national concern doctrine should be found to exist only over a specific and identifiable matter that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. Recognizing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions as a matter of national concern satisfies this requirement.

[173] Given that the matter at issue is establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHGs, it is important to begin by observing that these gases are a specific and precisely identifiable type of pollutant. The harmful effects of GHGs are known, and the fuel and excess emissions charges are based on the global warming potential of the gases (see Sch. 3 of the GGPPA). Moreover, GHG emissions are predominantly extraprovincial and international in their character and implications. This flows from their nature as a diffuse atmospheric pollutant and from their effect in causing global climate change. GHG emissions are precisely the type of diffuse and persistent substances with serious deleterious extraprovincial effects that the dissent in Hydro-Québec suggested might appropriately be regulated on the basis of the national concern doctrine: para. 76. In Interprovincial Co-operatives, a case concerning one province's emission of pollutants into an interprovincial river, Pigeon J. observed that the Court was "faced with a pollution problem that is not really local in scope but truly interprovincial": p. 514. GHG emissions represent a pollution problem that is not merely interprovincial, but global, in scope.

[174] The international response to GHG emissions over the past three decades confirms this. As early as 1992, the preamble to the UNFCCC recognized climate change as "a common concern of humankind", and also acknowledged its "global nature". The acknowledgment that climate change is a common concern of humankind was reiterated in the Paris Agreement. As well, the need for an effective international response to climate change was recognized in both agreements. Specifically, the Paris Agreement identifies imperatives of holding the increase in the global average temperature to well below 2.0°C above pre-industrial levels and achieving net zero emissions in the second half of the 21st century: arts. 2(1)(a) and 4(1). States parties are therefore required to make nationally determined contributions that are increasingly ambitious and to implement domestic mitigation measures for the purpose of ensuring that those contributions are achieved: arts. 4(2) and (3). Both the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement help illustrate the predominantly extraprovincial and international nature of GHG emissions and support the conclusion that the matter at issue is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern.

[175] Not only is the type of pollutant to which the matter applies identifiable and qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern, but the regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is a specific, and limited, one. It operates in a particular way, seeking to change behaviour by internalizing the cost of climate change impacts, incorporating them into the price of fuel and the cost of industrial activity. …GHG pricing does not amount to the regulation of GHG emissions generally. It is also different in kind from regulatory mechanisms that do not involve pricing, such as sector-specific initiatives concerning electricity, buildings, transportation, industry, forestry, agriculture and waste.

[176] Minimum national standards of GHG price stringency, which are implemented in this case by means of the backstop architecture of the GGPPA, relate to a federal role in carbon pricing that is qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern. The 2011 Securities Reference and 2018 Securities Reference illustrate this point. The proposed legislation at issue in the 2011 Securities Reference did not have a distinctly national focus; it ran afoul of the division of powers by replicating existing provincial schemes: para. 116. However, the Court held that "[l]egislation aimed at imposing minimum standards applicable throughout the country and preserving the stability and integrity of Canada's financial markets might well relate to trade as a whole" and could be a matter of national importance to which the federal general trade and commerce power applies: para. 114. This was the approach the federal government took in the proposed legislation at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference. The focus of that legislation was on controlling systemic risks that represented a threat to the stability of the country's financial system as a whole. Its effect was "to address any risk that 'slips through the cracks' and poses a threat to the Canadian economy": para. 92. Rather than displacing provincial securities legislation by ensuring the day-to-day regulation of securities trading, it sought to complement provincial legislation by addressing national economic objectives: para. 96.

[177] The backstop approach taken in the GGPPA is analogous to the approach taken in the proposed legislation that was at issue in the 2018 Securities Reference. The GGPPA establishes minimum national standards of price stringency to reduce GHG emissions in order to ensure that Canada's nationally determined contribution under the Paris Agreement is achieved. It does so on a distinctly national basis, one that neither represents an aggregate of provincial matters nor duplicates provincial GHG pricing systems. …

[179] The GGPPA is tightly focused on this distinctly federal role and does not descend into the detailed regulation of all aspects of GHG pricing. While it is true that the administrative pricing mechanism set out in the GGPPA is detailed, it can apply only to provinces that fail to meet the federal stringency standard. Thus, the GGPPA's fundamental role is a distinctly federal one: evaluating provincial pricing mechanisms against an outcome-based legal standard in order to address national risks posed by insufficient carbon pricing stringency in any part of the country. The GGPPA does not prescribe any rules for provincial pricing mechanisms as long as they meet the federally designated standard. Even if the GGPPA were to apply so as to supplement an insufficiently stringent provincial pricing scheme, the prior existence of similar provincial legislation is not, as this Court confirmed in the 2018 Securities Reference, a constitutional bar to federal legislation that pursues a qualitatively different national concern …

[181] The second principle to be considered at this stage of the inquiry is that federal jurisdiction should be found to exist only where the evidence establishes provincial inability to deal with the matter. I find that provincial inability is established in this case.

[182] First, the provinces, acting alone or together, are constitutionally incapable of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions. The situation here is much like the one in the 2018 Securities Reference, in which the provinces would be able to enact legislation to address national goals relating to systemic risk but could not do so on a sustained basis, because any province could choose to withdraw at any time: para. 113; see also 2011 Securities Reference, at paras. 119-21. In the instant case, while the provinces could choose to cooperatively establish a uniform carbon pricing scheme, doing so would not assure a sustained approach to minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions: the provinces and territories are constitutionally incapable of establishing a binding outcome-based minimum legal standard — a national GHG pricing floor — that applies in all provinces and territories at all times.

[183] Second, a failure to include one province in the scheme would jeopardize its success in the rest of Canada. It is true that a cooperative scheme might continue to exist if one province withdrew from it, but the issue here is whether it would be successful. The withdrawal of one province from the scheme would clearly threaten its success for two reasons: emissions reductions that are limited to a few provinces would fail to address climate change if they were offset by increased emissions in other Canadian jurisdictions; and any province's failure to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine the efficacy of GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage.

[184] The evidence in the instant case shows that even significant emissions reductions in some provinces have failed to further the goals of any cooperative scheme, because they were offset by increased emissions in other provinces. Between 2005 and 2016, Canada's total GHG emissions declined by only 3.8 percent … In that period, emissions fell by 22 percent in Ontario, 11 percent in Quebec and 5.1 percent in British Columbia, three of the five provinces with the highest levels of emissions in Canada, as well as by over 10 percent in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Yukon. But these decreases were largely offset by increases of 14 percent in Alberta and 10.7 percent in Saskatchewan, the other two provinces among the five with the highest levels of GHG emissions: p. 13. As a result, Canada failed to honour its commitment under the Kyoto Protocol before withdrawing from that agreement in 2011, and it is not currently on track to honour its Copenhagen Accord commitment.

[185] More recently, even though all the provinces made a commitment in the Vancouver Declaration in March 2016 to work collectively to significantly reduce GHG emissions, Saskatchewan had withdrawn by the time of the Pan-Canadian Framework seven months later, and Ontario and Alberta also subsequently withdrew. Together, these three provinces accounted for 71 percent of Canada's total GHG emissions in 2016 …. It is true that their withdrawal from the Pan-Canadian Framework does not mean that Saskatchewan, Ontario and Alberta will necessarily fail to reduce their GHG emissions. But when provinces that are collectively responsible for more than two thirds of Canada's total GHG emissions opt out of a cooperative scheme, this illustrates the stark limitations of a non-binding cooperative approach. The participating provinces can only reduce their own emissions — less than one third of Canada's total — and are vulnerable to the consequences of the lion's share of the emissions being generated by the non-participating provinces.

[186] What is more, any province's refusal to implement a sufficiently stringent GHG pricing mechanism could undermine GHG pricing everywhere in Canada because of the risk of carbon leakage. Carbon leakage is a phenomenon by which businesses in sectors with high levels of carbon emissions relocate to jurisdictions with less stringent carbon pricing policies…. I am referring to the environmental consequences, and the resulting harm to humans, of carbon leakage — the risk that any emissions reductions achieved by pricing in one province would be offset by an increase in emissions in another province as a result of the relocation of businesses. Thus, provincial cooperation may not result in national emissions reductions, as businesses could simply relocate to non-cooperating provinces, leaving Canada's net emissions unchanged and people across Canada vulnerable to the consequences of those emissions.

[187] Third, a province's failure to act or refusal to cooperate would in this case have grave consequences for extraprovincial interests. It is uncontroversial that GHG emissions cause climate change. It is also an uncontested fact that the effects of climate change do not have a direct connection to the source of GHG emissions; every province's GHG emissions contribute to climate change, the consequences of which will be borne extraprovincially, across Canada and around the world. And it is well-established that climate change is causing significant environmental, economic and human harm nationally and internationally, with especially high impacts in the Canadian Arctic, in coastal regions and on Indigenous peoples. This includes increases in average temperatures and in the frequency and severity of heat waves, extreme weather events like floods and forest fires, significant reductions in sea ice and sea level rises, the spread of life-threatening diseases like Lyme disease and West Nile virus, and threats to the ability of Indigenous communities to sustain themselves and maintain their traditional ways of life.

[188] Furthermore, I reject the notion that because climate change is "an inherently global problem", each individual province's GHG emissions cause no "measurable harm" or do not have "tangible impacts on other provinces"… Each province's emissions are clearly measurable and contribute to climate change. The underlying logic of this argument would apply equally to all individual sources of emissions everywhere, so it must fail. …

[190] While each province's emissions do contribute to climate change, there is no denying that climate change is an "inherently global problem" that neither Canada nor any one province acting alone can wholly address. This weighs in favour of a finding of provincial inability. As a global problem, climate change can realistically be addressed only through international efforts. Any province's failure to act threatens Canada's ability to meet its international obligations, which in turn hinders Canada's ability to push for international action to reduce GHG emissions. Therefore, a provincial failure to act directly threatens Canada as a whole. This is not to say that Parliament has jurisdiction to implement Canada's treaty obligations — it does not — but simply that the inherently global nature of GHG emissions and the problem of climate change supports a finding of provincial inability in this case.

[191] … in the absence of a federal law binding the provinces, there is nothing whatsoever to protect individual provinces or the country as a whole from the consequences of one province's decision, in exercising its authority, to take insufficient action to control GHGs, or to take no steps at all. In short, federal action is indispensable, and GHG pricing in particular is an integral aspect of any scheme to reduce GHG emissions. …

[194] The analogy between this case and Crown Zellerbach is clear. Le Dain J. emphasized the international character of marine pollution; GHG emissions represent a truly global pollution problem that demands a coordinated international response. Le Dain J. focused on the unique scientific characteristics of marine pollution that distinguish it from fresh water pollution; GHG emissions, like marine pollution, are a precisely identifiable form of pollution that can readily be scientifically distinguished from other atmospheric pollutants.

[195] But the case for finding that the matter is of national concern is even stronger here than in Crown Zellerbach. This is true for two reasons. First, in the case at bar, there is uncontested evidence of grave extraprovincial harm as a result of one province's failure to cooperate. In other words, this is a true interprovincial pollution problem of the highest order. … Second, the proposed federal matter in the instant case relates only to the risk of non-cooperation that gives rise to this threat of grievous extraprovincial harm. In other words, this matter would empower the federal government to do only what the provinces cannot do to protect themselves from this grave harm, and nothing more.

(c) Scale of Impact

[196] I conclude that, while it is true that finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over this matter will have a clear impact on provincial autonomy, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that fall under provincial heads of power will be limited and will ultimately be outweighed by the impact on interests that would be affected if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address this matter at a national level.

[197] I accept that finding that this matter is one of national concern has a clear impact on provincial jurisdiction. It leads to the recognition of a previously unidentified area of double aspect in which the federal law is paramount. Provinces can regulate GHG pricing from a local perspective (e.g., under ss. 92(13) and (16) and 92A), but legislation enacted on the basis of these provincial powers would apply concurrently in a field also occupied by a paramount federal law that establishes minimum standards of GHG price stringency. There is a clear impact on provincial autonomy. Provincial governments and their residents may well wish to pursue GHG pricing standards lower than those set by the federal government in order to protect the vitality of local industries, or may wish to choose policies that do not involve GHG pricing.

[198] However, I am persuaded that there is a real, and not merely nominal, federal perspective on the fact situation of GHG pricing: Canada can regulate GHG pricing from the perspective of addressing the risk of grave extraprovincial and international harm associated with a purely intraprovincial approach to GHG pricing. This is manifestly not the "same aspect of the same matter". On the contrary, the compelling federal interest is in doing precisely — and only — what the provinces cannot do: protect themselves from the risk of grave harm if some provinces were to adopt insufficiently stringent GHG pricing standards. Moreover, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate and on areas of provincial life that would fall under provincial heads of power is qualified and limited.

[199] First, the matter's impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate is minimal. It is important to mention that the issue in this case is not the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to GHG emissions generally. Here, the matter is limited to GHG pricing of GHG emissions — a narrow and specific regulatory mechanism. Any legislation that related to non-carbon pricing forms of GHG regulation — legislation with respect to roadways, building codes, public transit and home heating, for example — would not fall under the matter of national concern.

[200] Nor is the freedom of the provinces and territories to legislate in relation to all methods of pricing GHG emissions at issue. Even where the specific regulatory mechanism of GHG pricing is concerned, the extent to which the matter interferes with provincial jurisdiction is strictly limited. Under the GGPPA, provinces and territories are free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system as long as it meets minimum national standards of price stringency. If a province wants to exceed the federal standards, it is free to do so without fear of federal legislation rendering its legislation inoperative, because the federal matter concerns minimum standards, not maximum standards. If a province fails to meet the minimum national standards, the GGPPA imposes a backstop pricing system, but only to the extent necessary to remedy the deficiency in provincial regulation in order to address the extraprovincial and international harm that might arise from the province's failure to act or to set sufficiently stringent standards. … The federal matter thus deals with GHG pricing stringency in a way that relates only to the risk of non-cooperation and the attendant risk of grave extraprovincial harm and has the ascertainable and reasonable limits required by Crown Zellerbach so as to ensure that provincial jurisdiction is not eroded more than necessary.

[201] Second, the matter's impact on areas of provincial life that would generally fall under provincial heads of power is also limited. Although the identified matter of national concern could arguably apply to types of fuel and to industries to which the GGPPA does not apply at present, that matter is, crucially, restricted to standards for GHG pricing stringency. … Indeed, the federal power recognized in this case is significantly less intrusive than the one at issue in Crown Zellerbach, in which, as La Forest J. noted, the effect of finding that the federal government has jurisdiction over ocean pollution caused by the dumping of waste was to "virtually preven[t] a province from dealing with certain of its own public property without federal consent…

[202] Nor does the federal "supervisory" jurisdiction of the GGPPA increase the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction. As I explained above, the Governor in Council's discretion under the GGPPA is limited by the purpose of the statute, by specific guidelines set out in it and by administrative law principles. The Governor in Council does not have an unfettered discretion to determine whether a provincial GHG pricing system is desirable, but is confined to determining whether it meets results-based standards.

[203] Moreover, the Governor in Council's decision-making role in the GGPPA is an incident of the flexibility the provinces retain in relation to GHG pricing within their borders. If provincial pricing systems are to be taken into account and federal intervention is to be limited to remedying deficiencies in those systems, the GGPPA must include a mechanism for determining whether provincial pricing systems meet federal standards. It would not be feasible for the statute itself to indicate which provincial pricing systems meet federal standards, as provincial pricing schemes and policies frequently change. The Governor in Council's decision-making role thus seems to be an incident of a flexible model designed to preserve provincial regulation. Furthermore, the discretion of the Governor in Council is necessary in order to ensure that some provinces do not subordinate or unduly burden the other provinces through their unilateral choice of standards.

[204] Indeed, the design of the GGPPA to ensure provincial flexibility is consistent with the 2018 Securities Reference. In that case, the proposed law also involved a "supervisory" aspect, given that the federal regulator's intervention was contingent upon there being a risk that "slips through the cracks" of a provincial scheme that posed a threat to the Canadian economy: para. 92. The Court found that this feature weighed in favour of constitutionality, because the statute was a "carefully tailored" response to "this provincial incapacity"…

[206] On the whole, I am of the view that the scale of impact of this matter of national concern on provincial jurisdiction is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution. The GGPPA puts a Canada-wide price on carbon pollution. Emitting provinces retain the ability to legislate, without any federal supervision, in relation to all methods of regulating GHG emissions that do not involve pricing. They are free to design any GHG pricing system they choose as long as they meet the federal government's outcome-based targets. The result of the GGPPA is therefore not to limit the provinces' freedom to legislate, but to partially limit their ability to refrain from legislating pricing mechanisms or to legislate mechanisms that are less stringent than would be needed in order to meet the national targets. Although this restriction may interfere with a province's preferred balance between economic and environmental considerations, it is necessary to consider the interests that would be harmed — owing to irreversible consequences for the environment, for human health and safety and for the economy — if Parliament were unable to constitutionally address the matter at a national level. This irreversible harm would be felt across the country and would be borne disproportionately by vulnerable communities and regions, with profound effects on Indigenous peoples, on the Canadian Arctic and on Canada's coastal regions. In my view, the impact on those interests justifies the limited constitutional impact on provincial jurisdiction.

(d) Conclusion on the National Concern Doctrine

[207] In conclusion, the GGPPA is intra vires Parliament on the basis of the national concern doctrine. Canada has adduced evidence that shows that the proposed matter of establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions is of clear concern to Canada as a whole and that the two principles underpinning the "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" inquiry are satisfied. Considering the impact on the interests that would be affected if Canada were unable to address this matter at a national level, the matter's scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction is reconcilable with the division of powers. …

5.3 CÔTÉ J (dissenting)

[Justice Côté struck down the Act on the basis that it had delegated the power to amend parts of the Act legislation – a so-called Henry VIII clause. She did not address the national concern branch of the POGG power.]

5.4 BROWN J (dissenting)

A. Characterization …

[323] … the Attorney General of Canada acknowledges that his approach has "evolved", having been "informed" along the way "by the characterizations of [the] courts below" (R.F., at para. 61). So where has this "evolution" brought him? Before this Court, it has at last brought him to the revelation that the Act's dominant subject matter is "establishing minimum national standards integral to reducing nationwide GHG emissions" (para. 56 (emphasis deleted)). …

[326] The principal difficulty with these submissions is the invocation of "minimum national standards". It adds nothing to the pith and substance of a matter, which is directed not to the fact of a standard, but to the subject matter to which the standard is to be applied. In other words, identifying "minimum national standards" as part of the dominant subject matter begs the very question which the characterization analysis seeks to answer: minimum national standards of what?

[327] "Minimum national standards" is a nothing. It is an artifice — or, as the Attorney General of Alberta puts it, a rhetorical "sleight of hand" … Only federally enacted standards can be both "national" (in the sense that only federal legislation can apply nationwide, while provincial legislative authority cannot extend beyond its borders) and a "minimum" (since, if a provincial standard is different from a corresponding federal standard, the operation of paramountcy ensures that the federal standard will prevail). In the result, using "minimum" and "national" to describe the Act's pith and substance is empty and misleading. …

[338] The difficulty with many of the submissions before us, however, including those of the Attorney General of Canada, is that they attempt to characterize the pith and substance of the Act as if Parts 1 and 2 were each doing the same thing in the same way. The majority's pith and substance analysis is based on the same premise (para. 71). … While Part 1 of the Act increases the cost of producing, delivering, using, or importing fuels that produce GHG emissions (which is expected to be passed on to consumers through an increase in the ultimate retail cost of those fuels), Part 2 does something quite different: it increases the cost of certain industrial activities by charging large facilities for producing GHG emissions over prescribed limits based on their particular industry and production processes. Part 2 also alleviates the impact of carbon pricing on some industries, but not all: the OBPS covers only the emissions-intensive trade-exposed industries that carry out an activity that the federal Cabinet chooses to list in the regulations. Picking winners and losers in this way is the stuff of industrial policy, not carbon price stringency. …

[340] It follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act ought to be characterized separately. And it also follows from the foregoing that the pith and substance of Part 1 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel. The pith and substance of Part 2 of the Act is the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure.

B. Classification …

[342] It must be remembered that the Act's entire scheme is premised on the provinces having jurisdiction to do precisely what Parliament has presumed to do in the Act —— that is, to impose carbon pricing through a comparable scheme.

[343] Provincial jurisdiction over property and civil rights authorized by s. 92(13) stands out as the most relevant source of legislative authority for the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 of the Act. Regulating trade and industrial activity, all within the boundaries of specified provinces, is indisputably captured by this broad head of power, which includes the regulation of business not coming within one of the enumerated federal heads of power, as well as, of course, the law of property and of contracts … Indeed, as I have explained, the Act operates as a backstop, operating only where provincial legislative authority is not exercised, or not exercised in a manner acceptable to the federal Cabinet. …

[345] The provincial residuum in s. 92(16), granting authority over all matters of a local or private nature, could also authorise Parts 1 and 2 of the Act in the alternative (Hogg, at pp. 21-4 to 21-5).

[346] Part 2 of the Act, as a deep foray into industrial policy, also falls within matters of provincial legislative authority granted by s. 92(10) over local works and undertakings. Also relevant to Part 2 of the Act — with its emphasis on heavy industrial emitters, trade exposure, and international competitiveness — is s. 92A. This head of power gives the provinces the exclusive jurisdiction to make laws in relation to the exploration, development, conservation, and management of non-renewable natural resources in the province. Though not intended to derogate from the existing powers of Parliament, the resource amendment fortifies the pre-existing provincial powers in this area and gives the provinces indirect taxation powers, and greater control over, their natural resources…

(2) The National Concern Branch of POGG

(a) Defining the Matter of National Concern

[370] …Defining a matter of national concern that encompasses both the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and the reduction of GHG emissions by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) requires broad strokes. The legislative means employed by Parts 1 and 2 are mutually distinct. Indeed, each is quite different from the other, sharing only a purpose: the reduction of GHG emissions. This, and my conclusion stated above that the definition of the matter of national concern should not tie Parliament to a particular legislative means, tend to support the identification of the matter said to be of national concern as the purpose of the Act: the reduction of GHG emissions. The only remaining question, then, is whether the reduction of GHG emissions satisfies the test stated in Crown Zellerbach for a valid national concern.

(b) Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility

[371] "The reduction of GHG emissions" does not meet the requirements of Crown Zellerbach. This would be so, even if it were appropriate to consider each of the pith and substance of Parts 1 and 2 as proposed matters of national concern, since the reduction of GHG emissions by raising the cost of fuel (Part 1) and by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure (Part 2) each fail to meet the requirement of distinctiveness. Neither of these matters is distinct from matters falling under provincial jurisdiction under s. 92. ….

(i) The Pith and Substance of Each Part Is Not Distinct

[372] Here again, the backstop model of the Act is of significance. The principal difficulty in finding that the reduction of GHG emissions (whether by raising the cost of fuel, or by pricing emissions in a manner that distinguishes among industries based on emissions intensity and trade exposure) has the requisite distinctiveness to be recognized as a matter of national concern is illustrated by the very quality of the scheme that Parliament has legislated. Through the Act, Parliament encourages provinces to enact substantially the same scheme to serve the same regulatory purpose of altering behaviour. Again, this demonstrates that Parliament has legislated in respect of a matter that falls within provincial legislative authority, specifically, ss. 92(10) (local works and undertakings), (13) (property and civil rights), (16) (matters of a local nature) and 92A (natural resources). …

[373] Proponents of the Act urge us to find that, even if the Act and provincially legislated GHG pricing schemes address the same matter, they each address different aspects of that matter. This argument rests on the applicability of the double aspect doctrine, whose application here the majority not only accepts but describes as inevitable whenever minimum national standards are employed (Chief Justice's reasons, at paras. 125-31). But the majority is simply wrong -- the double aspect doctrine has no application here.

[374] The double aspect doctrine arose because "some matters are by their very nature impossible to categorize under a single head of power: they may have both provincial and federal aspects" (Canadian Western Bank v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 22, [2007] 2 SCR 3, at para. 30). It therefore contemplates that "both Parliament and the provincial legislatures can adopt valid legislation on a single subject depending on the perspective from which the legislation is considered, that is, depending on the various 'aspects' of the 'matter' in question" (para. 30). Whether the doctrine applies to the national concern doctrine of POGG is a question of some controversy, given this Court's statement in Crown Zellerbach that Parliament acquires "exclusive jurisdiction of a plenary nature to legislate in relation to" the matter of national concern (p. 433; see, for instance, Lacombe, at paras. 26-27). Assuming without deciding, however, that the double aspect doctrine may, in some instances, apply to matters of national concern recognized as such under POGG, it has no application here.

[375] As the provinces clearly have jurisdiction to establish standards of GHG price stringency in the province, this leaves as the only difference between the federal aspect and the provincial aspect "minimum national standards". Obviously, adopting "minimum national standards" as part of the matter of national concern allows the majority to invoke the double aspect doctrine, since it has defined the matter in terms of something (enacting "national standards") which, as a practical matter, only Parliament could possibly do. And just as obviously, when the matter is defined in terms of something only Parliament could possibly do, whatever it is that the provinces are doing must be something different. This reasoning, however, could easily be applied to create federal "aspects" of all sorts of matters falling within provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, the majority suggests just that, acknowledging that whenever the device of "minimum national standards" is used, a double aspect "will inevitably result" (para. 129).

[376] The device of minimum national standards, combined with the double aspect doctrine, artificially meets many aspects of the Crown Zellerbach test, as diluted by the majority. By definition, "minimum national standards", being national, would presumably, and in every case, qualify as "qualitatively different from matters of provincial concern" and as "predominantly extraprovincial . . . in character" (Chief Justice's reasons, at para. 148). And, of course provinces, being provinces, are unable to establish binding minimum national standards (para. 182). Further, because the Act leaves the provinces free to adopt their own schemes as long as (or provided) they meet federal approval, the impact on provincial jurisdiction is "qualified and limited" (paras. 198, 205 and 211). In short, the device of "minimum national standards", where applied, deprives the majority's framework of much of its "exacting" quality.

[377] It is, however, this simple. While the double aspect doctrine "allows for the concurrent application of both federal and provincial legislation, . . . it does not create concurrent jurisdiction" (2011 Securities Reference, at para. 66 (underlining added)). …

[378] The Attorney General of Quebec offers a particularly compelling and constitutionally sound encapsulation of the problem with the majority's invocation of the double aspect doctrine in this case, and of the damage to the federation that will follow. The Attorney General of Quebec -- no stranger to carbon pricing and legislative action to mitigate climate change -- says that the proposed matter does not contemplate two aspects of the same matter; rather, it contemplates the same aspect of the same matter. And because the provinces may legislate in this area only where such legislation meets the criteria unilaterally set by the federal government, defining the matter so as to artificially conjure a double aspect effectively amounts to a transfer of jurisdiction from the provinces to the federal government. …

(ii) "The Reduction of GHG Emissions" Is Not Single or Indivisible …

[380]… While aspects of "the reduction of GHG emissions" may be distinct from matters falling under s. 92, as a matter of national concern it still fails to meet the Crown Zellerbach requirements of singleness and indivisibility. In Crown Zellerbach, it was "not simply the possibility or likelihood of the movement of pollutants across [the boundary between the territorial sea and the internal marine waters of a state]", but "the difficulty of ascertaining by visual observation" that boundary that meant uniform legislative treatment was required for marine pollution (p. 437).

This proposition could not be clearer. The matter was indivisible in that case not because pollutants might cross an invisible boundary; rather, the matter was indivisible because of the difficulty of knowing the source and physical location (federal territorial seas vs. provincial inland waters) of the pollution at any given time, and therefore whose regulatory and penal provisions might apply.

[381] Here, however, the territorial jurisdiction from which GHG emissions are emitted is readily identifiable. The matter is divisible, because whenever fuel is purchased, or an industrial activity is undertaken, no question arises as to physical location and, therefore, no difficulty arises in identifying whose jurisdiction might apply. Responsibility for the reduction of GHG emissions among the provinces can therefore be readily identified for regulation at the source of such emissions. This is not a concern which, absent exclusive federal jurisdiction, the provinces could not address. Rather, both Parliament and the provinces may within their respective spheres of legislative authority "operate in tandem" to reduce GHG emissions (Hydro-Québec, at para. 59). The reduction of GHG emissions therefore lacks the degree of unity required to qualify as an indivisible matter of national concern. …

[383] Of course, uniform legislative treatment in the area of GHG emissions reduction might be desirable, as it might assist Canada in meeting its international commitments in relation to GHG emission targets. But the desirability of uniform treatment is hardly the marker of a matter of national concern. Here, the non-participation of one province does not prevent any other province from reducing its own GHG emissions. While a provincial failure to deal effectively with the control or regulation of GHG emissions may cause more emissions from that province to cross provincial boundaries, that is precisely what this Court held was insufficient to meet the requirement of indivisibility in Crown Zellerbach. To be clear, even if this could be said to meet the provincial inability test —— that is, even if Crown Zellerbach could be read as understanding "provincial inability" as including a provincial failure to act —— my conclusion on this point would not change. This is because, properly understood -- and contrary to the framework developed by the majority -- the provincial inability test is but one indicium of singleness and indivisibility. …

[385] Obviously, uniform legislative treatment might be desirable in that it could alleviate concerns about carbon leakage. But, and again as the Court of Appeal of Alberta observed, the evidence on this record of the harms of interprovincial carbon leakage is equivocal at best. …

(c) Scale of Impact

[387] Even were the reduction of GHG emissions a single and indivisible area of jurisdiction, its impact on provincial jurisdiction would be of a scale that is completely irreconcilable with the division of powers.

[388] The power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions effectively authorizes an array of regulations, "the boundaries of [which] are limited only by the imagination" (Sask. C.A. reasons, at para. 128). It extends to the regulation of any activity that requires carbon-based fuel, including manufacturing, mining, agriculture, and transportation. Indeed, Part 2 of the Act, much like the impugned law in the 2011 Securities Reference, descends into the detailed regulation of industrial GHG emissions reduction by imposing different carbon prices on different industrial activities. As Huscroft J.A. recognized, in dissent, the power to create minimum standards for GHG emissions could potentially authorize minimum standards related to home heating and cooling, public transit, road design and use, fuel efficiency, manufacturing and farming prices (Ont. C.A. reasons, at para. 237).

[389] Unlike previously recognized matters of national concern, including aeronautics, the development and conservation of the national capital region, atomic energy and marine pollution, the power to legislate to reduce GHG emissions has the potential to undo Canada's division of powers. It is in this respect comparable to the broad topics of environmental regulation and inflation, which this Court has expressly refused to recognize as independent legislative subjects. …

[390] In an attempt to minimize the scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction, the Attorney General of British Columbia reminds us that the Act does not forbid any activity, but only increases the cost of certain activities. …

[391] The majority adopts this line of argument, describing "establishing minimum national standards of GHG price stringency to reduce GHG emissions" as an exclusively "pricing-based formulation" of the Act's pith and substance (para. 57). …

[392] This view ignores two problems. First, "just paying money" is an odd way of describing the impact of a law. The goal of the financial charges — "just paying money" — is to influence behaviour, in this case both consumer and industrial. And that is precisely the point. …

[394] The second problem with the "just paying money" line of defence is that the contrasting degree of potential impact on provincial jurisdiction of a hypothetical law validly promulgated under Parliament's criminal law power, or its taxation power for that matter, has absolutely no bearing on whether another matter should be recognized as a matter of national concern. Contrary to the submissions of the Attorneys General of Canada and British Columbia at the hearing of these appeals, the Constitution does not require provinces to happily accept a severe intrusion on their jurisdiction under POGG simply because Parliament could have passed a criminal law. Likewise, an intrusion into provincial jurisdiction is no less severe simply because it leaves the provinces with authority to enact more stringent regulatory requirements. This argument misses the point of the division of powers analysis, which -- pace the majority -- allows no recourse to balancing or proportionality considerations. The Constitution Act, 1867 does not permit federal overreach as long as it preserves provincial autonomy to the greatest extent possible. It sets out spheres of exclusive jurisdiction. It divides powers -- exclusive powers -- between Parliament and the provincial legislatures. And within their sphere of jurisdiction, the provincial legislatures are sovereign, which sovereignty connotes provincial power to act —— or not act —— as they see fit, not as long as they do so in a manner that finds approval at the federal Cabinet table …

[451] But the real problem with my colleagues' scale of impact analysis is their significant understatement of the intrusion into provincial jurisdiction effected by the Act. It will be recalled that the majority finds that the impact on provincial jurisdiction is limited, in part because the "impact on the provinces' freedom to legislate is minimal" and "strictly limited", since provinces "are free to design and legislate any GHG pricing system as long as it meets minimum national standards of price stringency" (paras. 199-200 (emphasis added)). As I have noted, this ignores the detailed industrial regulations authorized by Part 2 of the Act. But it also ignores that the federal benchmark is not static, and can be set to an increasingly stringent level so as to correspondingly narrow provincial jurisdiction in the field. It is only by ignoring such things that the majority is able to claim that the federal power that it recognizes here is "significantly less intrusive than [that recognized] in Crown Zellerbach" (para. 201).

[452] More fundamentally, and even if federalism were a thing whose terms were not constitutionally enshrined but could instead be judicially balanced, the majority's overall approach is not one of balance. Rather, the majority puts its thumb heavily on the federal side of the scale —— by legitimating as a national concern the device of "minimum national standards" on matters of importance that otherwise fall within provincial jurisdiction, and by insisting that doing so still preserves provincial autonomy (as long as it is exercised in accordance with federal priorities). Parliament now knows how to ensure that the balance will always tip its way, whenever provinces choose to exercise their legislative authority in a way that impedes the federal agenda. …

5.5 ROWE J (dissenting)

[457] The national concern doctrine is a residual power of last resort. I have come to this view through a close reading of R. v. Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd., 1988 CanLII 63 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 401, and the cases that preceded it. Faithful adherence to the doctrine leads inexorably to the conclusion that the national concern branch of the "Peace, Order, and good Government" ("POGG") power cannot be the basis for the constitutionality of the [GGPPA] …

III. The National Concern Doctrine

A. Singleness, Distinctiveness, Indivisibility …

[540] Given the residual nature of POGG, the importance of a matter has nothing to do with whether it is a matter of national concern. …The role of the general residual power is to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers, not to centralize "important" matters that can be legislated upon by the provinces or by both orders of government. …

B. Provincial Inability

(1) Extra-Provincial Effects Are Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, Provincial Inability

[554] … "extra-provincial effects", on their own, are insufficient to satisfy the "provincial inability" test. Rather, the extra-provincial effects must be such that the matter, or part of the matter, is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem. …

[556] Clearly, some extra-provincial effects are compatible with provincial jurisdiction, considering that, under the federal structure, provinces can adversely affect extra-provincial interests if they are acting within their sphere of jurisdiction … If the pith and substance of provincial legislation comes within the classes of subjects assigned to the provinces, incidental or ancillary extra-provincial effects are irrelevant to its validity …Given the potential displacement of provincial authority, courts should have a "strong empirical base" for concluding that the extra-provincial effects are such that the matter is beyond the powers of the provinces to deal with on their own or in tandem …

[557] Evidence that provinces are not cooperating, even combined with the presence of extra-provincial effects, is also insufficient to make out provincial inability. Provinces are sovereign within their sphere of jurisdiction and can legitimately choose different policies than other provinces. The sovereign and democratic will of provincial legislatures entitles them to agree or disagree that uniformity of laws is a desirable goal, and to change their mind in the future … Moreover, since the possibility of one or more provinces not cooperating is always hypothetically present, such lax criteria would be ineffective protection for provincial jurisdiction … It is worth repeating that striking a balance between diversity and uniformity is precisely why the Canadian constitution has a federal structure. In certain fields, the Constitution Act, 1867, places diversity and the right to provincial difference above uniformity. This is not a defect of our Constitution, it is a strength.

(2) Provincial Inability Is Relevant to, But Not Determinative of, "Singleness, Distinctiveness and Indivisibility"

[558] Second, the residual role of the national concern doctrine explains why Le Dain J. in Crown Zellerbach indicated that the "provincial inability" test is only a "factor" to evaluate whether a subject matter has the required singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility.

[559] Many matters are "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with" but do not meet the requirements of singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility, and are therefore not matters of national concern. Obviously, matters that fall squarely within federal jurisdiction are one example (i.e. currency and coinage, the postal service, etc.). This is also the case when matters are mere divisible aggregates that span provincial and federal jurisdiction …. For instance, there is no denying that the containment of inflation is "beyond the power of the provinces to deal with", since it involves measures that fall squarely under federal jurisdiction, such as central banking measures relating to the rate of interest (Anti-Inflation, at p. 452). This does not mean that the containment of inflation has the required singleness and indivisibility to qualify as a matter of national concern since it can be divided and distributed to both orders of government. Since there is no constitutional gap, there is no need for the national concern doctrine to be applied such that the entire matter comes under federal jurisdiction.

[560] Provincial inability is no more than Le Dain J. says it is in Crown Zellerbach: an indicium of "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility". Extra-provincial effects resulting in provincial inability may indicate that the matter is not of a local or private nature (i.e. "distinct" from provincial matters), or is not separable from the local and private aspects of the matter (i.e. "indivisible" or "single"). This will be the case where the extra- and intra-provincial aspects of a matter are interrelated and inseparable (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 434). This makes sense. In line with the residual role of POGG, federal authority over what was formerly within provincial competence is only justified where a matter has become distinct from what the provinces can do, and cannot be shared between orders of government because of its indivisibility. In such a case, reliance on POGG is the only way to maintain the exhaustiveness of the division of powers. Otherwise, there would be a jurisdictional void — if the federal Parliament did not have jurisdiction over such a matter, no one would.

C. Scale of Impact

[561] When determining if a matter can pass muster as a subject matter falling under POGG, the final step is to consider whether it has "a scale of impact on provincial jurisdiction that is reconcilable with the fundamental distribution of legislative power under the Constitution" (Crown Zellerbach, at p. 432). If the "singleness, distinctiveness and indivisibility" inquiry has been carried out correctly such that reliance on POGG is necessary to avoid a jurisdictional vacuum, then the scale of impact will necessarily be reconcilable with the division of powers. This stage of the test should therefore be understood as a "check" or "litmus test", rather than as an independent requirement. The evaluation of the scale of impact on the federal balance illustrates the need for caution when determining whether a new permanent head of exclusive power should, in effect, be added to the federal list of powers (Anti-Inflation, at p. 444).

[562] This prong of the test requires courts to determine whether recognizing the proposed new federal power would be compatible with the federal structure. It does not ask whether the importance of the proposed new federal power outweighs the infringement on provincial jurisdiction. Importance is irrelevant because it does not indicate whether there is a jurisdictional gap that must be filled with the general residual power. Important matters can and should be dealt with by the provinces. Further, assessing importance requires courts to assess the desirability of certain policies, something which is not their role.

[563] Rather, the notion of scale of impact on the fundamental distribution of powers is a manifestation of the principle of federalism. …

[566] Although the modern conception of federalism is flexible and accommodates overlapping jurisdiction, courts must be careful not to let the double aspect doctrine undermine the scale of impact inquiry by suggesting that provinces retain ample means to regulate the matter. The double aspect doctrine recognizes that the same fact situation or "matter" may possess both federal and provincial aspects, which means that both orders of government can legislate from their respective perspective …

[569] Moreover, the double aspect doctrine must be applied carefully, since increasing overlap between provincial and federal competence can severely disrupt the federal balance. Under the paramountcy doctrine, "where there is an inconsistency between validly enacted but overlapping provincial and federal legislation, the provincial legislation is inoperative to the extent of the inconsistency" (Saskatchewan (Attorney General) v. Lemare Lake Logging Ltd., 2015 SCC 53, [2015] 3 SCR 419, at para. 15; Rothmans, Benson & Hedges Inc. v. Saskatchewan, 2005 SCC 13, [2005] 1 SCR 188, at para. 11). The combined operation of the doctrines of double aspect and federal paramountcy can have profound implications for the federal structure and for provincial autonomy. …

> [572] The Chief Justice also takes issue with my account of the national concern test. I agree that our understandings of POGG are fundamentally different. Mine is that POGG confers residual authority, by which I mean authority to legislate in relation to only those matters which would otherwise fall into a jurisdictional vacuum. As such, it can only be the basis of jurisdiction for matters that do not come within heads of power listed in ss. 91 and 92, and cannot be divided between them. Such residual authority is necessary to ensure that the division of powers is exhaustive. To put it in the simplest terms, the matters falling under the competence conferred on Parliament by s. 91 and that conferred on the legislatures of the provinces by s. 92, or any combination of the two, by definition, cannot come within a residual authority.
> [573] Therein lies the conceptual difference that the Chief Justice highlights. In his framework, POGG is a primary source of authority conferred on Parliament in relation to "matters of inherent national concern" (para. 139). Moreover, it is a source of authority that can be used to deal with federal "aspects" of matters under enumerated powers within the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. Thus, he states at para. 130: ". . . where Canada is empowered to impose a minimum national standard, a double aspect situation arises: federal and provincial laws apply concurrently, but the federal law is paramount."
> [574] By means of "minimum national standards", a federal aspect is generated, and this federal aspect can be used as a basis to supervise provinces in the exercise of their authority. This is not residual authority. It is the antithesis of residual authority, as it would operate to encroach on jurisdiction conferred on the provinces. Most respectfully, I disagree. …
> [594] In conclusion, … for the reasons of my colleague Brown J., conclude that Parliament did not have jurisdiction to enact the Act under its general residual power. …

5.6 Note: linking s. 91(2) and POGG

An important doctrinal development in References re Greenhouse Gas Pollution Pricing Act is to link the jurisprudence under the general regulation of trade branch of s. 91(2) with the national concern branch of POGG, in relation to the provincial inability test. Sujit Choudhry made this proposal in an article that appeared prior to the Supreme Court's hearing ("Constitutional Law and the Politics of Carbon Pricing in Canada" (2019) 74 Institute for Research in Public Policy Study, 19-23). Choudhry also argued that the Supreme Court should determine that GHG emissions pose a "systemic risk", and that the federal government had jurisdiction over systemic risks, whether of an economic or environmental nature:

> … at the heart of the Greenhouse Gas Reference is this question: What are the circumstances under which the federal government can legislate unliterally to address interjurisdictional spillovers in the form of negative extraprovincial externalities, even if it is possible for a federal-provincial- territorial or provincial-territorial agreement to functionally replicate federal legislation? The Supreme Court must squarely address this issue.
> From provincial inability to provincial incapacity and systemic risk
> Even though the federal government has sought to uphold the GGPPA under the POGG power, the answer to this question can be found in the jurisprudence under the federal trade and commerce power…
>
> The most important development in the trade and commerce case law since General Motors is the emergence of the concept of "systemic risks," which the Supreme Court of Canada introduced in Reference re Securities Act. This concept appeared in expert evidence from Michael Trebilcock, who defined them as "risks that occasion a 'domino effect' whereby the risk of default by one market participant will impact the ability of others to fulfil their legal obligations, setting off a chain of negative economic consequences that pervade an entire financial system" (paragraph 103).
> …In Reference re Securities Act, the Supreme Court found draft federal securities legislation for a comprehensive regime of securities regulation to be unconstitutional because it intruded into provincial jurisdiction. However, the Court opined that federal legislation confined to systemic risks would fall within federal jurisdiction. …
> The obvious rejoinder is that the provinces could enact coordinated legislation to address systemic risk. For example, "[b]y way of administrative delegation, they could delegate provincial regulatory powers to a single pan-Canadian regulator" (paragraph 118). … However, the Supreme Court in Reference re Securities Act rejected this argument …
> The Supreme Court accepted the factual proposition that withdrawal by a province could undermine the effectiveness of an interprovincial arrangement — for example, by creating a negative extraprovincial externality. It reasoned that this would be the price of federalism "in many areas," which the Court referred to as "lesser regulatory matters" (paragraph 123). But in the case of "managing systemic risk," the Court held that that price would be too high, because achieving "truly national goals" or "genuine national goals" (paragraph 121) would be jeopardized by unilateral provincial action. In respect of these issues, "a federal regime would be qualitatively different from a voluntary interprovincial scheme" (paragraph 123), and the federal government could legislate unilaterally. …
> Provincial incapacity and the systemic risk of global climate change: the constitutional case for the *GGPPA
> The concept of systemic risk — developed under the general regulation of trade branch of the trade and commerce power — is one that the Supreme Court should incorporate into the test for the national dimensions branch of POGG in the Greenhouse Gas Reference. The Court should distinguish "lesser regulatory areas" from "truly national goals" — the latter term being tantamount to matters of national concern. For the former, negative extraprovincial externalities are the price of federalism, and the policy area remains within provincial jurisdiction. But for the latter, negative extraprovincial externalities are a reason why the matter "must be regulated federally." Systemic risks are a kind of negative extraprovincial externality that falls into this category.
> The constitutional question is whether GHG emissions pose a systemic risk — and hence fall under federal jurisdiction. The federal government's argument would have to run as follows. If global temperatures rise beyond a certain level, a tipping point will be reached, leading to an uncontrollable cascade of events. GHGs would be released into the atmosphere at an ever-accelerating rate, which would fuel a self-reinforcing feedback loop that, once commenced, would be impossible for humanity to arrest, and that would make the planet uninhabitable. This is a "domino effect" of the kind referred to by the Supreme Court in Reference re Securities Act.
> In Reference re Securities Act, the Court stated that "[b]y definition" systemic "risks can be evasive of provincial boundaries and usual methods of control." In other words, systemic risks transcend jurisdictional boundaries. In that case, the systemic risk was economic, and the boundaries were interprovincial. In the case of GHG emissions and climate change, the systemic risk is environmental, and the boundaries are international.

5.7 Note: double aspect doctrine and the national concern branch of the POGG

The Supreme Court divided on the applicability of the double aspect doctrine to the national concern branch of the POGG. The majority, per Wagner CJ, held that it was applicable under certain circumstances. Brown and Rowe JJ, on the other, held it was inapplicable.

Consider the concerns raised by the dissenting judges. Do you agree? How does the majority respond to these concerns? Are you persuaded?

6.1 Introduction: the presumption of constitutionality
