37 Much of the CSMB's argument is based on its submission that [translation] "the kirpan is essentially a dagger, a weapon designed to kill, intimidate or threaten others". With respect, while the kirpan undeniably has characteristics of a bladed weapon capable of wounding or killing a person, this submission disregards the fact that, for orthodox Sikhs, the kirpan is above all a religious symbol. Chaplain Manjit Singh mentions in his affidavit that the word "kirpan" comes from "kirpa", meaning "mercy" and "kindness", and "aan", meaning "honour". There is no denying that this religious object could be used wrongly to wound or even kill someone, but the question at this stage of the analysis cannot be answered definitively by considering only the physical characteristics of the kirpan. Since the question of the physical makeup of the kirpan and the risks the kirpan could pose to the school board's students involves the reconciliation of conflicting values, I will return to it when I address justification under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter. In order to demonstrate an infringement of his freedom of religion, Gurbaj Singh does not have to establish that the kirpan is not a weapon. He need only show that his personal and subjective belief in the religious significance of the kirpan is sincere.

38 Gurbaj Singh says that he sincerely believes he must adhere to this practice in order to comply with the requirements of his religion. Grenier J. of the Superior Court declared (at para. 6) — and the Court of Appeal reached the same conclusion (at para. 70) — that Gurbaj Singh's belief was sincere. Gurbaj Singh's affidavit supports this conclusion, and none of the parties have contested the sincerity of his belief.

39 Furthermore, Gurbaj Singh's refusal to wear a replica made of a material other than metal is not capricious. He genuinely believes that he would not be complying with the requirements of his religion were he to wear a plastic or wooden kirpan. The fact that other Sikhs accept such a compromise is not relevant, since as Lemelin J. mentioned at para. 68 of her decision, [translation] "[w]e must recognize that people who profess the same religion may adhere to the dogma and practices of that religion to varying degrees of rigour."

40 Finally, the interference with Gurbaj Singh's freedom of religion is neither trivial nor insignificant. Forced to choose between leaving his kirpan at home and leaving the public school system, Gurbaj Singh decided to follow his religious convictions and is now attending a private school. The prohibition against wearing his kirpan to school has therefore deprived him of his right to attend a public school.

41 Thus, there can be no doubt that the council of commissioners' decision prohibiting Gurbaj Singh from wearing his kirpan to Sainte-Catherine-Labouré school infringes his freedom of religion. This limit must therefore be justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter.

7. Section 1 of the Canadian Charter

43 The onus is on the respondents to prove that, on a balance of probabilities, the infringement is reasonable and can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. To this end, two requirements must be met. First, the legislative objective being pursued must be sufficiently important to warrant limiting a constitutional right. Next, the means chosen by the state authority must be proportional to the objective in question: Oakes; R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713.

7.1 Importance of the Objective

44 As stated by the Court of Appeal, the council of commissioners' decision [translation] "was motivated by [a pressing and substantial] objective, namely, to ensure an environment conducive to the development and learning of the students. This requires [the CSMB] to ensure the safety of the students and the staff. This duty is at the core of the mandate entrusted to educational institutions" (para. 77). The appellant concedes that this objective is laudable and that it passes the first stage of the test. The respondents also submitted fairly detailed evidence consisting of affidavits from various stakeholders in the educational community explaining the importance of safety in schools and the upsurge in problems relating to weapons and violence in schools.

45 Clearly, the objective of ensuring safety in schools is sufficiently important to warrant overriding a constitutionally protected right or freedom. It remains to be determined what level of safety the governing board was seeking to achieve by prohibiting the carrying of weapons and dangerous objects, and what degree of risk would accordingly be tolerated. As in British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles) v. British Columbia (Council of Human Rights), 1999 CanLII 646 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 868, at para. 25, the possibilities range from a desire to ensure absolute safety to a total lack of concern for safety. Between these two extremes lies a concern to ensure a reasonable level of safety.

46 Although the parties did not present argument on the level of safety sought by the governing board, the issue was addressed by the intervener Canadian Human Rights Commission, which correctly stated that the standard that seems to be applied in schools is reasonable safety, not absolute safety. The application of a standard of absolute safety could result in the installation of metal detectors in schools, the prohibition of all potentially dangerous objects (such as scissors, compasses, baseball bats and table knives in the cafeteria) and permanent expulsion from the public school system of any student exhibiting violent behaviour. Apart from the fact that such a standard would be impossible to attain, it would compromise the objective of providing universal access to the public school system.

47 On the other hand, when the governing board approved the article in question of the Code de vie, it was not seeking to establish a minimum standard of safety. As can be seen from the affidavits of certain stakeholders from the educational community, violence and weapons are not tolerated in schools, and students exhibiting violent or dangerous behaviour are punished. Such measures show that the objective is to attain a certain level of safety beyond a minimum threshold.

48 I therefore conclude that the level of safety chosen by the governing council and confirmed by the council of commissioners was reasonable safety. The objective of ensuring a reasonable level of safety in schools is without question a pressing and substantial one.

7.2 Proportionality

7.2.1 Rational Connection

49 The first stage of the proportionality analysis consists in determining whether the council of commissioners' decision was rendered in furtherance of the objective. The decision must have a rational connection with the objective. In the instant case, prohibiting Gurbaj Singh from wearing his kirpan to school was intended to further this objective. Despite the profound religious significance of the kirpan for Gurbaj Singh, it also has the characteristics of a bladed weapon and could therefore cause injury. The council of commissioners' decision therefore has a rational connection with the objective of ensuring a reasonable level of safety in schools. Moreover, it is relevant that the appellant has never contested the rationality of the Code de vie's rule prohibiting weapons in school.

7.2.2 Minimal Impairment

50 The second stage of the proportionality analysis is often central to the debate as to whether the infringement of a right protected by the Canadian Charter can be justified. The limit, which must minimally impair the right or freedom that has been infringed, need not necessarily be the least intrusive solution…

52 In considering this aspect of the proportionality analysis, Lemelin J. expressed the view that [translation] "[t]he duty to accommodate this student is a corollary of the minimal impairment [test]" (para. 92). In other words, she could not conceive of the possibility of a justification being sufficient for the purposes of s. 1 if reasonable accommodation is possible (para. 75). This correspondence of the concept of reasonable accommodation with the proportionality analysis is not without precedent. In Eldridge, at para. 79, this Court stated that, in cases concerning s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter, "reasonable accommodation" was equivalent to the concept of "reasonable limits" provided for in s. 1 of the Canadian Charter.

53 In my view, this correspondence between the legal principles is logical. In relation to discrimination, the courts have held that there is a duty to make reasonable accommodation for individuals who are adversely affected by a policy or rule that is neutral on its face, and that this duty extends only to the point at which it causes undue hardship to the party who must perform it. Although it is not necessary to review all the cases on the subject, the analogy with the duty of reasonable accommodation seems to me to be helpful to explain the burden resulting from the minimal impairment test with respect to a particular individual, as in the case at bar…

54 The council of commissioners' decision establishes an absolute prohibition against Gurbaj Singh wearing his kirpan to school. The respondents contend that this prohibition is necessary, because the presence of the kirpan at the school poses numerous risks for the school's pupils and staff. It is important to note that Gurbaj Singh has never claimed a right to wear his kirpan to school without restrictions. Rather, he says that he is prepared to wear his kirpan under the above-mentioned conditions imposed by Grenier J. of the Superior Court. Thus, the issue is whether the respondents have succeeded in demonstrating that an absolute prohibition is justified.

55 According to the CSMB, to allow the kirpan to be worn to school entails the risks that it could be used for violent purposes by the person wearing it or by another student who takes it away from him, that it could lead to a proliferation of weapons at the school, and that its presence could have a negative impact on the school environment. In support of this last point, the CSMB submits that the kirpan is a symbol of violence and that it sends the message that the use of force is the way to assert rights and resolve conflicts, in addition to undermining the perception of safety and compromising the spirit of fairness that should prevail in schools, in that its presence suggests the existence of a double standard. Let us look at those arguments.

7.2.2.1 Safety in Schools

56 According to the respondents, the presence of kirpans in schools, even under certain conditions, creates a risk that they will be used for violent purposes, either by those who wear them or by other students who might take hold of them by force.

57 The evidence shows that Gurbaj Singh does not have behavioural problems and has never resorted to violence at school. The risk that this particular student would use his kirpan for violent purposes seems highly unlikely to me. In fact, the CSMB has never argued that there was a risk of his doing so.

58 As for the risk of another student taking his kirpan away from him, it also seems to me to be quite low, especially if the kirpan is worn under conditions such as were imposed by Grenier J. of the Superior Court. In the instant case, if the kirpan were worn in accordance with those conditions, any student wanting to take it away from Gurbaj Singh would first have to physically restrain him, then search through his clothes, remove the sheath from his guthra, and try to unstitch or tear open the cloth enclosing the sheath in order to get to the kirpan. There is no question that a student who wanted to commit an act of violence could find another way to obtain a weapon, such as bringing one in from outside the school. Furthermore, there are many objects in schools that could be used to commit violent acts and that are much more easily obtained by students, such as scissors, pencils and baseball bats.

59 In her brief reasons, Grenier J. explained that her decision was based in part on the fact that [translation] "the evidence revealed no instances of violent incidents involving kirpans in schools in Quebec" and on "the state of Canadian and American law on this matter" (para. 6). In fact, the evidence in the record suggests that, over the 100 years since Sikhs have been attending schools in Canada, not a single violent incident related to the presence of kirpans in schools has been reported…

62 The respondents maintain that freedom of religion can be limited even in the absence of evidence of a real risk of significant harm, since it is not necessary to wait for the harm to occur before correcting the situation. They submit that the same line of reasoning that was followed in Hothi v. R., 1985 CanLII 3672 (MB KB), [1985] 3 W.W.R. 256 (Man. Q.B.) (aff'd 1985 CanLII 3682 (MB CA), [1986] 3 W.W.R. 671 (Man. C.A.)), and Nijjar v. Canada 3000 Airlines Ltd. (1999), 1999 CanLII 19861 (CHRT), 36 C.H.R.R. D/76 (Can. Trib.), in which the wearing of kirpans was prohibited in courts and on airplanes, should apply in this case. As was mentioned above, Lemelin J. of the Court of Appeal pointed out that safety concerns are no less serious in schools.

63 There can be no doubt that safety is just as important in schools as it is on airplanes and in courts. However, it is important to remember that the specific context must always be borne in mind in resolving the issue. In Nijjar, Mr. Nijjar's complaint that he had been denied the right to wear his kirpan aboard a Canada 3000 Airlines aircraft was dismissed because, inter alia, he had failed to demonstrate that wearing a kirpan in a manner consistent with Canada 3000's policies would be contrary to his religious beliefs. It was apparent from Mr. Nijjar's testimony that wearing one particular type of kirpan rather than another was a matter of personal preference, not of religious belief…

64 Hothi also involved special circumstances. The judge who prohibited the wearing of a kirpan in the courtroom was hearing the case of an accused charged with assault under s. 245 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34…

65 The facts in the case at bar are more similar to the facts in Pandori than to those in Nijjar and Hothi. The school environment is a unique one that permits relationships to develop among students and staff. These relationships make it possible to better control the different types of situations that arise in schools…

67 Returning to the respondents' argument, I agree that it is not necessary to wait for harm to be done before acting, but the existence of concerns relating to safety must be unequivocally established for the infringement of a constitutional right to be justified. Given the evidence in the record, it is my opinion that the respondents' argument in support of an absolute prohibition — namely that kirpans are inherently dangerous — must fail.

7.2.2.2 Proliferation of Weapons in Schools

68 The respondents also contend that allowing Gurbaj Singh to wear his kirpan to school could have a ripple effect. They submit that other students who learn that orthodox Sikhs may wear their kirpans will feel the need to arm themselves so that they can defend themselves if attacked by a student wearing a kirpan.

69 This argument is essentially based on the one discussed above, namely that kirpans in school pose a safety risk to other students, forcing them to arm themselves in turn in order to defend themselves. For the reasons given above, I am of the view that the evidence does not support this argument. It is purely speculative and cannot be accepted in the instant case: see Eldridge, at para. 89. Moreover, this argument merges with the next one, which relates more specifically to the risk of poisoning the school environment. I will therefore continue with the analysis.

7.2.2.3 Negative Impact on the School Environment

70 The respondents submit that the presence of kirpans in schools will contribute to a poisoning of the school environment. They maintain that the kirpan is a symbol of violence and that it sends the message that using force is the way to assert rights and resolve conflict, compromises the perception of safety in schools and establishes a double standard.

71 The argument that the wearing of kirpans should be prohibited because the kirpan is a symbol of violence and because it sends the message that using force is necessary to assert rights and resolve conflict must fail. Not only is this assertion contradicted by the evidence regarding the symbolic nature of the kirpan, it is also disrespectful to believers in the Sikh religion and does not take into account Canadian values based on multiculturalism.

72 As for the submissions based on the other students' perception regarding safety and on feelings of unfairness that they might experience, these appear to stem from the affidavit of psychoeducator Denis Leclerc, who gave his opinion concerning a study in which he took part that involved, inter alia, questioning students and staff from 14 high schools belonging to the CSMB about the socio-educational environment in schools. The results of the study seem to show that there is a mixed or negative perception regarding safety in schools. It should be noted that this study did not directly address kirpans, but was instead a general examination of the situation in schools in terms of safety. Mr. Leclerc is of the opinion that the presence of kirpans in schools would heighten this impression that the schools are unsafe. He also believes that allowing Gurbaj Singh to wear a kirpan would engender a feeling of unfairness among the students, who would perceive this permission as special treatment. He mentions, for example, that some students still consider the right of Muslim women to wear the chador to be unfair, because they themselves are not allowed to wear caps or scarves.

74 With respect for the view of the Court of Appeal, I cannot accept Denis Leclerc's position. Among other concerns, the example he presents concerning the chador is particularly revealing. To equate a religious obligation such as wearing the chador with the desire of certain students to wear caps is indicative of a simplistic view of freedom of religion that is incompatible with the Canadian Charter. Moreover, his opinion seems to be based on the firm belief that the kirpan is, by its true nature, a weapon…

75 The appellants are perhaps right to state that the only possible explanation for the acceptance of … other potentially dangerous objects [such as compasses, paper cutters, baseball bats, sporting equipment, or cars] in schools is that the respondents consider the activities in which those objects are used to be important, while accommodating the religious beliefs of the appellant's son is not.

76 Religious tolerance is a very important value of Canadian society. If some students consider it unfair that Gurbaj Singh may wear his kirpan to school while they are not allowed to have knives in their possession, it is incumbent on the schools to discharge their obligation to instil in their students this value that is, as I will explain in the next section, at the very foundation of our democracy.

77 In my opinion, the respondents have failed to demonstrate that it would be reasonable to conclude that an absolute prohibition against wearing a kirpan minimally impairs Gurbaj Singh's rights.

7.2.3 Effects of the Measure

78 Since we have found that the council of commissioners' decision is not a reasonable limit on religious freedom, it is not strictly necessary to weigh the deleterious effects of this measure against its salutary effects. I do believe, however, like the intervener Canadian Civil Liberties Association, that it is important to consider some effects that could result from an absolute prohibition. An absolute prohibition would stifle the promotion of values such as multiculturalism, diversity, and the development of an educational culture respectful of the rights of others…

79 A total prohibition against wearing a kirpan to school undermines the value of this religious symbol and sends students the message that some religious practices do not merit the same protection as others. On the other hand, accommodating Gurbaj Singh and allowing him to wear his kirpan under certain conditions demonstrates the importance that our society attaches to protecting freedom of religion and to showing respect for its minorities. The deleterious effects of a total prohibition thus outweigh its salutary effects.

9. Remedy

82 Given that Gurbaj Singh no longer attends Sainte-Catherine-Labouré school, it would not be appropriate to restore the judgment of the Superior Court, as requested by the appellants. The Court accordingly considers that the appropriate and just remedy is to declare the decision prohibiting Gurbaj Singh from wearing his kirpan to be null.

[Justice Abella (Deschamps J concurring) and Justice LeBel wrote separate opinions concurring in the result but disagreeing on the methodology of resolving Charter disputes in the administrative context.]

2.4 Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2009] 2 SCR 567

2.4.1 Majority

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, Deschamps and Rothstein JJ. was delivered by

The Chief Justice —

I. Introduction

[1] The Province of Alberta requires all persons who drive motor vehicles on highways to hold a driver's licence. Since 1974 each licence has borne a photograph of the licence holder, subject to exemptions for people who objected to having their photos taken on religious grounds. In 2003 the Province made the photo requirement universal in order to reduce the risk of driver's licences being used for identity theft, a growing problem in Alberta and the country. All licence holders are now required to have their photos taken for purposes of placement in the Province's facial recognition data bank.

offered to lessen the impact of the universal photo requirement by issuing special licences without photos, relieving Colony members of the need to carry their photos. However, it insists that their photos be taken for purposes of placement in the central data bank. The members of the Wilson Colony have rejected this proposal.

[3] The case has proceeded on the basis that the universal photo requirement constitutes a limit on the freedom of religion of Colony members who wish to obtain a driver's licence and thus infringes s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The issue on this appeal is whether this limit is a reasonable limit demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter. If not, the regulation is inconsistent with the Charter and is null and void pursuant to s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[4] I conclude that the evidence led by the Province establishes that the universal photo requirement is justified under s. 1 of the Charter on the test set out in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103. The goal of setting up a system that minimizes the risk of identity theft associated with driver's licences is a pressing and important public goal. The universal photo requirement is connected to this goal and does not limit freedom of religion more than required to achieve it. Finally, the negative impact on the freedom of religion of Colony members who wish to obtain licences does not outweigh the benefits associated with the universal photo requirement. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal and uphold the regulation as constitutional.

II. Facts

[7] Members of the Wilson Colony, like many other Hutterites, believe that the Second Commandment prohibits them from having their photograph willingly taken. This belief is sincerely held.

[8] Although the Colony attempts to be self-sufficient, some members need driver's licences so that they can travel outside the Colony to do business and attend to the needs of members. Under the 2003 regulation, members currently holding Condition Code G licences are required to have their photograph taken upon renewal of their licences, resulting in a violation of their religious beliefs. The Colony claimants led evidence asserting that if members could not obtain driver's licences, the viability of their communal lifestyle would be threatened. Mr. Samuel Wurz, the Colony's Secretary-Treasurer, deposed that each Colony member has a specific set of responsibilities assigned to him or her, some of which require the member to drive. If a Colony member cannot carry out these responsibilities, it "causes our religious commune to function improperly, thereby eroding the fabric of our social, cultural and religious way of life". In his view, the Province is effectively "attempting to force the Hutterian Brethren to make a choice between two of our religious beliefs", a choice they feel they should not have to make.

V. Analysis

A. Freedom of Religion

(1) The Nature of the Limit on the Section 2(a) Right

[28] Section 2(a) of the Charter states that "[e]veryone has . . . freedom of conscience and religion".

[29] The members of the Colony believe that permitting their photo to be taken violates the Second Commandment: "You shall not make for yourself an idol, or any likeness of what is in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the water under the earth" (Exodus 20:4). They believe that photographs are "likenesses" within the meaning of the Second Commandment, and want nothing to do with their creation or use. The impact of having a photo taken might involve censure, such as being required to stand during religious services.

[31] My colleague Abella J. notes at para. 130 that "freedom of religion has 'both individual and collective aspects'". She asserts that "[b]oth . . . are engaged in this case." While I agree that religious freedom has both individual and collective aspects, I think it is important to be clear about the relevance of those aspects at different stages of the analysis in this case. The broader impact of the photo requirement on the Wilson Colony community is relevant at the proportionality stage of the s. 1 analysis, specifically in weighing the deleterious and salutary effects of the impugned regulation. The extent to which the impugned law undermines the proper functioning of the community properly informs that comparison. Community impact does not, however, transform the essential claim — that of the individual claimants for photo-free licences — into an assertion of a group right.

[33] The Province concedes the first element of this s. 2(a) test, sincere belief in a belief or practice that has a nexus with religion. The chambers judge described the concession in the following terms:

[34] The record does not disclose a concession on the second element of the test — whether the universal photo requirement interferes with Colony members' religious freedom in a manner that is more than trivial or insubstantial. In order for such a determination to be made, it would need to be shown that the claimants' "religious beliefs or conduct might reasonably or actually be threatened" by the universal photo requirement: see Edwards Books, at p. 759. Evidence of a state-imposed cost or burden would not suffice; there would need to be evidence that such a burden was "capable of interfering with religious belief or practice": Edwards Books, at p. 759. In the present case, however, the courts below seem to have proceeded on the assumption that this requirement was met. Given this assumption, I will proceed to consider whether the limit is a reasonable one, demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

(2) Is the Limit on the Section 2(a) Right Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[35] This Court has recognized that a measure of leeway must be accorded to governments in determining whether limits on rights in public programs that regulate social and commercial interactions are justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Often, a particular problem or area of activity can reasonably be remedied or regulated in a variety of ways. The schemes are typically complex, and reflect a multitude of overlapping and conflicting interests and legislative concerns. They may involve the expenditure of government funds, or complex goals like reducing antisocial behaviour. The primary responsibility for making the difficult choices involved in public governance falls on the elected legislature and those it appoints to carry out its policies. Some of these choices may trench on constitutional rights.

(a) Is the Limit Prescribed by Law?

[40] The majority of the Court of Appeal expressed concern that the challenged measure was adopted by regulation and therefore without any legislative debate, pursuant to an Act with very different objectives. The respondents take this position much further and advance a general proposition that Charter-infringing measures may only be adopted by primary legislation. Concern about overextension of regulatory authority is understandable. Governments should not be free to use a broad delegated authority to transform a limited-purpose licensing scheme into a de facto universal identification system beyond the reach of legislative oversight. However, that is not what has happened here. A photo requirement has been an accepted part of the motor vehicle licensing scheme for decades. It is not a stand-alone identification divorced from the public-safety purpose of the authorizing legislation. Moreover, hostility to the regulation-making process is out of step with this Court's jurisprudence and with the realities of the modern regulatory state: see Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69, [2000] 2 SCR 1120, at para. 71; D.J. Mullan, Administrative Law: Cases, Text and Materials (5th ed. 2003), at p. 948. Regulations, passed by Order in Council and applied in accordance with the principles of administrative law and subject to challenge for constitutionality, are the life blood of the administrative state and do not imperil the rule of law. Whether the impugned measure was passed into law by statute or regulation is usually of no consequence for the s. 1 analysis.

(b) Is the Purpose for Which the Limit Is Imposed Pressing and Substantial?

[44] The majority of the Court of Appeal suggested that the goal of the universal photo requirement should be confined to purposes related to traffic safety, since that was the subject of the authorizing Act. However, government regulations may deal both with the primary goal of an enabling law and with collateral concerns resulting from measures adopted to achieve this goal…

[46] Finally, as explained above, the fact that the specific objectives of the impugned regulation were not debated or ratified by the legislature does not render them invalid for the purposes of s. 1. If a regulation is validly enacted pursuant to delegated legislative authority, its objective can properly be evaluated under the test established in Oakes.

(c) Is the Means by Which the Goal Is Furthered Proportionate?

(i) Is the Limit Rationally Connected to the Purpose?

[50] Alberta's evidence demonstrates the ways in which the existence of an exemption from the photo requirement would increase the vulnerability of the licensing system and the risk of identity-related fraud. As Mr. Joseph Mark Pendleton, Director of the Special Investigations Unit of the Alberta Ministry of Government Services, put it in his affidavit supporting Alberta's position, "[o]pportunities for fraud are as numerous as criminals are clever and resourceful". The existence of non-photo licences in the system raises the possibility that a person could hold multiple licences in different names, as long as no more than one of them was a regular photographic licence. As stated by Alberta, "each licensee whose photo is not entered in our database creates an opportunity for impersonation by wrongdoers, because that person's licence can be renewed or replaced by a wrongdoer without being detected by [facial recognition]". A non-photo licence can be obtained and used to obtain credit or enter into other commercial relationships to the detriment of the other parties to the transactions. Without the photographs of all licence holders in the photo identification bank, the assurance of a one-to-one correspondence between individuals and issued licences is lost, and the possibility of driver's licence-based fraud would be increased.

[51] The majority of the Alberta Court of Appeal, while deciding the case on the basis of minimum impairment, expressed doubt on whether the universal photo requirement for all holders of driver's licences is rationally connected to the goal of preserving the integrity and security of the driver's licensing system. Conrad J.A. pointed out that many Albertans do not hold driver's licences and concluded that the risk flowing from exempting a few hundred Hutterites from the requirement was "minimal". These concerns confuse rational connection with proportionality of negative and positive effects of the measure. The issue at the stage of rational connection is simply whether there is a rational link between the infringing measure and the government goal. The balance between positive and negative effects of the measure falls to be considered at the final stage of the s. 1 analysis.

[52] I conclude that the Province has established that the universal photo requirement is rationally related to its goal of protecting the integrity of the driver's licensing system and preventing it from being used for purposes of identity theft.

(ii) Does the Limit Minimally Impair the Right?

[53] The question at this stage of the s. 1 proportionality analysis is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the pressing and substantial goal put forward to justify the limit. Another way of putting this question is to ask whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal. In making this assessment, the courts accord the legislature a measure of deference, particularly on complex social issues where the legislature may be better positioned than the courts to choose among a range of alternatives.

[55] I hasten to add that in considering whether the government's objective could be achieved by other less drastic means, the court need not be satisfied that the alternative would satisfy the objective to exactly the same extent or degree as the impugned measure. In other words, the court should not accept an unrealistically exacting or precise formulation of the government's objective which would effectively immunize the law from scrutiny at the minimal impairment stage…The test at the minimum impairment stage is whether there is an alternative, less drastic means of achieving the objective in a real and substantial manner. As I will explain, in my view the record in this case discloses no such alternative.

[56] The purpose of the limit in this case, I earlier concluded, is to maintain the integrity of the driver's licensing system by minimizing the risk of driver's licences being used for purposes of identity theft, so as to prevent fraud and various other misuses of the system. The regulation is part of a complex regulatory scheme and is aimed at an emerging and challenging problem. The question, therefore, is whether the means chosen to further its purpose — the universal photo requirement for all licensed drivers — is reasonably tailored to address the problem of identity theft associated with driver's licences.

[59] The problem with the claimants' proposal in the context of the minimum impairment inquiry is that it compromises the Province's goal of minimizing the risk of misuse of driver's licences for identity theft. The stamp "Not to be used for identification purposes" might prevent a person who comes into physical possession of such a licence from using it as a breeder document, but it would not prevent a person from assuming the identity of the licence holder and producing a fake document, which could not be checked in the absence of a photo in the data bank. As Slatter J.A. pointed out, without the photo in the bank, the bank is neutralized and the risk that the identity of the holder can be stolen and used for fraudulent purposes is increased. The only way to reduce that risk as much as possible is through a universal photo requirement. The claimants' argument that the reduction in risk would be low, since few people are likely to request exemption from the photo requirement, assumes that some increase in risk and impairment of the government goal may occur, and hence does not assist at the stage of minimal impairment.

[61] This is not to suggest the Colony members are acting improperly. Freedom of religion cases may often present this "all or nothing" dilemma. Compromising religious beliefs is something adherents may understandably be unwilling to do. And governments may find it difficult to tailor laws to the myriad ways in which they may trench on different people's religious beliefs and practices. The result may be that the justification of a limit on the right falls to be decided not at the point of minimal impairment, which proceeds on the assumption the state goal is valid, but at the stage of proportionality of effects, which is concerned about balancing the benefits of the measure against its negative effects.

[62] I conclude that the universal photo requirement minimally impairs the s. 2(a) right. It falls within a range of reasonable options available to address the goal of preserving the integrity of the driver's licensing system. All other options would significantly increase the risk of identity theft using driver's licences. The measure seeks to realize the legislative goal in a minimally intrusive way.

[63] Much has been made of the fact that over 700,000 Albertans do not hold driver's licences. The argument is that the risk posed by a few hundred potential religious objectors is minuscule as compared to the much larger group of unlicensed persons. This argument is accepted by the dissent. In my view, it rests on an overly broad view of the objective of the driver's licence photo requirement as being to eliminate all identity theft in the province. Casting the government objective in these broad terms, my colleague Abella J. argues that the risk posed by a few religious dissenters is minimal, when compared to the general risk posed by unlicensed persons. But with respect, that is the wrong comparison.

We must take the government's goal as it is. It is not the broad goal of eliminating all identity theft, but the more modest goal of maintaining the integrity of the driver's licensing system so as to minimize identity theft associated with that system. The question is whether, within that system, any exemptions, including for religious reasons, pose real risk to the integrity of the licensing system.

[64] The implication of Justice Abella's reasoning is that because the province tolerates the identity theft risk posed by unlicensed Albertans, it must therefore tolerate the risk associated with non-photographed licensees. On this logic, the province would be required to take the more radical approach of requiring photographic identification for every Albertan, which would directly contravene the respondents' religious beliefs, before it could rely upon a security risk argument in the context of the narrower driver's licensing program. In my opinion, the province has a legitimate interest in ensuring the integrity of its driver's licensing system and guarding against the risk that it will be used to perpetrate fraud. In order to accomplish this goal, it should not be forced to undertake broader measures that it might have resisted for other policy reasons.

[69] A very different kind of relationship exists between a legislature and the people subject to its laws. By their very nature, laws of general application are not tailored to the unique needs of individual claimants. The legislature has no capacity or legal obligation to engage in such an individualized determination, and in many cases would have no advance notice of a law's potential to infringe Charter rights. It cannot be expected to tailor a law to every possible future contingency, or every sincerely held religious belief. Laws of general application affect the general public, not just the claimants before the court. The broader societal context in which the law operates must inform the s. 1 justification analysis. A law's constitutionality under s. 1 of the Charter is determined, not by whether it is responsive to the unique needs of every individual claimant, but rather by whether its infringement of Charter rights is directed at an important objective and is proportionate in its overall impact. While the law's impact on the individual claimants is undoubtedly a significant factor for the court to consider in determining whether the infringement is justified, the court's ultimate perspective is societal. The question the court must answer is whether the Charter infringement is justifiable in a free and democratic society, not whether a more advantageous arrangement for a particular claimant could be envisioned.

[70] Similarly, "undue hardship", a pivotal concept in reasonable accommodation, is not easily applicable to a legislature enacting laws. In the human rights context, hardship is seen as undue if it would threaten the viability of the enterprise which is being asked to accommodate the right. The degree of hardship is often capable of expression in monetary terms. By contrast, it is difficult to apply the concept of undue hardship to the cost of achieving or not achieving a legislative objective, especially when the objective is (as here) preventative or precautionary. Though it is possible to interpret "undue hardship" broadly as encompassing the hardship that comes with failing to achieve a pressing government objective, this attenuates the concept. Rather than strain to adapt "undue hardship" to the context of s. 1 of the Charter, it is better to speak in terms of minimal impairment and proportionality of effects.

[71] In summary, where the validity of a law of general application is at stake, reasonable accommodation is not an appropriate substitute for a proper s. 1 analysis based on the methodology of Oakes. Where the government has passed a measure into law, the provisions of s. 1 apply. The government is entitled to justify the law, not by showing that it has accommodated the claimant, but by establishing that the measure is rationally connected to a pressing and substantial goal, minimally impairing of the right and proportionate in its effects.

(iii) Is the Law Proportionate in Its Effect?

2] The third and final step of the proportionality analysis is to determine proportionality of effects. We have seen that the regulation advances an important objective; that its limitation on the Colony members' religious freedom is rationally connected to that goal; and that the means chosen to achieve the government objective — the universal photo requirement — meet the requirement of minimal impairment.

[75] Despite the importance Dickson C.J. accorded to this stage of the justification analysis, it has not often been used. Indeed, Peter W. Hogg argues that the fourth branch of Oakes is actually redundant: Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), vol. 2, at section 38.12. He finds confirmation of this view in the fact that he is unable to locate any case in which this stage of the analysis has been decisive to the outcome. In his opinion, this is because it essentially duplicates the analysis undertaken at the first stage, pressing and substantial objective. If a law has an objective deemed sufficiently important to override a Charter right and has been found to do so in a way which is rationally connected to the objective and minimally impairing of the right, Hogg asks rhetorically, how can the law's effects nonetheless be disproportionate to its objective? In his view, a finding that a law's objective is "pressing and substantial" at the first stage of Oakes will always produce a conclusion that its effects are proportionate. The real balancing must be done under the heading of minimal impairment and, to a much more limited extent, rational connection.

[76] It may be questioned how a law which has passed the rigours of the first three stages of the proportionality analysis — pressing goal, rational connection, and minimum impairment — could fail at the final inquiry of proportionality of effects. The answer lies in the fact that the first three stages of Oakes are anchored in an assessment of the law's purpose. Only the fourth branch takes full account of the "severity of the deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups"…Because the minimal impairment and proportionality of effects analyses involve different kinds of balancing, analytical clarity and transparency are well served by distinguishing between them. Where no alternative means are reasonably capable of satisfying the government's objective, the real issue is whether the impact of the rights infringement is disproportionate to the likely benefits of the impugned law. Rather than reading down the government's objective within the minimal impairment analysis, the court should acknowledge that no less drastic means are available and proceed to the final stage of Oakes.

[78] In my view, this is a case where the decisive analysis falls to be done at the final stage of Oakes. The first two elements of the proportionality test — rational connection and minimum impairment — are satisfied, and the matter stands to be resolved on whether the "deleterious effects of a measure on individuals or groups" outweigh the public benefit that may be gained from the measure. In cases such as this, where the demand is that the right be fully respected without compromise, the justification of the law imposing the limit will often turn on whether the deleterious effects are out of proportion to the public good achieved by the infringing measure.

1. Salutary Effects

[79] The first inquiry is into the benefits, or "salutary effects" associated with the legislative goal. Three salutary effects of the universal photo requirement were raised on the evidence: (1) enhancing the security of the driver's licensing scheme; (2) assisting in roadside safety and identification; and (3) eventually harmonizing Alberta's licensing scheme with those in other jurisdictions.

[80] The most important of these benefits and the one upon which Alberta principally relies is the enhancement of the security or integrity of the driver's licensing scheme…

[81] Though it is difficult to quantify in exact terms how much risk of fraud would result from permitted exemptions, it is clear that the internal integrity of the system would be compromised. In this respect, the present case may be contrasted with previous religious freedom cases where this Court has found that the potential risk was too speculative.

[84] The requirement of a photo on a driver's licence serves the additional purpose of assisting police officers in reliably identifying drivers at the roadside. Alberta concedes that this benefit, given the relatively small number of persons who would seek religious exemptions, would not in itself justify limiting freedom of religion. Yet another salutary benefit may flow from eventual harmonization with other licensing systems. This benefit, however, remains to be realized. While these effects may not be determinative, they support the overall salutary effect of the universal photo requirement.

2. Deleterious Effects

[88] The deleterious effects of a limit on freedom of religion requires us to consider the impact in terms of Charter values, such as liberty, human dignity, equality, autonomy, and the enhancement of democracy: Thomson Newspapers, at para. 125; see also Health Services and Support — Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, [2007] 2 SCR 391. The most fundamental of these values, and the one relied on in this case, is liberty — the right of choice on matters of religion. As stated in Amselem, per Iacobucci J., religious freedom "revolves around the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom" (para. 40). The question is whether the limit leaves the adherent with a meaningful choice to follow his or her religious beliefs and practices.

[89] There is no magic barometer to measure the seriousness of a particular limit on a religious practice. Religion is a matter of faith, intermingled with culture. It is individual, yet profoundly communitarian. Some aspects of a religion, like prayers and the basic sacraments, may be so sacred that any significant limit verges on forced apostasy. Other practices may be optional or a matter of personal choice. Between these two extremes lies a vast array of beliefs and practices, more important to some adherents than to others.

[90] Because religion touches so many facets of daily life, and because a host of different religions with different rites and practices co-exist in our society, it is inevitable that some religious practices will come into conflict with laws and regulatory systems of general application. As recognized by the European Court of Human Rights in Kokkinakis v. Greece, judgment of 25 May 1993, Series A No. 260-A, cited by my colleague Abella J., this pluralistic context also includes "atheists, agnostics, sceptics and the unconcerned" (para. 31). Their interests are equally protected by s. 2(a): R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 347. In judging the seriousness of the limit in a particular case, the perspective of the religious or conscientious claimant is important. However, this perspective must be considered in the context of a multicultural, multi-religious society where the duty of state authorities to legislate for the general good inevitably produces conflicts with individual beliefs. The bare assertion by a claimant that a particular limit curtails his or her religious practice does not, without more, establish the seriousness of the limit for purposes of the proportionality analysis. Indeed to end the inquiry with such an assertion would cast an impossibly high burden of justification on the state. We must go further and evaluate the degree to which the limit actually impacts on the adherent.

[93] Cases of direct compulsion are straightforward. However, it may be more difficult to measure the seriousness of a limit on freedom of religion where the limit arises not from a direct assault on the right to choose, but as the result of incidental and unintended effects of the law. In many such cases, the limit does not preclude choice as to religious belief or practice, but it does make it more costly.

[97] The Hutterian claimants argue that the limit presents them with an invidious choice: the choice between some of its members violating the Second Commandment on the one hand, or accepting the end of their rural communal life on the other hand. However, the evidence does not support the conclusion that arranging alternative means of highway transport would end the Colony's rural way of life. The claimants' affidavit says that it is necessary for at least some members to be able to drive from the Colony to nearby towns and back. It does not explain, however, why it would not be possible to hire people with driver's licences for this purpose, or to arrange third party transport to town for necessary services, like visits to the doctor. Many businesses and individuals rely on hired persons and commercial transport for their needs, either because they cannot drive or choose not to drive. Obtaining alternative transport would impose an additional economic cost on the Colony, and would go against their traditional self-sufficiency. But there is no evidence that this would be prohibitive.

[99] I conclude that the impact of the limit on religious practice imposed by the universal photo requirement for obtaining a driver's licence is that Colony members will be obliged to make alternative arrangements for highway transport. This will impose some financial cost on the community and depart from their tradition of being self-sufficient in terms of transport. These costs are not trivial. But on the record, they do not rise to the level of seriously affecting the claimants' right to pursue their religion. They do not negate the choice that lies at the heart of freedom of religion.

3. Weighing the Salutary and Deleterious Effects

[100] Having considered the seriousness of the limit in terms of its impact on the claimants' freedom of religion, we must balance these deleterious effects against the salutary effects of the law, in order to determine whether the overall impact of the law is proportionate.

[101] The law has an important social goal — to maintain an effective driver's licence scheme that minimizes the risk of fraud to citizens as a whole. This is not a goal that should lightly be sacrificed. The evidence supports the conclusion that the universal photo requirement addresses a pressing problem and will reduce the risk of identity-related fraud, when compared to a photo requirement that permits exceptions.

[102] Against this important public benefit must be weighed the impact of the limit on the claimants' religious rights. While the limit imposes costs in terms of money and inconvenience as the price of maintaining the religious practice of not submitting to photos, it does not deprive members of their ability to live in accordance with their beliefs. Its deleterious effects, while not trivial, fall at the less serious end of the scale.

2.4.2 Dissents

[110] ABELLA J. (dissenting) — Freedom of religion is a core, constitutionally protected democratic value. To justify its impairment, therefore, the government must demonstrate that the benefits of the infringement outweigh the harm it imposes…

[112] The issue in this case, therefore, is whether in balancing the benefits of the infringing measure against the harm to the right, the infringement is justified. With respect, unlike the Chief Justice, in my view it is not.

[114] The harm to the constitutional rights of the Hutterites, in the absence of an exemption, is dramatic. Their inability to drive affects them not only individually, but also severely compromises the autonomous character of their religious community.

[115] Unlike the severity of its impact on the Hutterites, the benefits to the province of requiring them to be photographed are, at best, marginal. Over 700,000 Albertans do not have a driver's license and are therefore not in the province's facial recognition database. There is no evidence that in the context of several hundred thousand unphotographed Albertans, the photos of approximately 250 Hutterites will have any discernable impact on the province's ability to reduce identity theft.

[116] This means that the serious harm caused by the infringing measure weighs far more heavily on the s. 1 scales than the benefits the province gains from its imposition on the Hutterites. The province has therefore not discharged its onus of justifying the imposition of a mandatory photo requirement on the members of the Wilson Colony.

Analysis

[130] Moreover, it is important to recognize that freedom of religion has "both individual and collective aspects" (Edwards Books, at p. 781, per Dickson C.J.)…

Both the individual and group aspects are engaged in this case.

[134] It is against the scope of the particular constitutional right that the government has the onus of demonstrating that a limit is justified under s. 1 in accordance with the Oakes test. The purpose of the Oakes analysis is to balance the benefits of the objective with the harmful effects of the infringement. The stages of the Oakes test are not watertight compartments: the principle of proportionality guides the analysis at each step. This ensures that at every stage, the importance of the objective and the harm to the right are weighed.

[136] Where, as here, the benefit to the state of the infringing measure is of limited value and the infringement is a deeply harmful one, the overall requirement of proportionality is not met.

Pressing and Substantial Objective

[138] Alberta acknowledged that it is not attempting to justify the photo requirement on the basis that it allows for quick and efficient driver identification at the side of the road. The exemption to the photograph requirement was in place for 29 years without any demonstrably negative effects on roadside enforcement.

[140] I agree with the majority that this objective is an important one.

[142] I agree with the majority that the Government has satisfied the rational connection aspect of the s. 1 analysis…

Minimal Impairment

[143] Where I start to part company with the majority, with respect, is at the minimal impairment stage of the analysis. This aspect of the s. 1 analysis has attracted judicial approaches of some elasticity, reflecting an understandable desire both to be respectful of the complexity of developing public policy, while at the same time ensuring that the infringing measure meets its policy objectives no more intrusively than necessary.

[145] The government must therefore show that the measure impairs the right as little as reasonably possible in order to achieve the legislative objective. To be characterized as minimal, the impairment must be "carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary" (RJR-MacDonald, at para. 160).

[147] It is not difficult for the state to argue that only the measure it has chosen will maximize the attainment of the objective and that all other alternatives are substandard or less effective. And there is no doubt that the wider the use of the photographs, the greater the minimization of the risk. But at the minimal impairment stage, we do not assess whether the infringing measure fulfills the government's objective more perfectly than any other, but whether the means chosen impair the right no more than necessary to achieve the objective.

[148] In RJR-MacDonald, McLachlin J. rejected a complete ban on advertising on the grounds that a full prohibition will only be constitutionally acceptable at the minimal impairment stage of the analysis if the government can show that only a full prohibition will enable it to achieve its goal. In this case, all of the alternatives presented by the government involve the taking of a photograph. This is the very act that offends the religious beliefs of the Wilson Colony members. The requirement therefore completely extinguishes the right, and is, accordingly, analogous to the complete ban in RJR-MacDonald. It is therefore difficult to conclude that it minimally impairs the Hutterites' religious rights.

Proportionality

[150] It seems to me, with respect, that where the majority's s. 1 analysis fully flounders is in the final stage, where the negative effects of the infringement are balanced against the actual benefits derived from the legislative measure…

[154] Turning to the salutary effects in this case, in my view, the government has not discharged its evidentiary burden or demonstrated that the salutary effects in these circumstances are anything more than a web of speculation (Sujit Choudhry, "So What Is the Real Legacy of Oakes? Two Decades of Proportionality Analysis under the Canadian Charter's Section 1" (2006), 34 S.C.L.R. (2d) 501, at pp. 503-4).

[156] There is, in fact, no evidence from the government to suggest that the Condition Code G licences in place for 29 years as an exemption to the photo requirement, caused any harm at all to the integrity of the licensing system. As a result, there is no basis for determining why the exemption is no longer feasible, or so dramatically obstructs the government's objective that it cannot be re-instated.

[158] Seven hundred thousand Albertans are without a driver's licence. That means that 700,000 Albertans have no photograph in the system that can be checked by facial recognition technology. While adding approximately 250 licence holders to the database will reduce some opportunity for identity theft, it is hard to see how it will make a significant impact on preventing it when there are already several hundred thousand unlicenced and therefore unphotographed Albertans. Since there are so many others who are not in the database, the benefit of adding the photographs of the few Hutterites who wish to drive, would be marginal.

[159] It is worth noting too that in Alberta, numerous documents are used for identity purposes, including birth certificates, social insurance cards and health cards — not all of which include a photograph. Nor has Alberta thought it necessary to introduce, for example, a universal identity card to prevent identity theft. This suggests that the risk is not sufficiently compelling to justify universality.

[160] The fact that Alberta is seemingly unengaged by the impact on identity theft of over 700,000 Albertans being without a driver's licence, makes it difficult to understand why it feels that the system cannot tolerate 250 or so more exemptions.

[161] The majority mentions two ancillary benefits of the mandatory photo requirement: the eventual harmonization of Alberta's licensing scheme with those of other jurisdictions, and assistance in roadside safety and identification. There is no reason to anticipate that any such harmonized scheme would eliminate, rather than protect, religious exemptions. And as for the benefits to roadside identification and safety, Alberta conceded that this was not the purpose of the photo requirement and that any such benefits were minimal, as evidenced by the fact that this exemption has existed for the last 29 years without incident.

[167] To suggest, as the majority does, that the deleterious effects are minor because the Colony members could simply arrange for third party transportation, fails to appreciate the significance of their self-sufficiency to the autonomous integrity of their religious community. When significant sacrifices have to be made to practise one's religion in the face of a state imposed burden, the choice to practise one's religion is no longer uncoerced.

[171] I also have some discomfort with the majority's approach to assessing the seriousness of a religious infringement. It appears to suggest that there is a difference between the constitutional scrutiny of a government program that is "compulsory", and one that is "conditional" or a "privilege". This approach, with great respect, is troubling. It is both novel and inconsistent with the principle enunciated in Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 624, that "once the state does provide a benefit, it is obliged to do so in a non-discriminatory manner" (para. 73).

[174] The harm to the Hutterites' Charter right is substantial and easily ascertainable, but, as previously noted, the benefit of requiring the Hutterites to be photographed for the purposes of reducing identity theft, is not…

LEBEL J. (dissenting) —

I. Introduction

[178] I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and of my colleague Justice Abella. With respect for the other view, I agree with the comments of Justice Abella on the nature of the guarantee of freedom of religion under s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I share her opinion that the impugned regulation that limits freedom of religion has not been properly justified by the appellant under s. 1 of the Charter. As a result, as she proposes, I would dismiss the appeal and uphold the declaration of invalidity of the regulation that requires the members of the Hutterite Colony to have their photos taken as a condition for the renewal or issuance of a driver's licence.

[192] It may be tempting to draw sharp analytical distinctions between the minimal impairment and balancing of effects parts of the Oakes test. But determining whether a measure limiting a right successfully meets the justification test should lead to some questioning of the purpose in the course of the proportionality analysis, to determine not only whether an alternative solution could reach the goal, but also to what extent the goal itself ought to be realized. This part of the analysis may confirm the validity of alternative, less intrusive measures.

[196] The proportionality analysis reflects the need to leave some flexibility to government in respect of the choice of means. But the review of those means must also leave the courts with a degree of flexibility in the assessment of the range of alternatives that could realize the goal, and also in determining how far the goal ought to be attained in order to achieve the proper balance between the objective of the state and the rights at stake.

government's objective are not considered at this stage", i.e. the minimal impairment stage. Such an approach would severely restrict the ambit of court review of government action and would reduce it to an analysis of the alignment of means with purposes. At other times, however, I note that the reasons seem more alive to this problem. Thus, one may find in the reasons suggestions that "achieving the objective" might actually mean looking into whether there exists an alternative means of reaching the objective "in a real and substantial manner" (para. 55). What that would actually mean in practical terms may not be as clear as one could wish. Nevertheless, these words appear to signal that, even at the minimal impairment stage, the objective might have to be redefined and circumscribed.

II. Conclusion

[200] As to the outcome of this case, I agree with the reasons of Justice Abella and with the substance of her views on the lack of justification for the regulation under s. 1. Religious rights are certainly not unlimited. They may have to be restricted in the context of broader social values. But they are fundamental rights protected by the Constitution. The Government of Alberta had to prove that the limitations on the religious right were justified. Like Justice Abella, I believe that the Government of Alberta has failed to demonstrate that the regulation is a proportionate response to the identified societal problem of identity theft.

[201] Moreover, the driver's licence that it denies is not a privilege. It is not granted at the discretion of governments. Every would-be driver is entitled to a licence provided that he or she meets the required conditions and qualifications. Such a licence, as we know, is often of critical importance in daily life and is certainly so in rural Alberta. Other approaches to identity fraud might be devised that would fall within a reasonable range of options and that could establish a proper balance between the social and constitutional interests at stake. This balance cannot be obtained by belittling the impact of the measures on the beliefs and religious practices of the Hutterites and by asking them to rely on taxi drivers and truck rental services to operate their farms and to preserve their way of life. Absolute safety is probably impossible in a democratic society. A limited restriction on the Province's objective of minimizing identity theft would not unduly compromise this aspect of the security of Alberta residents and might lie within the range of reasonable and constitutional alternatives. Indeed, the Province's stated purpose is not set in stone and does not need to be achieved at all costs. The infringing measure was implemented in order to reach a hypothetical objective of minimizing identity theft, by requiring driver's licences with photos. But a small number of people carrying a driver's licence without a photo will not significantly compromise the safety of the residents of Alberta. On the other hand, under the impugned regulation, a small group of people is being made to carry a heavy burden. The photo requirement was not a proportionate limitation of the religious rights at stake.

2.5 Ktunaxa Nation v. British Columbia (Forests, Lands and Natural Resource Operations), 2017 SCC 54 (CanLII), [2017] 2 SCR 386

2.5.1 Majority

[3] This case concerns a proposed development in an area the Ktunaxa call Qat'muk. This area is located in a Canadian valley in the northwestern part of the larger Ktunaxa territory, the Jumbo Valley, about 55 kilometres west of the town of Invermere, B.C.

[4] The respondent Glacier Resorts Ltd. ("Glacier Resorts") wishes to build a year-round ski resort in Qat'muk with lifts to glacier runs and overnight accommodation for guests and staff. For more than two decades, Glacier Resorts has been negotiating with the B.C. government and stakeholders, including the Aboriginal peoples who inhabit the valley, the Ktunaxa and the Shuswap, on the terms and conditions of the development.

[5] Early on in the process, the Ktunaxa and Shuswap peoples raised concerns about the impact of the resort project. The Ktunaxa asserted that Qat'muk was a place of spiritual significance for them. Notably, it is home to an important population of grizzly bears and to Grizzly Bear Spirit, or Kławła Tukłułak?is, "a principal spirit within Ktunaxa religious beliefs and cosmology": A.F., at para. 18.

[6] Consultation ensued, leading to significant changes to the original proposal. The Shuswap declared themselves satisfied with the changes and indicated their support for the proposal given the benefits it would bring to their people and the region. The Ktunaxa were not satisfied, but committed themselves to further consultation to remove the remaining obstacles and find mutually satisfactory accommodation. Lengthy discussions ensued, and it seemed agreement would be achieved. Then, late in the process, the Ktunaxa adopted an uncompromising position — that accommodation was impossible because a ski resort with lifts to glacier runs and permanent structures would drive Grizzly Bear Spirit from Qat'muk and irrevocably impair their religious beliefs and practices. After fruitless efforts to revive the consultation process and reach agreement, the government declared that reasonable consultation had occurred and approved the project.

[7] The appellants, the Ktunaxa Nation Council and the Chair of the Council, Kathryn Teneese, brought proceedings in judicial review before the British Columbia Supreme Court to overturn the approval by the Minister of the ski resort on two independent grounds: first, that the project would violate the Ktunaxa's freedom of religion under s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and second, that the government breached the duty of consultation and accommodation imposed on the Crown by s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982. The chambers judge dismissed the petition for judicial review, and the Court of Appeal affirmed his decision. The Ktunaxa now appeal to this Court.

(2) The Scope of Freedom of Religion

[69] In this case, it is undisputed that the Ktunaxa sincerely believe in the existence and importance of Grizzly Bear Spirit. They also believe that permanent development in Qat'muk will drive this spirit from that place. The chambers judge indicated that Mr. Luke came to this belief in 2004 but whether this belief is ancient or recent plays no part in our s. 2(a) analysis. The Charter protects all sincere religious beliefs and practices, old or new.

[71] We would decline this invitation. The state's duty under s. 2(a) is not to protect the object of beliefs, such as Grizzly Bear Spirit. Rather, the state's duty is to protect everyone's freedom to hold such beliefs and to manifest them in worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination. In short, the Charter protects the freedom to worship, but does not protect the spiritual focal point of worship. We have been directed to no authority that supports the proposition that s. 2(a) protects the latter, rather than individuals' liberty to hold a belief and to manifest that belief. Section 2(a) protects the freedom to pursue practices, like the wearing of a kirpan in Multani or refusing to be photographed in Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567. And s. 2(a) protects the right to freely hold the religious beliefs that motivate such practices. In this case, however, the appellants are not seeking protection for the freedom to believe in Grizzly Bear Spirit or to pursue practices related to it. Rather, they seek to protect Grizzly Bear Spirit itself and the subjective spiritual meaning they derive from it. That claim is beyond the scope of s. 2(a).

[72] The extension of s. 2(a) proposed by the Ktunaxa would put deeply held personal beliefs under judicial scrutiny. Adjudicating how exactly a spirit is to be protected would require the state and its courts to assess the content and merits of religious beliefs. …

[73] The Ktunaxa argue that the Big M Drug Mart definition of the s. 2(a) guarantee has been subsequently enriched by an understanding that freedom of religion has a communal aspect, and that the state cannot act in a way that constrains or destroys the communal dimension of a religion. Grizzly Bear Spirit's continued occupation of Qat'muk is essential to the communal aspect of Ktunaxa religious beliefs and practices, they assert. State action that drives Grizzly Bear Spirit from Qat'muk will, the Ktunaxa say, "constrain" or "interfere" with — indeed destroy — the communal aspect of s. 2(a) protection.

[74] The difficulty with this argument is that the communal aspect of the claim is also confined to the scope of freedom of religion under s. 2(a). It is true that freedom of religion under s. 2(a) has a communal aspect: Loyola; Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89; Congrégation des témoins de Jéhovah de St-Jérôme-Lafontaine v. Lafontaine (Village), 2004 SCC 48, [2004] 2 SCR 650. But the communal aspects of freedom of religion do not, and should not, extend s. 2(a)'s protection beyond the freedom to have beliefs and the freedom to manifest them.

[75] We conclude that s. 2(a) protects the freedom to have and manifest religious beliefs, and that the Ktunaxa's claim does not fall within these parameters. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether the Minister's decision represents a reasonable balance between freedom of religion and other considerations.

2.5.2 Minority

The reasons of Moldaver and Côté JJ. were delivered by

[118] In my respectful view, where state conduct renders a person's sincerely held religious beliefs devoid of all religious significance, this infringes a person's right to religious freedom. Religious beliefs have spiritual significance for the believer. When this significance is taken away by state action, the person can no longer act in accordance with his or her religious beliefs, constituting an infringement of s. 2(a). That is exactly what happened in this case. The Minister's decision to approve the ski resort will render all of the Ktunaxa's religious beliefs related to Grizzly Bear Spirit devoid of any spiritual significance. Accordingly, the Ktunaxa will be unable to perform songs, rituals or ceremonies in recognition of Grizzly Bear Spirit in a manner that has any religious significance for them. In my view, this amounts to a s. 2(a) breach.

2.6 Notes

1. Indigenous spirituality and state religious neutrality were at issue in Servatius v Alberni School District No 70, 2022 BCCA 421, when students observed the Indigenous practice of smudging, and a hoop dance during which the dancer said a prayer. A parent objected, but the British Columbia Court of Appeal held that the students were being educated about Indigenous practices rather than indoctrinated into them, meaning there was no violation of the duty of religious neutrality.

3 State Religious Neutrality

3.1 Mouvement laïque québécois v. Saguenay (City), 2015 SCC 16 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 3

Gascon J. —

Introduction

[1] The state is required to act in a manner that is respectful of every person's freedom of conscience and religion. This is a fundamental right that is protected by the Quebec Charter of human rights and freedoms, CQLR, c. C-12 ("Quebec Charter"), and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Canadian Charter"). Its corollary is that the state must remain neutral in matters involving this freedom. The interplay between freedom of conscience and religion, on the one hand, and this duty of neutrality, on the other, is sometimes a delicate one.

[3] The Quebec Human Rights Tribunal ("Tribunal") concluded that the recitation of the prayer was in breach of the state's duty of neutrality and that it interfered in a discriminatory manner with Mr. Simoneau's freedom of conscience and religion. The Court of Appeal reversed that decision on the basis that the prayer was non-denominational and fundamentally inclusive. According to the Court of Appeal, such a prayer could not interfere with Mr. Simoneau's rights.

[4] I would allow the appeal. Through the recitation of the prayer at issue during the municipal council's public meetings, the respondents are consciously adhering to certain religious beliefs to the exclusion of all others. In so doing, they are breaching the state's duty of neutrality. The resulting discriminatory interference with Mr. Simoneau's freedom is supported by the evidence the Tribunal accepted.

[71] Neither the Quebec Charter nor the Canadian Charter expressly imposes a duty of religious neutrality on the state. This duty results from an evolving interpretation of freedom of conscience and religion. I will reproduce the following comments made by LeBel J. in Lafontaine in which he described the evolution of the concept of religious neutrality (although he was dissenting, the majority did not contradict him on this point either):

> The duty of neutrality appeared at the end of a long evolutionary process that is part of the history of many countries that now share Western democratic traditions. Canada's history provides one example of this experience, which made it possible for the ties between church and state to be loosened, if not dissolved. There were, of course, periods when there was a close union of ecclesiastical and secular authorities in Canada. European settlers introduced to Canada a political theory according to which the social order was based on an intimate alliance of the state and a single church, which the state was expected to promote within its borders. Throughout the history of New France, the Catholic church enjoyed the status of sole state religion. After the Conquest and the Treaty of Paris, the Anglican church became the official state religion, although social realities prompted governments to give official recognition to the status and role of the Catholic church and various Protestant denominations. This sometimes official, sometimes tacit recognition, which reflected the make-up of and trends in the society of the period, often inspired legislative solutions and certain policy choices. Thus, at the time of Confederation in 1867, the concept of religious neutrality implied primarily respect for Christian denominations. One illustration of this can be seen in the constitutional rules relating to educational rights originally found, inter alia, in s. 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867.
> Since then, the appearance and growing influence of new philosophical, political and legal theories on the organization and bases of civil society have gradually led to a dissociation of the functions of church and state; Canada's demographic evolution has also had an impact on this process, as have the urbanization and industrialization of the country. Although it has not excluded religions and churches from the realm of public debate, this evolution has led us to consider the practice of religion and the choices it implies to relate more to individuals' private lives or to voluntary associations (M. H. Ogilvie, Religious Institutions and the Law in Canada (2nd ed. 2003), at pp. 27 and 56). These societal changes have tended to create a clear distinction between churches and public authorities, placing the state under a duty of neutrality. Our Court has recognized this aspect of freedom of religion in its decisions, although it has in so doing not disregarded the various sources of our country's historical heritage. The concept of neutrality allows churches and their members to play an important role in the public space where societal debates take place, while the state acts as an essentially neutral intermediary in relations between the various denominations and between those denominations and civil society. [Emphasis added; paras. 66-67.]

[72] As LeBel J. noted, the evolution of Canadian society has given rise to a concept of neutrality according to which the state must not interfere in religion and beliefs. The state must instead remain neutral in this regard. This neutrality requires that the state neither favour nor hinder any particular belief, and the same holds true for non-belief (S.L., at para. 32). It requires that the state abstain from taking any position and thus avoid adhering to a particular belief.

[74] By expressing no preference, the state ensures that it preserves a neutral public space that is free of discrimination and in which true freedom to believe or not to believe is enjoyed by everyone equally, given that everyone is valued equally. I note that a neutral public space does not mean the homogenization of private players in that space. Neutrality is required of institutions and the state, not individuals (see R. v. N.S., 2012 SCC 72, [2012] 3 SCR 726, at paras. 31 and 50-51). On the contrary, a neutral public space free from coercion, pressure and judgment on the part of public authorities in matters of spirituality is intended to protect every person's freedom and dignity. The neutrality of the public space therefore helps preserve and promote the multicultural nature of Canadian society enshrined in s. 27 of the Canadian Charter. Section 27 requires that the state's duty of neutrality be interpreted not only in a manner consistent with the protective objectives of the Canadian Charter, but also with a view to promoting and enhancing diversity...

[76] When all is said and done, the state's duty to protect every person's freedom of conscience and religion means that it may not use its powers in such a way as to promote the participation of certain believers or non-believers in public life to the detriment of others. It is prohibited from adhering to one religion to the exclusion of all others. Section 3 of the Quebec Charter imposes a duty on the state to remain neutral in this regard. Today, the state's duty of neutrality has become a necessary consequence of enshrining the freedom of conscience and religion in the Canadian Charter and the Quebec Charter.

[144] Finally, the respondents argue that the reference to the supremacy of God in the preamble to the Canadian Charter establishes the moral source of the values that Charter protects. In their view, a prayer that refers to that same source cannot, in itself, interfere with anyone's freedom of conscience and religion. The Court of Appeal also mentioned this reference (at para. 100), although it did not discuss it in detail.

[145] The preamble to the Canadian Charter reads as follows:

> Whereas Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law:

[146] In my opinion, the respondents' argument in this regard truncates the analysis on the issue of freedom of conscience and religion. Contrary to what their argument suggests, that analysis is not limited to a single reference to God in the prayer. On its own, that reference is not determinative. Rather, the analysis concerns the state's observance of a religious practice. …

[147] The reference to the supremacy of God in the preamble to the Canadian Charter cannot lead to an interpretation of freedom of conscience and religion that authorizes the state to consciously profess a theistic faith. The preamble, including its reference to God, articulates the "political theory" on which the Charter's protections are based… It must nevertheless be borne in mind that the express provisions of the Canadian Charter, such as those regarding freedom of conscience and religion, must be given a generous and expansive interpretation…

[149] This leads me to conclude that the reference to the supremacy of God does not limit the scope of freedom of conscience and religion and does not have the effect of granting a privileged status to theistic religious practices. Contrary to what the respondents suggest, I do not believe that the preamble can be used to interpret this freedom in this way.

3.2 Zylberberg v. Sudbury Board of Education, 1988 CanLII 189 (ON CA)

BROOKE BLAIR, GOODMAN AND ROBINS JJ.A:-- The issue in this appeal is whether religious exercises, prescribed for the opening or closing of each school day in the public schools of this province, infringe the freedom of religion and conscience guaranteed by s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms…

2. The factual background

This application was originally made by five parents of children attending elementary public schools within the jurisdiction of the respondent school board in Sudbury (the Board). Two of the applicants have since moved out of the Board's district and seek to discontinue their appeal. The three remaining appellants were supported in argument by the three intervenors.

The Board's evidence was that the daily opening exercises in all its schools are brief and include the singing of O Canada and the saying of the Lord's Prayer. The prayer is either led by the class-room teacher or recited over the school's public address system. In some schools, Scripture passages are also read.

At the request of a parent, a child is excused from the class-room during the exercises or, if he or she remains in the room, is not required to participate. Arrangements are made in every school for the care of children while they are excused from the class-room…

Of the three remaining appellants one is of the Jewish religion and another is a Moslem [sic]. The third practises no religion but his wife is Roman Catholic and their children attend that church a few times a year. They decided to send their children to a public rather than a separate school in order to give them a secular education. One appellant made his objections to compulsory religious exercises known by letter to the Board but did not request an exemption from the exercises for his children although invited to do so. The other two appellants did not object before commencing these proceedings and did not request an exemption. The three appellants stated that they had not requested an exemption for their children because they did not want them singled out from their peers because of their religious beliefs.

There was a difference of expert opinion about the effect of religious exercises on non-Christian or non-participating children. An affidavit of a psychologist, filed by the appellants, expressed the view that such children would be placed under pressure to conform which, if resisted, would result in their being alienated from their peers. The affidavits of two psychologists, filed by the Board, asserted that children from minority religions were not harmed by the policy. They stated that pupils were routinely excused from other subjects and activities. They also claimed that religious exercises resulted in minority children "confronting the fact of their difference from the majority". This was said to be a normal and healthy part of growing up which would contribute to the development of religious tolerance and understanding which is important in view of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.

3. Historical background

The place of religion in the public schools of Ontario has been a matter of concern and, sometimes, dispute throughout their history. It has two aspects: religious education and opening or closing religious exercises. Although almost all supporters of the public school system were Christian during the 19th century and most of this century, sectarian differences between Protestant denominations made it impossible to provide for religious instruction until 1944 when the present system was adopted…

This case is concerned with the other aspect of religion in public schools: opening or closing religious exercises. Such exercises were suggested as early as 1816 when it was recommended that "the labours of the day commence with prayer" and that "they conclude with reading publicly and solemnly a few verses of the New Testament". It appears that the recommendation was not universally followed. In 1855, a minute of the Council of Public Instruction recommended such opening and closing exercises with the significant addition that "no pupil should be compelled to be present at these exercises against the wish of his parents or guardian, expressed in writing to the Master of the School". In 1884, the opening of the school day with prayer and authorized scripture selections, read without comment or explanation, was made mandatory but children could be exempted if their parents wished. The regulations of 1944 provided that the singing of God Save the King or O Canada, or both, should be part of the daily opening or closing exercises.

The continuance of such exercises was recommended both by the Hope Commission and the Mackay Committee. The latter Committee found that the opening exercises were more widely acceptable and less controversial than religious education. The Mackay Committee's Report states that it "sought to evaluate 'opening exercises'... particularly in relation to our conclusion that there should be no religious indoctrination in the public school system" (p. 35). The Report then states:

We were impressed by the fact, which we have noted was mentioned in several briefs, that many public functions in the province of Ontario, such as convocations, opening of the Legislature, and public meetings, are begun with the singing of the National Anthem and the reciting of a prayer. At gatherings such as these, people who object to the prayer usually stand in respectful silence without taking part. In the Committee's opinion, such opening ceremonies are indeed intrinsic in the culture of the province of Ontario. At school the child is being prepared for life in this society and accordingly participation in opening exercises at the beginning of each school day in the elementary grades is helpful in rounding out his education.

It was also brought forcibly to the Committee's attention, as previously noted, that to eliminate opening exercises would suggest that religion is not an integral part of the life of the people of this province. It is the Committee's view that religion does indeed play a vital part in our life and that the holding of opening exercises therefore exposes the child to a valuable learning experience in relation to the whole community in which he lives.

Throughout its Report, the Mackay Committee demonstrated sensitivity to the change in the composition of the population of the province in post-war years and the present pluralistic nature of Ontario's society. It commented at pp. 36-7:

The pluralistic nature of Ontario's society has been recognized by the Committee. The recommended opening exercises have religious significance for many and cultural significance for all. We are aware of the rights of minorities as well as the rights of the majority, and we have attempted to recognize the rights of both. What we have recommended is intended to fulfil a useful learning purpose, and should not be objectionable to most reasonable persons. Certainly, the opening exercises need provide no opportunity for indoctrination on the one hand or for watering down of individual belief on the other. We hope that all students will feel free to attend them in good heart.

Recognizing that the recommendation might not be universally approved, the Committee concluded:

[T]he Committee is of the opinion that the opening exercises which we now recommend should be found acceptable to almost all reasonable persons. Isolated requests for exemption, on the basis of individual religious implications, may have to be dealt with on their merits as they arise. We would regret such necessity, but for democratic reasons must admit the possibility.

It was not until 1978, nine years after the Mackay Committee Report, that the regulations governing opening religious exercises were changed by O.Reg. 704/78. …

The revised regulation, which is now s. 28(1) of Reg. 262, is repeated for convenience:

> 28(1) A public school shall be opened or closed each school day with religious exercises consisting of the reading of the Scriptures or other suitable readings and the repeating of the Lord's Prayer or other suitable prayers.

Since World War II, Ontario has changed from a population composed almost entirely of Christians to an ethnically diverse, multireligious and multicultural society. The Attorney-General submitted that, whereas 19th century requirements for religious exercises recognized differences among Christian denominations, today's requirements must recognize both interdenominational differences and those between Christians and non-Christians.

This, it was said, was exemplified by the experience of the City of Toronto public schools. As early as 1975, before the new regulations took effect in 1978, the Toronto Board of Education undertook a re-examination of religious exercises. This led, in 1979, to the formation of an interdenominational committee to recommend suitable prayers and religious readings. In 1980, the committee published a book of prayers and readings which was revised in 1981 and again in 1984. The readings and prayers in the book are drawn from a number of sources including Bahaism, Buddhism, Christianity, Confucianism, Hinduism, Islam, Jainism, Judaism, People of Native Ancestry, Secular Humanism, Sikhism, and Zoroastrianism. The book has been used in Toronto public schools for opening exercises since 1980.

The exercises now consist of the singing of O Canada, the reading of one or more selections from the book, followed by a moment of silent meditation and sometimes by comments by the teacher or principal, on the origins of the selections used. The Toronto programme appears to have met with general acceptance but we share the doubt, expressed by Reid J. at p. 773 O.R., pp. 733-4 D.L.R., whether it complies with s. 28(1) which requires both prayers and readings.

4. Does s. 28(1) of the regulations infringe Charter freedoms under s. 2(a)?

(a) The nature of freedom of conscience and religion

(b) Does s. 28(1) infringe the Charter freedom of conscience and religion?

In Sudbury, the Board's application of s. 28(1) of the Regulations imposes Christian religious exercises in the schools. The Board has not exercised the option open to it under s. 28(1) of providing non-Christian prayers and non- Biblical readings. The possibility that the Board might exercise this option does not, however, affect the outcome in this case. The substantive issue here is whether s. 28(1), which makes it possible for the Board to prescribe Christian religious exercises, violates s. 2(a) of the Charter.

On its face, s. 28(1) infringes the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed by s. 2(a) of the Charter. This was conceded by the respondents. Section 28(1) is antithetical to the Charter objective of promoting freedom of conscience and religion. The recitation of the Lord's Prayer, which is a Christian prayer, and the reading of Scriptures from the Christian Bible impose Christian observances upon non-Christian pupils and religious observances on non-believers.

The respondents, however, take the position that s. 28 viewed as a whole did not violate the freedoms of conscience and religion guaranteed by s. 2(a) of the Charter. They contend that the right to claim exemption from Christian religious exercises, conferred by s. 28(10), (11) and (12), eliminates any suggestion of pressure or compulsion on non-Christian pupils to participate in those exercises…

From the majoritarian standpoint, the respondent's argument is understandable but, in our opinion, it does not reflect the reality of the situation faced by members of religious minorities. Whether or not there is pressure or compulsion must be assessed from their standpoint and, in particular, from the standpoint of pupils in the sensitive setting of a public school. In saying this, we approve the analysis of Reid J. in the Divisional Court at p. 769 O.R., p. 729 D.L.R. where he said:

It may be that a control or limitation indirectly imposed is not readily appreciable to those who are not affected by it. It may be difficult for members of a majoritarian religious group, as I am, to appreciate the feelings of members of what, in our society, are minority religions. It may be difficult for religious people to appreciate the feelings of agnostics and atheists. Yet nevertheless those feelings exist. No one has suggested that the feelings expressed by applicants are not real, or that they do not run deep.

While the majoritarian view may be that s. 28 confers freedom of choice on the minority, the reality is that it imposes on religious minorities a compulsion to conform to the religious practices of the majority. The evidence in this case supports this view. The three appellants chose not to seek an exemption from religious exercises because of their concern about differentiating their children from other pupils. The peer pressure and the class-room norms to which children are acutely sensitive, in our opinion, are real and pervasive and operate to compel members of religious minorities to conform with majority religious practices…

Such reluctance to seek exemption seems all the more likely in view of the fact that children are disinclined at this age to step out of line or to flout "peer-group norms".

We consider that s. 28(1) also infringes freedom of conscience and religion in a broader sense. The requirement that pupils attend religious exercises, unless exempt,

… the right to be excused from class, or to be exempted from participating, does not overcome the infringement of the Charter freedom of conscience and religion by the mandated religious exercises. On the contrary, the exemption provision imposes a penalty on pupils from religious minorities who utilize it by stigmatizing them as non-conformists and setting them apart from their fellow students who are members of the dominant religion. In our opinion, the conclusion is inescapable that the exemption provision fails to mitigate the infringement of freedom of conscience and religion by s. 28(1).

Other arguments were made for denying the applicability of s. 2(a) of the Charter to religious exercises. It was contended that they did no harm to pupils of minority religions. This assertion is not proven because, as earlier indicated, there was a difference of expert opinion on whether or not minority pupils were harmed. In any event, in our opinion, harm to individual pupils need not be proved by those who object to s. 28(1). It is irrelevant to the real issue which is whether the Charter freedom of conscience and religion is infringed. There is no burden on those objecting to s. 28(1) on this ground to prove, in addition, that it causes actual harm to individual pupils.

> The effect of religious exercises cannot be glossed over with the comment that the exercises may be ‘‘good” for minority pupils. This view was expressed, as we indicated above, by a psychologist in supporting the Board’s case who said that it was salutary for minority pupils to confront “the fact of their difference from the majority”. This insensitive approach, in our opinion, not only depreciates the position of religious minorities but also fails to take into account the feelings of young children. It is also inconsistent with the multicultural nature of our society as recognized by s. 27 of the Charter which declares:
> 27. This Charter shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians.
> It was also argued that any infringement by s. 28(1) of the Charter freedom of conscience and religion was so trivial and insubstantial that it was not worthy of Charter protection. We reject this argument and, with respect, cannot agree with O’Leary J. that it applies in this case. In our opinion, judged on a purely factual basis, the denigration of the minorities’ freedom of conscience and religion by the operation of s. 28(1) constitutes an infringement of s. 2(a) of the Charter which is not “insubstantial or trivial”: …
> Counsel for the board submitted that s. 28(1) of the Regulations was consistent with the preamble of the Charter which declares:
> ... Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God and the rule of law.
> It is a basic principle in the construction of statutes that a preamble is rarely referred to and, even then, is usually employed only to clarify operative provisions which are ambiguous. The same rule, in our view, extends to constitutional instruments. There is no ambiguity in the meaning of s. 2(a) of the Charter or doubt about its application in this case. Whatever meaning may be ascribed to the reference in the preamble to the “supremacy of God”, it cannot detract from the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed by s. 2(a) which is, it should be noted, a “rule of law” also recognized by the preamble.
> The respondents [also] argued that, because the Charter contained no establishment clause [as does the US Constitution], s. 28(1) could not be invalidated…
> Two conclusions can be drawn from the American [Supreme Court] decisions [on school prayer]. The first is that the absence of an establishment clause in s. 2(a) does not limit the protection it gives to freedom of conscience and religion [because school prayer was also held to violate the “free exercise clause”]. The second is that support can be found in Abington, the most recent major decision on school prayer, for our conclusion that the compulsion on students to conform and not exercise the right of exemption is a real restraint on the freedom of conscience and religion guaranteed by the Charter.
> It follows from our analysis that s. 28(1) of the Regulations constitutes a prima facie infringement of the appellants’ rights under s. 2(a) of the Charter. In a usual Charter case, the burden passes at this stage to the parties upholding the Charter infringement to show on a balance of probabilities that it is justifiable under s. 1 of the Charter: R. v. Oakes, supra. In this case, however, the appellants contended that, since the very purpose of s. 28 of the Regulations violated s. 2(a) of the Charter, it was incapable of justification under s. 1.
> After a careful consideration of the Act, the Regulations, and other materials placed before us, we have concluded that the purpose of s. 28(1) is religious and that the exercises mandated by the Regulation were intended to be religious exercises. This is the only conclusion which can be drawn from the wording of the Act and the Regulations. This view is confirmed by the specific provision for exemption contained in s. 50(2)…
> It is clear that the exemption provision is included in the Act because the exercises were intended to serve religious and not secular purposes.
> At their inception in 1816, there is no doubt that the opening and closing religious exercises were intended to serve the purpose of imbuing education with Christian principles. Later in the nineteenth century, when the exercises were made mandatory, there was again no doubt as to their religious purpose. Dr. Egerton Ryerson, the founder of Ontario’s public school system, stated in his “Report on a System of Public Elementary Education of Upper Canada” that “as Christianity is the basis of our whole system of elementary education, that principle should pervade throughout”. The objective of the religious exercises mandated in the 19th century was not changed in this century…
> In this case it cannot be argued, as it was in Big M, supra, that over time the purpose of the impugned regulation had shifted from religious to secular objectives. Its religious character was reinforced by the Mackay Report. The opening exercises may have secular moral and educational effects but these are, in our opinion, merely derivative from their religious objective. It is the purpose and not the impact of legislation which is determinative for constitutional purposes…
> 5. Could s. 28(1) have been justified under s. 1 of the Charter?
> Although we have concluded that this Charter infringement is incapable of justification under s. 1, we think it proper to state that the result would be the same if s. 1 applied…
> It is not necessary, in this case, to conduct a ritualistic step-by-step inquiry under each of the four elements of the Oakes test. If the respondent fails under one element of the test, the Charter infringement cannot be justified. We propose, therefore, to consider the most vulnerable element of the test from the respondent’s standpoint which is whether s. 28(1) impairs the appellants’ freedoms under s. 2(a) “as little as possible”. …
> The experience of the Toronto Board of Education convincingly demonstrates that there are less intrusive ways of imparting educational and moral values than those provided in s. 28... In saying this we are not to be taken as passing a constitutional judgment on the opening exercises used in Toronto public schools. They were not in issue before us and we express no opinion as to whether they might give rise to Charter scrutiny.
> 6. Conclusion
> Since s. 28(1) infringes the appellants’ Charter freedoms and could not, in any event, have been justified under s. 1, the appellants are entitled to the declaration they seek under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 that s. 28(1) of the Regulations is of no force and effect.

3.3 Notes: CCLA v Ontario, Chamberlain, SL

1. As in Zylberberg, the line between education and indoctrination was also the key to the reasoning in a case about religious curricula in public schools. In Canadian Civil Liberties Assn v Ontario (Minister of Education), 1990 CanLII 6881 (ON CA), [1990] 71 OR (2d) 341, the Ontario Court of Appeal also invalidated moral education curricula that, in its view, crossed the line into indoctrination.
2. In Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, 2002 SCC 86, the SCC engaged with the question whether a school board could rely on the religious views of parents in making a decision about whether to exclude educational materials depicting same-sex parents from a curriculum. The British Columbia School Act required that public schools “must be conducted on strictly secular and non-sectarian principles." The majority of the court held that this did not necessarily preclude reliance on religious views, but these views could not be relied upon to exclude other members of the community:

> 19 The Act's insistence on strict secularism does not mean that religious concerns have no place in the deliberations and decisions of the Board. Board members are entitled, and indeed required, to bring the views of the parents and communities they represent to the deliberation process. Because religion plays an important role in the life of many communities, these views will often be motivated by religious concerns. Religion is an integral aspect of people's lives, and cannot be left at the boardroom door. What secularism does rule out, however, is any attempt to use the religious views of one part of the community to exclude from consideration the values of other members of the community. A requirement of secularism implies that, although the Board is indeed free to address the religious concerns of parents, it must be sure to do so in a manner that gives equal recognition and respect to other members of the community. Religious views that deny equal recognition and respect to the members of a minority group cannot be used to exclude the concerns of the minority group. This is fair to both groups, as it ensures that each group is given as much recognition as it can consistently demand while giving the same recognition to others.

3. More recently, in SL v Commission scolaire des Chênes, 2012 SCC 7 (CanLII), [2012] 1 SCR 235, the SCC held that a public school curriculum that taught about religious and philosophical traditions from an academic perspective did not infringe the religious freedom of a Catholic student, whose parents objected to program. The same curriculum, however, was held to interfere with the religious freedom of a Catholic school, to the extent that it required the private Catholic school to teach about Catholicism from a "neutral" perspective: Loyola High School v Quebec (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 613.

4 Freedom of Religion in Tension with Other Constitutional Rights and Values

One dominant framing contemporary disputes about religious practice is to view religious freedom as being in conflict with other constitutional rights or values, especially (but not only) the right to equality. Though claims of religious freedom often come down to a proportionality analysis under s 1 of the Charter, this section highlights cases where the discourse around them focuses on the clash between fundamental rights or values.

4.1 Guiding questions

1. When religious freedom conflicts with other values, how should courts approach such cases?
2. How do the ideas of the public and private spheres impact these kinds of decisions?

4.2 Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32 (CanLII), [2018] 2 SCR 293

4.2.1 Majority

The following is the judgment delivered by

Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner and Gascon JJ. —

I. Overview

[1] Trinity Western University (TWU), an evangelical Christian postsecondary institution, seeks to open a law school that requires its students and faculty to adhere to a religiously based code of conduct prohibiting "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman".

[2] At issue in this appeal is a decision of the Law Society of British Columbia (LSBC) not to recognize TWU's proposed law school. TWU and Brayden Volkenant, a graduate of TWU's undergraduate program who would have chosen to attend TWU's proposed law school, successfully brought judicial review proceedings to the Supreme Court of British Columbia, arguing that the LSBC's decision violated religious rights protected by s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Court of Appeal for British Columbia found that the LSBC should have approved the law school.

[3] In our respectful view, the LSBC's decision not to recognize TWU's proposed law school represents a proportionate balance between the limitation on the Charter right at issue and the statutory objectives governing the LSBC. The LSBC's decision was therefore reasonable.

II. Background

A. The Parties

[4] TWU is a privately funded evangelical Christian university located in Langley, British Columbia. It offers around 40 undergraduate majors and 17 graduate programs spanning an array of academic disciplines and subjects, all taught from a Christian perspective. Its object is "to provide for young people of any race, colour, or creed university education in the arts and sciences with an underlying philosophy and viewpoint that is Christian" (Trinity Western University Act, S.B.C. 1969, c. 44, s. 3(2)).

[6] Evangelical Christians believe in the authority of the Bible, the commitment to sharing the Christian message through evangelism, and sexual moral purity which requires sexual abstention outside marriage between a man and a woman. TWU's curriculum is developed and taught in a manner consistent with its religious worldview. The foundational beliefs of evangelical Christianity are also reflected in TWU's Community Covenant Agreement (Covenant). The Covenant requires TWU community members to "voluntarily abstain" from a number of actions, including harassment, lying, cheating, plagiarism, and the use or possession of alcohol on campus. At the heart of this appeal, however, is the Covenant's prohibition on "sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman" (A.R., vol. III, at p. 403).

B. TWU's Proposed Law School

[11] Over two decades ago, TWU decided that it wished to establish a faculty of law and to add a three-year juris doctor (J.D.) common law degree program to its degree offerings. In June 2012, TWU submitted its proposal to British Columbia's Minister of Advanced Education for the approval required to be able to grant law degrees, pursuant to the Minister's authority under the Degree Authorization Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 24, s. 4(1).

[12] TWU also submitted its proposal to the Federation of Law Societies of Canada, which received delegated authority from each of the provincial law societies in 2010 to ensure that new Canadian common law degree programs meet established national requirements. In December 2013, the Federation granted preliminary approval to TWU's proposed law school program. The following day, the Minister granted approval to TWU's proposed law school, authorizing TWU to grant law degrees to its graduates.

C. The LSBC's Decision Not to Approve TWU's Proposed Law School

[13] Under the LSBC's Rules, adopted pursuant to the LPA, enrollment in the LSBC's bar admission program requires proof of "academic qualification". Under Rule 2-27 (now Rule 2-54 of the Law Society Rules 2015), this requirement is met with a bachelor of laws or equivalent degree issued by an "approved" common law faculty of law in a Canadian university.

[14] A common law faculty of law is "approved" for the purposes of Rule 2-27 if it has been approved by the Federation "unless the Benchers adopt a resolution declaring that it is not or has ceased to be an approved faculty of law".

[15] Therefore, when the Federation granted its preliminary approval to TWU's law school on December 16, 2013, the law school became an "approved" faculty of law under the LSBC's Rule 2-27, unless the Benchers declared that it was not.

[20] The Benchers chose … to hold a referendum on the issue of TWU's law school approval. The Benchers agreed to be bound by the results only if one-third of members voted in the referendum and two-thirds of the votes were in favour of implementing the June 10, 2014 resolution.

[21] The referendum of all members was conducted by mail-in ballot in October 2014: 5951 members voted to implement the resolution through a declaration that TWU's proposed law school was not an approved faculty of law, while 2088 members voted against the resolution.

[22] On October 31, 2014, the Benchers passed a resolution declaring that TWU's law school was not an approved faculty of law. The resolution was passed with 25 votes in favour, one against, and four abstentions. On December 11, 2014, the Minister withdrew his approval of TWU's proposed law school under the Degree Authorization Act.

IV. Analysis

A. Questions on Appeal

[27] At the outset, it is important to identify what the LSBC actually decided when denying approval to TWU's proposed law school. The LSBC did not deny graduates from TWU's proposed law school admission to the LSBC; rather, the LSBC denied TWU's proposed law school with a mandatory covenant.

[28] In reviewing this decision, we must consider the following issues: whether the LSBC was entitled under its enabling statute to consider TWU's admissions policies and to hold a referendum of its members in deciding whether to approve its proposed law school; whether the LSBC's decision limited a Charter protection; and if so, whether that decision reflected a proportionate balance of the Charter protection and the statutory objectives.

B. The Scope of the LSBC's Statutory Mandate

[29] This appeal requires us to address the scope of the LSBC's statutory mandate. At issue in this case is the LSBC's decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school as a route of entry to the legal profession in British Columbia — a decision that falls within the core of the LSBC's role as the gatekeeper to the profession. A question that arises is whether the LSBC was entitled to consider factors apart from the academic qualifications and competence of individual graduates in making this decision to deny approval to TWU's proposed law school.

[30] TWU argues that the LSBC is only entitled to consider a law school's academic program, rather than its admissions policies, in deciding whether to approve it. It submits that Rule 2-27, the LSBC Rule under which the decision not to approve TWU's law school was made, was passed pursuant to the Benchers' statutory authority to make rules to "establish requirements, including academic requirements, and procedures" for enrolment of articled students and for admission to the bar, set out in ss. 20(1)(a) and 21(1)(b) of the LPA. However, ss. 20(1)(a) and 21(1)(b) of the LPA both explicitly allow the Benchers to "establish requirements, including academic requirements". TWU's argument also ignores the Benchers' authority, under s. 11(1) of the LPA, to "make rules for the governing of the society, lawyers, law firms, articled students and applicants, and for the carrying out of [the LPA]". This authority is explicitly "not limited by any specific power or requirement to make rules given to the benchers" elsewhere in the LPA (see LPA, s. 11(2)).

[31] In our view, the LPA requires the Benchers to consider the overarching objective of protecting the public interest in determining the requirements for admission to the profession, including whether to approve a particular law school.

[33] The LSBC's overarching statutory object in s. 3 of the LPA — to uphold and protect the public interest in the administration of justice — is stated in the broadest possible terms. While the provisions of s. 3 set out means by which this overarching objective is to be achieved, those means are framed expansively and include "regulating the practice of law" and "preserving and protecting the rights and freedoms of all persons". Section 3 of the LPA, read as a whole, manifests the legislature's intention to "leave the governance of the legal profession to lawyers"…

[39] The LSBC in this case interpreted its duty to uphold and protect the public interest in the administration of justice as precluding the approval of TWU's proposed law school because the requirement that students sign the Covenant as a condition of admission effectively imposes inequitable barriers on entry to the school. The LSBC was entitled to be concerned that inequitable barriers on entry to law schools would effectively impose inequitable barriers on entry to the profession and risk decreasing diversity within the bar. Ultimately, the LSBC determined that the approval of TWU's proposed law school with a mandatory covenant would negatively impact equitable access to and diversity within the legal profession and would harm LGBTQ individuals, and would therefore undermine the public interest in the administration of justice.

[41] Limiting access to membership in the legal profession on the basis of personal characteristics, unrelated to merit, is inherently inimical to the integrity of the legal profession. This is especially so in light of the societal trust placed in the legal profession and the explicit statutory direction that the LSBC should be concerned with "preserving and protecting the rights and freedoms of all persons" as a means to upholding the public interest in the administration of justice (LPA, s. 3(a)). Indeed, the LSBC, as a public actor, has an overarching interest in protecting the values of equality and human rights in carrying out its functions. As Abella J. wrote in Loyola, at para. 47, "shared values — equality, human rights and democracy — are values the state always has a legitimate interest in promoting and protecting". Constitutional and Charter values have been recognized as an important tool in judicial decision making since R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103 (p. 136), affirmed in subsequent jurisprudence (see e.g. Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 64-66; Reference re Senate Reform, 2014 SCC 32, [2014] 1 SCR 704, at para. 25; R. v. National Post, 2010 SCC 16, [2010] 1 SCR 477). Far from controversial, these values are accepted principles of constitutional interpretation. In the administrative context, this Court has recognized that "any exercise of statutory discretion must comply with the Charter and its values" (R. v. Conway, 2010 SCC 22, [2010] 1 SCR 765, at para. 41. See also G. Régimbald, Canadian Administrative Law (2nd ed. 2015), at pp. 94-100). There is no reason why Charter values should be seen as less significant in the context of administrative decision-making.

[42] Eliminating inequitable barriers to legal education, and thereby, to membership in the legal profession, also promotes the competence of the bar and improves the quality of legal services available to the public. The LSBC is statutorily mandated to ensure the competence of lawyers as a means of upholding and protecting the public interest in the administration of justice (LPA, s. 3(b)). The LSBC is not limited to enforcing minimum standards of competence for the individual lawyers it licenses; it is also entitled to consider how to promote the competence of the bar as a whole.

(1) Whether Freedom of Religion Is Engaged

[60] In this case, the first issue is whether, in applying its statutory public interest mandate — including the goals of equal access to and diversity within the legal profession — to the approval of TWU's proposed law school, the LSBC engaged the religious freedom of the TWU community.

[64] Although this Court's interpretation of freedom of religion reflects the notion of personal choice and individual autonomy and freedom, religion is about both religious beliefs and religious relationships (Amselem, at para. 40; Loyola, at para. 59, quoting Justice LeBel in Hutterian Brethren, at para. 182). The protection of individual religious rights under s. 2(a) must therefore account for the socially embedded nature of religious belief, as well as the "deep linkages between this belief and its manifestation through communal institutions and traditions" (Loyola, at para. 60). In other words, religious freedom is individual, but also "profoundly communitarian" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89). The ability of religious adherents to come together and create cohesive communities of belief and practice is an important aspect of religious freedom under s. 2(a).

[70] Because s. 2(a) protects beliefs which are sincerely held by the claimant, the court must "ensure that a presently asserted religious belief is in good faith, neither fictitious nor capricious, and that it is not an artifice" (Amselem, at para. 52; see also Multani v. Commission scolaire Marguerite-Bourgeoys, 2006 SCC 6, [2006] 1 SCR 256, at para. 35). It is clear from the record that evangelical members of TWU's community sincerely believe that studying in a community defined by religious beliefs in which members follow particular religious rules of conduct contributes to their spiritual development. In our view, this is the religious belief or practice implicated by the LSBC's decision.

[75] By interpreting the public interest in a way that precludes the approval of TWU's law school governed by the mandatory Covenant, the LSBC has interfered with TWU's ability to maintain an approved law school as a religious community defined by its own religious practices. The effect is a limitation on the right of TWU's community members to enhance their spiritual development through studying law in an environment defined by their religious beliefs in which members follow certain religious rules of conduct. Accordingly, their religious rights were engaged by the decision.

(2) Overlapping Charter Protections

[76] Three other Charter protections are potentially implicated in this case, namely free expression (s. 2(b)); free association (s. 2(d)); and equality (s. 15).

[77] The factual matrix underpinning a Charter claim in respect of any of these protections is largely indistinguishable. Further, the parties themselves have almost exclusively framed the dispute as centring on religious freedom. In our view, the religious freedom claim is sufficient to account for the expressive, associational, and equality rights of TWU's community members in the analysis.

(3) Proportionate Balancing

[84] The LSBC was faced with only two options — to approve or reject TWU's proposed law school. Given the LSBC's interpretation of its statutory mandate, approving TWU's proposed law school would not have advanced the relevant statutory objectives, and therefore was not a reasonable possibility that would give effect to Charter protections more fully in light of the statutory objectives.

[85] The LSBC's decision also reasonably balanced the severity of the interference with the Charter protection against the benefits to its statutory objectives. To begin, the LSBC's decision did not limit religious freedom to a significant extent. The LSBC did not deny approval to TWU's proposed law school in the abstract; rather, it denied a specific proposal that included the mandatory Covenant. Indeed, when the LSBC asked TWU whether it would "consider" amendments to its Covenant, TWU expressed no willingness to compromise on the mandatory nature of the Covenant. The decision therefore only prevents TWU's community members from attending an approved law school at TWU that is governed by a mandatory covenant.

[86] The Court of Appeal described the limitation in this case as "severe" because it precludes graduates of TWU's proposed law school from practising law in British Columbia (para. 168). However, the LSBC's decision does not prevent any graduates from being able to practise law in British Columbia. Furthermore, it does not prohibit any evangelical Christians from adhering to the Covenant or associating with those who do. The interference is limited to preventing prospective students from studying law at TWU with a mandatory covenant.

[87] First, the limitation in this case is of minor significance because a mandatory covenant is, on the record before us, not absolutely required for the religious practice at issue: namely, to study law in a Christian learning environment in which people follow certain religious rules of conduct. The decision to refuse to approve TWU's proposed law school with a mandatory covenant only prevents prospective students from studying law in their optimal religious learning environment where everyone has to abide by the Covenant.

[88] Second, the interference in this case is limited because the record makes clear that prospective TWU law students view studying law in a learning environment infused with the community's religious beliefs as preferred (rather than necessary) for their spiritual growth. …

[90] Our point is that, on the record before us, prospective TWU law students effectively admit that they have much less at stake than claimants in many other cases that have come before this Court (see e.g. Multani, at para. 3; Amselem, at para. 6; and Hutterian Brethren, at para. 7; and Reference re Same-Sex Marriage, 2004 SCC 79, [2004] 3 SCR 698, at para. 58). Put otherwise, denying someone an option they would merely appreciate certainly falls short of "forced apostasy" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 89).

[91] On the other side of the scale is the extent to which the LSBC's decision furthered its statutory objectives. As the regulator of the legal profession in British Columbia, its decision must represent a reasonable balance between the benefits to its statutory objectives and the severity of the limitation on Charter rights at stake.

[92] It is clear that the decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school significantly advanced the LSBC's statutory objectives — to promote and protect the public interest in the administration of justice by preserving and protecting the rights and freedoms of all persons and ensuring the competence of the legal profession (see LPA, ss. 3(a) and 3(b)).

[93] First, the decision advances the LSBC's relevant statutory objectives by maintaining equal access to and diversity in the legal profession. While TWU submits that it "is open to all academically qualified people wishing to live and learn in its religious community" (R.F., at para. 10), the reality is that most LGBTQ people will be deterred from applying to its proposed law school because of the Covenant's prohibition on sexual activity outside marriage between a man and a woman. …

[94] TWU submits that even if LGBTQ people are deterred from attending TWU's law school, there are many other options open to LGBTQ people who wish to attend law school (R.F., at para. 175). Even further, TWU asserts that its law school will result in an overall increase in law school seats, which expands choices for all students (para. 138). The British Columbia Court of Appeal accepted this argument, finding that the negative impact on access to law school by LGBTQ students would be "insignificant in real terms" (para. 179).

[95] Such arguments fail to recognize that even if the net result of TWU's proposed law school is that more options and opportunities are available to LGBTQ people applying to law school in Canada — which is certainly not a guarantee — this does not change the fact that an entire law school would be closed off to the vast majority of LGBTQ individuals on the basis of their sexual identity. Those who are able to sign the Covenant will be able to apply to 60 more law school seats per year, whereas those 60 seats remain effectively closed to most LGBTQ people. In short, LGBTQ individuals would have fewer opportunities relative to others. This undermines true equality of access to legal education, and by extension, the legal profession. Substantive equality demands more than just the availability of options and opportunities — it prevents "the violation of essential human dignity and freedom" and "eliminate[s] any possibility of a person being treated in substance as 'less worthy' than others" (Quebec (Attorney General) v. A, 2013 SCC 5, [2013] 1 SCR 61, at para. 138). The public confidence in the administration of justice may be undermined if the LSBC is seen to approve a law school that effectively bars many LGBTQ people from attending.

[96] Second, the decision furthers the statutory objective — protecting the public interest in the administration of justice by preserving rights and freedoms — by preventing the risk of significant harm to LGBTQ people who attend TWU's proposed law school. … TWU's Covenant prevents students who are not married to members of the opposite sex from engaging in sexual activity in the privacy of their own bedrooms. It requires non-evangelical LGBTQ students, whom TWU welcomes to its school, to comply with conduct requirements even when they are off-campus, in the privacy of their own homes. Attending TWU's law school would mean that LGBTQ students would have to deny a crucial component of their identity in the most private and personal of spaces for three years in order to receive a legal education...

[99] The TWU community has the right to determine the rules of conduct which govern its members. Freedom of religion protects the rights of religious adherents to hold and express beliefs through both individual and communal practices. Where a religious practice impacts others, however, this can be taken into account at the balancing stage. The Covenant is a commitment to enforcing a religiously based code of conduct, not just in respect of one's own behaviour, but also in respect of other members of the TWU community (D. Pothier, "An Argument Against Accreditation of Trinity Western University's Proposed Law School" (2014), 23:1 Const. Forum Const. 1, at p. 2). The effect of the mandatory Covenant is to restrict the conduct of others.

[103] The refusal to approve the proposed law school means that members of the TWU religious community are not free to impose those religious beliefs on fellow law students, since they have an inequitable impact and can cause significant harm. The LSBC chose an interpretation of the public interest in the administration of justice which mandates access to law schools based on merit and diversity, not exclusionary religious practices. The refusal to approve TWU's proposed law school prevents concrete, not abstract, harms to LGBTQ people and to the public in general. The LSBC's decision ensures that equal access to the legal profession is not undermined and prevents the risk of significant harm to LGBTQ people who feel they have no choice but to attend TWU's proposed law school. It also maintains public confidence in the legal profession, which could be undermined by the LSBC's decision to approve a law school that forces LGBTQ people to deny who they are for three years to receive a legal education.

[104] Given the significant benefits to the relevant statutory objectives and the minor significance of the limitation on the Charter rights at issue on the facts of this case, and given the absence of any reasonable alternative that would reduce the impact on Charter protections while sufficiently furthering those same objectives, the decision to refuse to approve TWU's proposed law school represents a proportionate balance. In other circumstances, a more serious limitation may be entitled to greater weight in the balance and change the outcome. But that is not this case.

[105] In our view, the decision made by the LSBC "gives effect, as fully as possible to the Charter protections at stake given the particular statutory mandate" (Loyola, at para. 39). Therefore, the decision amounted to a proportionate balancing and was reasonable.

V. Disposition

[106] The resolution of the LSBC to declare that TWU's proposed law school not be approved is restored. As a result, the appeal from the Court of Appeal for British Columbia is allowed, with costs.

4.2.2 Dissent

Côté and Brown JJ. (dissenting) —

I. Introduction

[260] One way of understanding this appeal and the appeal in Trinity Western University v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2018 SCC 33, [2018] 2 SCR 453 — and reliance was frequently placed upon this metaphor during submissions from both sides at the hearing — is that they call upon this Court to decide who controls the door to "the public square". In other words, accepting that the liberal state must foster pluralism by striving to accommodate difference in the public life of civil society, where does that state obligation — that is, where does that public life — begin? With a private denominational university? Or with a judicially reviewable statutory delegate charged by the provincial legislature to regulate the profession and entry thereto in the public interest?

[261] In our view, fundamental constitutional principles and the statutory jurisdiction of the Law Society of British Columbia ("LSBC"), properly interpreted, lead unavoidably to the legal conclusion that the public regulator controls the door to the public square and owes that obligation. The private denominational university, which is not subject to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and is exempt from provincial human rights legislation, does not. And, in conditioning access to the public square as it has, the regulator has — on this Court's own jurisprudence — profoundly interfered with the constitutionally guaranteed freedom of a community of co-religionists to insist upon certain moral commitments from those who wish to join the private space within which it pursues its religiously based practices. While, therefore, the LSBC has purported to act in the cause of ensuring equal access to the profession, it has effectively denied that access to a segment of Canadian society, solely on religious grounds. In our respectful view, this unfortunate state of affairs merits judicial intervention, not affirmation.

[265] At the end of the day, however, a court of law, particularly when dealing with claims of constitutionally guaranteed rights including freedom of religion, must have regard to the legal principles that guide the relationship between citizen and state, between private and public. And those principles exist to protect rights-holders from values which a state actor deems to be "shared", not to give licence to courts to defer to or impose those values. For the same reason, a court of law ought not in our respectful view to be concerned, as the majority (Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Wagner and Gascon JJ.) is explicitly concerned, with the "public perception" of what freedom of religion entails (Majority Reasons, at para. 101). The role of courts in these cases is "not to produce social consensus, but to protect the democratic commitment to live together in peace"…

[268] Even if the LSBC's statutory "public interest" mandate were to be interpreted such that it had the authority to take considerations other than fitness into account, the decision not to approve TWU's proposed law faculty unjustifiably limited the TWU community's freedom of religion. The decision not to approve TWU's proposed law faculty because of the restrictions contained in the Covenant — a code of conduct protected by provincial human rights legislation — is a profound interference with religious freedom, and is contrary to the state's duty of religious neutrality.

[269] Further, even were the "public interest" to be understood broadly, as the LSBC contends, accreditation of TWU's proposed law school would not be inconsistent with the public interest, so understood. Tolerance and accommodation of difference serve the public interest and foster pluralism. Acceptance by the LSBC of the unequal access effected by the Covenant would signify the accommodation of difference and of the TWU community's right to religious freedom, and not condonation of discrimination against LGBTQ persons. Approval of the proposed law school is, therefore, not inconsistent with "public interest" objectives of maintaining equal access and diversity in the legal profession, and indeed, it promotes those objectives. It follows that, in our view, approving TWU's proposed law school was the only decision reflecting a proportionate balancing between Charter rights and the LSBC's statutory objectives.

J. Proportionality: The Infringement Was Not Proportionate

(1) The LSBC Approval Decision Does Not Balance the TWU Community's Section 2(a) Rights With a Relevant Statutory Objective

[323] As we have already recounted, the LSBC's statutory objective in rendering an approval decision is to ensure that individual applicants are fit for licensing. And, as the fitness of future graduates of TWU's proposed law school was not in dispute, this statutory objective cannot justify any limitations on the TWU community's s. 2(a) rights. But as we will explain… even if the LSBC's statutory mandate had permitted the consideration of broader "public interest" concerns invoked by the LSBC and the majority, the LSBC's decision would not be justified, since withholding approval substantially interferes with the TWU community's freedom of religion and approving TWU's proposed law school was not against the public interest, so understood.

(2) The LSBC Approval Decision Substantially Interferes With Freedom of Religion

[324] In our view, the LSBC approval decision represents a profound interference with religious freedom: it is a measure that undermines the core character of a lawful religious institution and disrupts the vitality of the TWU community (Loyola, at para. 67). While the approval decision under review may appear to be facially neutral (as it denies a benefit and does not purport to directly compel or prohibit a religious practice), it is substantively coercive in nature. As the majority recognizes, at para. 99 of its reasons, "[t]he TWU community has the right to determine the rules of conduct which govern its members" through its Covenant. Indeed, the TWU Covenant is protected by British Columbia's Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210, s. 41(1). Yet, notwithstanding that right and that statutory protection, the LSBC approval decision makes state acceptance contingent upon the TWU community manifesting its beliefs in a particular way. That this is so is, on this record, beyond dispute. As noted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal, "[t]he Law Society was prepared to approve the law school if TWU agreed to remove the offending portions of the Covenant requiring students to abstain from 'sexual intimacy that violates the sacredness of marriage between a man and a woman"... This is highly intrusive conduct by a state actor into the religious practices of the TWU community. That conduct, like the ensuing LSBC decision to deny accreditation, contravened the state's duty of religious neutrality: each represented an expression by the state of religious preference which promotes the participation of non-believers, or believers of a certain kind, to the exclusion of the community of believers found at TWU (Mouvement laïque, at paras. 74-78).

[325] The majority concludes that the infringement in this case was "limited" and "of minor significance" (paras. 86-90). We agree with the Chief Justice (at paras. 128-32) that the fact the Covenant is not "absolutely required" and "preferred (rather than necessary)" does not diminish the severity of the infringement in this case.

(3) Approving TWU's Proposed Law School Is Not Against the LSBC's Public Interest Mandate

[327] The majority states that the decision not to approve TWU's proposed law school furthers its public interest objective by "maintaining equal access to and diversity in the legal profession" (Majority Reasons, at paras. 93-95). We recognize, as this Court has previously recognized, that while there is evidence before us that some LGBTQ persons do attend TWU, the vast majority of LGBTQ students "would not be tempted to apply for admission, and could only sign the so-called student contract at a considerable personal cost. TWU is not for everybody; it is designed to address the needs of people who share a number of religious convictions" (TWU 2001, at para. 25). In our view, however, the majority fails to appreciate that the unequal access resulting from the Covenant is a function of accommodating religious freedom, which itself advances the public interest by promoting diversity in a liberal, pluralist society.

[328] The rights recognized in the Charter and the enshrinement of multiculturalism therein reflect the premise of our constitutional law and history that pluralism is intrinsically valuable. Our colleague McLachlin C.J. notes Canada's long history of religious schools (para. 130). Similarly, and writing extra-judicially, our colleague Karakatsanis J. has observed that, "[i]n a global environment where religious accommodation is sometimes seen as a detriment, Canada has found a way to welcome difference" (quoted in H. MacIvor and A. H. Milnes, eds., Canada at 150: Building a Free and Democratic Society (2017), at p. 9; see also M. A. Yahya, "Traditions of Religious Liberty in Early Canadian History", in D. Newman, ed., Religious Freedom and Communities (2016), 49, at p. 49).

[329] But this generous and historically Canadian posture towards religious accommodation stands in stark contrast to the majority's view of the pursuit of statutory objectives as "unavoidabl[y]" limiting the individual freedoms protected by the Charter (Majority Reasons, at para. 100). This view fundamentally misconceives the role of the state in a multicultural and democratic society. As described by W. A. Galston, "[i]n a liberal pluralist regime, a key end is the creation of social space within which individuals and groups can freely pursue their distinctive visions of what gives meaning and worth to human existence" (The Practice of Liberal Pluralism (2005), at p. 3). Or as Sachs J. said in Christian Education South Africa (at paras. 23-24), "if society is to be open and democratic in the fullest sense it needs to be tolerant and accepting of cultural pluralism" and allow "individuals and communities . . . to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'".

[333] Simply put, the secular state is a neutral state, which refrains from espousing "values" that undermine or go beyond what is necessary for the civic participation of all. As Iacobucci J. recognized in Amselem, at para. 50, "the State is in no position to be, nor should it become, the arbiter of religious dogma". We agree, and would add that the state is equally unfit to be the arbiter of *ir*religious dogma (see Mouvement laïque, at para. 70). As this Court said in Mouvement laïque, "[state] neutrality requires that the state neither favour nor hinder any particular belief, and the same holds true for non-belief" (para. 72 (emphasis added)). Either way, state neutrality must prevail.

[334] It follows from the foregoing that accommodating diverse beliefs and values is a precondition to secularism and pluralism. Further, it is necessary to ensure that the dignity of all members of society is protected. "Tolerance", then, means forbearing, and allowing for difference. "[I]t is a feeble notion of pluralism that transforms 'tolerance' into 'mandated approval or acceptance'" (Chamberlain v. Surrey School District No. 36, 2002 SCC 86, [2002] 4 SCR 710, at para. 132, per Gonthier J., dissenting in the result but agreeing with the majority on this point).

[335] The "public interest", broadly understood, is therefore served by accommodating TWU's religious practices, including the Covenant. That this is so is confirmed by provincial and federal legislation. Contrary to the LSBC decision under review, the Legislative Assembly of British Columbia has already determined that the public interest is served by accommodating religious communities by providing that they do not contravene provincial human rights law when they grant a preference to members of their own group (Human Rights Code, s. 41). This provision was described by this Court in TWU 2001, at para. 28, as "accommodat[ing] religious freedoms by allowing religious institutions to discriminate in their admissions policies on the basis of religion". The practical exclusion of LGBTQ individuals from attending TWU's proposed law school is therefore a direct result of the Legislature's accommodation of the TWU community. Further, that exclusion — which expresses a community code of conduct in conformity with orthodox evangelical beliefs — is not directed to LGBTQ persons; no one group is singled out, and many others (notably unmarried heterosexual persons) would be bound by it. The purpose of TWU's admissions policy is not to exclude LGBTQ persons, or anybody else, but to establish a code of conduct which ensures the vitality of its religious community.

[338] Finally, and contrary to our colleague McLachlin C.J.'s view (at paras. 137, 145-46 and 149-50), we see no basis for concern that approval by the LSBC would amount to "condoning" the content of the Covenant or discrimination against LGBTQ persons. As previously explained, the LSBC does not govern law schools. There is no basis upon which to conclude that law schools exercise a public function on behalf of the LSBC. It therefore cannot be said that the LSBC would, by accrediting TWU, condone discrimination indirectly. Nor, for that matter, can it be said that other provincial law societies (which decided to accredit TWU's law school on the recommendation of the Federation of Law Societies of Canada), or the Federation itself, condoned discrimination indirectly. State recognition of the rights of a private actor does not amount to an endorsement of that actor's beliefs, whether that recognition takes the form of an approval decision of the LSBC, or the Legislature's enactment of s. 41 of the Human Rights Code, or Parliament's inclusion of the preamble and s. 3.1 of the Civil Marriage Act. Equating approval to condonation turns the protective shield of the Charter into a sword by effectively imposing Charter obligations on private actors. And, it operates to exclude religious institutions, and therefore, religious communities, from the public sphere solely because they choose to exercise their Charter-protected religious beliefs. As noted by V. M. Muñiz-Fraticelli, "if every accrediting decision implies complicity with the values of the program that is licensed, then there is no possibility for diversity of values in any field that requires state approval. Religious education, for instance, would be permitted only when religious doctrine is perfectly congruent with the ethos of the state" ("The (Im)possibility of Christian Education" (2016), 75 S.C.L.R. (2d) 209, at p. 220).

4.3.1 Majority

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Deschamps, Fish and Cromwell JJ. was delivered by

The Chief Justice —

I. Introduction

[1] How should the state respond to a witness whose sincerely held religious belief requires her to wear a niqab that covers her face, except for her eyes, while testifying in a criminal proceeding? One response is to say she must always remove her niqab on the ground that the courtroom is a neutral space where religion has no place. Another response is to say the justice system should respect the witness's freedom of religion and always permit her to testify with the niqab on. In my view, both of these extremes must be rejected in favour of a third option: allowing the witness to testify with her face covered unless this unjustifiably impinges on the accused's fair trial rights.

[2] A secular response that requires witnesses to park their religion at the courtroom door is inconsistent with the jurisprudence and Canadian tradition, and limits freedom of religion where no limit can be justified. On the other hand, a response that says a witness can always testify with her face covered may render a trial unfair and lead to wrongful conviction. What is required is an approach that balances the vital rights protecting freedom of religion and trial fairness when they conflict. The long-standing practice in Canadian courts is to respect and accommodate the religious convictions of witnesses, unless they pose a significant or serious risk to a fair trial. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which protects both freedom of religion and trial fairness, demands no less.

[3] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that a witness who for sincere religious reasons wishes to wear the niqab while testifying in a criminal proceeding will be required to remove it if:

(a) requiring the witness to remove the niqab is necessary to prevent a serious risk to the fairness of the trial, because reasonably available alternative measures will not prevent the risk; and

(b) the salutary effects of requiring her to remove the niqab, including the effects on trial fairness, outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so, including the effects on freedom of religion.

II. The Background

[4] The facts may be briefly stated. M---d S. and M---l S. stand charged with having sexually assaulted N.S. The accused are N.S.'s cousin and uncle, respectively. The prosecution called N.S. as a witness at the preliminary inquiry. N.S., who is a Muslim, wished to testify wearing her niqab. M---d S. and his co-accused, M---l S., sought an order requiring N.S. to remove her niqab when testifying. The preliminary inquiry judge held a voir dire, during which N.S. wore her niqab. N.S. testified that her religious belief required her to wear a niqab in public where men (other than certain close family members) might see her. She admitted that she had removed her niqab for the photo on her driver's licence, which was taken by a female photographer, and that, if required, she would remove it for a security check at a border crossing. The judge concluded that N.S.'s religious belief was "not that strong" and ordered her to remove her niqab. N.S. objected. The preliminary inquiry was adjourned. N.S. applied to the Superior Court of Justice to quash the order of the preliminary inquiry judge and to permit her to testify wearing the niqab.

III. The Issues

[7] The issue is when, if ever, a witness who wears a niqab for religious reasons can be required to remove it while testifying. Two sets of Charter rights are potentially engaged — the witness's freedom of religion (protected under s. 2(a)) and the accused's fair trial rights, including the right to make full answer and defence (protected under ss. 7 and 11(d)). This Court set out the framework for identifying and resolving rights conflicts that arise at common law in Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., 1994 CanLII 39 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 835. This approach was further refined in R. v. Mentuck, 2001 SCC 76, [2001] 3 SCR 442. The framework was developed in the context of publication bans, but its principles have broader application.

[9] Applying this framework involves answering four questions:

1. Would requiring the witness to remove the niqab while testifying interfere with her religious freedom?

2. Would permitting the witness to wear the niqab while testifying create a serious risk to trial fairness?

3. Is there a way to accommodate both rights and avoid the conflict between them?

4. If no accommodation is possible, do the salutary effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so?

IV. Would Requiring the Witness to Remove the Niqab While Testifying Interfere With Her Religious Freedom?

[13] This was not an appropriate determination of whether N.S. has a prima facie religious claim. First, the question of whether she has a claim focuses on sincerity of belief rather than its strength. While, as I will discuss, the strength of a claimant's religious belief may be relevant in balancing it against the accused's fair trial rights, the belief need only be sincere in order for it to receive protection. Second, inconsistent adherence to a religious practice may suggest lack of sincere belief, but it does not necessarily do so. A sincere believer may occasionally lapse, her beliefs may change over time or her belief may permit exceptions to the practice in particular situations. Departures from the practice in the past should also be viewed in context; a witness should not be denied the right to raise s. 2(a) merely because she has made what seemed to be a compromise in the past in order to participate in some facet of society. The preliminary inquiry judge did not explore these possibilities. I therefore agree with the Court of Appeal that the matter must be returned to the preliminary inquiry judge for full consideration of whether N.S.'s desire to wear a niqab is based on sincere religious belief.

[14] The balance of my reasons proceeds on the assumption that N.S. has established a sincere religious belief that she must wear a niqab while testifying in a public criminal proceeding. In such circumstances, can the judge order that the niqab be removed on the basis that it will adversely affect the accused's fair trial interests?

V. Would Permitting the Witness to Wear the Niqab While Testifying Create a Serious Risk to Trial Fairness?

[16] M---d S. argues that allowing N.S. to testify with her face covered by a niqab denies his fair trial rights in two ways: first, by preventing effective cross-examination; and second, by interfering with the ability of the trier of fact (judge or jury) to assess N.S.'s credibility.

[17] We have no expert evidence in this case on the importance of seeing a witness's face to effective cross-examination and accurate assessment of a witness's credibility. All we have are arguments and several legal and social science articles submitted by the parties as authorities.

[18] M---d S. and the Crown argue that the link is clear. Communication involves not only words, but facial cues. A facial gesture may reveal uncertainty or deception. The cross-examiner may pick up on non-verbal cues and use them to uncover the truth. Credibility assessment is equally dependent not only on what a witness says, but on how she says it. Effective cross-examination and accurate credibility assessment are central to a fair trial. It follows, they argue, that permitting a witness to wear a niqab while testifying may deny an accused's fair trial rights.

[19] N.S. and supporting interveners, on the other hand, argue that the importance of seeing a witness's face has been greatly exaggerated. They submit that untrained individuals cannot use facial expressions to detect deception. Moreover, to the extent that non-verbal cues are useful at all, a niqab-wearing witness's eyes, tone of voice and cadence of speech remain available to the cross-examiner and trier of fact.

[22] As a general rule, witnesses in common law criminal courts are required to testify in open court, with their faces visible to counsel, the judge and the jury. Face-to-face confrontation is the norm, although not an independent constitutional right: R. v. Levogiannis (1990), 1990 CanLII 6873 (ON CA), 1 O.R. (3d) 351 (C.A.), at pp. 366-67, aff'd 1993 CanLII 47 (SCC), [1993] 4 SCR 475. To be sure, long-standing assumptions of the common law can be displaced, if shown to be erroneous or based on groundless prejudice — thus the reforms to eliminate the many myths that once skewed the law of sexual assault. But the record before us has not shown the long-standing assumptions of the common law regarding the importance of a witness's facial expressions to cross-examination and credibility assessment to be unfounded or erroneous.

[24] Covering the face of a witness may impede cross-examination: see C.A. reasons, at para. 54. Effective cross-examination is integral to the conduct of a fair trial and a meaningful application of the presumption of innocence…

Non-verbal communication can provide the cross-examiner with valuable insights that may uncover uncertainty or deception, and assist in getting at the truth.

[25] Covering a witness's face may also impede credibility assessment by the trier of fact, be it judge or jury. It is a settled axiom of appellate review that deference should be shown to the trier of fact on issues of credibility because trial judges (and juries) have the "overwhelming advantage" of seeing and hearing the witness — an advantage that a written transcript cannot replicate… This advantage is described as stemming from the ability to assess the demeanour of the witness, that is, to see how the witness gives her evidence and responds to cross-examination.

[27] On the record before us, I conclude that there is a strong connection between the ability to see the face of a witness and a fair trial. Being able to see the face of a witness is not the only — or indeed perhaps the most important — factor in cross-examination or accurate credibility assessment. But its importance is too deeply rooted in our criminal justice system to be set aside absent compelling evidence.

[28] However, whether the ability to observe a witness's face impacts trial fairness in any particular case will depend on the evidence that the witness is to provide. Where evidence is uncontested, credibility assessment and cross-examination are not in issue; therefore, being unable to see the witness's face will not impinge on the accused's fair trial rights; as Dagenais notes, the risk to trial fairness must be "real and substantial" (p. 878), or in other words, the risk must be a serious one (Mentuck, at para. 34).

[29] If wearing the niqab poses no serious risk to trial fairness, a witness who wishes to wear it for sincere religious reasons may do so.

VI. Is There a Way to Accommodate Both Rights and Avoid the Conflict Between Them?

[30] If both freedom of religion and trial fairness are engaged on the facts, the question is how a judge should reconcile these rights.

[31] The answer to this question lies in the Dagenais/Mentuck approach and the jurisprudence of this Court. The answer is not to ban religion from the courtroom, transforming the courtroom into a "neutral" space where witnesses must park their religious convictions at the door. Nor does it lie in ignoring the ancient and persistent connection the law has postulated between seeing a witness's face and trial fairness, and holding that a witness may always wear her niqab while testifying. Rather, the answer lies in a just and proportionate balance between freedom of religion on the one hand, and trial fairness on the other, based on the particular case before the Court.

[32] Under the Dagenais/Mentuck framework, once a judge is satisfied that both sets of competing interests are actually engaged on the facts, he or she must try to resolve the claims in a way that will preserve both rights...

[33] When the matter returns to the preliminary inquiry judge, the parties should be able to place before the court evidence relating to possible options for accommodation of the potentially conflicting claims. This is the first step in the reconciliation process. The question is whether there is a reasonably available alternative that would conform to the witness's religious convictions while still preventing a serious risk to trial fairness. On the facts of this case, it may be that no accommodation is possible; excluding men from the courtroom would have implications for the open court principle, the right of the accused to be present at his trial, and potentially his right to counsel of his choice. Testifying without the niqab via closed-circuit television or behind a one-way screen may not satisfy N.S.'s religious obligations. However, when this case is reheard, the preliminary inquiry judge must consider the possibility of accommodation based on the evidence presented by the parties.

VII. Do the Salutary Effects of Requiring the Witness to Remove the Niqab Outweigh the Deleterious Effects of Doing So?

[34] If there is no reasonably available alternative that would avoid a serious risk to trial fairness while conforming to the witness's religious belief, the analysis moves to the next step in the Dagenais/Mentuck framework. The question is whether the salutary effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab, including the effects on trial fairness, outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so, including the effects on freedom of religion (Dagenais, at p. 878; Mentuck, at para. 32).

[36] In terms of the deleterious effects of requiring the witness to remove her niqab while testifying, the judge must look at the harm that would be done by limiting the sincerely held religious practice. Sincerity of belief is already established at the first step of determining whether the s. 2(a) right is engaged; at this stage the task is to evaluate the impact of failing to protect that sincere belief in the particular context. It is difficult to measure the value of adherence to religious conviction, or the injury caused by being required to depart from it. The value of adherence does not depend on whether a religious practice is a voluntary expression of faith or a mandatory obligation under religious doctrine: Amselem, at para. 47. However, certain considerations may be helpful. How important is the practice to the claimant? What is the degree of state interference with the religious practice? (See Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567, at paras. 89-95.) How does the actual situation in the courtroom — the people present and any measures that can be put in place to limit facial exposure — affect the harm to the claimant of limiting her religious practice? These are but some considerations that may be relevant to determining the impact of an order to remove the niqab on the witness's right to freedom of religion.

[37] The judge should also consider the broader societal harms of requiring a witness to remove the niqab in order to testify. N.S. and supporting interveners argue that if niqab-wearing women are required to remove the niqab while testifying against their sincere religious belief they will be reluctant to report offences and pursue their prosecution, or to otherwise participate in the justice system. The wrongs done to them will remain unredressed. They will effectively be denied justice. The perpetrators of crimes against them will go unpunished, immune from legal consequences. These considerations may be especially weighty in a sexual assault case such as this one. In recent decades the justice system, recognizing the seriousness of sexual assault and the extent to which it is under-reported, has vigorously pursued those who commit this crime. Laws have been changed to encourage women and children to come forward to testify. Myths that once stood in the way of conviction have been set aside.

[38] Having considered the deleterious effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab, the judge must also consider the salutary effects of doing so. These include preventing harm to the fair trial interest of the accused and safeguarding the repute of the administration of justice. An important consideration will be the extent to which effective cross-examination and credibility assessment on this witness's testimony is central to the case. On an individual level, the cost of an unfair trial is severe. The right to a fair trial is a fundamental pillar without which the edifice of the rule of law would crumble. No less is at stake than an individual's liberty — his right to live in freedom unless the state proves beyond a reasonable doubt that he committed a crime meriting imprisonment. This is of critical importance not only to the individual on trial, but to public confidence in the justice system.

[The majority then explained that the nature of the proceeding, whether the trial was by judge alone or judge and jury, and the nature of the evidence were examples of factors to be taken into account in this analysis.]

[45] The judge must assess all these factors and determine whether, in the case at hand, the salutary effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so.

VIII. The Alternatives

[46] I have proposed that courts should deal with the conflict between rights in cases such as this by finding a just and appropriate balance between freedom of religion on the one hand and fair trial rights on the other. The result is that where a niqab is worn because of a sincerely held religious belief, a judge should order it removed if the witness wearing the niqab poses a serious risk to trial fairness, there is no way to accommodate both rights, and the salutary effects of requiring the witness to remove the niqab outweigh the deleterious effects of doing so…

[48] I turn first to the position that a witness should always be permitted to wear a niqab in court. The basic problem with this solution is that it offers no protection for the accused's fair trial interest and the state's correlative interest in avoiding wrongful convictions and maintaining public confidence in the administration of justice…

[49] In the absence of evidence showing that these beliefs [in the importance of seeing a witness's face], backed by centuries of practice, are unsubstantiated "myths" that should be excised from the law, we should not take such a radical step. It follows that the view that witnesses can never be ordered to remove the niqab cannot be accepted. The Dagenais/Mentuck approach of finding a just balance between the conflicting rights is not displaced.

[50] At the other end of the spectrum lies the approach that says the courtroom must be a space in which individuals' particular religious convictions have no place…

[51] In my view, this option must also be rejected. It is inconsistent with Canadian jurisprudence, courtroom practice, and our tradition of requiring state institutions and actors to accommodate sincerely held religious beliefs insofar as possible. Importantly, it limits religious rights where there is no countervailing right and hence no reason to limit them. As such, it fails the proportionality test which has guided Charter jurisprudence since Oakes in 1986.

[52] First, as already discussed, our jurisprudence teaches that clashes between rights should be approached by reconciling the rights through accommodation if possible, and in the end, if a conflict cannot be avoided, by case-by-case balancing: Dagenais…

[53] Second, to remove religion from the courtroom is not in the Canadian tradition. Canadians have since the country's inception taken oaths based on holy books — be they the Bible, the Koran or some other sacred text. The practice has been to respect religious traditions insofar as this is possible without risking trial fairness or causing undue disruption in the proceedings. The Canada Evidence Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-5, now permits a witness to affirm instead of taking a religious oath, but it does not remove the option of the oath from the courtroom.

[54] Third, the Canadian approach in the last 60 years to potential conflicts between freedom of religion and other values has been to respect the individual's religious belief and accommodate it if at all possible …

[56] This brings me to the final reason for rejecting an approach that would never allow a witness to testify while wearing a religious facial covering. It does not comport with the fundamental premise underlying the Charter that rights should be limited only to the extent that the limits are shown to be justifiable. This principle is set out in s. 1 of the Charter, in relation to laws — laws that limit the rights guaranteed by the Charter are invalid to the extent that the limit is not reasonably justified in a free and democratic society. A total ban on religious face coverings for all evidence given by all witnesses in the courtroom would mean that freedom of religion is being limited in situations where there is no good reason for the limit. As discussed above, uncontested and uncontroversial evidence does not engage the fair trial interest. A total ban that would permit the state to intrude on freedom of religion where it cannot be justified is not consistent with the premise on which the Charter is based — a generous approach to defining the scope of the rights it confers, coupled with the need to justify intrusions on those rights because of conflicting interests or the public good.

IX. Conclusion

[57] I would dismiss the appeal. The matter should be remitted to the preliminary inquiry judge to be decided in accordance with these reasons.

4.3.2 Minority

The reasons of LeBel and Rothstein JJ. were delivered by

LeBel J. —

[59] Once again, this appeal signals the difficulties attendant on the trial of charges of sexual assault and related offences, particularly in the context of the life of a family. As we will see, however, there is more to this case. This appeal also illustrates the tension and changes caused by the rapid evolution of contemporary Canadian society and by the growing presence in Canada of new cultures, religions, traditions and social practices. Now, this Court must decide how to frame the relationship — or clash — between the affirmation of a religious right by a victim of sexual assault and the right of the accused to conduct his defence or, rather, to make full answer and defence to the charges against him. The complainant says that her Islamic faith requires her to wear a full-face veil, the niqab, in public, in court. The accused responds that the complainant must remove her veil, particularly when she gives evidence or is cross-examined, in order to protect his right to a fair trial and to make full answer and defence…

[60] The Court of Appeal and the complainant treated the issue in this case as purely one of conflict and reconciliation between a religious right and the protection of the right of the accused to make full answer and defence. This clash arises, but the equation involves other factors. The case engages basic values of the Canadian criminal justice system. Is the wearing of the niqab compatible not only with the rights of the accused, but also with the constitutional values of openness and religious neutrality in contemporary democratic, but diverse, Canada?

[61] Exploring this aspect of the case may lead to further questions about the meaning of multiculturalism in our democratic environment…

II. Conflict Between Religious Rights and the Criminal Justice Process

[63] In the instant case, this Court must resolve a conflict between two protected constitutional rights within the framework established by the constitutional system…

[67] But the Canadian criminal trial process remains faithful in its core aspects to an adversarial model. This process developed in the common law. Some of its features are now part of the constitutional order. The accused, who is the target of the process, may himself be going through a painful and traumatic experience from the time of the criminal investigation to the arrest, the laying of charges and the wait for a trial date in open court. Indeed, he is the target of a process established to satisfy the public interest in the pursuit and punishment of crime. Nevertheless the criminal process itself is also designed to ensure that the accused is given a fair trial, to safeguard the constitutional presumption of innocence and, hopefully, to avert wrongful convictions. The adversarial model is based on interaction between the prosecution, the plaintiff, counsel for the parties, witnesses and, finally, the judge and, where applicable, the jurors. This model of justice imposes a significant personal burden on witnesses and parties. This burden cannot be lifted entirely. The price might very well be reading the most basic rights of the accused out of the criminal law and of the Charter.

[68] In this context, it would be possible to expound at length on the theme of the reconciliation of rights. But the Court is, first of all, tasked with resolving a problem of balancing of rights, which both enjoy constitutional protection. I agree, in this respect, with the reasons of the Chief Justice that, when the issue involves the credibility of a key witness in respect of the core questions raised by a charge, the rights of the accused must be protected. Since cross-examination is a necessary tool for the exercise of the right to make full answer and defence, the consequences of restrictions on the rights in question weigh more heavily on the accused, and the balancing process works in his favour. A defence that is unduly and improperly constrained might impact on the determination of his guilt or innocence. As a result, the witness, the complainant in this case, must be asked to remove her veil while giving evidence at the preliminary inquiry and at trial.

III. The Niqab — Some Practical Aspects of the Conduct of the Trial

[69] But this does not mean that I agree with the solution the Chief Justice proposes to the problem of a witness wearing a niqab while testifying. In her view, whether a witness will be allowed to wear a niqab would depend on the nature or the importance of the evidence. The application of these criteria looks highly problematic. First, their application could trigger new motions, and possibly another type of "voir dire" that would add a new layer of complexity to a trial process that is not always a model of simplicity. We should not forget that a trial is itself a dynamic chain of events. It can often be difficult to foresee which evidence might be considered non-contentious or important at a specific point in a trial. The solution may vary at different stages of a trial, and also with what is known about the evidence. What looked unchallengeable one day might appear slightly dicey a week later. Given the nature of the trial process itself, the niqab should be allowed either in all cases or not at all when a witness testifies. In my opinion, a clear rule should be chosen. Because of its impact on the rights of the defence, in the context of the underlying values of the Canadian justice system, the wearing of a niqab should not be allowed.

IV. Values of the Canadian Criminal Justice System

[70] A few years ago, Abella J. wrote some words of caution about the need to respect differences, but at the same time to preserve common values of Canadian society:

> Endorsed in legal instruments ranging from the statutory protections found in human rights codes to their constitutional enshrinement in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the right to integrate into Canada's mainstream based on and notwithstanding these differences has become a defining part of our national character.
> The right to have differences protected, however, does not mean that those differences are always hegemonic. Not all differences are compatible with Canada's fundamental values and, accordingly, not all barriers to their expression are arbitrary.

(Bruker v. Marcovitz, 2007 SCC 54, [2007] 3 SCR 607, at paras. 1-2)

[71] Those common values are the ones that allowed Canada to develop and live as a diverse society. They preserve a public space where all will be welcome as they are, but where some core common values will facilitate the interaction between all members of society…

[72] Dickson C.J. recognized in Oakes that the Charter is grounded in a long history and tradition. The "living tree" keeps growing, but always from its roots. Today, we may rightly say that, in s. 27 of the Charter, Canada accepts the importance of multiculturalism in its social life. In s. 27, Canada signals its acceptance that it's changing through every day of its history. At the same time, however, the recognition of multiculturalism takes place in the environment of the Constitution itself, and is rooted in its political and legal traditions. The Constitution requires an openness to new differences that appear within Canada, but also an acceptance of the principle that it remains connected with the roots of our contemporary democratic society.

[73] The will to maintain an independent and open justice system in which the interests and the dignity of all are taken into consideration remains a key aspect of the traditions grounding this democratic society. The religious neutrality of the state and of its institutions, including the courts and the justice system, protects the life and the growth of a public space open to all regardless of their beliefs, disbeliefs and unbeliefs. Religions are voices among others in the public space, which includes the courts.

[74] A system of open and independent courts has become a core component of a democratic state, ruled by law (T. Bingham, The Rule of Law (2010), at p. 8). This system is part of the complex web of institutions, rules and values embraced by the notion of the rule of law, of a state and a society living under and within the law. Such a system is critical to the maintenance of the rule of law, a fundamental Canadian value, as this Court held, for example, in the Quebec Secession Reference…

[75] There are all sorts of exceptions to the openness of the courts and to the publicity of trials. But they remain exceptions. Courts work under a general principle that they are open to the public and that the public is entitled to know or learn about what goes on before them…

[76] From this broader constitutional perspective, the trial becomes an act of communication with the public at large. The public must be able to see how the justice system works. The principle of openness ensures that the courts and the trial process belong to all regardless of religion, gender or origin.

[77] In the courts themselves, as I mentioned above, the trial is a process of communication. To facilitate this process, the justice system uses rules and methods that try to assist parties that struggle with handicaps to overcome them in order to gain access to justice and take part effectively in a trial. Blind or deaf litigants, and parties with limited mobility, take part in judicial proceedings. Communication may sometimes be more difficult. But the efforts to overcome these obstacles and the rules crafted to address them tend to improve the quality of the communication process. Wearing a niqab, on the other hand, does not facilitate acts of communication. Rather, it restricts them. It removes the witness from the scope of certain elements of those acts on the basis of the assertion of a religious belief in circumstances in which the sincerity and strength of the belief are difficult to assess or even to question. The niqab shields the witness from interacting fully with the parties, their counsel, the judge and, where applicable, the jurors.

[78] A clear rule that niqabs may not be worn would be consistent with the principle of openness of the trial process and would safeguard the integrity of that process as one of communication. It would also be consistent with the tradition that justice is public and open to all in our democratic society. This rule should apply at all stages of the criminal trial, at the preliminary inquiry as well as at the trial itself. Indeed, evidentiary issues arise and evolve at the different stages of the criminal process, and they affect the conduct of the communication process taking place during the trial.

4.3.3 Dissent

Abella J. (dissenting) —

Introduction

[80] Controversy hovers over the context of this case: whether the niqab is mandatory for Muslim women or whether it marginalizes the women who wear it; whether it enhances multiculturalism or whether it demeans it. These are complex issues about which reasonable people can and do strenuously disagree. But we are not required to try to resolve any of these or related conceptual issues in this case, we are required to try to transcend them in order to answer only one question: Where identity is not an issue, should a witness' sincerely held religious belief that a niqab must be worn in a courtroom, yield to an accused's ability to see her face. In other words, is the harm to the accused's fair trial rights in not being able to see a witness' entire face, greater than the harm to that witness' religious rights.

[82] I concede without reservation that seeing more of a witness' facial expressions is better than seeing less. What I am not willing to concede, however, is that seeing less is so impairing of a judge's or an accused's ability to assess the credibility of a witness, that the complainant will have to choose between her religious rights and her ability to bear witness against an alleged aggressor. This also has the potential to impair the rights of an accused, who may find herself having to choose between her religious rights and giving evidence in her own defence. The court system has many examples of accepting evidence from witnesses who are unable to testify under ideal circumstances because of visual, oral, or aural impediments. I am unable to see why witnesses who wear niqabs should be treated any differently.

[83] I would, however, make an exception in cases where the accused can demonstrate that the witness' face is directly relevant to the case, such as where the witness' identity is in issue. In such cases, seeing the witness' face is central to the issues at trial, rather than merely being a part of the assessment of demeanour.

[86] The crux of this case… is whether the impact of not having full access to the usual "demeanour assessment package" can be said to so materially harm trial fairness that the religious right must yield. In my view, with very limited exceptions, the harm to a complainant of requiring her to remove her niqab while testifying will generally outweigh any harm to trial fairness.

[87] This Court has adopted a low threshold when it comes to establishing sincerity of belief. Inquiries into sincerity are to be "as limited as possible", intended "only to ensure that a presently asserted religious belief is in good faith, neither fictitious nor capricious, and that it is not an artifice…

[88] In my view, particularly in the context of this case, a probing inquiry into the claimant's sincerity of belief is unwarranted. For a start, it is unclear what sort of evidence a court would actually require in order for the claimant to establish a sincerity of religious practice: Sara Weinrib, "An Exemption for Sincere Believers: The Challenge of Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony" (2011), 56 McGill L.J. 719, at p. 728. Rigorous focus on a claimant's past religious practice to determine whether his or her current beliefs are sincerely held is largely inconclusive, as are the beliefs of co-religionists given the spectrum of beliefs and practices even within the same religion: Amselem, at para. 53. Moreover, it strikes me as manifestly unrealistic to assume that a witness would insincerely wear the niqab in an effort to gain some sort of testimonial advantage. As a result, I agree that the preliminary inquiry judge improperly focussed on N.S.'s decision to remove her niqab when having her driver's licence photo taken and at potential security checks. The record shows that N.S. has worn her niqab for five years in sincere religious observance. In my view, she met the sincerity threshold.

[89] With great respect, however, I disagree with the majority that the "strength" of a witness' belief, while not relevant in assessing the witness' prima facie religious claim, is nonetheless somehow relevant when balancing that claim against trial fairness. It is unclear to me how a claimant's "strength" of belief — particularly given the highly subjective and imprecise nature of the freedom of religion analysis — affects the protection a claimant should be afforded under the Charter. Such an approach, in my respectful view, risks re-entering into inappropriate inquiries into a claimant's past practices, or into the extent to which a claimant's practices follow a religion's orthodox traditions.

[91] There can be no doubt that the assessment of a witness' demeanour is easier if it is based on being able to scrutinize the whole demeanour package — face, body language, voice, etc. Nor is there any doubt that historically and ideally, we expect to see a witness' face when he or she is testifying. That, however, is different from concluding that unless the entire package is available for scrutiny, a witness'credibility cannot adequately be weighed.

[92] To start, while I think it is clear that witnesses in common law criminal courts are expected to testify with their faces visible to counsel and the trier of fact, it does not follow that if they are unable to do so, they cannot testify. A general expectation is not the same as a general rule, and there is no need to enshrine an historic practice into a "common law" requirement. Canada's justice journey has absorbed and accommodated an evolutionary recognition that while history assists in understanding the past, it need not necessarily command the future. That is why we have come to use screens for children, interpreters for those without facility in our official languages, and a myriad of other means to facilitate a witness' ability to give evidence in the courtroom. As this case demonstrates, courts are engaged in a constant process of reconciling historic expectations and practices with the Charter's vision.

[94] This has the effect of forcing a witness to choose between her religious beliefs and her ability to participate in the justice system: Natasha Bakht, "Objection, Your Honour! Accommodating Niqab-Wearing Women in Courtrooms", in Ralph Grillo et al., eds., Legal Practice and Cultural Diversity (2009), 115, at p. 128. As a result, as the majority notes, complainants who sincerely believe that their religion requires them to wear the niqab in public, may choose not to bring charges for crimes they allege have been committed against them, or, more generally, may resist being a witness in someone else's trial. It is worth pointing out as well that where the witness is the accused, she will be unable to give evidence in her own defence. To those affected, this is like hanging a sign over the courtroom door saying "Religious minorities not welcome".

[95] The order requiring a witness to remove her niqab must also be understood in the context of a complainant alleging sexual assault. As this Court stated in R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 668, "an assessment of the fairness of the trial process must be made 'from the point of view of fairness in the eyes of the community and the complainant' and not just the accused" (para. 72): see also R. v. O'Connor, 1995 CanLII 51 (SCC), [1995] 4 SCR 411, per McLachlin J., at para. 193. Creating a judicial environment where victims are further inhibited by being asked to choose between their religious rights and their right to seek justice, undermines the public perception of fairness not only of the trial, but of the justice system itself.

[96] The majority's conclusion that being unable to see the witness' face is acceptable from a fair trial perspective if the evidence is "uncontested", essentially means that sexual assault complainants, whose evidence will inevitably be contested, will be forced to choose between laying a complaint and wearing a niqab, which, as previously noted, may be no meaningful choice at all.

[97] This brings us to the extent to which N.S., by exercising her freedom of religion in wearing a niqab, harms the accused's fair trial rights. The right to a fair trial is crucial to the presumption of innocence and maintaining confidence in the criminal justice system. While I agree that witnesses generally and ideally testify with their faces uncovered in open court, abridgements of this "ideal" often occur in practice yet are almost always tolerated.

[98] "Demeanour" has been broadly described as "every visible or audible form of self-expression manifested by a witness whether fixed or variable, voluntary or involuntary, simple or complex": Barry R. Morrison, Laura L. Porter and Ian H. Fraser, "The Role of Demeanour in Assessing the Credibility of Witnesses" (2007), 33 Advocates' Q. 170, at p. 179. Trial judges often rely on many indicators other than facial cues in finding a witness credible, including > certitude in speaking, dignity while on the stand, exhibition of disability, exhibition of anger, exhibition of frustration, articulate speaking, thoughtful presentation, enthusiastic language, direct non-evasive answering, non-glib answering, exhibition of modesty, exhibition of flexibility, normal (as in as expected) body movement, cheerful attitude, kind manner, normal exhalation, normal inhalation. . . .

> (Morrison, at p. 189)

[99] Moreover, while the ability to assess a witness' demeanour is an important component of trial fairness, many courts have noted its limitations for drawing accurate inferences about credibility…

> What was the witness's manner when he or she testified? Do not jump to conclusions, however, based entirely on the witness's manner. Looks can be deceiving. Giving evidence in a trial is not a common experience for many witnesses. People react and appear differently. Witnesses come from different backgrounds. They have different intellects, abilities, values, and life experiences. There are simply too many variables to make the manner in which a witness testifies the only or the most important factor in your decision.
> (Model Jury Instructions, Part I, Preliminary Instructions, 4.11 Assessing Testimony (online))

[102] And courts regularly accept the testimony of witnesses whose demeanour can only be partially observed. Section 14 of the Charter, for example, states that a witness who cannot hear, or who does not understand or speak the language used in the proceedings, has the right to the assistance of an interpreter. In such cases, "the trial judge ha[s] to make credibility findings through the filters of the interpreters": R. v. A.F. (2005), 2005 ABCA 447 (CanLII), 376 A.R. 124 (C.A.), at para. 3; see also R. v. R.S.M., 1999 BCCA 218 (CanLII), at paras. 12-14. The use of an interpreter may well have an impact on how the witness' demeanour is understood, but it is beyond dispute that interpreters render the assessment of demeanour neither impossible nor impracticable…

[103] A witness may also have physical or medical limitations that affect a judge's or lawyer's ability to assess demeanour. A stroke may interfere with facial expressions; an illness may affect body movements; and a speech impairment may affect the manner of speaking. All of these are departures from the demeanour ideal, yet none has ever been held to disqualify the witness from giving his or her evidence on the grounds that the accused's fair trial rights are thereby impaired.

[104] There are other situations where we accept a witness' evidence without being able to assess demeanour at all. The Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, permits a judge to order and admit a transcript of evidence by a witness who is unable to attend the trial because of a disability, even when the accused's counsel is not present for the taking of the evidence: ss. 709 and 713. Courts also allow witnesses, including material witnesses, to give evidence and be cross-examined by telephone…

[105] Exceptions to hearsay evidence are another example where the trier of fact is completely unable to assess the demeanour of the person whose statement is being admitted as evidence…

[106] Wearing a niqab presents only a partial obstacle to the assessment of demeanour. A witness wearing a niqab may still express herself through her eyes, body language, and gestures. Moreover, the niqab has no effect on the witness'verbal testimony, including the tone and inflection of her voice, the cadence of her speech, or, most significantly, the substance of the answers she gives. Unlike out-of-court statements, defence counsel still has the opportunity to rigorously cross-examine N.S. on the witness stand.

[107] It is clear from all of this that trial fairness cannot reasonably expect ideal testimony from an ideal witness in every case, and that demeanour itself represents only one factor in the assessment of a witness' credibility…

[109] In my view, therefore, the harmful effects of requiring a witness to remove her niqab, with the result that she will likely not testify, bring charges in the first place, or, if she is the accused, be unable to testify in her own defence, is a significantly more harmful consequence than not being able to see a witness' whole face.

[110] Since, in my view, N.S.'s sincerity has been established, I see no reason to require her to remove her niqab. I would therefore allow the appeal and remit the matter to the preliminary inquiry for continuation, directing that N.S. be permitted to wear her niqab throughout both the preliminary inquiry and any trial that may follow.

4.4 Notes

1. Notably, in the earlier decision of Trinity Western University v British Columbia College of Teachers, 2001 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2001] 1 SCR 772, the SCC reached the opposite result as in the law society cases. There, too, Trinity Western University was denied accreditation for a proposed educational program, on the basis of an earlier version of its community covenant. The argument of the College of Teachers, however, focused on the risk that graduates of the program would discriminate against LGBTQ2IA+ students in their future classrooms. The majority of the SCC held that, in the absence of evidence that such discrimination had or would occur, the accreditation should have been granted.
2. For other cases in which religious freedom is in tension with equality and other Charter rights, see:
    a. Christian Medical and Dental Society of Canada v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, 2019 ONCA 393, in which the Ontario Court of Appeal upheld a policy requiring doctors to provide "effective referrals" for medical services such as abortion and medical assistance in dying despite doctors' religious objections;
    b. In both Marriage Commissioners Appointed Under The Marriage Act (Re), 2011 SKCA 3 and Kisilowsky v Manitoba, 2018 MBCA 10, courts of appeal held that provinces were justified in requiring provincial marriage commissioners to officiate same-sex marriages;
3. A different kind of constitutional tension relates to the constitutionally required public funding of "dissentient schools" protected under s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and its analogs in some of the acts by which new provinces joined confederation. This was part of the fundamental compromise undergirding confederation, and provided protection principally for Catholic schools outside Quebec and Protestant schools inside Quebec. Effectively, the provision constitutionalized whatever publicly funded schools existed at the moment the province joined confederation. Because not all provinces provided such funding, and because both Quebec and Newfoundland and Labrador have repealed the requirement by way of constitutional amendment, only Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Ontario continue to fully fund Catholic schools. Ontario is unique in that it does not provide any public funding to other religious schools. A group of parents challenged this practice in Adler v. Ontario, 1996 CanLII 148 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 609, arguing that funding Catholic schools but no other religious schools violated ss 2(a) and 15(1) of the Charter. The majority rejected the argument, reasoning that one part of the Constitution (the Charter) cannot be relied upon to invalidate another (s 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867).

5 Institutional Religious Freedom

Religious communities often function as collectives, organizing themselves in ways that suit their particular traditions. They also make choices about the legal form that their organization will take for the purposes of federal and provincial laws. One question that arises in this context is whether and to what extent a court has jurisdiction to make orders with respect to decisions of a community. The basic position of the SCC is that the religious decisions of communities are not justiciable – that is, not subject to judicial review– unless there is a separate legal right at play. Part of this logic applies to all voluntary associations – courts can only review decisions where there is a legal right at stake – but matters of theology are singled out specifically as non-justiciable. This position was laid out in Wall, excerpted below.

5.1 Highwood Congregation of Jehovah's Witnesses (Judicial Committee) v. Wall, 2018 SCC 26

Rowe J. —

I. Overview

[1] The central question in this appeal is when, if ever, courts have jurisdiction to review the decisions of religious organizations where there are concerns about procedural fairness. In 2014, the appellant, the Judicial Committee of the Highwood Congregation of Jehovah's Witnesses, disfellowshipped the respondent, Randy Wall, after he admitted that he had engaged in sinful behaviour and was considered to be insufficiently repentant. The Judicial Committee's decision was confirmed by an Appeal Committee. Mr. Wall brought an originating application for judicial review of the decision to disfellowship him before the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench. The court first dealt with the issue of whether it had jurisdiction to decide the matter. Both the chambers judge and a majority of the Court of Appeal concluded that the courts had jurisdiction and could proceed to consider the merits of Mr. Wall's application.

[2] For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal. Mr. Wall sought to have the Judicial Committee's decision reviewed on the basis that the decision was procedurally unfair. There are several reasons why this argument must fail. First, judicial review is limited to public decision makers, which the Judicial Committee is not. Second, there is no free-standing right to have such decisions reviewed on the basis of procedural fairness. In light of the foregoing, Mr. Wall has no cause of action, and, accordingly, the Court of Queen's Bench has no jurisdiction to set aside the Judicial Committee's membership decision. Finally, the ecclesiastical issues raised by Mr. Wall are not justiciable.

IV. Analysis

[12] Courts are not strangers to the review of decision making on the basis of procedural fairness. However, the ability of courts to conduct such a review is subject to certain limits. These reasons address three ways in which the review on the basis of procedural fairness is limited. First, judicial review is reserved for state action. In this case, the Congregation's Judicial Committee was not exercising statutory authority. Second, there is no free-standing right to procedural fairness. Courts may only interfere to address the procedural fairness concerns related to the decisions of religious groups or other voluntary associations if legal rights are at stake. Third, even where review is available, the courts will consider only those issues that are justiciable. Issues of theology are not justiciable.

A. The Availability of Judicial Review

[13] The purpose of judicial review is to ensure the legality of state decision making… Judicial review is a public law concept that allows s. 96 courts to "engage in surveillance of lower tribunals" in order to ensure that these tribunals respect the rule of law… Private parties cannot seek judicial review to solve disputes that may arise between them; rather, their claims must be founded on a valid cause of action, for example, contract, tort or restitution.

[14] Not all decisions are amenable to judicial review under a superior court's supervisory jurisdiction. Judicial review is only available where there is an exercise of state authority and where that exercise is of a sufficiently public character. Even public bodies make some decisions that are private in nature — such as renting premises and hiring staff — and such decisions are not subject to judicial review…

[17] Although the public law remedy of judicial review is aimed at government decision makers, some Canadian courts, including the courts below, have continued to find that judicial review is available with respect to decisions by churches and other voluntary associations. These decisions can be grouped in two categories according to the arguments relied on in support of the availability of judicial review. Neither line of argument should be taken as authority for the broad proposition that private bodies are subject to judicial review. Both lines of cases fail to recognize that judicial review is about the legality of state decision making.

[18] The first line of cases relies on the misconception that incorporation by a private Act operates as a statutory grant of authority to churches so constituted… The purpose of a private Act is to "confer special powers or benefits upon one or more persons or body of persons, or to exclude one or more persons or body of persons from the general application of the law… Thus, by its nature, a private Act is not a law of general application and its effect can be quite limited… For instance, The United Church of Canada Act (1924), 14 & 15 Geo. 5, c. 100, gives effect to an agreement regarding the transfer of property rights (from the Methodist, Congregationalist and certain Presbyterian churches) upon the creation of the United Church of Canada; it is not a grant of statutory authority.

[19] A second line of cases that allows for judicial review of the decisions of voluntary associations that are not incorporated by any Act (public or private) looks only at whether the association or the decision in question is sufficiently public in nature…

[20] In my view, these cases do not make judicial review available for private bodies… In my view, a decision will be considered to be public where it involves questions about the rule of law and the limits of an administrative decision maker's exercise of power. Simply because a decision impacts a broad segment of the public does not mean that it is public in the administrative law sense of the term. Again, judicial review is about the legality of state decision making.

[22] The present case raises no issues about the rule of law. The Congregation has no constating private Act and the Congregation in no way is exercising state authority.

B. The Ability of Courts to Review Decisions of Voluntary Associations for Procedural Fairness

[24] Even if Mr. Wall had filed a standard action by way of statement of claim, his mere membership in a religious organization — where no civil or property right is granted by virtue of such membership — should remain free from court intervention. Indeed, there is no free-standing right to procedural fairness with respect to decisions taken by voluntary associations. Jurisdiction cannot be established on the sole basis that there is an alleged breach of natural justice or that the complainant has exhausted the organization's internal processes. Jurisdiction depends on the presence of a legal right which a party seeks to have vindicated. Only where this is so can the courts consider an association's adherence to its own procedures and (in certain circumstances) the fairness of those procedures.

[28] Mr. Wall argues that a contractual right (or something resembling a contractual right) exists between himself and the Congregation. There was no such finding by the chambers judge. No basis has been shown that Mr. Wall and the Congregation intended to create legal relations. Unlike many other organizations, such as professional associations, the Congregation does not have a written constitution, by-laws or rules that would entitle members to have those agreements enforced in accordance with their terms…

[31] Had Mr. Wall been able to show that he suffered some detriment or prejudice to his legal rights arising from the Congregation's membership decision, he could have sought redress under appropriate private law remedies. This is not to say that the Congregation's actions had no impact on Mr. Wall; I accept his testimony that it did. Rather, the point is that in the circumstances of this case, the negative impact does not give rise to an actionable claim. As such there is no basis for the courts to intervene in the Congregation's decision-making process; in other words, the matters in issue fall outside the courts' jurisdiction.

C. Justiciability

[32] This appeal may be allowed for the reasons given above. However, I also offer some supplementary comments on justiciability, given that it was an issue raised by the parties and dealt with at the Court of Appeal. In addition to questions of jurisdiction, justiciability limits the extent to which courts may engage with decisions by voluntary associations even when the intervention is sought only on the basis of procedural fairness. Justiciability relates to the subject matter of a dispute. The general question is this: Is the issue one that is appropriate for a court to decide?

[33] Lorne M. Sossin defines justiciability as > a set of judge-made rules, norms and principles delineating the scope of judicial intervention in social, political and economic life. In short, if a subject-matter is held to be suitable for judicial determination, it is said to be justiciable; if a subject-matter is held not to be suitable for judicial determination, it is said to be non-justiciable.

Put more simply, "[j]usticiability is about deciding whether to decide a matter in the courts": ibid., at p. 1.

[34] There is no single set of rules delineating the scope of justiciability. Indeed, justiciability depends to some degree on context, and the proper approach to determining justiciability must be flexible. The court should ask whether it has the institutional capacity and legitimacy to adjudicate the matter: see Sossin, at p. 294…

[38] In addition, sometimes even the procedural rules of a particular religious group may involve the interpretation of religious doctrine. For instance, the Organized to Do Jehovah's Will handbook (2005) outlines the procedure to be followed in cases of serious wrongdoing: "After taking the steps outlined at Matthew 18:15, 16, some individual brothers or sisters may report to the elders cases of unresolved serious wrongdoing" (p. 151). The courts lack the legitimacy and institutional capacity to determine whether the steps outlined in Matthew have been followed. These types of procedural issues are also not justiciable. That being said, courts may still review procedural rules where they are based on a contract between two parties, even where the contract is meant to give effect to doctrinal religious principles… But here, Mr. Wall has not shown that his legal rights were at stake.

[39] Justiciability was raised in another way. Both the Congregation and Mr. Wall argued that their freedom of religion and freedom of association should inform this Court's decision. The dissenting justice in the Court of Appeal made comments on this basis and suggested that religious matters were not justiciable due in part to the protection of freedom of religion in s. 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. As this Court held in RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573, at p. 603, the Charter does not apply to private litigation. Section 32 specifies that the Charter applies to the legislative, executive and administrative branches of government: ibid., at pp. 603-4. The Charter does not directly apply to this dispute as no state action is being challenged, although the Charter may inform the development of the common law: ibid., at p. 603. In the end, religious groups are free to determine their own membership and rules; courts will not intervene in such matters save where it is necessary to resolve an underlying legal dispute.

V. Disposition

[40] I would allow the appeal and quash the originating application for judicial review filed by Mr. Wall. As the appellants requested that no costs be awarded, I award none.

5.2 Notes: Aga, Loyola

1. Shortly after Wall, the SCC confirmed its approach in Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church of Canada St. Mary Cathedral v. Aga, 2021 SCC 22. In that case, even though the community incorporated under Ontario's Corporations Act and had a written constitution and bylaws, the SCC held that it had no jurisdiction to decide a dispute about members' expulsion because the claimants had not proven that there existed an intention to create a legal relationship between the parties.
2. The question of corporate religious freedom goes all the way back to Big M Drug Mart, in which the claimant was a business corporation. There was argument that it should not have been able to make a religious freedom claim because corporations cannot have religious beliefs. The SCC rejected the argument, on the logic that anyone charged with an offence can argue that the offence is unconstitutional and is therefore invalid. The question of non-human entities making religious freedom arguments arose again in Loyola High School v Quebec (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 613. The majority of the Court deliberately avoided answering the question definitively, but the minority held that corporations established for religious purposes should be entitled to make religious freedom claims in some circumstances. For an argument that business corporations should also be able to make such claims in some circumstances, see Howard Kislowicz, "Business Corporations as Religious Freedom Claimants in Canada" (2017) 51 Revue juridique Thémis de l'Université de Montréal 337.

Although s 2(a) of the Charter protects freedom of conscience as well as freedom of religion, the large majority of the case law focuses on questions of religion. What's more, there is potential confusion between the terms "freedom of conscience" and "conscientious objection." While both rely on the idea of someone being free to act on their principles, in practice conscientious objections are often based in religious principles. For example, as noted above in Part 5.4, in Christian Medical and Dental Society of Canada v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, 2019 ONCA 393, a group of physicians objected to making "effective referrals" to other physicians for patients seeking access to services including abortion and medical assistance in dying. The objectors in that case rooted their claims in their religious beliefs. There are few judicial treatments of the idea of freedom of conscience disconnected from freedom of religion. At the SCC, Wilson J developed the idea in R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30 at 179 as follows:

> It seems to me, therefore, that in a free and democratic society "freedom of conscience and religion" should be broadly construed to extend to conscientiously-held beliefs, whether grounded in religion or in a secular morality. Indeed, as a matter of statutory interpretation, "conscience" and "religion" should not be treated as tautologous if capable of independent, although related, meaning. Accordingly, for the state to take sides on the issue of abortion, as it does in the impugned legislation by making it a criminal offence for the pregnant woman to exercise one of her options, is not only to endorse but also to enforce, on pain of a further loss of liberty through actual imprisonment, one conscientiously-held view at the expense of another. It is to deny freedom of conscience to some, to treat them as means to an end, to deprive them, as Professor MacCormick puts it, of their "essential humanity".

Justice Wilson's opinion, while concurring in the result reached by the majority, was not joined by any other justices. Aside from this, the SCC has very little to say about conscience. One case which takes up a non-religious, conscientiously held belief is Maurice v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 FCT 69, excerpted below.

7.1 Maurice v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 FCT 69

> [1] While in the custody of the Correctional Service of Canada ("CSC") since 1998, the Applicant has repeatedly requested to be served a vegetarian diet. These requests have been denied on the basis that special diets are only authorized for religious beliefs or medical grounds. By this application, the Applicant challenges this denial.
> [1] The Applicant had previously been provided a vegetarian diet because of his membership in the Hare Krishna faith. However, in August 1998, the Applicant renounced his religious faith and continued to demand a special vegetarian diet based on his "freedom of conscience". The Applicant does not eat meat, fish, eggs, poultry, onions, mushrooms and garlic because of his conscientiously held belief that eating those food items is "morally reprehensible and poisonous to society as a whole".
> [5] Religious diets are provided to inmates as mandated by the Corrections and Conditional Release legislative scheme. Section 75 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c.20 (the "Act") states that inmates are entitled to reasonable opportunities to freely and openly participate in and express religion or spirituality, subject to security and safety limits. Section 101 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Regulations, SOR/92-620 (the "Regulations") further provides that the necessities required for an inmate's religion or spirituality should be made available to the inmate, including a special diet. Section 8 of CD880 also specifically stipulates that religious diets are to be provided subject only to safety and security concerns.
> [8] Thus, while the CSC has recognized its legal duty to facilitate the religious freedoms outlined in the Charter, freedom of conscience has effectively been ignored. Section 2(a) of the Charter affords the fundamental freedom of both religion and conscience, yet by the CSC's policy, inmates with conscientiously held beliefs may be denied expression of their "conscience". In my opinion the CSC's approach is inconsistent. The CSC cannot incorporate s.2(a) of the Charter in a piecemeal manner; both freedoms are to be recognized.
> [9] Vegetarianism is a dietary choice, which is founded in a belief that consumption of animal products is morally wrong. Motivation for practising vegetarianism may vary, but, in my opinion, its underlying belief system may fall under an expression of "conscience".

> [10] In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at 346, Dickson J. stated that the rights associated with freedom of individual conscience are central to basic beliefs about human worth and dignity, and that every individual should be free to hold and manifest whatever beliefs and opinions his or her conscience dictates. Justice Dickson further articulated the broad scope of s.2(a) as follows:
> Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience.
> [11] Therefore, in my opinion, just as the entitlement for a religious diet may be found in s. 2(a) of the Charter, a similar entitlement for a vegetarian diet exists based on the right to freedom of conscience.
> [13] It is important to note that, in the context of special diets available to inmates, religious diets and vegetarian diets are closely related. The CSC Religious Diets General Guidelines indicate that, in practice, many religious diets include some form of a vegetarian menu. As a result, accommodating a vegetarian's conscientiously held beliefs imposes no greater burden on an institution than that already in place for the provision of religious diets. In fact, the guidelines reveal that the CSC has conducted the necessary research to enable it to provide properly planned and nutritious vegetarian menus. The CSC has taken positive measures to ensure that religious freedoms are protected. In my opinion, positive measures also must be taken to facilitate freedom of conscience, subject only to the same safety and security limitations that exist for accommodation of religious beliefs.

7.2 Questions

1. What does "freedom of conscience" add to s 2(a) that is not already covered by freedom of religion? What kinds of cases may be analyzed under "freedom of conscience"?
2. Does "freedom of conscience" require a different test that "freedom of religion"?

Chapter 20: S 2(b) Freedom of Expression

By Richard Moon and Margot Young

1 Foundations

Former Chief Justice Beverley McLachlin has written that free expression is "the indispensable condition for nearly every other freedom." (R.v Sharpe 2001 SCC 2 at para 23), quoting the US Supreme Court in Palko v. Connecticut, (302 US 319, 1937). The standard arguments for protecting freedom of expression focus on one or a combination of three values: truth, democracy, and individual autonomy. It is said that freedom of expression must be protected because it contributes to the public's recognition of truth, or to the growth of public knowledge: it is an important way of "seeking and attaining truth" (Irwin Toy v. Quebec, 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1SCR 927, 976). It is also argued that free expression is "an essential feature of Canadian parliamentary democracy" (RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery, 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573 at 584). It is "one of the fundamental concepts that has formed the basis for the historical development of the political, social and educational institutions of western society" (Dolphin Delivery 1986, 583). And, finally, freedom of expression is said to be important to individual self-realization or personal autonomy, as "the means by which the individual expresses his or her personal identity and sense of individuality" (Ford v. Quebec, 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712 at 749). Indeed, most accounts assume that a commitment to freedom of expression rests on all three of these values. This was the view of McLachlin J. in R. v. Keegstra (1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697 at 806):

> The broad wording of s.2(b) of the Charter is arguably inconsistent with a justification based on a single facet of expression. This suggests that there is no need to adopt any one definitive justification for freedom of expression. Different justifications for freedom of expression may assume varying degrees of importance in different fact situations".

Section 2(b) of the Charter guarantees to "everyone" "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication". The right to free expression is protected by various international human rights conventions to which Canada is a signatory, such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). Article 19(2) of the ICCPR provides that: "Everyone shall have the right to freedom of expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, regardless of frontiers, either orally, in writing or in print, in the form of art, or through any other media of his choice". Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) also guarantees "freedom of expression" and provides that this right "shall include the freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers."

When thinking about the value of free expression it is worth remembering that the freedom does not simply protect individual liberty from state interference. Rather, it protects the individual's freedom to communicate with others – to speak to others, and to hear what others have to say. The right of the individual is to participate in an activity that is deeply social in character, that involves socially created languages and the use of collective resources such as the streets and the internet.

1.2 Questions

1. What is the link between free expression and a healthy democracy? Is free expression always a positive factor in democracy?
2. Why might it be wrong (a breach of their autonomy) to silence a speaker, when we think their views are wrong, but not wrong to criticize those views? Why might it violate the autonomy of an individual to prevent them from hearing inaccurate or hurtful views, even when we are afraid they might judge unwisely and adopt these views? If it is not wrong to prevent someone from engaging in harmful actions, why is it not wrong to prevent them from hearing views that might encourage them to engage in such action?
3. John Stuart Mill in his famous text, On Liberty, said that:

> [T]he peculiar evil of silencing the expression of an opinion is, that it is robbing the human race; posterity as well as the existing generation; those who dissent from the opinion, still more than those who hold it. If the opinion is right, they are deprived of the opportunity of exchanging error for truth: if wrong, they lose, what is almost as great a benefit, the clearer perception and livelier impression of truth, produced by its collision with error. (32)

Compare Mill's quotation to the following one from Chief Justice Dickson in Keegstra (1990 at 762):

> Taken to its extreme, [the truth-based] argument would require us to permit the communication of all expression, it being impossible to know with absolute certainty which factual statements are true, or which ideas obtain the greatest good. [But] expression can be used to the detriment of our search for truth; the state should not be the sole arbiter of truth, but neither should we overplay the view that rationality will overcome all falsehoods in the unregulated marketplace of ideas.

Dickson CJ, wrote this long before the rise of social media and the spread of misinformation and disinformation online. Does this change in the form and character of public discourse undermine or complicate Mill's defence of free expression?

2 The scope and limits of the freedom

Canadian courts take a two-step approach to the adjudication of freedom of expression claims under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. At the first step, the court must decide whether the state has restricted an activity that falls within the scope of the freedom's protection. At the second step, the court must determine whether the restriction is justified under the terms of section 1 of the Charter.

In Irwin Toy (1989) the Supreme Court of Canada held that if "[a]n activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the [s. 2(b)] guarantee" (Irwin Toy 1989 at 968). The Court also said that expression can take "an infinite variety of forms," including "the written and spoken word, the arts, and physical gestures" (Irwin Toy 1989 at 607). The court used the example of parking a car to illustrate the potential breadth of the category of expression. While parking a car is not ordinarily viewed as expression, if it is done to convey a message to others, it will fall within the scope of the freedom:

> It might be difficult to characterize certain day-to-day tasks, like parking a car, as having expressive content. To bring such activity within the protected sphere, the plaintiff would have to show that it was performed to convey a meaning. For example, an unmarried person might, as part of a public protest, park in a zone reserved for spouses of government employees in order to express dissatisfaction or outrage at the chosen method of allocating a limited resource. If that person could demonstrate that his activity did in fact have expressive content, he would, at this stage, be within the protected sphere and the s. 2(b) challenge would proceed.

The European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has said that the term "expression" encompasses "expression in words, in pictures, by video, and through conduct intended to convey an idea or information" (Gough v. UK, [2014] ECHR, 147). The First Amendment of the US Constitution protects freedom of "speech"; however, the US courts have defined speech broadly. The US Supreme Court in Texas v. Johnson (491 US 397, 1989) said that while "[t]he First Amendment literally forbids the abridgement only of 'speech' … its protection does not end at the spoken or written word" and extends to acts such as flag burning (Texas v. Johnson 1989 at 404). According to the court, when an individual intends through their conduct "to express an idea … that conduct may be 'sufficiently imbued with elements of communication to fall within the scope of the First and Fourteenth Amendments'" (Texas v. Johnson 1989, 404). In deciding whether conduct "possesses sufficient communicative elements" to fall with the general protection of the First Amendment, the court asks whether "[a]n intent to convey a particularized message was present, and [whether] the likelihood was great that the message would be understood by those who viewed it" (Texas v. Johnson 1989, 404). The First Amendment does not provide for limits on the right to free speech, and so instead of determining whether a limit on 'speech' is justified, the US courts have denied protection (from "content-based" state restrictions) to certain categories of harmful expression, such as "advocacy intended, and likely to, incite imminent lawless action, obscenity, defamation, speech integral to criminal conduct, so-called 'fighting words,' child pornography, fraud, true threats, and speech presenting some grave and imminent threat the government has the power to prevent" (US v. Alvarez, 567 US 709, 2012, 2544). Further, the US courts have also given weaker protection to other categories of speech, such as commercial advertising, engaging in a form of balancing when determining whether a particular state limit breaches the First Amendment.

Because communication engages or affects its audience at many levels, it is not always easy to draw the line between expression that is protected under s. 2(b) and other human acts that are not. As a consequence, the courts have adopted a broad reading of the freedom's scope and relied on section 1, the Charter's limitations provision, to address concerns about the nature of the speaker's appeal to their audience – about whether a particular form or instance of expression engages the audience and encourages independent judgment or whether instead it intimidates, harasses, or manipulates the audience. In its freedom of expression cases, the Supreme Court of Canada is quick to find a breach of the right, leaving its significant analysis to the s. 1 stage, the justification of the limit on the right.

There are two exceptions to the Supreme Court of Canada's broad definition of the scope of freedom of expression under s. 2(b). First, the court has said that an act of expression will be denied s. 2(b) protection if its method or location is incompatible with the values underlying the freedom – truth, democracy, and self-realization (Montréal v. 2952-1366 Quebec Inc, 2005 SCC 62). According to the court, a violent act, even if intended to carry a message, does not fall within the scope of the section because it does not advance these values (Irwin Toy, 1989 at 970). Expression that advocates violence is protected under s. 2(b), although it is subject to limits under s. 1. However, if the expressive act has a violent form – is itself violent – it will be denied protection under s. 2(b), and the state will not be required to justify its restriction under s. 1. Initially the court held that threats of violence do not fall within this exception and are protected under s. 2(b). However, later in R. v. Khawaja (2012 SCC 69), the court revised its position and held that threats of violence undermine "the very values and social conditions that are necessary for the continued existence of freedom of expression," ad so also fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) protection (Khawaja at para 70). In that case, the court held that that the Criminal Code ban on "terrorist activity" did not breach s. 2(b) of the Charter because this activity involved "acts of violence or threats of violence" (Khawaja at para 71).The court has also said that s. 2(b) protection does not extend to expression that takes place on a state-owned property that is not ordinarily open to the public for expression (is not a public arena/forum). This issue is discussed later in the chapter in section 5.1.

The court has also narrowed the scope of s. 2(b) protection by drawing a distinction between two types of state restriction on expressive activity: state acts that have as their purpose the restriction of expression and those that, although not designed to restrict expression, nevertheless have this effect. In Irwin Toy (at 974), Dickson CJ drew the distinction in this way: between, on the one hand, government action that is intended to restrict "the content of expression" either "by singling out particular meanings that are not to be conveyed" or restricting particular forms or means of expression that are "tied to content," and, on the other hand, government action that is intended "to control only the physical consequences of certain human activity, regardless of the meaning being conveyed." The significance of the purpose/effect distinction, which roughly parallels the distinction in American jurisprudence between content restrictions and time, place, and manner restrictions, is that a government act that is intended to limit expression, and in particular the expression of certain messages, will be found to violate s. 2(b) automatically, while a government act that simply has the effect of limiting expression will be found to violate s. 2(b) only if the person challenging the state act can show that the restricted expression advances one or more of the values that underlie the commitment to freedom of expression. Specifically, the claimant must show that the restricted expression contributes to the realization of truth, participation in social and political decision-making, and diversity in the forms of individual self-fulfilment and human flourishing (Irwin Toy 1989, 976). Yet it is unclear why an act that the court has already decided is expressive – conveys meaning – would not, at least in some minimal way, advance individual self-realization.

Because the court has defined expression broadly to include all acts intended to convey a message, any act is potentially an act of expression. This also means that any law is potentially a restriction on expression – on how a particular individual has chosen to express her/himself. Understandably, the courts are reluctant to require substantial justification for a law, such as a parking restriction, that would not ordinarily be seen as impeding expressive freedom. In these cases, the individual speaker will often have other ways to communicate her/his message that are no less effective.

Perhaps the best way to make sense of the effect rule is to see it as establishing (albeit indirectly) a lower or variable standard of justification for time, place, and manner restrictions than the ordinary s. 1 standard. These restrictions are treated differently, not because the restricted expression is, or might be, less valuable (less directly connected to the values underlying the freedom) but because the impact of such a restriction on freedom of expression interests will depend on whether a speaker can communicate her/his message as, or almost as, effectively in another way or another place

The Supreme Court of Canada has held that the category of expressive acts (acts intended to carry a message) protected under s. 2(b) includes advertising, picketing, hate promotion, soliciting for the purposes of prostitution, and pornography. The court has said that protection is given to expression "irrespective of the particular meaning or message sought to be conveyed" (Keegstra 1990, 729) because "in a free, pluralistic and democratic society we prize a diversity of ideas and opinions for their inherent value both to the community and to the individual" (Irwin Toy 1989, 968).

When determining whether a limit on expression under s.2(b) is justified under s. 1, the courts apply the multi-part Oakes test.

While the court has defined the scope of s. 2(b) broadly so that it protects all non-violent forms of expression, when it assesses limits on the freedom under s. 1, it distinguishes between core and marginal forms of expression. The court recognizes that a broad and inclusive definition of the scope of the right means that there may be a significant variation in the value of different instances of protected expression. Political expression, for example, is considered by the court to be core expression that can be restricted only for the most substantial and compelling reasons. In contrast, obscenity, commercial advertising, and hate speech are regarded as marginal forms of expression because they are less directly connected to the values underlying the freedom. As a consequence, they may be restricted for less substantial reasons.

The courts have been willing, in certain circumstances, to defer to legislature's judgment about the need for a restriction on expression. There are two different ways in which a court may defer to the legislature's judgment. The first involves deference to findings of fact by the legislature. The court may decide to lower the standard of proof that the legislature must meet when establishing the factual basis for the justification of a restriction. The second form of judicial deference relates to the legislature's accommodation of competing values or interests. If the legislature has made an apparently reasonable judgment that concerns about the manipulation of children (or some other interest) justify the restriction of certain forms of expression, the court should not simply substitute its own judgment for that of the legislature.

In *Irwin Toy,*1989, the majority said that the court should show deference to the legislature's judgment about the need for a particular restriction on a right such as freedom of expression, "[w]here the legislature mediates between the competing claims of different groups in the community" (Irwin Toy 1989, 990). The court should not simply "second-guess" the legislature's judgment about where to draw the line between competing claims. The majority also thought that when determining whether the restriction satisfied the minimal impairment requirement, the court should not "take a restrictive approach to social science evidence and require legislatures to choose the least ambitious means to protect vulnerable groups" (Irwin Toy at 993). Underlying the court's call for deference is, first, a concern that the Charter "not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons" and second a belief that the court should be slow to displace the compromises struck by democratic institutions (Irwin Toy at 993).

RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Estey, McIntyre, Chouinard and Le Dain JJ. was delivered by

MCINTYRE J.

1. This appeal raises the question of whether secondary picketing by members of a trade union in a labour dispute is a protected activity under s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and, accordingly, not the proper subject of an injunction to restrain it. In reaching the answer, consideration must be given to the application of the Charter to the common law and as well to its application in private litigation.

20. On the basis of the findings of fact that I have referred to above, it is evident that the purpose of the picketing in this case was to induce a breach of contract between the respondent and Supercourier and thus to exert economic pressure to force it to cease doing business with Supercourier. It is equally evident that, if successful, the picketing would have done serious injury to the respondent. There is nothing remarkable about this, however, because all picketing is designed to bring economic pressure on the person picketed and to cause economic loss for so long as the object of the picketing remains unfulfilled. There is, as I have earlier said, always some element of expression in picketing. The union is making a statement to the general public that it is involved in a dispute, that it is seeking to impose its will on the object of the picketing, and that it solicits the assistance of the public in honouring the picket line. Action on the part of the picketers will, of course, always accompany the expression, but not every action on the part of the picketers will be such as to alter the nature of the whole transaction and remove it from Charter protection for freedom of expression. That freedom, of course, would not extend to protect threats of violence or acts of violence. It would not protect the destruction of property, or assaults, or other clearly unlawful conduct. We need not, however, be concerned with such matters here because the picketing would have been peaceful. I am therefore of the view that the picketing sought to be restrained would have involved the exercise of the right of freedom of expression.

22. The question then is: Can an injunction based on the common law tort of inducing a breach of contract, which has the effect of limiting the Charter right to freedom of expression, be sustained as a reasonable limit imposed by law in the peculiar facts of this case. …

23. From the evidence, it may well be said that the concern of the respondent is pressing and substantial. It will suffer economically in the absence of an injunction to restrain picketing. On the other hand, the injunction has imposed a limitation upon a Charter freedom. A balance between the two competing concerns must be found. It may be argued that the concern of the respondent regarding economic loss would not be sufficient to constitute a reasonable limitation on the right of freedom of expression, but there is another basis upon which the respondent's position may be supported. This case involves secondary picketing--picketing of a third party not concerned in the dispute which underlies the picketing. The basis of our system of collective bargaining is the proposition that the parties themselves should, wherever possible, work out their own agreement.

The freedom to agree logically entails the right to disagree, to fail to reach an acceptable compromise. Most of the time good faith negotiation does produce a settlement at the bargaining table, often without a great deal of trouble. But often enough it does not; and of course it is the failures which generate the visible tumult and shouting. And at that point the collective bargaining system diverges sharply from other components in the market economy.

When the parties do exercise the right to disagree, picketing and other forms of industrial conflict are likely to follow. The social cost is great, man-hours and wages are lost, production and services will be disrupted, and general tensions within the community may be heightened. Such industrial conflict may be tolerated by society but only as an inevitable corollary to the collective bargaining process. It is therefore necessary in the general social interest that picketing be regulated and sometimes limited. It is reasonable to restrain picketing so that the conflict will not escalate beyond the actual parties. While picketing is, no doubt, a legislative weapon to be employed in a labour dispute by the employees against their employer, it should not be permitted to harm others. …

24. [T]he requirement of proportionality is also met, particularly when it is recalled that this is an interim injunction effective only until trial when the issues may be more fully canvassed on fuller evidence. It is my opinion then that a limitation on secondary picketing against a third party, that is, a non-ally, would be a reasonable limit in the facts of this case. I would therefore conclude that the injunction is "a reasonable limit prescribed by law which can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

[McIntyre J. also held that the Charter did not apply (at least directly) in a case such as this which involves the enforcement of a common law rule in a dispute between private parties].

R.W.D.S.U., Local 558 v. Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd.*, [2002] 1 SCR 156, 2002 SCC 8

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

1 THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND LEBEL J. – This case raises the issue of when if ever secondary picketing – typically defined as picketing in support of a union which occurs at a location other than the premises of that union's employer – may be legally conducted. The respondents (the "Union") were on strike against Pepsi-Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd. ("Pepsi-Cola") in Saskatchewan. The strike escalated and the Union picketed some of Pepsi-Cola's retail outlets, placed placards outside a hotel where substitute workers were staying, and demonstrated outside the homes of Pepsi-Cola's management personnel. The issue is whether such conduct is unlawful and can be enjoined.

3 For the reasons that follow, we conclude that secondary picketing is generally lawful unless it involves tortious or criminal conduct …

30 The above discussion illustrates the difficulty in defining picketing in a detailed manner. Picketing represents a continuum of expressive activity. In the labour context it runs the gamut from workers walking peacefully back and forth on a sidewalk carrying placards and handing out leaflets to passers-by, to rowdy crowds shaking fists, shouting slogans, and blocking the entrances of buildings. Beyond the traditional labour context, picketing extends to consumer boycotts and political demonstrations (see Daishowa Inc. v. Friends of the Lubicon (1998), 1998 CanLII 14828 (ON SC), 39 O.R. (3d) 620 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)). A picket line may signal labour strife. But it may equally serve as a physical demonstration of individual or group dissatisfaction on an issue.

31 For the purposes of this appeal, we find it unnecessary to define picketing in a detailed and exhaustive manner. We proceed rather on the basis that picketing may involve a broad range of activities, from the "traditional" picket line where people walk back and forth carrying placards, to the dissemination of information through other means.

32 Picketing, however defined, always involves expressive action. As such, it engages one of the highest constitutional values: freedom of expression, enshrined in s. 2(b) of the Charter. This Court's jurisprudence establishes that both primary and secondary picketing are forms of expression, even when associated with tortious acts: Dolphin Delivery, supra. … Free speech protects human dignity and the right to think and reflect freely on one's circumstances and condition. It allows a person to speak not only for the sake of expression itself, but also to advocate change, attempting to persuade others in the hope of improving one's life and perhaps the wider social, political, and economic environment.

67 While freedom of expression is not absolute, and while care must be taken in the labour context to guard against extending the more severe effects of picket lines beyond the employer, if we are to be true to the values expressed in the Charter our statement of the common law must start with the proposition that free expression is protected unless its curtailment is justified. This militates against a rule that absolutely precludes secondary picketing, whether harmful or benign, disruptive or peaceful. The preferred methodology is to begin with the proposition that secondary picketing is prima facie legal, and then impose such limitations as may be justified in the interests of protecting third parties.

72 Protection from economic harm is an important value capable of justifying limitations on freedom of expression. Yet to accord this value absolute or pre-eminent importance over all other values, including free expression, is to err. The law has never recognized a sweeping right to protection from economic harm. …

(d) Adequate Flexibility

73 … Courts may intervene and preserve the interests of third parties or the struck employer where picketing activity crosses the line and becomes tortious or criminal in nature. It is in this sense that third parties will be protected from "undue" harm in a labour dispute. Torts such as trespass, intimidation, nuisance and inducing breach of contract will protect property interests and ensure free access to private premises. Rights arising out of contracts or business relationships will also receive basic protection. Torts, themselves the creatures of common law, may grow and be adapted to current needs.

74 In summary, a wrongful action approach to picketing allows for a proper balance between traditional common law rights and Charter values, and falls in line with the core principles of the collective bargaining system put in place in this country in the years following the Second World War.

76 The wrongful action approach … focuses on the character and effects of the activity, as opposed to its location. … By focussing on the character and effect of expression rather than its location, the wrongful action approach offers a rational test for limiting picketing, not an arbitrary one.

77 Picketing which breaches the criminal law or one of the specific torts like trespass, nuisance, intimidation, defamation or misrepresentation, will be impermissible, regardless of where it occurs.

(f) Avoidance of the Primary-Secondary Picketing Distinction

78 It follows from this analysis that the difficult and potentially arbitrary distinction between primary and secondary picketing is effectively abandoned on a wrongful action approach to picketing. Secondary picketing has been, as we have seen, location defined. Indeed, many of the difficulties the courts have encountered over the years in defining secondary picketing flow from how to determine the relevant location. A conduct approach based on tortious and criminal acts does not depend on location. All picketing is allowed, whether "primary" or "secondary", unless it involves tortious or criminal conduct.

(g) Avoidance of Labour/Non-labour Distinctions

80 The wrongful action approach treats labour and non-labour expression in a consistent manner. … Along with the diverse range of activities and objectives that may attach to the act of picketing, there is also a wide array of groups and organizations that rely on placards and pamphlets to inform and persuade the public on various issues. It is thus clear that activities common to picketing do not lie within the exclusive domain of the striking worker. … We can find no persuasive reason to deprive union members of an expressive right at common law that is available to all members of the public.

(h) Balance of Power

85 Judging the appropriate balance between employers and unions is a delicate and essentially political matter. Where the balance is struck may vary with the labour climates from region to region. This is the sort of question better dealt with by legislatures than courts. Labour relations is a complex and changing field, and courts should be reluctant to put forward simplistic dictums. Where specialized bodies have been created by legislation, be it labour boards or arbitrators, they are generally entrusted to reach appropriate decisions based on the relevant statute and the specific facts of a given situation. … If the Saskatchewan Legislature had enacted a comprehensive scheme to govern labour disputes, then it might be argued that allowing secondary picketing would disturb a carefully crafted balance of power. In the absence of a legislative scheme, however, we find it difficult to say that determining illegal picketing on the basis of tortious or criminal conduct … will unduly undermine the power of employers vis-à-vis employees.

86 We emphasize that the validity of legislation is not at stake in this appeal. It is the absence of such legislation that requires us to look to the common law to resolve the issue of the legality of secondary picketing. Nothing in these reasons forestalls legislative action in this area of the law. Within the broad parameters of the Charter, legislatures remain free to craft their own statutory provisions for the governance of labour disputes, and the appropriate limits of secondary picketing.

(j) The "Signalling" Effect

93 A [related] argument is that secondary picketing is per se unjustified because it has the effect of "signalling" that people must not do business with neutral third parties. Expression through a picket line may "signal" that the line is a barrier and hence acquire coercive impact. …

94 This signalling effect, it is argued, goes beyond expression and becomes coercion. Many people, as a matter of principle or habit, will not cross a picket line. …. It is argued that while we are willing to allow that kind of pressure to be applied against the primary employer, we are not willing to allow it to be applied against a neutral third party.

95 The first point to note is that the signalling effect should be carefully assessed. A number of judgments have taken the signalling effect for granted. Doubtless there is a kernel of truth in this concept. Some people will see a picket line and automatically refuse to cross it, out of respect, sympathy, or the fear of an implied confrontation. It should be remembered, however, that this concept arose originally to describe the response to picketing among other unionized employees … Moreover, the so-called signalling effect is probably more likely to operate in specific contexts. It may vary sharply, depending on whether the dispute happens in a small tightly knit, and highly unionized community, or at a strongly organized construction site used by several employers (see Domtar Inc., [2000] O.L.R.D. No. 3761 (QL), at para. 7). In a large urban centre, where the population is diverse, and where the per capita unionization rate is low, the signalling effect may be exaggerated….

96 A second observation is that the signalling argument implicitly suggests that to the extent that picketing has a coercive signal effect, it is not expressive and hence not worthy of protection. We find such a suggestion problematic. It is difficult to see how a signal can be other than expressive; by definition, a signal is meant to convey information to others. Indeed, the underlying concern of KMart is that the signal will express too much, that it will be too effective. It seems better to us to admit that signalling is expression, the limitations of which must be justified. At this point, however, signalling ceases to suggest a special rule; rather, the question is when expressive signalling can be justifiably limited.

97 … [I] is difficult to explain why expression in the labour context should be treated as fundamentally less important than expression in other contexts. It is far from clear that union speech is more likely to elicit an irrational or reflexive response than, for example, speech by a political organization. If we say that the signalling effect justifies a special prohibition in the labour context, does it not follow that signalling in other contexts may also justify blanket prohibitions? Moreover, it seems clear that freedom of expression is not confined to "rational" speech. Irrationality may support according less protection to particular kinds of speech. But it does not justify denying all protection as a matter of principle.

98 … A distinction is sometimes drawn between secondary picketing whose aim is to disrupt the production of the secondary employer (either by dissuading the secondary employer's employees from working or by persuading consumers not to deal at all with the secondary employer until it discontinues its commercial relationship with the primary employer) and secondary picketing whose aim is merely to persuade consumers not to purchase from the secondary employer the products of the primary employer. (As an example of the latter form of labour activity, workers striking against a tobacco manufacturer might picket convenience stores in an effort to persuade customers to substitute another manufacturer's brand of cigarettes for the brand manufactured by the primary employer.) The danger of a coercive picket line that depends on a signalling effect is clearly much greater in the case of union activity whose aim is to harm the secondary employer. The danger of coercion and signalling is much less in the case of secondary picketing aimed merely at persuading consumers not to purchase the product of the primary employer.

103 At this point we may usefully review what is caught by the rule that all picketing is legal absent tortious or criminal conduct. The answer is, a great deal. Picketing which breaches the criminal law or one of the specific torts like trespass, nuisance, intimidation, defamation or misrepresentation will be impermissible, regardless of where it occurs. Specific torts known to the law will catch most of the situations which are liable to take place in a labour dispute. In particular, the breadth of the torts of nuisance and defamation should permit control of most coercive picketing. Known torts will also protect property interests. They will not allow for intimidation, they will protect free access to private premises and thereby protect the right to use one's property. Finally, rights arising out of contracts or business relationships also receive basic protection through the tort of inducing breach of contract.

107 … [T]o the extent that it may prove necessary to supplement the wrongful action approach, the courts and legislatures may do so. Doubtless issues will arise around the elaboration of the relevant torts and the tailoring of remedies to focus narrowly on the illegal activity at issue. Doubtless too, circumstances will present themselves where it will become difficult to separate the expressive from the tortious activity. In dealing with these issues, the courts may be expected to develop the common law sensitively, with a view to maintaining an appropriate balance between the need to preserve third-party interests and prevent labour strife from spreading unduly, and the need to respect the Charter rights of picketers. The legislatures too may play a role. Clarification of the status of picketing at common law should not be viewed as a restriction on legislative intervention. Rather it should be seen merely as a tool to assist the courts where federal and provincial laws remain silent. … Legislatures must respect the Charter value of free expression and be prepared to justify limiting it. But subject to this broad constraint, they remain free to develop their own policies governing secondary picketing and to substitute a different balance than the one struck in this case.

116 [T]he conduct of the Union [in this case] provided no basis for inferring any other tort, much less crime. It was peaceful informational picketing. It was aimed at supporting the strike and harming the business of Pepsi-Cola by discouraging people from trading or buying Pepsi-Cola's products. It did not amount to the tort of intimidation, which has to do with the intentional infliction of loss by unlawful means. Nor did the pickets support the tort of interference with contractual relations. First, Pepsi-Cola did not establish the required contractual basis under which the outlets allegedly acquired its product for resale. Second, the evidence as to picketing was, in the view of the Court of Appeal, "so ambiguous as to have made it impossible to conclude that the picketers . . . induced the breach of any contract or hindered its performance" (p. 242).

117 With regard to the demonstration outside the homes of Pepsi-Cola's management personnel, we agree with the Court of Appeal that the injunction was well-founded, since the conduct was tortious. …

Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General)*, 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND LAMER AND WILSON JJ. -- This appeal raises questions concerning the constitutionality, under ss. 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and ss. 2(b) and 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, of ss. 248 and 249 of the Quebec Consumer Protection Act, R.S.Q., c. P-40.1, respecting the prohibition of television advertising directed at persons under thirteen years of age.

I - The Relevant Legislative and Constitutional Provisions

The relevant provisions of the Consumer Protection Act are ss. 248, 249 and 252, which provide:

> 248. Subject to what is provided in the regulations, no person may make use of commercial advertising directed at persons under thirteen years of age.
> 249. To determine whether or not an advertisement is directed at persons under thirteen years of age, account must be taken of the context of its presentation, and in particular of
> (a)the nature and intended purpose of the goods advertised;
> (b)the manner of presenting such advertisement;
> (c)the time and place it is shown.

[The regulations establish a number of limited exemptions from the ban, extending to an ad in a children's magazine, provided the ad, among other things does not exaggerate the quality and character of the product and does not directly "incite the child to purchase the product or urge another to do so].

Sections 3 and 9.1 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms provide:

> 9.1. In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec.
> In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law.

VI -Whether ss. 248 and 249 Limits Freedom of Expression as Guaranteed by the Canadian and Quebec Charters

B. The First Step: Was the Plaintiff's Activity Within the Sphere of Conduct Protected by Freedom of Expression?

Does advertising aimed at children fall within the scope of freedom of expression? … Clearly, not all activity is protected by freedom of expression, and governmental action restricting this form of advertising only limits the guarantee if the activity in issue was protected in the first place.

"Expression" has both a content and a form, and the two can be inextricably connected. Activity is expressive if it attempts to convey meaning. That meaning is its content. Freedom of expression was entrenched in our Constitution and is guaranteed in the Quebec Charter so as to ensure that everyone can manifest their thoughts, opinions, beliefs, indeed all expressions of the heart and mind, however unpopular, distasteful or contrary to the mainstream. Such protection is, in the words of both the Canadian and Quebec Charters, "fundamental" because in a free, pluralistic and democratic society we prize a diversity of ideas and opinions for their inherent value both to the community and to the individual. …

We cannot, then, exclude human activity from the scope of guaranteed free expression on the basis of the content or meaning being conveyed. Indeed, if the activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, it has expressive content and prima facie falls within the scope of the guarantee. Of course, while most human activity combines expressive and physical elements, some human activity is purely physical and does not convey or attempt to convey meaning. It might be difficult to characterize certain day-to-day tasks, like parking a car, as having expressive content. To bring such activity within the protected sphere, the plaintiff would have to show that it was performed to convey a meaning. For example, an unmarried person might, as part of a public protest, park in a zone reserved for spouses of government employees in order to express dissatisfaction or outrage at the chosen method of allocating a limited resource. If that person could demonstrate that his activity did in fact have expressive content, he would, at this stage, be within the protected sphere and the s. 2(b) challenge would proceed.

The content of expression can be conveyed through an infinite variety of forms of expression: for example, the written or spoken word, the arts, and even physical gestures or acts. While the guarantee of free expression protects all content of expression, certainly violence as a form of expression receives no such protection. It is not necessary here to delineate precisely when and on what basis a form of expression chosen to convey a meaning falls outside the sphere of the guarantee. But it is clear, for example, that a murderer or rapist cannot invoke freedom of expression in justification of the form of expression he has chosen.

Thus, the first question remains: Does the advertising aimed at children fall within the scope of freedom of expression? Surely it aims to convey a meaning, and cannot be excluded as having no expressive content. Nor is there any basis for excluding the form of expression chosen from the sphere of protected activity. As we stated in Ford [v. Quebec, 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712] at pp. 766-67:

> Given the earlier pronouncements of this Court to the effect that the rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Canadian Charter should be given a large and liberal interpretation, there is no sound basis on which commercial expression can be excluded from the protection of s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Consequently, we must proceed to the second step of the inquiry and ask whether the purpose or effect of the government action in question was to restrict freedom of expression.

C. The Second Step: Was the Purpose or Effect of the Government Action to Restrict Freedom of Expression?

Having found that the plaintiff's activity does fall within the scope of guaranteed free expression, it must next be determined whether the purpose or effect of the impugned governmental action was to control attempts to convey meaning through that activity.

Purpose

If the government's purpose is to restrict the content of expression by singling out particular meanings that are not to be conveyed, it necessarily limits the guarantee of free expression. If the government's purpose is to restrict a form of expression in order to control access by others to the meaning being conveyed or to control the ability of the one conveying the meaning to do so, it also limits the guarantee. On the other hand, where the government aims to control only the physical consequences of certain human activity, regardless of the meaning being conveyed, its purpose is not to control expression. Archibald Cox has described the distinction as follows (Freedom of Expression (1981), at pp. 59-60):

> The bold line ... between restrictions upon publication and regulation of the time, place or manner of expression tied to content, on the one hand, and regulation of time, place, or manner of expression regardless of content, on the other hand, reflects the difference between the state's usually impermissible effort to suppress "harmful" information, ideas, or emotions and the state's often justifiable desire to secure other interests against interference from the noise and the physical intrusions that accompany speech, regardless of the information, ideas, or emotions expressed.

Thus, for example, a rule against handing out pamphlets is a restriction on a manner of expression and is "tied to content", even if that restriction purports to control litter. The rule aims to control access by others to a meaning being conveyed as well as to control the ability of the pamphleteer to convey a meaning. To restrict this form of expression, handing out pamphlets, entails restricting its content. By contrast, a rule against littering is not a restriction "tied to content". It aims to control the physical consequences of certain conduct regardless of whether that conduct attempts to convey meaning. To restrict littering as a "manner of expression" need not lead inexorably to restricting a content. Of course, rules can be framed to appear neutral as to content even if their true purpose is to control attempts to convey a meaning. For example, in Saumur v. City of Quebec, 1953 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1953] 2 SCR 299, a municipal by-law forbidding distribution of pamphlets without prior authorization from the Chief of Police was a colourable attempt to restrict expression.

[I]f the government has aimed to control attempts to convey a meaning either by directly restricting the content of expression or by restricting a form of expression tied to content, its purpose trenches upon the guarantee. Where, on the other hand, it aims only to control the physical consequences of particular conduct, its purpose does not trench upon the guarantee. In determining whether the government's purpose aims simply at harmful physical consequences, the question becomes: does the mischief consist in the meaning of the activity or the purported influence that meaning has on the behaviour of others, or does it consist, rather, only in the direct physical result of the activity.

b. Effects

Even if the government's purpose was not to control or restrict attempts to convey a meaning, the Court must still decide whether the effect of the government action was to restrict the plaintiff's free expression. Here, the burden is on the plaintiff to demonstrate that such an effect occurred. In order so to demonstrate, a plaintiff must state her claim with reference to the principles and values underlying the freedom … [which] … can be summarized as follows: (1) seeking and attaining the truth is an inherently good activity; (2) participation in social and political decision-making is to be fostered and encouraged; and (3) the diversity in forms of individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing ought to be cultivated in an essentially tolerant, indeed welcoming, environment not only for the sake of those who convey a meaning, but also for the sake of those to whom it is conveyed. In showing that the effect of the government's action was to restrict her free expression, a plaintiff must demonstrate that her activity promotes at least one of these principles. It is not enough that shouting, for example, has an expressive element. If the plaintiff challenges the effect of government action to control noise, presuming that action to have a purpose neutral as to expression, she must show that her aim was to convey a meaning reflective of the principles underlying freedom of expression. The precise and complete articulation of what kinds of activity promote these principles is, of course, a matter for judicial appreciation to be developed on a case by case basis. But the plaintiff must at least identify the meaning being conveyed and how it relates to the pursuit of truth, participation in the community, or individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing.

c. Sections 248 and 249

There is no question but that the purpose of ss. 248 and 249 of the Consumer Protection Act was to restrict both a particular range of content and certain forms of expression in the name of protecting children. Section 248 prohibits, subject to regulation, attempts to communicate a commercial message to persons under thirteen years of age. Section 249 identifies factors to be considered in deciding whether the commercial message in fact has that prohibited content. …

[T]he regulations in question do more than just restrict the manner in which a particular contentmust be expressed. They also restrict content directly. …

Furthermore, it is clear from the substantial body of material submitted by the Attorney General of Quebec … that the purported mischief at which the Act and regulations were directed was the harm caused by the message itself. In combination, therefore, the Act and the regulations prohibit particular content of expression. Such a prohibition can only be justified if it meets the test under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter and s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter.

D. Summary and Conclusion

When faced with an alleged violation of the guarantee of freedom of expression, the first step in the analysis is to determine whether the plaintiff's activity falls within the sphere of conduct protected by the guarantee. Activity which (1) does not convey or attempt to convey a meaning, and thus has no content of expression or (2) which conveys a meaning but through a violent form of expression, is not within the protected sphere of conduct. If the activity falls within the protected sphere of conduct, the second step in the analysis is to determine whether the purpose or effect of the government action in issue was to restrict freedom of expression. If the government has aimed to control attempts to convey a meaning either by directly restricting the content of expression or by restricting a form of expression tied to content, its purpose trenches upon the guarantee. Where, on the other hand, it aims only to control the physical consequences of particular conduct, its purpose does not trench upon the guarantee. In determining whether the government's purpose aims simply at harmful physical consequences, the question becomes: does the mischief consist in the meaning of the activity or the purported influence that meaning has on the behaviour of others, or does it consist, rather, only in the direct physical result of the activity. If the government's purpose was not to restrict free expression, the plaintiff can still claim that the effect of the government's action was to restrict her expression. To make this claim, the plaintiff must at least identify the meaning being conveyed and how it relates to the pursuit of truth, participation in the community, or individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing.

In the instant case, the plaintiff's activity is not excluded from the sphere of conduct protected by freedom of expression. The government's purpose in enacting ss. 248 and 249 of the Consumer Protection Act and in promulgating ss. 87 to 91 of the Regulation respecting the application of the Consumer Protection Act was to prohibit particular content of expression in the name of protecting children. These provisions therefore constitute limitations to s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and s. 3 of the Quebec Charter. …

VII - Whether the Limit on Freedom of Expression Imposed by ss. 248 and 249 Is Justified Under s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter or s. 1 of the Canadian Charter

[The 3 judges found that the law was sufficiently clear to meet the prescribed by law requirement: "Absolute precision in the law exists rarely, if at all. The question is whether the legislature has provided an intelligible standard according to which the judiciary must do its work. The task of interpreting how that standard applies in particular instances might always be characterized as having a discretionary element, because the standard can never specify all the instances in which it applies. On the other hand, where there is no intelligible standard and where the legislature has given a plenary discretion to do whatever seems best in a wide set of circumstances, there is no 'limit prescribed by law'"].

D. Whether the s. 1 and s. 9.1 Materials Justify Banning Commercial Advertising Directed at Persons Under Thirteen Years of Age

In our view, the Attorney General of Quebec has demonstrated that the concern which prompted the enactment of the impugned legislation is pressing and substantial and that the purpose of the legislation is one of great importance. The concern is for the protection of a group which is particularly vulnerable to the techniques of seduction and manipulation abundant in advertising. In the words of the Attorney General of Quebec, [TRANSLATION] "Children experience most manifestly the kind of inequality and imbalance between producers and consumers which the legislature wanted to correct." The material given in evidence before this Court is indicative of a generalized concern in Western societies with the impact of media, and particularly but not solely televised advertising, on the development and perceptions of young children.

Broadly speaking, the concerns which have motivated both legislative and voluntary regulation in this area are the particular susceptibility of young children to media manipulation, their inability to differentiate between reality and fiction and to grasp the persuasive intention behind the message, and the secondary effects of exterior influences on the family and parental authority. Responses to the perceived problems are as varied as the agencies and governments which have promulgated them. However the consensus of concern is high.

In establishing the factual basis for this generally identified concern, the Attorney General relied heavily upon the U.S. Federal Trade Commission (FTC) Final Staff Report and Recommendation, In the Matter of Children's Advertising, which contains a thorough review of the scientific evidence on the subject as at 1981. … One of its principal conclusions is that young children (2-6) cannot distinguish fact from fiction or programming from advertising and are completely credulous when presented with advertising messages … The Report thus provides a sound basis on which to conclude that television advertising directed at young children is per se manipulative. Such advertising aims to promote products by convincing those who will always believe.

It is reasonable to extend this conclusion in two ways. First, it can be extended to advertising in other media. For example, the OECD Report, op. cit., discusses children's advertising in all media including television, although the greatest body of evidence focusses on the persuasive force of television advertising. Second, it can be extended to advertising aimed at older children (7-13). The Attorney General filed a number of studies reaching somewhat different conclusions about the age at which children generally develop the cognitive ability to recognize the persuasive nature of advertising and to evaluate its comparative worth. The studies suggest that at some point between age seven and adolescence, children become as capable as adults of understanding and responding to advertisements. The majority in the Court of Appeal interpreted this evidence narrowly and found that it only justified the objective of regulating advertising aimed at children six or younger, not the regulation of advertising aimed at children between the ages of seven and thirteen. They concluded, and we agree, that the evidence was strongest with respect to the younger age category. Opinion is more divided when children in the older age category are involved. But the legislature was not obliged to confine itself solely to protecting the most clearly vulnerable group. It was only required to exercise a reasonable judgment in specifying the vulnerable group.

Where the legislature mediates between the competing claims of different groups in the community, it will inevitably be called upon to draw a line marking where one set of claims legitimately begins and the other fades away without access to complete knowledge as to its precise location. If the legislature has made a reasonable assessment as to where the line is most properly drawn, especially if that assessment involves weighing conflicting scientific evidence and allocating scarce resources on this basis, it is not for the court to second guess. That would only be to substitute one estimate for another. In dealing with inherently heterogeneous groups defined in terms of age or a characteristic analogous to age, evidence showing that a clear majority of the group requires the protection which the government has identified can help to establish that the group was defined reasonably. Here, the legislature has mediated between the claims of advertisers and those seeking commercial information on the one hand, and the claims of children and parents on the other. There is sufficient evidence to warrant drawing a line at age thirteen, and we would not presume to re-draw the line.

The legislature reasonably concluded that advertisers should be precluded from taking advantage of children both by inciting them to make purchases and by inciting them to have their parents make purchases. Either way, the advertiser would not be able to capitalize upon children's credulity. The s. 1 and s. 9.1 materials demonstrate, on the balance of probabilities, that children up to the age of thirteen are manipulated by commercial advertising and that the objective of protecting all children in this age group is predicated on a pressing and substantial concern. We thus conclude that the Attorney General has discharged the onus under the first part of the Oakes test.

Means Proportional to the Ends

The second part of the s. 1 and s. 9.1 test involves balancing a number of factors to determine whether the means chosen by the government are proportional to its objective.

Rational Connection

There can be no doubt that a ban on advertising directed to children is rationally connected to the objective of protecting children from advertising. The government measure aims precisely at the problem identified in the s. 1 and s. 9.1 materials. It is important to note that there is no general ban on the advertising of children's products, but simply a prohibition against directing advertisements to those unaware of their persuasive intent. Commercial advertisements may clearly be directed at the true purchasers -- parents or other adults. Indeed, non-commercial educational advertising aimed at children is permitted. Simply put, advertisers are prevented from capitalizing on the inability of children either to differentiate between fact and fiction or to acknowledge and thereby resist or treat with some skepticism the persuasive intent behind the advertisement. In the present case, we are of the opinion that the evidence does establish the necessary rational connection between means and objective.

The party seeking to uphold the limit must demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that the means chosen impair the freedom or right in question as little as possible. What will be "as little as possible" will of course vary depending on the government objective and on the means available to achieve it.

[In] matching means to ends and asking whether rights or freedoms are impaired as little as possible, a legislature mediating between the claims of competing groups will be forced to strike a balance without the benefit of absolute certainty concerning how that balance is best struck. Vulnerable groups will claim the need for protection by the government whereas other groups and individuals will assert that the government should not intrude. In Edwards Books and Art Ltd., supra, Dickson C.J. expressed an important concern about the situation of vulnerable groups (at p. 779):

> In interpreting and applying the Charter I believe that the courts must be cautious to ensure that it does not simply become an instrument of better situated individuals to roll back legislation which has as its object the improvement of the condition of less advantaged persons.

When striking a balance between the claims of competing groups, the choice of means, like the choice of ends, frequently will require an assessment of conflicting scientific evidence and differing justified demands on scarce resources. Democratic institutions are meant to let us all share in the responsibility for these difficult choices. Thus, as courts review the results of the legislature's deliberations, particularly with respect to the protection of vulnerable groups, they must be mindful of the legislature's representative function. … (Edwards Books and Art Ltd. at p. 772).

In other cases, however, rather than mediating between different groups, the government is best characterized as the singular antagonist of the individual whose right has been infringed. For example, in justifying an infringement of legal rights enshrined in ss. 7 to 14 of the Charter, the state, on behalf of the whole community, typically will assert its responsibility for prosecuting crime whereas the individual will assert the paramountcy of principles of fundamental justice. There might not be any further competing claims among different groups. In such circumstances, and indeed whenever the government's purpose relates to maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judicial system, the courts can assess with some certainty whether the "least drastic means" for achieving the purpose have been chosen, especially given their accumulated experience in dealing with such questions … The same degree of certainty may not be achievable in cases involving the reconciliation of claims of competing individuals or groups or the distribution of scarce government resources.

The strongest evidence for the proposition that this ban impairs freedom of expression as little as possible comes from the FTC Report. Because the Report found that children are not equipped to identify the persuasive intent of advertising, content regulation could not address the problem. The Report concluded that the only effective means for dealing with advertising directed at children would be a ban on all such advertising because "[a]n informational remedy would not eliminate nor overcome the cognitive limitations that prevent young children from understanding advertising" (p. 36). [However, the FTC opposed the implementation of such a ban because "viewing audiences were not so sufficiently segmented". A broad ban based on either time period or audience composition would catch many audience members who were not young children and a narrower ban would still catch many non-children while also failing to catch programs frequently watched by young children.]

Sections 248 and 249 preserve the rationale for a ban contained in the FTC Report at the same time as overcoming the practical limitations suggested therein. The sections contemplate a larger age group than that envisaged by the FTC Report, and always allow advertising aimed at adults, thereby avoiding the difficulties identified in the Report both with a ban based on audience composition and with a ban based on the definition of "advertising directed to children". …

[The majority note that the government's application guidelines identify specific time periods when the audience of children, 2-11, is significant and specifies particular "categories of (1) products, (2) advertisements and (3) audience", which "allows for a sophisticated appraisal of when an advertisement is aimed at children."] … [T]he evidence sustains the reasonableness of the legislature's conclusion that a ban on commercial advertising directed to children was the minimal impairment of free expression consistent with the pressing and substantial goal of protecting children against manipulation through such advertising. While evidence exists that other less intrusive options reflecting more modest objectives were available to the government [such as relying on corporate self-regulation], there is evidence establishing the necessity of a ban to meet the objectives the government had reasonably set. This Court will not, in the name of minimal impairment, take a restrictive approach to social science evidence and require legislatures to choose the least ambitious means to protect vulnerable groups. …

Deleterious Effects

There is no suggestion here that the effects of the ban are so severe as to outweigh the government's pressing and substantial objective. Advertisers are always free to direct their message at parents and other adults. They are also free to participate in educational advertising. …

The final component of the proportionality test is easily satisfied. …

Conclusion

Based on the s. 1 and s. 9.1 materials, we conclude that ss. 248 and 249 constitute a reasonable limit upon freedom of expression and would accordingly uphold the legislation under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter and s. 9.1 of the Quebec Charter.

[The majority then considered and rejected the respondent's s. 7 claim].

McIntyre J (dissenting) (Beetz J. concurring):

Can it be said that the welfare of children is at risk because of advertising directed at them? I am not satisfied that any case has been shown that it is. There was evidence that small children are incapable of distinguishing fact from fiction in advertising. This is hardly surprising: many adults have the same problem. Children, however, do not remain children. They grow up and, while advertising directed at children may well be a source of irritation to parents, no case has been shown here that children suffer harm. Children live in a world of fiction, imagination and make believe. Children's literature is based upon these concepts. As they mature, they make adjustments and can be expected to pass beyond the range of any ill which might be caused by advertising. In my view, no case has been made that children are at risk. Furthermore, even if I could reach another conclusion, I would be of the view that the restriction fails on the issue of proportionality. A total prohibition of advertising aimed at children below an arbitrarily fixed age makes no attempt at the achievement of proportionality.

2.5 Questions

1. Have the courts defined the scope of s. 2(b) too broadly? Why? Why not?
2. Is the colouring of margarine so that it resembles butter an act of expression?
3. Why does the court distinguish, in its s. 2(b) analysis, between laws that are intended to restrict expression and laws that, while not intended to restrict expression, may (at least in some cases) have the effect of doing so?
4. Does it make sense to adopt a content-neutral approach when defining the scope of s.2(b) but under s.1 to follow a “contextual” approach (determining that some forms of expression of more valuable than others) when assessing limits under s.1? Why do you think the courts have taken such an approach?
5. In Irwin Toy the court says it is balancing the speech rights of the company against the interests of children in not being manipulated. Is that what it does?
6. To what extent should a court take into account harm to business interests when deciding whether a limit on expression is justified? Should the court have done so in Dolphin Delivery?

3 Forms of expression

3.1 Commercial expression

Several arguments have been made for excluding commercial advertising from the scope of freedom of expression. The one most frequently made is that freedom of expression is valued because of its contribution to democratic government, and so its protection does not extend to commercial speech/advertising and other forms of speech that do not address political concerns. However, the Canadian courts have held that the value of the freedom also rests on its contribution to individual self-realization and the advancement of truth or knowledge and so the freedom’s protection is not confined to political speech.

The other argument against the protection of commercial speech/advertising is that freedom of expression is valued for its contribution to individual self-expression or self-realization and so does not protect advertising and other forms of corporate promotion. Because a commercial speaker will say whatever they think will most effectively sell their product, they are not engaged in self-expression. The Supreme Court of Canada, however, rejected this argument for the exclusion of commercial advertising from the scope of freedom of expression, because, in the court’s view, advertising may sometimes provide information that enables audience members “to make informed economic choices, an important aspect of individual self-fulfillment and personal autonomy” (Ford v. Quebec, 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712, 767).

While the Supreme Court of Canada has said that advertising falls within the scope of s. 2(b) of the Charter, it has also said that it does not lie at the core of the freedom and that, in comparison to other forms of expression, its restriction may be easier to justify under s. 1. In Rocket v. RCDS (1990), for example, McLachlin J observed that the motivation behind commercial expression is “primarily economic” and that “the loss” that censorship might cause “is merely loss of profit, and not loss of opportunity to participate in the political process or the ‘marketplace of ideas,’ or to realize one’s spiritual or artistic self-fulfillment” (Rocket v. RCDS 1990, 247). It followed then that “restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b)” (Rocket v. RCDS, 1990 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 232, 247). However, McLachlin J recognized that while commercial expression may be “designed only to increase profits,” it may also play “an important role in consumer choice” (Rocket v. RCDS 1990, 247). The value of commercial (profit-motivated) expression then will depend on its contribution to the listener’s interests.

3.1.1 Case notes: Ford, Devine, and the “Prostitution Reference”

In Ford v. Quebec, 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712, and its companion case, Devine v. Quebec, 1988 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 790, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a Quebec law that required the use of French on commercial signs and prohibited the use of other languages. The court found that both the requirement of French and the prohibition of other languages violated s. 2(b). However, the court went on to decide that the requirement of French was justified under s. 1, while the prohibition of other languages was not. The court defined the scope of the freedom broadly so that it includes commercial expression, because “[o]ver and above its intrinsic value as expression, commercial expression … plays a significant role in enabling individuals to make informed economic choices” (Ford at 767). The court also held that s. 2(b) protects both the content (the message) and the form (the medium) of expression, including the speaker’s choice of language. The court recognized “that language is not merely a means or a medium of expression; it colours the content and meaning of expression” (Ford at 748). Finally, the court held that the freedom is violated when an individual is prevented from communicating in the language of her/his choice, but also when she/he is compelled to communicate in another language.

At the s. 1 stage of its analysis, the court in Ford found that the protection and preservation of the French language in Quebec was “a serious and legitimate” policy, of sufficient importance to support a restriction on freedom of expression. The court thought that maintaining a French visage linguistique in Quebec was sufficiently important to justify a restriction on the individual’s freedom of expression. A visage linguistique that is predominantly French encourages anglophone Quebeckers and nonfrancophone immigrants to learn the majority language, and it confirms to “young and ambitious Francophones” that success can be achieved in the French language and that it is not necessary to put aside their language in order to advance in business (Ford at 778). While the court accepted that the requirement of French on commercial signs was rationally connected to the goal of preserving the French language, it doubted that the prohibition of other languages was rationally connected to this goal. The court had before it a wide range of studies and statistics that showed the precarious position of the French language in Canada, the result of a declining birth rate and growing non-francophone immigration. The court, however, thought that these materials did not demonstrate that the prohibition of other languages was necessary: “That specific question is simply not addressed by the materials” (Ford at 779). According to the court, even if the prohibition did have some impact, there were other, more effective ways to achieve this goal that were less restrictive of freedom of expression. The court concluded that compelling French on signs is justified, but that prohibiting other languages is not.

In Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123 the Supreme Court of Canada held that the criminal prohibition on “communicating or attempting to communicate with any person in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute” breached s. 2(b) of the Charter but was a justified restriction under s.1. A plurality of the court in a judgment written by Dickson CJ thought that the purpose of the law was to remove solicitation from the streets “and out of public view”. In his s.1 analysis Dickson CJ found that “[p]ublic solicitation for the purposes of prostitution is closely associated with street congestion and noise, oral harassment of non-participants and general detrimental effects on passers-by or bystanders, especially children [and that] … the eradication of the nuisance-related problems caused by street solicitation is a pressing and substantial concern." In deciding that the ban satisfied the other elements of the Oakes test, Dickson CJ considered "the nature of the expression". He found that "communications regarding an economic transaction of sex for money lie at, or even near, the core of the guarantee of freedom of expression."

3.1.2 Rocket v. Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario

Rocket v. Royal College of Dental Surgeons of Ontario*, 1990 CanLII 121 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 232

The judgment of the Court was delivered by:

MCLACHLIN J. -- The issue in this case is whether restrictions on advertising imposed by the College of Dental Surgeons on its members infringe the guarantee of freedom of expression

The Background

Dr. Howard Rocket and Dr. Brian Price are dentists practising their profession in Ontario. They were prominently featured in an advertisement [for Holiday Inn] published in a number of Canadian magazines and newspapers … As a result of their participation in this advertising campaign, Dr. Rocket and Dr. Price were charged with violating ss. 37(39) and (40) of Regulation 447, R.R.O. 1980, made pursuant to the Health Disciplines Act. …

Section 37(39) classifies as professional misconduct all advertising not expressly permitted by the subsection. It restricts not only the means and manner of advertising, but the content, which is limited to the name, address and telephone number (and on business cards, the office hours) of the dentist. Section 37(40) is general, prohibiting any conduct which would reasonably be regarded as "disgraceful, dishonourable or unprofessional".

I. The Regulation of Professional Advertising and Freedom of Expression -- General Considerations

The first question is whether the protection conferred by s. 2(b) applies to commercial speech, such as advertising. The argument against applying s. 2(b) to commercial speech rests on the proposition that the Charter was not intended to protect economic interests. This argument has been rejected by this Court on the ground that advertising involves more than economics. In Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1988 CanLII 19 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 712, where the issue was the constitutionality of a provincial law restricting the language of advertising, the Court noted advertising's intrinsic value as expression, the protection afforded to the recipients of advertising as well as the advertisers, and the importance of fostering informed economic choices to individual fulfillment and autonomy. Hence in Ford and subsequently in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, commercial advertising was held to be protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Although it has been clearly held that commercial expression does not fall outside of the ambit of s. 2(b), the fact that expression is commercial is not necessarily without constitutional significance. Regulation of advertising may offend the guarantee of free expression in s. 2(b) of the Charter, but this does not end the inquiry. The further question of whether the infringement can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter must be considered. It is at this stage that the competing values -- the value of the limitation and the value of free expression – are weighed in the context of the case. Part of the context, in the case of regulation of advertising, is the fact that the expression at issue is wholly within the commercial sphere.

II. Does the Regulation Offend the Guarantee of Freedom of Expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter?

The decisions of this Court in Ford and Irwin Toy suggest the following considerations in determining if s. 2(b) has been infringed.

The first question is whether professional advertising constitutes expressive activity under s. 2(b) of the Charter. The test is whether it aims to convey a meaning: Irwin Toy. Clearly professional advertising meets this test.

The second question is whether the expressive activity limited by the Regulation is excluded from s. 2(b) because it takes a prohibited form. … Section 37(39) of the Regulation prohibits advertising which takes perfectly usual and acceptable forms. …

The third question is whether s. 37(39) of the Regulation has as its purpose the restriction of expression by singling out meanings which are not to be conveyed: Irwin Toy. In other words, is the purpose of the section to restrict the content of expression? The answer to this question must be affirmative. Section 37(39) prohibits not only the manner in which dentists advertise, but what information they may convey to the public by advertising. I conclude that s. 37(39) of the Regulation infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter by prohibiting legitimate forms of expression and by purposefully limiting the content of that expression.

III. Is the Regulation Justified under s. 1 of the Charter?

While the Canadian approach does not apply special tests to restrictions on commercial expression, our method of analysis does permit a sensitive, case-oriented approach to the determination of their constitutionality. Placing the conflicting values in their factual and social context when performing the s. 1 analysis permits the courts to have regard to special features of the expression in question. As Wilson J. notes in Edmonton Journal v. Alberta (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 1326, not all expression is equally worthy of protection. Nor are all infringements of free expression equally serious.

The expression limited by this regulation is that of dentists who wish to impart information to patients or potential patients. Their motive for doing so is, in most cases, primarily economic. Conversely, their loss, if prevented from doing so, is merely loss of profit, and not loss of opportunity to participate in the political process or the "marketplace of ideas", or to realize one's spiritual or artistic self-fulfillment: see Irwin Toy, supra, at p. 976. This suggests that restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b).

On the other hand, it cannot be denied that expression of this kind does serve an important public interest by enhancing the ability of patients to make informed choices. Furthermore, the choice of a dentist must be counted as a relatively important consumer decision. To the extent, then, that this regulation denies or restricts access of consumers to information that is necessary or relevant to their choice of dentist, the infringement of s. 2(b) cannot be lightly dismissed.

These two opposing factors -- that the expression is designed only to increase profit, and that the expression plays an important role in consumer choice -- will be present in most if not all cases of commercial expression. Their precise mix, however, will vary greatly, which is why I believe it is inadvisable to create a special and standardized test for restrictions on commercial expression, as has been done in the United States. In Irwin Toy, for example, the majority did not emphasize the consumer choice aspect, because the expression in question was advertising aimed at children, and the majority clearly felt that protection of consumer choice in children was much less important than it would be in adults. That left the relatively weak value of protecting the appellant's interest in advertising to increase profits to be pitted against the strong countervailing value of protecting children from economic exploitation.

The majority in Irwin Toy also identified another factor that will be present in many cases of regulation of commercial expression. They suggested that substantial latitude should be given to legislatures that act to protect a vulnerable group, or to mediate between competing groups, distinguishing this type of legislation from that in which the state appears as antagonist to the individual (such as traditional criminal law). In the case at bar, it must be recognized that the element of consumer choice is more significant than it was in Irwin Toy. But in another sense, there are parallels. Consumers of dental services would be highly vulnerable to unregulated advertising. As non-specialists, they would lack the ability to evaluate competing claims as to the quality of different dentists. Indeed, the practice of dentistry, like other professions, calls for so much exercise of subjective personal judgment that claims about the quality of different dentists may be inherently incapable of verification. Furthermore, the choice of a dentist is, as noted above, a relatively important one. The consuming public would thus be far more vulnerable to unregulated advertising from dental professionals than it would be to unregulated advertising from manufacturers or suppliers of many other, more standardized, goods or services. The fact that the provincial legislature here acted to protect a vulnerable group argues in favour of viewing its attempted compromise with some deference. With these considerations in mind, I now turn to the application of the s. 1 test.

B. Application of the Test

The Objective of the Regulation

It is difficult to overstate the importance in our society of the proper regulation of our learned professions. Indeed, it is not disputed that the provinces have a legitimate interest in regulating professional advertising. The maintenance of professionalism and the protection of the public are at the heart of such regulations.

I have no difficulty in concluding that it is essential to accord to professional societies the power to regulate the methods by which their members advertise, even though this may infringe the freedom of expression guaranteed to their members by s. 2(b) of the Charter. The only question is whether the regulation here in question meets the second branch of the test under s. 1 -- whether the particular limit in question is reasonable and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

Whether the Particular Limit is Reasonable and Demonstrably Justified

The first question is whether s. 37(39) is rationally connected to its objective. For the reasons I have given, I think it is. The objectives of promoting professionalism and avoiding irresponsible and misleading advertising will clearly be furthered by s. 37(39).

The second question is whether the means used impair the freedom as little as possible. It is here that difficulties arise. Section 37(39) is very broadly drafted. It starts with an absolute prohibition on all advertising, going on to set out exceptions. It is easy to think of examples of expression not falling within the exceptions which should clearly be permitted. For example, it is conceded that dentists should be able to advertise their hours of operation and the languages they speak, information which would be useful to the public and present no serious danger of misleading the public or undercutting professionalism.

Such examples equally suggest that the third requirement -- that there be proportionality between the effect of the legislative measure and the objective -- is not met. The effect of s. 37(39) is clearly to prohibit expression which in no way furthers its objectives. The aims of promoting professionalism and preventing irresponsible and misleading advertising on matters not susceptible of verification do not require the exclusion of much of the speech which is prohibited by s. 37(39). In the result, the effect of the impugned provision is disproportionate to its objectives. Moreover, the value served by free expression in the case of professional advertising is not purely the enhancement of the advertiser's opportunity to profit, as was the case in Irwin Toy. The public has an interest in obtaining information as to dentists' office hours, the languages they speak, and other objective facts relevant to their practice -- information which s. 37(39) prohibits dentists from conveying by advertising. Useful information is restricted without justification. These considerations satisfy me that the adverse effect of infringement of s. 2(b) in this case outweighs the benefits conferred by the legislation.

I conclude that s. 37(39) of the Regulations cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

3.1.3 RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General)

RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199

MCLACHLIN J. (Sopinka and Major JJ.) -- At issue in these cases is the validity of the Tobacco Products Control Act, S.C. 1988, c. 20 (the "Act"), a law which imposes a ban on all advertising of tobacco products in the Canadian media and requires tobacco manufacturers to print unattributed health warnings on the packages of all tobacco products.

[The requirement that tobacco manufactures include health warnings on product packaging is considered in Section 4 of this chapter, Compelled Expression.]

123 … I agree with my colleague, Justice La Forest, that Parliament may impose advertising bans … on tobacco products under its criminal law power.

124 The Charter guarantees free expression, a guarantee which has been held to extend to commercial speech such as advertising… I agree with La Forest J. that the prohibition on advertising and promotion of tobacco products constitutes a violation of the right to free expression as the Attorney General conceded. …

125 The only remaining question is whether these infringements of the right of free expression are saved under s. 1 of the Charter, as being reasonable and "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society". …

1 The Test for Justification under Section 1 of the Charter

(c)Applying the Oakes Factors -- Context, Deference to Parliament, Standard of Proof and the Trial Judge's Findings

...

138 [W]hile I agree with La Forest J. that context, deference and a flexible and realistic standard of proof are essential aspects of the s. 1 analysis, these concepts should be used as they have been used by this Court in previous cases. They must not be attenuated to the point that they relieve the state of the burden the Charter imposes of demonstrating that the limits imposed on our constitutional rights and freedoms are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society.

(d) The Objective of the Limit on Free Expression

...

144 … The objective of the advertising ban and trade mark usage restrictions must be to prevent people in Canada from being persuaded by advertising and promotion to use tobacco products. … [This] constitute[s an] important objective[], although the significance of the targeted decrease in consumption is reduced by the government's estimate that despite the ban, 65 percent of the Canadian magazine market will contain tobacco advertisements, given that the ban applies only to Canadian media and not to imported publications.

146 While the limited objective of reducing tobacco-associated health risks by reducing advertising-related consumption … is less significant than the broad objective of protecting Canadians generally from the risks associated with tobacco use, it nevertheless constitutes an objective of sufficient importance to justify overriding the right of free expression guaranteed by the Charter. Even a small reduction in tobacco use may work a significant benefit to the health of Canadians and justify a properly proportioned limitation of right of free expression.

(ii) Rational Connection

153 As a first step in the proportionality analysis, the government must demonstrate that the infringements of the right of free expression worked by the law are rationally connected to the legislative goal of reducing tobacco consumption. It must show a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic. To put it another way, the government must show that the restriction on rights serves the intended purpose. …

154 The causal relationship between the infringement of rights and the benefit sought may sometimes be proved by scientific evidence showing that as a matter of repeated observation, one affects the other. Where, however, legislation is directed at changing human behaviour, as in the case of the Tobacco Products Control Act, the causal relationship may not be scientifically measurable. In such cases, this Court has been prepared to find a causal connection between the infringement and benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic, without insisting on direct proof of a relationship between the infringing measure and the legislative objective: R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, at pp. 768 and 777; R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452, at p. 503. …

156 This leaves the question of whether there is less direct evidence that suggests as a matter of "reason" or "logic" that advertising bans and package warnings lead to a reduction in tobacco use. The evidence relied upon by La Forest J. in support of rational connection falls into this category. Without duplicating his thorough review, it may be seen as consisting largely of evidence of advertising practices as well as the assumptions and conclusions of bodies concerned with reducing the health risk associated with tobacco use.

158 To this the tobacco companies reply that their advertising is directed not at increasing the size of the total market but at obtaining a larger share of the existing market. The evidence indicates that one of the thrusts of the advertising programs of tobacco companies is securing a larger market share, but there is also evidence suggesting that advertising is used to increase the total market. … [W]hile purely informational advertising may not increase the total market, lifestyle advertising may, as a matter of common sense, be seen as having a tendency to discourage those who might otherwise cease tobacco use from doing so. … All this taken together with the admittedly inconclusive scientific evidence is sufficient to establish on a balance of probabilities a link based on reason between certain forms of advertising, warnings and tobacco consumption.

159 On the other hand, there does not appear to be any causal connection between the objective of decreasing tobacco consumption and the absolute prohibition on the use of a tobacco trade mark on articles other than tobacco products which is mandated by s. 8 of the Act. There is no causal connection based on direct evidence, nor is there, in my view, a causal connection based in logic or reason. It is hard to imagine how the presence of a tobacco logo on a cigarette lighter, for example, would increase consumption; yet, such use is banned. I find that s. 8 of the Act fails the rational connection test.

(iii) Minimal Impairment

160 As the second step in the proportionality analysis, the government must show that the measures at issue impair the right of free expression as little as reasonably possible in order to achieve the legislative objective. The impairment must be "minimal", that is, the law must be carefully tailored so that rights are impaired no more than necessary. The tailoring process seldom admits of perfection and the courts must accord some leeway to the legislator. If the law falls within a range of reasonable alternatives, the courts will not find it overbroad merely because they can conceive of an alternative which might better tailor objective to infringement…

On the other hand, if the government fails to explain why a significantly less intrusive and equally effective measure was not chosen, the law may fail.

162 … [T]he prohibition on advertising contained in s. 4 of the Act … bans all forms of advertising of Canadian tobacco products while explicitly exempting all foreign advertising of non-Canadian products which are sold in Canada. It extends to advertising which arguably produces benefits to the consumer while having little or no conceivable impact on consumption. Purely informational advertising, simple reminders of package appearance, advertising for new brands and advertising showing relative tar content of different brands -- all these are included in the ban. Smoking is a legal activity yet consumers are deprived of an important means of learning about product availability to suit their preferences and to compare brand content with an aim to reducing the risk to their health.

163 As this Court has observed before, it will be more difficult to justify a complete ban on a form of expression than a partial ban … Where, as here, no evidence is adduced to show that a partial ban would be less effective than a total ban, the justification required by s. 1 to save the violation of free speech is not established.

164 As noted in my analysis of rational connection, while one may conclude as a matter of reason and logic that lifestyle advertising is designed to increase consumption, there is no indication that purely informational or brand preference advertising would have this effect. The government had before it a variety of less intrusive measures when it enacted the total ban on advertising, including: a partial ban which would allow information and brand preference advertising; a ban on lifestyle advertising only; measures such as those in Quebec's Consumer Protection Act, R.S.Q., c. P-40.1, to prohibit advertising aimed at children and adolescents; and labelling requirements only (which Health and Welfare believed would be preferable to an advertising ban … In my view, any of these alternatives would be a reasonable impairment of the right to free expression, given the important objective and the legislative context.

165 These considerations suggest that the advertising ban imposed by s. 4 of the Act may be more intrusive of freedom of expression than is necessary to accomplish its goals. Indeed, Health and Welfare proposed less-intrusive regulation instead of a complete prohibition on advertising. Why then, did the government adopt such a broad ban? The record provides no answer to this question. The government presented no evidence in defence of the total ban, no evidence comparing its effects to less invasive bans.

167 Not only did the government present no evidence justifying its choice of a total ban, it also presented no argument before us on the point. The appellants argued that there were undisclosed alternatives to a complete ban. The Attorney General's factum offered no response. Instead, the Attorney General contented himself with the bland statement that a complete ban is justified because Parliament "had to balance competing interests" somehow. Its response to the minimal impairment argument is not evidence, but a simple assertion that Parliament has the right to set such limits as it chooses ...

170 … [J]ust as care must be taken not to overvalue the legislative objective beyond its actual parameters, so care must be taken not to undervalue the expression at issue. Commercial speech, while arguably less important than some forms of speech, nevertheless should not be lightly dismissed. … Tobacco consumption has not been banned in Canada. Yet the advertising ban deprives those who lawfully choose to smoke of information relating to price, quality and even health risks associated with different brands….

171 … While this Court has stated that restrictions on commercial speech may be easier to justify than other infringements, no link between the claimant's motivation and the degree of protection has been recognized. Book sellers, newspaper owners, toy sellers -- all are linked by their shareholders' desire to profit from the corporation's business activity, whether the expression sought to be protected is closely linked to the core values of freedom of expression or not. In my view, motivation to profit is irrelevant to the determination of whether the government has established that the law is reasonable or justified as an infringement of freedom of expression.

(iv) Proportionality Between the Effects of the Legislation and the Objective

175 Having found the requirement of minimum impairment is not satisfied for ss. 4 and 9 of the Act, it is unnecessary to proceed to the final stage of the proportionality analysis under s. 1 -- balancing the negative effects of the infringement of rights against the positive benefits associated with the legislative goal. …

2 Remedy

176 I have found ss. 4, 8 and 9 of the Tobacco Products Control Act constitute unjustified infringements on free expression. These provisions spearhead the scheme under the Act and cannot be severed cleanly from other provisions dealing with promotion and trade mark usage, ss. 5 and 6. I would consequently hold that ss. 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9 are inconsistent with the Charter and hence are of no force or effect by reason of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

...

The following are the reasons delivered by

179 IACOBUCCI J. --

182 … I do not believe that the Act minimally impairs the appellants' s. 2(b) Charter rights. …

[A]lthough I concur with many of Justice McLachlin's general conclusions, I differ somewhat with her s. 1 analysis and proposed remedy and therefore prefer to express my own reasons.

186 Minimal impairment analysis requires this Court to consider whether the legislature turned its mind to alternative and less rights-impairing means to promote the legislative goal in question. In these appeals, I am concerned by the fact that the Attorney General of Canada chose to withhold from the factual record evidence related to the options it had considered as alternatives to the total ban it chose to put in place. … I am reluctant to permit the justification of a conceded constitutional violation because of the inability of a party to the litigation to have pursued all possible avenues to obtain the non-disclosed information. These cases are of wide public interest constitutional litigation in which the government should remain non-adversarial and make full disclosure. Without this requirement, courts will be constrained to decide the constitutionality of legislation without full information. In any event, the burden of proof at the s. 1 stage lies solely with the government.

188 In my opinion, the question in these appeals is not whether a partial prohibition (the lesser rights-impairing approach) would be acceptable only if there were information establishing that some forms of advertising do not stimulate consumption. On the contrary, it is the total prohibition (the full rights-impairing option) that is only constitutionally acceptable if information is provided that such a total prohibition is necessary in order for the legislation to achieve a pressing and substantial goal. When, as in the case at bar, the evidence is unclear whether a partial prohibition is as effective as a full prohibition, the Charter requires that the legislature enact the partial denial of the implicated Charter right. In the absence of the discharge of this evidentiary burden (which is to be wholly borne by the government), the least rights-impairing option is to be preferred. Although tobacco advertising as a whole certainly affects consumption, the evidence is unclear whether all types of tobacco ads affect consumption. I believe that some attention must be paid to whether the legislature endeavoured to differentiate the harmful advertising from the benign advertising before it decided to ban all advertising or sought to identify whether, as claimed by the appellants, informational and brand-name advertising do not have the effects that the Act seeks to curb.

191 At this juncture, I should like to offer some indication of what sorts of measures would, in my mind, have survived Charter scrutiny. As I have already mentioned, it is clear that health warnings can and should be placed on the packages, but the strictures of the Charter necessitate that they be attributed to their author, in all likelihood Health and Welfare Canada. Regarding the advertising ban, it is clear to me that an effort could have been made to regulate tobacco advertising along the lines of alcohol advertising. Given that the tobacco companies had agreed as early as 1972 (through the Voluntary Code) to refrain from advertising on television and radio, these regulations would only involve advertising in the print media anyway. Alternatively, as evidenced in some of the testimony at trial, partial bans in the order of prohibitions on lifestyle advertising only and limitations on advertising aimed at adolescents could have been given more constructive attention. The main point I wish to make is that in this case we are faced with a total and absolute ban on advertising without a justifiable basis for it. Perhaps proof exists for such a ban, but in my view the record does not establish it.

192 In the end, I would allow these appeals, with costs throughout to the appellants. For the reasons set out above, ss. 4, 5, 6, 8, and 9 of the Act should be struck. However, I am of the mind, for the reasons I advanced in Egan, supra, that this, too, is the appropriate case for a suspensive declaration of invalidity of one year. I thus disagree with McLachlin J. in terms of the remedy. Immediately striking down the legislation would permit the tobacco companies the untrammelled ability to advertise until minimally impairing legislation is drafted; the suspensive veto would permit the government to design such legislation while the status quo remains in force. In my view, that is warranted in light of the deleterious effects of tobacco products on those who use them and on society generally.

[La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier and Cory JJ. dissenting found that the infringement was justifiable under s. 1 – that protecting Canadians from the health risks associated with tobacco use, and informing them about these risks, is a pressing and substantial objective.]

[Lamer C.J. and La Forest, L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Cory and Iacobucci JJ.: held that the law was validly enacted under the criminal law power. (Sopinka and Major JJ. dissenting*).*]

3.1.4 Canada (Attorney General) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp.

Canada (Attorney General) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp*., [2007] 2 SCR 610, 2007 SCC 30

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

I. Overview

1 These appeals concern the constitutionality of Canada's laws on tobacco advertising and promotion, under the Tobacco Act, S.C. 1997, c. 13, and the Tobacco Products

Information Regulations, SOR/2000-272 ("TPIR"). …

2 The case pits tobacco manufacturers against the Attorney General of Canada, who is supported by a number of provincial Attorneys General and the Canadian Cancer Society. The tobacco manufacturers, at this stage of the litigation, challenge six aspects of the legislative and regulatory scheme: (1) its effect on funded scientific publications; (2) its provisions dealing with false and erroneous promotion; (3) its provisions relating to advertising appealing to young persons; (4) its ban on lifestyle advertising; (5) its ban on sponsorship promotion; and (6) its regulatory requirement that health warning labels occupy 50 percent of tobacco packaging. [This last issue is addressed in Section E, Compelled Speech].

4 I conclude that properly interpreted, the legislative and regulatory provisions at issue do not unjustifiably infringe s. 2(b) of the Charter and should be upheld, for the reasons that follow.

6 In 1995, this Court struck down the advertising provisions of the Tobacco Products Control Act (S.C. 1988, c. 20): RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199. This Act broadly prohibited all advertising and promotion of tobacco products, subject to specific exceptions, and required affixing unattributed warning labels on tobacco product packaging. The majority of the Court in that case held that the provisions limited free expression and that the government had failed to justify the limitations under s. 1 of the Charter. In particular, the government, by failing to show that less intrusive measures were not available, had failed to establish that the limits met the requirement of minimal impairment developed in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103 (McLachlin J., at paras. 163 and 165, and Iacobucci J., at para. 191). While the majority agreed that s. 1 justification on issues such as this does not require scientifically precise proof, it found that the absence of virtually any proof was fatal to the government's case. …

7 In response to the Court's decision in RJR, Parliament enacted the Tobacco Act and Regulations at issue on these appeals. The scheme of the new legislation, in broad terms, involved permitting information and brand-preference advertising, while forbidding lifestyle advertising and promotion, advertising appealing to young persons, and false or misleading advertising or promotion. … It represented a genuine attempt by Parliament to craft controls on advertising and promotion that would meet its objectives as well as the concerns expressed by the majority of this Court in RJR.

8 The government's response to the inevitable challenge to the new scheme, when it came, also reflected the Court's decision in RJR. The government presented detailed and copious evidence in support of its contention that where the new legislation posed limits on free expression, those limits were demonstrably justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

9 Parliament was assisted in its efforts to craft and justify appropriately tailored controls on tobacco advertising and promotion by increased understanding of the means by which tobacco manufacturers seek to advertise and promote their products and by new scientific insights into the nature of tobacco addiction and its consequences. … We now know that half of smokers will die of tobacco-related diseases and that the costs to the public health system are enormous. We also know that tobacco addiction is one of the hardest addictions to conquer and that many addicts try to quit time and time again, only to relapse.

10 Moreover, the international context has changed since 1995. Governments around the world are implementing anti-tobacco measures similar to and, in some cases, more restrictive than Canada's. The WHO Framework Convention on Tobacco Control (2003), 2302 U.N.T.S. 229, which Canada ratified in 2004, mandates a comprehensive ban on tobacco promotion, subject to state constitutional requirements. … Domestically, governments now widely accept that protecting the public from second-hand smoke is a legitimate policy objective. …

IV. The Legislative and Regulatory Scheme

18 The purposes of the Tobacco Act are "to provide a legislative response to a national public health problem of substantial and pressing concern ..." and, more particularly, "to protect the health of Canadians in light of conclusive evidence implicating tobacco use in the incidence of numerous debilitating and fatal diseases"; "to protect young persons and others from inducements to use tobacco products and the consequent dependence on them"; " to protect the health of young persons by restricting access to tobacco products"; and "to enhance public awareness of the health hazards of using tobacco products"…

19 The Tobacco Act seeks to accomplish these purposes by targeting "the four Ps" of tobacco marketing: product, price, point of sale and promotion. These appeals deal only with the fourth "P" — promotion — which is regulated under Part IV of the Act. In addition to the provisions impugned in these appeals, Part IV prohibits celebrity endorsements, regulates the distribution of branded accessories and non-tobacco products, prohibits sales promotions such as rebates, prizes and free samples, and regulates the retail display of tobacco products. The government chose the current structure of the legislation after extensive public consultation and after considering a number of alternatives.

37 The broad objective of the limitations on freedom of expression at issue in this case is to deal with the public health problem posed by tobacco consumption by protecting Canadians against debilitating and fatal diseases associated with tobacco consumption. More particularly, the Act seeks to enhance public awareness of the health hazards of using tobacco products and to protect the health of young people by restricting access to tobacco products: s. 4. …

40 Few cases have foundered on the requirement of rational connection. That, however, does not mean that this step is unimportant. The government must establish that the means it has chosen are linked to the objective. At the very least, it must be possible to argue that the means may help to bring about the objective. This was a problem in RJR, where the trial judge found that while the government had completely banned commercial advertising, it had not established that pure information or brand-preference advertising was connected to an increase in consumption. In the current Act, Parliament sought to avoid this difficulty by permitting information and brand-preference advertising, subject to exceptions.

46 Although cases are most often resolved on the issue of minimal impairment, the final inquiry into proportionality of effects is essential. It is the only place where the attainment of the objective may be weighed against the impact on the right. If rational connection and minimal impairment were to be met, and the analysis were to end there, the result might be to uphold a severe impairment on a right in the face of a less important objective.

47 As will be seen, this case, while argued mainly on the basis of minimal impairment, engages concerns relating to proportionality of effects. The potential benefits of decreasing tobacco use and discouraging young people from becoming addicted to it are high. On the other hand, a number of the deleterious effects on the right arguably fall at the low end of the spectrum of free expression. (The alleged ban on publication of scientific research is an exception.) When commercial expression is used, as alleged here, for the purposes of inducing people to engage in harmful and addictive behaviour, its value becomes tenuous.

2. False Promotion

58 Section 20 bans "false, misleading or deceptive" promotion, as well as promotion "likely to create an erroneous impression about the characteristics, health effects or health hazards of the tobacco product or its emissions".

….

61 The s. 1 inquiry into the justification of the ban imposed by s. 20 of the Act must be set in the factual context of a long history of misleading and deceptive advertising by the tobacco industry. The creative ability of the manufacturers to send positive messages about a product widely known to be noxious is impressive. In recent years, for example, manufacturers have used labels such as "additive free" and "100% Canadian tobacco" to convey the impression that their product is wholesome and healthful. Technically, the labels may be true. But their intent and effect is to falsely lull consumers into believing, as they ask for the package behind the counter, that the product they will consume will not harm them, or at any rate will harm them less than would other tobacco products, despite evidence demonstrating that products bearing these labels are in fact no safer than other tobacco products. The wording chosen by Parliament in s. 20 and its justification must be evaluated with this context in mind. Parliament's concern was to combat misleading false inferences about product safety and to promote informed, enlightened consumer choice.

63 … [T]he phrase "likely to create an erroneous impression" is directed at promotion that, while not literally false, misleading or deceptive in the traditional legal sense, conveys an erroneous impression about the effects of the tobacco product, in the sense of leading consumers to infer things that are not true. It represents an attempt to cover the grey area between demonstrable falsity and invitation to false inference that tobacco manufacturers have successfully exploited in the past.

64 The industry practice of promoting tobacco consumption by inducing consumers to draw false inferences about the safety of the products is widespread. This suggests that it is viewed by the industry as effective. Parliament has responded by banning promotion that is "likely to create an erroneous impression". This constitutes a limit on free expression. The only question is whether the limit is justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

66 The impugned phrase does not impair the right of free expression more than is necessary to achieve the objective. The words false, misleading or deceptive do not do the work assigned to the additional phrase, "likely to create an erroneous impression". Nor is it easy to find narrower words that would accomplish that task.

68 Finally, the impugned phrase meets the requirement of proportionality of effects. On the one hand, the objective is of great importance, nothing less than a matter of life or death for millions of people who could be affected, and the evidence shows that banning advertising by half-truths and by invitation to false inference may help reduce smoking. The reliance of tobacco manufacturers on this type of advertising attests to this. On the other hand, the expression at stake is of low value — the right to invite consumers to draw an erroneous inference as to the healthfulness of a product that, on the evidence, will almost certainly harm them. On balance, the effect of the ban is proportional.

69 I conclude that the ban on false promotion, and particularly on promotion "likely to create an erroneous impression", is justified under s. 1 of the Charter as a reasonable limit on free expression and that s. 20 of the Tobacco Act is constitutional.

3. Advertising and Promotion Appealing to Young Persons

70 The Tobacco Act uses three particular means of protecting young persons from tobacco advertising and promotion. The first consists of the placement restrictions, found in s. 22(2). The second is a ban on advertising that "could be construed on reasonable grounds to be appealing to young persons", found in s. 22(3). The third is a ban on the use of tobacco brand elements on non-tobacco products that are "associated with young persons or could be construed on reasonable grounds to be appealing to young persons": s. 27(a). The manufacturers challenge the second of these measures, the ban on advertising that "could be construed on reasonable grounds to be appealing to young persons": s. 22(3).

91 It is not disputed that Parliament's objective of preventing young people from being tempted to take up tobacco use and consequently becoming addicted is pressing and substantial. Nor is there doubt that a ban on advertising appealing to young persons is rationally connected to this goal.

94 … The prohibited speech is of low value. Information about tobacco products and the characteristics of brands may have some value to the consumer who is already addicted to tobacco. But it is not great. On the other hand, the beneficial effects of the ban for young persons and for society at large may be significant. … [W]that is prohibited is advertising that could be specifically appealing to young people. Moreover, the vulnerability of the young may justify measures that privilege them over adults in matters of free expression…

4. Lifestyle Advertising

96 Section 22(3) carves out from permitted information and brand-preference advertising under s. 22(2) two types of advertising: advertising that could appeal to young persons, just considered, and lifestyle advertising.

97 Section 22(4) defines lifestyle advertising as follows: "lifestyle advertising" means advertising that associates a product with, or evokes a positive or negative emotion about or image of, a way of life such as one that includes glamour, recreation, excitement, vitality, risk or daring.

107 How, then, is lifestyle advertising in s. 22(3) to be construed? First, the scheme of s. 22 as a whole must be considered. We start with the fact that s. 22(2) permits information and brand-preference advertising. Information advertising is relatively clear: it consists of factual information about the product. This does not exclude, however, the possibility that information may be so presented that it evokes a lifestyle. Brand-preference advertising under the Act is even broader. As noted above, the Act did not adopt the narrow concept of brand-preference advertising set forth in RJR. Rather, it adopted a definition of "advertising that promotes a tobacco product by means of its brand characteristics". As the Canadian Cancer Society argues, the concept of a "brand" is associated with a lifestyle; in marketing, brands are intangible images, usually associated with particular lifestyles.

114 … [T]he prohibition on lifestyle advertising is reasonable and demonstrably justified under s. 1 of the Charter. As with the other challenged provisions, the pressing and substantial nature of Parliament's objective is beyond challenge. The record is replete with examples of lifestyle advertisements promoting tobacco products. It amply establishes the power of such advertisements to induce non-smokers to begin to smoke and to increase tobacco consumption among addicted smokers. It also establishes the sophistication and subtlety of such advertising. Lifestyle advertising spans the spectrum from the bold association of the Marlboro man with cowboy culture to the subtle suggestion emerging from a cup of coffee or a bath scene that evokes tobacco use through learned prior imagery.

115 The sophistication and subtlety of lifestyle advertising are reflected in the means Parliament has chosen to deal with it. A ban on lifestyle advertising must catch not only clear associations, but subtle subliminal evocations. Hence the inclusion of advertising that "evokes a positive or negative emotion or image." There is a rational connection between this provision and Parliament's objective. Minimal impairment is also established. True information and brand-preference advertising continues to be permitted under s. 22(2). Such advertising crosses the line when it associates a product with a way of life or uses a lifestyle to evoke an emotion or image that may, by design or effect, lead more people to become addicted or lead people who are already addicted to increase their tobacco use. Finally, the proportionality of the effects is clear. The suppressed expression — the inducement of increased tobacco consumption — is of low value, compared with the significant benefits in lower rates of consumption and addiction that the ban may yield.

116 The challenge of dealing with today's sophisticated advertising of tobacco products is not insignificant. The distinction between information and brand-preference advertising directed to market share, on the one hand, and advertising directed to increased consumption and new smokers, on the other, is difficult to capture in legal terms. Parliament in its wisdom has chosen to take the task on. Properly interpreted, the law it has adopted meets the requirements of justification under s. 1 of the Charter.

R. v. Guignard*, 2002 SCC 14

English version of the judgment of the Court delivered by

LEBEL J. –

I. Introduction

1 The issue in this appeal is whether the provisions of the by-laws of the City of Saint-Hyacinthe governing the posting of signs violate s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The appellant, Roger Guignard, was convicted in the Municipal Court of erecting a sign on one of his buildings expressing his dissatisfaction with the services of an insurance company.

2 The courts below found that the municipal by-laws prohibited the type of sign erected by Mr. Guignard and that, although this prohibition infringed freedom of expression, it was justified by s. 1 of the Charter. For the following reasons, I would allow the appeal, quash Mr. Guignard's conviction and enter an acquittal with respect to the offences with which he was charged.

II. Origin of the Case

3 In 1996, Guignard owned a property within the City of Saint-Hyacinthe. An insurance policy issued by a major company, the Commerce Group, covered the risks relating to this property. A loss occurred in May 1996 and the appellant claimed an indemnity from his insurer. Payment was delayed and Mr. Guignard eventually became impatient. He placed a sign on another of his buildings that eloquently expressed his dissatisfaction. On August 8, 1996, in response to a complaint, a municipal inspector ordered the appellant to remove the sign within 24 hours. According to the inspector, the sign contravened the zoning by-law of the City, which prohibited the erection of advertising signs outside an industrial area (Règlement d'urbanisme no 1200 de la Ville de Saint-Hyacinthe, s. 14.1.5(p)). The sign read as follows:

4 When he refused to comply, the municipality charged Guignard with contravening the by-law. …

5 At the same time, Mr. Guignard's insurer applied to the civil courts for an interlocutory injunction order requiring the appellant to remove his sign. The Superior Court granted the application and ordered the sign removed. That judgment was set aside on March 10, 1998, by the Quebec Court of Appeal, which found that the sign was not defamatory in nature and that Mr. Guignard's freedom of expression must take precedence.

2.2.4 Definitions

Sign:

Any writing (letters, words, numbers), any pictorial representation (drawing, engraving, photograph, illustration, image), any emblem (slogan, symbol, trade mark), any flag (banner, pennant, standard, streamer), any advertising billboard or any other similar object or similar means that:

is attached to, is part of or is placed on or outside a building or on land; is used to notify, inform, announce, advertise or for other similar purposes.

Advertising sign:

Sign indicating at least the name of a company and drawing attention to a business, a product, a service or an entertainment carried on, sold or offered other than the property on which it is placed.

14.1.5 Prohibited Signs

...

The following signs are prohibited:

(p) advertising signs and advertising billboards, except those located in industrial zones.

21 In applying s. 2(b) of the Charter, this Court has recognized the substantial value of freedom of commercial expression. The need for such expression derives from the very nature of our economic system, which is based on the existence of a free market. The orderly operation of that market depends on businesses and consumers having access to abundant and diverse information. …

23 The decisions of this Court accordingly recognize that commercial enterprises have a constitutional right to engage in activities to inform and promote, by advertising. As we know and can attest, sometimes with mixed feelings, the ubiquitous presence of advertising is a defining characteristic of western societies. Usually, it attempts to convey a positive message to potential consumers. However, it sometimes involves comparisons and may even be negative. On the other hand, consumers also have freedom of expression. This sometimes takes the form of > "counter-advertising" to criticize a product or make negative comments about the services supplied. Within limits prescribed by the legal principles relating to defamation, every consumer enjoys this right. Consumers may express their frustration or disappointment with a product or service. Their freedom of expression in this respect is not limited to private communications intended solely for the vendor or supplier of the service. Consumers may share their concerns, worries or even anger with other consumers and try to warn them against the practices of a business. Given the tremendous importance of economic activity in our society, a consumer's "counter-advertising" assists in circulating information and protecting the interests of society just as much as does advertising or certain forms of political expression. This type of communication may be of considerable social importance, even beyond the merely commercial sphere.

> 24 "Counter-advertising" is not merely a reaction to commercial speech, and is not a form of expression derived from commercial speech. Rather, it is a form of the expression of opinion that has an important effect on the social and economic life of a society. It is a right not only of consumers, but of citizens.
> 25 In this respect, simple means of expression such as posting signs or distributing pamphlets or leaflets or, these days, posting messages on the Internet are the optimum means of communication for discontented consumers. The media are still often beyond their reach because of the cost. In Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), 1993 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 1084, this Court stressed the importance of signs as an effective and inexpensive means of communication for individuals and groups that do not have sufficient economic resources. Signs, which have been used for centuries to communicate political, artistic or economic information, sometimes convey forceful messages. Signs, in various forms, are thus a public, accessible and effective form of expressive activity for anyone who cannot undertake media campaigns. …
> 26 By restricting the right to use this optimum means of expression to certain designated places, the impugned by-law directly infringes freedom of expression. This infringement impacts especially on the freedom of expression of a person who does not have access to substantial financial resources. A limitation of this nature can in fact deprive that person of the only means of expression that are truly accessible to him or her. Even when a legislative or regulatory provision is neutral in appearance, it can have a major impact on the ability of a person or group to engage in expressive activity (see Irwin Toy, at pp. 974-75).
> E. Impact of the By-law
> 27 I readily concede that the impugned provisions of the zoning by-law were certainly not designed with a view to preventing a consumer or member of the public from engaging in "counter-advertising". However, the by-law prohibits the posting of advertising except in industrial zones or on the site where the commercial activity is carried on (Règlement d'urbanisme no 1200 de la Ville de Saint-Hyacinthe, s. 14.1.5(p)). The definition of "advertising sign" includes any kind of sign that refers to a particular business by name. The definition is clear in this regard. Section 2.2.4 defines an advertising sign as a [TRANSLATION] "sign showing at least a trade name and drawing attention to a business, a product, a service or an entertainment carried on, sold or offered on a property other than the property on which it is placed". If a sign includes a trade name, the by-law prohibits placing it elsewhere than in the location where the commercial activity takes place or in an industrial zone. No distinction is made in this regard between favourable advertising and negative advertising. If the by-law is applied literally, its effect is to make it impossible for any individual to post signs criticising the practices, products or services of a business. … Guignard has therefore established an infringement of his freedom of expression. It is now up to the municipality to establish that the by-law is reasonable and to show that it is consistent with the values of a free and democratic society, under s. 1 of the Charter.
> F. Justification
> 29 In this case, in addition to denying that the constitutional guarantee had in any way been violated, the respondent argued, in the alternative, that its by-law was justified under s. 1 of the Charter on the ground that it was designed to prevent visual pollution and driver distraction. The justification process is not limited to the objective defined. The other tests must also be met, including demonstration of a rational connection, minimal impairment and proportionality. An examination of the practical effects of the by-law shows that the respondent did not meet any of the tests involved in the justification process. To be sure, the prevention of visual pollution is a reasonable objective. The creation of zones is an appropriate urban planning exercise that is authorized by the Act and is very common in most municipalities. It is easy to understand the reasons that prompt municipalities not to allow any kind of sign, in any place and at any time. It is a matter of maintaining a pleasant environment for the residents. However, as it stands, the respondent's by-law prohibits only those signs that expressly indicate the trade name of a commercial enterprise in residential areas. All other types of signs of a more generic nature are exempt from the by-law. Thus, if Guignard had merely stated on his sign "Don't trust insurance companies" without anything further, or "Don't trust the insurance company located at this address", or "Purchase your insurance elsewhere than in Saint-Hyacinthe", his sign would have complied with the by-law, even though it was just as polluting from a visual point of view as a billboard bearing the trade name "Commerce Group". These difficulties illustrate the arbitrary nature of the ban and of the distinctions that underlie it.
> 30 On the question of minimal impairment, the by-law in question is not a reasonable solution … The by-law severely curtails Guignard's freedom to express his dissatisfaction with the practices of his insurance company publicly. It forces him to use advertising methods that presuppose the availability of adequate financial resources. Alternatively, it restricts him to private or virtually private communications such as distributing leaflets in the neighbourhood around his property, which is undoubtedly less effective, to convey to the public his opinion about the quality of his insurer's services.
> 31 Finally, the impact of the by-law on Guignard's freedom of expression is disproportionate to any benefit that it secures for the municipality. In this respect, we have seen that posting signs is an optimum means of expression for individuals (see Ramsden, at p. 1102). By limiting that means of expression, the by-law amounts to a serious and unjustified infringement of a form of expression that has been commonly used for a long time and is closely connected to the values underlying the protection of freedom of expression.
> 32 The only appropriate remedy in this case is a declaration that the provisions of the municipal by-law the appellant has challenged are invalid.

2. How does the court distinguish the result in JTI-Macdonald from that in RJR-Macdonald?

3. Does Justice LeBel in Guignard (para. 23) extend the protection of commercial speech beyond expression that benefits consumers to expression that benefits the interests of commercial enterprises? If so, is this justified, given the courts earlier decisions?
4. Is there an even stronger case for supporting the regulation of micro-targeted advertising online?

3.2 Election / political speech

3.2.1 Introduction

Political speech, because of its importance to democratic governance, is treated by the courts as "core" value expression, the restriction of which will be difficult to justify under s.1. It's restriction can still be justified, but the courts will apply the limitations test strictly, applying a less deferential standard under s. 1 than they do in the case of advertising and hate speech.

Nevertheless, in contrast to the US courts, Canadian courts have been willing to uphold limits on campaign spending, including spending by "third parties" – a person or entity that is not a candidate, a political party, or local riding association, such as a labour union, business association or civil society group. In Libman v. Quebec, 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 569, the Supreme Court of Canada considered a challenge to a Quebec law that set spending ceilings in provincial referendum campaigns. Quebec's Referendum Act established and funded two official referendum committees (a "yes" and a "no" committee) and imposed limits on the amount each committee could spend. During the referendum period, only the authorized agent of an official committee, or their delegate, could incur or authorize expenses. An official committee could authorize an affiliated group to spend a portion of the committee's spending allocation. However, unaffiliated individuals/groups were prohibited from spending in support of either side during the referendum campaign.

The Supreme Court accepted that the third-party spending ceilings breached s. 2(b). In the court's view "freedom of expression includes the right to employ any methods, other than violence, necessary for communication" (Libman at 594). While the court thought that spending limits could be justified, in this case the spending limits were overly restrictive. The total ban on third-party spending during a referendum campaign did not impair freedom of expression as little as was necessary to protect the integrity of the election process and so could not be justified under s.1. However, the court was clear that spending limits (that were less restrictive) are necessary to ensure "the democratic nature of referendums by promoting equality between the options" and promote "free and informed voting" (Libman 1997, 596). Ceilings are needed, said the court, to "prevent the most affluent from monopolizing election discourse and consequently depriving their opponents of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard" (Libman 1997, 599). In the court's view, unlimited spending would work against informed choice, allowing some positions to "bury" others (Libman 1997, 596).

A few years later, in Harper v Canada (AG), 2004 SCC 33, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld restrictions in the Canada Elections Act on spending by third parties during federal election campaigns. The act limited third-party spending on election advertising to $3,000 in a single riding and $150,000 nationally. The limits applied to advertising "that promotes or opposes a registered party or the election of a candidate" or that "takes a position on an issue with which a registered party or candidate is associated" (Canada Elections Act, s. 319). The court also upheld restrictions on any advertising by a third party on election day.

BASTARACHE J. —

50 At issue in this appeal is whether the third party spending provisions of the Canada Elections Act, S.C. 2000, c. 9, violate ss. 2(b), 2(d) and 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. To resolve this issue, the Court must reconcile the right to meaningfully participate in elections under s. 3 with the right to freedom of expression under s. 2(b)….

III. Relevant Statutory Provisions

57 … Part 17 of the [Canada Elections] Act, ss. 349 to 362, creates a scheme that limits the advertising expenses of individuals and groups who are not candidates or political parties. … The regime can be broadly divided into four parts. First, s. 350 limits election advertising expenses to $3,000 in a given electoral district and $150,000 nationally. "[E]lection advertising" is defined in s. 319 of the Act as follows:

> "election advertising" means the transmission to the public by any means during an election period of an advertising message that promotes or opposes a registered party or the election of a candidate, including one that takes a position on an issue with which a registered party or candidate is associated. For greater certainty, it does not include
> (a) the transmission to the public of an editorial, a debate, a speech, an interview, a column, a letter, a commentary or news;
> (b) the distribution of a book, or the promotion of the sale of a book, for no less than its commercial value, if the book was planned to be made available to the public
> regardless of whether there was to be an election;
> (c) the transmission of a document directly by a person or a group to their members, employees or shareholders, as the case may be; or
> (d) the transmission by an individual, on a non-commercial basis on what is commonly known as the Internet, of his or her personal political views.

Thus, the limits do not apply to third party advertising prior to the election period or to advertising which promotes an issue that is not associated with a candidate or political party.

The second part of the regime is closely related to s. 350 as it prohibits individuals or groups from splitting or colluding for the purposes of circumventing the election advertising limits. Third, the attribution, registration and disclosure provisions (ss. 352 to 357, 359, 360 and 362) require a third party to identify itself in all of its election advertising and, under certain circumstances, to appoint financial agents and auditors who are required to record expenses, to register with, and to report to the Chief Electoral Officer who, in turn, makes this information available to the public. Finally, although s. 323 is not strictly part of the third party electoral advertising regime, third parties are also subject to the advertising blackout on polling day.

66 The appellant rightly concedes that the limits on election advertising expenses infringe s. 2(b) of the Charter. Most third party election advertising constitutes political expression and therefore lies at the core of the guarantee of free expression. As discussed below, in some circumstances, third party election advertising may be less deserving of constitutional protection where it seeks to manipulate voters.

75 The central issue at this stage of the analysis is the nature and sufficiency of the evidence required for the Attorney General to demonstrate that the limits imposed on freedom of expression are reasonable and justifiable in a free and democratic society. …

(a) Contextual Factors

(i) The Nature of the Harm and the Inability to Measure It

77 The legislature is not required to provide scientific proof based on concrete evidence of the problem it seeks to address in every case. Where the court is faced with inconclusive or competing social science evidence relating the harm to the legislature's measures, the court may rely on a reasoned apprehension of that harm.

78 This Court has, in the absence of determinative scientific evidence, relied on logic, reason and some social science evidence in the course of the justification analysis in several cases …

79 Similarly, the nature of the harm and the efficaciousness of Parliament's remedy in this case is difficult, if not impossible, to measure scientifically. The harm which Parliament seeks to address can be broadly articulated as electoral unfairness. Several experts, as well as the Lortie Commission, concluded that unlimited third party advertising can undermine election fairness in several ways. First, it can lead to the dominance of the political discourse by the wealthy (Lortie Report, supra, at p. 326) … Second, it may allow candidates and political parties to circumvent their own spending limits through the creation of third parties (Lortie Report, at p. 15)…. Third, unlimited third party spending can have an unfair effect on the outcome of an election (Lortie Report, at pp. 15-16). Fourth, the absence of limits on third party advertising expenses can erode the confidence of the Canadian electorate who perceive the electoral process as being dominated by the wealthy. This harm is difficult, if not impossible, to measure because of the subtle ways in which advertising influences human behaviour; the influence of other factors such as the media and polls; and the multitude of issues, candidates and independent parties involved in the electoral process. In light of these difficulties, logic and reason assisted by some social science evidence is sufficient proof of the harm that Parliament seeks to remedy.

(ii) Vulnerability of the Group

80 Third party spending limits seek to protect two groups. First, the limits seek to protect the Canadian electorate by ensuring that it is possible to hear from all groups and thus promote a more informed vote. Generally, the Canadian electorate "must be presumed to have a certain degree of maturity and intelligence"; see Thomson Newspapers, supra, at para. 101. Where, however, third party advertising seeks to systematically manipulate the voter, the Canadian electorate may be seen as more vulnerable; see Thomson Newspapers, at para. 114.

81 The members of the second group protected by the legislation are candidates and political parties. The appellant argues that the provisions seek to ensure that candidates and political parties have an equal opportunity to present their positions to the electorate. As discussed in Figueroa, supra, at para. 41, all political parties, whether large or small, are "capable of acting as a vehicle for the participation of individual citizens in the public discourse that animates the determination of social policy". Thus, regardless of their size, political parties are important to the democratic process. Nevertheless, neither candidates nor political parties can be said to be vulnerable.

(iii) Subjective Fears and Apprehension of Harm

82 Perception is of utmost importance in preserving and promoting the electoral regime in Canada. Professor Aucoin emphasized that "[p]ublic perceptions are critical precisely because the legitimacy of the election regime depends upon how citizens assess the extent to which the regime advances the values of their electoral democracy" (emphasis in original). Electoral fairness is key. Where Canadians perceive elections to be unfair, voter apathy follows shortly thereafter.

(iv) The Nature of the Infringed Activity: Political Expression

84 Third party advertising is political expression. Whether it is partisan or issue-based, third party advertising enriches the political discourse (Lortie Report, supra, at p. 340). As such, the election advertising of third parties lies at the core of the expression guaranteed by the Charter and warrants a high degree of constitutional protection. …

85 In some circumstances, however, third party advertising will be less deserving of constitutional protection. Indeed, it is possible that third parties having access to significant financial resources can manipulate political discourse to their advantage through political advertising. … There is no evidence before the Court that indicates that third party advertising seeks to be manipulative. Nor is there any evidence that third parties wish to use their advertising dollars to smear candidates or engage in other forms of non-political discourse. Nevertheless, the danger that political advertising may manipulate or oppress the voter means that some deference to the means chosen by Parliament is warranted.

87 Under the egalitarian model of elections, Parliament must balance the rights and privileges of the participants in the electoral process: candidates, political parties, third parties and voters. Advertising expense limits may restrict free expression to ensure that participants are able to meaningfully participate in the electoral process. For candidates, political parties and third parties, meaningful participation means the ability to inform voters of their position. For voters, meaningful participation means the ability to hear and weigh many points of view. The difficulties of striking this balance are evident. Given the right of Parliament to choose Canada's electoral model and the nuances inherent in implementing this model, the Court must approach the justification analysis with deference. … In the end, the electoral system, which regulates many aspects of an election, including its duration and the control and reimbursement of expenses, reflects a political choice, the details of which are better left to Parliament.

88 On balance, the contextual factors favour a deferential approach to Parliament in determining whether the third party advertising expense limits are demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Given the difficulties in measuring this harm, a reasoned apprehension that the absence of third party election advertising limits will lead to electoral unfairness is sufficient.

(c) Is the Objective Pressing and Substantial?

91 The overarching objective of the third party election advertising limits is electoral fairness. Equality in the political discourse promotes electoral fairness and is achieved, in part, by restricting the participation of those who have access to significant financial resources. The more voices that have access to the political discourse, the more voters will be empowered to exercise their right in a meaningful and informed manner. Canadians understandably have greater confidence in an electoral system which ultimately encourages increased participation.

> 92 … More narrowly characterized, the objectives of the third party election advertising scheme are threefold: first, to promote equality in the political discourse; second, to protect the integrity of the financing regime applicable to candidates and parties; and third, to ensure that voters have confidence in the electoral process.
> 93 As discussed, the Attorney General of Canada does not need to provide evidence of actual harm to demonstrate that each objective is pressing and substantial … To require the Attorney General to produce definitive social science evidence establishing the causes of every area of social concern would be to place an unreasonably high onus on the Attorney General. In this case, the Attorney General adduced sufficient informed evidence of the importance of electoral regulation in our free and democratic society.
> 104 At this stage of the analysis, the Attorney General "must show a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic" … There is sufficient evidence establishing a rational connection between third party advertising expense limits and promoting equality in the political discourse, protecting the integrity of the financing regime applicable to candidates and parties, and maintaining confidence in the electoral process.
> 107 Where advertising influences the electorate, and those who have access to significant financial resources are able to purchase an unlimited amount of advertising, it follows that they will be able to dominate the electoral discourse to the detriment of others, both speakers and listeners. An upper limit on the amount that third parties can dedicate to political advertising curtails their ability to dominate the electoral debate. Thus, third party advertising expense limits are rationally connected to promoting equality in the political discourse.
> (e) Minimal Impairment
> 111 … In this case, the contextual factors indicate that the Court should afford deference to the balance Parliament has struck between political expression and meaningful participation in the electoral process.
> 118 Certainly, one can conceive of less impairing limits. Indeed, any limit greater than $150,000 would be less impairing. Nevertheless, s. 350 satisfies this stage of the Oakes analysis. The limits allow third parties to inform the electorate of their message in a manner that will not overwhelm candidates, political parties or other third parties. The limits preclude the voices of the wealthy from dominating the political discourse, thereby allowing more voices to be heard. The limits allow for meaningful participation in the electoral process and encourage informed voting. The limits promote a free and democratic society.
> 119 The final stage of the Oakes analysis requires the Court to weigh the deleterious effects against the salutary effects.
> 120 Section 350 has several salutary effects. It enhances equality in the political discourse. By ensuring that affluent groups or individuals do not dominate the political discourse, s. 350 promotes the political expression of those who are less affluent or less capable of obtaining access to significant financial resources and ensures that candidates and political parties who are subject to spending limits are not overwhelmed by third party advertising. Section 350 also protects the integrity of the candidate and political party spending limits by ensuring that these limits are not circumvented through the creation of phony third parties. Finally, s. 350 promotes fairness and accessibility in the electoral system and consequently increases Canadians' confidence in it.
> 121 The deleterious effect of s. 350 is that the spending limits do not allow third parties to engage in unlimited political expression. That is, third parties are permitted to engage in informational but not necessarily persuasive campaigns, especially when acting alone. When weighed against the salutary effects of the legislation, the limits must be upheld. … Accordingly, s. 350 should be upheld as a demonstrably justified limit in a free and democratic society.
> [McLachlin C.J. (Major and Binnie JJ) dissenting in part found that the infringement on the s.2(b) right was not proportionate the law's objectives. The spending limit, in their view, was so low that it amounted to a virtual ban on citizen participation in election debate.]

3.2.3 Case notes: Thomson Newspapers, Working Families

1. In Thomson Newspapers v Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 877, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down a federal ban on the publication of election campaign polls during the final days of the campaign. According to the federal government, the ban was necessary "to prevent the potentially distorting effect of public opinion survey results that are released late in the election campaign leaving insufficient time to assess their validity" (Thomson at 902). Bastarache J, for the majority, dismissed this argument. He wrote that polls might contain information useful to voters and that late poll results, in particular, might be useful to those who want to vote strategically (to vote for their second choice, if their first choice seems to have no chance of winning). In any event, argued Bastarache J, it is up to voters to decide what information they want to take into account when deciding how to vote: "If they feel that their votes are better informed as a result of having this information, then the ban not only interferes with their freedom of expression, but with their perception of the freeness and validity of their vote" (Thomson at 972).
2. Previously under federal election law it was an offence for a person to "knowingly make or publish a false statement of fact before or during an election about the personal character or conduct of candidate for the purpose of affecting the return of a candidate" (Canadian Constitution Foundation v. Canada (AG), 2021 ONSC 1224 at para 12). However, in 2018 the law was amended, so that the word "knowingly" was dropped from the provision. The amended law also included a list of false statements that were prohibited, extended protection from false statements to "a broader category of people, including the leader of a political party or a public figure associated with a political party," and limited the application of the prohibition to the election period (Canadian Constitution Foundation, at para 17). A judge of the Ontario Superior Court found that because the word "knowingly" had been removed, the law no longer required proof that the person making the statement knew that it was false. In the judge's view, the absence of a knowledge requirement meant that the law could no longer be seen as a justified limit on the s. 2(b) right to freedom of expression.
3. In Ontario (Attorney General) v. Working Families Coalition (Canada) Inc., 2025 SCC 5, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld an Ontario Court of Appeal decision striking down a limit on third party spending during the six-month period before the provincial election date. A superior court judge had previously struck down the law under s. 2(b) because the Ontario government had not provided any reasons for amending the existing law to extend the limitation period from three months to six months. The government then re-enacted the law, invoking s. 33 of the Charter and declaring that the spending limit was applicable notwithstanding s. 2(b) of the Charter. The law was then challenged under s. 3 of the Charter, the right to vote, which is not subject to s. 33, the notwithstanding clause. A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada held that the restriction breached s. 3 and could not be justified under s.1. The judgment is discussed in the Chapter dealing with s. 3 of the Charter, Democratic Rights. The following are excerpts from the majority decision:

[35] Public debate dominated by any one actor, including political parties, threatens balance in the political discourse (Libman, at paras. 47-52; Harper, at para. 72). Harper held that overly severe spending limits may interfere with the ability of voters to hear a diversity of views and undermine the ability of citizens to vote in an informed way (para. 73). To meaningfully participate, voters should be able "to hear and weigh many points of view" (para. 87). If the differential treatment of participants has an adverse impact on citizens' right to meaningfully participate in the electoral process, it will offend s. 3 (Figueroa, at para. 51).

[36] I conclude from this review of our jurisprudence that a spending limit will infringe s. 3 of the Charter if it allows political actors or third parties a disproportionate voice in the political discourse given their roles in the electoral process, thus depriving voters of a broad range of views and perspectives on social and political issues. Such disproportionality in the political discourse would violate voters' right to be "reasonably informed of all the possible choices" (Harper, at para. 71, quoting Libman, at para. 47). This analysis is necessarily comparative, considering all actors. No one actor should be able to exert undue influence on the political discourse, drowning out other voices.

[39] [W]hatever the content or perspective of the political advertising, our jurisprudence has stressed that voters must be able to "hear and weigh many points of view" and to consider the relative strengths and weaknesses of each candidate, political party, and the issues associated with them, to make an informed choice (Harper, at para. 87; see also para. 71; Figueroa, at para. 63).

[45] The challenged law in this case caps third party political spending at $600,000 during the pre-writ year (s. 37.10.1(2)(b) of the EFA). Political parties have no limit on spending during the first six months of this period, and can spend substantially more (up to $1,000,000) during the second six (s. 38.1).

[46] By design, the EFA creates a significant, qualitative disparity between what political parties and third parties may do, leading to disproportionality in the political discourse. Third parties are strictly limited in their ability to inform citizens while political parties face no restrictions in the first six months of the pre-writ year, and may spend a substantially higher amount in the six months before the writ period. On its face, the provision permits political parties to overwhelm or drown out the voices of third parties during the first six months of the pre-election year.

[48] The EFA's definition of "political advertising" casts a wide net. The AGO and the intervener the Chief Electoral Officer of Ontario share the view that the definition in the EFA only captures "election-oriented" advertising (A.F., at para. 102; I.F., at paras. 19-20). However, the scope of regulated political advertising under the EFA captures significant issue-based advertising. If the advertisement "can reasonably be regarded as closely associated with a registered party or its leader or a registered candidate", it is caught by the definition (s. 1(1)). Given the broad range of issues on which parties can and do campaign, this could include any advertising on education, justice, Indigenous, health, environmental, or economic issues. There is no requirement that the advertising include an explicit reference to the election, though that is a factor that the Chief Electoral Officer may consider (s. 37.0.1(c)). As the Chief Electoral Officer candidly explains, the definition captures indirect advertising or advertising that is impliedly related to an election (I.F., at paras. 18-19 and 22).

[50] This restriction on issues-based advertising on third parties in the first half of the pre-writ year, while political parties face no limits, also has potential effects closer to an election. If an issue of public significance arises a year or many months away from an election, and which is (or may become) closely associated with a political party, third parties are required to decide whether to use part of their spending limit to convey their views to citizens, or refrain from advertising. They may choose to save it, in case other important issues arise during the year, or to ensure they are able to advertise in the period right before an election. Citizens are potentially deprived of information regarding matters of public concern, both when the legislature is sitting and in the period before an election. The legislation thus forces third parties into a Hobson's choice, while simultaneously allowing political parties to spend unlimited amounts in the first six months of the pre-writ year to advertise using whichever form of media they wish on a wide range of issues.

[55] To summarize, the information available to voters in Ontario in the year before an election must include the interests, voices, and views of different citizens and parties. Meaningful participation in the electoral process includes an informed vote, as it is only with access to information that citizens can vote in a way that accurately reflects their preferences (Figueroa, at para. 54). To assess the relative merits of each party and candidate and their positions on the issues of the day, there must be equilibrium or proportionality in the political discourse so citizens have information on diverse points of view (Harper, at paras. 71-72). Political advertising is an important part of the electoral process. When political parties face no limitations, curtailing the ability of third parties to use platforms that may be effective in reaching certain voters has the potential to overwhelm the political discourse and drown out third parties, interfering with citizens' access to information letting them weigh and establish their views during an important time in the democratic cycle. The preferences of citizens casting votes is the basis of responsive government policy, and the legitimacy of laws made by the elected government. On its face, the EFA creates an absolute disproportionality in the availability of information to citizens over a key period, thus impeding their ability to form meaningful preferences, violating s. 3 of the Charter.

3.2.5 Questions

1. How do the ads of the better funded candidate/party drown out the ads of the other candidates/parties – if the latter are still heard, albeit less often?
2. Do the egalitarian concerns that are emphasised in Harper 2004 arise in other s. 2(b) decisions?
3. What is the difference between the regulation of campaign speech in Libman and Harper that led the court to strike down one regulation but not the other?
4. If it is acceptable to limit party and candidate spending during an election campaign, should it also be acceptable to limit it outside the campaign period?
5. Should the law regulate misleading or false claims in election ads?

3.3 Hate speech

There are two general kinds of harm that hate speech can cause. The first is that suffered directly by the members of a racial or other target group. This form of harm may include fear, humiliation, and emotional trauma resulting from speech that is threating or harassing. The second kind of harm is the spread of hateful views in the larger community that may lead others to engage in acts of discrimination and violence against members of the targeted group. The type of harm caused (or contributed to) by a particular instance of hate speech will depend on its content and its audience – on what is said and to whom it is said. The leading hate speech cases in Canada involve the second kind of harm, the restriction of racist and other bigoted claims that are meant to persuade members of the general community about the dangerous or undesirable traits of the members of a particular group.

In 1970 the Canadian government amended the Criminal Code, adding prohibitions on the advocacy of genocide (s. 318), “incitement to hatred likely to lead to a breach of the peace” against a group identified on the basis of race, religion, and ethnicity (s. 319(1)), and the “wilful promotion of hatred” against such a group (s. 319(2)). The list of groups has since been expanded to include groups identified on the basis of age, sex, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, and mental or physical disability.

In 2022, the federal government added to the Criminal Code a prohibition on Holocaust denial. Section 319(2.1) prohibits the communication of any statement made “other than in private conversation [that] wilfully promotes antisemitism by condoning, denying or downplaying the Holocaust”. This provision may not expand the scope of the s. 319(2) prohibition since it also requires that the communication “wilfully” promote a particular form of hatred.

For all of these offences, charges cannot be laid without the consent of the provincial Attorney General.

The federal government amended the Canada Human Rights Act (CHRA) in 1977 to include a ban on “telephonic” communication that is likely to expose the members of an identifiable group to hatred or contempt. The scope of the s. 13 ban was later extended to include hate speech on the internet. Section 13 of the CHRA was repealed by the federal government in 2013. The human rights codes of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and the Northwest Territories include a provision similar to s. 13 that is applicable to signs and publications. Enforcement of these human rights provisions is “complaint driven.” An individual or organization may make a complaint, which (under most of the codes) is investigated by a human rights commission. The commission must decide whether the complaint has substance and should be referred to a tribunal for adjudication.

3.3.1 R. v. Keegstra

R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Wilson, L’Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ. was delivered by Dickson CJ.

DICKSON C.J. –

Mr. James Keegstra was a high school teacher in Eckville, Alberta from the early 1970s until his dismissal in 1982. In 1984 Mr. Keegstra was charged under s. 319(2) (then s. 281.2(2)) of the Criminal Code with unlawfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group by communicating anti-semitic statements to his students. He was convicted by a jury in a trial before McKenzie J. of the Alberta Court of Queen’s Bench.

Mr. Keegstra’s teachings attributed various evil qualities to Jews. He thus described Jews to his pupils as “treacherous”, “subversive”, “sadistic”, “money-loving”, “power hungry” and “child killers”. He taught his classes that Jewish people seek to destroy Christianity and are responsible for depressions, anarchy, chaos, wars and revolution. According to Mr. Keegstra, Jews “created the Holocaust to gain sympathy” and, in contrast to the open and honest Christians, were said to be deceptive, secretive and inherently evil. Mr. Keegstra expected his students to reproduce his teachings in class and on exams. If they failed to do so, their marks suffered.

III. Relevant Statutory and Constitutional Provisions

The relevant legislative and Charter provisions are set out below:

Criminal Code

319 (2) Every one who, by communicating statements, other than in private conversation, wilfully promotes hatred against any identifiable group is guilty of (a) an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years; or (b) an offence punishable on summary conviction.

(3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under subsection (2)

(a) if he establishes that the statements communicated were true;

(b) if, in good faith, he expressed or attempted to establish by argument an opinion on a religious subject;

(c) if the statements were relevant to any subject of public interest, the discussion of which was for the public benefit, and if on reasonable grounds he believed them to be true; or

(d) if, in good faith, he intended to point out, for the purpose of removal, matters producing or tending to produce feelings of hatred toward an identifiable group in Canada.

… 318

VI. Section 2(b) of the Charter - Freedom of Expression

The first [constitutional question] concerns whether the Charter guarantee of freedom of expression is infringed by s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code.

Communications which wilfully promote hatred against an identifiable group without doubt convey a meaning, and are intended to do so by those who make them. Because Irwin Toy stresses that the type of meaning conveyed is irrelevant to the question of whether s. 2(b) is infringed, that the expression covered by s. 319(2) is invidious and obnoxious is beside the point. It is enough that those who publicly and wilfully promote hatred convey or attempt to convey a meaning, and it must therefore be concluded that the first step of the Irwin Toy test is satisfied.

… The purpose of s. 319(2) [is] to restrict the content of expression by singling out particular meanings that are not to be conveyed. Section 319(2) therefore overtly seeks to prevent the communication of 319(2) expression, and hence meets the second requirement of the Irwin Toy test. … I thus find s. 319(2) to constitute an infringement of the freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter. …

… [I]t was argued before this Court that the wilful promotion of hatred is an activity the form and consequences of which are analogous to those associated with violence or threats of violence. This argument contends that Supreme Court of Canada precedent excludes violence and threats of violence from the ambit of s.2(b), and that the reason for such exclusion must lie in the fact that these forms of expression are inimical to the values supporting freedom of speech. … Accordingly, we were urged to find that hate propaganda of the type caught by s. 319(2), insofar as it imperils the ability of target group members themselves to convey thoughts and feelings in non-violent ways without fear of censure, is analogous to violence and threats of violence and hence does not fall within s. 2(b).

Stated at its highest, an exception has been suggested where meaning is communicated directly via physical violence, the extreme repugnance of this form to free expression values justifying such an extraordinary step. Section 319(2) of the Criminal Code prohibits the communication of meaning that is repugnant, but the repugnance stems from the content of the message as opposed to its form. For this reason, I am of the view that hate propaganda is to be categorized as expression so as to bring it within the coverage of s. 2(b).

VII. Section 1 Analysis of Section 319(2)

C. Objective of Section 319(2)

….

Essentially, there are two sorts of injury caused by hate propaganda. First, there is harm done to members of the target group. It is indisputable that the emotional damage caused by words may be of grave psychological and social consequence.

A person's sense of human dignity and belonging to the community at large is closely linked to the concern and respect accorded the groups to which he or she belongs … The derision, hostility and abuse encouraged by hate propaganda therefore have a severely negative impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance.

A second harmful effect of hate propaganda which is of pressing and substantial concern is its influence upon society at large.

It is… not inconceivable that the active dissemination of hate propaganda can attract individuals to its cause, and in the process create serious discord between various cultural groups in society.

The threat to the self-dignity of target group is thus matched by the possibility that prejudiced messages will gain some credence, with the attendant result of discrimination, and perhaps even violence, against minority groups in Canadian society.

[In support of his determination that the objective of s. 319(2) is pressing and substantial Dickson CJ refers to the various human rights treaties that support the prohibition of discrimination and hate speech, and to other provisions in Charter such as s. 15 and s.27.]

D. Proportionality

(i) Relation of the Expression at Stake to Free Expression Values

[T]he interpretation of s. 2(b) under Irwin Toy, gives protection to a very wide range of expression. Content is irrelevant to this interpretation, the result of a high value being placed upon freedom of expression in the abstract. This approach to s. 2(b) often operates to leave unexamined the extent to which the expression at stake in a particular case promotes freedom of expression principles. In my opinion, however, the s. 1

analysis of a limit upon s. 2(b) cannot ignore the nature of the expressive activity which the state seeks to restrict. While we must guard carefully against judging expression according to its popularity, it is equally destructive of free expression values, as well as the other values which underlie a free and democratic society, to treat all expression as equally crucial to those principles at the core of s. 2(b).

One must ask whether the expression prohibited by s. 319(2) is tenuously connected to the values underlying s. 2(b) so as to make the restriction "easier to justify than other infringements." …

From the outset, I wish to make clear that in my opinion the expression prohibited by s. 319(2) is pression not closely linked to the rationale underlying s. 2(b).

At the core of freedom of expression lies the need to ensure that truth and the common good are attained, whether in scientific and artistic endeavors or in the process of determining the best course to take in our political affairs. Since truth and the ideal form of political and social organization can rarely, if at all, be identified with absolute certainty, it is difficult to prohibit expression without impeding the free exchange of potentially valuable information. Nevertheless, the argument from truth does not provide convincing support for the protection of hate propaganda. Taken to its extreme, this argument would require us to permit the communication of all expression, it being impossible to know with absolute certainty which factual statements are true, or which ideas obtain the greatest good. The problem with this extreme position, however, is that the greater the degree of certainty that a statement is erroneous or mendacious, the less its value in the quest for truth. Indeed, expression can be used to the detriment of our search for truth; the state should not be the sole arbiter of truth, but neither should we overplay the view that rationality will overcome all falsehoods in the unregulated marketplace of ideas. There is very little chance that statements intended to promote hatred against an identifiable group are true, or that their vision of society will lead to a better world. To portray such statements as crucial to truth and the betterment of the political and social milieu is therefore misguided.

Another component central to the rationale underlying s. 2(b) concerns the vital role of free expression as a means of ensuring individuals the ability to gain self-fulfillment by developing and articulating thoughts and ideas as they see fit. It is true that s. 319(2) inhibits this process among those individuals whose expression it limits, and hence arguably works against freedom of expression values. On the other hand, such self-autonomy stems in large part from one's ability to articulate and nurture an identity derived from membership in a cultural or religious group. The message put forth by individuals who fall within the ambit of s. 319(2) represents a most extreme opposition to the idea that members of identifiable groups should enjoy this aspect of the s. 2(b) benefit. The extent to which the unhindered promotion of this message furthers free expression values must therefore be tempered in so far as it advocates with inordinate vitriol an intolerance and prejudice which view as execrable the process of individual self-development and human flourishing among all members of society.

… Freedom of expression is a crucial aspect of the democratic commitment, not merely because it permits the best policies to be chosen from among a wide array of proffered options, but additionally because it helps to ensure that participation in the political process is open to all persons. …

The suppression of hate propaganda undeniably muzzles the participation of a few individuals in the democratic process, and hence detracts somewhat from free expression values, but the degree of this limitation is not substantial. …

I am very reluctant to attach anything but the highest importance to expression relevant to political matters. But given the unparalleled vigour with which hate propaganda repudiates and undermines democratic values, and in particular its condemnation of the view that all citizens need be treated with equal respect and dignity so as to make participation in the political process meaningful, I am unable to see the protection of such expression as integral to the democratic ideal so central to the s. 2(b) rationale. … In my view, hate propaganda should not be accorded the greatest of weight in the s. 1 analysis.

(ii) Rational Connection

[I]t is [sometimes]argued that the provision may actually promote the cause of hate-mongers by earning them extensive media attention. In this vein, it is also suggested that persons accused of intentionally promoting hatred often see themselves as martyrs, and may actually generate sympathy from the community in the role of underdogs engaged in battle against the immense powers of the state. Second, the public may view the suppression of expression by the government with suspicion, making it possible that such expression - even if it be hate propaganda - is perceived as containing an element of truth.

[F]rom my perspective, s. 319(2) serves to illustrate to the public the severe reprobation with which society holds messages of hate directed towards racial and religious groups.

The many, many Canadians who belong to identifiable groups surely gain a great deal of comfort from the knowledge that the hate-monger is criminally prosecuted and his or her ideas rejected.

[I]t can also be said that government suppression of hate propaganda will not make the expression attractive and hence increase acceptance of its content.

In sum, having found that the purpose of the challenged legislation is valid, I also find that the means chosen to further this purpose are rational in both theory and operation, and therefore conclude that the first branch of the proportionality test has been met.

(iii) Minimal Impairment of the Section 2(b)

Terms of Section 319(2)

… [S]tatements made "in private conversation" are not included in the criminalized expression. The provision thus does not prohibit views expressed with an intention to promote hatred if made privately, indicating Parliament's concern not to intrude upon the privacy of the individual.

A second important element of s. 319(2) is its requirement that the promotion of hatred be "wilful".

… Martin J.A. [in the earlier ONCA decision of R. v. Buzzanga held that] this mental element is satisfied only where an accused subjectively desires the promotion of hatred or foresees such a consequence as certain or substantially certain to result from an act done in order to achieve some other purpose.

This mental element, requiring more than merely negligence or recklessness as to result, significantly restricts the reach of the provision, and thereby reduces the scope of the targeted expression.

It is clear that the word "wilfully" imports a difficult burden for the Crown to meet and, in so doing, serves to minimize the impairment of freedom of expression.

It has been argued, however, that even a demanding mens rea component fails to give 319(2) a constitutionally acceptable breadth. The problem is said to lie in the failure of the offence to require proof of actual hatred resulting from a communication …

[However,] to predicate the limitation of free expression upon proof of actual hatred gives insufficient attention to the severe psychological trauma suffered by members of those identifiable groups targeted by hate propaganda. Second, it is clearly difficult to prove a causative link between a specific statement and hatred of an identifiable group. In fact, to require direct proof of hatred in listeners would severely debilitate the effectiveness of s. 319(2) in achieving Parliament's aim. … [P]roof of actual hatred is not required in order to justify a limit under s. 1.

The next feature of the provision that must be explored is the phrase "promotes hatred against any identifiable group". Given the purpose of the provision to criminalize the spreading of hatred in society, I find that the word "promotes" indicates active support or instigation.

The hate-monger must intend or foresee as substantially certain a direct and active stimulation of hatred against an identifiable group. As for the term "identifiable group"', s. 318(4) states that identifiable group" means any section of the public distinguished by colour, race, religion or ethnic origin" The act to be targeted is therefore the intentional fostering of hatred against particular members of our society, as opposed to any individual.

The meaning of "hatred" remains to be elucidated.

Noting the purpose of s. 319(2), in my opinion the term "hatred" connotes emotion of an intense and extreme nature that is clearly associated with vilification and intense detestation.

Hatred is predicated on destruction, and hatred against identifiable groups therefore thrives on insensitivity, bigotry and destruction of both the target group and of the values of our society. Hatred in this sense is a most extreme emotion that belies reason; an emotion that, if exercised against members of an identifiable group, implies that those individuals are to be despised, scorned, denied respect and made subject to ill-treatment on the basis of group affiliation.

A careful reading of the s. 319(3) defences shows them to take in examples of expressive activity that generally would not fall within the "wilful promotion of hatred" as I have defined phrase. … These defences are hence intended to aid in making the scope of the wilful promotion of hatred more explicit …

The overlap between s. 319(2) and the defences is less pronounced in the case of the defence of truth, s. 319(3)(a) being more likely than the other defences to excuse the wilful promotion of hatred. This increased likelihood reveals the defence in para. (a) to be an especially poignant indicator of Parliament's cautionary approach and care in protecting freedom of expression. … [I]f a situation arises where an individual uses statements of truth in order to promote hatred against identifiable groups, the accused is acquitted despite the existence of the harm which Parliament seeks to prevent.

[E]ven though the terms of s. 319(2) and the nature of the available defences expose an individual to conviction only in narrow and clearly defined circumstances, it is said that non-criminal responses can more effectively combat the harm caused by hate propaganda. Most generally, it is said that discriminatory ideas can best be met with information and education programmes extolling the merits of tolerance and cooperation between racial and religious groups. As for the prohibition of hate propaganda, human rights statutes are pointed to as being a less severe and more effective response than the criminal law.

In assessing the proportionality of a legislative enactment to a valid governmental objective, however, s. 1 should not operate in every instance so as to force the government to rely upon only the, mode of intervention least intrusive of a Charter right or freedom. It may be that a number courses of action are available in the furtherance of a pressing and substantial objective, each imposing a varying degree of restriction upon aright or freedom.

(d) Conclusion as to Minimal Impairment

[T]he terms of s. 319(2) create a narrowly confined offence which suffers from neither overbreadth nor vagueness. This interpretation stems largely from my view that the provision possesses a stringent mens rea requirement, necessitating either an intent to promote hatred or knowledge of the substantial certainty of such, and is also strongly supported by the conclusion that the meaning of the word "hatred" is restricted to the most severe and deeply-felt form of opprobrium. …

(iv) Effects of the Limitation

The third branch of the proportionality test entails a weighing of the importance of the state objective against the effect of limits imposed upon a Charter right or guarantee.

The expressive activity at which this provision aims is of a special category, a category only tenuously connected with the values underlying the guarantee of freedom of speech. Moreover, the narrowly drawn terms of s. 319(2) and its defences prevent the prohibition of expression lying outside of this narrow category. Consequently, the suppression of hate propaganda affected by s. 319(2) represents an impairment of the individual's freedom of expression which is not of a most serious nature.

[McLachlin J dissenting (Sopinka J. and LaForest J concurring) argued that the restriction could not be justified under s.1. Notably she argued that the line separating hate speech from valuable forms of expression might be drawn in the wrong place so that expression that ought to be protected is not. She further argued that even if the court managed to draw the line in the right place, the hate speech ban might have a "chilling effect" on legitimate expression: some community members might be reluctant to publish material, even valuable material that should not, and probably would not, be caught by the restriction, because they would be unwilling to take the risk that it might fall afoul of a criminal prohibition that did not have a clearly defined scope.]

3.3.2 Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor

Canada (Human Rights Commission) v. Taylor, 1990 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 892

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Wilson, L'Heureux-Dubé and Gonthier JJ. was delivered by

DICKSON C.J. -- Section 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act, S.C. 1976-1977, c. 33, provides that:

13. (1) It is a discriminatory practice for a person or a group of persons acting in concert to communicate telephonically or to cause to be so communicated, repeatedly, in whole or in part by means of the facilities of a telecommunication undertaking within the legislative authority of Parliament, any matter that is likely to expose a person or persons to hatred or contempt by reason of the fact that that person or those persons are identifiable on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination.

Prohibited grounds of discrimination are set out in s. 2 of the Act, and include (though are not restricted to) race, national or ethnic origin, colour and religion.

The primary issue in this appeal is whether s. 13(1), in so far as it restricts the communication of certain telephone messages, violates the "freedom of expression" as guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

A. Section 13(1): Infringement of Section 2(b)

The initial step in determining whether s. 13(1) violates the Charter is to decide whether the sphere of the freedom entrenched in s. 2(b) extends to telephone communications likely to expose persons to hatred or contempt by reason of identification on the basis of race or religion.

Applying the Irwin Toy approach to the facts of this appeal, I have no doubt that the activity described by s. 13(1) is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter. Indeed, the point is conceded by the respondent Commission. To begin with, it is self-evident that this activity conveys or attempts to convey a meaning, the medium in issue to my mind being susceptible to no other use. Indeed, I find it impossible to conceive of an instance where the "telephonic communication of matter" (to paraphrase the language of s. 13(1)) could not be said to involve a conveyance of meaning. The inescapable conclusion is that the activity affected by s. 13(1) constitutes "expression" as the term is envisioned by s. 2(b).

As for the Irwin Toy requirement that the purpose or effect of the impugned regulatory measure be to restrict expressive activity, it is clear that Parliament s aim in passing s. 13(1) is to constrain expression communicated by telephone, for the section operates to prohibit directly messages likely to expose certain persons or groups of persons to hatred or contempt. The desire of the government in enacting s. 13(1) being to restrict expression by singling out for censure particular conveyances of meaning, the second requirement of Irwin Toy is met, necessarily leading to the conclusion that s. 2(b) is infringed.

B. Section 13(1): Analysis Under Section 1 of the Charter

Objective

I believe that the broad legislative intent in implementing s. 13(1) can be gleaned directly from the statute in which it is found. The purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act is stated as follows in s. 2:

> 2. The purpose of this Act is to extend the present laws in Canada to give effect, within the purview of matters coming within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, to the principle that every individual should have an equal opportunity with other individuals to make for himself or herself the life that he or she is able and wishes to have, consistent with his or her duties and obligations as a member of society, without being hindered in or prevented from doing so by discriminatory practices based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sex, marital status, family status, disability or conviction for an offence for which a pardon has been granted.

It is this purpose -- the promotion of equal opportunity unhindered by discriminatory practices based on, inter alia, race or religion -- which informs the objective of s. 13(1). In denoting the activity described in s. 13(1) as a discriminatory practice, Parliament has indicated that it views repeated telephonic communications likely to expose individuals or groups to hatred or contempt by reason of their being identifiable on the basis of certain characteristics as contrary to the furtherance of equality.

… The serious harm caused by messages of hatred was identified by the Special Committee on Hate Propaganda in Canada, commonly known as the Cohen Committee, in 1966. The Cohen Committee noted that individuals subjected to racial or religious hatred may suffer substantial psychological distress, the damaging consequences including a loss of self-esteem, feelings of anger and outrage and strong pressure to renounce cultural differences that mark them as distinct. … As well, the Committee observed that hate propaganda can operate to convince listeners, even if subtlely, that members of certain racial or religious groups are inferior. The result may be an increase in acts of discrimination, including the denial of equal opportunity in the provision of goods, services and facilities, and even incidents of violence.

In seeking to prevent the harms caused by hate propaganda, the objective behind s. 13(1) is obviously one of pressing and substantial importance sufficient to warrant some limitation upon the freedom of expression. It is worth stressing, however, the heightened importance attached to this objective by reason of international human rights instruments to which Canada is a party and ss. 15 and 27 of the Charter.

Proportionality

… [I]n balancing interests within s. 1, one cannot ignore the setting in which the s. 2(b) freedom is raised. … [A] contextual approach to s. 1 demands an appreciation of the extent to which a restriction of the activity at issue on the facts of the particular case debilitates or compromises the principles underlying the broad guarantee of freedom of expression.

… I am of the opinion that hate propaganda contributes little to the aspirations of Canadians or Canada in either the quest for truth, the promotion of individual self-development or the protection and fostering of a vibrant democracy where the participation of all individuals is accepted and encouraged. While I cannot conclude that hate propaganda deserves only marginal protection under the s. 1 analysis, I can take cognizance of the fact that limitations upon hate propaganda are directed at a special category of expression which strays some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b), and hence conclude that "restrictions on expression of this kind might be easier to justify than other infringements of s. 2(b)" (Royal College, supra, at p. 247).

… The unusually extreme extent to which the expression at stake in this appeal attacks the s. 2(b) rationale … requires that the proportionality analysis be carried out with the recognition that the suppression of hate propaganda does not severely abridge free expression values. …

(i) Rational Connection

In my view, once it is accepted that hate propaganda produces effects deleterious to the guiding principles of s. 2 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, there remains no question that s. 13(1) is rationally connected to the aim of restricting activities antithetical to the promotion of equality and tolerance in society. The section labels as discriminatory the transmission of messages likely to expose individuals to hatred or contempt by reason of their being identifiable on the basis of certain characteristics, including race and religion. Sections 41 and 42 of the Act allow the Human Rights Tribunal to issue a cease and desist order against an individual found to be engaging in this discriminatory practice, and this order can be enforced upon application to the Federal Court of Canada by the Commission (s. 43). In sum, when conjoined with the remedial provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act, s. 13(1) operates to suppress hate propaganda and its harmful consequences, and hence is rationally connected to furthering the object sought by Parliament.

… The process of hearing a complaint made under s. 13(1) and, if the complaint is substantiated, issuing a cease and desist order reminds Canadians of our fundamental commitment to equality of opportunity and the eradication of racial and religious intolerance. In addition, although criminal law is not devoid of impact upon the rehabilitation of offenders, the conciliatory nature of the human rights procedure and the absence of criminal sanctions make s. 13(1) especially well suited to encourage reform of the communicator of hate propaganda.

(ii) Minimal Impairment

When considering the scope of the phrase "hatred or contempt", it is worthwhile mentioning that the nature of human rights legislation militates against an unduly narrow reading of s. 13(1). … I therefore do not wish to transgress the well-established principle that the rights enumerated in such a code should be given their full recognition and effect through a fair, large and liberal interpretation. At the same time, however, the purposive definition to be given a human rights code cannot extend so far as to permit the limitation of a Charter right or freedom not otherwise justified under s. 1.

In my view, there is no conflict between providing a meaningful interpretation of s. 13(1) and protecting the s. 2(b) freedom of expression so long as the interpretation of the words "hatred" and "contempt" is fully informed by an awareness that Parliament's objective is to protect the equality and dignity of all individuals by reducing the incidence of harm-causing expression. Such a perspective was employed by the Human Rights Tribunal in Nealy v. Johnston (1989), 1989 CanLII 151 (CHRT), 10 C.H.R.R. D/6450, the most recent decision regarding s. 13(1), where it was noted, at p. D/6469, that:

> In defining "hatred" the Tribunal [in Taylor] applied the definition in the Oxford English Dictionary (1971 ed.) which reads (at p. 28): "active dislike, detestation, enmity, ill-will, malevolence".

The Tribunal drew on the same source for their definition of "contempt". It was characterized as the condition of being condemned or despised; dishonour or disgrace.

> As there is no definition of "hatred" or "contempt" within the [Canadian Human Rights Act] it is necessary to rely on what might be described as common understandings of the meaning of these terms. Clearly these are terms which have a potentially emotive content and how they are related to particular factual contexts by different individuals will vary. There is nevertheless an important core of meaning in both, which the dictionary definitions capture. With "hatred" the focus is a set of emotions and feelings which involve extreme ill will towards another person or group of persons. To say that one "hates" another means in effect that one finds no redeeming qualities in the latter. It is a term, however, which does not necessarily involve the mental process of "looking down" on another or others. It is quite possible to "hate" someone who one feels is superior to one in intelligence, wealth or power. None of the synonyms used in the dictionary definition for "hatred" give any clues to the motivation for the ill will. "Contempt" is by contrast a term which suggests a mental process of "looking down" upon or treating as inferior the object of one's feelings. This is captured by the dictionary definition relied on in Taylor . . . in the use of the terms "despised",

> "dishonour" or "disgrace". Although the person can be "hated" (i.e. actively disliked) and treated with "contempt" (i.e. looked down upon), the terms are not fully coextensive, because "hatred" is in some instances the product of envy of superior qualities, which "contempt" by definition cannot be. [Emphasis added.]

The approach taken in Nealy gives full force and recognition to the purpose of the Canadian Human Rights Act while remaining consistent with the Charter. The reference to "hatred" in the above quotation speaks of "extreme" ill-will and an emotion which allows for "no redeeming qualities" in the person at whom it is directed. "Contempt" appears to be viewed as similarly extreme, though is felt by the Tribunal to describe more appropriately circumstances where the object of one's feelings is looked down upon. According to the reading of the Tribunal, s. 13(1) thus refers to unusually strong and deep-felt emotions of detestation, calumny and vilification, and I do not find this interpretation to be particularly expansive. To the extent that the section may impose a slightly broader limit upon freedom of expression than does s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code, however, I am of the view that the conciliatory bent of a human rights statute renders such a limit more acceptable than would be the case with a criminal provision.

In sum, the language employed in s. 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act extends only to that expression giving rise to the evil sought to be eradicated and provides a standard of conduct sufficiently precise to prevent the unacceptable chilling of expressive activity. Moreover, as long as the Human Rights Tribunal continues to be well aware of the purpose of s. 13(1) and pays heed to the ardent and extreme nature of feeling described in the phrase "hatred or contempt", there is little danger that subjective opinion as to offensiveness will supplant the proper meaning of the section.

While words in s. 13(1) such as "hatred" and "contempt" can be read consistently with both the intent of Parliament to eradicate hate propaganda and a minimal impairment of s. 2(b) of the Charter, the appellants argue that no sympathetic interpretation can remedy the overbreadth created by reason of the section's lack of an intent requirement. The focus of s. 13(1) is solely upon likely effects, it being irrelevant whether an individual wishes to expose persons to hatred or contempt on the basis of their race or religion. This inconsequentiality of intent is said to impinge seriously and unnecessarily upon the freedom of expression, and indeed in my reasons in Keegstra particular emphasis is placed upon the stringent intent requirement in saving s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code under s. 1 of the Charter. …

An intent to discriminate is not a precondition of a finding of discrimination under human rights codes … The preoccupation with effects, and not with intent, is readily explicable when one considers that systemic discrimination is much more widespread in our society than is intentional discrimination. To import a subjective intent requirement into human rights provisions, rather than allowing tribunals to focus solely upon effects, would thus defeat one of the primary goals of anti-discrimination statutes. At the same time, however, it cannot be denied that to ignore intent in determining whether a discriminatory practice has taken place according to s. 13(1) increases the degree of restriction upon the constitutionally protected freedom of expression. This result flows from the realization that an individual open to condemnation and censure because his or her words may have an unintended effect will be more likely to exercise caution via self-censorship.

… [I]t seems to me that the important Parliamentary objective behind s. 13(1) can only be achieved by ignoring intent, and therefore the minimal impairment requirement of the Oakes proportionality test is not transgressed.

In coming to this conclusion, I do not mean to say that the purpose of eradicating discrimination in all its forms can justify any degree of impairment upon the freedom of expression, but it is well to remember that the present appeal concerns an infringement of s. 2(b) in the context of a human rights statute. The chill placed upon open expression in such a context will ordinarily be less severe than that occasioned where criminal legislation is involved, for attached to a criminal conviction is a significant degree of stigma and punishment, whereas the extent of opprobrium connected with the finding of discrimination is much diminished and the aim of remedial measures is more upon compensation and protection of the victim. …

…[I]t is my opinion that the absence of an intent component in s. 13(1) raises no problem of minimal impairment when one considers that the objective of the section requires an emphasis upon discriminatory effects. Moreover, and this is where I am perhaps jumping ahead to the "effects" component of the proportionality test, the purpose and impact of human rights codes is to prevent discriminatory effects rather than to stigmatize and punish those who discriminate. Consequently, in this context the absence of intent in s. 13(1) does not impinge so deleteriously upon the s. 2(b) freedom of expression so as to make intolerable the challenged provision's existence in a free and democratic society.

Although I have found the absence of an intent requirement in s. 13(1) to be constitutionally acceptable, the section evinces yet another feature which is said to give it a fatally broad scope. In contrast to s. 319(2) of the Criminal Code, s. 13(1) provides no defences to the discriminatory practice it describes, and most especially does not contain an exemption for truthful statements. Accepting that the value of truth in all facets of life, including the political, is central to the s. 2(b) guarantee, the question becomes whether a restriction upon freedom of expression is excessive where it operates to suppress statements which are either truthful or perceived to be truthful.

In Keegstra, I dealt in considerable detail with hate propaganda and the defence of truth, though in relation to the criminal offence of wilfully promoting hatred against an identifiable group. … :

> … Truth may be used for widely disparate ends, and I find it difficult to accept that circumstances exist where factually accurate statements can be used for no other purpose than to stir up hatred against a racial or religious group. It would seem to follow that there is no reason why the individual who intentionally employs such statements to achieve harmful ends must under the Charter be protected from criminal censure.

For the reasons given in the above quotation, I am of the view that the Charter does not mandate an exception for truthful statements in the context of s. 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

I am of course aware that my comments in Keegstra related to a provision where an individual could only be convicted upon proof that he or she intended to promote hatred, and that in Keegstra the presence of such an intention was specifically emphasized. Clearly, an intention to expose others to hatred or contempt on the basis of race or religion is not required in s. 13(1). As I have just explained, however, s. 13(1) operates within the context of a human rights statute. Accordingly, the importance of isolating effects (and hence ignoring intent) justifies this absence of a mens rea requirement. I also reiterate the point that the impact of the impugned section is less confrontational than would be the case with a criminal prohibition, the legislative framework encouraging a conciliatory settlement and forbidding the imposition of imprisonment unless an individual intentionally acts in a manner prohibited by an order registered with the Federal Court. …

As the preceding discussion shows, the freedom of expression is not unnecessarily impaired by s. 13(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act. The terms of the section, in particular the phrase "hatred or contempt", are sufficiently precise and narrow to limit its impact to those expressive activities which are repugnant to Parliament's objective of promoting equality and tolerance in society. …

Though it is true that the absence of an intent requirement under s. 13(1) may make the section wider in scope than the criminal provision upheld in Keegstra, this particular distinction is made necessary by the important objective of the Canadian Human Rights Act of eradicating systemic discrimination. Moreover, intent is far from irrelevant when imposing incarcerating sanctions upon an individual by way of a contempt order, subjective awareness of the likely effect of one's messages being a necessary precondition for the issuance of such an order by the Federal Court. A similar point can be made regarding the lack of defences offered under the Act, though as I have noted it is quite conceivable that the full panoply of defences is not constitutionally required in even a criminal provision. Finally, by focusing upon "repeated" telephonic messages, s. 13(1) directs its attention to public, larger-scale schemes for the dissemination of hate propaganda, the very type of phone use which most threatens the admirable aim underlying the Canadian Human Rights Act.

(iii) Effects

It will be apparent from the preceding discussion that I do not view the effects of s. 13(1) upon the freedom of expression to be so deleterious as to make intolerable its existence in a free and democratic society. The section furthers a government objective of great significance and impinges upon expression exhibiting only tenuous links with the rationale underlying the freedom of expression guarantee. Moreover, operating in the context of the procedural and remedial provisions of the Canadian Human Rights Act, s. 13(1) plays a minimal role in the imposition of moral, financial or incarcerating sanctions, the primary goal being to act directly for the benefit of those likely to be exposed to the harms caused by hate propaganda. It is therefore my opinion that the degree of limitation imposed upon the freedom of expression by s. 13(1) is not unduly harsh, and that the third requirement of the Oakes proportionality approach is satisfied.

C. Section 13(1) and the Freedom of Expression: Conclusion Under Section 1 of the Charter

Having found that the effects of s. 13(1) are acceptable in light of the important objective sought by Parliament, I conclude that the government has satisfactorily demonstrated the proportionality of the provision. Consequently, s. 13(1) is saved under s. 1 of the Charter as a limit reasonable in a free and democratic society. …

3.3.3 Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott

Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott*, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 SCR 467

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

ROTHSTEIN J. —

[3] Four complaints were filed with the Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission ("Commission") concerning four flyers published and distributed by the respondent, William Whatcott. The flyers were distributed to the public and targeted homosexuals and were challenged by the complainants on the basis that they promoted hatred against individuals because of their sexual orientation. The Saskatchewan Human Rights Tribunal ("Tribunal") held that the flyers constituted publications that contravened s. 14 of The Saskatchewan Human Rights Code, S.S. 1979, c. S-24.1 ("Code") as they exposed persons to hatred and ridicule on the basis of their sexual orientation: (2005), 2005 CanLII 80912 (SK HRT), 52 C.H.R.R. D/264. Section 14(1)(b) of the Code prohibits the publication or display of any representation "that exposes or tends to expose to hatred, ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of any person or class of persons on the basis of a prohibited ground". The Code lists "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground (s. 2(1)(m.01)(vi))….

[5] Two issues arise in this appeal. The first is whether s. 14(1)(b) of the Code is constitutional. If so, a second issue arises as to whether the Tribunal's application of that provision in the context of this case should have been upheld.

[6] I conclude that although s. 14(1)(b) of the Code infringes Mr. Whatcott's rights under both ss. 2(a) and 2(b) of the Charter, the infringement is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. This Court's approach in Keegstra and Taylor, with some modification, sets out an acceptable method for determining how to balance the competing rights and interests at play.

[35] In the present context, the courts have confirmed that when applying a prohibition based on hatred, the outcome does not depend on the subjective views of the publisher or of the victim of the alleged hate publication, but rather on an objective application of the test … The courts pose the question of whether, "when considered objectively by a reasonable person aware of the relevant context and circumstances, the speech in question would be understood as exposing or tending to expose members of the target group to hatred" … In the course of this assessment, a judge or adjudicator is expected to put his or her personal views aside and to base the determination on what he or she perceives to be the rational views of an informed member of society, viewing the matter realistically and practically.

[41] In my view, "detestation" and "vilification" aptly describe the harmful effect that the Code seeks to eliminate. Representations that expose a target group to detestation tend to inspire enmity and extreme ill-will against them, which goes beyond mere disdain or dislike. Representations vilifying a person or group will seek to abuse, denigrate or delegitimize them, to render them lawless, dangerous, unworthy or unacceptable in the eyes of the audience. Expression exposing vulnerable groups to detestation and vilification goes far beyond merely discrediting, humiliating or offending the victims. …

[42] … While hate speech often uses the device of inflammatory falsehoods and misrepresentations to persuade and galvanize its audience, the use of such tools is not necessary to a finding that the expression exposes its targeted group to hatred. Nor would false misrepresentations, alone, be sufficient to constitute hate speech. …

[44] In the years following Taylor, there has been considerable human rights jurisprudence and academic commentary about what constitutes hate speech. The types of expression and devices used to expose groups to hatred were summarized as the "hallmarks of hate" enumerated in Warman v. Kouba, 2006 CHRT 50 (CanLII), at paras. 24-81. Hate speech often vilifies the targeted group by blaming its members for the current problems in society, alleging that they are a "powerful menace" (para. 24); that they are carrying out secret conspiracies to gain global control (Citron v. Zündel (No. 4) (2002), 2002 CanLII 78205 (CHRT), 41 C.H.R.R. D/274 (C.H.R.T.)); or plotting to destroy western civilization (Taylor). Hate speech also further delegitimizes the targeted group by suggesting its members are illegal or unlawful, such as by labelling them "liars, cheats, criminals and thugs" (Citron, at para. 140); a "parasitic race" or "pure evil": Warman v. Tremaine (No. 2), 2007 CHRT 2, 59 C.H.R.R. D/391, at para. 136.

[51] … Hate speech legislation is not aimed at discouraging repugnant or offensive ideas. It does not, for example, prohibit expression which debates the merits of reducing the rights of vulnerable groups in society. It only restricts the use of expression exposing them to hatred as a part of that debate. It does not target the ideas, but their mode of expression in public and the effect that this mode of expression may have.

[52] An assessment of whether expression exposes a protected group to hatred must therefore include an evaluation of the likely effects of the expression on its audience. Would a reasonable person consider that the expression vilifying a protected group has the potential to lead to discrimination and other harmful effects? This assessment will depend largely on the context and circumstances of each case.

[54] Dickson C.J. [in Taylor] emphasized this need to focus on the effects of the expression in his reasons in Taylor. He noted that "the purpose and impact of human rights codes is to prevent discriminatory effects rather than to stigmatize and punish those who discriminate" (p. 933 (emphasis added)). … Dickson C.J. reasoned that the preoccupation with the discriminatory effects was understandable, given that systemic discrimination is more widespread than intentional discrimination. Tribunals must focus on the likely effects of impugned expression in order to achieve the preventive goals of anti- discrimination statutes.

VII. Constitutional Analysis

Whether Section 14(1)(b) Infringes Freedom of Expression Under Section 2(b) of the Charter

[62] … The activity described in s. 14(1)(b) — the publication or display of certain types of expression — has expressive content and falls within the scope of s. 2(b) protection. The purpose of s.14(1)(b) is to prevent discrimination by curtailing certain types of public expression.

Section 1 — Whether the Infringement Is Demonstrably Justified in a Free and Democratic Society

Is the Objective for Which the Limit Is Imposed Pressing and Substantial?

[71] Hate speech is, at its core, an effort to marginalize individuals based on their membership in a group. Using expression that exposes the group to hatred, hate speech seeks to delegitimize group members in the eyes of the majority, reducing their social standing and acceptance within society. When people are vilified as blameworthy or undeserving, it is easier to justify discriminatory treatment. The objective of s. 14(1)(b) may be understood as reducing the harmful effects and social costs of discrimination by tackling certain causes of discriminatory activity.

[74] Hate speech, therefore, rises beyond causing emotional distress to individual group members. It can have a societal impact. If a group of people are considered inferior, subhuman, or lawless, it is easier to justify denying the group and its members equal rights or status. … As the majority becomes desensitized by the effects of hate speech, the concern is that some members of society will demonstrate their rejection of the vulnerable group through conduct. Hate speech lays the groundwork for later, broad attacks on vulnerable groups. These attacks can range from discrimination, to ostracism, segregation, deportation, violence and, in the most extreme cases, to genocide: …

[77] … I therefore have no difficulty in determining that the purpose of the legislation is pressing and substantial.

[80] … Hate speech seeks to marginalize individuals based on their group characteristics. As such, in order to satisfy the rational connection requirement, the expression captured under legislation restricting hate speech must rise to a level beyond merely impugning individuals: it must seek to marginalize the group by affecting its social status and acceptance in the eyes of the majority.

[82] Societal harm flowing from hate speech must be assessed as objectively as possible. The feelings of the publisher or victim are not the test: ... While the emotional damage from hate speech is indeed troubling, protecting the emotions of an individual group member is not rationally connected to the overall purpose of reducing discrimination. … Instead, the focus must be on the likely effect of the hate speech on how individuals external to the group might reconsider the social standing of the group. Ultimately, it is the need to protect the societal standing of vulnerable groups that is the objective of legislation restricting hate speech.

[84] … A prohibition of hate speech will only be rationally connected to the objective if its ambit is limited to expression publicly directed at a protected group, or at an individual on the basis that he or she is a member of that group.

[The Court held that the restriction on ridicule and belittlement in s. 14 was not a justified limit because it was not "not rationally connected to the legislative purpose of addressing systemic discrimination of protected groups" (para 92).]

(b) Minimal Impairment

Alternative Methods of Furthering the Legislature's Objectives

[102] Two alternatives have been suggested that would better serve the goal of eradicating hate speech than the provisions of the Code. One is that trust should be placed in the "marketplace of ideas" to arrive at the appropriate balancing of competing rights and conflicting views. The other is that the prosecution of hate speech ought to be left to the criminal law.

[104] … [I]n Keegstra, Dickson C.J. set out a compelling rationale for why Parliament's preference to regulate hate speech through legislation rather than to trust it to the hands of the marketplace was also reasonable. … In his view, paradoxically, hate speech undermines the principles upon which freedom of expression is based … While hate speech may achieve the self-fulfillment of the publisher, it does so by reducing the participation and self-fulfillment of individuals within the vulnerable group. These drawbacks suggest that this alternative is not without its concerns.

[105] Others suggest that to minimally impair expression, hate speech should be dealt with through criminal law prohibitions or other prohibitions restricting only speech which threatens, advocates or justifies violence …

[106] Having canvassed the proposed alternatives to the civil law remedy, I cannot say that any one represents such a superior approach as to render the others unreasonable. Section 14(1)(b) of the Code is within the range of reasonable alternatives that was available to the legislature.

3. Political Discourse

[117] Finding that certain expression falls within political speech does not close off an enquiry into whether the expression constitutes hate speech. Hate speech may often arise as a part of a larger public discourse but, as discussed in Keegstra and Taylor, it is speech of a restrictive and exclusionary kind. Political expression contributes to our democracy by encouraging the exchange of opposing views. Hate speech is antithetical to this objective in that it shuts down dialogue by making it difficult or impossible for members of the vulnerable group to respond, thereby stifling discourse. Speech that has the effect of shutting down public debate cannot dodge prohibition on the basis that it promotes debate.

(iv) Conclusion on Minimal Impairment

[145] The prohibition against hate speech involves balancing between freedom of expression and equality rights. People are free to debate or speak out against the rights or characteristics of vulnerable groups, but not in a manner which is objectively seen to expose them to hatred and its harmful effects. The only expression that should be suppressed by the prohibition is that which Dickson C.J. recognized in Keegstra as straying "some distance from the spirit of s. 2(b) [of the Charter]" (p. 766).

(c) Whether the Benefits Outweigh the Deleterious Effects

[148] As is apparent from the above analysis, in my opinion, the benefits of the suppression of hate speech and its harmful effects outweigh the detrimental effect of restricting expression which, by its nature, does little to promote the values underlying freedom of expression. Section 14(1)(b) of the Code represents a choice by the legislature to discourage hate speech and its harmful effects on both the vulnerable group and on society as a whole, in a manner that is conciliatory and remedial. In cases such as the present, the process under the legislation can provide guidance to individuals like Mr. Whatcott, so that they can continue expressing their views in a way that avoids falling within the narrow scope of expression captured by the statutory prohibition. The protection of vulnerable groups from the harmful effects emanating from hate speech is of such importance as to justify the minimal infringement of expression that results from the restriction of materials of this kind.

[The court then applied s. 14 to the flyers that were distributed by Mr Whatcott. The court decided that two of the flyers contained text that breached the hate speech ban, while the other two did not. The court thought that a "reasonable observer" would conclude that two of the flyers were likely to expose gays and lesbians to hatred because they displayed several of the "hallmarks": "portray[ing] the targeted group as a menace that could threaten the safety and well-being of others," and children, in particular, drawing on authoritative sources, such as the Bible, "to lend credibility to the negative generalizations," and creating "a tone of hatred" through the use of "vilifying and derogatory representations" that described gays as "filthy" and "degenerated" (187–8). The court found that the other two flyers did not breach the code. In the court's view, while the flyers may have been offensive, a reasonable person, "aware of the relevant context and circumstances" would not read these flyers "as exposing or likely to expose persons of same-sex orientation to detestation and vilification" (196).]

3.3.5 Case note: Zundel

In R v. Zundel, 1992 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 731, a writer and publisher of Holocaust denial material was prosecuted under s. 181 of the Criminal Code, which prohibits the wilful publication of "a statement, tale or news that [the publisher] knows is false and causes or is likely to cause injury or mischief to a public interest." The crime of spreading "false news" had been introduced in England in 1275 and was intended to protect the nobility from scurrilous attacks. The offence was included in the first Canadian Criminal Code in 1892, even though it had been repealed in England several years earlier. The case against Zundel was brought under this obscure provision because the Attorney General of Ontario had declined to give his consent to the prosecution of Zundel under the Criminal Code ban on the wilful promotion of hatred. The case consequently began as a private prosecution; however, the Crown took over the case prior to the trial. The jury in the case decided that Zundel knew that his claims were false and found him guilty of the offence. However, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a majority judgment written by McLachlin J, decided that s. 181 breached s. 2(b) and could not be justified under s. 1. McLachlin J decided that lies and exaggerations fall within the scope of s. 2(b) because such statements convey a message and may sometimes be of public value:

> Exaggeration – even clear falsification – may arguably serve useful social purposes linked to the values underlying freedom of expression. A person fighting cruelty to animals may knowingly cite false statistics in pursuit of his or her beliefs and with the purpose of communicating a more fundamental message, e.g., "cruelty must be stopped." A doctor, in order to persuade people to be inoculated against a burgeoning epidemic, may exaggerate the number or geographical location of persons potentially infected with the virus. … All of this expression arguably has intrinsic value in fostering political participation and individual self-fulfillment. To accept the proposition that deliberate lies can never fall under s. 2(b) would be to exclude statements such as the examples above from the possibility of constitutional protection. I cannot accept that such was the intention of the framers of the Constitution. (Zundel 1992, 754)

Having decided that lies are protected speech, and therefore that s. 181 breached s. 2(b), McLachlin J went on to consider whether the restriction was justified under s. 1. In her view, neither the language of the provision nor its legislative history pointed to a legitimate purpose for the law. She argued that even if the dissenting judges were right that the purpose of the provision could now be viewed as the protection of racial and social tolerance, the ban on false news was vague and overbroad and so failed the minimal impairment element of the Oakes test. She was particularly concerned that, in applying the provision, a court would infer "knowledge of falsity" when the statement "diverge[d] from prevailing or officially accepted beliefs" (Zundel 1992). The consequence of this would be that an individual could be convicted "for virtually any statement which does not accord with currently accepted 'truths'" (Zundel 1992).

3.3.6 Questions

1. How does hate speech cause harm? Is its restriction compatible with the constitutional protection of free expression?
2. If hate speech should be restricted, is it better to do so though the criminal law, human rights codes, or other means?
3. Should lies be protected under s.2(b)? Do they have value, as McLachlin J. claimed in Zundel?

3.4 Harassing and bullying expression

There are a variety of laws in Canada that restrict insults directed at individuals or groups in particular contexts. It is accepted that racist, sexist, and other insults should be banned in the workplace, in schools, and in other similar environments, where they are difficult to avoid. The workplace environment is both closed and hierarchical and so a higher standard of civility may reasonably be expected. There is also increasing support for bans on racist and other types of insult in public spaces, such as a downtown street or public park.

When insults are directed at group members in the workplace or the streets, the abuser and the abused, occupy the same physical space – the school yard, the office, the street. The insults can be difficult to avoid whether they come from one or a few individuals in the workplace or from a succession of strangers in the streets. Most abuse, though, now takes place online – on X (Twitter), and other social media platforms. Social media has enlarged the space in which harassment and abuse occur. The parameters of the virtual space that abuser and abused occupy are less easily defined and can encompass a potentially large group of individuals. Abuse online can be anonymous, extensive, and persistent.

Several provinces have enacted cyber-bulling laws, which apply primarily in the education context. These laws prohibit a number of activities, such as threats, harassment, counselling suicide, and impersonating someone online. The Criminal Code prohibits criminal harassment (s. 264(1)) and uttering threats (s. 264.1(1)) and now includes a ban on publishing or transmitting intimate images of a person, without that person's consent (s. 62.1).

3.4.1 Case notes: Chaplinsky and Snyder

In Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 US 568, 569 1942, the US Supreme Court held that "fighting words" – those which "by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace" fell outside the scope of First Amendment protection. "Such words," said the court, "as ordinary people know, are likely to cause a fight" (Chaplinsky 1942, 320). This exception extends only to insults that are extreme and made face to face.

In Snyder v. Phelps, 562 US 443 (2010) the US Supreme Court held that the imposition of civil liability for emotional distress in a case involving a protest by the Westboro Baptist Church near a military funeral was prohibited under the First Amendment. Chief Justice Roberts for the majority of the court said: "Speech is powerful. It can stir people to action, move them to tears of both joy and sorry and – as it did here – inflict great pain. On the facts, before us, we cannot react to the pain by punishing the speaker. As a nation we have chosen a different course – to protect even hurtful speech on public issues to ensure we do not stifle public debate."

3.4.2 Ward v. Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse)

Ward v. Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse)*, 2021 SCC 43, [2021] 3 SCR 176

> English version of the judgment of Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ. delivered by
> THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND CÔTÉ J. —
> Introduction
> [1] This appeal concerns the legal framework that applies to a discrimination claim involving a public figure's right to the safeguard of his dignity, on the one hand, and a professional comedian's freedom of expression, on the other. It invites us, incidentally, to clarify the scope of the jurisdiction of the Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse ("Commission") and the Human Rights Tribunal ("Tribunal") with respect to discrimination claims based on the Charter of human rights and freedoms, CQLR, c. C-12 ("Charter" or "Quebec Charter").
> [2] Very often, discrimination complaints are made in the context of employment, housing, or goods and services available to the public. In this case, the complaint that gave rise to the appeal is quite different, as it concerns a professional comedian, the appellant, Mike Ward, who mocked a public figure with a disability, Jérémy Gabriel.
> Background
> [9] At the time of the events alleged against Mr. Ward, Mr. Gabriel was a minor and a student in secondary school, and he had an artistic career as a singer. The circumstances in which Mr. Gabriel began that career, at the age of 8 and with his parents' support, are commendable. He was born with Treacher Collins syndrome, which caused certain malformations of the head as well as profound deafness. When he was 6 years old, he received a bone-anchored hearing aid that made it possible for him to hear 80 to 90 percent of sounds. Thanks to that hearing aid, he learned to speak and to sing.

[10] The first two years of his career, 2005 and 2006, were highlighted by several events that received media coverage (e.g., performance of the national anthem at a sporting event, an invitation to sing for Céline Dion, and a musical performance in Rome in the presence of Pope Benedict XVI). …

[11] Mr. Ward, for his part, is a professional comedian and a graduate of the École nationale de l'humour whose career began in 1993. His performances, for which he has won many awards, are, he says, in the style of dark comedy, a comedy genre in which shocking subjects or social taboos are "tackled".

[12] From September 2010 to March 2013, Mr. Ward gave a show called Mike Ward s'eXpose, the main theme of which was tolerance and the fact that [TRANSLATION] "we are all the same". Around 135,000 tickets were sold. This litigation centres on one of the routines in that show, called [TRANSLATION] The Untouchables. In that routine, Mr. Ward mocked certain figures in Quebec's artistic community whom he described as [TRANSLATION] "sacred cows" that could not be made fun of for various reasons, whether because of their wealth or their influence, or because "they are seen as weak" … Mr. Gabriel was one of the public figures referred to in the routine.

[13] In addition to that show, Mr. Ward made several videos on topical subjects that were posted on his website. The videos were about a number of public figures. One of them was posted in connection with the release of Mr. Gabriel's autobiography. In that video, Mr. Ward made disparaging comments about Mr. Gabriel's physical appearance.

[15] In 2012, Mr. Gabriel's parents filed a complaint with the Commission, on their own behalf and on behalf of Mr. Gabriel, sometime after the broadcast of a television interview with Mr. Ward that included an excerpt from the routine called The Untouchables concerning their son. The Commission concluded that there was a basis for discrimination and referred the complaint to the Tribunal.

Issue

[22] The only issue is that of the legal framework that applies to a discrimination claim under the Quebec Charter, in a context involving freedom of expression, in order to determine whether, in this case, Mr. Ward interfered with Mr. Gabriel's right to the safeguard of his dignity and thereby in fact discriminated against him.

V. Relevant Provisions of the Quebec Charter

[23] The provisions of the Quebec Charter at issue in this appeal, as they read at the relevant time, are as follows:

> CHAPTER I
> FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS AND RIGHTS
> 3. Every person is the possessor of the fundamental freedoms, including freedom of conscience, freedom of religion, freedom of opinion, freedom of expression, freedom of peaceful assembly and freedom of association.
> 4. Every person has a right to the safeguard of his dignity, honour and reputation.
> ...
> 9.1. In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec.
> In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law.
> RIGHT TO EQUAL RECOGNITION AND EXERCISE OF RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS
> 10. Every person has a right to full and equal recognition and exercise of his human rights and freedoms, without distinction, exclusion or preference based on race, colour, sex, pregnancy, sexual orientation, civil status, age except as provided by law, religion, political convictions, language, ethnic or national origin, social condition, a handicap or the use of any means to palliate a handicap. Discrimination exists where such a distinction, exclusion or preference has the effect of nullifying or impairing such right.

[36] A plaintiff claiming the protection of s. 10 must satisfy a burden of proof that has three elements. First, the plaintiff must prove a "distinction, exclusion or preference" (Quebec Charter, s. 10), that is, "a decision, a measure or conduct [that] 'affects [him or her] differently from others to whom it may apply'" (Bombardier, at para. 42, quoting Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Simpsons-Sears Ltd., 1985 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 536, at p. 551). Second, the plaintiff must establish that one of the characteristics expressly protected in s. 10 was a factor in the differential treatment complained of (Bombardier, at paras. 52 and 56). Third, the plaintiff must show that the differential treatment impairs the full and equal exercise or recognition of a freedom or right guaranteed by the Quebec Charter (Bombardier, at para. 53). Where these three elements are established, the burden of justifying the discrimination falls on the defendant.

> 9.1. In exercising his fundamental freedoms and rights, a person shall maintain a proper regard for democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec.
> In this respect, the scope of the freedoms and rights, and limits to their exercise, may be fixed by law.

[40] … Before it can be found that there has been discrimination in the recognition or exercise of a right provided for in any of ss. 1 to 9, the protection of that right must be called for in light of the "democratic values, public order and the general well-being of the citizens of Québec" referred to in s. 9.1, as it read at the relevant time. There is no discrimination if, in a particular context, s. 9.1 gives the right exercised by the defendant precedence over the right invoked by the plaintiff in combination with s. 10. This is why the elements of discrimination cannot be analyzed in isolation. To do so would make it possible to circumvent the reasonable limits on the right invoked in support of s. 10 by giving that right an unlimited scope. …

(4) Test That Applies Where There is a Conflict Between the Right to the Safeguard of Dignity and the Right to Freedom of Expression

[83] The test for resolving a conflict between the right to freedom of expression and the right to the safeguard of dignity requires … that it be determined, first, whether a reasonable person, aware of the relevant context and circumstances, would view the expression targeting an individual or group as inciting others to vilify them or to detest their humanity on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination. This first criterion is more in keeping with the requirements of the Canadian Charter as formulated in Whatcott. Hate speech within the meaning of Whatcott is therefore prohibited, as is expression that has the same effects on personal dignity without meeting the definition of hatred given in that case.

[84] Second, it must be shown that a reasonable person would view the expression, considered in its context, as likely to lead to discriminatory treatment of the person targeted. Discrimination within the meaning of the Quebec Charter … involves differential treatment that affects an individual's social acceptance. As a result, only expression that, considered in its context, is likely to jeopardize the social acceptance of the individual or group is discriminatory (Whatcott, at paras. 178 and 191). The analysis is focused not on the content of the expression as such, but on its likely effects on third parties, that is, the discriminatory treatment likely to result from it (Whatcott, at paras. 54, 58 and 82).

[85] In this regard, the mode of expression and the effect of the mode of expression are determinative. Expression that stirs up extreme and intrinsically dangerous emotions like hatred in an audience clearly does not have the same impact as expression that is calm and rational. This does not mean, of course, that speech that purports to be scientific or rational is incapable of arousing the contempt of the majority for the humanity of vulnerable groups. But in general, expression that appeals to an audience's reason or to emotions free of any real motivating force will be unlikely to lead to discriminatory treatment of the targeted individual or group.

[88] First, expression that attacks or ridicules people may inspire feelings of disdain or superiority in relation to them, but it generally does not encourage the denial of their humanity or their marginalization in the eyes of the majority (Whatcott, at paras. 89-91). It is true that ridicule, if pushed to the limit, could cross this line, but it will do so only in extreme and unusual circumstances.

[89] Second, humour, whether in good or in bad taste, rarely has [TRANSLATION] "the spillover effect needed to give rise to an attitude of hatred and discrimination among third parties" (Rainville, at p. 68). It involves well-known methods such as [TRANSLATION] "exaggeration, over-generalization, provocation and distortion of reality" (C.A. reasons, at para. 129, per Savard J.A.). The audience is able to identify these methods, when they are clear, and must be acknowledged to be discerning enough not to take everything said at face value (see, by analogy, Bou Malhab, at para. 74; S. Martin, "Rira bien qui rira le dernier: la caricature confrontée au droit à l'image" (2004), 16 C.P.I. 611, at pp. 621-22). This is all the more true where the expression comes from a person publicly known for their particular type of humour (see, by analogy, Bou Malhab, at para. 89) or where it targets a public figure whose fame exposes them to such commentary (see, by analogy, WIC Radio Ltd. v. Simpson, 2008 SCC 40, [2008] 2 SCR 420, at para. 48; Trudeau v. AD4 Distribution Canada inc., 2014 QCCA 1740, at paras. 21-22 (CanLII)). Other than in exceptional cases, it would be surprising if expression in such circumstances had enough motivating force to lead to discriminatory treatment.

[90] These clarifications must not be interpreted as resulting in a form of impunity for comedians or as diminishing the protection given by the law to public figures. There is less of a risk that expression will lead to discrimination where it involves supposedly humorous comments that are made by a well-known comedian or that concern a person known to the public. And in the absence of a sufficiently serious risk, the claim must fail.

D. Application to This Case

[91] In summary, we are of the view that Mr. Gabriel was made subject to a distinction by being targeted by Mr. Ward's comments. However, in light of the Tribunal's finding that Mr. Ward [TRANSLATION] "did not choose Jérémy because of his handicap" but rather "because he was a public personality" (Tribunal reasons, at para. 86), it must be concluded that the distinction was not based on a prohibited ground. This conclusion on its own is sufficient to dispose of the appeal. Nonetheless, we believe that it will be helpful to analyze discrimination in its entirety in light of the particular context of this case.

(3) Impairing the Recognition of the Right to the Safeguard of Dignity

[105] … The context here is that of a dark comedy show meant for an audience that had paid to hear this kind of talk. In his show, Mr. Ward said that it had become impossible in Quebec to mock people without risking legal proceedings. He said that he wanted to take risks and poke fun at the "untouchables", that is, people whom Quebecers like and who are successful and powerful. After mocking the physical appearance of many public figures, Mr. Ward came to Mr. Gabriel, whom he described to his audience as a young person with a loudspeaker on his head. Alluding to the complaints of those who did not really appreciate Mr. Gabriel's artistic talent, he said that he had defended Mr. Gabriel's right to live out his dream, believing that he was about to die. Mr. Ward added that, because Mr. Gabriel had not died, he had tried to drown him but had not succeeded. In ending the routine, he said that he had discovered from searches that Mr. Gabriel's illness was being ugly.

[106] As for the video, it was made in connection with the release of Mr. Gabriel's autobiography in 2008, two years after the launch of the show in issue. The comedian made the video available on his professional website for about a year. It consisted of a photograph of the young Mr. Gabriel in which only the eyes and mouth moved. Using a disguised voice, Mr. Ward made his target speak in the first person. In the video, Mr. Gabriel was presented as a young person with a loudspeaker on his head and a mouth that did not close all the way.

[110] That being said, even if we had found that the comments incited others to vilify Mr. Gabriel or to detest his humanity on the basis of a prohibited ground, the analysis of the second requirement of the test set out in this decision would also have led to the denial of his claim. A reasonable person could not view the comments made by Mr. Ward, considered in their context, as likely to lead to discriminatory treatment of Mr. Gabriel.

[111] At first instance, the Tribunal found that Mr. Gabriel's classmates [TRANSLATION] "were inspired by [Mr.] Ward's comments" to make fun of him (para. 114 (emphasis added)). That evidence is relevant only insofar as it tells us something about the likely effect of the comments. It must be remembered that the test is objective. It should therefore be kept in mind that something that occurs following a person's conduct is not necessarily a result of that conduct. Thus, the fact that people are inspired by certain comments does not mean that this is a likely effect of those comments. Of course, it is foreseeable that comments made by a well-known comedian will have repercussions outside their initial context, but this does not mean that those repercussions can necessarily be attributed to the comedian. It must still be determined whether, viewed objectively, the comments encouraged such repercussions. In our view, this is not the case here.

[112] The impugned comments involved open provocation and systematic exaggeration — methods that increased their derisory effect. They were made by a career comedian known for this type of humour. They exploited, rightly or wrongly, a feeling of discomfort in order to entertain, but they did little more than that. As a result, the comments made in the video and the show, considered in their context, were not likely to have a spillover effect that could lead to discriminatory treatment of Mr. Gabriel.

[113] Accordingly, the Commission did not meet the requirements for succeeding under ss. 4 and 10 of the Quebec Charter. But this conclusion does not mean that Mr. Gabriel was without recourse following these events. Other recourses were available. For example, though we express no opinion on the chances of success of these alternative recourses, Mr. Gabriel could have invoked the protection against harassment provided for in s. 10.1 of the Charter because of the fact that he had been bullied. He could also have brought an action in defamation. However, neither the Commission nor the Tribunal has jurisdiction over defamation. The combination of the norm of equality in the Quebec Charter and the right to the safeguard of dignity cannot confer such jurisdiction on them indirectly.

IX. Disposition

[114] The appeal is allowed without costs. The judgments of the Tribunal and the Court of Appeal are set aside as they relate to Mr. Gabriel.

[Justices Abella and Kasirer, in a dissenting judgment, decided that the speech in this case amounted to bullying, a "contemptuous affront" to Gabriel's identity (para 163), because it "played on harmful dehumanizing attitudes towards children with disabilities" and reached a large audience (para 218).]

3.4.4 Questions

1. In the Ward case should it have made a difference to the outcome that Mr. Gabriel was a minor?
2. In Ward the majority focused on the way in which the speech might affect the attitudes and actions of Mr. Ward's audience (and so the majority adopted a test similar to that followed in Whatcott). The dissenting judges, however, focused on the impact of the speech on Mr. Gabriel, and viewed it as a form of bullying. Which approach makes most sense to you?
3. Online harassment has become a significant problem. How is this form of harassment different from earlier forms? How can or should the law respond to it?

3.5 Defamation

In Canada, defamation can give rise to a civil action under the common law, but also, exceptionally, to a criminal prosecution. The Criminal Code prohibits, as "defamatory libel," any published material "that is likely to injure the reputation of any person by exposing him to hatred, contempt or ridicule, or that is designed to insult the person." The prohibition on defamatory libel in s. 301 of the code applies regardless of whether the libellous statement is true or false. While this provision remains on the books, several courts have held that it is unconstitutional. However, in R. v. Lucas, 1998 CanLII 815 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 439, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the other part of the criminal ban on defamatory libel, s. 300, which prohibits libel that the speaker knows to be false. The court thought that preventing attacks on an individual's reputation was a "legitimate goal" of the criminal law: "Wilful and false" attacks on an individual's reputation harmed "the innate dignity of the individual" and their "fruitful participation in Canadian society" (Lucas at para 48). In the court's view, the offence was narrowly drawn, requiring the prosecution to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused intended to defame the individual and that they knew their defamatory statements were false.

Defamation, under the common law, occurs when an individual makes a statement to one or more people about another individual that tends to lower the reputation of that other individual from the perspective of a reasonable person. Until Grant v Torstar Corp, 2009 SCC 61, 3 SCR 640, defamation was a strict liability wrong, in the sense that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that the defendant had acted maliciously or carelessly when making the defamatory statement. If an individual is able to show that they have been defamed, the person accused of having defamed them may raise one or more of a number of defences, including that their statement was true, that it was privileged, or that it amounted to fair comment. In Grant, the Supreme Court of Canada added to this list the defence of "responsible communication."

Introduction

[2] … [F]reedom of expression is not absolute. One limitation on free expression is the law of defamation, which protects a person's reputation from unjustified assault. The law of defamation does not forbid people from expressing themselves. It merely provides that if a person defames another, that person may be required to pay damages to the other for the harm caused to the other's reputation. However, if the defences available to a publisher are too narrowly defined, the result may be "libel chill", undermining freedom of expression and of the press.

[3] Two conflicting values are at stake — on the one hand freedom of expression and on the other the protection of reputation. While freedom of expression is a fundamental freedom protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter, courts have long recognized that protection of reputation is also worthy of legal recognition. The challenge of courts has been to strike an appropriate balance between them in articulating the common law of defamation. …

V. Analysis

Should the Common Law Provide a Defence Based on Responsible Communication in the Public Interest?

(1) The Current Law

[28] A plaintiff in a defamation action is required to prove three things to obtain judgment and an award of damages: (1) that the impugned words were defamatory, in the sense that they would tend to lower the plaintiff's reputation in the eyes of a reasonable person; (2) that the words in fact referred to the plaintiff; and (3) that the words were published, meaning that they were communicated to at least one person other than the plaintiff. If these elements are established on a balance of probabilities, falsity and damage are presumed … The plaintiff is not required to show that the defendant intended to do harm, or even that the defendant was careless. The tort is thus one of strict liability.

[30] Both statements of opinion and statements of fact may attract the defence of privilege, depending on the occasion on which they were made. Some "occasions", like Parliamentary and legal proceedings, are absolutely privileged. Others, like reference letters or credit reports, enjoy "qualified" privilege, meaning that the privilege can be defeated by proof that the defendant acted with malice … The law acknowledges through recognition of privileged occasions that false and defamatory expression may sometimes contribute to desirable social ends.

[33] To succeed on the defence of justification, a defendant must adduce evidence showing that the statement was substantially true. This may be difficult to do. A journalist who has checked sources and is satisfied that a statement is substantially true may nevertheless have difficulty proving this in court, perhaps years after the event. The practical result of the gap between responsible verification and the ability to prove truth in a court of law on some date far in the future, is that the defence of justification is often of little utility to journalists and those who publish their stories.

[38] Two related arguments are presented in support of broadening the defences available to public communicators, such as the press, in reporting matters of fact.

[39] The first argument is grounded in principle. It asserts that the existing law is inconsistent with the principle of freedom of expression as guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter. In the modern context, it is argued, the traditional rule has a chilling effect that unjustifiably limits reporting facts, and strikes a balance too heavily weighted in favour of protection of reputation. While the law should provide redress for baseless attacks on reputation, defamation lawsuits, real or threatened, should not be a weapon by which the wealthy and privileged stifle the information and debate essential to a free society.

[53] Freedom does not negate responsibility. It is vital that the media act responsibly in reporting facts on matters of public concern, holding themselves to the highest journalistic standards. But to insist on court-established certainty in reporting on matters of public interest may have the effect of preventing communication of facts which a reasonable person would accept as reliable and which are relevant and important to public debate. The existing common law rules mean, in effect, that the publisher must be certain before publication that it can prove the statement to be true in a court of law, should a suit be filed. Verification of the facts and reliability of the sources may lead a publisher to a reasonable certainty of their truth, but that is different from knowing that one will be able to prove their truth in a court of law, perhaps years later. This, in turn, may have a chilling effect on what is published. Information that is reliable and in the public's interest to know may never see the light of day.

[54] … Fear of being sued for libel may prevent the publication of information about matters of public interest. The public may never learn the full truth on the matter at hand.

[55] Against this, it is argued that false statements cannot advance the purposes of s. 2(b). This contention, however, is belied by the fact the existing defence of privilege concedes: sometimes the public interest requires that untrue statements should be granted immunity, because of the importance of robust debate on matters of public interest (e.g. Parliamentary privilege), or the importance of discussion and disclosure as a means of getting at the truth (e.g. police reports, employment recommendations).

[56] The argument also overlooks the fact that the Charter's s. 2(b) protection is not confined to statements that a person can ultimately prove are true. As Professor Boivin puts it:

> Those who argue that false and defamatory publications have a weak claim to Charter protection omit to mention that it is only at trial, usually several years after publication, that a trier of fact determines whether a defence of justification is well founded. Moreover, it is only then that the defamatory nature of the publication is assessed. Surely freedom of expression encompasses more than statements which, after the fact, are either proven factually accurate or do not injure someone's reputation. [Emphasis added.]

[57] I conclude that media reporting on matters of public interest engages the first and second rationales of the freedom of expression guarantee in the Charter [democracy and truth]. … It is simply beyond debate that the limited defences available to press-related defendants may have the effect of inhibiting political discourse and debate on matters of public importance, and impeding the cut and thrust of discussion necessary to discovery of the truth.

[58] This brings me to the competing value: protection of reputation. Canadian law recognizes that the right to free expression does not confer a licence to ruin reputations. In assessing the constitutionality of the Criminal Code's defamatory libel provisions, for example, the Court has affirmed that "[t]he protection of an individual's reputation from wilful and false attack recognizes both the innate dignity of the individual and the integral link between reputation and the fruitful participation of an individual in Canadian society": R. v. Lucas, 1998 CanLII 815 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 439, at para. 48, per Cory J. This applies both to private citizens and to people in public life. People who enter public life cannot reasonably expect to be immune from criticism, some of it harsh and undeserved. But nor does participation in public life amount to open season on reputation.

[61] … The law must take due account of the damage to the plaintiff's reputation. But this does not preclude consideration of whether the defendant acted responsibly, nor of the social value to a free society of debate on matters of public interest. …

[62] The protection offered by a new defence [of responsible communication] based on conduct is meaningful for both the publisher and those whose reputations are at stake. If the publisher fails to take appropriate steps having regard to all the circumstances, it will be liable. The press and others engaged in public communication on matters of public interest, like bloggers, must act carefully, having regard to the injury to reputation that a false statement can cause. A defence based on responsible conduct reflects the social concern that the media should be held accountable through the law of defamation. … The requirement that the publisher of defamatory material act responsibly provides accountability and comports with the reasonable expectations of those whose conduct brings them within the sphere of public interest. People in public life are entitled to expect that the media and other reporters will act responsibly in protecting them from false accusations and innuendo. They are not, however, entitled to demand perfection and the inevitable silencing of critical comment that a standard of perfection would impose.

[65] Having considered the arguments on both sides of the debate from the perspective of principle, I conclude that the current law with respect to statements that are reliable and important to public debate does not give adequate weight to the constitutional value of free expression. While the law must protect reputation, the level of protection currently accorded by the law — in effect a regime of strict liability — is not justifiable. The law of defamation currently accords no protection for statements on matters of public interest published to the world at large if they cannot, for whatever reason, be proven to be true. But such communications advance both free expression rationales mentioned above — democratic discourse and truth-finding — and therefore require some protection within the law of defamation. When proper weight is given to the constitutional value of free expression on matters of public interest, the balance tips in favour of broadening the defences available to those who communicate facts it is in the public's interest to know.

[66] A consideration of the jurisprudence of other common law democracies favours replacing the current Canadian law governing redress for defamatory statements of fact on matters of public interest, with a rule that gives greater scope to freedom of expression while offering adequate protection of reputation. Different countries canvassed have taken different approaches. Most, however, give more weight to the value of freedom of expression and robust public debate than does the traditional Canadian approach.

[The court then discusses the relevant caselaw in the US, UK, NZ, SA and Australia]

B. The Elements of the Defence of Responsible Communication

(2) Formulating the Defence of Responsible Communication on Matters of Public Interest

[98] … I … would formulate the test as follows. First, the publication must be on a matter of public interest. Second, the defendant must show that publication was responsible, in that he or she was diligent in trying to verify the allegation(s), having regard to all the relevant circumstances.

(a) Was the Publication on a Matter of Public Interest?

[99] To be protected by the defence of responsible communication, the publication must be on a matter of public interest.

[100] …[W]hether a statement's publication is in the public interest involves factual issues. But it is primarily a question of law; the judge is asked to determine whether the nature of the statement is such that protection may be warranted in the public interest. …

[101] In determining whether a publication is on a matter of public interest, the judge must consider the subject matter of the publication as a whole. The defamatory statement should not be scrutinized in isolation. … If it is, and if the evidence is legally capable of supporting the defence, as I will explain below, the judge should put the case to the jury for the ultimate determination of responsibility.

[103] The authorities offer no single "test" for public interest, nor a static list of topics falling within the public interest (see, e.g., Gatley on Libel and Slander (11th ed. 2008), at p. 530). Guidance, however, may be found in the cases on fair comment and s. 2(b) of the Charter.

[104] … Whenever a matter is such as to affect people at large, so that they may be legitimately interested in, or concerned at, what is going on; or what may happen to them or to others; then it is a matter of public interest on which everyone is entitled to make fair comment. [p. 198]

[105] To be of public interest, the subject matter "must be shown to be one inviting public attention, or about which the public has some substantial concern because it affects the welfare of citizens, or one to which considerable public notoriety or controversy has attached": Brown, vol. 2, at pp. 15-137 and 15-138. …

[The court found that in this case the evidence revealed a basis for several defences including the defence of responsible communication on a matter of public interest. The court therefore ordered a new trial].

[2] Through a class action, the appellant sought compensation for the injury allegedly suffered by the members of the group as a result of racist comments made by a radio host concerning Montréal taxi drivers whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole. The respondents argued, successfully in the Court of Appeal, that the members had not been personally affected and cannot be compensated. I find that there was no personal injury in this case and that the rules of civil liability accordingly do not authorize compensation. I would therefore dismiss the appeal.

V. Analysis

[14] A. I will begin by considering the concept of defamation in Quebec civil law. I will then look at its specific characteristics where the allegedly defamatory comments were made about a group. Finally, I will apply these rules to the facts of this appeal.

Defamation in the Civil Law

[16] The concept of defamation requires that the right to the protection of reputation be reconciled with the right to freedom of expression, since that which belongs to the former is generally taken away from the latter. …

[17] Freedom of expression is protected by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 2(b), and the Charter of human rights and freedoms, R.S.Q., c. C-12, s. 3

("Quebec Charter"). …

[18] The right to the safeguard of reputation is guaranteed by the Quebec Charter (s. 4) and the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64, arts. 3 and 35. Since good reputation is related to dignity (Hill, at paras. 120-21), it is also tied to the rights protected by the Canadian Charter. Reputation is a fundamental feature of personality that makes it possible for an individual to develop in society. It is therefore essential to do everything possible to safeguard a person's reputation, since a tarnished reputation can seldom regain its former lustre (Hill, at para. 108).

[19] Of course, there is no precise measuring instrument that can determine the point at which a balance is struck between the protection of reputation and freedom of expression. In reconciling these two rights, the principles on which a free and democratic society is based must be respected. The intersection point will change as society changes. …

(2) Constituent Elements of Defamation in Quebec Civil Law

[22] In Quebec, there is no specific form of action for punishing defamation. Actions in defamation come under the general system of civil liability established in art. 1457 C.C.Q. The plaintiff is entitled to compensation if fault, injury and a causal connection are all present. Fault is determined by looking at the defendant's conduct, while injury is assessed by looking at the impact of that conduct on the victim, and a causal link is established where the decision maker finds that a connection exists between the fault and the injury. This is an area of law where it is important to make a clear distinction between fault and injury. Proof of injury is not a basis for presuming that a fault was committed. Proof that a fault was committed does not, without more, establish the existence of a compensable injury.

[42] The instant case … raises the … question of group defamation. It presents some specific problems that need to be considered.

B. Defamatory Nature of Comments Made About a Group of People

(1) Need to Prove Personal Injury

[43] An action in defamation can succeed only if personal injury has actually been sustained by the plaintiff or plaintiffs. This requirement also applies where the defamatory comments are made about a group.

(3) Factors Used to Determine Whether Personal Injury Has Been Sustained

[57] In any action in defamation, injury is proved if the plaintiff satisfies the judge that the impugned comments are defamatory, that is, that an ordinary person would believe that they tarnished the plaintiff's reputation. The same test is used where the comments apply a priori to a group of individuals, but special attention will then have to be paid to the personal nature of the injury. The plaintiff or plaintiffs must prove that an ordinary person would have believed that each of them personally sustained damage to his or her reputation.

[58] The judge must thus analyse the impugned comments, taking into account all the circumstances in which they were made. Although it is impossible to draw up an exhaustive list of the criteria used to determine whether personal injury has been sustained, a number of factors can nevertheless help the judge in this process. …

(i) Size of the Group

[59] The size of the group is the factor to which the courts have attached the greatest importance in Quebec and elsewhere. Generally speaking, it is recognized that the larger the group, the more difficult it is to prove that personal injury has been sustained by the member or members bringing the action.

[64] However, the size of the group is not a decisive factor and must be balanced with other considerations. There is no maximum size beyond which the members of a group no longer have a cause of action in defamation. The personal nature of injury can be determined only through a contextual analysis. In the common law, this multi-factored approach involves assessing the "intensity of suspicion" the comments could create in the mind of a sensible person …

(ii) Nature of the Group

[65] In general, the more strictly organized and homogeneous the group, the easier it will be to establish that the injury is personal to each member of the group. …

[66] Conversely, the imputing of a single characteristic to all members of a group that is highly heterogeneous, has no specific organization or has flexible, broadly defined admission criteria would make an allegation of personal injury implausible. For example, the Quebec Court of Appeal has dismissed actions in defamation based on comments made about Scientology (Cabay) and the Falun Gong doctrine (Zhang).

[67] Where the group's members are identifiable or very visible in the community, it will be easier to prove that they sustained personal injury. In A.U.P.E., for example, the Alberta trial court noted that correctional officers could easily be recognized by their uniforms and, from that fact, drew an inference in favour of the plaintiffs' position.

[68] Finally, in certain circumstances, the fact that a group has historically been stigmatized may mean that insults and offensive comments made about the group will stick more easily to its members. The vulnerability of the members of the group thus makes them targets more susceptible to personal defamation.

(iii) Plaintiff's Relationship With the Group

[69] The plaintiff's status, duties, responsibilities or activities in the group can make it easier to prove personal injury. …

[70] A person who is a well-known member of a group is more likely to suffer damage to his or her reputation as a result of comments made about the group. …

(iv) Real Target of the Defamation

[71] The judge must also consider the words, gestures or images used to convey the message in order to determine the real target of the attacks. The precision or generality of the allegations will influence the analysis of the personal nature of the injury. The more general, evasive and vague the allegations, the more difficult it will be to go behind the screen of the group. For example, attacks on a doctrine, policy, opinion or religion must be distinguished from attacks on the persons supporting it, since proving personal injury will be complicated in the former situation. …

[72] Moreover, where allegations apply to only one segment of a group, it will be more difficult for them to reflect personally on all members of the group. This occurs where the comments include an expression such as "some", "a few", "several", "most" or "all but one". …

(v) Seriousness or Extravagance of the Allegations

[73] As the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal stated in Butler v. Southam, "the more serious or inflammatory the allegation, the wider may be its sting" (para. 68)….

[74] In some circumstances, the seriousness of the allegations will have the opposite effect: an ordinary person will see exaggeration, excessive generalization or extravagance in the allegations and will give them less credence as a result. Thus, where there is no rational connection between an allegation and the members of a group, the statements made will not be accepted by an ordinary person because, as Lord Atkin explained in Knupffer, "the habit of making unfounded generalizations is ingrained in ill-educated or vulgar minds [and] the words are occasionally intended to be a facetious exaggeration" (at p. 122). …

(vi) Plausibility of the Comments and Tendency to Be Accepted

[76] Generally speaking, a plausible or convincing allegation will capture the ordinary person's attention more and thus make it easier for that person to connect the allegation with each or some of the group's members personally. Conversely, the ordinary person will quickly brush aside implausible allegations without connecting them with the group's members personally.

[77] The context of an allegation also has an impact on its plausibility and on the likelihood of its being accepted. The fact that a group is big, that it is heterogeneous, or that the comments are general or exaggerated are all factors that will reduce the probability that the ordinary person would believe the assertion.

C. Application to the Facts of the Case at Bar

[80] Injury is the only one of the three elements of civil liability that is in issue in this case. The wrongful nature of Mr. Arthur's conduct is not in dispute. The respondents concede that, as the Court of Appeal found, [TRANSLATION] "the impugned comments, which we are not trying to excuse by invoking some journalistic standard of conduct, were made without regard for their potential impact on other people even though the person making them should have known that they were false, rude or exaggerated" (para. 27 of the reasons). The appellant is challenging the conclusion of the majority of the Court of Appeal that the members of the group did not sustain compensable injury. In light of the legal principles explained above, it is my opinion that the Court of Appeal's conclusion must be upheld.

[81] Mr. Arthur's comments were directed at the group made up of taxi drivers working in Montréal whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole. Therefore, what needs to be asked is whether an ordinary person would have believed that the comments damaged the reputation of each member of that group, with the result that each of them sustained personal injury. …

[82] Mr. Arthur made accusations of uncleanliness, arrogance, incompetence, corruption and ignorance of official languages. By referring to Creole as speaking [TRANSLATION] [derogatory term directed at Blacks], he disparaged and expressed contempt for the language primarily used by Haitians to communicate with one another. As well, when he called drivers of Arab origin [TRANSLATION] [derogatory term directed at Arabs], he made fun of and even ridiculed them. His comments were scornful and racist, as has been found by all the courts that have had to consider them. It is thus easy to understand why the taxi drivers who were called to testify at the hearing said they were hurt by those comments, but this is a subjective perception, not the perception of the ordinary person. There is no doubt that such statements constituted civil fault. However, in this case, I am persuaded by an analysis of the trial judgment and a review of the entire record that an ordinary person might have been annoyed by Mr. Arthur's comments but could not have applied the insults, abuse and offensive accusations to each taxi driver personally.

[83] Admittedly, certain contextual elements work in favour of recognizing personal injury. The members of the group have the same job and are identifiable as taxi drivers when they are driving their vehicles. In interacting with the public or their coworkers, their accent may sometimes also make it possible to recognize their mother tongue. Moreover, they belong to visible minorities.

[84] Some of the words used by Mr. Arthur suggested that his attacks were directed more at Montréal taxi drivers whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole than at the taxi industry in general. When Mr. Arthur used words such as [TRANSLATION] "Arabs", "Haitians", "immigrants" or "drivers", he seemed to be attacking more the drivers themselves, which favours the appellant's position. However, at other times, the words used by Mr. Arthur gave the impression that he was criticizing the taxi industry in Montréal generally … [E]ven assuming that the words used by Mr. Arthur referred more generally to the drivers than to the taxi industry as a whole, and even though the members of the group may be identifiable, I must conclude based on the other contextual elements that the drivers' personal reputations remained intact in the eyes of the ordinary person.

[85] First of all, the relevant group is of considerable size. The trial judge estimated that the group made up of Montréal taxi drivers whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole has about 1,100 members. That is a large number. While I am not prepared to rule out the possibility that comments made about such a large group may in certain very specific circumstances reflect on each of its members personally, there are several reasons why that cannot be the case here.

[86] It is well known that the group in question is heterogeneous. Taxi drivers in general are not part of a structured or formalized association. Nor is there any indication that the group of drivers in question was organized in any special way that made it easier to recognize each of its members. Of course, the taxi drivers in question share a language and a job and belong to two visible minorities, but no one could reasonably believe that their common attributes extend to their personal knowledge of English and French, their knowledge of driving routes in the city of Montréal, their thoughtfulness with customers, their personal hygiene and the cleanliness of their vehicles. These are highly individual characteristics that do not readily lend themselves to generalization. … In such a heterogeneous group, it is implausible that all members would have the specific failings imputed to them by Mr. Arthur. Certain characteristics could be attributed to such a heterogeneous group only by extrapolation.

[87] … Mr. Arthur's statements conveyed the message that taxi drivers whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole should be blamed for all the problems he said existed in the taxi industry in Montréal. There is simply nothing rational about this suggestion, as the trial judge pointed out (para. 87).

[89] … Mr. Arthur was a known polemicist in the area where his show was broadcast. He had become known for his distasteful and provocative language. …

[90] In light of these factors, I am of the opinion that an ordinary person would have understood the extravagant nature of the comments made. Mr. Arthur's allegations were undoubtedly serious and infuriating, but an ordinary person would nonetheless have recognized that they were an excessive generalization on the part of the host, based on an unpleasant personal experience. An ordinary person would not have believed the offensive allegations and would not have thought that Mr. Arthur was vouching for the validity of his racist and contemptuous insults. An ordinary person certainly would not have associated the allegations of ignorance, incompetence, uncleanliness, arrogance and corruption with each taxi driver whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole personally.

[92] In short, having regard to all of the circumstances, I find that the group is of considerable size and is heterogeneous, that the characteristics attributed to the members of the group are individual and do not lend themselves well to extrapolation, and that the remarks are an extreme, irrational and sensationalist generalization. Accordingly, an ordinary person, while sensitive to such excessive remarks, would not in my view have formed a less favourable opinion of each Arab or Haitian taxi driver, considered individually. I therefore conclude that Mr. Arthur's comments, while wrongful, did not damage the reputation of each Montréal taxi driver whose mother tongue is Arabic or Creole. The plaintiff did not prove that a personal injury was sustained by the members of the group.

VI. Conclusion

[94] I have no doubt that racist speech can have a pernicious effect on the opinions of members of its audience. However, it should be noted that an action in defamation will not always be the appropriate recourse in cases concerning racism or discrimination. In the instant case, I am of the opinion that it is not the appropriate recourse. I would therefore dismiss the appeal. For the reasons given by the Court of Appeal on this question, no costs are awarded in this Court.

The following are the reasons delivered by

> [106] In my view, an ordinary person would conclude that the remarks made by Mr. Arthur were defamatory of these plaintiffs and therefore injurious. Mr. Arthur's comments were not about the taxi industry in general. He targeted only Arab and Haitian taxi drivers and accused them of creating "Third World" public transportation in Montréal, of corruption in obtaining their permits, of incompetence, and of keeping unsanitary cars. He also said that neither Arab nor Haitian drivers knew their way around the city and that they could not communicate in either English or French. … [and used racist epithets to describe them].
> [107] These were highly stigmatizing remarks attacking members of vulnerable communities. There is a difference between provocation or controversy, including offensive statements, and statements that deliberately vilify vulnerable people. The trial judge concluded that the comments in this case were racist. When we are dealing with hortatory language seriously uttered that is blatantly racist, we are inherently dealing with words that diminish dignity and are an invitation to contempt. …
> [110] Under both the common law and civil law regimes, the fact that comments are aimed at a group is not, in itself, reason to deny a claim. If multiple individuals can show that they were defamed by the comments, each has a right of action. As the reasons of Deschamps J. make clear, the determination of whether the statements relate to each member of the group involves a contextual analysis of both the group and the comments. …
> [116] While the group targeted by the statements in this case was large, it was not so diffuse as to be indeterminate. Mr. Arthur's criticisms were directed at Arab and Haitian taxi drivers in Montréal. This is a precisely defined and easily identified group.
> [117] Secondly, these were serious accusations. Mr. Arthur's allegations of corruption were particularly dramatic …
> [119] Mr. Arthur's comments were aimed at a determinate group of individuals who were of particular racial backgrounds in a particular industry and in a particular city … The group was defined with sufficient precision and the statements specific enough to be harmful to the reputations of each of its members. If Mr. Arthur had named an individual taxi driver and accused him or her of similar corruption and incompetence, there seems to me to be little doubt that an ordinary person would find those comments to be defamatory and therefore injurious.
> [120] Moreover, I do not accept that his listeners would have inevitably treated Mr. Arthur's statements as less plausible because of his reputation. I appreciate that Mr. Arthur was not averse to comments of a provocative nature, and that his listeners knew that he was given occasionally to making offensive statements. But I do not accept that Mr. Arthur's comments would necessarily be seen to be hyperbolic by the ordinary person. They were made "seriously", not satirically or ironically.
> [121] The members of the group Mr. Arthur vilified interact with the public on a daily basis and their livelihoods depend upon their ability to attract customers. Mr. Arthur's defamatory comments were … made seriously and raised, objectively, the clear possibility not only of harm to reputation, but also of harmful economic consequences from customers who may have decided to avoid taxis driven by members of the group, members who were easily identified and who stood accused not only of incompetence, but of having used corruption to become taxi drivers. In my view, those comments would palpably have been seen by an ordinary person as being defamatory, and therefore injurious, of the plaintiffs.
> [122] I would therefore allow the appeal and restore the award of damages made by Guilbault J

3.5.3 Note on press freedom

Section 2(b) of the Charter provides that "everyone" has the "freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression, including freedom of the press and other media of communication." The terms "press" and "media" in s. 2(b) seem to refer, not to particular institutions, but rather to the various methods or means of communication and perhaps to certain functions.

In Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 184 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 480, Justice La Forest, writing for the majority of the Supreme Court of Canada, emphasized the importance of "a free and vigorous press" in informing the public and supporting meaningful debate in the public domain (CBC 1996 at para 23). In a more recent decision, Justice Abella (in a concurring judgment) stressed the importance of a "strong, independent and responsible press" that "holds people and institutions to account, uncovers the truth and informs the public" (R.v. Vice Media Canada, 2018 SCC 53, 125).

Prior to the internet, the functions of gathering and disseminating news were performed by particular institutions, generally large-scale newspapers and broadcasters. It was, at the time, natural to conflate institution and function. However, with the rise of the internet as the main vehicle for the communication of news and opinion, the link between function and institution has been broken. In addition to the online versions of traditional media, there are now many small-scale online news sites and blogs operated by citizen journalists. Low entry costs have made it possible for almost anyone to set up a website that provides information and opinion. In the new media landscape, s. 2(b) may protect certain activities, such as newsgathering, that are not in themselves expressive but are necessary to effective communication and meaningful public discourse – even though courts and commentators continue to refer to the rights of "the press." Those engaged in the activities of newsgathering and dissemination may have particular rights such as the protection of source confidentiality and access to locations that are not automatically open to others.

3.6 Obscenity / pornography

Section 163 of the Criminal Code prohibits the production and publication of obscene material. Under s. 163(8), material is obscene if its dominant characteristic is the undue exploitation of sex or the combination of sex with violence, cruelty, crime, or horror. In R. v. Brodie, [1962] 1 SCR 681, a case that was decided shortly after the enactment of s. 163, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the principal test for determining whether a particular instance of expression (in the form of an explicit sexual image) unduly exploited sex was whether the expression violated community standards.

In R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 452, an individual who operated an "adult" video rental store was charged with distributing obscene material. In his defence, he argued that the Criminal Code ban on obscene publications breached s. 2(b) of the Charter. Before considering the merits of the Charter challenge, the Supreme Court of Canada, in a judgment written by Justice Sopinka, reviewed "the legislative history of the provision as well as the extensive judicial interpretation and analysis which have infused the bare words of the statute" (Butler at 471). The court's (re)interpretation of the obscenity prohibition in Butler took place against a background of changing attitudes towards obscenity/pornography. The justification for the censorship of sexually explicit representations no longer emphasized the immoral or offensive character of sexual imagery. Censorship was instead justified on the grounds that sexually explicit representations could sometimes have harmful consequences. With this change in justification came a shift in the focus of restriction from sexually explicit material in general to sexually explicit material that depicts violent or degrading activity and a change in the language used to describe the restricted material from obscenity to pornography. The shift from obscenity to pornography was the consequence first of a growing commitment to the harm principle: the idea that the prevention of harm was the only legitimate basis for state coercion. This shift was accelerated by the demands of the Charter, and in particular its requirement that any restriction on expression be demonstrably justified. Second, the shift from obscenity to pornography was the consequence of a growing awareness of the problems of sexual subordination and violence and a widely held belief that certain kinds of sexual representation contributed to these harms.

2. Relevant Legislation

163. (1) Every one commits an offence who,

(a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatever; or

(b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation a crime comic.

(2) Every one commits an offence who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse,

(a) sells, exposes to public view or has in his possession for such a purpose any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatever;

(b) publicly exhibits a disgusting object or an indecent show;

(c) offers to sell, advertises or publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal, any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of causing abortion or miscarriage; or

(d) advertises or publishes an advertisement of any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method for restoring sexual virility or curing venereal diseases or diseases of the generative organs.

(3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section if he establishes that the public good was served by the acts that are alleged to constitute the offence and that the acts alleged did not extend beyond what served the public good.

(4) For the purposes of this section, it is a question of law whether an act served the public good and whether there is evidence that the act alleged went beyond what served the public good, bur it is a question of fact whether the acts did or did not extend beyond what served the public good.

(5) For the purposes of this section, the motives of an accused are irrelevant.

(6) Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1), the fact that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, phonograph record, crime comic or other thing by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed is not a defence to the charge.

(7) In this section, "crime comic" means a magazine, periodical or book that exclusively or substantially comprises matter depicting pictorially

(a) the commission of crimes, real or fictitious; or

(b) events connected with the commission of crimes, real or fictitious, whether occurring before or after the commission of the crime.

(8) For the purposes of this Act, any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene.

4. Analysis

B. Judicial Interpretation of s. 163(8)

(b) Tests of "Undue Exploitation of Sex"

In order for the work or material to qualify as "obscene", the exploitation of sex must not only be its dominant characteristic, but such exploitation must be "undue". In determining when the exploitation of sex will be considered "undue", the courts have attempted to formulate workable tests. The most important of these is the "community standard of tolerance" test.

i) "Community Standard of Tolerance" Test

In Brodie, Judson J. accepted the view espoused notably by the Australian and New Zealand courts that obscenity is to be measured against "community standards". … The community standards test has been the subject of extensive judicial analysis. It is the standards of the community as a whole which must be considered and not the standards of a small segment of that community such as the university community where a film was shown … With respect to expert evidence, it is not necessary and is not a fact which the Crown is obliged to prove as part of its case…

Our Court was called upon to elaborate the community standards test in Towne Cinema Theatres Ltd. v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 494. Dickson C.J. reviewed the case law and found (at pp. 508-9):

> The cases all emphasize that it is a standard of tolerance, not taste, that is relevant. What matters is not what Canadians think is right for themselves to see. What matters is what Canadians would not abide other Canadians seeing because it would be beyond the contemporary Canadian standard of tolerance to allow them to see it. Since the standard is tolerance, I think the audience to which the allegedly obscene material is targeted must be relevant. The operative standards are those of the Canadian community as a whole, but since what matters is what other people may see, it is quite conceivable that the Canadian community would tolerate varying degrees of explicitness depending upon the audience and the circumstances. [Emphasis in original.]

Therefore, the community standards test is concerned not with what Canadians would not tolerate being exposed to themselves, but what they would not tolerate other Canadians being exposed to. The minority view was that the tolerance level will vary depending on the manner, time and place in which the material is presented as well as the audience to whom it is directed.

ii) "Degradation or Dehumanization" Test

There has been a growing recognition in recent cases that material which may be said to exploit sex in a "degrading or dehumanizing" manner will necessarily fail the community standards test. …

Among other things, degrading or dehumanizing materials place women (and sometimes men) in positions of subordination, servile submission or humiliation. They run against the principles of equality and dignity of all human beings. In the appreciation of whether material is degrading or dehumanizing, the appearance of consent is not necessarily determinative. Consent cannot save materials that otherwise contain degrading or dehumanizing scenes. Sometimes the very appearance of consent makes the depicted acts even more degrading or dehumanizing.

This type of material would, apparently, fail the community standards test not because it offends against morals but because it is perceived by public opinion to be harmful to society, particularly to women. While the accuracy of this perception is not susceptible of exact proof, there is a substantial body of opinion that holds that the portrayal of persons being subjected to degrading or dehumanizing sexual treatment results in harm, particularly to women and therefore to society as a whole. …

iii) "Internal Necessities Test" or "Artistic Defence"

… [T]he artistic defence is the last step in the analysis of whether the exploitation of sex is undue. Even material which by itself offends community standards will not be considered "undue", if it is required for the serious treatment of a theme. …

[T]he "internal necessities" test, or what has been referred to as the "artistic defence", has been interpreted to assess whether the exploitation of sex has a justifiable role in advancing the plot or the theme, and in considering the work as a whole, does not merely represent "dirt for dirt's sake" but has a legitimate role when measured by the internal necessities of the work itself.

(iv) The relationship of the tests to each other

Pornography can be usefully divided into three categories: (1) explicit sex with violence, (2) explicit sex without violence but which subjects people to treatment that is degrading or dehumanizing, and (3) explicit sex without violence that is neither degrading nor dehumanizing. Violence in this context includes both actual physical violence and threats of physical violence. Relating these three categories to the terms of s. 163(8) of the Code, the first, explicit sex coupled with violence, is expressly mentioned. Sex coupled with crime, horror or cruelty will sometimes involve violence. Cruelty, for instance, will usually do so. But, even in the absence of violence, sex coupled with crime, horror or cruelty may fall within the second category. As for category (3), subject to the exception referred to below, it is not covered. Some segments of society would consider that all three categories of pornography cause harm to society because they tend to undermine its moral fibre. Others would contend that none of the categories cause harm. Furthermore, there is a range of opinion as to what is degrading or dehumanizing. …

Because this is not a matter that is susceptible of proof in the traditional way and because we do not wish to leave it to the individual tastes of judges, we must have a norm that will serve as an arbiter in determining what amounts to an undue exploitation of sex. That arbiter is the community as a whole.

The courts must determine as best they can what the community would tolerate others being exposed to on the basis of the degree of harm that may flow from such exposure. Harm in this context means that it predisposes persons to act in an anti-social manner as, for example, the physical or mental mistreatment of women by men, or, what is perhaps debatable, the reverse. Anti-social conduct for this purpose is conduct which society formally recognizes as incompatible with its proper functioning. The stronger the inference of a risk of harm the lesser the likelihood of tolerance. The inference may be drawn from the material itself or from the material and other evidence. Similarly evidence as to the community standards is desirable but not essential.

In making this determination with respect to the three categories of pornography referred to above, the portrayal of sex coupled with violence will almost always constitute the undue exploitation of sex. Explicit sex which is degrading or dehumanizing may be undue if the risk of harm is substantial. Finally, explicit sex that is not violent and neither degrading nor dehumanizing is generally tolerated in our society and will not qualify as the undue exploitation of sex unless it employs children in its production.

The foregoing deals with the interrelationship of the "community standards test" and "the degrading or dehumanizing" test. How does the "internal necessities" test fit into this scheme? The need to apply this test only arises if a work contains sexually explicit material that by itself would constitute the undue exploitation of sex. The portrayal of sex must then be viewed in context to determine whether that is the dominant theme of the work as a whole. Put another way, is undue exploitation of sex the main object of the work or is this portrayal of sex essential to a wider artistic, literary, or other similar purpose? Since the threshold determination must be made on the basis of community standards, that is, whether the sexually explicit aspect is undue, its impact when considered in context must be determined on the same basis. The court must determine whether the sexually explicit material when viewed in the context of the whole work would be tolerated by the community as a whole. Artistic expression rests at the heart of freedom of expression values and any doubt in this regard must be resolved in favour of freedom of expression.

C. Does s. 163 Violate s. 2(b) of the Charter?

In light of our recent decision in R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, the respondent, and most of the parties intervening in support of the respondent, do not take issue with the proposition that s. 163 of the Criminal Code violates s. 2(b) of the Charter. …

Meaning sought to be expressed need not be "redeeming" in the eyes of the court to merit the protection of s. 2(b), whose purpose is to ensure that thoughts and feelings may be conveyed freely in non-violent ways without fear of censure.

In this case, both the purpose and effect of s. 163 are specifically to restrict the communication of certain types of materials based on their content. In my view, there is no doubt that s. 163 seeks to prohibit certain types of expressive activity and thereby infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Before turning to consider whether this infringement is justified under s. 1 of the Charter, I wish to address the argument advanced by the Attorney General of B.C. that in applying s. 2(b), a distinction should be made between films and written works. It is argued that by its very nature, the medium of the written word is such that it is, when used, inherently an attempt to convey meaning. In contrast, British Columbia argues that the medium of film can be used for a purpose "not significantly communicative". In its factum, British Columbia maintains that if the activity captured in hard core pornographic magazines and videotapes is itself not expression, the fact that they are reproduced by the technology of a camera does not magically transform them into "expression": the appellant cannot hide behind the label "film" to claim protection for the reproduction of activity the sole purpose of which is to arouse or shock.

In my view, this submission cannot be maintained. … First, I cannot agree with the premise that purely physical activity, such as sexual activity, cannot be expression. Second, in creating a film, regardless of its content, the maker of the film is consciously choosing the particular images which together constitute the film. In choosing his or her images, the creator of the film is attempting to convey some meaning. The meaning to be ascribed to the work cannot be measured by the reaction of the audience, which, in some cases, may amount to no more than physical arousal or shock. Rather, the meaning of the work derives from the fact that it has been intentionally created by its author. To use an example, it may very well be said that a blank wall in itself conveys no meaning. However, if one deliberately chooses to capture that image by the medium of film, the work necessarily has some meaning for its author and thereby constitutes expression. The same would apply to the depiction of persons engaged in purely sexual activity.

D. Is s. 163 Justified Under s. 1 of the Charter?

(a) Is s. 163 a Limit Prescribed by Law?

The appellant argues that the provision is so vague that it is impossible to apply it. Vagueness must be considered in relation to two issues in this appeal: (1) is the law so vague that it does not qualify as "a limit prescribed by law"; and (2) is it so imprecise that it is not a reasonable limit. …

Standards which escape precise technical definition, such as "undue", are an inevitable part of the law. … It is within the role of the judiciary to attempt to interpret these terms. If such interpretation yields an intelligible standard, the threshold test for the application of s. 1 is met. In my opinion, the interpretation of s. 163(8) in prior judgments which I have reviewed, as supplemented by these reasons, provides an intelligible standard.

In my view … the overriding objective of s. 163 is not moral disapprobation but the avoidance of harm to society. In Towne Cinema, Dickson C.J. stated, at p. 507:

"It is harm to society from undue exploitation that is aimed at by the section, not simply lapses in propriety or good taste."

The harm was described in the following way in the Report on Pornography by the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs (MacGuigan Report) (1978), at p. 18:4:

> The clear and unquestionable danger of this type of material is that it reinforces some unhealthy tendencies in Canadian society. The effect of this type of material is to reinforce male-female stereotypes to the detriment of both sexes. It attempts to make degradation, humiliation, victimization, and violence in human relationships appear normal and acceptable. A society which holds that egalitarianism, non-violence, consensualism, and mutuality are basic to any human interaction, whether sexual or other, is clearly justified. In controlling and prohibiting any medium of depiction, description or advocacy which violates these principles.

I do not agree [with the appellant] that to identify the objective of the impugned legislation as the prevention of harm to society, one must resort to the "shifting purpose" doctrine. First, the notions of moral corruption and harm to society are not distinct, as the appellant suggests, but are inextricably linked. It is moral corruption of a certain kind which leads to the detrimental effect on society. Second, and more importantly, I am of the view that with the enactment of s. 163, Parliament explicitly sought to address the harms which are linked to certain types of obscene materials. The prohibition of such materials was based on a belief that they had a detrimental impact on individuals exposed to them and consequently on society as a whole. Our understanding of the harms caused by these materials has developed considerably since that time; however this does not detract from the fact that the purpose of this legislation remains, as it was in 1959, the protection of society from harms caused by the exposure to obscene materials. …

A permissible shift in emphasis was built into the legislation when, as interpreted by the courts, it adopted the community standards test. Community standards as to what is harmful have changed since 1959.

This being the objective, is it pressing and substantial? Does the prevention of the harm associated with the dissemination of certain obscene materials constitute a sufficiently pressing and substantial concern to warrant a restriction on the freedom of expression?

The enactment of the impugned provision is also consistent with Canada's international obligations (Agreement for the Suppression of the Circulation of Obscene Publications and the Convention for the Suppression of the Circulation of and Traffic in Obscene Publications). Finally, it should be noted that the burgeoning pornography industry renders the concern even more pressing and substantial than when the impugned provisions were first enacted. I would therefore conclude that the objective of avoiding the harm associated with the dissemination of pornography in this case is sufficiently pressing and substantial to warrant some restriction on full exercise of the right to freedom of expression. …

(c) Proportionality

In assessing whether the proportionality test is met, it is important to keep in mind the nature of expression which has been infringed. …

Shannon J., in R. v. Wagner, supra, described the materials, [observing] at p. 331:

> Women, particularly, are deprived of unique human character or identity and are depicted as sexual playthings, hysterically and instantly responsive to male sexual demands. They worship male genitals and their own value depends upon the quality of their genitals and breasts.

In my view, the kind of expression which is sought to be advanced does not stand on an equal footing with other kinds of expression which directly engage the "core" of the freedom of expression values.

This conclusion is further buttressed by the fact that the targeted material is expression which is motivated, in the overwhelming majority of cases, by economic profit. …

(ii) Rational Connection

… As the Attorney General of Ontario has argued in its factum, obscenity wields the power to wreak social damage in that a significant portion of the population is humiliated by its gross misrepresentations.

Accordingly, the rational link between s. 163 and the objective of Parliament relates to the actual causal relationship between obscenity and the risk of harm to society at large. On this point, it is clear that the literature of the social sciences remains subject to controversy. …

While a direct link between obscenity and harm to society may be difficult, if not impossible, to establish, it is reasonable to presume that exposure to images bears a causal relationship to changes in attitudes and beliefs. …

In the face of inconclusive social science evidence, the approach adopted by our Court in Irwin Toy is instructive. In that case, the basis for the legislation was that television advertising directed at young children is per se manipulative. The Court made it clear, at p. 994, that in choosing its mode of intervention, it is sufficient that Parliament had a reasonable basis …

… Parliament was entitled to have a "reasoned apprehension of harm" resulting from the desensitization of individuals exposed to materials which depict violence, cruelty, and dehumanization in sexual relations.

Accordingly, I am of the view that there is a sufficiently rational link between the criminal sanction, which demonstrates our community's disapproval of the dissemination of materials which potentially victimize women and which restricts the negative influence which such materials have on changes in attitudes and behaviour, and the objective. …

(iii) Minimal Impairment

In determining whether less intrusive legislation may be imagined, this Court stressed in the Prostitution Reference, supra, that it is not necessary that the legislative scheme be the "perfect" scheme, but that it be appropriately tailored in the context of the infringed right (at p. 1138). …

First, the impugned provision does not proscribe sexually explicit erotica without violence that is not degrading or dehumanizing. It is designed to catch material that creates a risk of harm to society. It might be suggested that proof of actual harm should be required. It is apparent from what I have said above that it is sufficient in this regard for Parliament to have a reasonable basis for concluding that harm will result and this requirement does not demand actual proof of harm.

Second, materials which have scientific, artistic or literary merit are not captured by the provision. As discussed above, the court must be generous in its application of the "artistic defence". …

Third, in considering whether the provision minimally impairs the freedom in question, it is legitimate for the court to take into account Parliament's past abortive attempts to replace the definition with one that is more explicit. … The attempt to provide exhaustive instances of obscenity has been shown to be destined to fail (Bill C-54, 2nd Sess., 33rd Parl.). It seems that the only practicable alternative is to strive towards a more abstract definition of obscenity which is contextually sensitive and responsive to progress in the knowledge and understanding of the phenomenon to which the legislation is directed. In my view, the standard of "undue exploitation" is therefore appropriate. The intractable nature of the problem and the impossibility of precisely defining a notion which is inherently elusive makes the possibility of a more explicit provision remote. …

Fourth, while the discussion in this appeal has been limited to the definition portion of s. 163, I would note that the impugned section, with the possible exception of subs. 1, which is not in issue here, has been held by this Court not to extend its reach to the private use or viewing of obscene materials. …

(iv) Balance Between Effects of Limiting Measures and Legislative Objective

The final question to be answered in the proportionality test is whether the effects of the law so severely trench on a protected right that the legislative objective is outweighed by the infringement. The infringement on freedom of expression is confined to a measure designed to prohibit the distribution of sexually explicit materials accompanied by violence, and those without violence that are degrading or dehumanizing. As I have already concluded, this kind of expression lies far from the core of the guarantee of freedom of expression. It appeals only to the most base aspect of individual fulfilment, and it is primarily economically motivated. The objective of the legislation, on the other hand, is of fundamental importance in a free and democratic society. It is aimed at avoiding harm, which Parliament has reasonably concluded will be caused directly or indirectly, to individuals, groups such as women and children, and consequently to society as a whole, by the distribution of these materials. It thus seeks to enhance respect for all members of society, and non-violence and equality in their relations with each other.

I therefore conclude that the restriction on freedom of expression does not outweigh the importance of the legislative objective.

5. Conclusion

I conclude that while s. 163(8) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, freedom of expression, it constitutes a reasonable limit and is saved by virtue of the provisions of s. 1. … [The Court ordered a new trial].

3.6.2 R. v. Labaye

R. v. Labaye*, [2005] 3 SCR 728, 2005 SCC 80

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Major, Binnie, Deschamps, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE —

1. Introduction

1 The appellant appeals from a conviction of keeping a "common bawdy- house" for the "practice of acts of indecency" under s. 210(1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. The issue is whether the acts committed in his establishment were acts of indecency within the meaning of our criminal law.

2 Defining indecency under the Criminal Code is a notoriously difficult enterprise. The Criminal Code offers no assistance, leaving the task to judges. The test developed by the cases has evolved from one based largely on subjective considerations, to one emphasizing the need for objective criteria, based on harm. This heightened emphasis on objective criteria rests on the principle that crimes should be defined in a way that affords citizens, police and the courts a clear idea of what acts are prohibited. …

3 This appeal requires us to apply the norms developed in recent cases to the operation of clubs established to facilitate group sex, a practice colloquially referred to as "swinging". This in turn invites further refinement of the objective criteria for indecency under the Criminal Code.

4 I conclude that the appellant's conviction should be quashed.

4. Analysis

4.1 The Legal Test for Criminal Indecency

4.1.1 The History of Criminal Indecency

13 Section 210(1) of the Criminal Code makes it an offence, punishable by two years in prison, to keep a common bawdy-house. A bawdy-house is defined in s. 197(1) of the Code as a place kept, occupied, or resorted to "by one or more persons for the purpose of prostitution or the practice of acts of indecency". The only question in this case is whether what went on at L'Orage [the club] constituted "acts of indecency".

22 The Court in Little Sisters confirmed that harm is an essential ingredient of obscenity. As Binnie J. pointed out, "the phrase 'degrading or dehumanizing' in Butler is qualified immediately by the words 'if the risk of harm is substantial' . . . . This makes it clear that not all sexually explicit erotica depicting adults engaged in conduct which is considered to be degrading or dehumanizing is obscene. The material must also create a substantial risk of harm which exceeds the community's tolerance" (para. 60 (emphasis added)).

24 Grounding criminal indecency in harm represents an important advance in this difficult area of the law. Harm or significant risk of harm is easier to prove than a community standard. Moreover, the requirement of a risk of harm incompatible with the proper functioning of society brings this area of the law into step with the vast majority of criminal offences, which are based on the need to protect society from harm.

4.1.2 Toward a Theory of Harm

28 The first step is to generically describe the type of harm targeted by the concept of indecent conduct under the Criminal Code. In Butler at p. 485 and Little Sisters at para. 59, this was described as "conduct which society formally recognizes as incompatible with its proper functioning".

29 Two general requirements emerge from this description of the harm required for criminal indecency. First, the words "formally recognize" suggest that the harm must be grounded in norms which our society has recognized in its Constitution or similar fundamental laws. This means that the inquiry is not based on individual notions of harm, nor on the teachings of a particular ideology, but on what society, through its laws and institutions, has recognized as essential to its proper functioning. Second, the harm must be serious in degree. It must not only detract from proper societal functioning, but must be incompatible with it.

30 It follows that the analysis to be performed in a particular case involves two steps. The first step is concerned with the nature of the harm. It asks whether the Crown has established a harm or significant risk of harm to others that is grounded in norms which our society has formally recognized in its Constitution or similar fundamental laws. The second step is concerned with the degree of the harm. It asks whether the harm in its degree is incompatible with the proper functioning of society. Both elements must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before acts can be considered indecent under the Criminal Code.

4.1.3 The Nature of the Harm: Harm to Individuals or Society Contrary to Society's Norms

36 Three types of harm have thus far emerged from the jurisprudence as being capable of supporting a finding of indecency: (1) harm to those whose autonomy and liberty may be restricted by being confronted with inappropriate conduct; (2) harm to society by predisposing others to anti-social conduct; and (3) harm to individuals participating in the conduct. Each of these types of harm is grounded in values recognized by our Constitution and similar fundamental laws. The list is not closed; other types of harm may be shown in the future to meet the standards for criminality established by Butler. But thus far, these are the types of harm recognized by the cases.

37 Reference to the fundamental values of our Constitution and similar fundamental laws also eliminates types of conduct that do not constitute a harm in the required sense. Bad taste does not suffice: Towne Cinema, at p. 507. Moral views, even if strongly held, do not suffice. Similarly, the fact that most members of the community might disapprove of the conduct does not suffice: Butler, at p. 492. In each case, more is required to establish the necessary harm for criminal indecency.

4.1.3.1 The Harm of Loss of Autonomy and Liberty Through Public Confrontation

40 The first is the harm of public confrontation with unacceptable and inappropriate conduct. One reason for criminalizing indecent acts and displays is to protect the public from being confronted with acts and material that reduce their quality of life. Indecent acts are banned because they subject the public to unwanted confrontation with inappropriate conduct. This harm is conceptually akin to nuisance. … The harm is not the aesthetic harm of a less attractive community, but the loss of autonomy and liberty that public indecency may impose on individuals in society, as they seek to avoid confrontation with acts they find offensive and unacceptable. The value or interest protected is the autonomy and liberty of members of the public, to live within a zone that is free from conduct that deeply offends them.

41 Much harm in this category does not rise to the levels of harm required by Butler and Little Sisters. Tolerance requires that only serious and deeply offensive moral assaults can be kept from public view on pain of criminal sanction. We live in an age when sexual images, some subtle and some not so subtle, are widely dispersed throughout our public space. However, this does not negate the fact that even in our emancipated society, there may be some kinds of sexual conduct the public display of which seriously impairs the livability of the environment and significantly constrains autonomy. Sexual relations are an intensely personal, religious and age-sensitive matter. People's autonomy and enjoyment of life can be deeply affected by being unavoidably confronted with debased public sexual displays. Even when avoidance is possible, the result may be diminished freedom to go where they wish or take their children where they want. Sexual conduct and material that presents a risk of seriously curtailing people's autonomy and liberty may justifiably be restricted. … If the risk of harm is significant enough, it may rise to the degree of the test for criminal indecency in Butler — conduct which society formally recognizes as incompatible with its proper functioning.

4.1.3.2 The Harm of Predisposing Others to Anti-social Acts or Attitudes

45 The second source of harm is based on the danger that the conduct or material may predispose others to commit anti-social acts. … [A] particular harm envisaged in Butler was the "predispos[ition of] persons to act in an anti-social manner as, for example, the physical or mental mistreatment of women by men, or, what is perhaps debatable, the reverse" (p. 485).

46 This source of harm is not confined to explicit invitations or exhortations to commit anti-social acts. As discussed in Butler, the inquiry embraces attitudinal harm. Conduct or material that perpetuates negative and demeaning images of humanity is likely to undermine respect for members of the targeted groups and hence to predispose others to act in an anti-social manner towards them. Such conduct may violate formally recognized societal norms, like the equality and dignity of all human beings, …

4.1.3.3 Harm to Participating Individuals

48 A third source of harm is the risk of physical or psychological harm to individuals involved in the conduct at issue. … [B]ut some kinds of sexual activity may harm those involved. Women may be forced into prostitution or other aspects of the sex trade. They may be the objects of physical and psychological assault. Sometimes they may be seriously hurt or even killed. Similar harms may be perpetrated on children and men. Sexual conduct that risks this sort of harm may violate society's declared norms in a way that is incompatible with the proper functioning of society, and hence meet the Butler test for indecent conduct under the Criminal Code.

49 The consent of the participant will generally be significant in considering whether this type of harm is established. However, consent may be more apparent than real. Courts must always be on the lookout for the reality of victimization. Where other aspects of debased treatment are clear, harm to participating individuals may be established despite apparent consent.

50 Unlike the previous types of harm by confrontation and by inculcation, the third type of harm is only minimally dependent on whether the conduct is private or public, since its focus is not on harm to society or members of society, but on individuals involved in the acts. …

4.1.4 The Degree of the Harm: Harm Incompatible With the Proper Functioning of Canadian Society

52 At this stage, the task is to examine the degree of the harm to determine whether it is incompatible with the proper functioning of society. The threshold is high. It proclaims that as members of a diverse society, we must be prepared to tolerate conduct of which we disapprove, short of conduct that can be objectively shown beyond a reasonable doubt to interfere with the proper functioning of society.

53 The objective test for criminal indecency that this Court has long insisted must be our goal, requires careful and express analysis of whether the alleged harm is on the evidence in the particular case truly incompatible with the proper functioning of Canadian society. This involves value judgements. What is the "proper" functioning of society? At what point do we say an activity is "incompatible" with it?

54 Value judgements in this domain of the law, like many others, cannot be avoided. But this does not mean that the decision-making process is subjective and arbitrary. First, judges should approach the task of making value judgments with an awareness of the danger of deciding the case on the basis of unarticulated and unacknowledged values or prejudices. Second, they should make value judgments on the basis of evidence and a full appreciation of the relevant factual and legal context, to ensure that it is informed not by the judge's subjective views, but by relevant, objectively tested criteria. Third, they should carefully weigh and articulate the factors that produce the value judgements. By practices such as these, objectivity can be attained.

56 Incompatibility with the proper functioning of society is more than a test of tolerance. The question is not what individuals or the community think about the conduct, but whether permitting it engages a harm that threatens the basic functioning of our society. This ensures in part that the harm be related to a formally recognized value, at step one. But beyond this it must be clear beyond a reasonable doubt that the conduct, not only by its nature but also in degree, rises to the level of threatening the proper functioning of our society.

57 Whether it does so must be determined by reference to the values engaged by the particular kind of harm at stake. If the harm is based on the threat to autonomy and liberty arising from unwanted confrontation by a particular kind of sexual conduct, for example, the Crown must establish a real risk that the way people live will be significantly and adversely affected by the conduct. The number of people unwillingly exposed to the conduct and the circumstances in which they are exposed to it are critical under this head of harm. If the only people involved in or observing the conduct were willing participants, indecency on the basis of this harm will not be made out.

58 If the harm is based on predisposing others to anti-social behaviour, a real risk that the conduct will have this effect must be proved. Vague generalizations that the sexual conduct at issue will lead to attitudinal changes and hence anti-social behaviour will not suffice. The causal link between images of sexuality and anti-social behaviour cannot be assumed. Attitudes in themselves are not crimes, however deviant they may be or disgusting they may appear. What is required is proof of links, first between the sexual conduct at issue and the formation of negative attitudes, and second between those attitudes and real risk of anti-social behaviour.

59 Similarly, if the harm is based on physical or psychological injury to participants, it must again be shown that the harm has occurred or that there is a real risk that this will occur. Witnesses may testify as to actual harm. Expert witnesses may give evidence on the risks of potential harm. …

> 60 … [I]n most cases, expert evidence will be required to establish that the nature and degree of the harm makes it incompatible with the proper functioning of society. In every case, a conviction must be based on evidence establishing beyond a reasonable doubt actual harm or a significant risk of actual harm. The focus on evidence helps to render the inquiry more objective. It does not, however, transform the entire inquiry into a pure question of fact. A finding of indecency requires the application of a legal standard to the facts and context surrounding the impugned conduct. It is this legal standard that the harm-based test seeks to articulate.
> 61 Where actual harm is not established and the Crown is relying on risk, the test of incompatibility with the proper functioning of society requires the Crown to establish a significant risk. Risk is a relative concept. The more extreme the nature of the harm, the lower the degree of risk that may be required to permit use of the ultimate sanction of criminal law. Sometimes, a small risk can be said to be incompatible with the proper functioning of society. For example, the risk of a terrorist attack, although small, might be so devastating in potential impact that using the criminal law to counter the risk might be appropriate. However, in most cases, the nature of the harm engendered by sexual conduct will require at least a probability that the risk will develop to justify convicting and imprisoning those engaged in or facilitating the conduct.
> 4.1.5 Summary of the Test
> 62 Indecent criminal conduct will be established where the Crown proves beyond a reasonable doubt the following two requirements:
> 1. That, by its nature, the conduct at issue causes harm or presents a significant risk of harm to individuals or society in a way that undermines or threatens to undermine a value reflected in and thus formally endorsed through the Constitution or similar fundamental laws by, for example:
> (a) confronting members of the public with conduct that significantly interferes with their autonomy and liberty; or
> (b) predisposing others to anti-social behaviour; or
> (c) physically or psychologically harming persons involved in the conduct, and
> 2. That the harm or risk of harm is of a degree that is incompatible with the proper functioning of society.
> As the above makes clear, the categories of harm capable of satisfying the first branch of the inquiry are not closed, nor is any one of the listed categories in itself an integral part of the definition of harm. For example, predisposition to anti-social behaviour, while central to this Court's analysis in Butler, is but one illustration of the type of harm that undermines or threatens to undermine one of society's formally recognized values.
> 63 This test, applied objectively and on the basis of evidence in successive cases as they arise, is directed to articulating legal standards that enhance the ability of persons engaged in or facilitating sexual activities to ascertain the boundary between non-criminal conduct and criminal conduct. In this way, the basic requirements of the criminal law of fair notice to potential offenders and clear enforcement standards to police will, it is hoped, be satisfied.
> 4.2 Application of the Test

The evidence establishes that a number of steps were taken to ensure that members of the public who might find the conduct inappropriate did not see the activities. Pre-membership interviews were conducted to advise of the nature of the activities and screen out persons not sharing the same interests. Only members and guests were admitted to the premises. A doorman controlled access to the principal door.

3.6.3 Case notes: Little Sisters, Ashcroft

1. In Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69, customs officials had interfered with the importation of books by a gay and lesbian bookstore, on the grounds that these books were obscene. Canadian customs legislation prohibited the importation of material "deemed to be obscene" under s. 163, the obscenity provision of the Criminal Code, and gave customs officers the power to make this determination (subject to certain appeals). The court found that the legislation had been improperly applied by customs officers and that non-obscene gay and lesbian material ordered by the bookstore had routinely been held up at the border. However, the court decided that the overbroad application of the legislation was not due to any flaws in the legislation but simply to a misapplication of the law by customs officials. The court, therefore, declined to strike down the law and instead called for better training and guidance for these officials.
2. In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 US 234 (2002), the US Supreme Court decided that a prohibition on the possession of a virtual/computer generated sexual image of a child could not be upheld under the First Amendment since the particular harm addressed by child pornography laws was the harm to children in its production. In a dissent, Justice Rehnquist noted that with the development of virtual technologies it may become increasingly difficult to distinguish between real and virtual images of children. Furthermore, if the harm of child pornography is not simply the abuse of children during the production process but also includes also the normalization of sex with children or the development of sexual arousal towards children, then virtual imagery may also be seen as harmful.

4 Compelled speech

If it is wrong for the state to prevent an individual from communicating with others, then is it also wrong for the state to compel an individual to communicate? According to Justice Beetz: "The freedoms [thought, belief, opinion, and expression] guarantee to every person the right to express the opinions he may have: a fortiori they must prohibit compelling anyone to utter opinions that are not his own" (National Bank v. RCIU, [1984] SCR 269 at 296). In this description, the right not to express oneself (not to speak) is simply the other side of the freedom of expression right. Justice Lamer, in a later case, took the same view, "freedom of expression necessarily entails the right to say nothing or the right not to say certain things" (Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038 at 1080). Yet it is not at all clear that silence (non-speech) is valuable in the way that expression is (leaving aside those occasions when silence is itself expressive - the most obvious examples being a silent vigil or a moment of silence). But even if silence is not valuable in itself, being required to speak may be experienced as a personal invasion because of the importance of speech to the realization of individual agency and identity.

4.1 Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson

Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson*, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Wilson, La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE –

The respondent, Mr. Ron Davidson, a radio time salesman, was dismissed by his employer, the appellant, Slaight Communications Incorporated, operating as Q107 FM Radio. A complaint was filed by Mr. Davidson under the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1, as amended by S.C. 1977-78, c. 27, s. 21, and an inquiry undertaken. As the matter could not be resolved or settled, [an adjudicator was appointed] … to render a decision in accordance with the provisions of … the Canada Labour Code. …

[The adjudicator found that Mr. Davidson have been dismissed without just cause].

> [The adjudicator] ordered payment of $46,628.96 plus interest and legal costs of $2,500. He made a further order, which is central to this appeal, reading:
> That the employer give the complainant a letter of recommendation, with a copy to this adjudicator, certifying that:
> (1) Mr. Ron Davidson was employed by Station Q107 from June, 1980, to January 20, 1984, as a radio time salesman;
> (2) That his sales "budget" or quota for 1981 was $248,000 of which he achieved 97.3 per cent;
> (3) That his sales "budget" or quota for 1982 was $343,500 of which he achieved 100.3 per cent;
> (4) That his sales "budget" or quota for 1983 was $402,200 of which he achieved 114.2 per cent;
> (5) That following termination in January, 1984, an adjudicator (appointed by the Minister of Labour) after hearing the evidence and representations of both parties, held that the termination had been an unjust dismissal.
> I further order that any communication to Q107, its management or staff, whether received by letter, telephone or otherwise, from any person or company inquiring about Mr. Ron Davidson's employment at Q107, shall be answered exclusively by sending or delivering a copy of the said letter of recommendation.

[Following a discussion of the authority of the adjudicator to make such an order under the Canada Labour Code, Dickson CJ then considered the application of the Charter to the order].

Two constitutional questions were stated in this appeal as follows:

> 1. Do the provisions of the adjudicator's order, pursuant to s. 61.5(9) of the Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1, as amended, whereby the appellant was ordered to provide the respondent with a letter of recommendation of specified content combined with the further stipulation that any communication to the appellant relating to the respondent's employment with the appellant be answered exclusively by sending or delivering a copy of the letter of recommendation, infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
> 2.If the provisions of the adjudicator's order infringe or deny the rights and freedoms guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, are they justified by s. 1 of the Charter and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

I have had the benefit of reading the opinion of Justice Lamer and … agree with his conclusion that the positive order made by adjudicator Joliffe (to draw up and to give the respondent a specified letter of reference) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter but is saved by s. 1. However, with regard to the negative order (that any inquiry about the respondent's employment at Q107 be answered exclusively by the letter of reference which is the subject of the positive order), I must respectfully disagree with the conclusion of Lamer J. that it is patently unreasonable, thereby obviating the need to consider the Charter. Furthermore, not only am I of the view that the negative order is reasonable in the administrative law sense but I also believe that it is reasonable and demonstrably justified in the sense of s. 1 of the Charter.

The Negative Order and Section 2(b) of the Charter

Adjudicator Joliffe's order that Slaight Communications Inc. answer any reference inquiry exclusively by sending the specified letter is an infringement of s. 2(b) freedom of expression. The government is attempting to prevent Q107 from expressing its opinion as to the qualifications of Mr. Davidson beyond the facts set out in the letter. The harm that it was aiming to prevent, decreased job prospects for Mr. Davidson, is only relevant to s. 1 analysis and not to s. 2(b) analysis.

IV

1. Importance of the Objective

I am in firm agreement with the conclusions of Lamer J. about the importance of the objective sought to be achieved by the positive order, namely, counteracting the effects of the unjust dismissal by enhancing the ability of the employee to seek new employment without being lied about by the previous employer. This is also the objective of the negative order which, in the words of Mahoney J. in the Federal Court of Appeal, at p. 260, was designed to "forclos[e] the undermining of [the] effect" of the positive order. Both orders seek to achieve the same goal, the negative order complementing and reinforcing the positive order.

It cannot be overemphasized that the adjudicator's remedy in this case was a legislatively-sanctioned attempt to remedy the unequal balance of power that normally exists between an employer and employee. Thus, in a general sense, this case falls within a class of cases in which the governmental objective is that of protection of a particularly vulnerable group, or members thereof. …

The courts must be just as concerned to avoid constitutionalizing inequalities of power in the workplace and between societal actors in general. … As long as the proportionality test is met, it would not, on the facts of this case, be in accordance with those underlying principles and values for the Charter to be successfully invoked by an employer. The inequality in one employment relationship would be continued even after its termination with the result that the worker looking for a new job would be placed in an even more unequal bargaining position vis-à-vis prospective employers than is normally the case. On the facts of this case, constitutionally protecting freedom of expression would be tantamount to condoning the continuation of an abuse of an already unequal relationship.

2. Proportionality

(a) Rational Connection

The negative order is very much rationally linked to the objective, no less than the positive order. The adjudicator was plainly of the view that the respondent had been the subject of some kind of personal vendetta or "set-up" …

… [T]he representative of the employer was found to have engaged in bad faith and duplicitous conduct, giving misleading evidence about the Mr. Davidson's work performance both at the time of his dismissal and during the unjust dismissal hearing. Further, in deciding that reinstatement was not a viable remedy, the adjudicator gave as his reason that "[t]here is no sign that he would receive fair treatment by an employer which has made such vigorous efforts to justify the indefensible". With this proven history of promoting a fabricated version of the quality of Mr. Davidson's service and the concern that the employer would continue to treat him unfairly if he went back to work for the employer, it was rational for the adjudicator to attach a rider to the order for a reference letter so as to ensure that representatives of the employer did not subvert the effect of the letter by unjustifiably maligning its previous employee in the guise of giving a reference.

(b) Minimal Impairment

In my view, there was no less intrusive measure that the adjudicator could have taken and still have achieved the objective with any likelihood. To the extent there was a likelihood that representatives of Q107 would not be content to pass on the letter of reference absent the kind of untrue comments that had resulted in the finding of unjust dismissal, the letter of reference would have been rendered illusory to the same degree of likelihood.

While an order of additional monetary compensation would clearly be less intrusive upon the appellant's freedom of expression, it would not be an acceptable substitute. Even if the adjudicator had ordered that the Mr. Davidson could come back once he had secured a job and be granted compensation, above and beyond unemployment insurance, for the actual period out of work, this would only be compensation for the economic effects of lack of employment not the personal effects. This is directly contrary to the objective sought to be achieved by the order, which is securing new employment in the shortest order possible; the corollary of this objective is, of course, a concern to alleviate the personal problems associated with being out of work. …

… The letter was tightly and carefully designed to reflect only a very narrow range of facts which, we saw, were not really contested. … [T]he negative order seeks to prevent the employer from passing on an opinion, such prohibition being closely tied to the history of abuse of power which had been found to exist. Furthermore, that prohibition is very circumscribed. Firstly, it is triggered only in cases when the appellant is contacted for a reference and, secondly, there is no requirement to send the letter to anyone other than prospective employers. …

Finally, it cannot be ignored that a letter such as this may not have a great beneficial impact on an employee's job hunt. The letter is very neutral in tone, totally unembellished as it is by any opinion customary in letters of reference, and it refers to the fact of the finding of unjust dismissal. It seems to me that the adjudicator went no further than was necessary to achieve the objective and, even then, the measures adopted by the adjudicator cannot be said to have done more than to have enhanced, as opposed to having ensured, the chances of the respondent finding a job. The adjudicator did not in any sense pursue the objective without regard to the appellant's right to free expression.

(c) Deleterious Effects

It is clear to me that the effects of the measures are not so deleterious as to outweigh the objective of the measures. The importance of the above-discussed objective cannot be overemphasized. There are many diverse values that deserve protection in a free and democratic society such as that of Canada, only some of which are expressly provided for in the Charter. The underlying values of a free and democratic society both guarantee the rights in the Charter and, in appropriate circumstances, justify limitations upon those rights. As was said in Oakes, supra, at p. 136, among the underlying values essential to our free and democratic society are "the inherent dignity of the human person" and "commitment to social justice and equality". Especially in light of Canada's ratification of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, G.A. Res. 2200 A (XXI), 21 U.N. GAOR, Supp. (No. 16) 49, U.N. Doc. A/6316 (1966), and commitment therein to protect, inter alia, the right to work in its various dimensions found in Article 6 of that treaty, it cannot be doubted that the objective in this case is a very important one.

In normal course, the suppression of one's right to express an opinion about a subject or person will be a serious infringement of s. 2(b) and only outweighed by very important objectives. In the foregoing analysis, I have sought to show that the negative order was minimally intrusive in a relative sense and also that the careful tailoring of both parts of the order has made this a much less serious infringement of s. 2(b) …

Conclusion

In conclusion, I am of the opinion that both of the adjudicator's orders at issue (the positive order and the negative order) infringe s. 2(b) but are saved by s. 1. I would answer both constitutional questions in the affirmative and dismiss the appeal with costs.

[BEETZ J. (dissenting) thought that the order could not be supported because it forced "the employer to write, as if they were his own, statements of facts in which, rightly or wrongly, he may not believe, or which he may ultimately find or think to be inaccurate, misleading or false."

[LAMER J. (dissenting in part) held that the adjudicator had the power to order the employer to respond to any inquiries about Mr. Davidson with the specified letter. However, he did not think the relevant law should be read as authorizing the adjudicator to prohibit the employer from answering a request for information about Mr. Davidson "other than by sending this letter of recommendation". In his view, "This type of penalty is totalitarian and as such alien to the tradition of free nations like Canada, even for the repression of the most serious crimes."]

4.2 Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union

Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, 1991 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 211

The reasons of Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. were delivered by

WILSON J. -- This is an appeal from the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal holding that the expenditure by a union of union dues extracted from non-members pursuant to a mandatory check-off clause in a collective agreement on union-related causes did not violate either s. 2(d) or s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I. The Facts

Since 1974 the appellant has been a teaching master at the Haileybury School of Mines. He is a member of the academic staff bargaining unit represented by the respondent Union, OPSEU. He has never become a member of the respondent Union, nor has he been required to become a member. He has, however, been required to pay dues to the respondent Union. The dues are deducted from his pay cheque under the terms of the collective agreement between the respondent Council of Regents and OPSEU. The dues are paid into the general revenues of the Union and may be used for any purpose contemplated by the Union's constitution.

Article 4 of OPSEU's constitution sets out the aims and purposes of the organization. Specifically, the Union is required to regulate labour relations between its members and their employers, including such things as collective bargaining. General objectives of the Union include the advancement of the "common interests, economic, social and political, of the members and of all public employees, wherever possible, by all appropriate means".

Mr. Lavigne is opposed to the use of his dues to support causes which come within the broader aims of the Union's constitution. OPSEU made several contributions out of its general revenues to which the appellant objected. It is not necessary to list these contributions in any detail. Suffice it to say that donations were made to disarmament campaigns including the campaign against cruise missile testing, to a campaign opposing the expenditure of municipal funds for the SkyDome stadium in Toronto, to the National Union of Mine Workers in the United Kingdom in support of their strike, to a health care workers' union in Nicaragua, and tickets were purchased for events sponsored by the New Democratic Party. Mr. Lavigne has also drawn attention to the fact that OPSEU passed a resolution in favour of free choice with respect to abortion.

[Wilson J. found that the Charter applied since the college, a government actor, was a party to the agreement that compelled the payment of union dues. This was also the finding of the other judges on the Court].

3. Freedom of Expression

The test articulated in Irwin Toy has formed the basis of this Court's approach to freedom of expression questions … It is to be noted, however, that this test was framed in the context of governmental restrictions on expression and not, as in the present case, in the context of "forced" expression. Thus, the first issue which must be addressed is whether it is appropriate to apply Irwin Toy in this case.

How [does the Irwin Toy test apply] in cases where, instead of restricting expression, government is compelling expression? It seems to me that as long as the activity in which a plaintiff wishes to engage falls within the protected sphere of activity, the first step will be satisfied. If the government's purpose was to put a particular message into the mouth of the plaintiff, as is metaphorically alleged to be the case here, the action giving effect to that purpose will run afoul of s. 2(b). If, on the other hand, the government's purpose was otherwise but the effect of its action was to infringe the plaintiff's right of free expression, then the plaintiff must take the further step and demonstrate that such effect warrants constitutional disapprobation. It seems to me therefore that the interpretive approach established in Irwin Toy readily lends itself to the analysis of claims based on compelled expression and I will follow it in my approach to s. 2(b) in this case.

(a) The First Step

The first step, then, is to ask whether the activity in which the appellant wishes to engage falls within the sphere of conduct protected by s. 2(b), i.e., whether the activity conveys a meaning and, if so, whether the expression takes an acceptable form. …

It must … be determined whether the activity in which the appellant wishes to engage conveys a meaning. The nub of Mr. Lavigne's argument is that the scheme of mandatory dues check-off deprives him of his right to refuse to support the Union and the causes it supports. He says, in effect, that it deprives him of the right to take a contrary position on these causes or to refrain from taking any position on them at all. It compels him, he submits, to be identified with them and therefore conveys a meaning in the sense discussed in Irwin Toy.

It was noted in Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code, supra, that silence may in certain circumstances constitute expressive activity within the meaning of s. 2(b). At page 1184 Lamer J. said:

> Obviously, almost all human activity combines expressive and physical elements. For example sitting down expresses a desire not to be standing. Even silence, the apparent antithesis of expression, can be expressive in the sense that a moment's silence on November 11 conveys a meaning.

I do not think that Lamer J. was saying in this passage that silence in general conveys a meaning but that it may in some special circumstances such as the two minutes' silence on Armistice Day. Silence can, indeed, in some circumstances speak louder than words but the question raised by the plaintiff as far as silence is concerned is whether his s. 2(b) right to freedom of expression includes a right to take no position as well as a right to take a contrary position.

I do not consider it necessary in this case to decide whether freedom of expression under s. 2(b) encompasses a right not to express oneself at all on an issue since it seems to me clear that the essence of Mr. Lavigne's complaint is not that he wishes to take a neutral or no position in relation to some of the causes supported by the Union but that he is vigorously opposed to some of them and objects to being compelled, as he says, to be identified with them through the payment of the equivalent of union dues. His objection, as I understand it, is to being compelled to say something rather than to being denied the right to say nothing.

There is no question in my mind that the Union's contributions to various purposes convey meaning for it. Similarly, for some members of the bargaining unit represented by OPSEU the contribution of dues to the Union signifies for them support for the Union and perhaps more generally for the union movement and the interests it supports. Clearly, therefore, volunteering financial support is expressive for such people. Particularly in this day and age where money is an extremely powerful way of expressing support, the channelling of contributions is expressive indeed. It is also unquestionably true that a refusal to provide monetary assistance, to boycott, in other words, is equally expressive. I agree, therefore, with the appellant that the fact that he is denied the right to boycott the Union's causes prevents him from conveying a meaning which he wants to convey. The real question, however, is whether it is the action of government which has in either purpose or effect impinged upon this expressive activity.

(b) The Second Step

What was the purpose behind the government action in this case? I think it clear that it was never the intention of government in enacting the impugned sections of the Colleges Collective Bargaining Act, or in agreeing with OPSEU to incorporate the Rand formula into the collective agreement, to control the conveyance of meaning. Indeed, to suggest that it was seems to me to misapprehend the purpose of the agency shop and the vital role it plays in the regulation of Canadian labour relations.

The history behind the agency shop device in Canada demonstrates that the purpose of the Rand formula is simply to promote industrial peace through the encouragement of collective bargaining. I will have more to say on the purpose behind compulsory dues check-off schemes in my analysis of the application of s. 1 of the Charter later in these reasons. For the moment, suffice it to say that the Rand formula is but one aspect of a complex legislative regime which attempts to strike a balance between the interests of capital and labour. The Rand formula has grown in popularity in this country precisely because it is a fair means to achieve that balance without which collective bargaining cannot succeed. Compulsory dues check-off is a means by which to shore up union strength in bargaining relationships plagued by inequality. Its success in Canada has stemmed from the fact that in enhancing union security it does not work to suppress expression but to foster it.

Why is this so? Viewed closely, it is evident that there is nothing about the agency shop which purports to align those subject to its operation with the union or any of its activities. Indeed, the Rand formula specifically provides for dissent by stipulating that no member of the bargaining unit is required to join and thereby become a member of the union. Free expression was thus enhanced by giving unionists and non-unionists alike a voice in the administration of the employment relationship.

But does the Rand formula have the effect of depriving the appellant of his right to express himself freely? In Irwin Toy, as I indicated earlier, this Court held that, where a law only incidentally affects freedom of expression, a plaintiff, in order to reap the benefit of s. 2(b), must show that the expression in which he or she wishes to engage feeds the purpose behind the guarantee. …

The second way in which a possible freedom of expression impingement could arise in this context would be if Mr. Lavigne's capacity to engage in "expression" were reduced as a result of mandatory dues. Arguably, compelled payment of dues reduces the financial resources available to the objecting dues payor to support causes of his own choosing; this results in a burdening of freedom of expression. ...

I cannot see that the record for this application supports the argument that Mr. Lavigne's capacity to express his views about the Union, or about the causes it supports has been impaired in any way.

[I]t seems to me that this Court [in Slaight Communication v. Davidson and other cases] has already accepted that public identification and opportunity to disavow are relevant to the determination of whether s. 2(b) has been violated.

Quite apart from these decisions it would be my view that as a matter of principle concerns over public identification and opportunity to disavow should form part of the s. 2(b) calculus. I have only one reservation and that is that care should be exercised in considering whether or not one truly has the opportunity to disavow. Opportunity must be meaningful and we should not be too quick to ascribe to persons opportunities and abilities which they do not really possess. That aside, I favour the inclusion of these factors because both are directed to preserving and promoting the fundamental purpose of the s. 2(b) guarantee, namely to ensure that everyone has a meaningful opportunity to express themselves. If a law does not really deprive one of the ability to speak one's mind or does not effectively associate one with a message with which one disagrees, it is difficult to see how one's right to pursue truth, participate in the community, or fulfil oneself is denied.

I return, therefore, to the question whether the mandatory payment of dues infringes s. 2(b). To my mind, compelled financial support does not necessarily violate freedom of expression. For example, all members of the community are compelled to pay taxes on pain of legal penalty. It seems axiomatic that the payment of taxes does not signify in the eyes of others support for the uses to which tax money is put or support for the political party in power or, indeed, support for the idea of government at all. The constitutionality of compelled payments has in fact been recently litigated. In MacKay v. Manitoba, 1989 CanLII 26 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 357, this Court rejected a claim that The Election Finances Act, S.M 1982-83-84, c. 45, infringed taxpayers' freedom of expression. The Act provided for the payment of a portion of campaign expenses out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Manitoba to election candidates who received a designated proportion of the votes in provincial elections. Cory J. briefly disposed of this argument, stating at pp. 366-67:

> It was said that the statutory funding of candidates could, whenever a losing candidate or candidates received 10 per cent of the vote, force a taxpayer to support a candidate whose views are fundamentally opposed to that of the taxpayer. This enforced support of a contrary view was said to infringe the taxpayer's right to freedom of expression. I cannot accept that contention. The Act does not prohibit a taxpayer or anyone else from holding or expressing any position or their belief in any position. Rather, the Act seems to foster and encourage the dissemination and expression of a wide range of views and positions. In this way it enhances public knowledge of diverse views and facilitates public discussion of those views.

See also Prior v. Canada (1989), 101 N.R. 401 (F.C.A.) where a challenge on religious grounds to tax dollars being expended for military purposes failed for the same reason.

In my view, the present case is analogous to MacKay. The fact that the appellant is obliged to pay dues pursuant to the agency shop clause in the collective agreement does not inhibit him in any meaningful way from expressing a contrary view as to the merits of the causes supported by the Union. He is free to speak his mind as and when he wishes. Nor does his being governed by the Rand formula have such an effect. It is a built-in feature of the Rand formula that Union activities represent only the expression of the Union as the representative of the majority of employees. It is not the voice of one and all in the bargaining unit. I find therefore that the appellant's s. 2(b) right has not been infringed.

4. Section 1 of the Charter

Although it is not necessary for me to consider s. 1 of the Charter in light of my conclusion that neither s. 2(d) nor s. 2(b) has been infringed, I am considering its application in case my conclusion is in error and for the sake of completeness.

[Wilson J. held that any breach of s.2(b) would be justified under s.1 since the objective of the "Rand Formula", to ensure industrial peace was substantial and compelling.]

[Wilson J. also found that the union dues requirement in this case did not breach s. 2(d).]

VI. Disposition

I would dismiss the appeal with costs to Ontario Public Service Employees Union, Canadian Labour Congress, Ontario Federation of Labour and National Union of Provincial Government Employees.

The reasons of La Forest, Sopinka and Gonthier JJ. were delivered by

I have had the advantage of reading the reasons of my colleague, Justice Wilson, and would dispose of the appeal as she does, but I have reached that conclusion by a different route and have therefore felt constrained to write.

Freedom of Expression

… This Court has, in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, at p. 968, stated that "[a]ctivity is expressive if it attempts to convey meaning". I do not think that the appellant's contribution to the Union can be said to be an attempt to convey meaning. I fail to see how Lavigne, as one of many who either willingly or unwillingly contribute to the Union, can be said to be responsible for the use to which the money contributed is put. Nor would reasonable people regard him as responsible for the use to which that money was put. In short, the manner in which the Union expends its funds would properly be regarded as the expression of the opinions and positions of the Union qua corporate entity. It would not be regarded as an expression of the thoughts and opinions of the many individuals who contribute to the Union's coffers.

While I have no doubt that the contribution of money to a fund would in many circumstances constitute an activity capable of expressing meaning, I do not think it does in the circumstances of the present case. The appellant is one of many anonymous contributors to a fund which will be spent in the name of the Union as representative of the majority of employees. More particularly, the Rand formula is so designed that he is not even a member of the Union.

Disposition

For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs to the Ontario Public Service Employees Union, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Ontario Federation of Labour and the National Union of Provincial Government Employees

[LaForest J. found that the Rand Formula breached s. 2(d) "to the extent that these sums are expended on matters not substantially related to the labour relations process" but that this breach was justified under s.1.]

4.3 Case notes: Barnette, RJR MacDonald, JTI-Macdonald

1. In the United States, the right against compelled speech was recognized by the US Supreme Court in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 US 624, 63 S Ct 1178 (1943). The case involved a resolution by the West Virginia school authorities that required all students to salute the flag during the school's opening exercises. Several students who were members of the Jehovah's Witness community refused to salute the flag and were, as a consequence, suspended from school. The resolution further provided that any student who was suspended from school for refusing to salute the flag would be considered a juvenile delinquent and could be removed from their family home. The US Supreme Court held that the resolution breached the First Amendment. In the court's opinion, the flag salute was an expression of loyalty that individuals should not be compelled to make. Justice Jackson declared:

   > If there is a fixed star in our constitutional constellation, it is that no official, high or petty can prescribe what shall be orthodox in politics, nationalism, religion, or other matters of opinion or force citizens to confess by word or act their faith therein … We think the action of the local authorities in compelling the flag salute and pledge transcends constitutional limitations on their power and invades the sphere of intellect and spirit which it is the purpose of the First Amendment to our Constitution to reserve from all official control. (Barnette 1943, 642)

2. In RJR-MacDonald Inc v Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada decided that a federal law requiring manufacturers to include specified health warnings on cigarette packages violated the Charter. McLachlin J, writing for the majority, held that the requirement breached s. 2(b) because it compelled the manufacturers "to say what they do not wish to say" and "in a way that associates them with the opinions in question" (RJR-MacDonald at 348). She accepted that the reasons for requiring manufacturers to include these warnings were substantial enough to justify a limitation under s. 1 of their "right not to speak." However, she thought it was a problem that manufacturers could not attribute the warnings to the government because the law prohibited the display of any message on the package other than brand name, trademark, and health warning. She suggested that consumers might mistakenly think that these were voluntary statements by the cigarette companies: "that it is the corporations themselves who are warning of the danger" (RJR-MacDonald at 348). Since, in her view, a warning attributed to the government would be no less effective than an unattributed warning, in advancing the government's objective (of informing the public), the compelled speech in this case was more intrusive than necessary and so could not be justified under s. 1 as a minimal impairment on the freedom.
3. A few years following the RJR-MacDonald (1995) decision, the federal government reintroduced a requirement that tobacco manufacturers include health warnings on their packaging. Under the new law, the companies were permitted to attribute the warnings to the government. The law, though, required that the warnings (including graphic images) take up at least 50 per cent of the packaging surface. The tobacco companies challenged this requirement, arguing that it was excessive and so interfered unnecessarily with their freedom of expression. In Canada (AG) v. JTI-Macdonald Corp., 2007 SCC 30, the Supreme Court of Canada accepted that the warning requirement “and specifically the requirement that 50 percent of the principal display surfaces of the package be devoted to the warnings” amounted to a breach of the companies’ s. 2(b) rights (JTI-Macdonald at132). The court, however, found that this infringement was justified under s. 1. In the court’s view, the law was designed to advance the important goal “of discouraging tobacco consumption and preventing new smokers from taking up the habit” and was reasonable in its scope, since it left the tobacco companies with half the package surface to communicate their message (JTI-Macdonald at 138).

4. The courts in both the United States and Canada have held that freedom of expression precludes the state from requiring a newspaper to publish a story or statement. The courts have struck down legislation granting limited public access to the print media, in the form of a right of reply to political criticism and a right against discrimination in the purchase of advertising space.
Both countries, though, have taken a different approach to broadcasting. The courts in Canada and the US have upheld legislation requiring broadcasters to be balanced in their presentation of news. In Canada, the courts have also upheld rules requiring broadcasters to include a certain amount of Canadian content. The regulation of social media is still taking shape, although in Canada it seems to be accepted that the state can require social media platforms and search engines to include certain material and speakers, without running afoul of s. 2(b).

4.5 Questions

1. If compelled expression is objectionable because, in the words of the US Supreme Court, it invades the sphere of intellect and spirit, should it matter if others know that the expression has been compelled or if the compelled speaker has an opportunity to express their actual views?
2. Should the right not to speak extend to the payment of money such as compulsory union dues?
3. Should the right not to speak prevent the state from requiring a corporation to open its property, such as a shopping mall or a newsletter, to other views or voices?
4. Canadian law requires disclosures of many different kinds. The law requires house sellers to reveal latent defects, drug manufacturers to disclose risks and side effects, and doctors to inform their patients of the risks of different procedures. Why do you think the court took a different view the health warnings on tobacco packaging? Was the court treating these warning as matters of opinion?

5 Communicative power and access

If expression is a valuable activity, contributing to different individual and collective interests, then it is important that individuals have meaningful opportunities to communicate with others. Expression occurs in common spaces, face to face, or through different media such as the radio, newspaper, or internet. The ability to participate in public discourse depends on access to these communicative platforms or resources. Freedom of expression, though, is conventionally viewed as a negative right that protects the individual’s communicative activity from interference by the state but does not require the state to support expression. A court, as an adjudicative body, is not in a position to review and make adjustments to the distribution of communicative resources. However, as the Canadian cases show, this distinction between censorship and support (or between negative and positive freedom of expression claims) is not always easy to draw.

5.1 Access to state property

In determining whether and when an individual has a right to communicate on state-owned property, the Canadian courts have adopted a version of the US public forum doctrine, which gives individuals the right to access some properties (those that by tradition or designation are open to public communication) and not others (those that perform a function that would be significantly compromised by general access). The issue in access to state property cases is not, or not simply, whether the state has interfered with expression but is instead whether the individual has a meaningful opportunity to express themselves. It is a distributive issue that does not fit easily into the two-step structure of Charter adjudication.

Montréal (City) v. 2952-1366 Québec Inc.*, [2005] 3 SCR 141, 2005 SCC 62

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Bastarache, LeBel, Deschamps, Abella and Charron JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND DESCHAMPS J. —

1. Introduction

1. This appeal concerns the power of the city of Montréal (“City”) to prohibit noise produced in the street by a loudspeaker located in the entrance of an establishment. …

2. Origins of the Case

3 The respondent operates a club featuring female dancers in a commercial zone of downtown Montréal, in a building fronting Ste-Catherine Street. To attract customers and compete with a similar establishment located nearby, the respondent set up, in the main entrance to its club, a loudspeaker that amplified the music and commentary accompanying the show under way inside so that passers-by would hear them. …. The respondent was charged with producing noise that could be heard outside using sound equipment, in violation of arts. 9(1) and 11 of the By-law. These provisions read as follows:

9. … [T]he following noises, where they can be heard from the outside, are specifically prohibited:

(1) noise produced by sound equipment, whether it is inside a building or installed or used outside;

...

[The majority found that the by-law applied only to amplified sound]

[The majority found that the by-law fell within the jurisdiction of the municipality. The City has the power to adopt art. 9(1) of the By-law by virtue of its power to define and regulate nuisances pursuant to arts. 517(l) and 520(72) of the Charter of the city of Montreal, 1960.]

3.2 Does Article 9(1) of the By-law Infringe Section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter?

56 Does the City's prohibition on amplified noise that can be heard from the outside infringe s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter? Following the analytic approach of previous cases, the answer to this question depends on the answers to three other questions. First, did the noise have expressive content, thereby bringing it within s. 2(b) protection? Second, if so, does the method or location of this expression remove that protection? Third, if the expression is protected by s. 2(b), does the By-law infringe that protection, either in purpose or effect? …

57 The first two questions relate to whether the expression at issue in this case falls within the protected sphere of s. 2(b). They are premised on the distinction made in Irwin Toy between content (which is always protected) and "form" (which may not be protected). While this distinction may sometimes be blurred …, it is useful in cases such as this, where method and location are central to determining whether the prohibited expression is protected by the guarantee of free expression.

3.2.1 Expressive Content

58 The first question is whether the noise emitted by a loudspeaker from inside the club had expressive content. The answer must be yes. The loudspeaker sent a message into the street about the show going on inside the club. The fact that the message may not, in the view of some, have been particularly valuable, or may even have been offensive, does not deprive it of s. 2(b) protection. Expressive activity is not excluded from the scope of the guarantee because of its particular message. Subject to objections on the ground of method or location, as discussed below, all expressive activity is presumptively protected by s. 2(b) …

59 It is clear that noise emitted by loudspeakers from buildings onto the street can have expressive content, and in this case it did. Therefore, the first part of the test in Irwin Toy is met and a prima facie case for s. 2(b) protection is established.

3.2.2 Excluded Expression

60 Expressive activity may fall outside the scope of s. 2(b) protection because of how or where it is delivered. While all expressive content is worthy of protection …, the method or location of the expression may not be. For instance, this Court has found that violent expression is not protected by the Canadian Charter: Irwin Toy, at pp. 969-70. Violence is not excluded because of the message it conveys (no matter how hateful) but rather because the method by which the message is conveyed is not consonant with Charter protection.

62 Section 2(b) protection does not extend to all places. Private property, for example, will fall outside the protected sphere of s. 2(b) absent state-imposed limits on expression, since state action is necessary to implicate the Canadian Charter. Public property, however, may be more problematic since, by definition, it implicates the state. Two countervailing arguments, both powerful, are pitted against each other where the issue is expression on public property.

63 The argument for s. 2(b) protection on all public property focuses on ownership. It says the critical distinction is between government-owned places and other places. The government as the owner of property controls it. It follows that restrictions on the use of public property for expressive purposes are "government acts". Therefore, it is argued, the government is limiting the right to free expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and must justify this under s. 1.

64 The argument against s. 2(b) protection on at least some government-owned property, by contrast, focuses on the distinction between public use of property and private use of property. Regardless of the fact that the government owns and hence controls its property, it is asserted, many government places are essentially private in use. Some areas of government-owned property have become recognized as public spaces in which the public has a right to express itself. But other areas, like private offices and diverse places of public business, have never been viewed as available spaces for public expression. It cannot have been the intention of the drafters of the Canadian Charter, the argument continues, to confer a prima facie right of free expression in these essentially private spaces and to cast the onus on the government to justify the exclusion of public expression from places that have always and unquestionably been off-limits to public expression and could not effectively function if they were open to the public.

72 Expressive activity should be excluded from the protective scope of s. 2(b) only if its method or location clearly undermines the values that underlie the guarantee. Violent expression, which falls outside the scope of s. 2(b) by reason of its method, provides a useful analogy. Violent expression may be a means of political expression and may serve to enhance the self-fulfillment of the perpetrator. However, it is not protected by s. 2(b) because violent means and methods undermine the values that s. 2(b) seeks to protect. Violence prevents dialogue rather than fostering it. Violence prevents the self-fulfillment of the victim rather than enhancing it. And violence stands in the way of finding the truth rather than furthering it. Similarly, in determining what public spaces fall outside s. 2(b) protection, we must ask whether free expression in a given place undermines the values underlying s. 2(b).

73 We therefore propose the following test for the application of s. 2(b) to public property; it adopts a principled basis for method or location-based exclusion from s. 2(b) ... The onus of satisfying this test rests on the claimant.

75 The historical function of a place for public discourse is an indicator that expression in that place is consistent with the purposes of s. 2(b). In places where free expression has traditionally occurred, it is unlikely that protecting expression undermines the values underlying the freedom. As a result, where historical use for free expression is made out, the location of the expression as it relates to public property will be protected.

76 Actual function is also important. Is the space in fact essentially private, despite being government-owned, or is it public? Is the function of the space — the activity going on there — compatible with open public expression? Or is the activity one that requires privacy and limited access? Would an open right to intrude and present one's message by word or action be consistent with what is done in the space? Or would it hamper the activity? Many government functions, from cabinet meetings to minor clerical functions, require privacy. To extend a right of free expression to such venues might well undermine democracy and efficient governance.

77 Historical and actual functions serve as markers for places where free expression would have the effect of undermining the values underlying the freedom of expression. The ultimate question, however, will always be whether free expression in the place at issue would undermine the values the guarantee is designed to promote. Most cases will be resolved on the basis of historical or actual function. However, we cannot discount the possibility that other factors may be relevant. Changes in society and technology may affect the spaces where expression should be protected having regard to the values that underlie the guarantee. The proposed test reflects this, by permitting factors other than historical or actual function to be considered where relevant.

78 The markers of historical and actual functions will provide ready answers in most cases. However, we must accept that, on the difficult issue of whether free expression is protected in a given location, some imprecision is inevitable. As some scholars point out, the public-private divide cannot be precisely defined in a way that will provide an advance answer for all possible situations: see, e.g., R. Moon, The Constitutional Protection of Freedom of Expression (2000), at pp. 148 et seq. This said, the historical and actual functions of a place is something that can be established by evidence. As courts rule on what types of spaces are inherently public, a central core of certainty may be expected to evolve with respect to when expression in a public place will undermine the values underlying the freedom of expression.

79 … Our jurisprudence requires broad protection at the s. 2(b) stage, on the understanding that governments can limit that protection if they can justify the limits under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter. The proposed test reflects this. However, it also reflects the reality that some places must remain outside the protected sphere of s. 2(b). People must know where they can and cannot express themselves and governments should not be required to justify every exclusion or regulation of expression under s. 1. … [T]he test must provide a preliminary screening process. Otherwise, uncertainty will prevail and governments will be continually forced to justify restrictions which, viewed from the perspective of history and common sense, are entirely appropriate. Restricted access to many government-owned venues is part of our history and our constitutional tradition. The Canadian Charter was not intended to turn this state of affairs on its head.

80 A final concern is whether the proposed test is flexible enough to accommodate future developments. Changes in society will inevitably alter the specifics of the debate about the venues in which the guarantee of free expression will apply. Some say, for example, that the increasing privatization of government space will shift the debate to the private sector. Others say that the new spaces for communication created by electronic communication through the Internet will raise new questions on the issue of where the right to free speech applies. We do not suggest how the problems of the future will be answered. But it seems to us that a test that focuses on historical and actual functions as markers for public and private domains, adapted as necessary to accord with new situations and the values underlying the s. 2(b) guarantees, will be sufficiently flexible to meet the problems of the future.

81 … [T]he expression at issue in this case falls within the protected sphere of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter. The content, as already noted, is expressive. Viewed from the perspective of locus, the expression falls within the public domain. Streets are clearly areas of public, as opposed to private, concourse, where expression of many varieties has long been accepted. There is nothing to suggest that to permit this medium of expression would subvert the values of s. 2(b).

3.2.3 The Infringement

82 This brings us to the third step of the Irwin Toy test. Having concluded that the expression falls within the protected scope of s. 2(b), we must ask whether the By-law impinges on protected expression, in purpose or effect.

83 Here, the purpose of the By-law is benign. However, its effect is to restrict expression. Where the effect of a provision is to limit expression, a breach of s. 2(b) will be made out, provided the claimant shows that the expression at issue promotes one of the values underlying the freedom of expression … .

84 The electronically amplified noise at issue here encouraged passers-by to engage in the leisure activity of attending one of the performances held at the club. Generally speaking, engaging in lawful leisure activities promotes such values as individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing. The disputed value of particular expressions of self- fulfillment, like exotic dancing, does not negate this general proposition … . It follows that the By-law has the effect of restricting expression which promotes one of the values underlying s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter.

3.3 Is the Limit Justified Under Section 1 of the Canadian Charter?

86 We have concluded that the By-law amounts to a limitation on expression protected by s. 2(b). The remaining question is whether that limit is justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter.

89 We conclude that the objective of the limitation is pressing and substantial … Noise pollution is a serious problem in urban centers, and cities like Montréal are entitled to act reasonably and responsibly in seeking to curb it.

90 This brings us to proportionality. Proportionality is concerned with the means chosen to meet the objective. Here the City chose a two-pronged attack on noise pollution. First, it prohibited noises exceeding a stipulated degree of loudness: art. 8. Second, it prohibited particular noises — namely noise that can be heard from the outside and is produced by sound equipment, whether it is inside a building or installed or used outside: art. 9. Noise targeted by art. 9 is prohibited regardless of whether it affects an inhabited place: art. 11. It is important, however, to note that art. 9 does not represent an absolute ban. … the scheme of the By-law in this case anticipates routine granting of licences as exceptions to the prohibition. Article 20 of the By-law provides that the City may authorize the use of sound equipment prohibited by arts. 9 and 11 in particular circumstances, as for special events, celebrations and demonstrations. The City has exercised this authority and granted permits to use sound equipment on hundreds of occasions: at para. 115, per Chamberland J.A. There is no evidence that it has exercised this authority arbitrarily or to curb democratic discourse. Moreover, as discussed above, in para. 34, a contextual reading of the impugned provision leads to the conclusion that art. 9(1) only captures noise that interferes with the peaceful use and enjoyment of the urban environment. This is the essence of the regulatory scheme the City put in place to deal with noise pollution on its streets.

91 The first question is whether the limit on noise produced by sound equipment is rationally connected to the City's objective of limiting noise in the streets. Clearly it is. Amplified noise emitted into the street may interfere with the activities of people using the street and the buildings around it. People in urban neighbourhoods cannot expect to be free from the sounds of the many activities that go on around them. However, they can and do expect the level of this intrusion to be limited, so that they can enjoy a measure of peace and quiet. This was the City's objective. Presumptively prohibiting the emission of amplified noise was one of the means by which it sought to accomplish that objective.

94 … [I]n dealing with social issues like this one, where interests and rights conflict, elected officials must be accorded a measure of latitude. The Court will not interfere simply because it can think of a better, less intrusive way to manage the problem. What is required is that the City establish that it has tailored the limit to the exigencies of the problem in a reasonable way. …

95 Second, it is far from clear that regulation by degree of loudness would effectively deal with the problem of noise pollution and the conflict between commercial concerns seeking to maximize commercial expression and citizens seeking a relatively peaceful and calm environment. … Noise can be emitted randomly in unexpected places. Detecting and prosecuting violations could be difficult. Moreover, the regulation of sound levels alone would not prevent the possibility that multiple, simultaneous noises, each within the legal limit, could cumulatively exceed an acceptable sound level.

97 Rights should never be sacrificed to mere administrative convenience. Here, however, the City contends that for a variety of reasons there was really no other practical way to deal with the complex problem it was facing. Accordingly, the City's measures do not go beyond what was reasonably necessary in the circumstances and, as a result, its regulatory plan is entitled to deference.

98 It remains to consider whether the prejudicial effects on free expression flowing from the regulation of sound at issue are proportionate to the beneficial effects of the regulation. In our view, the test supports the conclusion that the By-law is valid.

99 The expression limited by the By-law consists of noise produced by sound equipment that interferes with the peaceful use and enjoyment of the urban environment. This limitation therefore goes to the permitted forms of expression on city streets, regardless of content. Against this stand the benefits of reducing noise pollution on the street and in the neighbourhood. We acknowledge that in balancing the deleterious and positive effects of the By-law, account must be taken of the fact that the activity was taking place on a street with an active commercial nightlife in a large and sophisticated city. This does not, however, mean that its residents must necessarily be subjected to abuses of the enjoyment of their environment. … We conclude that the beneficial effects of the By-law outweigh its prejudicial effects.

3.4 Conclusion on the Constitutional Issue

100 We conclude that the expression at issue falls within the protected sphere of s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter and that the prohibition on noise produced by sound equipment in arts. 9 and 11 of the By-law limits that right. However, that limitation is justified under s. 1 of the Canadian Charter as a reasonable limit in a free and democratic society. We therefore conclude that the By-law is constitutional.

[Binnie J. dissenting found that the by-law applied to any sound projected on to the street even if it was not amplified and so decided that the by-law was overbroad in its application and could not be justified under s.1 of the Charter].

5.1.2 Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component

Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority v. Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component*, 2009 SCC 31, [2009] 2 SCR 295

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ. was delivered by DESCHAMPS J.

Facts and Judicial History

[3] In the summer and fall of 2004, the respondents, the Canadian Federation of Students — British Columbia Component ("CFS") and the British Columbia Teachers' Federation ("BCTF"), attempted to purchase advertising space on the sides of buses operated by the transit authorities. The CFS, a society which represents thousands of college and university students in B.C., sought to encourage more young people to vote in a provincial election scheduled for May 17, 2005 by posting, on buses, advertisements about the election. The first advertisement, which was to run the length of the bus, would have depicted a silhouette of a crowd at a concert with the following text:

> Register now. Learn the issues. Vote May 17, 2005. ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com

The second advertisement was a "banner ad" placed along the top of the bus which would have read in one long line as follows:

> Tuition fees ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com Minimum wage ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com Environment ROCKTHEVOTEBC.com.

The BCTF, a society and trade union which is the exclusive bargaining agent for more than 40,000 public school teachers in B.C., sought to voice its concern about changes in the public education system by posting the following message:

> 2,500 fewer teachers, 114 schools closed. Your kids. Our students. Worth speaking out for.

[4] The transit authorities refused to post the respondents' advertisements on the basis that such advertisements were not permitted by their advertising policies. The transit authorities had adopted essentially identical advertising policies, which included the following provisions:

> POLICY:
> ...
> 2. Advertisements, to be accepted, shall be limited to those which communicate information concerning goods, services, public service announcements and public events.
> ...
> Standards and Limitations
> ...
> 7. No advertisement will be accepted which is likely, in the light of prevailing community standards, to cause offence to any person or group of persons or create controversy;
> ...
> 9. No advertisement will be accepted which advocates or opposes any ideology or political philosophy, point of view, policy or action, or which conveys information about a political meeting, gathering or event, a political party or the candidacy of any person for a political position or public office;

[5] The respondents commenced the present action, alleging that articles 2, 7 and 9 of the transit authorities' policies had violated their right to freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter. The respondents restricted their claim for relief to a declaration, "pursuant to s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, that [articles] 2, 7 and 9 of the advertising policies are unconstitutional and of no force and effect".

Issues

[12] There are four issues in this appeal: (1) whether the entities which operate the public transit systems in the GVRD and elsewhere in British Columbia are subject to the Charter; (2) if so, whether the impugned policies adopted by these entities infringe the respondents' right to freedom of expression; (3) if so, whether the limits imposed by those policies are "reasonable limits prescribed by law" within the meaning of s. 1 of the Charter; and (4) whether a declaration can be made under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 with respect to the policies.

[The Court found that the Transit Authorities were government actors and therefore subject to the Charter]

3.2 Section 2(b) of the Charter

[25] … [T]he transit authorities have earned revenues from advertising posted on their buses for years. BC Transit has permitted advertising inside its buses since the 1980s and on the outsides for over a decade, and TransLink has permitted advertising on the outsides of its buses ever since it came into existence in 1998. The transit authorities' policies, which regulate both the content and the form of advertisements, are at the heart of the debate. The respondents sought to post various advertisements on the sides of buses, and their requests were rejected by the transit authorities on the basis that articles 2, 7 and 9 of the policies prohibited political advertisements or advertisements of a controversial nature.

3.2.1 Application of City of Montréal

[37] In order to determine whether the transit authorities' advertising policies infringe s. 2(b) of the Charter, three questions must be asked: First, do the respondents' proposed advertisements have expressive content that brings them within the prima facie protection of s. 2(b)? Second, if so, does the method or location of this expression remove that protection? Third, if the expression is protected by s. 2(b), do the transit authorities' policies deny that protection? (City of Montréal, at para. 56) If the policies are found to have infringed s. 2(b) of the Charter, the analysis then shifts to determining whether the infringement is justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

[38] The answer to the first question is not in issue. The proposed advertisements unquestionably have expressive content. The answer to the third question is also Uncontroversial … In the instant case, the very purpose of the impugned policies is to restrict the content of expression in the advertising space on the sides of buses. The wording of articles 2 and 7 clearly limits the content of advertisements. Article 9 is even more precise in excluding political speech. …

[39] Regarding the second question, the analysis is somewhat more elaborate. In City of Montréal, the majority of the Court set out the following test for determining whether expression in a government location is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter (at para. 74): The basic question with respect to expression on government-owned property is whether the place is a public place where one would expect constitutional protection for free expression on the basis that expression in that place does not conflict with the purposes which s. 2(b) is intended to serve, namely (1) democratic discourse, (2) truth finding and (3) self-fulfillment. To answer this question, the following factors should be considered: (a) the historical or actual function of the place; and (b) whether other aspects of the place suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression.

[42] The question is whether the historical or actual function or other aspects of the space are incompatible with expression or suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression. One way to answer this question is to look at past or present practice. This can help identify any incidental function that may have developed in relation to certain government property. … While it is true that buses have not been used as spaces for this type of expressive activity for as long as city streets, utility poles and town squares, there is some history of their being so used, and they are in fact being used for it at present. As a result, not only is there some history of use of this property as a space for public expression, but there is actual use — both of which indicate that the expressive activity in question neither impedes the primary function of the bus as a vehicle for public transportation nor, more importantly, undermines the values underlying freedom of expression.

[43] The second factor from City of Montréal is whether other aspects of the place suggest that expression within it would undermine the values underlying the constitutional protection. … The very fact that the general public has access to the advertising space on buses is an indication that members of the public would expect constitutional protection of their expression in that government-owned space. … The bus is operated on city streets and forms an integral part of the public transportation system. The general public using the streets, including people who could become bus passengers, are therefore exposed to a message placed on the side of a bus in the same way as to a message on a utility pole or in any public space in the city. Like a city street, a city bus is a public place where individuals can openly interact with each other and their surroundings. Thus, rather than undermining the purposes of s. 2(b), expression on the sides of buses could enhance them by furthering democratic discourse, and perhaps even truth finding and self-fulfillment.

[46] I do not see any aspect of the location that suggests that expression within it would undermine the values underlying free expression. On the contrary, the space allows for expression by a broad range of speakers to a large public audience and expression there could actually further the values underlying s. 2(b) of the Charter. I therefore conclude that the side of a bus is a location where expressive activity is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter.

Is the Limit Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[Deschamps J. found that the transit authorities' policies satisfied the prescribed by law requirement because they were intended to be binding and were "accessible and precise".]

3.3.4 Are the Limits Justified in a Free and Democratic Society?

> [76] I accept that the policies were adopted for the purpose of providing "a safe, welcoming public transit system" and that this is a sufficiently important objective to warrant placing a limit on freedom of expression. However, like the trial judge, I am not convinced that the limits on political content imposed by articles 2, 7 and 9 are rationally connected to the objective. I have some difficulty seeing how an advertisement on the side of a bus that constitutes political speech might create a safety risk or an unwelcoming environment for transit users. It is not the political nature of an advertisement that creates a dangerous or hostile environment. Rather, it is only if the advertisement is offensive in that, for example, its content is discriminatory or it advocates violence or terrorism — regardless of whether it is commercial or political in nature — that the objective of providing a safe and welcoming transit system will be undermined.
> [77] Had I found a rational connection between the objective and the limits imposed by articles 2, 7 and 9, I would nevertheless have concluded that the means chosen to implement the objective was neither reasonable nor proportionate to the respondents' interest in disseminating their messages pursuant to their right under s. 2(b) of the Charter to freedom of expression. The policies allow for commercial speech but prohibit all political advertising. In particular, article 2 of the policies limits the types of advertisements that will be accepted to "those which communicate information concerning goods, services, public service announcements and public events", thereby excluding advertisements which communicate political messages. Article 7, on the other hand, refers to prevailing community standards as a measuring stick for whether an advertisement is likely "to cause offence to any person or group of persons or create controversy". While a community standard of tolerance may constitute a reasonable limit on offensive advertisements, excluding advertisements which "create controversy" is unnecessarily broad. Citizens, including bus riders, are expected to put up with some controversy in a free and democratic society. Finally, article 9 represents the most overt restriction on political advertisements, as it bans all forms of political content regardless of whether the message actually contributes to an unsafe or unwelcoming transit environment. In sum, the policies amount to a blanket exclusion of a highly valued form of expression in a public location that serves as an important place for public discourse. They therefore do not constitute a minimal impairment of freedom of expression.

> 4.2 Application of the Principles to the Transit Authorities' Policies
> [90] The transit authorities' policies clearly come within the meaning of "law" for the purposes of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. They were adopted by government entities pursuant to a rule-making power. On the facts of the case, the transit authorities used their delegated rule-making power to adopt policies which unjustifiably limited the respondents' freedom of expression. Those policies are binding rules of general application that establish the rights of members of the public who seek to advertise on the transit authorities' buses. In my view, the transit authorities' advertising policies are "law" within the meaning of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 and can therefore be declared of no force or effect to the extent of their inconsistency.

5.1.3 Case notes: Watson, Batty, Bracken

1. The Access to Abortion Act in British Columbia creates access zones around abortion clinics, as well as the homes and offices of abortion providers. These zones, which are carved out of space that is otherwise public, exclude protestors from the immediate vicinity of the clinics. The BC Court of Appeal in R v. Watson and Spratt, 2008 BCCA 234 held that the BC law was a reasonable restriction on the freedom of expression rights of anti-abortion protestors. In the court's view, the law was intended to ensure "equal access to abortion services," to enhance "privacy and dignity for women using the services," and to improve "security for service providers" (Watson at para 71). The court thought that "[w]omen entering the clinic should not be held hostage to the message the protestors wish to send" (Watson at para 82). The buffer zone established by the law "offers distance and therefore protection to the staff and patients of the clinic from the physical threats and emotional upset caused by the actions of the protestors and the proximity of their strong message" (Watson at para 76). The court also thought that because "the line between peaceful protest and virulent or even violent expression against abortion is easily and quickly crossed … a clear rule against any interference" is the best way to achieve the law's purpose (Watson at para 80). When the object of the law is to ensure unimpeded access, it is impractical to require the authorities to make a decision about "each individual approach to everyone entering the clinic" (Watson at para 80).
2. In Batty v City of Toronto, 2011 ONSC 6862, a judge of the Ontario Superior Court upheld a trespass notice issued by the City of Toronto that required the removal of structures, equipment, and debris from a park that had been put there by protestors. The judge accepted that part of the protestors' message was that "it is both possible and necessary to build a community structure different from that prevailing in most places of our society" (Batty at para 108). However, in the judge's view, the Charter did not give the protestors a right to "[appropriate] to their own use – without asking their fellow citizens – a large portion of the common public space for an indefinite period" (Batty 2011, 12). He noted that the trespass order only limited the form and scope of the protest and would not prevent the protestors from spending up to eighteen hours a day at the park continuing their protest.
3. In Bracken v The Town of Fort Erie, 2017 ONCA 668, the Ontario Court of Appeal emphasized that a "a protest does not cease to be peaceful simply because protestors are loud and angry" (Bracken at para 51). In that case a lone protestor standing at the entrance to the city hall had communicated his message using a megaphone.

5.1.5 Questions

1. Why have Canadian courts adopted a version of the public forum doctrine and not simply relied on s.1 of the Charter to justify limits on access to state-owned properties?
2. In the City of Montreal case, when considering the third step of the Irwin Toy s. 2(b) test, the court held that the strip club's 'speech' advances the values underlying the freedom, and more particularly the value of individual self-realization. If the speech in this case satisfies the test, is there any speech that might fail the test?
3. In the Vancouver Transportation case advertisers had to pay for space on the public 'platform' - does that complicate the analysis?
4. When if ever should an individual be protected from speech they do not want to hear?
5. Is an encampment a form of expression? If it is, how does a court decide when its prohibition is justified?
6. Why do you think that public demonstrations are still so commonplace in the age of the internet?
7. What is the relationship between section 2(b) and s.2(c) (freedom of peaceful assembly)? Why do you think s.2(c) has played such a limited role in the cases dealing with protest?

5.2 Access to state platforms

Freedom of expression is generally described as a negative right that does not place any obligation on the state to support or facilitate expression. However, the Canadian courts have said that in exceptional cases the freedom may be breached when the state excludes a speaker from a publicly established platform or program for expression. The most obvious example of this is the classification of certain state properties, such as streets and parks, as public forums on which individuals ordinarily have a right to communicate. As noted earlier, the courts have treated the exclusion of communication from public forums as a limitation on expression rights under the Charter, and not simply as a refusal by the state to actively support individual expression.

When the state supports or subsidizes expression, it makes choices between different speakers or messages, giving support to some and denying it to others. In the case of an arts subsidy program, for example, the state chooses among different applicants on grounds such as aesthetic merit or artistic medium. If an applicant is unsuccessful because their work has been judged aesthetically inferior to that of other applicants, we do not ordinarily consider that the state has violated their freedom of expression rights. It is also generally accepted that the government is entitled to express or lend its support to particular views, such as national unity or the need for greater crime control. The state may also consult with some members of the community (or survey a section of the population) when deciding on a particular policy.

Yet sometimes when a speaker is denied access to a particular state-created opportunity or resource for communication they experience this denial not simply as a failure by the state to support their communication (which involves no constitutional wrong) but instead as state 'censorship' of their speech. Whether we view a state allocation decision as a denial of support for speech, or instead as suppression of speech, will depend on the purpose, scope, and stability of the particular support program. Certain state programs of support for expression are so well established, and so broad in scope, that they are viewed as part of the framework of public discourse. A decision by the state to exclude a particular speaker or viewpoint from such a program may be viewed as a breach of s.2(b).

ROTHSTEIN J. —

INTRODUCTION

1 This case concerns whether legislation that limits the ability of school employees to run for election and serve as school trustees in Alberta is constitutional.

II. FACTUAL BACKGROUND

3 The Local Authorities Election Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-21 ("LAEA"), governs the proceedings for election to municipal councils and school boards in Alberta. The LAEA sets out the qualifications required to be a candidate for school trustee. A person may be nominated as a candidate if he or she is eligible to vote, meets certain residency requirements, and is not otherwise ineligible (s. 21).

4 Ineligibility to be nominated as a candidate is dealt with in s. 22 of the LAEA. Prior to the amendments at issue in this appeal, it restricted school employees from running for election as a school trustee only in the jurisdiction in which they were employed ("own-employer restriction"). Any public school employees who wished to seek election to their employing school board were required to take a leave of absence and were deemed to have resigned if elected (ss. 22(1)(b) and 22(9)). There was no requirement to take a leave of absence or to resign if a school employee was elected as a school trustee to any other school board.

5 In 2004, Alberta legislated to expand the "own-employer" restriction into a province-wide restriction on school employees serving as school trustees. The School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002, S.A. 2002, c. 23 ("LAEA Amendments"), amended the LAEA by adding a provision stating that, unless on a leave of absence, a person is not eligible to be nominated as a candidate for election as a trustee of any school board if that person is employed by any school district or division, charter school, or private school in Alberta. If a school employee is ultimately elected as a school trustee, s. 22(9) of the LAEA is engaged, which deems the school employee to have resigned his or her position of employment in order to carry out the role of school trustee. There is therefore a deemed resignation even when a school employee is elected to a school board which is not his or her employer.

6 The appellants Baier, Ollenberger and McNiff are teachers who, at the time the LAEA Amendments were passed, were serving as school trustees on school boards that did not employ them. The appellant Keith is a teacher who intended to seek election to a school board. …

VI. ANALYSIS

A. Freedom of Expression

20 … [T]he Court has held that s. 2 generally imposes a negative obligation on government rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance …

21 In Haig, this Court considered whether freedom of expression includes a positive right to be provided with a specific means of expression. L'Heureux-Dubé J. for the majority, noted that freedom of expression has typically been conceptualized in terms of negative rights rather than positive entitlements:

> The traditional view, in colloquial terms, is that the freedom of expression contained in s. 2(b) prohibits gags, but does not compel the distribution of megaphones. [p. 1035]

22 That case arose in the context of federal and Quebec referenda concerning proposed constitutional amendments in 1992. Mr. Haig had moved from Ontario to Quebec and was unable to vote in either the federal or Quebec referendum because of different residency requirements in the federal and provincial legislation. He challenged the federal legislation as violating his freedom of expression. The majority held that the right to vote in the referendum was governed by the Referendum Act, S.C. 1992, c. 30, and s. 2(b) did not require the government to extend that right to all. L'Heureux-Dubé J. stated:

> The Court is being asked to find that this statutorily created platform for expression has taken on constitutional status. In my view, though a referendum is undoubtedly a platform for expression, s. 2(b) of the Charter does not impose upon a government, whether provincial or federal, any positive obligation to consult its citizens through the particular mechanism of a referendum. Nor does it confer upon all citizens the right to express their opinions in a referendum. A government is under no constitutional obligation to extend this platform of expression to anyone, let alone to everyone. A referendum as a platform of expression is, in my view, a matter of legislative policy and not of constitutional law. [Emphasis added; p. 1041.]

23 The statutory platform analysis in Haig has been followed in a number of subsequent cases which have held that underinclusive legislative schemes or government action did not infringe s. 2. In Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, 1994 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 627

("NWAC"), the Native Women's Association of Canada ("NWAC") alleged that the government's funding of some Aboriginal organizations, along with the opportunity to participate in constitutional discussions, required the government to bestow upon the NWAC an equal chance for expression of its views, and funding to enable it to do so. The Court determined that there was no positive duty on the government to provide funding to NWAC in the circumstances. Sopinka J., for the majority, stated:

[I]t cannot be said that every time the Government of Canada chooses to fund or consult a certain group, thereby providing a platform upon which to convey certain views, that the Government is also required to fund a group purporting to represent the opposite point of view. [p. 656] The freedom of expression guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter does not guarantee any particular means of expression or place a positive obligation upon the Government to consult anyone. [p. 663]

> ... a situation might arise in which, in order to make a fundamental freedom meaningful, a posture of restraint would not be enough, and positive governmental action might be required. This might, for example, take the form of legislative intervention aimed at preventing certain conditions which muzzle expression, or ensuring public access to certain kinds of information.

27 In Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), [2001] 3 SCR 1016, 2001 SCC 94, a majority of the Court found such an exception to the general rule that s. 2 does not require positive government action. Labour legislation excluding agricultural workers from a protective regime was found to infringe s. 2(d). Bastarache J., for the majority, considered the factors relevant to establishing an exception:

> (2) The claimant must meet an evidentiary burden of demonstrating that exclusion from a statutory regime permits a substantial interference with activity protected under s. 2 (para. 25), or that the purpose of the exclusion was to infringe such activity (paras. 31-33). The exercise of a fundamental freedom need not be impossible, but the claimant must seek more than a particular channel for exercising his or her fundamental freedoms (para. 25).
> (3) The state must be accountable for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom: "[U]nderinclusive state action falls into suspicion not simply to the extent it discriminates against an unprotected class, but to the extent it substantially orchestrates, encourages or sustains the violation of fundamental freedoms" (para. 26).

29 While Dunmore concerned freedom of association rather than freedom of expression, the three factors for challenging underinclusive legislation were described as applicable to s. 2 in general. …

30 In cases where a government defending a Charter challenge alleges, or the Charter claimant concedes, that a positive rights claim is being made under s. 2(b), a court must proceed in the following way. First it must consider whether the activity for which the claimant seeks s. 2(b) protection is a form of expression. If so, then second, the court must determine if the claimant claims a positive entitlement to government action, or simply the right to be free from government interference. If it is a positive rights claim, then third, the three Dunmore factors must be considered. As indicated above, these three factors are (1) that the claim is grounded in a fundamental freedom of expression rather than in access to a particular statutory regime; (2) that the claimant has demonstrated that exclusion from a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with s. 2(b) freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression under s. 2(b); and (3) that the government is responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom. If the claimant cannot satisfy these criteria then the s. 2(b) claim will fail. If the three factors are satisfied then s. 2(b) has been infringed and the analysis will shift to s. 1.

VII. APPLICATION TO THE CASE

Question 1

Do ss. 1(2)(a) and 1(2)(b) of the School Trustee Statutes Amendment Act, 2002, infringe s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

A. Expressive Activity

31 The threshold to any s. 2(b) claim must be that there is expression involved. The appellants claim that "[s]tanding for election to the office of school trustee and serving as a school trustee" are expressive activities, the restriction of which they claim violates s. 2(b) (appellants' factum, at para. 27). These activities, they argue, represent "unique and important opportunities to engage in political debate, persuasion and voting on the governance, funding and management of the public and separate education systems" (ibid.). The respondent concedes that seeking nomination for school trustee and some of the activities of school trustees may be characterized as having an expressive nature (respondent's factum, at paras. 1 and 18).

32 It might be said that the expressive nature of school trusteeship is merely incidental, and that school boards are primarily concerned with school management rather than expression. However, there is nothing that requires that the activity in question be purely or predominantly expression to count as expression for s. 2(b) purposes (see e.g. RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573, at p. 588).

33 The LAEA Amendments only restrict who has access to the platform of school trusteeship for expressive activity. They do not constrain the expressive activities of those with access to the platform i.e. those not ineligible to be school trustees. I interpret the appellants' complaint as "I do not have access to school trusteeship to express myself" rather than, "as a school trustee I cannot express a particular view". Expressive activity is in issue, although what is restricted is the platform on which that expression may take place rather than the content of the expression. I find that the expressive aspects of school trustee candidacy and school trusteeship are sufficient to continue consideration of whether s. 2(b) is violated.

B. Is a Positive Right Claimed?

35 To determine whether a right claimed is a positive right, the question is whether the appellants claim the government must legislate or otherwise act to support or enable an expressive activity. Making the case for a negative right would require the appellants to seek freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage, without any need for any government support or enablement.

36 The appellants in this case make a claim for the government to legislate to enable expressive activity. Their claim is thus a positive one. The appellants seek access to the statutory platform of school trustee candidacy and school trusteeship. The fact that the appellants had access to this statutory platform prior to the LAEA Amendments cannot convert their claim into a negative one. There is no meaningful distinction in this case between a hypothetical situation where the government for the first time provides for elected school boards with provisions to disqualify school employees from running and serving as trustees, and the present situation where pre-existing legislation has been amended to that end. To hold otherwise would mean that once a government had created a statutory platform, it could never change or repeal it without infringing s. 2(b) and justifying such changes under s. 1.

C. Are the Dunmore Factors Met Here?

43 Having determined that the appellants are making a positive claim that the government legislate their inclusion into the platform of school trusteeship, the question is whether their claim meets the grounds for an exception to the general rule that s. 2(b) only protects from government interference. This involves a consideration of the three factors identified by Bastarache J. in Dunmore as stated above.

44 First, claims of underinclusion should be grounded in fundamental Charter freedoms rather than in access to a particular statutory regime. In this case, the appellants assert the right to run for election and to serve as school trustees. The appellants argue that the unique role of a school trustee means that when a teacher seeks to be able to run as a school trustee it is a fundamental freedom. However, claiming a unique role is not the same as claiming a fundamental freedom. The appellants' claim, as they have articulated it, is grounded in access to the particular statutory regime of school trusteeship. As such it would not meet the first of the Dunmore criteria.

48 In my view, the appellants have not established that their practical exclusion from school trusteeship substantially interferes with their ability to express themselves on matters relating to the education system. The LAEA Amendments may deprive them of one particular means of expression, but it has not been demonstrated that absent inclusion in this statutory scheme, they are unable to express themselves on education issues. As Bastarache J. noted in Delisle at para. 41, diminished effectiveness in the conveyance of a message does not mean that s. 2(b) is violated. There must be substantial interference with the fundamental freedom. School employees may express themselves in many ways other than through running for election as, and serving as, a school trustee.

53 The chambers judge found "the purpose of the LAEA Amendments ... does not infringe s. 2(b) as the legislation is meant to protect the democratic process by ensuring the business of school boards can be carried on without concerns about conflicts of interest" (para. 79). The party alleging improper purpose has the onus of demonstrating that to be true (Delisle, at para. 76, per Cory and Iacobucci JJ.). …

54 The appellants have not met the evidentiary burden of demonstrating that exclusion from the statutory regime permits a substantial interference with their freedom of expression on school board issues or education generally. Rather they seek a particular channel of expression. Nor have the appellants proved that the purpose of the LAEA Amendments was to infringe their freedom of expression. Therefore, their claim does not meet the second Dunmore factor. Because the appellants have not established a substantial interference with their ability to exercise their freedom of expression, it is unnecessary to consider the third Dunmore factor.

55 In finding against the appellants here, I leave open the possibility that there may be exceptional situations where exclusion from a statutory platform interferes substantially with fundamental freedom of expression and meets the Dunmore criteria. While s. 2(b) does not give a right to a specific statutory platform, so that restricting access to such a platform will not generally offend s. 2(b), and while Dunmore itself was decided under s. 2(d) rather than s. 2(b), there may be exceptional cases where exclusion from a platform so substantially interferes with freedom of expression that it may infringe s. 2(b). However, the case at bar is not such a case.

E. Conclusion on Section 2(b)

61 The appellants' claim is one of access to a statutory platform. It does not meet the criteria set out in Dunmore to warrant an exception to the general rule that freedom of expression under s. 2(b) of the Charter does not grant the right to a statutorily created platform for expression. The appellants' s. 2(b) claim must therefore be dismissed.

62 As s. 2(b) is not infringed, there is no need to consider s. 1.

[LeBel J. (Bastarache and Abella JJ. concurring) held that s. 2(b) does not protect the right to run for public office.]

[Fish J. (dissenting) thought that when the government creates a system of democratically elected boards to administer a particular public activity such as education, it cannot exclude a particular group of individuals, without having the justify that exclusion under s.1.].

5.2.2 Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General)

Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General)*, 2021 SCC 34, [2021] 2 SCR 845

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND BROWN J. —

Introduction

[2] Section 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 assigns to provinces exclusive legislative authority regarding "Municipal Institutions in the Province". Municipalities incorporated under this authority therefore hold delegated provincial powers; like school boards or other creatures of provincial statute, they do not have independent constitutional status. … No constitutional norms or conventions prevent a province from making changes to municipal institutions without municipal consent …

[3] … After the closing of a nomination period for elections to the Toronto City Council, the Province legislated a new, reduced ward structure for the City of Toronto and a correspondingly reduced Council. The City says that doing so was unconstitutional, because it limited the s. 2(b) Charter rights of electoral participants and violated the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy. It also, says the City, ran afoul of the constitutional requirements of effective representation, which it says flow from s. 2(b) of the Charter and s. 92(8) of the Constitution Act, 1867 by virtue of that same unwritten constitutional principle of democracy.

[4] None of these arguments have merit, and we would dismiss the City's appeal. In our view, the Province acted constitutionally. As to the s. 2(b) claim, the City seeks access to a statutory platform which must be considered under the framework stated in Baier. The change to the ward structure did not prevent electoral participants from engaging in access to a statutory platform which must be considered under the framework stated in Baier. The change to the ward structure did not prevent electoral participants from engaging in further political expression on election issues under the new ward structure in the 69 days between the Act coming into force and the election day. There was no substantial interference with the claimants' freedom of expression and thus no limitation of s. 2(b).

[7] On May 1, 2018, the City of Toronto campaign commenced and nominations opened in preparation for an election day on October 22, 2018. By the close of nominations on July 27, 2018, just over 500 candidates had registered to run in the 47 wards. That same day, the Government of Ontario announced its intention to introduce legislation reducing the size of Toronto City Council to 25 wards. On August 14, 2018, the Better Local Government Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 11 ("Act"), came into force, reducing the number of wards from 47 to 25 (based on the boundaries of the federal electoral districts), and extending the nomination period to September 14.

III. Issues

[13] Two issues arise from the foregoing. First, did the Act limit (unjustifiably or at all) the freedom of expression of candidates and/or voters participating in the 2018 Toronto municipal election? And secondly, can the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy be applied, either to narrow provincial legislative authority over municipal institutions or to require effective representation in those institutions, so as to invalidate the Act?

IV. Analysis

A. Freedom of Expression

Principles of Charter Interpretation in the Context of Section 2(b)

[16] … [Section] 2(b) has been interpreted as "generally impos[ing] a negative obligation . . . rather than a positive obligation of protection or assistance" (Baier, at para. 20 (emphasis added), citing Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995, at p. 1035). A claim is properly characterized as negative where the claimant seeks "freedom from government legislation or action suppressing an expressive activity in which people would otherwise be free to engage" (Baier, at para. 35 (emphasis added)). Such claims of right under s. 2(b) are considered under this Court's Irwin Toy framework.

[17] In Baier, however, this Court explained that s. 2(b) may, in certain circumstances, impose positive obligations on the government to facilitate expression. Put differently, while s. 2(b) typically "prohibits gags", it can also, in rare and narrowly circumscribed cases, "compel the distribution of megaphones" (para. 21, quoting Haig, at p. 1035). Hence the Court of Appeal's statement in this case that "[f]reedom of expression is respected, in the main, if governments simply refrain from actions that would be an unjustified interference with it", and that positive claims under s. 2(b) may be recognized in only "exceptional and narrow" circumstances (paras. 42 and 48 (emphasis in original)).

(2) The Baier Framework

[22] The Baier framework applies if a claimant seeks to impose an obligation on the government (or legislature) to provide access to a particular statutory or regulatory platform for expression (para. 30; Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority, at para. 35). Here, therefore, if the City's claim would require the government or legislature to enact legislation or promulgate regulations, or otherwise act to provide a particular statutory or regulatory platform, it is advancing a positive claim (Baier, at para. 35).

[23] In Baier, this Court held that, to succeed, a positive claim must satisfy the three Dunmore factors: (1) Is the claim grounded in freedom of expression, rather than in access to a particular statutory regime? (2) Has the claimant demonstrated that lack of access to a statutory regime has the effect of a substantial interference with freedom of expression, or has the purpose of infringing freedom of expression? (3) Is the government responsible for the inability to exercise the fundamental freedom? [Dunmore v. ON is a SCC decision dealing with freedom of association.]

[26] If, therefore, a claimant can demonstrate that, by denying access to a statutory platform, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression or acted with the purpose of doing so, the claim may proceed. Despite being a positive claim, the claimant has demonstrated a limit to its s. 2(b) right, and — subject to justification of such limit under s. 1 — government action or legislation may be required.

impossible, we stress that effective preclusion represents an exceedingly high bar that would be met only in extreme and rare cases (Baier, at para. 27; Dunmore, at para. 25). For example, a statutory reduction of the length of an election campaign to two days may well, as a practical matter, be shown to have the effect of constituting a substantial interference with freedom of expression. In such a case, meaningful expression may very well be found to be effectively precluded.

[28] The height of this bar of effective preclusion is demonstrated by Baier. There, legislation was amended to prohibit school employees from running for election as school trustees, and the Court — applying the Dunmore factors — concluded that no substantial interference with freedom of expression was demonstrated. The claim was grounded merely in access to a particular statutory platform governing school trusteeship, rather than a substantial interference with freedom of expression. And, in any event, there was no interference, substantial or otherwise, with the appellants' ability to express views on matters relating to the education system. Their exclusion from the statutory scheme deprived them only of one particular means of such expression (paras. 44 and 48).

(3) Application

(a) Nature of the Claim

[29] The first question to answer in deciding this appeal is whether the City advances a positive claim. There are two ways in which the City's claim can be understood. Each leads to the conclusion that the claim is, in substance, a positive claim that must, therefore, show a substantial interference with freedom of expression.

[30] The first possible view of the City's claim is that of restoring an earlier statutory platform, specifically the 47-ward structure. That this is so is evident from the City's requested disposition, which asks that the next municipal election be conducted under the previous framework (A.F., at para. 152). The City, then, would have the Province act (either by enacting new legislation or repealing the impugned provisions of the Act) to restore the previous statutory platform. This reveals a straightforward positive claim. The fact that the City and the participants in the election had previously enjoyed access to the 47-ward structure is of no legal significance. In Baier, this Court viewed a claim for restoring the status quo as a positive claim, equating it with a demand to legislate a framework for the first time. Such an approach is necessary to prevent fettering; "[t]o hold otherwise would mean that once a government had created a statutory platform, it could never change or repeal it without infringing s. 2(b)" (para. 36).

[32] The City's focus on the timing of the Act cannot, however, convert its positive claim into a negative one. While its claim is couched in language of non-interference — something that superficially resembles a negative claim to be considered under the Irwin Toy framework — the City does not seek protection of electoral participants' expression from restrictions tied to content or meaning (as was the case, for example, in Greater Vancouver Transportation Authority); rather, it seeks a particular platform (being whatever council structure existed at the outset of the campaign) by which to channel, and around which to structure, that expression.

(b) Application of Baier

[36] As explained above, the Baier framework asks whether the claimant demonstrated that, by denying access to a statutory regime, the government has substantially interfered with freedom of expression. To repeat, this is a demanding threshold, requiring the City to show that the Act radically frustrated the expression of election participants such that meaningful expression was effectively precluded. In our view, the City cannot do so and therefore has not established a limit on s. 2(b).

[37] Here, the candidates and their supporters had 69 days — longer than most federal and provincial election campaigns — to re-orient their messages and freely express themselves according to the new ward structure. (Our colleague Abella J. is simply incorrect to suggest, at para. 104, that only one month of the campaign remained. It was twice that.) The Act did not prevent candidates from engaging in further political speech under the new structure. Candidates continued to campaign vigorously, canvassing and debating about issues unrelated to the impugned provisions, the size of council or the ward boundaries. And even had they not, nothing in the Act prevented them from doing so. It imposed no restrictions on the content or meaning of the messages that participants could convey. Many of the challengers who continued to campaign ultimately had, by any measure, successful campaigns, raising significant amounts of money and receiving significant numbers of votes. This would not have been possible had their s. 2(b) rights been so radically frustrated so as to effectively preclude meaningful expression.

[38] It is of course likely that some of the candidates' prior expression may have lost its relevance; pamphlets or other campaign paraphernalia with an old ward designation on them, for instance, had to be revised or discarded. But, with the new ward structure — and larger ward populations — came higher campaign expenditure limits, so candidates were able to raise more funds over the 69 days they had left in the campaign. This is, therefore, a complaint that the prior expression of the candidates was no longer meaningful or helpful in their project to secure election. It is, at its root, a complaint about diminished effectiveness.

> instituting a two-day electoral campaign — may rise to the level of a substantial interference with freedom of expression; such an act may effectively preclude meaningful expression in the context of the election. That is simply not what happened here. Section 2(b) is not a guarantee of the effectiveness or continued relevance of a message, or that campaign materials otherwise retain their usefulness throughout the campaign.
> [40] Even accepting that the change in structure diminished the effectiveness of the electoral candidates' prior political speech by rendering some of their 47-ward campaign communications less relevant, this does not rise to the level of substantial interference. Again, the campaign that took place over 69 days following the imposition of the 25-ward system was vigorously contested by candidates whose freedom of expression was clearly not radically frustrated. …
> [41] The City says that the expression at issue here — again, what it calls "electoral expression" — is uniquely connected to, and dependent on, the framework of the election itself. Therefore, it says, the scope of s. 2(b) encompasses not only the expression itself but also the structure of the election. Put thusly, however, the claim is not dissimilar to the "unique role" of school trusteeship claimed by the appellants, and rejected by the Court, in Baier. Claiming a unique role or dependence on a statutory platform is not the same as claiming a fundamental freedom (Baier, at para. 44). Doing so is simply to seek access to that statutory platform. That is what the City seeks here.
> [42] In sum, the Baier threshold is not met here. The Act imposed no limit on freedom of expression.
> V. Conclusion
> [85] We would dismiss the appeal.
> [The majority also dismissed claims based on s. 3 of the Charter and the unwritten principle of democracy].
> [Abella J dissenting (Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. concurring) argued that by altering the campaign rules, the provincial government had interfered with the candidates' freedom of expression. In her view, the Baier test was not applicable. She thought "[t]here is no reason to superimpose onto our constitutional framework the additional hurdle of dividing rights into positive and negative ones for analytical purpose" (para 155). She thought that the rule changes amounted to a form of censorship that could not be justified under s. 1. Individuals who had access to a particular platform were prevented from being able to fully or fairly express themselves on that platform.]

1. Do the tests set out in Baier 2007 or the simplified test in City of Toronto 2021 provide meaningful guidance to the courts in deciding these issues?
2. In none of these cases did the court find a 'positive right' to free expression that had been breached. Can you think of a situation in which the court might find such a right? Or is it the case that once the court classifies a claim as positive rather than negative, it has in effect already decided the issue?
3. Should running for public office be considered expression under s.2(b)?

5.3 Social media

The internet opened the public conversation to more voices, allowing individuals to bypass existing media structures and to communicate with a potentially large audience. Yet, at the same time, the internet, and social media in particular, have exacerbated other problems with our public discourse. In the internet era audiences are more fragmented and public opinion is more polarized. Disinformation and conspiracy theories seem to spread easily and widely, unimpeded by media filters. Advertising and other messages, drawing on user data collected by internet platforms and providers, are more efficiently targeted at sympathetic audiences and out of public view. This new environment has contributed to a new set of speech harms or risks, while at the same time making regulation of harmful speech far more difficult. Free speech doctrine developed in a very different communication environment and does not map easily onto this new landscape.

The regulation of online content can take several forms, including (1) rules requiring platforms and providers to remove material that is unlawful, (2) self-regulation by the platforms and providers relying on user agreements, and (3) state oversight of the systems established by platforms and providers to filter out illegal material – a form of co-regulation. Canada seems to be moving towards some version of the third option, in which the state consults with the major platforms about the design of their content codes and their procedures for the removal of material, and then monitors the effectiveness of these processes in blocking or removing unlawful material and protecting material that is lawful. Because the larger social media platforms must rely on automated systems for reviewing material (given the large volume of material posted daily on their platforms and the speed at which this material can spread), their "decisions" are bound to be imperfect, sometimes catching material that is not unlawful, and other times missing material that is. The identification of harmful posts, including hate speech and child pornography, is often context dependent and may turn, at least in part, on the reasons for the post and the audience to which it is directed. The object then of co-regulation is simply to manage systemic risks and ensure that "due care" is exercised in the creation and application of these processes.

Chapter 21: S 2(d): Freedom of Association

By Joel Bakan and Benjamin Oliphant

1 Introduction

Section 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides that "everyone has the… (d) freedom of association". From this sparsely worded guarantee has emerged among the most controversial, and sometimes volatile, areas of constitutional jurisprudence over the decades following the adoption of the Charter.

This began in a trilogy of cases, most notably the Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313 (the "Alberta Reference"), in which the Supreme Court of Canada adopted an interpretation of section 2(d) that many agreed was either too narrowly conceived, or too narrowly applied. This resulted in the Court denying constitutional protection to many activities that are often considered essential to the meaningful exercise of associational freedom in the labour relations context, such as collective bargaining and strike activity.

Since that time, however, the Court has gradually broadened its interpretation of section 2(d), in a series of important cases spanning from 2000 to 2015. The focus in these decisions moved away from an abstract definition of section 2(d) that was narrowly applied, to a more robust conception of section 2(d) that covered many of the core associational activities directly associated with labour unions.

This resulted in the protection of a range of labour rights that often bear a strong resemblance to the core rights contained in statutory labour codes across the country, including protections against unfair labour practices (in Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94), a meaningful right to collectively bargain (in Health Services and Support - Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27), a right to choose independent unions or employee associations (in Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1), and a right to strike (Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4 ("SFL")). As Madam Justice Abella put it, with her characteristic flare, the Court has clearly determined that "the arc bends increasingly towards workplace justice" (SFL, para 2).

Notwithstanding this arc, interesting questions remain about the future scope and application of freedom of association in Canada. In the Supreme Court of Canada's most recent venture into this arena, in Société des casinos du Québec inc. v. Association des cadres de la Société des casinos du Québec, 2024 SCC 13, it confirmed that the standard for establishing a breach of freedom of association – "substantial interference" – is higher than for some other fundamental freedoms, such as freedom of expression. While the full implications of this approach for the protection of section 2(d) is not yet known, some have been harshly critical of applying a higher standard to interference with freedom of association than in the context of other fundamental freedoms (see e.g. Brian Langille, "The Condescending Constitution (Or, the Purpose of Freedom of association Is Freedom of Association)" (2016) 19:2 Canadian Lab & Emp LJ 335).

Others have wondered whether the Court has departed from the more typical structure of the fundamental freedoms, or has created a guarantee that is only meaningful for a single (albeit especially important) type of association – labour unions – rather than a definition that can be consistently applied to all of the many and varied associations and associational activities in which individuals may choose to participate. Some argue that, while the original trilogy was improperly applied to exclude any protections for many essential union activities, the Court since then has focused on expanding labour rights, often conditioned on the ability to access "Wagner Act" style majoritarian collective bargaining regimes, rather than the fundamental freedoms more commonly protected by section 2 of the Charter (see e.g. Benjamin J. Oliphant, "The Nature of the Fundamental Freedoms and the Sui Generis Right to Collective Bargaining: The Case of Vulnerable and Precarious Workers" (2018) 21:2 Canadian Lab & Emp LJ 319).

Other scholars believe that the Court has not yet gone far enough in interpreting and applying section 2(d) to ensure that it is truly effective and meaningful for those who need it the most. For instance, Professor Doorey has argued that the Court should apply a 'graduated model' of freedom of association, whereby individuals who cannot realistically obtain access to the more robust menu of labour rights contained in statutory labour codes are nevertheless provided with certain essential associational protections (David J. Doorey, "Graduated Freedom of Association: Worker Voice beyond the Wagner Model" (2013) 38:2 Queen's LJ 511).

Other scholars point out that many workers – such as vulnerable or precarious workers, or those involved in the gig economy – are often unable to exercise meaningful freedom of association in the workplace, and argue that section 2(d) must be reconsidered and expanded to ensure its meaningful application outside of more traditional employment relationships, or outside the common Wagner Act model paradigm (see e.g. Joel Bakan & Sujit Choudhry, "Constitutional Labour Rights in the Gig Economy Digital Platform Workers and Section 2(d) of the Charter" McGill LJ (forthcoming, 2025); Bethany Hastie, "(Re)Discovering the Promise of Fraser? Labour Pluralism and Freedom of Association" (2021) 66:3 McGill L J 427).

As you read through the materials in this Chapter, consider how the freedom of association can and should be understood and applied in the modern Canadian context. Who is currently denied meaningful protection for freedom of association in the workplace, under the approach adopted by the Supreme Court, and can this be justified under our best interpretation of section 2(d)? To what extent should section 2(d) be reconceived in light of fundamental changes to the world of work witnessed over the past few decades, including the move away from traditional, long-term stable employment? What other forms of associational activity, outside of the labour context, may be entitled to constitutional protection, and on what standard? These and other questions are explored in the readings and Guidance Questions outlined below.

2 Scope and purpose of freedom of association

2.1 Excerpt from Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313 - per Dickson CJ, paras 78-97

The government of Alberta referred constitutional questions about provisions of provincial labour legislation to the Alberta Court of Appeal. The legislation in question was the Public Service Employee Relations Act (which applied to public service employees), the Labour Relations Act (which applied to firefighters and hospital employees); and the Police Officers Collective Bargaining Act (which applied to police officers). The impugned provisions prohibited employees from striking (with compulsory arbitration required as an alternative when collective bargaining did not produce an agreement) and stipulated certain conditions (including subjects that were not to be discussed in the arbitration as well as many mandatory considerations for the arbitrator) relating to the arbitration proceedings themselves. The Alberta Court of Appeal held that the prohibition on striking was not unconstitutional, and declined to comment on the constitutionality of provisions relating to arbitration proceedings. The decision was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. The majority of the Court held that the provisions did not violate s 2(d) of the Charter and were thus constitutional. Justices Dickson and Wilson dissented, finding that the provisions did violate s 2(d).

Dickson CJ –

78. A wide variety of alternative interpretations of freedom of association has been advanced in the jurisprudence summarized above and in argument before this Court.

79. At one extreme is a purely constitutive definition whereby freedom of association entails only a freedom to belong to or form an association. On this view, the constitutional guarantee does not extend beyond protecting the individual's status as a member of an association. It would not protect his or her associational actions.

80. In the trade union context, then, a constitutive definition would find a prima facie violation of s. 2(d) of the Charter in legislation such as s. 2(1) of the Police Officers Act which prohibits membership in any organization affiliated with a trade union. But it could find no violation of s. 2(d) in respect of legislation which prohibited a concerted refusal to work. Indeed, a wide variety of trade union activities, ranging from the organization of social activities for its members, to the establishment of union pension plans, to the discussion of collective bargaining strategy, could be prohibited by the state without infringing s. 2(d).

81. The essentially formal nature of a constitutive approach to freedom of association is equally apparent when one considers other types of associational activity in our society. While the constitutive approach might find a possible violation of s. 2(d) in a legislative enactment which prohibited marriage for certain classes of people, it would hold inoffensive an enactment which precluded the same people from engaging in the activities integral to a marriage, such as cohabiting and raising children together. If freedom of association only protects the joining together of persons for common purposes, but not the pursuit of the very activities for which the association was formed, then the freedom is indeed legalistic, ungenerous, indeed vapid.

82. In my view, while it is unquestionable that s. 2(d), at a minimum, guarantees the liberty of persons to be in association or belong to an organization, it must extend beyond a concern for associational status to give effective protection to the interests to which the constitutional guarantee is directed. In this respect, it is important to consider the purposive approach to constitutional interpretation mandated by this Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 344:

> This Court has already, in some measure set out the basic approach to be taken in interpreting the Charter. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.
> In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore, as this Court's decision in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, 1984 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 357, illustrates, be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts. [Emphasis added.]

83. A second approach, the derivative approach, prevalent in the United States, embodies a somewhat more generous definition of freedom of association than the formal, constitutive approach. In the Canadian context, it is suggested by some that associational action which relates specifically to one of the other freedoms enumerated in s. 2 is constitutionally protected, but other associational activity is not.

84. I am unable, however, to accept that freedom of association should be interpreted so restrictively. Section 2(d) of the Charter provides an explicit and independent guarantee of freedom of association. In this respect it stands in marked contrast to the First Amendment to the American Constitution. The derivative approach would, in my view, largely make surplusage of s. 2(d). The associational or collective dimensions of s. 2(a) and (b) have already been recognized by this Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, without resort to s. 2(d). The associational aspect of s. 2(c) clearly finds adequate protection in the very expression of a freedom of peaceful assembly. What is to be learnt from the United States jurisprudence is not that freedom of association must be restricted to associational activities involving independent constitutional rights, but rather, that the express conferral of a freedom of association is unnecessary if all that is intended is to give effect to the collective enjoyment of other individual freedoms.

85. I am also unimpressed with the argument that the inclusion of s. 2(d) with freedoms of a "political" nature requires a narrow or restrictive interpretation of freedom of association. I am unable to regard s. 2 as embodying purely political freedoms. Paragraph (a), which protects freedom of conscience and religion is quite clearly not exclusively political in nature. It would, moreover, be unsatisfactory to overlook our Constitution's history of giving special recognition to collectivities or communities of interest other than the government and political parties. Sections 93 and 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and ss. 16-24, 25, 27 and 29 of the Charter, dealing variously with denominational schools, language rights, aboriginal rights, and our multicultural heritage implicitly embody an awareness of the importance of various collectivities in the pursuit of educational, linguistic, cultural and social as well as political ends. Just as the individual is incapable of resisting political domination without the support of persons with similar values, so too is he or she, in isolation, incapable of resisting domination, over the long term, in many other aspects of life.

86. Freedom of association is protected in s. 2(d) under the rubric of "fundamental" freedoms. In my view, the "fundamental" nature of freedom of association relates to the central importance to the individual of his or her interaction with fellow human beings. The purpose of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association is, I believe, to recognize the profoundly social nature of human endeavours and to protect the individual from state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends. In the famous words of Alexis de Tocqueville in Democracy in America (1945), vol. 1, at p. 196:

> The most natural privilege of man, next to the right of acting for himself, is that of combining his exertions with those of his fellow creatures and of acting in common with them. The right of association therefore appears ... almost as inalienable in its nature as the right of personal liberty. No legislator can attack it without impairing the foundations of society.

As social beings, our freedom to act with others is a primary condition of community life, human progress and civilized society. Through association, individuals have been able to participate in determining and controlling the immediate circumstances of their lives, and the rules, mores and principles which govern the communities in which they live. As John Stuart Mill stated, "if public spirit, generous sentiments, or true justice and equality are desired, association, not isolation, of interests, is the school in which these excellences are nurtured". (Principles of Political Economy (1893), vol. 2, at p. 352.)

87. Freedom of association is most essential in those circumstances where the individual is liable to be prejudiced by the actions of some larger and more powerful entity, like the government or an employer. Association has always been the means through which political, cultural and racial minorities, religious groups and workers have sought to attain their purposes and fulfil their aspirations; it has enabled those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict. T. I. Emerson, "Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression" (1964), 74 Yale L.J. 1 at p. 1, states that:

> More and more the individual, in order to realize his own capacities or to stand up to the institutionalized forces that surround him, has found it imperative to join with others of like mind in pursuit of common objectives.

88. What freedom of association seeks to protect is not associational activities qua particular activities, but the freedom of individuals to interact with, support, and be supported by, their fellow humans in the varied activities in which they choose to engage. But this is not an unlimited constitutional license for all group activity. The mere fact that an activity is capable of being carried out by several people together, as well as individually, does not mean that the activity acquires constitutional protection from legislative prohibition or regulation.

89. I believe that Bayda C.J.S. was right in holding that s. 2(d) normally embraces the liberty to do collectively that which one is permitted to do as an individual, a proposition which one American writer, Reena Raggi perceives to be the cornerstone of freedom of association:

> The basic principle for which recognition will be sought in the formulation of an independent constitutional right of association is that whatever action a person can pursue as an individual, freedom of association must ensure he can pursue with others. Only such a principle assures man that, in his struggle to be independent of government control, he will not be crippled simply because on occasion he strives to achieve that independence with the help of others.

However, it is not in my view correct to regard this proposition as the exclusive touchstone for determining the presence or absence of a violation of s. 2(d). Certainly, if a legislature permits an individual to enjoy an activity which it forecloses to a collectivity, it may properly be inferred that the legislature intended to prohibit the collective activity because of its collective or associational aspect. Conversely, one may infer from a legislative proscription which applies equally to individuals and groups that the purpose of the legislation was a bona fide prohibition of a particular activity because of detrimental qualities inhering in the activity (e.g., criminal conduct), and not merely because of the fact that the activity might sometimes be done in association. The proposition articulated by Bayda C.J.S. is therefore a useful test of legislative purpose in some circumstances. There will, however, be occasions when no analogy involving individuals can be found for associational activity, or when a comparison between groups and individuals fails to capture the essence of a possible violation of associational rights. This is precisely the situation in this case. There is no individual equivalent to a strike. The refusal to work by one individual does not parallel a collective refusal to work. The latter is qualitatively rather than quantitatively different. The overarching consideration remains whether a legislative enactment or administrative action interferes with the freedom of persons to join and act with others in common pursuits. The legislative purpose which will render legislation invalid is the attempt to preclude associational conduct because of its concerted or associational nature.

90. I wish to refer to one further concern. It has been suggested that associational activity for the pursuit of economic ends should not be accorded constitutional protection. If by this it is meant that something as fundamental as a person's livelihood or dignity in the workplace is beyond the scope of constitutional protection, I cannot agree. If, on the other hand, it is meant that concerns of an exclusively pecuniary nature are excluded from such protection, such an argument would merit careful consideration. In the present case, however, we are concerned with interests which go far beyond those of a merely pecuniary nature.

> As a vehicle which admits a person to the status of a contributing, productive, member of society, employment is seen as providing recognition of the individual's being engaged in something worthwhile. It gives the individual a sense of significance. By realizing our capabilities and contributing in ways society determines to be useful, employment comes to represent the means by which most members of our community can lay claim to an equal right of respect and of concern from others. It is this institution through which most of us secure much of our self-respect and self-esteem.

92. The role of association has always been vital as a means of protecting the essential needs and interests of working people. Throughout history, workers have associated to overcome their vulnerability as individuals to the strength of their employers. The capacity to bargain collectively has long been recognized as one of the integral and primary functions of associations of working people. While trade unions also fulfil other important social, political and charitable functions, collective bargaining remains vital to the capacity of individual employees to participate in ensuring fair wages, health and safety protections, and equitable and humane working conditions. As Professor Paul Weiler explains in Reconcilable Differences: New Directions in Canadian Labour Law (1980), at p. 31:

> An apt way of putting it is to say that good collective bargaining tries to subject the employment relationship and the work environment to the "rule of law". Many theorists of industrial relations believe that this function of protecting the employee from the abuse of managerial power, thereby enhancing the dignity of the worker as a person, is the primary value of collective bargaining, one which entitles the institution to positive encouragement from the law.

93. Professor Weiler goes on to characterize collective bargaining as "intrinsically valuable as an experience in self-government" (p. 33), and writes at p. 32:

> ...collective bargaining is the most significant occasion upon which most of these workers ever participate in making social decisions about matters that are salient to their daily lives. That is the essence of collective bargaining.

A similar rationale for endorsing collective bargaining was advanced in the Woods Task Force Report on Canadian Industrial Relations (1968), at p. 96:

> 296. One of the most cherished hopes of those who originally championed the concept of collective bargaining was that it would introduce into the work place some of the basic features of the political democracy that was becoming the hallmark of most of the western world. Traditionally referred to as industrial democracy, it can be described as the substitution of the rule of law for the rule of men in the work place.

94. Closely related to collective bargaining, at least in our existing industrial relations context, is the freedom to strike. A. W. R. Carrothers, E. E. Palmer and W. B. Rayner, Collective Bargaining Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1986), describe the requisites of an effective system of collective bargaining as follows at p. 4:

> What are the requirements of an effective system of collective bargaining? From the point of view of employees, such a system requires that they be free to engage in three kinds of activity: to form themselves into associations, to engage employers in bargaining with the associations, and to invoke meaningful economic sanctions in support of the bargaining.

95. The Woods Task Force Report at p. 129 identifies the work stoppage as the essential ingredient in collective bargaining:

> 408. Strikes and lockouts are an indispensable part of the Canadian industrial relations system and are likely to remain so in our present socio-economic-political society.

At page 138 the Report continues:

> 431. Collective bargaining is the mechanism through which labour and management seek to accommodate their differences, frequently without strife, sometimes through it, and occasionally without success. As imperfect an instrument as it may be , there is no viable substitute in a free society.

At page 175 the Report notes that the acceptance of collective bargaining carries with it a recognition of the right to invoke the economic sanction of the strike. And at page 176, it is said, "The strike has become a part of the whole democratic system".

96. The importance to collective bargaining of the ultimate threat of a strike has also been recognized in the cases. Lord Wright noted in Crofter Hand Woven Harris Tweed Co. v. Veitch, [1942] 1 All E.R. 142 (H.L.), at pp. 158-59, "The right of workmen to strike is an essential element in the principle of collective bargaining". As the editors of Kahn-Freund's Labour and the Law (3rd ed. 1983), point out in respect of this comment: "If the workers could not, in the last resort, collectively refuse to work, they could not bargain collectively" (p. 292). See also: Broadway Manor; Dairy Workers case; Blount, per Wright J. The necessity and lawfulness of strikes has also been acknowledged by this Court: Perrault v. Gauthier (1898), 1898 CanLII 37 (SCC), 28 SCR 241, at p. 256; Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Zambri, 1962 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1962] SCR 609, at pp. 618 and 621.

97. I am satisfied, in sum, that whether or not freedom of association generally extends to protecting associational activity for the pursuit of exclusively pecuniary ends--a question on which I express no opinion--collective bargaining protects important employee interests which cannot be characterized as merely pecuniary in nature. Under our existing system of industrial relations, effective constitutional protection of the associational interests of employees in the collective bargaining process requires concomitant protection of their freedom to withdraw collectively their services, subject to s. 1 of the Charter.

148. Freedom of association is one of the most fundamental rights in a free society. The freedom to mingle, live and work with others gives meaning and value to the lives of individuals and makes organized society possible. The value of freedom of association as a unifying and liberating force can be seen in the fact that historically the conqueror, seeking to control foreign peoples, invariably strikes first at freedom of association in order to eliminate effective opposition. Meetings are forbidden, curfews are enforced, trade and commerce is suppressed, and rigid controls are imposed to isolate and thus debilitate the individual. Conversely, with the restoration of national sovereignty the democratic state moves at once to remove restrictions on freedom of association.

149. It is clear that the importance of freedom of association was recognized by Canadian law prior to the Charter. It is equally clear that prior to the Charter a provincial Legislature or Parliament acting within its jurisdiction could regulate and control strikes and collective bargaining. The Charter has reaffirmed the historical importance of freedom of association and guaranteed it as an independent right. The courts must now define the range or scope of this right and its relation to other rights, both those grounded in the Charter and those existing at law without Charter protection.

150. In approaching this task, it must be recognized that the Charter should receive a broad and generous construction consistent with its general purpose, (see Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 155). In R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, this Court dealt in some detail with the considerations which should govern an inquiry into the meaning of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter. At page 344, Dickson J. (now C.J.) speaking for the majority, said:

> This Court has already, in some measure, set out the basic approach to be taken in interpreting the Charter. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, this Court expressed the view that the proper approach to the definition of the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter was a purposive one. The meaning of a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter was to be ascertained by an analysis of the purpose of such a guarantee; it was to be understood, in other words, in the light of the interests it was meant to protect.
> In my view this analysis is to be undertaken, and the purpose of the right or freedom in question is to be sought by reference to the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, to the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, to the historical origins of the concepts enshrined, and where applicable, to the meaning and purpose of the other specific rights and freedoms with which it is associated within the text of the Charter. The interpretation should be, as the judgment in Southam emphasizes, a generous rather than a legalistic one, aimed at fulfilling the purpose of the guarantee and securing for individuals the full benefit of the Charter's protection. At the same time it is important not to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question, but to recall that the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum, and must therefore, as this Court's decision in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, 1984 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 357, illustrates, be placed in its proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts. [Emphasis added.]

151. It follows that while a liberal and not overly legalistic approach should be taken to constitutional interpretation, the Charter should not be regarded as an empty vessel to be filled with whatever meaning we might wish from time to time. The interpretation of the Charter, as of all constitutional documents, is constrained by the language, structure, and history of the constitutional text, by constitutional tradition, and by the history, traditions, and underlying philosophies of our society.

The Value of Freedom of Association

152. The starting point of the process of interpretation is an inquiry into the purpose or value of the right at issue. While freedom of association like most other fundamental rights has no single purpose or value, at its core rests a rather simple proposition: the attainment of individual goals, through the exercise of individual rights, is generally impossible without the aid and cooperation of others. "Man, as Aristotle observed, is a `social animal, formed by nature for living with others', associating with his fellows both to satisfy his desire for social intercourse and to realize common purposes." (L. J. MacFarlane, The Theory and Practice of Human Rights (1985), p. 82.) This thought was echoed in the familiar words of Alexis de Tocqueville:

> The most natural privilege of man, next to the right of acting for himself, is that of combining his exertions with those of his fellow creatures and of acting in common with them. The right of association therefore appears to me almost as inalienable in its nature as the right of personal liberty. No legislator can attack it without impairing the foundations of society.

153. The increasing complexity of modern society, which has diminished the power of the individual to act alone, has greatly increased the importance of freedom of association. In the words of Professor T. I. Emerson in "Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression" (1964), 74 Yale L.J. 1, at p. 1:

> Freedom of association has always been a vital feature of American society. In modern times it has assumed even greater importance. More and more the individual, in order to realize his own capacities or to stand up to the institutionalized forces that surround him, has found it imperative to join with others of like mind in pursuit of common objectives.

A similar point was made by C. Wilfred Jenks, a former Director-General of the I.L.O. (Human Rights and International Labour Standards (1960), at p. 49):

> In an age of interdependence and large-scale organisation, in which the individual counts for so little unless he acts in co-operation with his fellows, freedom of association has become the cornerstone of civil liberties and social and economic rights alike. It has long been the bulwark of religious freedom and political liberty; it has increasingly become a necessary condition of economic and social freedom for the ordinary citizen.

154. Our society supports a multiplicity of organized groups, clubs and associations which further many different objectives, religious, political, educational, scientific, recreational, and charitable. This exercise of freedom of association serves more than the individual interest, advances more than the individual cause; it promotes general social goals. Of particular importance is the indispensable role played by freedom of association in the functioning of democracy. Paul Cavalluzzo said in "Freedom of Association and the Right to Bargain Collectively" in Litigating the Values of a Nation: The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1986), at pp. 199-200:

> Secondly, [freedom of association] is an effective check on state action and power. In many ways freedom of association is the most important fundamental freedom because it is the one human right which clearly distinguishes a totalitarian state from a democratic one. In a totalitarian system, the state cannot tolerate group activity because of the powerful check it might have on state power.

Associations serve to educate their members in the operation of democratic institutions. As de Tocqueville noted, supra, vol. II, at p. 116:

> ...[individuals] cannot belong to these associations for any length of time without finding out how order is maintained among a large number of men and by what contrivance they are made to advance, harmoniously and methodically, to the same object. Thus they learn to surrender their own will to that of all the rest and to make their own exertions subordinate to the common impulse, things which it is not less necessary to know in civil than in political associations. Political associations may therefore be considered as large free schools, where all the members of the community go to learn the general theory of association.

Associations also make possible the effective expression of political views and thus influence the formation of governmental and social policy. As Professor G. Abernathy observed in The Right of Assembly and Association (1961), at p. 242:

> ...probably the most obvious service rendered by the institution of association is influencing governmental policy. Concerted action or pressure on governmental agencies has a far greater chance of success than does the sporadic pressure of numerous individuals acting separately.

Freedom of association then serves the interest of the individual, strengthens the general social order, and supports the healthy functioning of democratic government.

155. In considering the constitutional position of freedom of association, it must be recognized that while it advances many group interests and, of course, cannot be exercised alone, it is nonetheless a freedom belonging to the individual and not to the group formed through its exercise. While some provisions in the Constitution involve groups, such as s. 93 of the Constitution Act, 1867 protecting denominational schools, and s. 25 of the Charter referring to existing aboriginal rights, the remaining rights and freedoms are individual rights; they are not concerned with the group as distinct from its members. The group or organization is simply a device adopted by individuals to achieve a fuller realization of individual rights and aspirations. People, by merely combining together, cannot create an entity which has greater constitutional rights and freedoms than they, as individuals, possess. Freedom of association cannot therefore vest independent rights in the group.

156. Many of the scholarly writers on this subject have recognized and stated this proposition. Clyde W. Summers in "Freedom of Association and Compulsory Unionism in Sweden and the United States" (1964), 112 U. Pa. L. Rev. 647, at p. 647, said:

> Although commonly asserted by the organization, freedom of association is not simply a collective right vested in the organization for its benefit. Freedom of association is an individual right vested in the individual to enable him to enlarge his personal freedom. Its function is not merely to grant power to groups, but to enrich the individual's participation in the democratic process by his acting through those groups. [Emphasis added.]

Professor Emerson, supra, at p. 4, stated:

> ...a theory of association must begin with the individual. In a society governed by democratic principles it is the individual who is the ultimate concern of the social order. His interests and rights are paramount. Association is an extension of individual freedom. It is a method of making more effective, of giving greater depth and scope to, the individual's needs, aspirations and liberties.

and Reena Raggi in the article "An Independent Right to Freedom of Association" (1977), 12 Harv. C.R.-C.L.L. Rev. 1, stated the position clearly, at pp. 15-16:

> This notion that an association is no more than the sum of its individual members seems essential in a society in which it is "the individual who is the ultimate concern of the social order." In such a society it would hardly seem possible that an abstract entity such as an association should enjoy rights apart from and indeed greater than its individual members; to hold otherwise would contradict the equality of opportunity which is at the heart of this argument for freedom of association.

157. The recognition of this principle in the case at bar is of great significance. The only basis on which it is contended that the Charter enshrines a right to strike is that of freedom of association. Collective bargaining is a group concern, a group activity, but the group can exercise only the constitutional rights of its individual members on behalf of those members. If the right asserted is not found in the Charter for the individual, it cannot be implied for the group merely by the fact of association. It follows as well that the rights of the individual members of the group cannot be enlarged merely by the fact of association.

158. Various theories have been advanced to define freedom of association guaranteed by the Constitution. They range from the very restrictive to the virtually unlimited. To begin with, it has been said that freedom of association is limited to a right to associate with others in common pursuits or for certain purposes. Neither the objects nor the actions of the group are protected by freedom of association. This was the approach adopted in Collymore v. Attorney-General, [1970] A.C. 538. The facts of the case have been stated by the Chief Justice and need no repetition here. In its reasons, the Judicial Committee approved the words of Sir Hugh Wooding C.J., of the Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago, which defined freedom of association in these terms, at p. 547:

> ...freedom of association means no more than freedom to enter into consensual arrangements to promote the common-interest objects of the associating group. The objects may be any of many. They may be religious or social, political or philosophical, economic or professional, educational or cultural, sporting or charitable. But the freedom to associate confers neither right nor licence for a course of conduct or for the commission of acts which in the view of Parliament are inimical to the peace, order and good government of the country.

159. This approach was followed in Dolphin Delivery Ltd. v. Retail, Wholesale & Department Store Union, Local 580 (1984), 1984 CanLII 750 (BC CA), 10 D.L.R. (4th) 198, (affirmed by this Court on different grounds, 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573), where Esson J.A., speaking for the British Columbia Court of Appeal on this issue, said, at p. 209:

> The freedom must be intended to protect the right of 'everyone' to associate as they please, and to form associations of all kinds, from political parties to hobby clubs. Some will have objects and will be in favour of means of achieving those objects, which the framers of the Charter cannot have intended to protect. The freedom to associate carries with it no constitutional protection of the purposes of the association, or means of achieving those purposes.

161. A second approach provides that freedom of association guarantees the collective exercise of constitutional rights or, in other words, the freedom to engage collectively in those activities which are constitutionally protected for each individual. This theory has been adopted in the United States to define the scope of freedom of association under the American Constitution. Professor L. H. Tribe in his treatise, American Constitutional Law (1978), describes the American position, as follows, at p. 702:

> ...[freedom of association] is a right to join with others to pursue goals independently protected by the first amendment--such as political advocacy, litigation (regarded as a form of advocacy), or religious worship.

Further, in Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984), Brennan J., writing for the majority of the United States Supreme Court, said, at p. 618:

> ...the Court has recognized a right to associate for the purpose of engaging in those activities protected by the First Amendment--speech, assembly, petition for the redress of grievances, and the exercise of religion. The Constitution guarantees freedom of association of this kind as an indispensable means of preserving other individual liberties.

162. It will be seen that this approach guarantees not only the right to associate but as well the right to pursue those objects of association which by their nature have constitutional protection.

163. A third approach postulates that freedom of association stands for the principle that an individual is entitled to do in concert with others that which he may lawfully do alone, and conversely, that individuals and organizations have no right to do in concert what is unlawful when done individually…

164. A fourth approach would constitutionally protect collective activities which may be said to be fundamental to our culture and traditions and which by common assent are deserving of protection. This approach was proposed by Kerans J.A. in Black v. Law Society of Alberta, 1986 ABCA 68 (CanLII), [1986] 3 W.W.R. 590 (Alta. C.A.) The court held in that case that legislative restrictions against partnerships for the practice of law between Alberta solicitors and non-resident solicitors violated freedom of association. Speaking for himself, Kerans J.A., stated, at p. 612:

> In my view, the freedom [of association] includes the freedom to associate with others in the exercise of Charter-protected rights and also those other rights which--in Canada--are thought so fundamental as not to need formal expression: to marry, for example, or to establish a home and family, pursue an education or gain a livelihood. [Emphasis added.]

165. A fifth approach rests on the proposition that freedom of association, under s. 2(d) of the Charter, extends constitutional protection to all activities which are essential to the lawful goals of an association. This approach was advanced in Re Service Employees' International Union, Local 204 and Broadway Manor Nursing Home (1983), 1983 CanLII 1928 (ON SC), 44 O.R. (2d) 392 by the Ontario Divisional Court. The court held that freedom of association included the freedom to bargain collectively and to strike, since, in its view, these activities were essential to the objects of a trade union and without them the association would be emasculated…

166. The sixth and final approach so far isolated in the cases, and by far the most sweeping, would extend the protection of s. 2(d) of the Charter to all acts done in association, subject only to limitation under s. 1 of the Charter. This is the position suggested by Bayda C.J.S. in the Dairy Workers case, supra. He said in his reasons for judgment, at pp. 620-21:

> To summarize, a person asserting the freedom of association under para. 2(d) is free (apart from s. l of the Charter) to perform in association without governmental interference any act that he is free to perform alone. Where an act by definition is incapable of individual performance, he is free to perform the act in association provided the mental component of the act is not to inflict harm. Such then is the "unregulated area" (to use Professor Lederman's expression) relative to the freedom of association. Such is the "sphere of activity within which the law (has guaranteed) to leave me alone", to use the words of the author of Salmond on Jurisprudence with an interpolation from s. 1 of the Charter. [Emphasis added.]

167. In presenting these six formulations of the concept of freedom of association, I do not mean to suggest that they are the only ones which might be developed. They do, however, embrace generally the concepts and arguments advanced before the Court. In examining these formulations, I will consider them within the context of the Charter, the pre-existing law of Canada, and the circumstances in which freedom of association is asserted.

168. As to the pre-existing law in Canada, it is sufficient to say that freedom of association is not a new right or freedom. It existed in Canada long before the Charter was adopted and was recognized as a basic right. It consisted in the liberty of two or more persons to associate together provided that they did not infringe a specific rule of common law or statute by having either an unlawful object or by pursuing their object by unlawful means (see Halsbury's Laws of England (3rd ed. 1954), vol. 7, at pp. 195-96; O. Hood Phillips and Paul Jackson, Constitutional and Administrative Law (6th ed. 1978), at p. 503). It may be observed as well that freedom of association was recognized and applied in relation to trade unions. The law of Canada and of each province has long recognized that trade unions could, and did, exist as lawful associations with rights and obligations fixed by law and that individuals had the right to belong to, and participate in, the activities of trade unions (see Collective Bargaining Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1986), A. W. R. Carrothers, E. E. Palmer and W. B. Rayner, at pp. 1-108).

169. Freedom of association was acknowledged and accepted as part of our social and legal fabric. The Charter upon its adoption guaranteed freedom of association as a free-standing right in s. 2(d). I do not seek to limit the effect of that guarantee to the law as it stood before adoption. I do, however, suggest that the Charter guarantee, which by itself does not in any way define freedom of association, must be construed with reference to the constitutional text and to the nature, history, traditions, and social philosophies of our society. This approach makes relevant consideration of the pre-Charter situation and the nature and scope of the rights and obligations the law had ascribed to associations, in this case trade unions, before the adoption of the Charter.

170. Turning to the various approaches which have been briefly described above, I would conclude that both the fifth approach (which postulates that freedom of association constitutionally protects all activities which are essential to the lawful goals of an association) and the sixth (which postulates that freedom of association constitutionally protects all activities carried out in association, subject only to reasonable limitation under s. l of the Charter) are unacceptable definitions of freedom of association.

171. The fifth approach rejects the individual nature of freedom of association. To accept it would be to accord an independent constitutional status to the aims, purposes, and activities of the association, and thereby confer greater constitutional rights upon members of the association than upon non-members. It would extend Charter protection to all the activities of an association which are essential to its lawful objects or goals, but, it would not extend an equivalent right to individuals. The Charter does not give, nor was it ever intended to give, constitutional protection to all the acts of an individual which are essential to his or her personal goals or objectives. If Charter protection is given to an association for its lawful acts and objects, then the Charter-protected rights of the association would exceed those of the individual merely by virtue of the fact of association. The unacceptability of such an approach is clearly demonstrated by Peter Gall in "Freedom of Association and Trade Unions: A Double-Edged Constitutional Sword" in Litigating the Values of a Nation: The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1986), at p. 247:

> A brief example illustrates this point. One of our levels of government may decide to ban the ownership of guns. This would not infringe any individual right under the Charter. But if some individuals have combined to form a gun club, does the Charter's protection of freedom of association mean that the principal activity of the gun club, namely the ownership and use of guns, is now constitutionally protected? One is quickly forced to the conclusion that it does not. The Charter does not protect the right to bear arms, regardless of whether that activity is carried out by an individual or by an association. The mere fact that it is the principal activity of the gun club does not give it a constitutional status. I doubt whether there would be much, if any, disagreement on this point. Thus, by referring to this hypothetical situation we see that the principal activities of associations are not necessarily protected under the concept of freedom of association.

172. The sixth approach, in my opinion, must be rejected as well, for the reasons expressed in respect of the fifth. It would in even more sweeping terms elevate activities to constitutional status merely because they were performed in association. For obvious reasons, the Charter does not give constitutional protection to all activities performed by individuals. There is, for instance, no Charter protection for the ownership of property, for general commercial activity, or for a host of other lawful activities. And yet, if the sixth approach were adopted, these same activities would receive protection if they were performed by a group rather than by an individual. In my view, such a proposition cannot be accepted. There is simply no justification for according Charter protection to an activity merely because it is performed by more than one person. This was recognized by Paul Cavalluzzo, supra, at pp. 202-03:

> The problem with this [the sixth] approach is that it sanctifies conduct because it is engaged in by more than one citizen. Although the state is given the opportunity to justify interference under section 1, why should there be constitutional value in numbers? Surely, more is required to reach the threshold of attaining constitutional protection. Freedom of association is not a fundamental freedom because there is some inherent value in group activity. Not all individual expressions are protected by freedom of expression at the threshold stage. Likewise, not all associational conduct is protected by freedom of association.

173. I am also of the view that the fourth approach, which postulates that freedom of association embraces those collective activities which have attained a fundamental status in our society because they are deeply rooted in our culture, traditions, and history, is an unacceptable definition. By focusing on the activity or the conduct itself, this fourth approach ignores the fundamental purpose of the right. The purpose of freedom of association is to ensure that various goals may be pursued in common as well as individually. Freedom of association is not concerned with the particular activities or goals themselves; it is concerned with how activities or goals may be pursued. While activities such as establishing a home, pursuing an education, or gaining a livelihood are important if not fundamental activities, their importance is not a consequence of their potential collective nature. Their importance flows from the structure and organization of our society and they are as important when pursued individually as they are when pursued collectively. Even institutions such as marriage and the family, which by their nature are collective, do not fall easily or completely under the rubric of freedom of association. For instance, freedom of association would have no bearing on the legal consequences of marriage, such as the control or ownership of matrimonial property. This is not to say that fundamental institutions, such as marriage, will never receive the protection of the Charter. The institution of marriage, for example, might well be protected by freedom of association in combination with other rights and freedoms. Freedom of association alone, however, is not concerned with conduct; its purpose is to guarantee that activities and goals may be pursued in common. When this purpose is considered, it is clear that s. 2(d) of the Charter cannot be interpreted as guaranteeing specific acts or goals, whether or not they are fundamental in our society.

175. One enters upon more controversial ground when considering the third approach which provides that whatever action an individual can lawfully pursue as an individual, freedom of association ensures he can pursue with others. Conversely, individuals and organizations have no constitutional right to do in concert what is unlawful when done alone. This approach is broader than the second, since constitutional protection attaches to all group acts which can be lawfully performed by an individual, whether or not the individual has a constitutional right to perform them. It is true, of course, that in this approach the range of Charter-protected activity could be reduced by legislation, because the Legislature has the power to declare what is and what is not lawful activity for the individual. The Legislature, however, would not be able to attack directly the associational character of the activity, since it would be constitutionally bound to treat groups and individuals alike. A simple example illustrates this point: golf is a lawful but not constitutionally protected activity. Under the third approach, the Legislature could prohibit golf entirely. However, the Legislature could not constitutionally provide that golf could be played in pairs but in no greater number, for this would infringe the Charter guarantee of freedom of association. This contrasts with the second approach, which would provide no protection against such legislation, because golf is not a constitutionally protected activity for the individual. Thus, the range of group activity protected by the third approach is greater than that of the second, but the greater range is to some extent illusory because of the power of the Legislature to say what is and what is not lawful activity for the individual. This approach, in my view, is an acceptable interpretation of freedom of association under the Charter. It is clear that, unlike the fifth and sixth approaches, this definition of freedom of association does not provide greater constitutional rights for groups than for individuals; it simply ensures that they are treated alike. If the state chooses to prohibit everyone from engaging in an activity and that activity is not protected under the Constitution, freedom of association will not afford any protection to groups engaging in the activity. Freedom of association as an independent right comes into play under this formulation when the state has permitted an individual to engage in an activity and yet forbidden the group from doing so. Moreover, unlike the fourth approach, the inquiry is firmly focussed on the fundamental purpose of freedom of association, namely, to permit the collective pursuit of common goals. As noted by the Chief Justice, at p. 367, "if a legislature permits an individual to enjoy an activity which it forecloses to a collectivity, it may properly be inferred that the legislature intended to prohibit the collective activity because of its collective or associational aspect. Conversely, one may infer from a legislative proscription which applies equally to individuals and groups that the purpose of the legislation was a bona fide prohibition of a particular activity because of detrimental qualities inhering in the activity (e.g., criminal conduct), and not merely because of the fact that the activity might sometimes be done in association." Finally, this approach fully realizes the value or purpose of association. Activities which the state permits an individual to pursue may be pursued in a group. Associations engaged in scientific, educational, recreational, and charitable pursuits would receive protection even though these activities or pursuits may not be independently protected by the Charter, provided these activities are not forbidden at law to individuals. The objective of guaranteeing the freedom of individuals to unite in organizations of their choice for the pursuit of objects of their choice would be achieved.

176. It follows from this discussion that I interpret freedom of association in s. 2(d) of the Charter to mean that Charter protection will attach to the exercise in association of such rights as have Charter protection when exercised by the individual. Furthermore, freedom of association means the freedom to associate for the purposes of activities which are lawful when performed alone. But, since the fact of association will not by itself confer additional rights on individuals, the association does not acquire a constitutionally guaranteed freedom to do what is unlawful for the individual.

177. When this definition of freedom of association is applied, it is clear that it does not guarantee the right to strike. Since the right to strike is not independently protected under the Charter, it can receive protection under freedom of association only if it is an activity which is permitted by law to an individual. Accepting this conclusion, the appellants argue that freedom of association must guarantee the right to strike because individuals may lawfully refuse to work. This position, however, is untenable for two reasons. First, it is not correct to say that it is lawful for an individual employee to cease work during the currency of his contract of employment. Belzil J.A., in the Alberta Court of Appeal, in the case at bar, dealt with this point in these words:

> The argument falters on the premise that cessation of work by one person is lawful. The rationale advanced for that premise is that the courts will not compel a servant to fulfil his contract of service, therefore cessation of work by a servant is lawful. While it is true that the courts will not compel a servant to fulfil his contract of service, the servant is nevertheless bound in law by his contract and may be ordered to pay damages for the unlawful breach of it. It cannot be said that his cessation of work is lawful.

The second reason is simply that there is no analogy whatever between the cessation of work by a single employee and a strike conducted in accordance with modern labour legislation. The individual has, by reason of the cessation of work, either breached or terminated his contract of employment. It is true that the law will not compel the specific performance of the contract by ordering him back to work as this would reduce "the employee to a state tantamount to slavery" (I. Christie, Employment Law in Canada (1980), p. 268). But, this is markedly different from a lawful strike. An employee who ceases work does not contemplate a return to work, while employees on strike always contemplate a return to work. In recognition of this fact, the law does not regard a strike as either a breach of contract or a termination of employment. Every province and the federal Parliament has enacted legislation which preserves the employer-employee relationship during a strike (see Canada Labour Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. L-1, as amended, s. 107(2); Labour Relations Act, R.S.A. 1980 (Supp.), c. L-1.1, as amended, s. 1(2); Labour Code, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 212, as amended, s. 1(2); The Labour Relations Act, S.M. 1972, c. 75, as amended, s. 2(1); Industrial Relations Act, R.S.N.B. 1973, c. I-4, as amended, s. 1(2); The Labour Relations Act, 1977, S.N. 1977, c. 64, as amended, s. 2(2); The Trade Union Act, S.N.S. 1972, c. 19, as amended, s. 13; Labour Relations Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 228, as amended, s. 1(2); Labour Act, R.S.P.E.I. 1974, c. L-1, as amended, s. 8(2); Labour Code, R.S.Q. 1977, c. C-27, as amended, s. 110; and The Trade Union Act, R.S.S. 1978, c. T-17, as amended s. 2(f); and see Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Zambri, 1962 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1962] SCR 609). Moreover, many statutes provide employees with reinstatement rights following a strike (Ontario, Labour Relations Act, s. 73; Quebec, Labour Code, s. 110.1; Manitoba, The Labour Relations Act, s. 11; and see Canadian Air Line Pilots' Ass'n and Eastern Provincial Airways Ltd. (1983), 5 CLRBR (NS) 368) and in the province of Quebec the employer is expressly prohibited from replacing employees who are lawfully on strike (s. 109.1).

178. Modern labour relations legislation has so radically altered the legal relationship between employees and employers in unionized industries that no analogy may be drawn between the lawful actions of individual employees in ceasing to work and the lawful actions of union members in engaging in a strike…

It is apparent, in my view, that interpreting freedom of association to mean that every individual is free to do with others that which he is lawfully entitled to do alone would not entail guaranteeing the right to strike. I am supported in this conclusion by the Chief Justice, who states at p. 367 in his judgment, "There is no individual equivalent to a strike. The refusal to work by one individual does not parallel a collective refusal to work. The latter is qualitatively rather than quantitatively different." Restrictions on strikes are not aimed at and do not interfere with the collective or associational character of trade unions. It is therefore my conclusion that the concept of freedom of association does not extend to the constitutional guarantee of a right to strike. This conclusion is entirely consistent with the general approach of the Charter which accords rights and freedoms to the individual but, with a few exceptions noted earlier, does not confer group rights. It is also to be observed that the Charter, with the possible exception of s. 6(2)(b) (right to earn a livelihood in any province) and s. 6(4), does not concern itself with economic rights. Since trade unions are not one of the groups specifically mentioned by the Charter, and are overwhelmingly, though not exclusively, concerned with the economic interests of their members, it would run counter to the overall structure and approach of the Charter to accord by implication special constitutional rights to trade unions.

2.3 Questions

1. What are the fundamental differences between the approach to freedom of association adopted by Chief Justice Dickson, compared with that adopted by Justice McIntyre? And on what points do both judgments agree?

2. Both Chief Justice Dickson and Justice McIntyre find that there is no analogy between certain individual activities and certain collective activities – but it leads them to opposite conclusions in this case. What are the core points of dispute that lead them to reach opposite conclusions on the application of section 2(d) in this context?
3. Justice McIntyre's approach to freedom of association – the freedom to do with others what one has the freedom to do alone – was found to not provide protection to strike action. Is his reasoning on this point convincing? (see David Beatty and Steve Kennett, "Striking Back: Fighting Words, Social Protest and Political Participation in Free and Democratic Societies" (1988) 67:4 Can Bar Rev 573).
4. As we will see in later sections, Chief Justice Dickson's judgment is often applauded for offering a "purposive" approach to freedom of association. But is Justice McIntyre's approach not also purposive? And if it is also a "purposive" interpretation, is there a disagreement about the purpose of section 2(d) that can help explain the opposing conclusions reached on scope of section 2(d) and the right to strike?

3 The "three aspects" of freedom of association

3.1 Excerpt from Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 3, paras 51-80

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police were excluded from the definition of "employee" in s 2(1) of the federal Public Service Labour Relations Act (previously the Public Service Staff Relations Act) and therefore from collective bargaining. Instead, the Police were subject to a non-unionized labour relations scheme imposed by s 96 of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Regulations (which was replaced by a substantially similar s 56 in the 2014 regulations). The only way employees could raise issues was through the Staff Relations Representative Program, which was staffed by RCMP employees and ultimately left final decisions exclusively with RCMP management. Two groups of RCMP members challenged the constitutionality of the labour relations scheme in place for RCMP officers as well as the general exclusion of RCMP officers from the definition of "employee" under the Public Service Labour Relations Act. The Ontario Superior Court of Justice held that the labour regime was an unjustifiable infringement of s 2(d), but the Ontario Court of Appeal overturned that judgement. At the Supreme Court level, a majority of the Court held that both the exclusion from the federal statute and the regime provided for in the regulations were unjustifiable infringements of s 2(d). The declaration was suspended 12 months to allow Parliament time to respond. Justice Rothstein dissented, finding that both provisions were s 2(d) compliant.

> [51] In his dissenting reasons in the Alberta Reference, Dickson C.J. identified three possible approaches to the interpretation of s. 2(d) — constitutive, derivative and purposive. We conclude that s. 2(d) protects each of the aspects of freedom of association with which these approaches are concerned.
> [52] The narrowest approach, the "constitutive", would protect only the bare right to belong to or form an association. The state would thus be prohibited from interfering with individuals meeting or forming associations, but would be permitted to interfere with the activities pursued by the associations people form. This protection, while narrow, is not trivial; history is replete with examples of states that have banned associations or prevented people from associating, either absolutely or in terms of restrictions on the number of people who can associate for a particular purpose.
> [53] The "derivative" approach would protect not only the right to associate, but also the right to associational activity that specifically relates to other constitutional freedoms. This approach prevails in the United States, where freedom of association is recognized insofar as it supports other constitutional rights, like freedom of religion and the political rights. Beyond this, however, associational activities would not be constitutionally protected.
> [54] The purposive approach, adopted by Dickson C.J. in the Alberta Reference, defines the content of s. 2(d) by reference to the purpose of the guarantee of freedom of association: ". . . to recognize the profoundly social nature of human endeavours and to protect the individual from state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends" (Alberta Reference, at p. 365). The object of Dickson C.J.'s words is a concrete one, not an abstract expression of a desire for a better life. Elaborating on this interpretive approach, Dickson C.J. states that the purpose of the freedom of association encompasses the protection of (1) individuals joining with others to form associations (the constitutive approach); (2) collective activity in support of other constitutional rights (the derivative approach); and (3) collective activity that enables "those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict": Alberta Reference, at p. 366.
> [55] The purposive approach thus recognizes that freedom of association is empowering, and that we value the guarantee enshrined in s. 2(d) because it empowers groups whose members' individual voices may be all too easily drowned out. This conclusion is rooted in "the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" in s. 2(d) (Big M Drug Mart, at p. 344).
> [56] The historical emergence of association as a fundamental freedom — one which permits the growth of a sphere of civil society largely free from state interference — has its roots in the protection of religious minority groups: M. Walzer, "The Concept of Civil Society", in M. Walzer, ed., Toward a Global Civil Society (1995), 7, at p. 20. More recent history also illustrates how the freedom to associate has contributed to the women's suffrage and gay rights movements: J. D. Inazu, Liberty's Refuge: The Forgotten Freedom of Assembly (2012), at p. 45; and D. Carpenter, "Expressive Association and Anti-Discrimination Law After Dale: A Tripartite Approach" (2001), 85 Minn. L. Rev. 1515.
> [57] Historically, those most easily ignored and disempowered as individuals have staked so much on freedom of association precisely because association was the means by which they could gain a voice in society. As Dickson C.J. put it in the Alberta Reference:
> > Freedom of association is most essential in those circumstances where the individual is liable to be prejudiced by the actions of some larger and more powerful entity, like the government or an employer. Association has always been the means through which political, cultural and racial minorities, religious groups and workers have sought to attain their purposes and fulfil their aspirations; it has enabled those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict. [Emphasis added; pp. 365-66.]
> [58] This then is a fundamental purpose of s. 2(d) — to protect the individual from "state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends": Alberta Reference, at p. 365. The guarantee functions to protect individuals against more powerful entities. By banding together in the pursuit of common goals, individuals are able to prevent more powerful entities from thwarting their legitimate goals and desires. In this way, the guarantee of freedom of association empowers vulnerable groups and helps them work to right imbalances in society. It protects marginalized groups and makes possible a more equal society.
> [59] The flip side of the purposive approach to freedom of association under s. 2(d) is that the guarantee will not necessarily protect all associational activity. Section 2(d) of the Charter is aimed at reducing social imbalances, not enhancing them. For this reason, some collective activity lies outside the Charter's protection. For example, associational activity that constitutes violence is not protected by s. 2(d): Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 SCR 3, at para. 107.

[60] Whether there are other categories of activity in addition to violence that are by their very nature entirely excluded from s. 2(d) protection need not be canvassed here. It suffices to note that a purposive interpretation of s. 2(d) confers prima facie protection on a broad range of associational activity, subject to limits justified pursuant to s. 1 of the Charter.

[61] The nature of a given associational activity and its relation to the underlying purpose of s. 2(d) may also be relevant to the s. 1 analysis, in the same way that the nature of particular expression is relevant in s. 2(b) cases….

[62] Section 2(d), we have seen, protects associational activity for the purpose of securing the individual against state-enforced isolation and empowering individuals to achieve collectively what they could not achieve individually. It follows that the associational rights protected by s. 2(d) are not merely a bundle of individual rights, but collective rights that inhere in associations. L'Heureux-Dubé J. put it well in Advance Cutting:

> In society, there is an element of synergy when individuals interact. The mere addition of individual goals will not suffice. Society is more than the sum of its parts. Put another way, a row of taxis do not a bus make. An arithmetic approach to Charter rights fails to encompass the aspirations imbedded in it. [para. 66]

[63] It has been suggested that collective rights should not be recognized because they are inconsistent with the Charter's emphasis on individual rights, and because this would give groups greater rights than individuals. In our view, neither criticism is well founded.

[65] It has also been suggested that recognition of a collective aspect to s. 2(d) rights will somehow undermine individual rights and the individual aspect of s. 2(d). We see no basis for this contention. Recognizing group or collective rights complements rather than undercuts individual rights, as the examples just cited demonstrate. It is not a question of either individual rights or collective rights. Both are essential for full Charter protection.

C. The Right to a Meaningful Collective Bargaining Process

[67] Applying the purposive approach just discussed to the domain of labour relations, we conclude that s. 2(d) guarantees the right of employees to meaningfully associate in the pursuit of collective workplace goals, affirming the central holdings of Health Services and Fraser. This guarantee includes a right to collective bargaining. However, that right is one that guarantees a process rather than an outcome or access to a particular model of labour relations.

> Long ago we stated the reason for labor organizations. We said that they were organized out of the necessities of the situation; that a single employee was helpless in dealing with an employer; that he was dependent ordinarily on his daily wage for the maintenance of himself and family; that if the employer refused to pay him the wages that he thought fair, he was nevertheless unable to leave the employ and resist arbitrary and unfair treatment . . . . [Emphasis added.]

[69] Similarly, this Court recently affirmed the importance of freedom of expression in redressing the imbalance inherent in the employer-employee relationship in Alberta (Information and Privacy Commissioner) v. United Food and Commercial Workers, Local 401, 2013 SCC 62, [2013] 3 SCR 733, at paras. 31-32:

> A person's employment and the conditions of their workplace can inform their identity, emotional health, and sense of self-worth . . . .
> Free expression in the labour context can also play a significant role in redressing or alleviating the presumptive imbalance between the employer's economic power and the relative vulnerability of the individual worker . . . . It is through their expressive activities that unions are able to articulate and promote their common interests, and, in the event of a labour dispute, to attempt to persuade the employer. [Citations omitted.]

[71] The right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining is therefore a necessary element of the right to collectively pursue workplace goals in a meaningful way (Health Services; Fraser). Yet a process of collective bargaining will not be meaningful if it denies employees the power to pursue their goals. As this Court stated in Health Services: "One of the fundamental achievements of collective bargaining is to palliate the historical inequality between employers and employees . . ." (para. 84). A process that substantially interferes with a meaningful process of collective bargaining by reducing employees' negotiating power is therefore inconsistent with the guarantee of freedom of association enshrined in s. 2(d).

achieve. Or they may set up a process that the employees cannot effectively control or influence. Whatever the nature of the restriction, the ultimate question to be determined is whether the measures disrupt the balance between employees and employer that s. 2(d) seeks to achieve, so as to substantially interfere with meaningful collective bargaining: Health Services, at para. 90.

[74] The reference in Fraser to the effective impossibility of achieving workplace goals must be understood with reference to the legislative schemes at issue. For instance, in discussing Dunmore, the majority in Fraser explained that Bastarache J. had "concluded that the absence of legislative protection for farm workers to organize in order to achieve workplace goals made meaningful association to achieve workplace goals impossible and therefore constituted a substantial interference with the right to associate guaranteed by s. 2(d) of the Charter" (para. 31 (emphasis added)). Similarly, the majority in Fraser explained that the legislation impugned in Health Services — legislation that unilaterally nullified terms concerning seniority and lay-offs in existing collective agreements and precluded future bargaining over those matters — "rendered the meaningful pursuit of [workplace] goals impossible and effectively nullified the right to associate of its employees" (para. 38).

[77] This said, we agree that some of the passages in Fraser seem to unnecessarily complicate the analysis by referring to both effective impossibility (as the effect of certain state action) and substantial interference or impairment (as the test for infringement of s. 2(d)). For the reasons just discussed, however, such references should be understood consistently with the majority reasons in Fraser, read in their entirety, and with this Court's precedents in Dunmore and Health Services. More generally, they must be understood consistently with this Court's purposive and generous approach to s. 2(d), as explained above.

[79] However, the majority in Fraser did not qualify the right to collective bargaining in this way. It held that collective bargaining is "a 'necessary precondition' to the meaningful exercise of the constitutional guarantee of freedom of association": para. 66. Similarly, at para. 99, "the right of an employees' association to make representations to the employer and have its views considered in good faith" is described as "a derivative right under s. 2(d) of the Charter, necessary to meaningful exercise of the right to free association" (emphasis added). To the extent the term "derivative right" suggests that the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining only applies where the guarantee under s. 2(d) is otherwise frustrated, use of that term should be avoided. Furthermore, any suggestion that an aspect of a Charter right may somehow be secondary or subservient to other aspects of that right is out of keeping with the purposive approach to s. 2(d).

3.2 Questions

1. The Court in Mounted Police Association of Ontario (MPAO) holds freedom of association extends protection to*:*

i. individuals joining with others to form associations (the constitutive approach) - in what types of circumstances – whether inside or outside of the labour context – might the ability to join with others to form associations be engaged or infringed?

ii. collective activity in support of other constitutional rights (the derivative approach) - the Court suggests that section 2(d) would protect associational activity "that specifically relates to other constitutional freedoms". What does this mean? If the underlying activities are already constitutionally protected, what does section 2(d) add in these contexts?

iii. collective activity that enables "those who would otherwise be vulnerable and ineffective to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of those with whom their interests interact and, perhaps, conflict" – in what contexts, other than labour relations, might this aspect of section 2(d) be meaningfully applied to protect associational activity? For what other kinds of power imbalances in society might section 2(d) provide relief?

2. The Court in MPAO notes that "the associational rights protected by s. 2(d) are not merely a bundle of individual rights, but collective rights that inhere in associations". What are the implications of this finding, and why does the Court feel it must say this? Can it be reconciled with the placement of section 2(d) among the other fundamental freedoms, which are typically considered individual in nature? Why or why not?

4 The right to join a union without interference

4.1 Excerpt from Dunmore v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2001 SCC 94, [2001] 3 SCR 1016, paras 19-30, 35-48

The Ontario legislature passed the Labour Relations and Employment Statute Law Amendment Act (LRESLAA) in 1995, which, through s 80, repealed the Agricultural Labour Relations Act (ALRA). With the ALRA repealed, agricultural workers were excluded from any statutory labour relations regime. The claimants challenged that exclusion as infringing their s 2(d) and s 15(1) Charter rights. A majority of the Court held the exclusion violated the workers' s 2(d) rights and could not be justified under s 1. The majority declined to consider the s 15(1) claim since the s 2(d) claim was successful. The LRESLAA was held unconstitutional to the extent it gave affect to the exclusion of agricultural workers from Ontario's more general Labour Relations Act, with the declaration suspended for 18 months to allow the legislature time to respond. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé wrote a concurring opinion in which she agreed that s 2(d) was infringed, but also found an unjustifiable infringement of s 15(1) by holding that occupation status constitutes an "analogous ground" for the purposes of that analysis. Justice Major dissented, finding that there was no s 2(d) violation and that agricultural workers were not an analogous group for the purposes of s 15(1).

(b) State Responsibility Under Section 2(d)

19 The content of the freedom to organize having been discussed, the next question that arises is the scope of state responsibility in respect of this freedom. This responsibility is generally characterized as "negative" in nature, meaning that Parliament and the provincial legislatures need only refrain from interfering (either in purpose or effect) with protected associational activity. Conversely, the Charter does not oblige the state to take affirmative action to safeguard or facilitate the exercise of fundamental freedoms.

20 However, history has shown, and Canada's legislatures have uniformly recognized, that a posture of government restraint in the area of labour relations will expose most workers not only to a range of unfair labour practices, but potentially to legal liability under common law inhibitions on combinations and restraints of trade. Knowing this would foreclose the effective exercise of the freedom to organize, Ontario has provided a statutory freedom to organize in its LRA (s. 5), as well as protections against denial of access to property (s. 13), employer interference with trade union activity (s. 70), discrimination against trade unionists (s. 72), intimidation and coercion (s. 76), alteration of working conditions during the certification process (s. 86), coercion of witnesses (s. 87), and removal of Board notices (s. 88). In this context, it must be asked whether, in order to make the freedom to organize meaningful, s. 2(d) of the Charter imposes a positive obligation on the state to extend protective legislation to unprotected groups. More broadly, it may be asked whether the distinction between positive and negative state obligations ought to be nuanced in the context of labour relations, in the sense that excluding agricultural workers from a protective regime substantially contributes to the violation of protected freedoms.

21 This precise question was raised in Delisle, supra, in which the appellant failed to establish that exclusion from a protective regime violated s. 2(d). The Delisle case involved RCMP officers who were employed by the Canadian government, so it is arguable that the Court's decision was not intended to apply where private employers are involved. However, Justice L'Heureux-Dubé recognized at para. 7 of a concurring judgment that s. 2(d) may require protection against unfair labour practices in certain circumstances:

> I recognize that in cases where the employer does not form part of government, there exists no Charter protection against employer interference. In such a case, it might be demonstrated that the selective exclusion of a group of workers from statutory unfair labour practice protections has the purpose or effect of encouraging private employers to interfere with employee associations. It may also be that there is a positive obligation on the part of governments to provide legislative protection against unfair labour practices or some form of official recognition under labour legislation, because of the inherent vulnerability of employees to pressure from management, and the private power of employers, when left unchecked, to interfere with the formation and administration of unions. [Emphasis added.]

This dictum was not rejected by the Delisle majority, which focused instead on the fact that an interference with associational activity had not been made out on the facts of the case. Indeed, in making this finding, I deferred judgment on the appellant's argument that underinclusion could have "an important chill on freedom of association because it clearly indicates to its members that unlike all other employees, they cannot unionize, and what is more, that they must not get together to defend their interests with respect to labour relations" (see Delisle, supra, at para. 30). In addition, I left open the possibility that s. 2 of the Charter may impose "a positive obligation of protection or inclusion on Parliament or the government . . . in exceptional circumstances which are not at issue in the instant case" (para. 33).

22 Even before Delisle, Le Dain J. recognized in the Alberta Reference, supra, that s. 2(d) protected workers' freedom to organize "without penalty or reprisal", making no distinction between workers employed by government or private entities (p. 391). What this dictum recognized, in my view, is that without the necessary protection, the freedom to organize could amount "to no more than the freedom to suffer serious adverse legal and economic consequences" (see H. W. Arthurs et al., Labour Law and Industrial Relations in Canada (4th ed. 1993), at para. 431). Perhaps more importantly for this appeal, this dictum implies that total exclusion from a regime protecting the freedom to organize could engage not only s. 15(1) of the Charter, but also s. 2(d) of the Charter. Where a group is denied a statutory benefit accorded to others, as is the case in this appeal, the normal course is to review this denial under s. 15(1) of the Charter, not s. 2(d) (see Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995; Native Women's Assn. of Canada v. Canada, 1994 CanLII 27 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 627 ("NWAC"); Delisle, supra). This was properly recognized by Sharpe J. who noted that "by 'dipping its toe in the water', and affording or enhancing the rights of some", the government is not obliged to "go all the way and ensure the enjoyment of rights by all" (p. 207). However, it seems to me that apart from any consideration of a claimant's dignity interest, exclusion from a protective regime may in some contexts amount to an affirmative interference with the effective exercise of a protected freedom. In such a case, it is not so much the differential treatment that is at issue, but the fact that the government is creating conditions which in effect substantially interfere with the exercise of a constitutional right; it has been held in the s. 2(a) context, for example, that "protection of one religion and the concomitant non-protection of others imports disparate impact destructive of the religious freedom of the collectivity" (see Big M Drug Mart, supra, at p. 337). This does not mean that there is a constitutional right to protective legislation per se; it means legislation that is underinclusive may, in unique contexts, substantially impact the exercise of a constitutional freedom.

23 This brings me to the central question of this appeal: can excluding agricultural workers from a statutory labour relations regime, without expressly or intentionally prohibiting association, constitute a substantial interference with freedom of association? A preliminary answer to this question may be found in Haig, supra, where L'Heureux-Dubé J. recognized that "a situation might arise in which, in order to make a fundamental freedom meaningful, a posture of restraint would not be enough, and positive governmental action might be required" (p. 1039). Although such a situation did not arise in that case, at least three observations are in order. First, the benefit sought in Haig, namely, participation in a national referendum, was, unlike inclusion in the LRA, not designed to safeguard the exercise of a fundamental freedom; thus, this Court was able to reject the appellants' claim for positive state action on the grounds that it would constitutionalize a very limited statutory regime. Second, there was no evidence in Haig that without the benefit of the referendum, the appellant would have been incapable of expressing his views on Quebec secession; thus, the appellants failed to meet the minimum evidentiary burden required of a s. 2(b) claim (see Haig, at p. 1040). Finally, even had the appellant been unable to express his views on Quebec secession, that surely had nothing to do with his exclusion from the national referendum. Similar points may be made about NWAC, supra. In that case, this Court again recognized the possibility of positive government action in some cases, but concluded that the respondents' exclusion from a particular series of constitutional discussions did not suppress their overall freedom of expression. As in the Haig case, the decisive point was the nature of the state action sought, combined with the absence of an evidentiary foundation for the s. 2 claim. By contrast, the appellants argue in this case that they possess no independent ability to organize, either inside or outside of the relevant statutory context.

24 In my view, the cases of Haig, NWAC and Delisle function to circumscribe, but not to foreclose, the possibility of challenging underinclusion under s. 2 of the Charter. One limit imposed by these cases is that claims of underinclusion should be grounded in fundamental Charter freedoms rather than in access to a particular statutory regime…

25 Second, the underinclusion cases demonstrate that a proper evidentiary foundation must be provided before creating a positive obligation under the Charter. This requirement proved fatal in Haig, NWAC and Delisle because the claimants in all three cases were unable to prove that the fundamental freedom at issue, as opposed to merely their requested statutory entitlement, was impossible to exercise. On the contrary, it was concluded in Haig that "the referendum itself, far from stifling expression, provided a particular forum for such expression" (p. 1040). Similarly, it was concluded in NWAC that "[e]ven assuming that in certain extreme circumstances, the provision of a platform of expression to one group may infringe the expression of another and thereby require the Government to provide an equal opportunity for the expression of that group, there was no evidence in this case to suggest that the funding or consultation of the four Aboriginal groups infringed the respondents' equal right of freedom of expression" (p. 664). Finally, it was concluded in Delisle that "it is difficult to argue that the exclusion of RCMP members from the statutory regime of the PSSRA prevents the establishment of an independent employee association because RCMP members have in fact formed such an association in several provinces, including Quebec, where 'C' Division was created by Mr. Delisle himself" (para. 31). In my view, the evidentiary burden in these cases is to demonstrate that exclusion from a statutory regime permits a substantial interference with the exercise of protected s. 2(d) activity. Such a burden was implied by Dickson C.J. in the Alberta Reference, supra, where he stated that positive obligations may be required "where the absence of government intervention may in effect substantially impede the enjoyment of fundamental freedoms" (p. 361 (emphasis added)). It was also implied by this Court in NWAC, where Sopinka J. stated that "[i]t will be rare indeed that the provision of a platform or funding to one or several organizations will have the effect of suppressing another's freedom of speech" (p. 657 (emphasis added)). These dicta do not require that the exercise of a fundamental freedom be impossible, but they do require that the claimant seek more than a particular channel for exercising his or her fundamental freedoms.

26 Assuming an evidentiary foundation can be provided, a third concern is whether the state can truly be held accountable for any inability to exercise a fundamental freedom. In this case, it is said that the inability to form an association is the result of private action and that mandating inclusion in a statutory regime would run counter to this Court's decision in Dolphin Delivery, supra. However, it should be noted that this Court's understanding of "state action" has matured since the Dolphin Delivery case and may mature further in light of evolving Charter values. For example, this Court has repeatedly held that the contribution of private actors to a violation of fundamental freedoms does not immunize the state from Charter review; rather, such contributions should be considered part of the factual context in which legislation is reviewed (see Lavigne, per La Forest J., at p. 309; see, similarly, R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, per Dickson C.J., at p. 766). Moreover, this Court has repeatedly held in the s. 15(1) context that the Charter may oblige the state to extend underinclusive statutes to the extent underinclusion licenses private actors to violate basic rights and freedoms (see Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493). Finally, there has been some suggestion that the Charter should apply to legislation which "permits" private actors to interfere with protected s. 2 activity, as in some contexts mere permission may function to encourage or support the act which is called into question (see Lavigne, per Wilson J., at p. 248). If we apply these general principles to s. 2(d), it is not a quantum leap to suggest that a failure to include someone in a protective regime may affirmatively permit restraints on the activity the regime is designed to protect. The rationale behind this is that underinclusive state action falls into suspicion not simply to the extent it discriminates against an unprotected class, but to the extent it substantially orchestrates, encourages or sustains the violation of fundamental freedoms.

27 The notion that underinclusion can infringe freedom of association is not only implied by Canadian Charter jurisprudence, but is also consistent with international human rights law. Article 2 of Convention (No. 87) concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize, 67 U.N.T.S. 17, provides that "[w]orkers and employers, without distinction whatsoever, shall have the right to establish and . . . to join organisations of their own choosing" (emphasis added), and that only members of the armed forces and the police may be excluded (Article 9). In addition, Article 10 of Convention No. 87 defines an "organisation" as "any organisation of workers or of employers for furthering and defending the interests of workers or of employers" (emphasis added). Canada ratified Convention No. 87 in 1972. The Convention's broadly worded provisions confirm precisely what I have discussed above, which is that discriminatory treatment implicates not only an excluded group's dignity interest, but also its basic freedom of association. This is further confirmed by the fact that Article 2 operates not only on the basis of sex, race, nationality and other traditional grounds of discrimination, but on the basis of any distinction, including occupational status (see L. Swepston, "Human rights law and freedom of association: Development through ILO supervision" (1998), 137 Int'l Lab. Rev. 169, at pp. 179-180). Nowhere is this clearer than in Article 1 of Convention (No. 11) concerning the Rights of Association and Combination of Agricultural Workers, 38 U.N.T.S. 153, which obliges ratifying member states to secure to "all those engaged in agriculture" the same rights of association as to industrial workers; the convention makes no distinction as to the type of agricultural work performed. Although provincial jurisdiction has prevented Canada from ratifying Convention No. 11, together these conventions provide a normative foundation for prohibiting any form of discrimination in the protection of trade union freedoms (see J. Hodges-Aeberhard, "The right to organise in Article 2 of Convention No. 87: What is meant by workers 'without distinction whatsoever'?" (1989), 128 Int'l Lab. Rev. 177). This foundation is fortified by Convention (No. 141) concerning Organisations of Rural Workers and Their Role in Economic and Social Development (I.L.O. Official Bulletin, vol. LVIII, 1975, Series A, No. 1, p. 28) which extends, under Article 2, the freedom to organize to "any person engaged in agriculture, handicrafts or a related occupation in a rural area, whether as a wage earner or, . . . as a tenant, sharecropper or small owner-occupier".

28 In sum, while it is generally desirable to confine claims of underinclusion to s. 15(1), it will not be appropriate to do so where the underinclusion results in the effective denial of a fundamental freedom such as the right of association itself. This is not to say that such claims will be common: they are constrained by both s. 32 of the Charter, which demands a minimum of state action before the Charter can be invoked, as well as by the factors discussed above. However, a claim for inclusion should not, in my view, automatically fail a s. 2(d) analysis: depending on the circumstances, freedom of association may, for example, prohibit the selective exclusion of a group from whatever protections are necessary to form and maintain an association, even though there is no constitutional right to such statutory protection per se. In this sense, the burden imposed by s. 2(d) of the Charter differs from that imposed by s. 15(1): while the latter focuses on the effects of underinclusion on human dignity (Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 675 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 497), the former focuses on the effects of underinclusion on the ability to exercise a fundamental freedom. This distinction is contemplated by the wording of the Charter itself and is supported by subsequent jurisprudence of this Court (see, e.g., Delisle, supra, at para. 25).

29 Before concluding on this point, I reiterate that the above doctrine does not, on its own, oblige the state to act where it has not already legislated in respect of a certain area. One must always guard against reviewing legislative silence, particularly where no legislation has been enacted in the first place. By the same token, it must be remembered why the Charter applies to legislation that is underinclusive. Once the state has chosen to regulate a private relationship such as that between employer and employee, I believe it is unduly formalistic to consign that relationship to a "private sphere" that is impervious to Charter review. As Dean P. W. Hogg has stated, "[t]he effect of the governmental action restriction is that there is a private realm in which people are not obliged to subscribe to 'state' values, and into which constitutional norms do not intrude. The boundaries of that realm are marked, not by an a priori definition of what is 'private', but by the absence of statutory or other governmental intervention" (see Constitutional Law of Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 34-27). I am not prepared to say that the relationship between farmers and their employees falls within that boundary. If, by investigating the effects of a statute that regulates this sphere, this Court is imposing "positive" obligations on the state, that is only because such imposition is justified in the circumstances.

(c) Summary of Discussion on Section 2(d)

30 In my view, the activities for which the appellants seek protection fall squarely within the freedom to organize, that is, the freedom to collectively embody the interests of individual workers. Insofar as the appellants seek to establish and maintain an association of employees, there can be no question that their claim falls within the protected ambit of s. 2(d) of the Charter. Moreover, the effective exercise of these freedoms may require not only the exercise in association of the constitutional rights and freedoms (such as freedom of assembly) and lawful rights of individuals, but the exercise of certain collective activities, such as making majority representations to one's employer. These activities are guaranteed by the purpose of s. 2(d), which is to promote the realization of individual potential through relations with others, and by international labour jurisprudence, which recognizes the inevitably collective nature of the freedom to organize. Finally, while inclusion in legislation designed to protect such freedoms will normally be the province of s. 15(1) of the Charter, claims for inclusion may, in rare cases, be cognizable under the fundamental freedoms. With this in mind, I turn to whether s. 3(b) of the LRA interferes with the appellants' protected freedoms, either in purpose or effect.

35 The history of labour relations in Canada illustrates the profound connection between legislative protection and the freedom to organize. It may be suggested that legislative protection is so tightly woven into the fabric of labour relations that, while there is no constitutional right to protective legislation per se, the selective exclusion of a group from such legislation may substantially impact the exercise of a fundamental freedom. To illustrate this point, I find it necessary to make three observations about the appellants' exclusion from the LRA. First, the LRA is designed to safeguard the exercise of a fundamental freedom, rather than to provide a limited statutory entitlement to certain classes of citizens. Second, the appellants in this case are substantially incapable of exercising their fundamental freedom to organize without the protective regime, as indicated by the record filed before this Court. Third, the appellants' exclusion from the LRA functions not simply to permit private interference with their fundamental freedoms, but to substantially reinforce such interferences. Central to all of these points, in my view, is that the freedom to organize constitutes a unique swatch in Canada's constitutional fabric, as difficult to exercise as it is fundamental, into which legislative protection is historically woven.

(i) The LRA is Designed to Safeguard the Exercise of the Fundamental Freedom to Associate 36 In assessing the appellant's claim for the repeal of s. 3(b) of the LRA, it is crucial to examine the essential ambition of the LRA. As numerous scholars have pointed out, the LRA does not simply enhance, but instantiates, the freedom to organize. The Act provides the only statutory vehicle by which employees in Ontario can associate to defend their interests and, moreover, recognizes that such association is, in many cases, otherwise impossible. This recognition is evident not only from the statute's protections against unfair labour practices, but from the express "right to organize" it inscribes in s. 5. At the same time, the activities for which the appellants seek protection antecede, at least notionally, the LRA's enactment; as this Court held in Delisle, supra, "[t]he ability to form an independent association and to carry on [its] protected activities . . . exists independently of any statutory regime", even though the unprotected aspects of collective bargaining and the right to strike are creatures of statute (para. 33). What this means is that, while the inevitable effect of allowing this appeal may be to extend a statutory regime to agricultural workers, depending on the legislative response to this decision, the appellants are not seeking a constitutional "right" to inclusion in the LRA.

37 The freedom to organize lies at the core of the Charter's protection of freedom of association. So central is this freedom to s. 2(d) that, during the legislative hearings preceding the Charter's enactment, an express right to unionize was opposed on the grounds "that that is already covered in the freedom of association that is provided already in . . . the Charter" (emphasis added) (see Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on the Constitution of Canada, Issue No. 43, January 22, 1981, at pp. 69-70 (Kaplan)). As recently as Delisle, supra, L'Heureux-Dubé J. noted that "the right to freedom of association must take into account the nature and importance of labour associations as institutions that work for the betterment of working conditions and the protection of the dignity and collective interests of workers in a fundamental aspect of their lives: employment" (para. 6 (emphasis in original)). These remarks echo those of Dickson C.J., who noted in the Alberta Reference, supra, that "[w]ork is one of the most fundamental aspects in a person's life, providing the individual with a means of financial support and, as importantly, a contributory role in society" (p. 368) (see similarly, McKinney v. University of Guelph, 1990 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 229, per La Forest J., at p. 300; Machtinger v. HOJ Industries Ltd., 1992 CanLII 102 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 986, at p. 1002; Wallace v. United Grain Growers Ltd., 1997 CanLII 332 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 701, per Iacobucci J., at para. 95). Moreover, the importance of trade union freedoms is widely recognized in international covenants, as is the freedom to work generally. In my view, judicial recognition of these freedoms strengthens the case for their positive protection. It suggests that trade union freedoms lie at the core of the Charter, and in turn that legislation instantiating those freedoms ought not be selectively withheld where it is most needed.

38 By protecting the freedom to organize, s. 2(d) of the Charter recognizes the dynamic and evolving role of the trade union in Canadian society. In addition to permitting the collective expression of employee interests, trade unions contribute to political debate. At the level of national policy, unions advocate on behalf of disadvantaged groups and present views on fair industrial policy. These functions, when viewed globally, affect all levels of society and constitute "an important subsystem in a democratic market-economy system" (see K. Sugeno, "Unions as social institutions in democratic market economies" (1994), 133 Int'l Lab. Rev. 511, at p. 519). For these reasons, the notion that minimum legislative protection cannot be extended to agricultural workers without extending full collective bargaining rights is misguided. Equally misguided is the notion that inherent difficulties in the formation of trade unions, or the fact that unions are in some cases experiencing a decline in membership, diminishes their social and political significance. On the contrary, unions remain core voluntary associations based on the principle of freedom of association.

(ii) Without the Protection of the LRA, Agricultural Workers Are Substantially Incapable of Exercising the Freedom to Associate

39 The fact that a regime aims to safeguard a fundamental freedom does not, of course, mean that exclusion from that regime automatically gives rise to a Charter violation. As I discussed in Delisle, supra, a group that proves capable of associating despite its exclusion from a protective regime will be unable to meet the evidentiary burden required of a Charter claim. In such a case, inclusion in a statutory regime cannot be said to safeguard, but rather to enhance, the exercise of a fundamental freedom. In this case, by contrast, the appellants contend that total exclusion from the LRA creates a situation whereby they are substantially incapable of exercising their constitutional right to associate. Needless to say, this claim must be assessed against the factual record provided by both the appellants and the respondents.

40 As a preliminary matter, the appellants state that the repeal of the ALRA by the LRESLAA caused the immediate demise of the first agricultural workers' union in Ontario. While this is an alluring argument, in my view it obscures the true substance of the appellants' claim. As discussed above, what is ultimately impugned in this case is not simply the repeal of the ALRA, but the combined effect of the LRESLAA and the LRA. This implicates the decades-long exclusion of agricultural workers from the labour relations regime, from the first enactment of the Collective Bargaining Act, 1943, until the repeal of the ALRA in 1995. The LRESLAA occupies only a small space in this history; it ought not prove decisive in this appeal.

41 Nonetheless, the appellants argue that notwithstanding the ALRA, they have no realistic chance of associating without the protection of the LRA. This is mainly because the LRA protects workers from common law inhibitions on organizing activity, as well as from employer practices designed to obstruct the formation of unions (see Arthurs, supra, at para. 431; International Labour Organization, Committee on Freedom of Association, Report No. 308, Case No. 1900, "Complaint against the Government of Canada (Ontario), presented by the Canadian Labour Congress (CLC)", I.L.O. Official Bulletin, vol. LXXX, 1997, Series B, No. 3, at paras. 145-46 and 187). Perhaps more broadly, the LRA is described by the intervener Canadian Labour Congress as having "regulated, structured and channelled" the method through which Canadian workers are able to organize, to the point where organizing a workers' association is "virtually synonymous" with unionizing under the legislative scheme. As just noted, the mere fact of exclusion from protective legislation is not conclusive evidence of a Charter violation; as I observed in Delisle, supra, RCMP officers had the strength to form employee associations in several provinces despite their exclusion from the PSSRA (para. 31). That being said, it is possible to draw a distinction between groups who are "strong enough to look after [their] interests without collective bargaining legislation" and those "who have no recourse to protect their interests aside from the right to quit" (see Canadian Industrial Relations: The Report of the Task Force on Labour Relations (1968), at paras. 253-54). As Canada's leading Task Force on Labour Relations recognized as early as 1968, agricultural workers fall into the latter category (para. 254). Not only have agricultural workers proved unable to form employee associations in provinces which deny them protection but, unlike the RCMP officers in Delisle, they argue that their relative status and lack of statutory protection all but guarantee this result. Distinguishing features of agricultural workers are their political impotence, their lack of resources to associate without state protection and their vulnerability to reprisal by their employers; as noted by Sharpe J., agricultural workers are "poorly paid, face difficult working conditions, have low levels of skill and education, low status and limited employment mobility" (p. 216). Moreover, unlike RCMP officers, agricultural workers are not employed by the government and therefore cannot access the Charter directly to suppress an unfair labour practice (Delisle, at para. 32). It is no wonder, therefore, according to the appellants, that agricultural workers have failed to associate in any meaningful way in Ontario, while RCMP officers have successfully created independent employee associations in several provinces across Canada (Delisle, at para. 31).

42 The validity of this claim will depend in part on how strict a definition of the word "unionize" this Court adopts. The respondent Fleming Chicks and the intervener Labour Issues Coordinating Committee both adopt a very strict definition, arguing that UFCW's involvement in this litigation proves that the LRA has not functioned to stifle union activity. This claim is disputed by the appellants' chief expert, Professor Judy Fudge, who notes that legislative protection is a necessary precondition for collective bargaining under Canadian labour relations legislation. As stated earlier in these reasons, it is only the right to associate that is at issue here, not the right to collective bargaining. Nevertheless, to suggest that s. 2(d) of the Charter is respected where an association is reduced to claiming a right to unionize would, in my view, make a mockery of freedom of association. The record shows that, but for the brief period covered by the ALRA, there has never been an agricultural workers' union in Ontario. Agricultural workers have suffered repeated attacks on their efforts to unionize. Conversely, in those provinces where labour relations rights have been extended to agricultural workers, union density is higher than in Ontario (see Statistics Canada, Annual Report of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, Part II, Labour Unions (1992), at pp. 38-41). The respondents do not contest this evidence, nor do they deny that legislative protection is absolutely crucial if agricultural workers wish to unionize. Indeed, to suggest otherwise would contradict a widespread consensus among Parliament and the provincial legislatures that without certain minimum protections, the somewhat limited freedom to organize itself would be a hollow freedom. For these reasons, I readily conclude that the evidentiary burden has been met in this case: the appellants have brought this litigation because there is no possibility for association as such without minimum statutory protection.

(iii) The Exclusion of Agricultural Workers from the LRA Substantially Reinforces the Inherent Difficulty in Exercising the Freedom to Associate 43 Their freedom to organize having been substantially impeded by exclusion from protective legislation, it is still incumbent on the appellants to link this impediment to state, not just private action (see Dolphin Delivery, supra). On this point, the respondents argue that since agricultural workers are isolated, seasonal and relatively under-educated, this, along with the unfair labour practices of their employers, is what explains the difficulty in creating associations rather than the underinclusiveness of the legislation. On the other hand, the appellants argue that the above conditions are reinforced by legislation which fails to provide minimum protection of their freedom to organize and further isolates agricultural workers by excluding them from the general regime of labour relations.

44 In my view, the appellants' argument must prevail. What the legislature has done by reviving the LRA is not simply allow private circumstances to subsist; it has reinforced those circumstances by excluding agricultural workers from the only available channel for associational activity (see Vriend, supra, at paras. 99-103). The most poignant chapter in this legislative history, but by no means the decisive one, is the LRESLAA. Through this enactment, the Ontario government not only renewed its commitment to preventing agricultural unions from collective bargaining, but prohibited even the voluntary recognition of agricultural associations, whatever their attributes might be. At the same time, it must be presumed that the legislature understood the history of labour relations and remained of the view that a protective regime was essential to the exercise of freedom of association in this area.

45 The most palpable effect of the LRESLAA and the LRA is, in my view, to place a chilling effect on non-statutory union activity. By extending statutory protection to just about every class of worker in Ontario, the legislature has essentially discredited the organizing efforts of agricultural workers. This is especially true given the relative status of agricultural workers in Canadian society. In Delisle, supra, I linked RCMP officers' ability to associate to their relative status, comparing them with the armed forces, senior executives in the public service and judges. The thrust of this argument was that if the PSSRA sought to discourage RCMP officers from associating, it could not do so in light of their relative status, their financial resources and their access to constitutional protection. By contrast, it is hard to imagine a more discouraging legislative provision than s. 3(b) of the LRA. The evidence is that the ability of agricultural workers to associate is only as great as their access to legal protection, and such protection exists neither in statutory nor constitutional form. Moreover, agricultural workers already possess a limited sense of entitlement as a result of their exclusion from other protective legislation related to employment standards and occupational health and safety (see Employment Standards Act Regulations, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 325, s. 3(1)(i), excluding most agricultural workers from Parts IV-VIII of the Employment Standards Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.14; Occupational Health and Safety Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. O.1, s. 3(2)). In this context, the effect of s. 3(b) of the LRA is not simply to perpetuate an existing inability to organize, but to exert the precise chilling effect I declined to recognize in Delisle.

> 46 Conversely, the didactic effects of labour relations legislation on employers must not be underestimated. It is widely accepted that labour relations laws function not only to provide a forum for airing specific grievances, but for fostering dialogue in an otherwise adversarial workplace. As P. Weiler has written, unionization introduces a form of political democracy into the workplace, subjecting employer and employee alike to the "rule of law" (see Reconcilable Differences: New Directions in Canadian Labour Law (1980), at pp. 31-32). In this context, the wholesale exclusion of agricultural workers from a labour relations regime can only be viewed as a stimulus to interfere with organizing activity. The exclusion suggests that workplace democracy has no place in the agricultural sector and, moreover, that agricultural workers' efforts to associate are illegitimate. As surely as LRA protection would foster the "rule of law" in a unionized workplace, exclusion from that protection privileges the will of management over that of the worker. Again, a contrast to Delisle, supra, is apposite: a government employer is less likely than a private employer to take exclusion from protective legislation as a green light to commit unfair labour practices, as its employees have direct recourse to the Charter.
> 47 For these reasons, I believe it is inappropriate for the Ontario Legislature to distance itself from the effects of the LRA and the LRESLAA. The enactment of the Collective Bargaining Act, 1943 reflected the legislature's awareness of employer unfair labour practices and its concomitant recognition that legislation was necessary to enable workers' freedom of association. The Collective Bargaining Act, 1943 was enacted against a background of staunch resistance to the labour movement; in large part, it was intended to prevent discrimination against union members. In this context, the exclusion of an entire category of workers from the LRA can only be viewed as a foreseeable infringement of their Charter rights. It was obviously open to the respondents to argue that the legislature has since altered its view of the need for protective legislation and that the LRA is not even required for the majority of workers today. However, by reviving the exclusion in 1995 and providing time-limited protection against penalty and reprisal, the legislature clearly acknowledged otherwise (see LRESLAA, s. 81(1)). In essence, after recognizing agricultural workers' need for protection, the legislature made things more difficult for them by excluding them from the protective regime put in place in 1943. For these reasons, the respondents cannot claim that circumstances have changed substantially since the enactment of the Collective Bargaining Act, 1943; rather, it can only justify the exclusion of agricultural workers on the basis of collateral concerns such as the protection of the family farm and the need to maintain a competitive agricultural sector – issues which, needless to say, must be considered under s. 1 of the Charter.
> 48 In sum, I believe it is reasonable to conclude that the exclusion of agricultural workers from the LRA substantially interferes with their fundamental freedom to organize. The inherent difficulties of organizing farm workers, combined with the threats of economic reprisal from employers, form only part of the reason why association is all but impossible in the agricultural sector in Ontario. Equally important is the message sent by s. 3(b) of the LRA, which delegitimizes associational activity and thereby ensures its ultimate failure. Given these known and foreseeable effects of s. 3(b), I conclude that the provision infringes the freedom to organize and thus violates s. 2(d) of the Charter.

4.2 Questions

1. In Dunmore, the Court found that the exclusion of farm workers from unfair labour practice protections available to employees in most other industries constituted a breach of section 2(d). What factors led the Court to conclude that the government had to extend similar protections to farm workers in this context?
2. The Court in Dunmore suggests that a government would not have had to extend such protections to the claimants in Dunmore if they had not already chosen to extend such protections to other workers. How can this approach be justified under a fundamental freedom? If the statutory protection is necessary to protect the fundamental freedom, would that not be the case regardless of whether the same protection was already offered to others? How does the Court address this argument?
3. Is the Court's recognition of a "positive" dimension to section 2(d) unique to that section, or generalizable to other Charter rights and freedoms?
4. Some have suggested that cases like Dunmore – where claimants are seeking access to "underinclusive" protective legislation equal to that afforded to other groups of workers – are really 'equality' cases, masquerading as freedom of association cases (see e.g. Brian Langille, "Why are Canadian Judges Drafting Labour Codes - And Constitutionalizing the Wagner Act Model" (2009) 15:1 Canadian Lab & Emp LJ 101). Is looking through an 'equality' lens a more viable way to address the type of problem in Dunmore? Why or why not? (see e.g. Fay Faraday, "Envisioning Equality: Analogous Grounds and Farm Workers' Experience of Discrimination," in Fay Faraday, Judy Fudge & Eric Tucker, eds, Constitutional Labour Rights in Canada: Farm Workers and the Fraser Case (Toronto: Irwin Press, 2012).)
5. Looking ahead, how does the reasoning in Dunmore support – or detract form – constitutional protection for other important labour rights afforded by modern collective bargaining association, such as the right to collective bargaining, and the right to strike? Is it possible to accept the reasoning in Dunmore without extending it to other important associational activities in the labour context? Is the right to join a union without interference somehow more 'essential' than other labour rights, and if so, in what way? In this regard, note how Dunmore is relied upon by the Court in subsequent cases.

5 The right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining

5.1 Excerpt from Health Services and Support - Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, [2007] 2 SCR 391, paras 19-20, 22, 31-36, 40-41, 69-70, 80-81, 87-109

The Health and Social Services Delivery Improvement Act – which was quickly legislated in response to challenges facing the BC health care system – gave health care employers increased flexibility to manage labour relations, including in ways that would have violated existing collective agreements. The Act also precluded meaningful collective bargaining on several issues. Unions representing the health care employees challenged the Act for violating their s 2(d) and s 15 Charter rights. At trial and on appeal, the courts held that there were no Charter violations. On appeal to the Supreme Court, a majority held that s 2(d) includes a right to collective bargaining, and that various provisions in Part 2 of the Act infringed that right and could not be upheld under section 1 because it effectively negated the outcomes of past collective bargaining agreements and pre-emptively undermining future collective bargaining. The majority held that the Act did not violate s 15 of the Charter. Justice Deschamps agreed with the majority that collective bargaining is within the scope of s 2(d), but dissented in finding that most of the impugned provisions (with the exception of one section) could be justified under s 1 of the Charter.

> 19 At issue in the present appeal is whether the guarantee of freedom of association in s. 2(d) of the Charter protects collective bargaining rights. We conclude that s. 2(d) of the Charter protects the capacity of members of labour unions to engage, in association, in collective bargaining on fundamental workplace issues. This protection does not cover all aspects of "collective bargaining", as that term is understood in the statutory labour relations regimes that are in place across the country. Nor does it ensure a particular outcome in a labour dispute, or guarantee access to any particular statutory regime. What is protected is simply the right of employees to associate in a process of collective action to achieve workplace goals. If the government substantially interferes with that right, it violates s. 2(d) of the Charter: Dunmore. We note that the present case does not concern the right to strike, which was considered in earlier litigation on the scope of the guarantee of freedom of association.

20 Our conclusion that s. 2(d) of the Charter protects a process of collective bargaining rests on four propositions. First, a review of the s. 2(d) jurisprudence of this Court reveals that the reasons evoked in the past for holding that the guarantee of freedom of association does not extend to collective bargaining can no longer stand. Second, an interpretation of s. 2(d) that precludes collective bargaining from its ambit is inconsistent with Canada's historic recognition of the importance of collective bargaining to freedom of association. Third, collective bargaining is an integral component of freedom of association in international law, which may inform the interpretation of Charter guarantees. Finally, interpreting s. 2(d) as including a right to collective bargaining is consistent with, and indeed, promotes, other Charter rights, freedoms and values.

(1) Reasons for Excluding Collective Bargaining from Section 2(d) in the Past Require Reconsideration

22 In earlier decisions, the majority view in the Supreme Court of Canada was that the guarantee of freedom of association did not extend to collective bargaining. Dunmore, opened the door to reconsideration of that view. We conclude that the grounds advanced in the earlier decisions for the exclusion of collective bargaining from the Charter's protection of freedom of association do not withstand principled scrutiny and should be rejected.

31 We conclude that the reasons provided by the majorities in the Alberta Reference and PIPSC should not bar reconsideration of the question of whether s. 2(d) applies to collective bargaining. This is manifestly the case since this Court's decision in Dunmore, which struck down a statute that effectively prohibited farm workers from engaging in collective bargaining by denying them access to the Province's labour relations regime, as violating of s. 2(d) of the Charter. Dunmore clarified three developing aspects of the law: what constitutes interference with the "associational aspect" of an activity; the need for a contextual approach to freedom of association; and the recognition that s. 2(d) can impose positive obligations on government.

32 Dunmore accepted the conclusion of the majority in Canadian Egg Marketing Agency v. Richardson, 1997 CanLII 17020 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 157, that only the "associational aspect" of an activity and not the activity itself are protected under s. 2(d). It clarified, however, that equal legislative treatment of individuals and groups does not mean that the "associational aspect" of an activity has not been interfered with. A prohibition on an individual may not raise associational concerns, while the same prohibition on the collective may do so…

33 Second, Dunmore correctly advocated a more contextual analysis than had hitherto prevailed. Showing that a legislature has targeted associational conduct because of its "concerted or associational nature" requires a more contextual assessment than found in the early s. 2(d) cases. …

34 Finally, Dunmore recognized that, in certain circumstances, s. 2(d) may place positive obligations on governments to extend legislation to particular groups. Underinclusive legislation may, "in unique contexts, substantially impact the exercise of a constitutional freedom" (para. 22) …

36 In summary, a review of the jurisprudence leads to the conclusion that the holdings in the Alberta Reference and PIPSC excluding collective bargaining from the scope of s. 2(d) can no longer stand. None of the reasons provided by the majorities in those cases survive scrutiny, and the rationale for excluding inherently collective activities from s. 2(d)'s protection has been overtaken by Dunmore.

(a) Canadian Labour History Reveals the Fundamental Nature of Collective Bargaining

40 Association for purposes of collective bargaining has long been recognized as a fundamental Canadian right which predated the Charter. This suggests that the framers of the Charter intended to include it in the protection of freedom of association found in s. 2(d) of the Charter.

41 The respondent argues that the right to collective bargaining is of recent origin and is merely a creature of statute. This assertion may be true if collective bargaining is equated solely to the framework of rights of representation and collective bargaining now recognized under federal and provincial labour codes. However, the origin of a right to collective bargaining in the sense given to it in the present case (i.e., a procedural right to bargain collectively on conditions of employment), precedes the adoption of the present system of labour relations in the 1940s. The history of collective bargaining in Canada reveals that long before the present statutory labour regimes were put in place, collective bargaining was recognized as a fundamental aspect of Canadian society. This is the context against which the scope of the s. 2(d) must be considered.

(b) International Law Protects Collective Bargaining as Part of Freedom of Association

69 Under Canada's federal system of government, the incorporation of international agreements into domestic law is properly the role of the federal Parliament or the provincial legislatures. However, Canada's international obligations can assist courts charged with interpreting the Charter's guarantees (see Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), [2002] 1 SCR 3, 2002 SCC 1, at para. 46). Applying this interpretive tool here supports recognizing a process of collective bargaining as part of the Charter's guarantee of freedom of association.

70 Canada's adherence to international documents recognizing a right to collective bargaining supports recognition of the right in s. 2(d) of the Charter. As Dickson C.J. observed in the Alberta Reference, at p. 349, the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified.

(c) Charter Values Support Protecting a Process of Collective Bargaining Under Section 2(d)

80 Protection for a process of collective bargaining within s. 2(d) is consistent with the Charter's underlying values. The Charter, including s. 2(d) itself, should be interpreted in a way that maintains its underlying values and its internal coherence. As Lamer J. stated in Dubois v. The Queen, 1985 CanLII 10 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 350, at p. 365:

> Our constitutional Charter must be construed as a system where "Every component contributes to the meaning as a whole, and the whole gives meaning to its parts" (P. A. Côté writing about statutory interpretation in The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (1984), at p. 236). The courts must interpret each section of the Charter in relation to the others (see, for example, R. v. Carson (1983), 1983 CanLII 1812 (ON CA), 20 M.V.R. 54 (Ont. C.A.); R. v. Konechny, 1983 CanLII 282 (BC CA), [1984] 2 W.W.R. 481 (B.C.C.A.); Reference re Education Act of Ontario and Minority Language Education Rights (1984), 1984 CanLII 1832 (ON CA), 47 O.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.); R. v. Antoine, supra).

81 Human dignity, equality, liberty, respect for the autonomy of the person and the enhancement of democracy are among the values that underly the Charter: R. v. Zundel, 1992 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 731; Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203, at para. 100; R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103. All of these values are complemented and indeed, promoted, by the protection of collective bargaining in s. 2(d) of the Charter.

(3) Section 2(d) of the Charter and the Right to Collective Bargaining

87. The preceding discussion leads to the conclusion that s. 2(d) should be understood as protecting the right of employees to associate for the purpose of advancing workplace goals through a process of collective bargaining. The next question is what this right entails for employees, for government employers subject to the Charter under s. 32, and for Parliament and provincial legislatures which adopt labour laws.

88 Before going further, it may be useful to clarify who the s. 2(d) protection of collective bargaining affects, and how. The Charter applies only to state action. One form of state action is the passage of legislation. In this case, the legislature of British Columbia has passed legislation applying to relations between health care sector employers and the unions accredited to those employers. That legislation must conform to s. 2(d) of the Charter, and is void under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 if it does not (in the absence of justification under s. 1 of the Charter). A second form of state action is the situation where the government is an employer. While a private employer is not bound by s. 2(d), the government as employer must abide by the Charter, under s. 32, which provides: "This Charter applies ... (b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province." This case is concerned with an attack on government legislation; there is no allegation that the government of British Columbia, qua employer, violated s. 2(d) of the Charter.

89 The scope of the right to bargain collectively ought to be defined bearing in mind the pronouncements of Dunmore, which stressed that s. 2(d) does not apply solely to individual action carried out in common, but also to associational activities themselves. The scope of the right properly reflects the history of collective bargaining and the international covenants entered into by Canada. Based on the principles developed in Dunmore and in this historical and international perspective, the constitutional right to collective bargaining concerns the protection of the ability of workers to engage in associational activities, and their capacity to act in common to reach shared goals related to workplace issues and terms of employment. In brief, the protected activity might be described as employees banding together to achieve particular work-related objectives. Section 2(d) does not guarantee the particular objectives sought through this associational activity. However, it guarantees the process through which those goals are pursued. It means that employees have the right to unite, to present demands to health sector employers collectively and to engage in discussions in an attempt to achieve workplace-related goals. Section 2(d) imposes corresponding duties on government employers to agree to meet and discuss with them. It also puts constraints on the exercise of legislative powers in respect of the right to collective bargaining, which we shall discuss below.

90 Section 2(d) of the Charter does not protect all aspects of the associational activity of collective bargaining. It protects only against "substantial interference" with associational activity, in accordance with a test crafted in Dunmore by Bastarache J., which asked whether "excluding agricultural workers from a statutory labour relations regime, without expressly or intentionally prohibiting association, [can] constitute a substantial interference with freedom of association" (para. 23). Or to put it another way, does the state action target or affect the associational activity, "thereby discouraging the collective pursuit of common goals"? (Dunmore, at para. 16) Nevertheless, intent to interfere with the associational right of collective bargaining is not essential to establish breach of s. 2(d) of the Charter. It is enough if the effect of the state law or action is to substantially interfere with the activity of collective bargaining, thereby discouraging the collective pursuit of common goals. It follows that the state must not substantially interfere with the ability of a union to exert meaningful influence over working conditions through a process of collective bargaining conducted in accordance with the duty to bargain in good faith. Thus the employees' right to collective bargaining imposes corresponding duties on the employer. It requires both employer and employees to meet and to bargain in good faith, in the pursuit of a common goal of peaceful and productive accommodation.

92 To constitute substantial interference with freedom of association, the intent or effect must seriously undercut or undermine the activity of workers joining together to pursue the common goals of negotiating workplace conditions and terms of employment with their employer that we call collective bargaining. Laws or actions that can be characterized as "union breaking" clearly meet this requirement. But less dramatic interference with the collective process may also suffice. In Dunmore, denying the union access to the labour laws of Ontario designed to support and give a voice to unions was enough. Acts of bad faith, or unilateral nullification of negotiated terms, without any process of meaningful discussion and consultation may also significantly undermine the process of collective bargaining. The inquiry in every case is contextual and fact-specific. The question in every case is whether the process of voluntary, good faith collective bargaining between employees and the employer has been, or is likely to be, significantly and adversely impacted.

94 Both inquiries are necessary. If the matters affected do not substantially impact on the process of collective bargaining, the measure does not violate s. 2(d) and, indeed, the employer may be under no duty to discuss and consult. There will be no need to consider process issues. If, on the other hand, the changes substantially touch on collective bargaining, they will still not violate s. 2(d) if they preserve a process of consultation and good faith negotiation.

95 Turning to the first inquiry, the essential question is whether the subject matter of a particular instance of collective bargaining is such that interfering with bargaining over that issue will affect the ability of unions to pursue common goals collectively. It may help to clarify why the importance of the subject matter of bargaining is relevant to the s. 2(d) inquiry. As we have stated, one requirement for finding a breach of s. 2(d) is that the state has "precluded activity because of its associational nature, thereby discouraging the collective pursuit of common goals" (Dunmore, at para. 16 (emphasis deleted)). Interference with collective bargaining over matters of lesser importance to the union and its capacity to pursue collective goals in concert may be of some significance to workers. However, interference with collective bargaining over these less important matters is more likely to fall short of discouraging the capacity of union members to come together and pursue common goals in concert. Therefore, if the subject matter is of lesser importance to the union, then it is less likely that the s. 2(d) right to bargain collectively is infringed. The importance of an issue to the union and its members is not itself determinative, but will bear on the "single inquiry" prescribed in Dunmore as it applies in the particular context of collective bargaining: does interference with collective bargaining over certain subject matter affect the ability of the union members to come together and pursue common goals? The more important the matter, the more likely that there is substantial interference with the s. 2(d) right. Conversely, the less important the matter to the capacity of union members to pursue collective goals, the less likely that there is substantial interference with the s. 2(d) right to collective bargaining.

96 While it is impossible to determine in advance exactly what sorts of matters are important to the ability of union members to pursue shared goals in concert, some general guidance may be apposite. Laws or state actions that prevent or deny meaningful discussion and consultation about working conditions between employees and their employer may substantially interfere with the activity of collective bargaining, as may laws that unilaterally nullify significant negotiated terms in existing collective agreements. By contrast, measures affecting less important matters such as the design of uniform, the lay out and organization of cafeterias, or the location or availability of parking lots, may be far less likely to constitute significant interference with the s. 2(d) right of freedom of association. This is because it is difficult to see how interfering with collective bargaining over these matters undermines the capacity of union members to pursue shared goals in concert. Thus, an interference with collective bargaining over these issues is less likely to meet the requirements set out in Dunmore for a breach of s. 2(d).

97 Where it is established that the measure impacts on subject matter important to collective bargaining and the capacity of the union members to come together and pursue common goals, the need for the second inquiry arises: does the legislative measure or government conduct in issue respect the fundamental precept of collective bargaining — the duty to consult and negotiate in good faith? If it does, there will be no violation of s. 2(d), even if the content of the measures might be seen as being of substantial importance to collective bargaining concerns, since the process confirms the associational right of collective bargaining.

98 Consideration of the duty to negotiate in good faith which lies at the heart of collective bargaining may shed light on what constitutes improper interference with collective bargaining rights. It is worth referring again to principle H of the ILO principles concerning collective bargaining, which emphasizes the need for good faith in upholding the right to collective bargaining and in the course of collective bargaining. Principle H thus states:

> The principle of good faith in collective bargaining implies recognizing representative organizations, endeavouring to reach an agreement, engaging in genuine and constructive negotiations, avoiding unjustified delays in negotiation and mutually respecting the commitments entered into, taking into account the results of negotiations in good faith.

99 Consistent with this, the Canada Labour Code and legislation from all provinces impose on employers and unions the right and duty to bargain in good faith (see generally Adams, at pp. 10-91 and 10-92). The duty to bargain in good faith under labour codes is essentially procedural and does not dictate the content of any particular agreement achieved through collective bargaining. The duty to bargain is aimed at bringing the parties together to meet and discuss, but as illustrated by Senator Walsh, chairman of the Senate committee hearing on the Wagner Act, the general rule is that: "The bill does not go beyond the office door." (Remarks of Senator Walsh, 79 Cong. Rec. 7659; see F. Morin, J.-Y. Brière and D. Roux, Le droit de l'emploi au Québec (3rd ed. 2006), at pp. 1026-27.)

100 A basic element of the duty to bargain in good faith is the obligation to actually meet and to commit time to the process (Carter et al., at p. 301)….

101 The parties have a duty to engage in meaningful dialogue and they must be willing to exchange and explain their positions. They must make a reasonable effort to arrive at an acceptable contract (Adams, at p. 10-107; Carrothers, Palmer and Rayner, at p. 453)….

102 Nevertheless, the efforts that must be invested to attain an agreement are not boundless. "[T]he parties may reach a point in the bargaining process where further discussions are no longer fruitful. Once such a point is reached, a breaking off of negotiations or the adoption of a 'take it or leave it' position is not likely to be regarded as a failure to bargain in good faith" (Carter et al., at p. 302).

> It is often difficult to determine whether a breach of the duty to bargain in good faith has been committed. Parties to collective bargaining rarely proclaim that their aim is to avoid reaching a collective agreement. The jurisprudence recognizes a crucial distinction between "hard bargaining" and "surface bargaining" ... Hard bargaining is not a violation of the duty to bargain in good faith. It is the adoption of a tough position in the hope and expectation of being able to force the other side to agree to one's terms. Hard bargaining is not a violation of the duty because there is a genuine intention to continue collective bargaining and to reach agreement. On the other hand, one is said to engage in "surface bargaining" when one pretends to want to reach agreement, but in reality has no intention of signing a collective agreement and hopes to destroy the collective bargaining relationship. It is the improper objectives which make surface bargaining a violation of the Act. The dividing line between hard bargaining and surface bargaining can be a fine one.
> (Canadian Union of Public Employees, at p. 341; see also Royal Oak Mines, at para. 46)

105 Even though the employer participates in all steps of the bargaining process, if the nature of its proposals and positions is aimed at avoiding the conclusion of a collective agreement or at destroying the collective bargaining relationship, the duty to bargain in good faith will be breached: see Royal Oak Mines Inc. To the words of Senator Walsh, that collective bargaining does not go beyond the office door, we would add that, on occasion, courts are nevertheless allowed to look into what is going on in the room, to ensure that parties are bargaining in good faith.

106 In Canada, unlike in the United States, the duty to bargain in good faith applies regardless of the subject matter of collective bargaining. Under Canadian labour law, all conditions of employment attract an obligation to bargain in good faith unless the subject matter is otherwise contrary to the law and could not legally be included in a collective agreement (Adams, at pp. 10-96 and 10-97; J.-P. Villaggi, "La convention collective et l'obligation de négocier de bonne foi: les leçons du droit du travail" (1996), 26 R.D.U.S. 355, at pp. 360-61). However, the refusal to discuss an issue merely on the periphery of the negotiations does not necessarily breach the duty to bargain in good faith (Carter et al., at p. 302).

108 Even where a s. 2(d) violation is established, that is not the end of the matter; limitations of s. 2(d) may be justified under s. 1 of the Charter, as reasonable limits demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. This may permit interference with the collective bargaining process on an exceptional and typically temporary basis, in situations, for example, involving essential services, vital state administration, clear deadlocks and national crisis.

109 In summary, s. 2(d) may be breached by government legislation or conduct that substantially interferes with the collective bargaining process. Substantial interference must be determined contextually, on the facts of the case, having regard to the importance of the matter affected to the collective activity, and to the manner in which the government measure is accomplished. Important changes effected through a process of good faith negotiation may not violate s. 2(d). Conversely, less central matters may be changed more summarily, without violating s. 2(d). Only where the matter is both important to the process of collective bargaining, and has been imposed in violation of the duty of good faith negotiation, will s. 2(d) be breached.

5.2 Excerpt from Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20 (CanLII), [2011] 2 SCR 3, paras 98-113

In response to Dunmore, Ontario enacted the Agricultural Employees Protection Act (AEPA) which affirmed agricultural workers' exclusion from the Labour Relations Act, but created a separate labour relations regime for them. The claimants challenged the AEPA for failing to provide effective protection for their rights to organize and bargain collectively (thus violating s 2(d)), and for excluding farm workers on the basis of occupation from protections other workers were entitled to (thus violating s 15). A majority of the Court held that the AEPA did not breach s 2(d) of the Charter since it provided for a meaningful process of collective bargaining, and that it did not breach s 15 since there was no evidence that the AEPA regime perpetuated existing prejudice or disadvantage. Justice Rothstein (with Justice Charron) concurred with the result but argued that Health Sectors should be reversed such that collective bargaining be removed from the scope of s 2(b). Justice Deschamps also concurred with the result, additionally noting that freedom of association should not be associated with the right to equality or any other Charter right. Justice Abella dissented, arguing that the AEPA did violate s 2(d) of the Charter for its insufficient protection of collective bargaining processes.

The Chief Justice and LeBel J. —

[98] The essential question is whether the AEPA makes meaningful association to achieve workplace goals effectively impossible, as was the case in Dunmore. If the AEPA process, viewed in terms of its effect, makes good faith resolution of workplace issues between employees and their employer effectively impossible, then the exercise of the right to meaningful association guaranteed by s. 2(d) of the Charter will have been limited, and the law found to be unconstitutional in the absence of justification under s. 1 of the Charter. The onus is on the farm workers to establish that the AEPA interferes with their s. 2(d) right to associate in this way.

[99] As discussed above, the right of an employees' association to make representations to the employer and have its views considered in good faith is a derivative right under s. 2(d) of the Charter, necessary to meaningful exercise of the right to free association. The question is whether the AEPA provides a process that satisfies this constitutional requirement.

[100] Under the AEPA, the right of employees' associations to make representations to their employers is set out in s. 5. The relevant sections are ss. 5(1), (5), (6) and (7):

> 5. (1) The employer shall give an employees' association a reasonable opportunity to make representations respecting the terms and conditions of employment of one or more of its members who are employed by that employer.
> (5) The employees' association may make the representations orally or in writing.
> (6) The employer shall listen to the representations if made orally, or read them if made in writing.
> (7) If the representations are made in writing, the employer shall give the association a written acknowledgment that the employer has read them.

[101] Sections 5(6) and (7) are critical. They provide that the employer shall listen to oral representations, and read written representations, and acknowledge having read them. They do not expressly refer to a requirement that the employer consider employee representations in good faith. Nor do they rule it out. By implication, they include such a requirement.

[102] Three considerations lead us to conclude that any ambiguity in ss. 5(6) and (7) should be resolved by interpreting them as imposing a duty on agricultural employers to consider employee representations in good faith.

[103] The first consideration is the principle that a statute should be interpreted in a way that gives meaning and purpose to its provisions. This requires us to ask what the purpose of the requirements in ss. 5(6) and (7) is. There can only be one purpose for requiring the employer to listen to or read employee representations — to assure that the employer will in fact consider the employee representations. No labour relations purpose is served merely by pro forma listening or reading. To fulfill the purpose of reading or listening, the employer must consider the submission. Moreover, the employer must do so in good faith: consideration with a closed mind would render listening or reading the submission pointless.

[104] The second consideration is that Parliament and legislatures are presumed to intend to comply with the Charter: Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, 1989 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1038, at p. 1078, per Lamer J. (as he then was), dissenting in part; R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, [2001] 1 SCR 45, at para. 33. At the time the AEPA was adopted Dunmore had pronounced that the Charter requires meaningful exercise of the right to associate in pursuit of workplace goals. Since Health Services, it has been clear that this requires employers to consider employee representations in good faith. Any ambiguity in the AEPA should be resolved accordingly.

[105] The third consideration is the expressed intention of the Minister in debates on the legislation. When introducing the legislation, she stated:

> The government is advised that the Supreme Court of Canada decision regarding Dunmore versus Ontario obligates the government to extend legislative protections to agricultural workers. It obligates us to do this to ensure that employees have the right to form and join associations, as well as have the protection necessary to ensure that the freedom of association is meaningful. The government of Ontario will meet these obligations.
> (Legislative Assembly of Ontario, Official Report of Debates (Hansard), No. 46A, 3rd Sess., 37th Parl., October 22, 2002, at p. 2340 (emphasis added))

[106] The government must, on the words of its Minister, have intended the legislation to achieve whatever is required to ensure meaningful exercise of freedom of association. As discussed above, meaningful exercise of the right to free association in the workplace context requires good faith consideration of employee representations. As pointed out by the respondents, the Minister also stated that the AEPA was not intended to "extend collective bargaining to agricultural workers". However, this may be understood as an affirmation that the AEPA did not institute the dominant Wagner model of collective bargaining, or bring agricultural workers within the ambit of the LRA, not that the Minister intended to deprive farm workers of the protections of collective bargaining that s. 2(d) grants.

[109] This history, scant as it is, does not establish that the AEPA violates s. 2(d). Indeed, the union has not made a significant attempt to make it work. As just discussed, properly interpreted, it does not violate s. 2(d). Moreover, the process has not been fully explored and tested. The AEPA, as Farley J. noted, contemplates a meaningful exercise of the right of association, and provides a tribunal for the resolution of disputes.

[110] Farley J. expressed cautious hope that the Tribunal created by the Act would prove efficacious and that the relief claimed might be granted:

> One would think it better to see how the Tribunal operates in fact before condemning it as powerless to deal with such abuses. . . . I am of the view that this condemnation is premature. A successful application would do one of several things: be effective positively as to action; or morally give the wrongdoing employer a "bloody nose"; or if truly an empty process, it would demonstrate the need for strengthening by legislative amendment. [para. 18]

[111] Farley J. accordingly found that the complaint was premature:

> ... it would seem to me to be a premature and unfair complaint that the Tribunal charged under the AEPA with dealing with complaints — namely the Agriculture, Food and Rural Affairs Appeal Tribunal — is bereft of expertise in labour relations given its bipartite composition of labour and agricultural experienced personnel. That Tribunal should be given a fair opportunity to demonstrate its ability to appropriately handle the function given to it by the AEPA. [para. 28]

[112] Section 11 of the AEPA specifically empowers the Tribunal to make a determination that there has been a contravention of the Act, and to grant an order or remedy with respect to that contravention. The Tribunal may be expected to interpret its powers, in accordance with its mandate, purposively, in an effective and meaningful way. Labour tribunals enjoy substantial latitude when applying their constituent statutes to the facts of a given case. As stated by the Ontario Labour Relations Board in Adams Mine, Cliffs of Canada Ltd. v. United Steelworkers of America (1982), 1 C.L.R.B.R. (N.S.) 384:

> The Act does not spell out each and every right and obligation of labour and management. This Board is left with the task of applying the Act's general language in the light of an infinite variety of circumstances which may arise. A rigid scheme of regulation is avoided and flexibility is provided although all within the limitations necessary to effectuate the dominant purpose of the Act. [pp. 399-400]

5.3 Excerpt from Meredith v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 2 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 125, para 1, 26-30

The claimants, members of the National Executive Committee of the RCMP's Staff Relations Representative Program (SSRP), challenged the constitutionality of the Expenditure Restraint Act, which was passed in 2009 to limit wage increases for RCMP employees to 1.5% each year from 2008-2010 without consulting the SSRP prior to making that change. All SSRP proposals for change were rejected by the RCMP Treasury Board, ultimately leading to the Charter challenge. The majority of the Court held that rolling back scheduled wage increases without prior consultation did not infringe s 2(d) rights to collective bargaining since there was still a process for RCMP members to consult on compensation-related issues, despite that overall process being deemed constitutionally insufficient in MPAO. Justice Rothstein agreed there was no s 2(d) violation but disagreed with the majority's finding that MPAO deemed the existing Pay Council processes insufficient. Justice Abella, dissenting, found a s 2(d) violation in rolling back the wage increases without providing opportunity for RCMP members to discuss those rollbacks, which nullified the right to meaningful consultation and collective bargaining.

> [1] This appeal raises the question whether the Expenditure Restraint Act, S.C. 2009, c. 2, s. 393 ("ERA"), violates the guarantee of freedom of association in s. 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and if so, whether the infringement is justified under s. 1. The appellants are serving members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police ("RCMP") who were elected to the national executive of the Staff Relations Representative Program ("SRRP"). They argue that the ERA, by rolling back scheduled wage increases for RCMP members without prior consultation, violates the members' constitutional right to collective bargaining, as recognized in Health Services and Support — Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, [2007] 2 SCR 391.
> [26] For the affected RCMP members, the ERA resulted in a rollback of scheduled wage increases from the previous Pay Council recommendations accepted by the Treasury Board, from between 2% and 3.5% to 1.5% in each of 2008, 2009 and 2010. The original increase would also have doubled service pay and increased the Field Trainer Allowance. Both of these were also eliminated by the ERA, subject to subsequent negotiations pursuant to s. 62 of that Act.

[27] The Attorney General of Canada acknowledges that wages are an important issue, but notes that the limits imposed by the ERA were time-limited in nature, were shared by all public servants, and did not permanently remove the subject of wages from collective bargaining. Accordingly, he suggests that the importance of the wage restraints does not rise to the level of a s. 2(d) violation. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that s. 2(d) was not breached.

[28] The facts of Health Services should not be understood as a minimum threshold for finding a breach of s. 2(d). Nonetheless, the comparison between the impugned legislation in that case and the ERA is instructive. The Health and Social Services Delivery Improvement Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 2, Part 2, introduced radical changes to significant terms covered by collective agreements previously concluded. By contrast, the level at which the ERA capped wage increases for members of the RCMP was consistent with the going rate reached in agreements concluded with other bargaining agents inside and outside of the core public administration and so reflected an outcome consistent with actual bargaining processes. The process followed to impose the wage restraints thus did not disregard the substance of the former procedure. And the ERA did not preclude consultation on other compensation-related issues, either in the past or the future.

[29] Furthermore, the ERA did not prevent the consultation process from moving forward. Most significantly in the case of RCMP members, s. 62 permitted the negotiation of additional allowances as part of "transformation[al] initiatives" within the RCMP. The record indicates that RCMP members were able to obtain significant benefits as a result of subsequent proposals brought forward through the existing Pay Council process. Service pay was increased from 1% to 1.5% for every five years of service — representing a 50% increase — and extended for the first time to certain civilian members. A new and more generous policy for stand-by pay was also approved. Actual outcomes are not determinative of a s. 2(d) analysis, but, in this case, the evidence of outcomes supports a conclusion that the enactment of the ERA had a minor impact on the appellants' associational activity.

[30] Simply put, the Pay Council continued to afford RCMP members a process for consultation on compensation-related issues within the constitutionally inadequate labour relations framework that was then in place. The ERA and the government's course of conduct cannot be said to have substantially impaired the collective pursuit of the workplace goals of RCMP members. This said, our conclusions, as they relate to the ERA's impact on the Pay Council process, should not be taken to endorse the constitutional validity of that process or of similar schemes.

5.4 Excerpt from British Columbia Teachers' Federation v. British Columbia, 2015 BCCA 184, per Donald JA, paras 275-280, 372-376 (as adopted by a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in British Columbia Teachers' Federation v. British Columbia, 2016 SCC 49, [2016] 2 SCR 407)

The British Columbia Teachers' Federation (BCTF) challenged the constitutionality of two statutes (the Education Services Collective Agreement Act, and the Public Education Flexibility and Choice Act) which nullified certain terms of a previously expired collective agreement that, in accordance with its terms, continued in force between the BCTF and the BC Public School Employers' Association (BCPSEA). The Acts additionally prohibited the inclusion of similar terms in future agreements between the BCTF and the BCPSEA. The BCTF was provided no opportunity for consultations in relation to the passing of the two Acts. The trial judge held that the Acts infringed s 2(d) rights by voiding terms of an in-force collective agreement and by preventing future bargaining on those terms. Following this decision, a new law was passed (the Education Improvement Act) which did the same thing as the previous Acts, except this time the prohibition on future inclusion of deleted terms was for 14 months instead of an indeterminate period. The Province consulted with the BCTF prior to passing the EIA. The trial judge again held that the legislation unjustifiably infringed s 2(d) Charter rights. Justice Donald, dissenting in the BCCA decision, held that the trial judge correctly found that the Province failed to consult in good faith, thus unjustifiably infringing s 2(d). A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada adopted Justice Donald's reasons providing no reasons of its own, with Justices Côté and Brown dissenting.

Donald JA –

[275] I have had the privilege of reading the draft reasons for judgment of Chief Justice Bauman and Mr. Justice Harris. Insofar as my colleagues have determined the trial judge erred in her primary conclusion that pre-legislative consultation is always irrelevant for the purposes of determining a constitutional breach, and her secondary alternative conclusion that pre-legislative consultation was irrelevant in this case because the Province of British Columbia (the "Province") was not acting qua employer, I agree with those conclusions, but I prefer to give my own reasons for doing so.

[276] However, insofar as my colleagues have also found that the trial judge erred in her tertiary alternative conclusion – that the Province breached the teachers' s. 2(d) Charter right to freedom of association by failing to negotiate and consult in good faith – I must respectfully disagree. In my opinion, an appropriately deferential approach to the trial judge's findings of fact, along with an application of the constitutional test as set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Health Services and Support – Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27, [2007] 2 SCR 391 [Health Services], and Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20, [2011] 2 SCR 3 [Fraser], inexorably leads to the conclusion that the trial judge's finding that the passage of Bill 22 was unconstitutional must be upheld.

[277] In my opinion, the reasons given by my colleagues make an error similar in principle to that made by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Fraser, subsequently overruled by the Supreme Court of Canada, in that they have read into the constitutional good-faith test elements of a "Wagner-style" collective bargaining regime; specifically, a prohibition on reviewing the substantive reasonableness of the Province's negotiating position. The Supreme Court of Canada has made clear that s. 2(d) does not protect a particular regime for collective bargaining, but instead is a bulwark that protects the ability of employees to pursue workplace goals collectively: see Fraser at paras. 44-46.

[278] This error has led my colleagues to disregard key findings of fact made by the trial judge – findings that colour and characterize the lengthy history of the dispute between the Province and the British Columbia Teachers' Federation ("BCTF"). These findings of fact were made by a trial judge with particular knowledge of the relationship between the parties. Between the original Bill 28 Decision (2011 BCSC 469) and its follow-up, the Bill 22 Decision (the case under appeal, 2014 BCSC 121), the trial judge had the benefit of 29 days of evidence and submissions pertaining to this dispute over a period of more than three years, not to mention additional time spent on applications, etc. The appellate function is not to substitute the findings and inferences made by a judge who has had the full benefit of the trial process with an appeal division's own opinions of the facts, unless the trial judge has made such palpable and overriding errors of fact that the conclusion cannot stand. As I will explain, I disagree that the trial judge made any palpable and overriding errors of fact.

[279] After oral submissions were given in this appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada released three consequential decisions on freedom of association: Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1 [MPAO]; Meredith v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 2; and Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4 [SFL]. Accordingly, the parties subsequently provided additional written submissions to this Court on the application of those decisions to the case at bar. In those decisions, the Supreme Court of Canada has now held that employees are entitled to constitutional protection for not only collective representation, but independent representation selected by the employees: MPAO. As well, employees have a constitutionally protected right to strike in order to protect an approximately equal bargaining position with their employer: SFL. Most importantly, the Court has reiterated and emphasized that at the centre of s. 2(d) is a Charter-protected balance between employees and employer that will allow for meaningful collective bargaining: MPAO at para. 72.

> [372] The trial judge found as a fact that the Province began the consultation process with the BCTF with its mind made up. It intended to re-enact the same provisions already found to be unconstitutional in the Bill 28 Decision. The Province's stated purpose for doing so was already found by the trial judge to be unfounded and based on myth and hearsay. For a substantial portion of the consultation period, the Province refused to answer the BCTF's requests for the Province to explain its position, nor did the Province even read the substantive content of the BCTF's proposal: the terms of the Working Conditions.
> [373] In my opinion, it was reasonable on these facts alone for the trial judge to come to the conclusion that the Province was not consulting in good faith. As was made clear in Fraser, good faith negotiation requires parties to explain their position and read and consider the positions of opposing parties. The Province failed to meet this minimum standard in this case.
> [374] My colleagues suggest that the trial judge did not properly weigh five important contextual factors in her infringement analysis. While the trial judge's assessment of these "practical and contextual realities" should be assessed on a standard of palpable and overriding error, that makes no difference in this case because I am of the opinion that the trial judge's assessment in this regard was correct and I disagree with my colleagues' assessment. I will not repeat my colleagues' enumeration of the five factors, found at para. 42, but I will now address them.
> [375] First, the Province did not give the BCTF a meaningful opportunity to make representations. To be a meaningful opportunity, the Province must have considered the BCTF's representations in good faith, which it did not do. Second, the trial judge gave full consideration to the Province's policy objectives in her infringement analysis: see e.g., Bill 22 Decision at paras. 243, 244, 250, 308, 347, 349, 361, 394, 417. As I explained, I am confident that the Province is able to pursue its policy goals while respecting the fundamental freedoms protected by the Charter. Third, the Province cannot rely on a claim that the parties were at an impasse when Bill 22 was passed, because as I explained, a legitimate impasse can only occur if the Province had been negotiating in good faith. Fourth, as I will explain in greater detail below in my s. 1 analysis, the temporally limited prohibition on collective bargaining did not mitigate, but in fact entrenched, the substantial infringement resulting from the deletion of the Working Conditions. Fifth, as I explained above, the associated regulations passed by the Province do not mitigate the Province's substantial interference with the BCTF's freedom of association.
> [376] In summary, I agree with the trial judge that the Province did not consult in good faith. Since the Province did not consult in good faith, it did not retain a meaningful process that protected the BCTF's s. 2(d) right to collectively bargain toward important workplace goals. The unilateral deletion of the Working Conditions, which were of significant importance to the teachers, was therefore a substantial interference with BCTF's associational activity and a breach of s. 2(d).

5.5 Questions

1. The Court provides four primary reasons for departing from its previous conclusion that collective bargaining was not protected by section 2(d), three of which have proven particularly controversial:

i. "the reasons evoked in the past for holding that the guarantee of freedom of association does not extend to collective bargaining can no longer stand" – in particular, the Court relied heavily on the Dunmore judgment in finding that many of the core assumptions of the original trilogy had been passed aside. Do you agree with this analysis? Why or why not?

ii. "an interpretation of s. 2(d) that precludes collective bargaining from its ambit is inconsistent with Canada's historic recognition of the importance of collective bargaining to freedom of association" – is the Court's review of labour history a compelling factor in this case? (see e.g. Eric Tucker, "The Constitutional Right to Bargain Collectively: The Ironies of Labour History in the Supreme Court of Canada" (2008) 61 Labour/La Travail 151).

iii. "collective bargaining is an integral component of freedom of association in international law, which may inform the interpretation of Charter guarantees" – is the Court's conception of collective bargaining supported by international labour law, despite the fact that the Wagner Act model of good faith bargaining is largely unique to North America? (see Brian Langille, "The Freedom of Association Mess: How We Got into It and How We Can Get out of It" (2009) 54:1 McGill L J 177 and Roy J. Adams, "Prospects for Labour's Right to Bargain Collectively after B.C. Health Services" (2009) 59:1 UNBLJ 85).

2. The Court's subsequent decision in Fraser was largely seen as a departure from the more robust conception of collective bargaining adopted in BC Health Services. Do you agree? And if so, what can justify or account for the different approaches in the two cases?

3. In Dunmore, the Court discussed the importance of extending constitutional protections to vulnerable groups of workers who are most in need of statutory protections to make their freedom of association meaningful. Can that be reconciled with the different outcomes in the BC Health Services and Fraser decisions? How can denying the farm workers in Fraser the full statutory protection for meaningful collective bargaining be justifiable in light of their extreme vulnerability?

4. How does the right to meaningful collective bargaining (as described in BC Health Services), or the right to make representations and have them considered in good faith (as described in Fraser), apply outside of labour relations statutes? For instance, can these rights apply to precarious workers, such as gig workers, who are often unable to meet ordinary thresholds for certification under labour relations statutes, but nevertheless seek to engage in collective bargaining with their employers?

5. The public sector wage restraint legislation in the Meredith case clearly interfered with the ability to negotiate collective agreements, to at least some extent, as it imposed certain terms and conditions of employment and precluded others. On what basis did the Court conclude that this did not constitute a breach of section 2(d)? To what extent did the outcome of the legislative process – that is, the specific terms imposed – influence the Court's conclusion that the process itself was constitutionally sound?

6. What features distinguish the outcome in Meredith from the outcome in the BC Health Services and the BC Teachers Federation cases, especially in relation to the question of a meaningful process of collective bargaining?

7. Looking ahead, are there other important aspects or elements of collective bargaining – beyond the duty to bargain in good faith and the need to adhere to collective agreements concluded through such bargaining – that must be protected to make "collective bargaining" truly meaningful?

6 The right to employee choice and independence in employee associations

6.1 Excerpt from Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 3, paras 81-103

> The Chief Justice and LeBel J. —

[81] We have concluded that s. 2(d) protects the right of employees to associate for the purpose of meaningfully pursuing collective workplace goals. The government therefore cannot enact laws or impose a labour relations process that substantially interferes with that right. This raises the question — what are the features essential to a meaningful process of collective bargaining under s. 2(d)? In this section, we conclude that a meaningful process of collective bargaining is a process that provides employees with a degree of choice and independence sufficient to enable them to determine their collective interests and meaningfully pursue them.

[82] Collective bargaining constitutes a fundamental aspect of Canadian society which "enhances the human dignity, liberty and autonomy of workers by giving them the opportunity to influence the establishment of workplace rules and thereby gain some control over a major aspect of their lives, namely their work" (Health Services, at para. 82). Put simply, its purpose is to preserve collective employee autonomy against the superior power of management and to maintain equilibrium between the parties. This equilibrium is embodied in the degree of choice and independence afforded to the employees in the labour relations process.

[83] But choice and independence are not absolute: they are limited by the context of collective bargaining. In our view, the degree of choice required by the Charter for collective bargaining purposes is one that enables employees to have effective input into the selection of the collective goals to be advanced by their association. In the same vein, the degree of independence required by the Charter for collective bargaining purposes is one that ensures that the activities of the association are aligned with the interests of its members.

[84] In the following subsections, we lay out the theoretical underpinnings of choice and independence and we explain how they are inherent to the nature and purpose of collective bargaining. We then explain how the requirements of choice and independence can be respected by a variety of labour relations models, as long as such models allow collective bargaining to be pursued in a meaningful way.

(1) Choice and Independence Are Inherent to the Nature and Purpose of Collective Bargaining

(a) Employee Choice

[85] The function of collective bargaining is not served by a process which undermines employees' rights to choose what is in their interest and how they should pursue those interests. The degree of choice required by the Charter is one that enables employees to have effective input into the selection of their collective goals. This right to participate in the collective is crucial to preserve employees' ability to advance their own interests, particularly in schemes which involve trade-offs of individual rights to gain collective strength (J. E. Dorsey, "Individuals and Internal Union Affairs: The Right to Participate", in K. P. Swan and K. E. Swinton, eds., Studies in Labour Law (1983), 193).

[86] Hallmarks of employee choice in this context include the ability to form and join new associations, to change representatives, to set and change collective workplace goals, and to dissolve existing associations. Employee choice may lead to a diversity of associational structures and to competition between associations, but it is a form of exercise of freedom of association that is essential to the existence of employee organizations and to the maintenance of the confidence of members in them (PIPSC, at p. 380, per Cory J., in dissent; P. Davies and M. Freedland, Kahn-Freund's Labour and the Law (3rd ed. 1983), at p. 200).

[87] Accountability to the members of the association plays an important role in assessing whether employee choice is present to a sufficient degree in any given labour relations scheme. Employees choose representatives on the assumption that their voice will be conveyed to the employer by the people they choose (A. Bogg and K. Ewing, "A (Muted) Voice at Work? Collective Bargaining in the Supreme Court of Canada" (2012), 33 Comp. Lab. L. & Pol'y J. 379, at p. 405). A scheme that holds representatives accountable to the employees who chose them ensures that the association works towards the purposes for which the employees joined together. Accountability allows employees to gain control over the selection of the issues that are put forward to the employer, and the agreements concluded on their behalf as a result of the process of collective bargaining.

(b) Independence From Management

[88] The function of collective bargaining is not served by a process which is dominated by or under the influence of management. This is why a meaningful process of collective bargaining protects the right of employees to form and join associations that are independent of management (Delisle, at paras. 32 and 37). Like choice, independence in the collective bargaining context is not absolute. The degree of independence required by the Charter for collective bargaining purposes is one that permits the activities of the association to be aligned with the interests of its members.

[89] Just as with choice, independence from management ensures that the activities of the association reflect the interests of the employees, thus respecting the nature and purpose of the collective bargaining process and allowing it to function properly. Conversely, a lack of independence means that employees may not be able to advance their own interests, but are limited to picking and choosing from among the interests management permits them to advance. Relevant considerations in assessing independence include the freedom to amend the association's constitution and rules, the freedom to elect the association's representatives, control over financial administration and control over the activities the association chooses to pursue.

[91] We now turn to the practical implications of choice and independence for labour relations models.

(2) Labour Relations Models Must Permit Collective Bargaining to Be Pursued in a Meaningful Way

[92] A variety of labour relations models may provide sufficient employee choice and independence from management to permit meaningful collective bargaining. As discussed, choice and independence are not absolute in the context of collective bargaining. By necessity, a collective framework not only serves employees' interests, but imposes limits on individual entitlements in order to permit the pursuit of collective goals. Collective bargaining is "an exercise in solidarity in which individual interests are not simply aggregated but transformed in the process of democratic deliberation" (J. Fudge, "Introduction: Farm Workers, Collective Bargaining Rights, and the Meaning of Constitutional Protection", in F. Faraday, J. Fudge and E. Tucker, eds., Constitutional Labour Rights in Canada: Farm Workers and the Fraser Case (2012), 1, at p. 17; see also G. Murray and P. Verge, La représentation syndicale: visage juridique actuel et futur (1999), at pp. 2-3; Dorsey, at pp. 195 and 219). As Professor Wellington states: "Accommodating the interests of the dissenter and those of the majority is always difficult. The hallmark of a truly democratic society is its unwillingness to give up easily either majority rule or individual freedom" (Labor and the Legal Process (1968), at p. 129).

[94] The Wagner Act model of labour relations in force in most private sector and many public sector workplaces offers one example of how the requirements of choice and independence ensure meaningful collective bargaining. That model permits a sufficiently large sector of employees to choose to associate themselves with a particular trade union and, if necessary, to decertify a union that fails to serve their needs. The principles of majoritarianism and exclusivity, the mechanism of "bargaining units" and the processes of certification and decertification — all under the supervision of an independent labour relations board — ensure that an employer deals with the association most representative of its employees: G. W. Adams, Canadian Labour Law (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at paras. 2.3800 to 2.4030; D. D. Carter et al., Labour Law in Canada (5th ed. 2002), at pp. 286-87; P. Verge, G. Trudeau and G. Vallée, Le droit du travail par ses sources (2006), at pp. 41-42.

[96] Labour schemes are responsive to the interests of the parties involved and the particular workplace context. Different models have emerged to meet the specific needs of diverse industries and workplaces. The result has been ongoing debate on the desirability of various forms of workplace representation and cooperation and on their coexistence: D. J. Doorey, "Graduated Freedom of Association: Worker Voice Beyond the Wagner Model" (2013), 38 Queen's L.J. 511; B. W. Burkett, "The Future of the Wagner Act: A Canadian-American Comparison" (2013), 38 Queen's L.J. 363; D. Taras, "Reconciling Differences Differently: Employee Voice in Public Policymaking and Workplace Governance" (2007), 28 Comp. Lab. L. & Pol'y J. 167; Adams, at paras. 1.290 to 1.340.

[98] The respondent argues that this view of s. 2(d) would require an employer, even a government employer, to recognize and bargain with every association chosen by employees, whatever the size. In our view, this result does not follow. Freedom of association requires, among other things, that no government process can substantially interfere with the autonomy of employees in creating or joining associations of their own choosing, even if in so doing they displace an existing association. It also requires that the employer consider employees' representations in good faith, and engage in meaningful discussion with them. But s. 2(d) does not require a process whereby every association will ultimately gain the recognition it seeks (see M. Coutu et al., Droit des rapports collectifs du travail au Québec (2nd ed. 2013), vol. 1, Le régime général, at para. 98). As we said, s. 2(d) can also accommodate a model based on majoritarianism and exclusivity (such as the Wagner Act model) that imposes restrictions on individual rights to pursue collective goals.

[99] In summary, a meaningful process of collective bargaining is a process that gives employees meaningful input into the selection of their collective goals, and a degree of independence from management sufficient to allow members to control the activities of the association, having regard to the industry and workplace in question. A labour relations scheme that complies with these requirements and thus allows collective bargaining to be pursued in a meaningful way satisfies s. 2(d).

[101] So stated, the notions of choice and independence, on the one hand, and representativeness, on the other, overlap considerably. However, we consider choice and independence best suited for the constitutional analysis at issue. If employees cannot choose the voice that speaks on their behalf, that voice is unlikely to speak up for their interests. It is precisely employee choice of representative that guarantees a representative voice. Similarly, if employees must "have confidence in their spokespersons" (Rothstein J.'s reasons, at para. 219), the way to ensure such confidence is through a sufficient degree of employee choice in the selection of representatives.

[102] Justice Rothstein argues that "the touchstone is representativeness" (para. 195). He acknowledges, however, that employees must be able to hold their representatives "to account" (paras. 193 and 222). Yet employees will be unable to hold representatives accountable if those employees lack sufficient choice in selecting their representatives or if their representatives are dependent on management (for instance, in determining the acceptable subject matter of employee grievances, or the relative priority of employee concerns).

[103] Representativeness and accountability rest on choice and independence. We conclude that the latter two principles are the most appropriate in assessing s. 2(d) compliance in the context of labour relations. That said, these principles are tools in an analysis that must in each case determine whether the right to the meaningful pursuit of collective workplace goals is respected. In our view, the disagreement between majority and Rothstein J. on the terminology of "choice and independence" versus "representativeness" is more semantic than real. The real difference lies in how the concepts are understood and applied.

6.2 Questions

1. The Court in Mounted Police Association of Ontario (MPAO) emphasizes that section 2(d) protects "choice" and "independence" in the pursuit of collective goals, but that "choice and independence are not absolute" in this context. What does the Court mean by this?
2. In the context of most other types of associations – from political parties to advocacy groups to book clubs – we have essentially absolute choice over which associations to join, in which collective activities we choose to engage, and we can typically choose these associations and engage in these activities independent of any other associations or entities. How does the context of these other associations differ from the labour relations context, and does that justify greater limitations on choice and independence in the labour relations arena?
3. The Court in MPAO suggests, in passing, that a designated bargaining model – where all workers in a particular employment context or industry, such as teachers, are statutorily required to bargain through a particular union – "may be" acceptable under section 2(d). What does this reveal about what the Court means when it discusses the need for employee 'choice' in relation to its collective bargaining representatives?

7.1 Excerpt from Saskatchewan Federation of Labour v. Saskatchewan, 2015 SCC 4, [2015] 1 SCR 245, paras 1-4, 32-34, 43-45, 51, 53-70, 75-97

The Saskatchewan Federation of Labour and other unions challenged the Public Service Essential Services Act, which limited the ability of public sector employees who perform essential services to go on strike. The Act contained no mechanism for resolving bargaining impasses. A majority of the Court held that the right to strike is an integral part of the rights contemplated by s 2(d) of the Charter, and thus found the PSESA to be an unjustifiable infringement of s 2(d). Justices Rothstein and Wagner dissented in part, arguing that s 2(d) does not encompass a right to strike since because meaningful collective bargaining could, in theory, occur without employees possessing the right or ability to strike. The declaration of invalidity for the PSESA was suspended for one year.

Abella J. —

[1] In the Alberta Reference (Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313), this Court held that the freedom of association guaranteed under s. 2(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms did not protect the right to collective bargaining or to strike. Twenty years later, in Health Services and Support — Facilities Subsector Bargaining Assn. v. British Columbia, 2007 SCC 27 (CanLII), [2007] 2 SCR 391, this Court held that s. 2(d) protects the right of employees to engage in a meaningful process of collective bargaining. The rights were further enlarged in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Fraser, 2011 SCC 20 (CanLII), [2011] 2 SCR 3, where the Court accepted that a meaningful process includes employees' rights to join together to pursue workplace goals, to make collective representations to the employer, and to have those representations considered in good faith, including having a means of recourse should the employer not bargain in good faith. And, most recently, in Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 3, the Court recognized that a process of collective bargaining could not be meaningful if employees lacked the independence and choice to determine and pursue their collective interests. Clearly the arc bends increasingly towards workplace justice.

[2] The question in this appeal is whether a prohibition on designated employees participating in strike action for the purpose of negotiating the terms and conditions of their employment amounts to a substantial interference with their right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining and, as a result, violates s. 2(d) of the Charter. The question of whether other forms of collective work stoppage are protected by s. 2(d) of the Charter is not at issue here.

[3] The conclusion that the right to strike is an essential part of a meaningful collective bargaining process in our system of labour relations is supported by history, by jurisprudence, and by Canada's international obligations. As Otto Kahn-Freund and Bob Hepple recognized:

> The power to withdraw their labour is for the workers what for management is its power to shut down production, to switch it to different purposes, to transfer it to different places. A legal system which suppresses the freedom to strike puts the workers at the mercy of their employers. This — in all its simplicity — is the essence of the matter.
> (Laws Against Strikes (1972), at p. 8)

The right to strike is not merely derivative of collective bargaining, it is an indispensable component of that right. It seems to me to be the time to give this conclusion constitutional benediction.

[4] This applies too to public sector employees. Those public sector employees who provide essential services undoubtedly have unique functions which may argue for a less disruptive mechanism when collective bargaining reaches an impasse, but they do not argue for no mechanism at all. Because Saskatchewan's legislation abrogates the right to strike for a number of employees and provides no such alternative mechanism, it is unconstitutional.

[32] Given the fundamental shift in the scope of s. 2(d) since the Alberta Reference was decided, the trial judge was entitled to depart from precedent and consider the issue in accordance with this Court's revitalized interpretation of s. 2(d): Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72 (CanLII), [2013] 3 SCR 1101, at para. 42.

[33] Dickson C.J.'s dissenting reasons in the Alberta Reference were influential in the development of the more "generous approach" in the recent jurisprudence. Recognizing that association "has always been vital as a means of protecting the essential needs and interests of working people" (at p. 368), and that Canada's international human rights obligations required protection for both the formation and essential activities of labour unions, including collective bargaining and the freedom to strike, Dickson C.J. concluded that "effective constitutional protection of the associational interests of employees in the collective bargaining process requires concomitant protection of their freedom to withdraw . . . their services [collectively], subject to s. 1 of the Charter" (at p. 371). (See also Perrault v. Gauthier (1898), 1898 CanLII 37 (SCC), 28 SCR 241, at p. 256, and Canadian Pacific Railway Co. v. Zambri, 1962 CanLII 11 (SCC), [1962] SCR 609, at pp. 618 and 621.)

[43] As this Court noted in Health Services, the "unprecedented number of strikes, caused in large part by the refusal of employers to recognize unions and to bargain collectively, led to governments adopting the American Wagner Act model of legislation" (para. 54). In implementing statutorily protected bargaining rights, modern labour relations legislation was "designed to secure a greater measure of industrial peace to the public by encouraging collective bargaining and conciliation procedures rather than strikes as a method of resolving industrial disputes" (Gagnon v. Foundation Maritime Ltd., 1961 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1961] SCR 435, at pp. 443-44, per Ritchie J.).

> The loss of the freedom to strike for recognition was accompanied by a certification procedure that enabled employees to obtain union representation through a democratic process, and also imposed on employers a duty to recognize and to bargain in good faith with certified unions. The loss of the freedom to strike during the life of a collective agreement came with a right to enforce the terms of that agreement through binding arbitration. And, of course, the postponement of strikes until after conciliation . . . also came with a statutory freeze on terms and conditions. Finally, the new regime also gave workers a right to strike in the Hohfeldian sense, by prohibiting employers from terminating the contract of employment merely because the worker was on strike. The scope of the right to resume employment varies from jurisdiction to jurisdiction, but it protects striking workers' jobs in most situations. [p. 350]

[51] The preceding historical account reveals that while strike action has variously been the subject of legal protections and prohibitions, the ability of employees to withdraw their labour in concert has long been essential to meaningful collective bargaining. Protection under s. 2(d), however, does not depend solely or primarily on the historical/legal pedigree of the right to strike. Rather, the right to strike is constitutionally protected because of its crucial role in a meaningful process of collective bargaining.

[53] In Health Services, this Court recognized that the Charter values of "[h]uman dignity, equality, liberty, respect for the autonomy of the person and the enhancement of democracy" supported protecting the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining within the scope of s. 2(d) (para. 81). And, most recently, drawing on these same values, in Mounted Police it confirmed that protection for a meaningful process of collective bargaining requires that employees have the ability to pursue their goals and that, at its core, s. 2(d) aims > to protect the individual from "state-enforced isolation in the pursuit of his or her ends" . . . . The guarantee functions to protect individuals against more powerful entities. By banding together in the pursuit of common goals, individuals are able to prevent more powerful entities from thwarting their legitimate goals and desires. In this way, the guarantee of freedom of association empowers vulnerable groups and helps them work to right imbalances in society. It protects marginalized groups and makes possible a more equal society. [para. 58]

[54] The right to strike is essential to realizing these values and objectives through a collective bargaining process because it permits workers to withdraw their labour in concert when collective bargaining reaches an impasse. Through a strike, workers come together to participate directly in the process of determining their wages, working conditions and the rules that will govern their working lives (Fudge and Tucker, at p. 334). The ability to strike thereby allows workers, through collective action, to refuse to work under imposed terms and conditions. This collective action at the moment of impasse is an affirmation of the dignity and autonomy of employees in their working lives.

[55] Striking — the "powerhouse" of collective bargaining — also promotes equality in the bargaining process: England, at p. 188. This Court has long recognized the deep inequalities that structure the relationship between employers and employees, and the vulnerability of employees in this context. In the Alberta Reference, Dickson C.J. observed that

> [t]he role of association has always been vital as a means of protecting the essential needs and interests of working people. Throughout history, workers have associated to overcome their vulnerability as individuals to the strength of their employers. [p. 368]

And this Court affirmed in Mounted Police that

> ... s. 2(d) functions to prevent individuals, who alone may be powerless, from being overwhelmed by more powerful entities, while also enhancing their strength through the exercise of collective power. Nowhere are these dual functions of s. 2(d) more pertinent than in labour relations. Individual employees typically lack the power to bargain and pursue workplace goals with their more powerful employers. Only by banding together in collective bargaining associations, thus strengthening their bargaining power with their employer, can they meaningfully pursue their workplace goals.
> The right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining is therefore a necessary element of the right to collectively pursue workplace goals in a meaningful way . . . . [The] process of collective bargaining will not be meaningful if it denies employees the power to pursue their goals. [paras. 70-71]

Judy Fudge and Eric Tucker point out that it is "the possibility of the strike which enables workers to negotiate with their employers on terms of approximate equality" (p. 333). Without it, "bargaining risks being inconsequential — a dead letter" (Prof. Michael Lynk, "Expert Opinion on Essential Services", at par. 20; A.R., vol. III, at p. 145).

[57] Strike activity itself does not guarantee that a labour dispute will be resolved in any particular manner, or that it will be resolved at all. And, as the trial judge recognized, strike action has the potential to place pressure on both sides of a dispute to engage in good faith negotiations. But what it does permit is the employees' ability to engage in negotiations with an employer on a more equal footing (see Williams v. Aristocratic Restaurants (1947) Ltd., 1951 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1951] SCR 762, at p. 780; Mounted Police, at paras. 70-71).

> Often it is only by means of a strike that union members can publicize and emphasize the merits of their position as they see them with regard to the issues in dispute. It is essential that both the labour and management side be able to put forward their position so the public fully understands the issues and can determine which side is worthy of public support. Historically, to put forward their position, management has had far greater access to the media than have the unions. At times unions had no alternative but to take strike action and by means of peaceful picketing put forward their position to the public. This is often the situation today. [p. 916]

[59] As Dickson C.J. observed, "[t]he very nature of a strike, and its raison d'être, is to influence an employer by joint action which would be ineffective if it were carried out by an individual" (Alberta Reference, at p. 371).

[60] Alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, on the other hand, are generally not associational in nature and may, in fact, reduce the effectiveness of collective bargaining processes over time: Bernard Adell, Michel Grant and Allen Ponak, Strikes in Essential Services (2001), at p. 8. Such mechanisms can help avoid the negative consequences of strike action in the event of a bargaining impasse, but as Dickson C.J. noted in RWDSU v. Saskatchewan, 1987 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 460, they do not, in the same way, help to realize what is protected by the values and objectives underlying freedom of association:

> . . . as I indicated in the Alberta Labour Reference, the right to bargain collectively and therefore the right to strike involve more than purely economic interests of workers . . . . [A]s yet, it would appear that Canadian legislatures have not discovered an alternative mode of industrial dispute resolution which is as sensitive to the associational interests of employees as the traditional strike/lock-out mechanism . . . . [pp. 476-77]

That is why, in the Alberta Reference, Dickson C.J. dealt with alternative dispute resolution mechanisms not as part of the scope of s. 2(d), but as part of his s. 1 analysis: pp. 374-75.

[61] The ability to engage in the collective withdrawal of services in the process of the negotiation of a collective agreement is therefore, and has historically been, the "irreducible minimum" of the freedom to associate in Canadian labour relations (Paul Weiler, Reconcilable Differences: New Directions in Canadian Labour Law (1980), at p. 69).

[62] Canada's international human rights obligations also mandate protecting the right to strike as part of a meaningful process of collective bargaining. These obligations led Dickson C.J. to observe that > there is a clear consensus amongst the [International Labour Organization] adjudicative bodies that [Convention (No. 87) concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, 68 U.N.T.S. 17 (1948)] goes beyond merely protecting the formation of labour unions and provides protection of their essential activities — that is of collective bargaining and the freedom to strike. [Alberta Reference, at p. 359]

[63] At the time of the Alberta Reference, Dickson C.J.'s reliance on Canada's commitments under international law did not attract sufficient collegial support to lift his views out of their dissenting status, but his approach has more recently proven to be a magnetic guide.

[64] LeBel J. confirmed in R. v. Hape, 2007 SCC 26 (CanLII), [2007] 2 SCR 292, that in interpreting the Charter, the Court "has sought to ensure consistency between its interpretation of the Charter, on the one hand, and Canada's international obligations and the relevant principles of international law, on the other": para. 55. And this Court reaffirmed in Divito v. Canada (Public Safety and Emergency Preparedness), 2013 SCC 47 (CanLII), [2013] 3 SCR 157, at para. 23, "the Charter should be presumed to provide at least as great a level of protection as is found in the international human rights documents that Canada has ratified".

[65] Given this presumption, Canada's international obligations clearly argue for the recognition of a right to strike within s. 2(d). Canada is a party to two instruments which explicitly protect the right to strike. Article 8(1) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3, to which Canada acceded in May 1976, provides that the "States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to ensure . . . (d) the right to strike, provided that it is exercised in conformity with the laws of the particular country". (See also affidavit of Prof. Patrick Macklem (Expert Report), sworn December 21, 2010.) In Dickson C.J.'s view, the qualification that the right had to be exercised in conformity with domestic law appeared to allow for the regulation of the right, but not its legislative abrogation (Alberta Reference, at p. 351, citing Re Alberta Union of Provincial Employees and the Crown in Right of Alberta (1980), 1980 CanLII 1108 (AB KB), 120 D.L.R. (3d) 590 (Alta. Q.B.), at p. 597; see also Hepple, at p. 138).

[66] In addition, in 1990, just over two years after the Alberta Reference was decided, Canada signed and ratified the Charter of the Organization of American States, Can. T.S. 1990 No. 23. Article 45(c) states:

> Employers and workers, both rural and urban, have the right to associate themselves freely for the defense and promotion of their interests, including the right to collective bargaining and the workers' right to strike, and recognition of the juridical personality of associations and the protection of their freedom and independence, all in accordance with applicable laws;

[67] Besides these explicit commitments, other sources tend to confirm the protection of the right to strike recognized in international law. Canada is a party to the International Labour Organization (ILO) Convention (No. 87) concerning freedom of association and protection of the right to organize, ratified in 1972. Although Convention No. 87 does not explicitly refer to the right to strike, the ILO supervisory bodies, including the Committee on Freedom of Association and the Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations, have recognized the right to strike as an indissociable corollary of the right of trade union association that is protected in that convention: see Pierre Verge and Dominic Roux, "L'affirmation des principes de la liberté syndicale, de la négociation collective et du droit de grève selon le droit international et le droit du travail canadien: deux solitudes?", in Pierre Verge, ed., Droit international du travail: Perspectives canadiennes (2010), 437, at p. 460; Janice R. Bellace, "The ILO and the right to strike" (2014), 153 Int'l Lab. Rev. 29, at p. 30. Striking, according to the Committee of Experts, is "one of the essential means available to workers and their organizations for the promotion and protection of their economic and social interests": Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining (1994), at para. 147; Jean-Michel Servais, "ILO Law and the Right to Strike" (2009-2010), 15 C.L.E.L.J. 147, at p. 150.

[68] Under the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights signatory states are not permitted to take "legislative measures which would prejudice, or apply the law in such a manner as would prejudice, the guarantees provided for in [Convention No. 87]": Article 8(3) of the ICESCR. The principles relating to the right to strike were summarized by the Committee on Freedom of Association as follows:

> 521. The Committee has always recognized the right to strike by workers and their organizations as a legitimate means of defending their economic and social interests.
> 522. The right to strike is one of the essential means through which workers and their organizations may promote and defend their economic and social interests.
> 523. The right to strike is an intrinsic corollary to the right to organize protected by Convention No. 87.
> ...

[75] This historical, international, and jurisprudential landscape suggests compellingly to me that s. 2(d) has arrived at the destination sought by Dickson C.J. in the Alberta Reference, namely, the conclusion that a meaningful process of collective bargaining requires the ability of employees to participate in the collective withdrawal of services for the purpose of pursuing the terms and conditions of their employment through a collective agreement. Where good faith negotiations break down, the ability to engage in the collective withdrawal of services is a necessary component of the process through which workers can continue to participate meaningfully in the pursuit of their collective workplace goals. In this case, the suppression of the right to strike amounts to a substantial interference with the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining.

[76] In their dissenting reasons, however, my colleagues urge deference to the legislature in interpreting the scope of s. 2(d). This Court has repeatedly held that the rights enumerated in the Charter should be interpreted generously: Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 156; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 344. It is not clear to me why s. 2(d) should be interpreted differently: Health Services, at para. 26; R. v. Advance Cutting & Coring Ltd., 2001 SCC 70 (CanLII), [2001] 3 SCR 209, at para. 162; Mounted Police, at para. 47. In the context of constitutional adjudication, deference is a conclusion, not an analysis. It certainly plays a role in s. 1, where, if a law is justified as proportionate, the legislative choice is maintained. But the whole purpose of Charter review is to assess a law for constitutional compliance. If the touchstone of Charter compliance is deference, what is the point of judicial scrutiny?

[79] The maintenance of essential public services is self-evidently a pressing and substantial objective, as the Unions acknowledge. The Unions also accept the trial judge's further conclusion that the government's objective — ensuring the continued delivery of essential services — is rationally connected to the "basic structure of the legislation, including the sanctions imposed on employees and their unions to ensure compliance with its provisions".

[81] The trial judge concluded that the provisions of the PSESA "go beyond what is reasonably required to ensure the uninterrupted delivery of essential services during a strike". I agree. The unilateral authority of public employers to determine whether and how essential services are to be maintained during a work stoppage with no adequate review mechanism, and the absence of a meaningful dispute resolution mechanism to resolve bargaining impasses, justify the trial judge's conclusion that the PSESA impairs the s. 2(d) rights more than is necessary.

[82] In Canadian Union of Public Employees, Local 301 v. Montreal (City), 1997 CanLII 386 (SCC), [1997] 1 SCR 793, L'Heureux-Dubé J. explained why public sector strike action engages singular considerations:

> When "public" employees strike, the pressure exerted on the employer is not largely financial, as in the private sector, but rather arises from the disruption of services upon which society depends for the daily activities of its members. While consumers may simply go to another source for goods and services provided by private enterprise, alternatives to the services targeted by the special regimes may be unavailable or very difficult and expensive to obtain. [para. 32]

[83] That is why the trial judge accepted that "the principle that it is unacceptable to risk the health and safety of others as a means to resolve a public sector collective bargaining dispute is well established in Canada".

> It is ... necessary to define "essential services" in a manner consistent with the justificatory standards set out in s. 1. The logic of s. 1 in the present circumstances requires that an essential service be one the interruption of which would threaten serious harm to the general public or to a part of the population. In the context of an argument relating to harm of a non-economic nature I find the decisions of the Freedom of Association Committee of the I.L.O. to be helpful and persuasive. These decisions have consistently defined an essential service as a service "whose interruption would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population" (Freedom of Association: Digest of Decisions and Principles of the Freedom of Association Committee of the Governing Body of the I.L.O., supra). In my view, and without attempting an exhaustive list, persons essential to the maintenance and administration of the rule of law and national security would also be included within the ambit of essential services. Mere inconvenience to members of the public does not fall within the ambit of the essential services justification for abrogating the freedom to strike. [Emphasis added; pp. 374-75.]

[85] In other words, the fact that a service is provided exclusively through the public sector does not inevitably lead to the conclusion that it is properly considered "essential". In some circumstances, the public may well be deprived of a service as a result of strike action without being deprived of any essential service at all that would justifiably limit the ability to strike during negotiations. As Ball J. wrote:

> ... all of the services provided by public sector workers are not essential. It cannot be credibly argued, for example, that the services provided by every employee of every governmental ministry, Crown corporation and agency, every city, town and village, and every educational institution, are so essential that their discontinuance would jeopardize the health and safety of the community. Can it be said that the community would be at risk if employees at casinos and liquor stores in Saskatchewan decided to withdraw their services in support of higher wages? [para. 96]

[86] This need for demarcated limits on both the right of essential services employees to strike and, concomitantly, on the extent to which services may justifiably be limited as "essential", is reflected too in international law. As the trial judge noted:

> International law also recognizes the necessity of limitations on the right to strike of essential service workers. . . . The jurisprudence under ILO Convention No. 87, the ICSECR [sic] and the ICCPR has been consistent. As expressed by Prof. Patrick Macklem:
> > Each of these instruments has been interpreted as enshrining the right to strike, and their respective supervisory bodies have insisted that the right to strike may be restricted or prohibited:
> > (a) in the public service only for public servants exercising authority in the name of the state;
> > (b) in essential services in the strict sense of the term (that is, services the interruption of which would endanger the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population); or
> > (c) in the event of an acute national emergency and for a limited period of time.

See also Lynk, at paras. 19-20; Verge and Roux, at pp. 461-62. And within the general category of essential services, the ILO has recognized that "certain classes of personnel . . . should not be deprived of the right to strike, because the interruption of their functions does not in practice affect life, personal safety or health": Servais, at p. 154.

[87] Under the PSESA, however, the categories of workers whose right to strike may be abrogated because they provide essential services is subject to the employer's unilateral discretion. The scheme requires a public employer and a trade union to first attempt to negotiate the terms of an essential services agreement. Section 6(2) of the Act contemplates that the employer must "advise the trade union" of the services it considers to be essential within the meaning of the Act. And where the employer is the Government of Saskatchewan, the prescribed essential services have been identified by regulation, without any room for further discussion about what constitutes an essential service. It is, as a result, not even clear that the scheme necessarily contemplates that the designation of certain services as essential will be the subject of negotiation under an agreement.

[88] Moreover, s. 7(2) of the PSESA states that under an essential services agreement, the number of employees within each classification "is to be determined without regard to the availability of other persons to provide essential services". As the trial judge found:

> The apparent purpose of s. 7(2) is to enable managers and non-union administrators to avoid the inconvenience and pressure that would ordinarily be brought to bear by a work stoppage. Yet if qualified personnel are available to deliver requisite services, it should not matter if they are managers or administrators. If anything s. 7(2) works at cross purposes to ensuring the uninterrupted delivery of essential services during a work stoppage. [para. 192]

[89] And in the event that an agreement cannot be reached, s. 9(2) gives a public employer the unilateral authority to dictate whether and how essential services will be maintained, including the authority to determine the classifications of employees who must continue to work during the work stoppage, the number and names of employees within each classification, and, for public employers other than the Government of Saskatchewan, the essential services that are to be maintained. As the trial judge found, "[o]f the unilateral designations made by public employers under s. 9(2) only one, that of the number of employees required to work, is subject to review by the [Saskatchewan Labour Relations Board]." There is no jurisdiction for the Board to even consider significant dimensions of an employer's unilateral designation with regard to the maintenance of essential services, such as whether any particular service is essential, or which job classifications involve the delivery of genuinely essential services.

[90] There is no evidence to support Saskatchewan's position that the objective of ensuring the continued delivery of essential services requires unilateral rather than collaborative decision-making authority. And its view that public employers can be relied upon to make fair decisions has the potential to sacrifice the right to a meaningful process of collective bargaining on the altar of aspirations. The history of barriers to collective bargaining over the past century represents a compelling reality check to such optimism.

[91] And even where an employee has been prohibited from participating in strike activity, the PSESA does not tailor his or her responsibilities to the performance of essential services alone. Section 18(1)(a) of the PSESA requires that in the event of a work stoppage, all essential services employees must continue "the duties of [their] employment with the public employer in accordance with the terms and conditions of the last collective bargaining agreement" and must not fail to continue those duties "without lawful excuse" (s. 18(2)). Requiring those affected employees to perform both essential and non-essential work during a strike action undercuts their ability to participate meaningfully in and influence the process of pursuing collective workplace goals.

[92] All this is in addition to the absence of an impartial and effective dispute resolution process to challenge public employer designations under s. 9(2) of the legislation, a particular concern in light of the significant definitional latitude given to public employers. As noted, the ILO's Committee on Freedom of Association defined essential services as those needed to prevent a "clear and imminent threat to the life, personal safety or health of the whole or part of the population" (Freedom of Association, at para. 581). The definition of "essential services" under the PSESA requires basic judgments to be made about when life, health, safety, or environmental concerns, among others, justify essential services designation. These are fundamental questions, yet all are permitted to be answered unilaterally by the employer under the Act with no access to an effective dispute resolution mechanism for reviewing disputed employer designations.

[93] Nor is there any access to a meaningful alternative mechanism for resolving bargaining impasses, such as arbitration. Paul Weiler persuasively explained why such an alternative is crucial for essential services employees:

> If we pull all the teeth of a union by requiring provision of imperative public safety services, such that any remaining strike option does not afford the union significant bargaining leverage, then I believe the union should have access to arbitration at its option. [Emphasis deleted; p. 237.]

[94] Not surprisingly, Dickson C.J. was alive to the profound bargaining imbalance the union inherits when the removal of the right to strike is not accompanied by a meaningful mechanism for resolving collective bargaining disputes:

> Clearly, if the freedom to strike were denied and no effective and fair means for resolving bargaining disputes were put in its place, employees would be denied any input at all in ensuring fair and decent working conditions, and labour relations law would be skewed entirely to the advantage of the employer. It is for this reason that legislative prohibition of freedom to strike must be accompanied by a mechanism for dispute resolution by a third party. I agree with the Alberta International Fire Fighters Association at p. 22 of its factum that "It is generally accepted that employers and employees should be on an equal footing in terms of their positions in strike situations or at compulsory arbitration where the right to strike is withdrawn". The purpose of such a mechanism is to ensure that the loss in bargaining power through legislative prohibition of strikes is balanced by access to a system which is capable of resolving in a fair, effective and expeditious manner disputes which arise between employees and employers. [Emphasis added.]

[95] The trial judge compared the PSESA with other Canadian essential services labour relations schemes and was struck by how uniquely restrictive the PSESA was:

> ... no other essential services legislation in Canada comes close to prohibiting the right to strike as broadly, and as significantly, as the [PSESA]. No other essential services legislation is as devoid of access to independent, effective dispute resolution processes to address employer designations of essential service workers and, where those designations have the effect of prohibiting meaningful strike action, an independent, efficient, overall dispute mechanism....
> Canadian legislation prohibiting strikes by firefighters and police officers, where the level of essentiality is very high, invariably provides compensatory access to arbitration to resolve collective bargaining disputes. The same is true for legislation prohibiting strikes by hospital workers. Although that legislation contains a variety of approaches for determining when and how access should be provided, the point is that it is invariably provided.
> There is a pragmatic reason why "no strike" legislation almost always provides for access to independent, effective dispute resolution processes: mechanisms of that kind can operate as a safety valve against an explosive buildup of unresolved labour relations tensions.

[96] Given the breadth of essential services that the employer is entitled to designate unilaterally without an independent review process, and the absence of an adequate, impartial and effective alternative mechanism for resolving collective bargaining impasses, there can be little doubt that the trial judge was right to conclude that the scheme was not minimally impairing. Quite simply, it impairs the s. 2(d) rights of designated employees much more widely and deeply than is necessary to achieve its objective of ensuring the continued delivery of essential services.

7.2 Questions

1. The right to strike in Canada is tightly controlled under labour relations legislation. It is not permitted either as a means of forcing an employer to recognize a union (recognition strikes), or during the currency of a collective bargaining relationship (enforcement strikes). Indeed, it is typically only available to workers during a single period of time following the conclusion of a collective agreement, and even then, it is heavily regulated by labour boards. (see e.g. Judy Fudge & Eric Tucker, "The Freedom to Strike in Canada: A Brief Legal History" (2009) 15:2 Canadian Lab & Emp LJ 333.) Are these common restrictions on strike action justifiable and permissible under section 2(d)? Do they amount to a breach of section 2(d) that is saved by section 1? Or do they not amount to a breach of section 2(d) at all? Why or why not?
2. Under Canadian labour legislation, the decision of a group of employees to leave work in concert for reasons unrelated to achieving collective bargaining goals – such as a political protest – is nevertheless deemed a strike, which can be restrained by labour boards. Is this type of restriction a breach of section 2(d), and if so, is it justified under section 1? (see Brian Langille, "What is a Strike" (2009) 15:2 Canadian Lab & Emp LJ 355).
3. The Court in Saskatchewan Federation of Labour (SFL) described the test for a breach of 2(d) in the context of strike action as "whether the legislative interference with the right to strike in a particular case amounts to a substantial interference with collective bargaining". Does this mean that the right to strike is, in a meaningful sense, derived from the process of collective bargaining?
4. The Court also observed that while strike action exists outside of the Wagner Act model familiar in Canada, the Wagner Act model "is the prevailing model in this country and the one under the s. 2(d) microscope in this case". To what extent is the right to strike, as described in SFL, available to those who cannot access the majoritarian collective bargaining rights available under labour statutes? Can such an important aspect of a fundamental freedom be limited to those who are able to obtain access to certification under labour relations legislation?
5. Looking back through the history of the Court's jurisprudence, are there other ways to justify protection for the right to strike, that would not be directly tethered to the Wagner Act model of collective bargaining? And if so, would such approaches open up the door to protection for strike action for those who are not able to obtain certification through Canadian labour relations statutes? (see Steven Barrett & Benjamin Oliphant, "The Trilogy Strikes Back: Reconsidering Constitutional Protection for the Freedom to Strike" (2013) 45:2 Ottawa L Rev 201).

8 The modern "substantial interference" test under 2(D)

8.1 Excerpt from Société des casinos du Québec inc. v. Association des cadres de la Société des casinos du Québec, 2024 SCC 13, paras 21-44

The Association des cadres de la Société des casinos du Quebec challenged s 1(l)(1) of the Quebec Labour Code, which excluded first level managers from Quebec's statutory labour relations regime. The Association had applied to the Administrative Labour Tribunal (ALT) to be recognized as a certified union representing first-level managers at a Montreal casino. The ALT held that the exclusion unjustifiably infringed s 2(d). This decision was overturned by the Quebec Superior Court, finding that the claim was for positive rights, thus triggering the test from Dunmore, which it held was not met. The Court of Appeal restored the ALT's decision, prompting an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. A majority of that Court held that Dunmore was not overturned by either MPAO or Fraser, meaning there was just one test for s 2(d) claims – positive or negative. In applying that test, the majority held that the exclusion was not intended to interfere with freedom of association for managers, and the Association failed to show that the result of the exclusion constituted a substantial interference with section 2(d). Chief Justice Wagner and Justice Côté in their concurring opinion held that the Dunmore framework is better suited for positive claims, maintaining a distinction in how courts should approach positive and negative freedom of association claims. Justice Rowe agreed that the Dunmore framework should still apply to positive claims distinctly from negative ones.

> [33] To sum up, this Court's s. 2(d) jurisprudence reveals that the Court has consistently applied a two-part framework that examines whether activities fall within the scope of s. 2(d) and whether government action has substantially interfered with those activities, in purpose or effect. This Court has also highlighted that its s. 2(d) jurisprudence since Dunmore should be viewed as a consistent body of case law.

[34] Dunmore was not overturned by this Court's decisions in Mounted Police or Fraser. Nor does this Court's jurisprudence create two tests, one for claims seeking positive intervention from the state and another for claims seeking negative protection against state interference. Although the Dunmore factors have not been identified and analyzed each time the Court has been asked to determine whether legislation or government action infringed s. 2(d) of the Charter, the underlying principles have been consistently reaffirmed. These principles, or Dunmore factors, circumscribe the possibility of successfully challenging underinclusive legislation, but they do not constitute a separate test. Rather, they provide guidance to ensure the analysis is focused on determining whether legislation or government action substantially interferes in purpose or effect with the claimant's ability to engage in activities within the scope of s. 2(d).

[35] It is not always necessary to consider each Dunmore factor expressly. Sometimes, the state's responsibility in causing the substantial interference is self-evident. Consider, for example, legislation that prohibits a type of associational activity, such as a ban on striking. The Dunmore factor of ensuring that the interference is attributable to the state rather than a private actor is still relevant, but it is so self-evident that the interference is attributable to the state that it need not be discussed expressly. In other cases, as Bastarache J. cautioned in Dunmore, a court must be careful in evaluating the evidence to disentangle the effects of the impugned legislation or government action from external elements and determine whether the legislation or government action "substantially orchestrates, encourages or sustains the violation" (para. 26).

[36] Nor does Dunmore establish a higher threshold for establishing an infringement of s. 2(d) in claims seeking state intervention. In all cases, the threshold for proving an infringement of s. 2(d) is substantial interference. This threshold was first explained in Dunmore (at para. 25) and has been consistently applied in this Court's subsequent s. 2(d) jurisprudence (Health Services, at paras. 19 and 90; Fraser, at paras. 2 and 47; Mounted Police, at para. 72; Meredith, at paras. 4 and 24-25; Saskatchewan Federation of Labour, at paras. 2 and 25).

[37] It may be harder for a claimant to meet their burden of proof when challenging underinclusive legislation or when seeking state intervention since, as noted above, the effects of underinclusive legislation can be hard to disentangle from other factors. As this Court noted in Dunmore, it will be in "unique contexts" that underinclusive legislation amounts to substantial interference (para. 22). In all cases, however, the threshold to establish an infringement of s. 2(d) remains substantial interference. A claimant alleging that underinclusive legislation infringes s. 2(d) need not meet an elevated threshold.

(2) Section 2(b) and Section 2(d) of the Charter Have Different Frameworks

[39] It is also useful to highlight briefly the different evolution of the frameworks under ss. 2(b) and 2(d) of the Charter to explain why the distinction between positive freedoms and negative rights is not relevant in determining the framework for s. 2(d) claims, even though it has been recently affirmed in Toronto (City) in the context of s. 2(b).

[44] In summary, the frameworks under ss. 2(b) and 2(d) have evolved differently in this Court's jurisprudence. This helps explain why the distinction between positive freedoms and negative rights is not relevant in determining the applicable framework for s. 2(d) claims, even though it has been recently affirmed in the s. 2(b) context.

8.2 Questions

1. The Supreme Court of Canada in Société des casinos du Québec inc. v. Association des cadres de la Société des casinos du Québec, 2024 SCC 13 ("Casinos") confirmed that the test for a breach of freedom of association under section 2(d), one of "substantial interference", is higher than the test for a breach of freedom of expression under section 2(b). What is the Court's justification for this difference? Are there any other justifications for this difference that the Court did not offer?
2. Leaving aside the labour relations context, can it be said that the Government or legislature should be able to interfere with a person's freedom to join and belong to an association, and participate in its activities, as long as the interference is not "substantial"?

9 The right to not associate

9.1 Excerpts from Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, 1991 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 211, per Wilson J., paras 69, 77-100

The claimant in this case was a community college teacher required to pay union dues pursuant to a collective bargaining agreement between the teachers' union and the Council of Regents (the employer). He objected to the union's use of membership dues for activities unrelated to collective bargaining, including contributions to the NDP. The trial judge found that all provisions in the collective bargaining agreement that required union dues to be paid for non-bargaining related activities were unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal held that the Charter did not apply to the Council of Regents and even if it did, s 2(d) was not infringed since the claimant was equally free to associate with others and oppose the union. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the majority opinion , written by La Forest J., held that the Charter did apply to the Council and that s 2(d) is infringed when members are compelled to pay union dues to contribute to causes not directly related to collective bargaining. held, however, that the infringement could be justified under s 1 since unions need to be enabled to participate in broader societal debates and enable democracy in the workplace. Justices Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé, in dissent, held that the Charter did not apply to the spending of union dues. If the Charter did apply, their opinion held that s 2(d) does not protect the right not to associate and even if it were to, such a right would not be infringed since Mr. Lavigne's claim was closely tied to the union's objects. Justice Cory held that the Charter did apply but agreed with Justices Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé's opinion with respect to s 2(d). Justice McLachlin (as she then was) agreed that the Council of Regents was bound by the Charter, but found that s 2(d) was not infringed because that section protects the right against enforced ideological conformity and compelled union due payments did not force Mr. Lavigne to associate with the viewpoints to which the union was contributing.

Wilson J

69. The appellant argues that because he is compelled to contribute financially to the Union, he is thereby brought into association with OPSEU against his wishes. Mr. Lavigne maintains that it is this mandatory payment of dues alone which gives rise to a violation of s. 2(d) and that the manner in which the Union spends his dues is irrelevant as far as his associational rights are concerned. The respondent Union, on the other hand, argues that the scheme of mandatory dues deduction does not infringe s. 2(d). It maintains that s. 2(d) does not include a freedom not to associate, but guarantees only a freedom to associate, i.e., to join together collectively. OPSEU also contends that even if s. 2(d) does in fact protect the right of individuals not to associate, such a right has not been infringed in the present case. The principal issue raised by this ground of appeal is therefore whether s. 2(d) of the Charter only protects freedom to associate or whether it also safeguards the right of individuals to refuse to associate.

77 Hence, it would appear that this Court has been unanimous in finding on more than one occasion and in a variety of contexts that the purpose which s. 2(d) is meant to advance is the collective action of individuals in pursuit of their common goals. The lower courts have interpreted this Court's position as being that the Charter does not guarantee a freedom not to associate: see Arlington Crane Service Ltd. v. Ontario (Minister of Labour) (1988), 1988 CanLII 4802 (ON SC), 67 O.R. (2d) 225 (H.C.), and Re Pruden Building Ltd. and Construction & General Workers' Union Local 92 (1984), 1984 CanLII 1205 (AB KB), 13 D.L.R. (4th) 584 (Alta. Q.B.).

78 The appellant seeks, however, to limit the scope of what was said in the Alberta Reference and its progeny. Mr. Lavigne argues that this Court's conclusion as to the scope of s. 2(d) was reached in the context of governmental intrusion upon collective action and that the question whether s. 2(d) includes a freedom not to associate has never actually been before the Court. The appellant urges the Court to expand the reach of s. 2(d) to include the right not to associate and cites a number of authorities in support of this position.

79 Mr. Lavigne relies on the decision of this Court in Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union v. Imperial Oil Ltd., 1963 CanLII 44 (SCC), [1963] SCR 584. In that case, provincial law prohibited unions from making any contribution to political parties or political candidates out of the moneys they acquired through dues check-off schemes and required them to issue a declaration indicating their compliance with the legislation in this regard. Mandatory dues deduction and mandatory union membership were agreed upon between the employer and the union and a provision to that effect was incorporated into the collective agreement. When the union failed to make the statutory declaration, Imperial Oil refused to continue to make the deductions. The union then sued the company for the funds. In seeking to justify its actions the union argued that the legislation was ultra vires the province of British Columbia because it purported to regulate matters relating to federal elections and fundamental rights both of which were matters of federal rather than provincial jurisdiction under the Constitution Act, 1867.

80 In the course of finding that the legislation was in pith and substance in relation to property and civil rights and therefore within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, Martland J. remarked at p. 593:

> The Labour Relations Act has materially affected the civil rights of individual employees by conferring upon certified trade unions the power to bind them by agreement and the power to make agreements which will compel membership in a union. Such legislation falls within the powers of the Legislature.... The legislation which is under attack in the present proceedings, in my opinion, does nothing more than to provide that the fee paid as a condition of membership in such an entity by each individual employee cannot be expended for a political object which may not command his support. That individual has been brought into association with the trade union by statutory requirement. [Emphasis added.]

81 While this comment seems on its face to support Mr. Lavigne's argument, its significance in terms of the present appeal is diminished by the following considerations. Most importantly, the process of characterizing a law for the purposes of division of powers determinations is quite a different exercise from construing a law for purposes of the Charter. This point is made unequivocally clear by the decision of this Court in Big M Drug Mart, supra, and more recently in Douglas College, supra. Second, it is clear that what was at issue in Oil, Chemical was a "closed shop" rather than an "agency shop" provision. That is to say, the article negotiated between the union and the employer and incorporated into the collective agreement in that case made it a condition of employment that employees actually join the union rather than simply pay the equivalent of union dues. To the extent that this fact influenced the thinking of Martland J., that situation is clearly distinguishable from the present. Mr. Lavigne has not been compelled to become a member of the Union and, indeed, has exercised his prerogative to refrain from doing so.

82 The appellant also relies on the decision of the European Human Rights Commission in Young, James and Webster v. United Kingdom (1980), 3 E.H.R.R. 20. In that case a complaint was lodged that a closed shop clause negotiated into a collective agreement violated associational rights as guaranteed by Article 11 of the European Convention on Human Rights. The complainants were dismissed from their employment with British Rail after, the agreement having been ratified by the employer and the bargaining agent, they refused to join the union. The Commission agreed that a violation of the Convention had been established. It is my opinion, however, that Young, James and Webster actually provides scanty support for the appellant's position. As was the case in Oil, Chemical and unlike the present case, the impugned article of the collective agreement provided for a "closed shop". More crucial is the fact that the Commission expressly refused to base its decision on a right not to associate, a point which is made clear by the Commission's statement at pp. 26-27 that it did "not have to discuss the more general question whether or not the positive freedom guaranteed by Article 11(1) implies also a negative freedom". Indeed, the gist of the decision is that the complainants' positive associational rights were violated because they were prohibited from joining a union of their choosing. That the heart of the decision rested on this footing is made abundantly clear by the following remarks of the Commission at p. 26:

> As regards the individual to whom the rights mentioned in Article 11 are guaranteed, these words imply that a worker must be able to choose the union which in his opinion best protects his interests, and if he considers that none of the existing trade unions does so effectively, to form together with others a new one. This is particularly important since unions, as these cases show, may have political affiliations. [Emphasis added.]

83 Finally, Mr. Lavigne relies heavily on American authority in support of his submission as to the reach of s. 2(d), and in particular, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977). At issue there was the constitutionality of an agency shop provision negotiated in a collective agreement. Like Mr. Lavigne, the appellants in that case contended that the partial expenditure of their money by the union on political causes which they did not support infringed their constitutional rights under the First Amendment. The United States Supreme Court agreed and ordered the union to refund those portions of the dues which were earmarked for political causes.

84 Unlike the other sources upon which the appellant draws for support it is clear that the Supreme Court in Abood did indeed recognize a right not to associate. But while Abood is by far the strongest authority for the constitutional protection of such a right, this Court must exercise caution in adopting any decision, however compelling, of a foreign jurisdiction. This Court has consistently stated that even although it may undoubtedly benefit from the experience of American and other courts in adjudicating constitutional issues, it is by no means bound by that experience or the jurisprudence it generated. The uniqueness of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms flows not only from the distinctive structure of the Charter as compared to the American Bill of Rights but also from the special features of the Canadian cultural, historical, social and political tradition. Thus in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486, Lamer J. stressed the pre-eminent role of s. 1 of our Charter which differentiates our constitution from that of our American neighbours. And in McKinney, supra, the concept of government was examined from a peculiarly Canadian perspective in order to construe what was meant by the word "government" in s. 32 of the Charter.

85 These observations are particularly apposite in this appeal since, as regards freedom of association, our Charter stands in marked contrast to the American Bill of Rights. A freedom to associate is not explicitly recognized in the Constitution of the United States. Protection of this freedom has been made possible only through its judicial recognition as a derivative of the First Amendment guarantee of freedom of speech. The constitutional interlocking of freedom of speech and freedom of association in the United States emerges clearly from the various opinions rendered in Abood. For instance, Stewart J. wrote at p. 233: "Our decisions establish with unmistakable clarity that the freedom of an individual to associate for the purpose of advancing beliefs and ideas is protected by the First and fourteenth Amendments." In the view of the majority it was the compelled expression of political views which formed the essence of the violation…

86 Under the Charter, in contrast, there is no necessary connection between association and speech in order to engage s. 2(d)…

87 In R. v. Skinner, supra, it was likewise made clear that, while Charter guaranteed freedoms are mutually reinforcing, they remain separate and distinct. For Dickson C.J. it was implicit that the application of s. 2(d) was not triggered where it was evident that the legislation was primarily aimed at human activity covered by another Charter guarantee, in that case the expressive activity protected by s. 2(b). It was my view, on the other hand, that both s. 2(b) and s. 2(d) could be invoked so long as the activities involved were the kind these provisions were meant to safeguard against legislative intrusion. In spite of these differences of opinion it was accepted by all in Skinner that freedom of association serves a very different function from freedom of expression.

88 In summary, none of the authorities cited by the appellant provide unequivocal support for his position that a right not to associate should be recognized as encompassed by s. 2(d). Precedent aside, the appellant suggests that if s. 2(d) protects the right to associate, it should also as a matter of simple logic protect the converse, i.e., the right not to associate. This Court rejected reasoning like this in R. v. Turpin, 1989 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1296, where it was argued that if s. 11(f) of the Charter guaranteed the right to be tried by a jury and an accused could waive that right, then the section must necessarily also guarantee him the right to be tried by a judge alone. This argument was met with the following response at p. 1321:

> There is no constitutional right to a non-jury trial. There is a constitutional right to a jury trial and there may be a "right", using that term loosely, in an accused to waive the right to a jury trial. An accused may repudiate his or her s. 11(f) right but such repudiation does not, in my view, transform the constitutional right to a jury trial into a constitutional right to a non-jury trial so as to overcome the mandatory jury trial provisions of the Criminal Code.

89 To my mind, the appellant has not advanced sufficiently compelling reasons to justify extending freedom of association, having regard to its purpose, to include a freedom not to associate. In the words of Dickson J. in Big M Drug Mart, supra, at p. 344, this would be "to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question". The purpose behind s. 2(d) has already been fully and fairly discussed and there seem to me to be good reasons for affirming the interpretation given to the provision. For instance, Mr. Goudge argued that to include a negative freedom of association within the compass of s. 2(d) would set the scene for contests between the positive associational rights of union members and the negative associational rights of non-members. To construe the section in this way would place the Court in the impossible position of having to choose whose s. 2(d) rights should prevail. I agree with counsel for the respondent that an interpretation leading to such a result should be avoided if at all possible.

90 I should add that restricting the reach of s. 2(d) to positive associational rights best accords with a serious and non-trivial approach to Charter guarantees. In Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 143, this Court rejected the "mere distinction" approach to construing the meaning of "discrimination" in s. 15 of the Charter because to do so would trivialize the very important promise of equality embodied in that section. If every difference in treatment gave rise to a violation of s. 15, the real value of the guarantee of equality would be lost. A similar approach may be taken toward s. 2(d). It is a fact of our civilization as human beings that we are of necessity involved in associations not of our own choosing. That being so it is naive to suggest that the Constitution can or should enable us to extricate ourselves from all the associations we deem undesirable. Such extrication would be impossible and even to attempt it would make a mockery of the right contained in s. 2(d).

91 Several examples were cited in oral argument which demonstrate how a right not to associate would lead to absurd results. The most compelling of these was the analogy drawn to the mandatory payment of taxes. Following the line of logic which the negative freedom analysis commands, our system of taxation arguably brings all taxpayers into forced association with the political party in power, its policies and the uses to which our tax money is put. If it were the case that s. 2(d) protected such compelled associations, all taxpayers with a grievance to air would theoretically be able to come before the courts and insist that each tax expenditure be subjected to analysis under s. 1.

92 The appellant sought to distinguish this situation on the footing that citizens subject to taxation agree to be bound by such a system when they choose to be "members" of a community governed by democratically elected representatives. To my mind, there is no distinction in principle between our overall system of government and the role of taxation within it and the mini-democracy of the workplace. Under our labour relations regime all members of the bargaining unit have an equal opportunity to participate in choosing who is to represent them and to join the ranks of the union or not as they see fit. Further, as in our system of representative democracy, members of a bargaining unit may also decide to oust their bargaining agent if dissatisfied with its performance. Hence, the system of compulsory dues check-off is no different in principle from the system of taxation in a democracy and Mr. O'Connor's attempt to differentiate between these two regimes is without merit.

93 I think it clear that even if it were the business of the courts in upholding the Constitution to scrutinize tax expenditures, a proposition with which I have some considerable difficulty, it would be unwise to devote our limited judicial resources to such endeavours. Indeed, this is precisely the difficulty which has arisen since the decision in Abood, supra. In that case the United States Supreme Court expressly refrained from deciding which expenditures were or were not made for "legitimate" collective bargaining purposes, leaving it up to the courts below to determine these matters. As a consequence litigation of this kind has been going on for years: see, e.g., Ellis v. Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks, 466 U.S. 435 (1984). In short, the recognition of compelled contributions as constitutionally impermissible has given rise to an endless train of disputes in the United States.

94 In Canada, by contrast, the courts have thus far sought to deal with the practical problems to which the recognition of negative associational claims gives rise in a very different fashion. To avoid the "floodgates" problem Canadian courts have attempted to differentiate between serious and trivial violations of s. 2(d). For instance, in Merry v. Manitoba and Manitoba Medical Association (1989), 1989 CanLII 7322 (MB KB), 58 Man. R. (2d) 221 (Q.B.), provincial law required all licensed medical practitioners to contribute annual dues to the Association regardless of their membership status. Merry, a licensed medical doctor who was not a member of the Association, applied for a declaration that the legislation violated his s. 2(d) rights. He objected to having to pay dues to the Association because it supported certain causes to which Dr. Merry was vehemently opposed. Rather than accepting that a violation of s. 2(d) had been established and proceeding to analyze the justiciability of the expenditures under s. 1, the court drew a distinction between constitutionally significant and constitutionally insignificant compelled associations. Similarly, the Court of Appeal in the present case dealt with the issue of the appellant's right to refrain from associating with the Union in the same manner, by characterizing his claim as falling within the realm of the constitutionally insignificant.

95 In my view, neither the approach of the Canadian nor that of the American courts particularly commends itself. As soon as the Court is placed in the position of having to choose between so-called meaningful and trivial constitutional claims, an opening for the exercise of arbitrary line drawing has been created. On the other hand, it would be an abdication of this Court's responsibility to ensure access to justice if it turned a blind eye to the problems which recognition of a right not to associate will generate. Cognizant of these problems commentators have proposed various approaches designed to curb constitutional excesses. In the United States, for example, Professor Cantor in his article "Forced Payments to Service Institutions and Constitutional Interests in Ideological Non-Association" (1983), 36 Rutgers L. Rev. 3, argues at p. 25 that:

> ...moral affront or upset to conscience from being used as a financial instrument is not, by itself, a serious constitutional injury. Indeed, such incursions upon conscience through forced "support" of distasteful causes is an inevitable concomitant of living in an organized society. While it would be nice to avoid all spiritual and ideological affronts to persons forced by government to pay monies, the critical issue for first amendment purposes is whether the payor is required to associate with or appear to endorse in some fashion a distasteful cause selected by government. [Emphasis in original.]

96 In Canada, similar limitations have been proposed in relation to s. 2(d). Professor Etherington, for example, has argued in his article, "Freedom of Association and Compulsory Union Dues: Towards a Purposive Conception of a Freedom to not Associate" (1987), 19 Ottawa L. Rev. 1, that what lies at the heart of the claim not to associate are interests in the preservation of the democratic political system and in the protection of individual liberty. Professor Etherington envisions four ways in which these interests might be endangered by forced contributions which a freedom of non-association should guard against: (1) government establishment of, or support for, particular political causes; (2) impairment of individual freedom to join or associate with causes of his or her choosing; (3) imposition of ideological conformity; and (4) personal identification of the individual payor with causes which he or she does not support.

97 In my view, Professor Etherington's and Professor Cantor's analyses both contain necessary and desirable limitations which must be affixed to any negative right to associate. And indeed, adoption of either approach would minimize the problems to which negative association rights can give rise. However, I remain of the view that s. 2(d) should not be expanded to protect the right not to associate. As Mr. Nelson suggested, other Charter guaranteed rights and freedoms adequately protect the type of interests which underlie claims based on a right not to associate. As was evident throughout this appeal, the real harm produced by compelled association is not the fact of the association itself but the enforced support of views, opinions or actions one does not share or approve. To hold that s. 2(d) does not include the right not to associate does not leave those who do not wish to associate without redress for these harms. Sections 2(b) and 7 of the Charter, in particular, would seem to me to be available in appropriate cases.

98 Having found that s. 2(d) includes only the positive freedom to associate, the question remains whether Mr. Lavigne's freedom of association has been violated in this case. The appellant has not been prevented from forming or joining associations of his choosing. It is my view, therefore, that the appellant's right to freely associate has not been infringed and this ground of appeal must accordingly fail.

99 I should perhaps add that even if this Court were to recognize a right not to associate under s. 2(d), I would still hold that this right has not been infringed in the present case. My main reason for so concluding is that, if a negative right does indeed exist, it surely can be no broader in scope than the positive right to associate previously defined by this Court.

100 Beginning with the Alberta Reference and culminating most recently in the decision in P.I.P.S., supra, this Court has repeatedly stated that s. 2(d) does not protect the objects of an association. Unions have accordingly been denied constitutional protection for activities which are central, indeed fundamental, to their effective functioning within our system of collective bargaining. Mr. Lavigne submits, however, that while the objects of an association are irrelevant to the claims of collectivities of working people, they may legitimately be taken into account when assessing the claim of an individual who objects to being associated with the objects of such a collectivity. I do not believe it is open to the Court to engage in one-sided justice of this kind. Since s. 2(d) protects both individuals and collectivities, if the objects of an association cannot be invoked to advance the constitutional claims of unions, then neither, it seems to me, can they be invoked in order to undermine them. Even although the appellant has framed his claim in terms of his compelled association with the Union simpliciter (i.e., in terms of his having been forced to pay dues), it is clear that his only real objection is to certain forms of union expenditure. Mr. Lavigne's claim is thus inextricably connected to the objects of the association, a factor which this Court has consistently stated has no place in s. 2(d), and not merely to the existence of the association.

9.2 Excerpts from Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, 1991 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 211, per La Forest J., paras 232-241

La Forest J

232. It is clear that the Rand formula cannot be attacked on the ground that it interferes with any right the appellant may have to associate with others in the pursuit of collective activities or common goals. If the formula can, of itself, be said to violate s. 2(d) of the Charter, it is because it interferes with what has been described as the negative aspect of freedom of association -- the freedom not to associate with others. Therefore, the initial question is whether the scope of s. 2(d) includes freedom from compelled association.

233 The historical origins, purposes and meaning of the s. 2(d) Charter guarantee were reviewed thoroughly by this Court in Reference Re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313 (the Alberta Reference), in the context of a union's right to act collectively in launching a strike. The fundamental nature of the guarantee as articulated by the members of this Court echoed the classic statement of freedom of association made over a century ago by Alexis de Tocqueville in Democracy in America (1945), vol. I, at p. 196:

> The most natural privilege of man, next to the right of acting for himself, is that of combining his exertions with those of his fellow creatures and of acting in common with them. The right of association therefore appears ... almost as inalienable in its nature as the right of personal liberty. No legislator can attack it without impairing the foundations of society.

In a complex modern democracy, it is nothing less than imperative that the individual be afforded the freedom to join with others in the pursuit of common goals.

234 The essence of the freedom is the protection of the individual's interest in self-actualization and fulfillment that can be realized only through combination with others. McIntyre J., with whom the majority agreed as to the characterization of the s. 2(d) right, made this clear in the Alberta Reference, supra, at p. 395:

> While freedom of association like most other fundamental rights has no single purpose or value, at its core rests a rather simple proposition: the attainment of individual goals, through the exercise of individual rights, is generally impossible without the aid and cooperation of others. "Man, as Aristotle observed, is a 'social animal, formed by nature for living with others', associating with his fellows both to satisfy his desire for social intercourse and to realize common purposes." (L.J. MacFarlane, The Theory and Practice of Human Rights (1985), p. 82.)

It is important to recognize that while it is true, as Wilson J. states in her reasons, at p. 251, that "freedom of association is meant to protect the collective pursuit of common goals", such protection is afforded ultimately to further individual aspirations. Association is but "an extension of individual freedom": Thomas Emerson, "Freedom of Association and Freedom of Expression" (1964), 74 Yale L.J. 1, at p. 4.

235 This is not to deny, however, that there is a community interest embodied in the freedom of association. This interest might be expressed as the interest of society at large in the contributions in political, economic, social and cultural matters which can be made only if people are free to work in concert. In addition, it is axiomatic that there is a community interest in sustaining democracy, an essential element of which is associational activity. The question, then, is whether the protection of this community interest and the antecedent individual interest requires that freedom from compelled association be recognized under s. 2(d) of the Charter.

236 In my view, the answer is clearly yes. Forced association will stifle the individual's potential for self-fulfillment and realization as surely as voluntary association will develop it. Moreover, society cannot expect meaningful contribution from groups or organizations that are not truly representative of their memberships' convictions and free choice. Instead, it can expect that such groups and organizations will, overall, have a negative effect on the development of the larger community. One need only think of the history of social stagnation in Eastern Europe and of the role played in its development and preservation by officially established "free" trade unions, peace movements and cultural organizations to appreciate the destructive effect forced association can have upon the body politic. Recognition of the freedom of the individual to refrain from association is a necessary counterpart of meaningful association in keeping with democratic ideals.

> Freedom can primarily be characterized by the absence of coercion or constraint. If a person is compelled by the state or the will of another to a course of action or inaction which he would not otherwise have chosen, he is not acting of his own volition and he cannot be said to be truly free. One of the major purposes of the Charter is to protect, within reason, from compulsion or restraint. Coercion includes not only such blatant forms of compulsion as direct commands to act or refrain from acting on pain of sanction, coercion includes indirect forms of control which determine or limit alternative courses of conduct available to others. Freedom in a broad sense embraces both the absence of coercion and constraint, and the right to manifest beliefs and practices. Freedom means that, subject to such limitations as are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others, no one is to be forced to act in a way contrary to his beliefs or his conscience. [Emphasis added.]

It is clear that a conception of freedom of association that did not include freedom from forced association would not truly be "freedom" within the meaning of the Charter.

238 This brings into focus the critical point that freedom from forced association and freedom to associate should not be viewed in opposition, one "negative" and the other "positive". These are not distinct rights, but two sides of a bilateral freedom which has as its unifying purpose the advancement of individual aspirations. The bilateral nature of the associational right is explicitly recognized in Art. 20 of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, which provides as follows:

> 1. Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and association.
> 2. No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

This construction of the associational right in two reflective strands serves to recognize the often over-looked potential for coercion in association. Governmental tyranny can manifest itself not only in constraints on association, but in forced association. There is no logical inconsistency in recognizing this reality. Nor do I accept the proposition that including the right to be free from compelled association within the reach of s. 2(d) will weaken or "trivialize" the cherished right to be free to form associations. It will do nothing but strengthen it. Moreover, the purposive approach to Charter interpretation demands such a result.

239 Finally, that some aspects of the freedom may be protected by ss. 7, 2(a) or 2(b) of the Charter, to cite the most obvious possibilities, should not dissuade us from giving full meaning to s. 2(d). All of the liberties guaranteed by the Charter are particular aspects of the broader freedom we enjoy in Canada. As the Court noted in R. v. Lyons, 1987 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 309, at p. 326:

> Before entering into a detailed discussion of the issues, it may be useful to note that this case exemplifies the rather obvious point that the rights and freedoms protected by the Charter are not insular and discrete (see, e.g., my comments in this regard in R. v. Rahey, 1987 CanLII 52 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 588). Rather, the Charter protects a complex of interacting values, each more or less fundamental to the free and democratic society that is Canada (R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, at p. 136), and the particularization of rights and freedoms contained in the Charter thus represents a somewhat artificial, if necessary and intrinsically worthwhile attempt to structure and focus the judicial exposition of such rights and freedoms. The necessity of structuring the discussion should not, however, lead us to overlook the importance of appreciating the manner in which the amplification of the content of each enunciated right and freedom imbues and informs our understanding of the value structure sought to be protected by the Charter as a whole and, in particular, of the content of the other specific rights and freedoms it embodies.

Accordingly, a person is not deprived of protection under a provision of the Charter merely because protection may also be derived under another. The rights overlap in defining Canadian society, and I see no reason for depriving a litigant of success because he has chosen one provision that legitimately appears to cover the matter of which he or she complains, rather than another. That would often be the effect if the individual rights and freedoms were construed as discrete rather than overlapping.

240 It does not necessarily follow, however, that s. 2(d) of the Charter protects us from any association we may wish to avoid. In a word, I do not think the freedom of association is necessarily a right to isolation. As a matter of metaphysical and sociological reality, "no man is an island", and the Charter must be taken to recognize this. At the very fundamental level, it could certainly not have been intended that s. 2(d) protect us against the association with others that is a necessary and inevitable part of membership in a democratic community, the existence of which the Charter clearly assumes. Thus, it could not be said that s. 2(d) entitles us to object to the association with the government of Canada and its policies which the payment of taxes would seem to entail given the comprehensive nature of its authority and functions. In Justice Holmes' phrase, the state is "the one club to which we all belong" and its activities will inevitably associate us with policies and groups with which we may not wish to be associated: see Robert Horn in Groups and the Constitution (1971), at p. 3.

241. Realistically, too, as I will more fully explain later, the organization of our society compels us to be associated with others in many activities and interests that justify state regulation of these associations. Thus I doubt that s. 2(d) can entitle us to be free of all legal obligations that flow from membership in a family. And the same can be said of the workplace. In short, there are certain associations which are accepted because they are integral to the very structure of society. Given the complexity and expansive mandate of modern government, it seems clear that some degree of involuntary association beyond the very basic foundation of the nation state will be constitutionally acceptable, where such association is generated by the workings of society in pursuit of the common interest. However, as will be seen, state compulsion in these areas may require assessment against the nature of the underlying associational activity the state has chosen to regulate.

McLachlin J

299. The next question is whether s. 2(d) includes a right not to associate. While it is not necessary for my purposes to resolve that issue, I am inclined to the view that the interest protected by s. 2(d) goes beyond being free from state-enforced isolation, as contended by the interveners OFL and CLC. In some circumstances, forced association is arguably as dissonant with self-actualization through associational activity as is forced expression. For example, the compulsion to join the ruling party in order to have any real opportunity of advancement is a hallmark of a totalitarian state. Such compulsion might well amount to enforced ideological conformity, effectively depriving the individual of the freedom to associate with other groups whose values he or she [page344] might prefer. As La Forest J. suggests, at p. 318, "Forced association will stifle the individual's potential for self-fulfillment and realization as surely as voluntary association will develop it."

300 In my view, freedom from compelled association, whatever its ambit, could not extend to the payments here at issue. Freedom not to associate, like freedom to associate, must be based on the value of individual self-actualization through relations with others. The justification for a right not to associate would appear to be the individual's interest in being free from enforced association with ideas and values to which he or she does not voluntarily subscribe. For the purposes of this case, I shall refer to this as the interest in freedom from coerced ideological conformity.

301 It follows from this definition that negative associational activity falling under s. 2(d) is not to be determined by the type of the coerced activity impugned (e.g. mandatory payments), but by whether the activity associates the individual with ideas and values to which he or she does not voluntarily subscribe. This approach is similar to that taken toward the right of expression in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, where it was held that the test for whether conduct falls within s. 2(b) of the Charter was not the activity per se (e.g. speech or conduct), but whether the activity was one intended to convey meaning.

302 If one accepts that the interest protected by the right not to associate is the interest in being free from enforced ideological conformity, then one cannot assume that payments fall within s. 2(d) simply because they be used to support a group cause. It is necessary to go further and ask whether the payments are such that they associate the individual with ideas and values to which he or she does not voluntarily subscribe. Applying an objective standard, the final test is this: are the payments such that they may rea sonably be regarded as associating the individual with ideas and values to which the individual does not voluntarily subscribe? This is not to suggest that public identification is an essential prerequisite to any involuntary association; the point, rather, is that before any involuntary association can be said to arise, there must be activity which can fairly be adjudged to bring an individual into association with ideas or values to which he or she does not voluntarily subscribe.

B. The Nature of the Payments

303 As asserted by Wilson J. in Edmonton Journal, context is vital in determining whether an impugned activity falls under a Charter guarantee. It is therefore necessary to consider the nature of the payment at issue in this case and the circumstances in which the issue arises.

304 The payments in question are compelled under legislation applying the Rand formula. The Rand formula has been part of Canadian labour relations for many years. It was designed to resolve the problem of persons such as Lavigne, whose employer contracts with a union of which they do not wish to be a member. The formula permits individual employees to choose not to belong to the union, but stipulates that they must pay union dues, in order to avoid the unfairness of giving non-union employees a "free ride". In essence, while not a member of the union, the person who opts out is required to pay dues on the basis that he or she benefits from the activities of the union on behalf of all employees.

305 The need for compromises such as the Rand formula arises from the fact that Canadian labour relations generally permit only one union to represent all employees in a designated work grouping. This may be contrasted with the quite different system prevailing in parts of Europe, where a worker may choose between several different unions. In a system which permits only one union, there may be workers who do not wish to associate themselves with it. The Rand formula allows a worker to choose whether or not to be a member of the union, but requires that in any event he or she pay dues. As such, it represents a carefully crafted balance between the interest of the majority in the union and individuals who may not wish to belong to the union. (It should not be overlooked in considering the dynamics of this balance that the individual members comprising the majority of the union may have a constitutionally protected right under s. 2(d) to pursue activities with which certain members may not wish to associate themselves.)

306 It is against this background that the payments at issue on this appeal must be viewed.

II. Does the Charter Apply?

308 Assuming that a right not to associate exists, it follows from what I have already said that its purpose must be to protect the interest of individuals against enforced ideological conformity. Does the requirement that Lavigne make payments to the Union, which the Union may thereafter spend in part in support of causes which Lavigne does not support, fall within this interest?

309 In my view, it does not. The test, as set out above, is whether the payments can reasonably be regarded as associating the individual with ideas and values to which the individual does not voluntarily subscribe. The payments here at issue do not meet this test because under the Rand formula there is no link between the mandatory payment and conformity with the ideas and values to which Lavigne objects.

310 The fact that one pays money which may ultimately be expended in support of a cause does not necessarily associate one with the cause. In buying an automobile, for example, one does not by paying money to the dealer indicate any support for the way the dealer or the manufacturer of the vehicle may spend the portions of the price it retains as profit. The same applies to a payment to a telephone utility for a service some might regard as essential. In both situations, the payment is devoid of ideological content. It is merely an exchange for something one wants. Similarly, in paying taxes, one is not endorsing the purposes to which the government may devote those taxes. The transaction does not connote association on the part of the payor with the causes the government may support.

311. Mandatory payments under the Rand formula fall into the same category. The whole purpose of the formula is to permit a person who does not wish to associate himself or herself with the union to desist from doing so. The individual does this by declining to become a member of the union. The individual thereby dissociates himself or herself from the activities of the union. Fairness dictates that those who benefit from the union's endeavours must provide funds for the maintenance of the union. But the payment is by the very nature of the formula bereft of any connotation that the payor supports the particular purposes to which the money is put. By the analogy with government, the payor is paying by reason of an assumed or imposed obligation arising from this employment, just as a taxpayer pays taxes by reason of an assumed or imposed obligation arising from living in this country. By the analogy of commerce, the payor is simply paying for services and benefits received.

A group of contractors who were charged with hiring employees that were not certified to work on a construction project contrary to s. 119.1 of the Quebec Act Respecting Labour Relations, Vocational Training and Manpower Management in the Construction Industry defended against this charge by arguing that those employees could not obtain certification without registering with a trade union, and that this compelled association violated those workers' s 2(d) freedom of association rights. At all levels of court, the legislation was found to be constitutional. At the Supreme Court of Canada, the majority held that s 2(d) rights were not infringed since the obligation to unionize was strictly limited to an obligation to be part of a union, vote on a representative, and pay union dues – there was no evidence of forced ideological conformity. Even if s 2(d) was violated, the majority held that it could be saved by s 1. Justice L'Heureux-Dubé agreed that s 2(d) was not violated, but echoed Justice Wilson's opinion in Lavigne (which she had concurred with) that s 2(d) does not protect the right not to associate. Justice Iacobucci concurred with the majority in finding that s 2(d) includes a negative component, that right not to associate was infringed in this case, and the infringement could be justified under s 1. Chief Justice McLachlin as well as Justices Major, Bastarache, and Binnie dissented holding that s 2(d) contains a negative right not to associate and that it was infringed by the legislation and could not be saved by section 1.

Lebel J

163 The case at bar offers the possibility for an evolution in the relationship between the Charter and labour law. As has been seen above, the present case involves an attack on some forms of union security clauses. Under many shapes and forms, such arrangements often provide for an obligation to obtain or maintain union membership in order to retain or obtain employment. They may also address the financing of union activities. They may combine provisions relating to the checking off of union dues with others concerning the maintenance of union membership. A well-known and common form of union security, the Rand formula, which was discussed in the Lavigne case, has even become a standard part of the labour laws of some provinces, for example, under the Quebec Labour Code, R.S.Q., c. C-27, s. 47. Under this formula, union dues are withheld from the pay of an employee, whether or not he or she belongs to the union. (For an overview of those clauses, see R. P. Gagnon, L. LeBel and P. Verge, Droit du travail (2nd ed. 1991), at pp. 529-30.)

205 The present case presents a more difficult problem than the application of the Rand formula canvassed in Lavigne. The Construction Act imposes an obligation to join one of five unions. The question becomes whether this fact per se triggers the negative component and becomes a breach of s. 2(d) of the Charter that must be justified under s. 1. If we adopt this route, it might well mean that all forms of compulsory membership provided for or even authorized under statute would be open to challenge under the Charter.

206 A proper analysis of Lavigne and of the nature of the constitutional guarantee does not allow for such a result. Although differing in some respects, McLachlin J.'s and La Forest J.'s reasons both refused to view the negative right as a simple mirror image of the positive right of association. Both Justices accepted that the nature of a workplace and the status of the persons participating in its life and experience created associations that became unavoidable or "compelled". The use of the notion of ideological conformity by McLachlin J. or La Forest J.'s concerns for the safeguarding of broad liberty interests acknowledged the need for association, as well as the need to join, which may be required in some aspects of life in the workplace. At the same time, they intended to meet the need to safeguard democratic values and to foster them in the area of labour relations. Their reasons reflect the view that some forms of compelled association might breach s. 2(d) of the Charter if the fact of association imposes on an individual values and views of the world antithetical to his or her own.

207 The Court found a balance in Lavigne. This balance is now at stake in the present case. The majority of the Court in Lavigne found that there was a negative right not to associate. Although it acknowledged the need for such a right, it accepted a democratic rationale for putting internal limits on the right not to associate. La Forest J. regarded the Constitution's presumption of democracy as a reason for concluding that forced associations which flow from the functioning of democracy cannot be severed with the aid of the Charter (pp. 317 and 320-21). Democracy is not primarily about withdrawal, but fundamentally about participation in the life and management of democratic institutions like unions.

208 An approach that fails to read in some inner limits and restrictions to a right not to associate would deny the individual the benefits arising from an association. This Court has maintained, since the labour law trilogy of 1987, that the right of association intends to foster individual autonomy and attaches to individuals. At the same time, the exercise of the right of association also reinforces the ability of an individual to convey ideas and opinions, through a group voice, as the Court acknowledged in the Libman case, while discussing political and ideological associations. It should not be viewed as an inferior right, barely tolerated and narrowly circumscribed.

K. Freedom of Association and the Employment Relationship

209 In the present case, it must be acknowledged that the law challenged by the appellants legislates a form of union shop. All construction workers must elect one of five union groups as their collective bargaining representative. Their union dues go to these groups or their affiliates. If the appellants' arguments were to be accepted, the answer to the constitutional question would be short; the right not to associate would have been infringed and the law would not pass constitutional muster. A more refined approach elicits a different answer.

210 In spite of the acknowledgement of the existence of a right not to associate, the guarantee of freedom of association is not engaged by the legislative scheme challenged in the present appeal. Freedom of association, even with its negative component, does not express a right to isolation, as La Forest J. observed in Lavigne. To this I would add there is a unique quality of association connected to individual self-realization. It gives the associates, "the partners", a common strength that enables the furtherance of individual goals and aspirations in a way that escapes the efforts of a man or woman acting alone. The birth and development of a strong and diverse civil society in modern democracy bears witness to that special quality of a social activity. The community, as well as the individual, benefits from it. One cannot presume that the Charter addresses only the relationship between isolated individuals and the state. It is also concerned with the interaction of groups and "mini" societies within the broader Canadian society. The incorporation of a guarantee of freedom of association in the Charter signals the strong societal interest in a broad interpretation of freedom of association, although always in accord with the democratic values of Canada. It signals the importance of the social element of man's self-actualization. It demonstrates the importance of communication and of cooperation between human beings.

211 As La Forest J. stated in the Lavigne case, some forms of association arise from the human condition. Others find their source in the necessities and realities of life. Relationships born and organized around the workplace may create a need for a stronger bond between groups and persons undergoing the same experiences while at work.

212 As this Court has acknowledged, the employment relationship rests on an imbalance of power between ordinary workers and those who employ them. The power to direct the work and fix the conditions of employment is usually exercised unilaterally by employers. Entering into an employment relationship means accepting the existence and exercise of that power. Often, especially during periods of economic downturn or unemployment, the employee has little option but to accept what is offered.

213 The Civil Code of Québec identifies clearly the nature of the employment relationship when it defines the contract of employment as an agreement based on the acceptance of the authority of the employer:

> 2085. A contract of employment is a contract by which a person, the employee, undertakes for a limited period to do work for remuneration, according to the instructions and under the direction or control of another person, the employer.

214 Professors P. Verge and G. Vallée, in a recent study of the principles of labour law, stated that the fundamental nature of the employment relationship, whatever its form and shape, rests on an inequality which reflects an imbalance of economic power. Subordination and inequality remain at the core of the relationship:

> [translation] Therefore, although the employment relationship may be reflected in different status levels within the company, it is nonetheless still an employment relationship. As a rule, in spite of variations in the length of employment or in the relationship itself, or even in the identity of the ultimate user of the work, the subordination to the employer which is characteristic of the relationship is still present. Viewed subjectively -- that is, in relation to the overall situation of the employee -- the insecurity of the employment in fact intensifies the employee's economic dependency on any employer for which he or she might work.

L. The History of Labour Relations

215 The existence of this fundamental inequality has provoked the long and continuing search for a new balance in labour relations. A common instrument has been the association of persons seeking to agree and thus acquire a degree of control over their working conditions. Since the industrial revolution, association and the right to associate have been viewed as critical tools in the fight for a more stable and sometimes more equitable employment relationship. (For a short outline of the history of labour law, see A. W. R. Carrothers, E. E. Palmer and W. B. Rayner, Collective Bargaining Law in Canada (2nd ed. 1986), at pp. 3-30; Gagnon, LeBel and Verge, supra, at pp. 16-32; G. W. Adams, Canadian Labour Law (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), at pp. 1-1 to 1-11.)

216 Nevertheless, the right of association faces an inner tension in the striving to create a different work environment. The refusal of some to join the group weakens the efforts to achieve the goals of the majority. For these reasons, compelled associations in many forms became a reality of labour relations in several countries including Canada. Various forms of union security clauses ranging from the obligation to pay union dues to the obligation to hire only members of a certain union group were included in collective agreements and applied. In different ways, these arrangements attempted to resolve the tension and contradiction between the two competing aspects of the right of association.

218 The Construction Act imposes an obligation to join a union group. The obligation remains, nevertheless, a very limited one. It boils down to the obligation to designate a collective bargaining representative, to belong to it for a given period of time, and to pay union dues. The Act does not require more. At the same time, the Act provides protection against past, present and potential abuses of union power. Unions are deprived of any direct control over employment in the industry. They may not set up or operate an office or union hall (ss. 104 and 119 of the Act). No discrimination is allowed against the members of different unions. Provided they hold the required competency certificates, all workers are entitled to work in the construction industry without regard to their particular union affiliation. Specific guarantees against discrimination are found in ss. 94 and 102. Section 96 grants members clear rights of information and participation in union life. The law allows any construction worker to change his or her union affiliation, at the appropriate time. As it stands, the law does not impose on construction workers much more than the bare obligation to belong to a union. It does not create any mechanism to enforce ideological conformity.

219 In Lavigne, both La Forest and McLachlin JJ. limited the right not to associate when certain liberty interests were affected. Their comments also imply that such liberty interests, no matter how broad, must be asserted and identified. In the Lavigne case, the appellant claimed, although unsuccessfully as it turned out, that some union activities in support of political and social causes breached his right not to associate. He did not ground his case on a bare assertion that he could not accept financing a union or joining it, without more.

220 As appears from the evidence, the situation is completely different in the case at bar. No witness came forward to assert that he felt or believed that joining a union associated him with activities he disapproved of, or with opinions he did not share. In order to trigger the negative guarantee in this case, ideological conformity or breach of another liberty interest would have to be found in the fact that unions, as other groups belonging to or participating in a democratic society, sometimes engage in public debate, take positions on issues concerning their members, or comment on broad social or political questions.

221 Our Court would have to presume that, because they take part in social debate, unions in Quebec or elsewhere act in breach of the democratic values of our society, and of the liberty interests and the freedom of opinion and expression of their members. Still, if union members assert such a concern, it may have to be addressed. Accommodation may become necessary to safeguard the democratic character of unions and of the society within which they operate. For example, concerns about equality rights may impose a review of some union practices and even of specific provisions of labour agreements. (See C. Brunelle, Discrimination et obligation d'accommodement en milieu de travail syndiqué (2001), at pp. 236 et seq.) It would be rash to attempt an exhaustive definition of all situations and cases where liberty interests falling within the scope of the negative right would have to be accommodated. Such liberty interests must, at least, be advanced, which was not the case in the courts below and in this Court.

222 The record supporting the appeal appears sketchy about the reasons why construction workers would object to belonging to a union. In the evidence introduced at trial before Judge Bonin, in the Court of Québec, the appellants offered a few witnesses. Most of them were either contractors or promoters, although a few construction workers gave evidence. In general, these witnesses voiced deep disagreement with the legislative and regulatory scheme in force in the Quebec construction industry. The employers affirmed that the rules governing employment and hiring prevented them from hiring whom they wanted. They also believed that the Office de la construction referred them incompetent workers. The construction workers complained about the absence of a right of free entry into the employment market. Some witnesses expressed their concern about the Quebec laws imposing strict professional certification on contractors and they expressed a preference for a freer regulatory environment.

223 No evidence was introduced about union practices that would impose values or opinions on their members. No evidence was offered about the internal life of construction unions or about the constraints they might seek to impose upon members. There was no indication that free expression is limited by union activities of such a nature that forced association would trigger the guarantee of s. 2(d). The nature of a particular legislative or regulatory system, in an important part of the economy like the construction industry, may certainly be subject to criticisms or political discussions. Nevertheless, personal disagreements with the extent of a strict regulatory system do not suffice to mount a successful Charter challenge. It should now be clear that the mere fact of compelled association will not, by itself, involve a breach of the Charter. More is needed in order to trigger the negative component of s. 2(d).

M. Evidence of Ideological Coercion

224 May the Court presume ideological coercion from the fact that, at times, Quebec unions, like other groups, have advocated particular causes? They have expressed varying, and often conflicting, views on social, economic and political issues. Even amongst themselves, they have differed about the direction of society, its priorities and those of the labour movement. The existence of those orientations, nevertheless, does not mean that ideological, political or philosophical conformity was being imposed on Quebec construction workers and that this fact in itself triggers the negative right not to associate and hence a prima facie violation of s. 2(d) of the Charter.

225 In order to reach such a result, the Court would have to take judicial notice of the presumed ideological bent of Quebec unions. The Court would have to judicially notice that ideological orientations or the adoption of social and political causes within the union movement mean that a form of intellectual conformity is being imposed by unions on their members, and that the liberty interests of those members are being jeopardized. Judicial notice certainly has its place in constitutional adjudication. Recently, in R. v. Find, [2001] 1 SCR 863, 2001 SCC 32, McLachlin C.J. reflected on its role. The key to judicial notice which emerges in Find will be a distinction between facts and inferences to be drawn from these facts. In Find, the facts regarding sexual assault were uncontested and accepted by judicial notice, but the inferences from those facts on which the appellant sought to rely, namely, that they led to widespread bias against those accused of sexual assault, could not be judicially noticed (para. 86). (See also Law, supra, at paras. 77 and 79, per Iacobucci J.)

226 The fact that unions intervene in political social debate is well known and well documented and might be the object of judicial notice. Indeed, our Court acknowledged the importance of this role in the Lavigne case. Several ideological currents have criss-crossed the history of the Quebec labour movement. It was never unanimous about its direction, even about the need to enter the political arena or to involve itself in broader societal issues beyond the horizon of the bargaining unit. (See P. Verge and G. Murray, Le droit et les syndicats: aspects du droit syndical québécois (1991), at p. 225.) These authors underscore the weakness of the formal links between the Quebec unions and political parties (pp. 238-39). They add that it is impossible to determine whether union political positions had any real influence on their members (p. 239). More recent studies of voting attitudes seem to indicate that, in fact, Canadian unions exert very little influence on the voting behaviour of their members, as at least one Canadian political party, the New Democratic Party, has found repeatedly to its sorrow (see A. Blais et al., "Making Sense of the Vote in the 2000 Canadian Election", paper prepared for the Annual Meeting of the Canadian Political Science Association, Quebec City, May 2001).

227 Taking judicial notice of the fact that Quebec unions have a constant ideology, act in constant support of a particular cause or policy, and seek to impose that ideology on their members seems far more controversial. It would require a leap of faith and logic, absent a proper factual record on the question. The assertion seems to rest on the tenuous line that, although we do not have any evidence to this effect, coercion on the individuals should be inferred from "ideological" trends present in the labour movement. This "fact" is unlike issues of notorious discrimination against certain groups in Canadian society, and unlike the disadvantage experienced by women and children after a divorce, both facts of which this Court has taken judicial notice (see R. v. Williams, 1998 CanLII 782 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 1128, and Willick v. Willick, 1994 CanLII 28 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 670). In this case, it cannot be said that some form of politicization and ideological conformity which allegedly flows from the political and social orientation of the labour movement is self-evident. Instead, such views evidence stereotypes about the union movement as authoritarian and undemocratic, and conjure images of workers marching in lock step without any free choice or free will, under the watchful eyes of union bosses and their goon squads.

228 In fact, democracy undergirds the particular form of union security provided for by the Construction Act. Throughout the conflicts and difficulties that marred the history of the construction industry, a critical flaw of the regime appeared to be the lack of participation in the life of unions and the need to reestablish and maintain member control over their affairs. While it also facilitated the evaluation of the representativeness of the unions, the obligation to choose and join a union answered this critical need in a way that a different union security arrangement, like the Rand Formula, would not have addressed. The dues check-off scheme, like the Rand formula, disposes of the free rider problem, but the employee remains outside the life of the union. In other security arrangements, a member may choose to remain aloof and refrain from attending meetings, voting for union officers and taking part in discussions. Affiliation means that he or she has, at least, gained the ability to influence the life of the association whether or not he or she decides to exercise this right.

229 In the case of the construction unions, a heightened degree of participation in the life of the associations appeared necessary in order to foster union democracy. At the same time, the legislative formula left workers a choice among the various groups active in the construction industry. These groups had held widely different views on the role of labour unions in society. Their orientations represented a broad spectrum of opinions, both about the orientation of society and about the functions of unions. The legislative solution represented an answer to some of the pressing problems that the Quebec construction industry had been confronted with during several years. The degree of relative peace and equilibrium reached by the time the present case started bears witness to the basic soundness of this legislative choice, which expresses a deep concern for democratic values. One might think that an absolute right to withdraw at will, even with payment of service fees for unions, would not preserve and develop the internal democracy of union groups in the same manner. It would deprive the dues-paying worker of any influence on the life of the union and on the determination of working conditions meant to be extended to the entire industry or a sector thereof, as rules of public order.

230 Union members seem to act very independently from their union when it comes to the expression of their political choices and, even more so, to their voting preferences, come election time. Existence of attempted ideological conformity, let alone its realization, seems highly doubtful. In addition, in Quebec, the labour movement faces particular constraints flowing from the strict legislation on the financing of political parties and referendums. The Election Act, R.S.Q., c. E-3.3, forbids contributions by persons other than electors which, by definition, are not corporations, unions or associations: J. P. Boyer, Money and Message: The Law Governing Election Financing, Advertising, Broadcasting and Campaigning in Canada (1983), at pp. 219-40. The same limitations apply under the Referendum Act, R.S.Q., c. C-64.1. (See also Libman, supra.)

231 In this context, there is simply no evidence to support judicial notice of Quebec unions ideologically coercing their members. Such an inference presumes that unions hold a single ideology and impose it on their rank and file, including the complainants in this case. Such an inference would amount to little more than an unsubstantiated stereotype.

232 The appellants have based their case on the notion of some absolute right to refuse to associate and on their strong disagreement with the complex and extensive regulatory system governing the construction industry in Quebec. However, they presented no evidence that the legislation imposes a form of ideological conformity or threatens a liberty interest protected by the Charter, which is necessary to infringe the right not to associate under s. 2(d). The evidence does not even indicate whether unions are engaged in causes and activities that the appellants disapprove of. It is not a subject where judicial knowledge could and should replace proper evidentiary records unless the fact of joining a union would be, of itself, evidence of a particular ideological bent. One would have to presume that, because Quebec unions, as well as many other groups, take positions on social, economic and political issues, they impose an ideological coercion on their members or, in some way, impair the liberty interests protected by the Charter. The well-known fact of trade union participation in public life in Canada does not demonstrate that every union worker joining a union under a union security arrangement should be considered prima facie a victim of a breach of the Charter. After all, in Lavigne, our Court has accepted that the participation of labour unions in public life is an important aspect of their societal role. The application of the negative right not to associate may not rest on a generalized suspicion of the nature of unions and their management or internal life. Nor should the right of association be viewed primarily as an empty shell devoid of any positive or substantive meaning. Ironically, if another view prevails, what would be left in the Charter, at least in the field of labour relations, would be essentially a negative freedom not to associate. It would be used to deprive, inasmuch as possible, associations of workers of their effectiveness in the workplace and of their influence in society.

(1) American Jurisprudence

242 As explained by Dickson C.J. in Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), supra, at pp. 344 et seq., the American Constitution does not explicitly protect the freedom of association. This right is seen as primarily derived from the First Amendment, which provides:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

243 The United States Supreme Court has also cited the liberty and due process clauses of the Fifth and the Fourteenth Amendments and even the Ninth Amendment in generating a constitutional freedom to associate. Nevertheless, the source of the right to associate was usually to be found in the First Amendment, as a corollary of freedom of speech.

244 While the United States Supreme Court has been willing to recognize a right not to associate, also based on the rights of free speech and belief, the history of its jurisprudence shows that the court has not invalidated every form of compelled association. It has attempted to draw a distinction between traditional union functions and political activities and has sought to protect the right of individual members to restrict the use of their dues in respect of causes they disapprove of. A more exhaustive review of this jurisprudence would not be useful, and I will only outline its most important features.

245 The Supreme Court refused to invalidate the provisions of a state constitution that restrained or prohibited some forms of closed shop or union shop (Lincoln Federal Labor Union v. Northwestern Iron & Metal Co., 335 U.S. 525 (1949); American Federation of Labor v. American Sash & Door Co., 335 U.S. 538 (1949)). On the other hand, the court found that the provisions of the Railway Labour Act which authorized a form of union shop did not infringe the First Amendment, absent evidence that it deprived employees of their freedom of thought and conscience: Railway Employes' Department v. Hanson, 351 U.S. 225 (1956), at p. 238.

246 In a later case, it held that the compulsory withholding of union dues from wages was only a device to compel otherwise "free riders" to share in the cost of negotiating and administering collective agreements. Yet such compulsory dues should not be used to compel employees to support causes that they oppose: International Association of Machinists v. Street, 367 U.S. 740 (1961). (See also Brotherhood of Railway and Steamship Clerks v. Allen, 373 U.S. 113 (1963).) In Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977), the Supreme Court revisited the problem of the relationship between compelled union support and the guarantee of freedom of speech and opinion. On this occasion, it examined the validity and effect of an agency-shop clause similar to the Rand formula whereby every employee represented by the union, whether he or she had joined it or not, had to pay it a service fee equal to union dues. A group of employees objected to the enforcement of this provision. In their view, such a provision deprived them of their freedom of association protected by the First Amendment. They asserted that they were opposed to the payment of union dues to unions as well as to collective bargaining in the public sector and objected to various social and political activities carried on by their union. A majority of the Supreme Court held that the obligation to join the union was constitutionally justified "by the legislative assessment of the important contribution of the union shop to the system of labour relations established by Congress" (p. 222, per Stewart J.). Union dues could be exacted as long as they were used for collective bargaining, contract administration and grievance-adjustment purposes. Beyond that, the obligation to contribute to causes that members disapproved of violated their freedoms of association, speech and belief protected by the First Amendment.

247 Since Abood, a recurrent problem in the application of union-agency clauses has remained the proper delineation between core union functions and more peripheral activities, as dues may be collected from unwilling employees only for the traditional collective bargaining purposes. This analysis has required the creation of subtle distinctions within the broad range of possible union activities. Dissenting employees are now entitled to a procedure that mitigates the infringement of their First Amendment rights by preventing the use of their contributions for impermissible purposes (see Ellis v. Brotherhood of Railway, Airline & Steamship Clerks, 466 U.S. 435 (1984); Chicago Teachers Union, Local No. 1 v. Hudson, 475 U.S. 292 (1986); Communications Workers of America v. Beck, 487 U.S. 735 (1988); Lehnert v. Ferris Faculty Association, 500 U.S. 507 (1991)).

248 This Court has already chosen to diverge from the American approach taken to the right not to associate. Unlike in the United States, the Lavigne case held that a statutory system which allows for compulsory union dues is justified, even when the union spends the money for causes other than "traditional" union purposes, and even when some dues payers oppose some of the causes supported.

(2) The Jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights

249 My colleague Bastarache J. relies on the text of several international instruments to support the wide scope he gives to the negative freedom to not associate. An examination of the judicial interpretation of one of these instruments indicates that a negative right has been adopted but with limits. The appellants also invoked a number of judgments of the European Court of Human Rights…

250 Nevertheless, despite this silence of the Convention, since Young, James and Webster, Eur. Court H.R., judgment of 13 August 1981, Series A No. 44, the European Court has moved towards a recognition of the right not to associate as a necessary component of the guarantee of freedom of association under art. 11(1) of the Convention. In this case, in the opinion of the court, a union shop arrangement which imposed ideological conformity under the threat of dismissal from employment infringed art. 11 of the Convention and was not held to be justifiable. The court, nevertheless, held that not all forms of compelled association were inconsistent with art. 11. For example, a public interest law compelling doctors to join a professional regulatory body did not engage the guarantee of freedom of association (Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere, Eur. Court H.R., judgment of 23 June 1981, Series A No. 43). In Sigurjónsson v. Iceland, Eur. Court H.R., judgment of 30 June 1993, Series A No. 264, the court clearly accepted that a right not to associate should be read into the guarantee of art. 11(1). In that case, it found that the legislative obligation to join a taxi-driver's union infringed the guarantee of freedom of association. It viewed this compulsion as a violation of the freedom of opinion of the complainant. On the other hand, the court held that art. 11 did not grant an employer the right to refuse to enter into a collective agreement as required by the relevant national legislation (Gustafsson v. Sweden, Eur. Court H.R., judgment of 25 April 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-II). In a recent judgment, outside the sphere of labour relations, an obligation to join hunter associations under a French law was declared invalid. On this occasion, the court reasserted the existence of the negative component of the guarantee of freedom of association (Chassagnou and Others v. France [GD], Nos. 25088/94, 28331/95 and 28443/95, ECHR 1999-III).

251 It must be understood, as well, that the European Convention is applied in a legal environment that reflects a different history of labour relations than in Canada or Quebec, in particular. The structures and methods of collective bargaining, the patterns of union organization and their status within the enterprise all differ deeply from the Canadian experience in the development of labour law and the management of labour relations. These labour systems may reject the principle of monopoly representation by a particular union or forms of union security like the union shop and the compulsory check off of union dues. On the other hand, the right to strike may be affirmed by the constitution itself, as in France. (See A. Mazeaud, Droit du travail (2nd ed. 2000), at pp. 204-5.) Many European nations recognize the broad societal role which unions play, and have entrenched union rights to participate in the management of private commercial and industrial enterprises. (See M. Weiss, "Workers' Participation in the European Union", in P. Davies et al., eds., European Community Labour Law: Principles and Perspectives (1996), 213; B. Bercusson, European Labour Law (1997), at pp. 248-61.) The labour laws of a country evidence a social and political compromise about the place of unions in that society and the proper balance between unions and employers. Thus, interesting as it may be, the consideration of European jurisprudence is not determinative, although it confirms an interpretation whereby a limited right to refuse to associate should be read into s. 2(d) of the Charter.

L'Heureux-Dube J

59 Although I agree that no one should be forced to associate, contrary to my colleague LeBel J. I am of the view that s. 2(d) of the Charter does not offer such constitutional protection for the reasons I articulated. Rather, and particularly on the narrowly circumscribed definition of that right and numerous built-in exceptions which my colleague LeBel J. adopts, the constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression under s. 2(b) will come into play if and when one is forced to associate as well as possibly s. 7 of the Charter. There is no need to create a "right not to associate" as a component of s. 2(d) of the Charter with all the consequences which might ensue and a protected right which, in my view, is not contemplated by s. 2(d).

60 The real concern expressed by McLachlin J. in Lavigne regarding "freedom from coerced ideological conformity" can be addressed without creating a protected "right not to associate", as Wilson J. pointed out in Lavigne: "To hold that s. 2(d) does not include the right not to associate does not leave those who do not wish to associate without redress for these harms. Sections 2(b) and 7 of the Charter, in particular, would seem to me to be available in appropriate cases" (p. 263).

61 I am also mindful of Dickson J.'s words in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 344, referred to by Wilson J. in Lavigne, at p. 259, that extending the protected right to freedom of association to include a freedom not to associate would be "to overshoot the actual purpose of the right or freedom in question…

The Fundamental Purpose of Freedom of Association

62 In Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313 (the "Alberta Reference"), McIntyre J., for the majority, stated at p. 408, that the "fundamental purpose of freedom of association . . . [is] to permit the collective pursuit of common goals…

63 In Lavigne, La Forest J., at p. 317, introduced the term "individual aspirations" when he noted that "[i]t is important to recognize that while it is true, as Wilson J. states in her reasons, at p. 251, that 'freedom of association is meant to protect the collective pursuit of common goals', such protection is afforded ultimately to further individual aspirations".

64 I interpret the meaning of "individual aspirations" as being a set which includes a subset under the rubric of "common goals" as well as a subset comprising "individual goals". In the context of freedom of association, I view La Forest J.'s "individual aspirations" as referring primarily to the subset of common goals. The pursuit of individual aspirations comprises both the pursuit of individual goals and the pursuit of common goals. The freedom to associate protects the giving effect to the latter. While it could be the case that in a given case only common goals are involved, the inclusion of individual goals within the term "individual aspirations" does not negate the argument.

65 I believe that it would not correspond with this Court's jurisprudence to characterize the purpose of s. 2(d) as meaning solely the protection of the common pursuit of individual goals, i.e. with no common goals in the equation.

66 There is an additional reason why the "common pursuit of individual goals" is not appropriate in the context of freedom of association analysis. In society, there is an element of synergy when individuals interact. The mere addition of individual goals will not suffice. Society is more then [sic] the sum of its parts. Put another way, a row of taxis do not a bus make. An arithmetic approach to Charter rights fails to encompass the aspirations imbedded in it.

67 In this context, negative rights are viewed as individual rights embodying individual goals: an individual is given the constitutional right not to belong to an association. But, if the "fundamental purpose of freedom of association, . . . [is] to permit the collective pursuit of common goals", then the very concept of a "negative freedom of association" becomes suspect. At issue is the definition of "common goals". In such a context, the "collective pursuit of common goals" leads to an abstraction which is difficult to justify…

70 The course of judicial restraint suggests that no new constitutional doctrine should be developed if existing doctrine could resolve the issue. In this regard, I would make a comment on the case of Sigurjónsson v. Iceland, Eur. Court H.R., judgment of 30 June 1993, Series A No. 264, cited by LeBel J. in his reasons at para. 250, where he stated that in Sigurjónsson, the European Court of Human Rights ("ECHR") "clearly accepted that a right not to associate should be read into the guarantee of art. 11(1)". At p. 17, the majority of the ECHR stated:

> ... Sigurjónsson objected to being a member of the association in question partly because he disagreed with its policy in favour of limiting the number of taxicabs and, thus, access to the occupation; in his opinion the interests of his country were better served by extensive personal freedoms, including freedom of occupation, than State regulation. Therefore, the Court is of the view that Article 11 can, in the circumstances, be considered in the light of Articles 9 and 10, the protection of personal opinion being also one of the purposes of the freedom of association guaranteed by Article 11 (see the above-mentioned Young, James and Webster judgment, pp. 23-24, § 57). The pressure exerted on the applicant in order to compel him to remain a member of Frami contrary to his wishes was a further aspect going to the very essence of an Article 11 right; there was an interference too in this respect. [Emphasis added.]

71 It is apparent that the ECHR reached its conclusion by considering Mr. Sigurjónsson's individual goals in the context of art. 11 of the European Convention. The ECHR also held unanimously that it was "not necessary also to examine the case under Articles 9 or 10" (p. 20).

72 Similarly, in another case cited by LeBel J. at para. 250, Chassagnou and Others v. France [GD], Nos. 25088/94, 28331/95 and 28443/95, ECHR 1999-III, the ECHR applied a hybrid analysis, a methodology which would not be required in Canada. In that case, all the applicants were owners of small landholdings. By law, the applicants, who are opposed to hunting, had to become members of the approved municipal or intermunicipality hunters' associations set up in their municipalities and to transfer hunting rights over their land to these associations so that all hunters living in the relevant municipality could hunt there. The ECHR stated (at para. 117):

> To compel a person by law to join an association such that it is fundamentally contrary to his own convictions to be a member of it, and to oblige him, on account of his membership of that association, to transfer his rights over the land he owns so that the association in question can attain objectives of which he disapproves, goes beyond what is necessary to ensure that a fair balance is struck between conflicting interests and cannot be considered proportionate to the aim pursued.
> There has therefore been a violation of Article 11.

73 My opposition to the enshrinement of the negative right of association in s. 2(d) is not based on a desire to curtail the rights of those who feel aggrieved by the exclusion of the negative right of association. My argument has to do with my belief that we have the constitutional tools to deal with such a grievance.

74 As discussed above, the analysis followed in Sigurjónsson would be contrary to our jurisprudence for two reasons. First, it grounded its analysis primarily on individual goals, giving far lesser weight to communal goals. Secondly, a solution could have been found under arts. 9 or 10, but the ECHR decided otherwise.

75 This judicial parsimony should be ascribed to prudence, not miserliness. Constitutional remedies are powerful tools which ought to be used with prudence. When required, however, they should be applied with vigour and in a purposive manner.

76 An additional reason for caution is based on the fact that the impetus for efforts to establish the negative right to association has historically originated with those opposed to the establishment or maintenance of labour associations. Such a tainted pedigree raises the question of whether we should constitutionalize an initiative whose purpose was to defeat the right to associate. This concern is reflected in the dissenting opinion of Judge Thór Vilhjálmsson in the Sigurjónsson case, where he comments (at p. 21):

> The present case shows, in my opinion, that the classic freedom of association, which is expressly guaranteed in Article 11 of the Convention, is essentially different from the negative freedom of association. The freedom guaranteed by the Convention was originally one of the foundations of political freedom and activity. Since then, under the protection of this freedom, the trade unions, and their activities aimed at improving the lot of their members, have developed. The Icelandic case before the Court now shows that in certain circumstances it is not clear whether the negative freedom of association is likely to further the interests of those concerned in a way comparable to the clear benefits of the classic freedom. [Emphasis added.]

77 The creation and application of new judicial tools, featuring a questionable mark of origin, will inevitably generate new jurisprudence to which there are certain risks attached. Such a development may not be viewed as prudent, especially in light of the fact that there is no need to take such a risk because proven alternatives are available.

78 In any event the European Convention cannot dictate the way the Canadian Charter does protect fundamental rights and as my colleague LeBel J. asserts (at para. 251) "the consideration of European jurisprudence is not determinative". I do not however agree with his assertion that "it confirms an interpretation whereby a limited right to refuse to associate should be read into s. 2(d) of the Charter". In my view such a reading of s. 2(d) of the Charter is in no way implied in the European jurisprudence, since it is as compatible with my position that, if such a right exists, it is protected by s. 2(b) of the Charter.

79 Here, there is no negation of the right not to associate but only the way in which the Canadian Charter protects it. For these reasons, more extensively discussed in the reasons of Wilson J. in Lavigne, to which I refer as if herein recited at length, I conclude "that s. 2(d) includes only the positive freedom to associate" in the words of Wilson J. (p. 263). This being said, there is no reason for me to embark on a s. 1 analysis.

9.6 Excerpt from R. v. Advance Cutting & Coring Ltd., 2001 SCC 70 (CanLII), [2001] 3 SCR 209, per Bastarache J., paras 2-20, 31-36

Bastarache J.,

2 LeBel J. concludes that s. 2(d) of the Charter implies a negative right not to associate; he states that the test for an infringement of this right is whether there is evidence of ideological coercion or conformity imposed by the forced association. Having found that no such ideological conformity exists in the present case, he finds no infringement of this right. With respect, I disagree both with the test used and his ultimate finding in the present case.

3 The test relied upon by LeBel J. is based primarily upon the decision of McLachlin J. (as she then was) in Lavigne v. Ontario Public Service Employees Union, 1991 CanLII 68 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 211. According to LeBel J., for ideological conformity to exist, there must be evidence of an imposition of union values or opinions on the member, evidence of a limitation of the member's free expression, or evidence that the union participates in causes and activities of which the member disapproves (para. 232). In other words, LeBel J.'s interpretation of ideological conformity is a narrow one where, in order to exist, there must be some impact on the member's moral convictions. This test, as formulated by LeBel J., is, in my opinion, too narrow and results in a negative right that is too constrained. I do not agree that McLachlin J.'s opinion in Lavigne need be interpreted so restrictively. In my view, the interpretation of ideological conformity must be broader and take place in context. In this case, this context would take into account the true nature of unions as participatory bodies holding political and economic roles in society which, in turn, translates into the existence of ideological positions. To mandate that an individual adhere to such a union is ideological conformity.

4 It is evident that even prior to the coming into force of the Charter, ideological conformity was a major concern of the courts when considering forced association. In fact, this is shown by the Rand formula, which has been so important in the historical development of the union movement. According to Rand J., the democratic principle is an underlying value of prime importance in this analysis and any form of coercion affecting it must be taken very seriously. As noted by M. MacNeil, M. Lynk and P. Engelmann in Trade Union Law in Canada (loose-leaf ed.), at p. 2-13:

> Rand attempted to balance the interest of individuals in not being forced to associate with an organization against their will with the interest of the majority in preventing a minority from acquiring the fruits of collective bargaining without having to pay for it. [Emphasis added.]

5 At issue in the labour dispute arbitrated by Rand J. in 1946 was whether a union shop clause could be inserted into a collective agreement. He created an alternative to the union shop clause which became widely accepted and known as the 'Rand formula'. As noted above, in Ford Motor Co. of Canada v. U.A.W.-I.C.O. (1946), 46 C.L.L.C. ¶18,001, Rand J. was concerned with individual workers' rights and the democratic principles underlying union membership. He stated at p. 159:

> As I conceive it, from the social and economic structure in which we live I must select considerations which have attained acceptance in the public opinion of this country and which as principles are relevant to controversies of the nature of that before me;

At pp. 160 and 161, he noted that:

> [O]rganized labour itself develops and depends upon power, which in turn must be met in balancing controls in relation to the individual members or workers over whom it may be exercised, as well as to industry and public.
> The organization of labour must in a civilized manner be elaborated and strengthened for its essential function in an economy of private enterprise. For this there must be enlightened leadership at the top and democratic control at the bottom. ... Hitherto the tendency has been to treat labour as making demands quite unwarranted on any basis of democratic freedom in relation to property and business and the ordinary mode of settling labour disputes, a piecemeal concession in appeasement. I cannot see much effort to place conciliation on principle and although at once I disclaim any hope of doing more than to suggest principle through a slightly altered approach, I must at least make that attempt. [Emphasis added.]

He continued, at p. 163, discussing the balancing of union security with that of individual choice. He remarked:

> What is asked for is a union shop with a check-off. A union shop permits the employer to engage employees at large, but requires that within a stated time after engagement they join the union or be dismissed if they do not. This is to be distinguished from what is known as a "closed shop" in which only a member of the union can be originally employed, which in turn means that the union becomes the source from which labour is obtained.
> ... Where there is a closed or union shop, the check-off becomes less significant because of the fact that expulsion from the union requires dismissal from employment.
> In addition to the foregoing of which there may be many modifications, there is what is known as "maintenance of membership" which is a requirement that an employee member of a union maintain that membership as a condition to his continuing employment for a stated time, generally the life of an agreement. ...
> Basing my judgment on principles which I think the large majority of Canadians accept, I am unable in the circumstances to award a union shop. It would subject the Company's interest in individual employees and their tenure of service to strife within the union and between them and the union which, with extraordinary consequences, . . . and it would deny the individual Canadian the right to seek work and to work independently of personal association with any organized group. It would also expose him even in a generally disciplined organization to the danger of arbitrary action of individuals and place his economic life at the mercy of the threat as well as the action of power in an uncontrolled and here an unmatured group. [Emphasis added.]

Finally, at p. 165, he concluded that the mechanism chosen "preserves the basic liberties of [the] Company and employee" (emphasis added) aforementioned.

6 The Rand formula was discussed by this Court in Lavigne, supra. Wilson J. noted the reason for the success of this type of clause in Canada and distinguished it from situations where union membership was mandatory. She stated, at p. 272:

> Its success in Canada has stemmed from the fact that in enhancing union security it does not work to suppress expression but to foster it.
> Why is this so? Viewed closely, it is evident that there is nothing about the agency shop which purports to align those subject to its operation with the union or any of its activities. Indeed, the Rand formula specifically provides for dissent by stipulating that no member of the bargaining unit is required to join and thereby become a member of the union. Free expression was thus enhanced by giving unionists and non-unionists alike a voice in the administration of the employment relationship. [Emphasis added.]

Finding that the Rand formula infringes s. 2(d) of the Charter but is justified by s. 1, La Forest J. also noted, at p. 341, that the Rand formula does not mandate union membership. Further, McLachlin J. remarked, at p. 347:

> The whole purpose of the formula is to permit a person who does not wish to associate himself or herself with the union to desist from doing so. The individual does this by declining to become a member of the union. The individual thereby dissociates himself or herself from the activities of the union.

7 The infringement in the present case is much more important than that created by the Rand formula and requires justification that is therefore more extensive. It was decided in Lavigne that ideological conformity is at the core of freedom from association; it is not necessary to decide here whether it is the only factor to be considered in all cases, as will be shown later in these reasons.

8 In order to understand the entire scope of the negative right, one must consider the impact of other Charter values on its infringement, as required under the rules of Charter interpretation described in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295…

9 …The whole context of the right must be considered. This was already a consideration of Rand J. in Ford Motor, supra, at p. 159, wherein he speaks of the social and economic structure in which we live and which gives rise to principles of law. This context includes, as I have said, a consideration of Charter values that come into play in the particular situation at issue. In this case, the fundamental values that must be protected in the workplace include freedom of conscience, mobility, liberty, freedom of expression and the right to work. The necessity of considering the totality of the rights and values that are interrelated when dealing with forced association in the workplace, in my opinion, points to the need to take a broad view of the Charter right not to associate.

10 This approach is supported by consideration of this freedom in light of international conventions and the jurisprudence of this Court.

Article 20

2. No one may be compelled to belong to an association.

In addition, the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 993 U.N.T.S. 3, provides that:

Article 8. 1. The States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to ensure:

(a) the right of everyone to form trade unions and join the trade union of his choice, subject only to the rules of the organization concerned, for the promotion and protection of his economic and social interests. No restrictions may be placed on the exercise of this right other than those prescribed by law and which are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of national security or public order or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others; [Emphasis added.]

12 This Court has regularly made reference to and relied upon the aforementioned international documents in interpreting fundamental freedoms in the Charter…

13 It is interesting to note that the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, which was referred to in B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, 1995 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1995] 1 SCR 315, at para. 38 (the scope of the right to liberty in s. 7), provides, at art. 10:

2. Subject to the obligation of solidarity provided for in Article 29 no one may be compelled to join an association. [Emphasis added.]

14 In Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), 1987 CanLII 88 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 313 ("Alberta Reference"), and Lavigne, supra, this Court used these international agreements as interpretative tools in an analysis of s. 2(d) of the Charter. In Alberta Reference, Dickson C.J. (dissenting) noted, at p. 350, that the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, were adopted in an effort to make more specific the broad principles included in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. I would like to note, however, that the specificity of the international covenants did not replace the broad principles enunciated in the Universal Declaration. These covenants clarify art. 20(1) of the Universal Declaration (the positive right), but do not minimize the negative right. Actually, the continuing importance of the negative right is seen in art. 8(1)(a) of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, wherein the joining of a union is referred to as the "right" of the worker to join a union of his or her "choice".

15 The importance of these documents in relation to s. 2(d) was discussed by La Forest J. in Lavigne, where he prescribed a broad and liberal interpretation of s. 2(d) in light of other Charter values…

Accordingly, a person is not deprived of protection under a provision of the Charter merely because protection may also be derived under another. The rights overlap in defining Canadian society, and I see no reason for depriving a litigant of success because he has chosen one provision that legitimately appears to cover the matter of which he or she complains, rather than another. That would often be the effect if the individual rights and freedoms were construed as discrete rather than overlapping.

16 He went on to discuss the scope of this Charter right. In doing so, he noted that s. 2(d) has limitations and that it was not meant to protect the people of Canada from the association with others that is "a necessary and inevitable part of membership in a democratic community" (p. 320). He mentioned governmental policies requiring the payment of taxes and the association with others that is compelled by the organization of our society, such as membership in a family. I am not persuaded that these are examples of true associations as envisaged within the meaning of s. 2(d) or that they constitute true exceptions to the freedom from association. In this, I think we have to be guided by the purpose of the section. On this point, it is worth quoting La Forest J., at pp. 322-23, where he stated:

At the core of the guarantee of freedom of association is the individual's freedom to choose the path to self-actualization. This is an aspect of the autonomy of the individual. It is of little solace to a person who is compelled to associate with others against his or her own will that no one will attribute the views of the group to that person. ... Consequently, the test should not be whether the payments "may reasonably be seen" as association, or must "indicate to any reasonable person" that the individual has associated himself with an ideological cause. An external manifestation of some link between the individual and the association is not a prerequisite to the invocation of the right; it is enough that the individual's freedom is impaired. [Emphasis added.]

I think this has to be read with the words of Dickson C.J. in Oakes, supra, at p. 136:

The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society. [Emphasis added.]

17 The recognition of the union movement as a fundamental institution is implicit here precisely because it is a participant in the political and social debate at the core of Canadian democracy. To suggest that the unions in the present case are not associated with any ideological cause is to ignore the history of the union movement itself. Although it has been accepted that freedom of association protects an activity by an association that is permitted by an individual, this does not mean that there is no distinctive function for an association, or that associational analogues to individual rights need be ignored. The collective character of the right to associate is undeniable because collective activity is not equivalent to the addition of individual activities. It is important, however, that belonging to important social institutions be free; this is how democracy will be enhanced.

18 Discussing limitations on the freedom from association, La Forest J. noted that some of the liberty interests at issue in the context of the right to be free from association were discussed by Professor B. Etherington in his article "Freedom of Association and Compulsory Union Dues: Towards a Purposive Conception of a Freedom to not Associate" (1987), 19 Ottawa L. Rev. 1, and include (at pp. 43-44):

1. governmental establishment of, or support for, particular political parties or causes;
2. impairment of the individual's freedom to join or associate with causes of his choice;
3. the imposition of ideological conformity; and
4. personal identification of an objector with political or ideological causes which the service association supports.

La Forest J. noted that this view is consistent with the reasons of Dickson J. in Big M Drug Mart, supra.

19 I agree with La Forest and McLachlin JJ. that there is a negative aspect to the s. 2(d) right. However, I do not think it is useful to distinguish between the factors proposed by Professor Etherington or to formulate a definitive opinion with regard to the various factors that could, in any given situation, provide a framework for the conclusion that freedom from association has been breached. With regard to the content of the right, it is sufficient to refer to ideological conformity in this case because that factor has already been recognized, because it is at play and because its scope is such that it encompasses all aspects of the case on its facts. I am left here with a number of options. For instance, I could accept that there is an internal qualification of the negative aspect of s. 2(d) and that it is triggered by the infringement of a liberty interest, other Charter values and/or the imposition of ideological conformity; or I could accept that there is a negative aspect to s. 2(d) and that a s. 1 justification is immediately required upon a finding that there has been state-imposed association. First, a distinction may be made between the exceptions to s. 2(d) protection, as discussed by La Forest J. and noted at para. 16 of these reasons, and true associations which are protected by s. 2(d). Although not necessary to determine in this case, as these exceptions are not brought into play by the factual situation in issue, it may be said that these "necessary" associations do not truly fall within the purpose of s. 2(d) protection since they do not involve persons coming together in the pursuit of a common goal or purpose as this is generally understood. Association in a labour organization would not in any case be part of the "necessary" associations category. Further, any element of necessity which would impact protections provided by s. 2(d) would, in my opinion, fall within a s. 1 justification of a s. 2(d) infringement rather than at the initial Charter breach analysis. Second, it should be added that even if forced associations in and of themselves should not be considered ab initio contrary to universal values or principles, once coercion is applied by government to association in circumstances where ideological conformity is imposed, I believe s. 2(d) is infringed and the government must justify this forced association pursuant to s. 1.

20 I would add here that I disagree with the statement of LeBel J. at para. 199 of his reasons that La Forest J. was of the opinion that the obligation to join a union whose purposes were limited to collective bargaining would not even engage s. 2(d). This inference, in my view, is not consistent with the fact that La Forest J.'s discussions of constitutional issues in Lavigne had nothing to do with mandatory membership (see p. 325). Furthermore, this is not relevant here, as will be demonstrated later, because the association in question goes beyond the purpose of collective bargaining.

31 This is a case where the freedom not to associate is markedly infringed. I respectfully disagree with LeBel J. when he advocates deference to the choices of government on giving content to the notions of "self-actualization" (para. 210) and "democracy" (paras. 228 and 229). I disagree with his view that the present matter "lie[s] largely beyond the area of expertise of courts" (para. 239). In my opinion, though problems may have been acute in this area, not all options are open to government. This is a clear situation of government coercion, the result of which mandates that workers in the construction industry in Quebec group together in a few unions which are specified and approved by government. The fact that there are five unions from which workers can choose in no way negates this infringement for it remains government-mandated group affiliation. Self-realization of the worker is violated in many ways. He or she must unionize. Within the prescribed regime, democracy is further restricted by limited choice. There is no guarantee that a majority of voters will exercise their right. A default provision can determine the outcome of elections. Those voting for minority associations may be left out of future negotiations.

32 The vast majority of Canadians must work for a living and, as such, working is a compelled fact of life; however, in the present situation, the appellants are not arguing that being forced to work with a particular group or to participate in employment-related activities violates s. 2(d). This is not a case where workers dispute the payment of mandated union dues; the restrictions in this case are much more severe than that in Lavigne. The Rand formula mandates payment of union dues for the betterment of all workers; in this case, the workers are being forced to join a union. As argued by the appellants, being forced by the government to join one of five specified unions differs drastically from being forced to pay union dues. The appellants state (factum, at para. 24):

> The objection to union membership can be anchored in profound moral, religious or political convictions and it is implicit in Canadian law that such convictions are to be respected.

I agree with this assertion. Lavigne focussed on the actual activities of the union in question and the purpose for which union dues were used. This situation, on the other hand, even if it is not based on the actual views held by the five unions, comprises a form of ideological conformity.

33 As I have said, it is not necessary to make a conclusive determination of whether these liberty interests are separate indices of a s. 2(d) infringement or whether they are merely subcategories of ideological conformity since, in this case, ideological conformity, which was explicitly accepted by both La Forest and McLachlin JJ. in Lavigne, exists. Workers may feel strongly about joining a union for various reasons, but whether they are moral, religious or political, these beliefs and convictions must be pushed aside if one wishes to work in the construction industry in Quebec. They are the only workers affected in this way. When considering freedom not to associate in light of other Charter values, including freedom of conscience and expression, liberty, mobility and the right to work, I cannot help but find that governmental mandatory union association infringes this important Charter right.

34 As I have said, ideological conformity is engaged in particular because the members of the associations necessarily participate in and indirectly support a system of forced association and state control over work opportunity. This is a situation whereby the democratic rights of workers are taken away. Being forced to accept and participate in a system that severely limits the democratic principle in the area of labour relations is a form of coercion that cannot be segregated totally from ideological conformity. If Parliament provided that a person must belong to a specific political party to work in the public service of Canada, the situation would be analogous. Some would argue that one does not have to believe, simply that one has to belong; as stated at para. 16, I believe there would still be clear ideological conformity.

36 I do not believe that this conclusion is inconsistent with previous jurisprudence. For example, the Rand formula differs from the case at bar because it does not negate the democratic principle; in that case, a majority of workers choose accreditation and approve the collective agreement. Workers can still choose to work in a non-unionized environment. The ultimate forced association is then justified by the majority principle and the underlying need to have a system of protection of workers that is effective. There is also a distinction to be made with the requirements of professional associations such as medical associations and law societies, where the need for protection of the public may require a forced association which is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. In this case, the provisions are not based on the protection of the public by way of assuring the competency of workers. To receive certification, a worker must be a member of one of the five chosen unions; to become a member, he or she must have been a resident of Quebec in the previous year, have worked a set number of hours in that year and must be under 50 years of age. Without having met these requirements, a worker is unable to work in Quebec regardless of his or her actual competence or experience in his or her chosen trade. The conditions related to forced association have nothing to do with the protection of the public. As stated by Judge Bonin of the Court of Québec, [translation] "[t]he certificate's main purpose was to maintain hiring priority". As such, a s. 1 justification is required. Before considering s. 1, however, I turn next to the examination of the positive right which is also part of s. 2(d).

9.7 Questions

1. The two major Supreme Court of Canada decisions addressing the 'freedom to not associate', Lavigne and Advance Cutting, were each split four ways, with four different judgments. What makes this issue so difficult and controversial? Would the freedom to not associate be treated differently outside of the labour context, and if so, why?
2. In Lavigne and Advance Cutting, respectively, Justices Wilson and Lebel place little weight on comparative or international law, both of which arguably offer greater protection for a right to not associate than the approaches adopted by these Justices under section 2(d). Should the experience of comparator jurisdictions or the requirements of international law pertaining to the right to not associate be paid greater attention in defining the scope of section 2(d) in this context? Why or why not?
3. The payment of monies – whether compelled in favour of causes one does not support, or prohibited in favour of causes one does support – has been an enduring source of constitutional controversy. Justice LaForest likens certain mandatory dues to the forced payment of religious tithes by non-believers, while Justice Wilson draws an analogy to the payment of taxes. Which analogy is more compelling in the context of union dues, or is there a different and better way to look at this issue? (for one thoughtful view on the subject, see Brian Etherington, "Freedom of Association and Compulsory Union Dues: Towards a Purposive Conception of a Freedom to Not Associate" (1987) 19:1 Ottawa L Rev 1).
4. In order to demonstrate a breach of the right to not associate, the majority in Advance Coring suggests that it is necessary to demonstrate that the impugned government action imposes "ideological conformity". Is this the appropriate standard in determining a breach of the right to not associate? Why or why not? And should the standard depend on the context of the restriction? (for a critical assessment of the decisions in Lavigne and Advance Cutting, see Jamie Cameron, "Big M's Forgotten Legacy of Freedom" in Newman, Ross, Bird eds The Forgotten Fundamental Freedoms of the Charter (Toronto: LexisNexis Canada Inc., 2020)).
5. The right to not associate limits the scope of employees' collective power, and thus effectively favours employers, even when invoked by an employee (as in Lavigne). What impact, if any, does this have on the Court's reasoning and conclusions?

Chapter 22: Democratic Rights

By Mary Liston and Michael Pal

1 Introduction

> "Voting is the cornerstone of our democracy. Denying citizens the right to vote not only strikes at the heart of their fundamental rights, but also comes at the expense of their dignity and their sense of self-worth": Frank v. Canada, 2019 SCC 1 at para 82.

The simple idea behind democracy is 'rule by the people'. To bring this ideal to life, democracy requires a legal basis and an institutional framework. This Chapter on "Democratic Rights" covers the rights and freedoms in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms directly relevant to political participation, the written and unwritten components of the Constitution of Canada which sustain the institutional structure of Canadian democracy, and aspects of Canadian public law related to both democratic rights and institutions.

Democracy in Canada has enduring core characteristics. Canada can be variously described as a representative democracy, a constitutional democracy, and a liberal democracy.

Canada is a representative democracy, with elections to select Members of Parliament (MP's) who will sit as our representatives in the House of Commons lying at the heart of political life. While mechanisms of direct democracy such as referendums have a circumscribed role, elections are the primary vehicle for assigning public authority in a democratic fashion. Democratic rights in Canada are focused as a result on ensuring a fair electoral process, such that:

- voters are provided a meaningful opportunity to participate and to be effectively represented;
- candidates and political parties have an equal opportunity to compete to wield public power; and,
- interest groups of various kinds, such as non-governmental organizations, corporations, and unions are free to shape public debate.

As a constitutional democracy, a complex legal superstructure creates and sustains the practice of Canadian democracy. This practice is shaped by the Constitution of Canada which, while multi-faceted, is best described as liberal in nature. Our constitutional tradition and text are informed by the political philosophy of liberalism, which endorses the concept of rights that limit arbitrary or irrational government action. These rights include the right to vote, the right to stand as a candidate for elected office, freedom of political expression, freedom of association, equality, and freedom of the press, among others.

Part of this liberal traditional involves counter-majoritarianism. While elections translate votes into seats in the House of Commons and can result in a majority government, this does not necessarily mean that a government will behave democratically. Democratic law-making and accountability is realized through scrutiny of the governing party or parties by Parliament. Citizens, through the ballot box, have the right to 'kick the bums out' if they are unhappy with the government of the day and can then instantiate a fresh start with a new government as a form of direct accountability. The conventions or 'rules' of responsible government (discussed below in section 1.2.1.1) aim to ensure that both our elected representatives and the unelected decisionmakers in the executive branch (ie, the modern administrative state) are also indirectly held accountable.

The judiciary is specially tasked to oversee government action through the practice of judicial review in administrative and constitutional law. Courts check the exercise of public power in a variety of ways, but one chief means is through the enforcement of rights against the other two branches of government.

Canadian democracy has historically and continues to be the subject of extensive critique for failing to live up to democratic ideals. Institutionally, the Senate performs an important function as the second legislative chamber, but as an unelected body with an outdated distribution of seats, it has been criticized since its inception for lacking democratic legitimacy. Parliament is formally supreme and sovereign, but in practice the political executive, namely the Prime Minister and cabinet, are dominant and exercise extensive day-to-day control over the legislature: see Mary Liston, 'The Most Opaque Branch: The (Un)Accountable Growth of Executive Power in Canadian Government' in Richard Albert, Paul Daly, and Vanessa MacDonnell, eds, The Canadian Constitution in Transition (University of Toronto Press, 2019).

Indigenous Peoples have, since Canada's founding, criticized the country's institutions for excluding them and failing to respect their right to self-government. As discussed below in sections 1.4.2 and Part 4 of this Chapter, the historical formal exclusion of participation by Indigenous Peoples in Canadian elections has left a long shadow today, including informal barriers to voting and standing as a candidate that persist.

In relation to democratic rights, a set of recurring problems appear in the caselaw: who can vote; who can run for office; who is the true winner in the wake of a contested election result; what is the role of political parties; how should elections be administered; and what is the correct balance between liberty and equality in the regulation of money in politics? These cases inevitably touch on broader issues around accountability for those wielding state power, the proper scope of democratic rights, and the appropriate role of courts when cases involving the institutional aspect of democracy arise.

This Chapter first sets out the legal context that informs our democratic rights. Part 2 then examines the constitutional and legal architecture that supports democracy. Part 3 turns to the caselaw on the right to vote. Part 4 looks at the distinctive ways that Indigenous communities elect their leadership. Finally, in Part 5 the Chapter briefly reflects on emerging issues. This Chapter largely focuses on the federal level in Canada, though it is important to note that the democratic issues examined here also occur at the provincial level.

1.1 Law and democracy in Canada

While the text of the Constitution of Canada structures democracy, the unwritten principle of democracy shapes interpretation of the text. Democracy is part of the 'web' or 'network' of unwritten principles in our jurisprudence and the democratic principle informs our constitutional architecture. We begin therefore with a discussion of the unwritten principle of democracy as it has been used in constitutional interpretation.

1.1.1 Unwritten principle of democracy

1.1.1.1 Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217

The Secession Reference (Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217 at para 49) identified democracy as one of the four foundational unwritten principles of the Constitution of Canada. Like the other unwritten principles, democracy is part of the 'architecture' of the Constitution and its 'basic constitutional structure' (para 50).

The Secession Reference (paras 61-69) stated that the democracy principle contained both an individual and institutional dimension. On the institutional dimension, the basic structure of the Constitution presupposes that Canada is a constitutional democracy with 'freely elected' legislatures in Ottawa and in the Provinces. This concise phrase contains within it an assumption that elections are part of the basic structure, that they must be free and fair, and that democracy operates at both the federal and provincial orders of government. The Secession Reference (para 62) also importantly cites pre-Charter cases where the Supreme Court struck down provincial laws for ostensibly violating the division of powers. These cases had the effect of protecting democracy by invalidating provincial laws that harmed the free press, the capacity of citizens to criticize the government, and other rights and freedoms critical to democracy. These cases are consistent with the Secession Reference's claim that democracy has always been foundational to the Canadian Constitution.

The institutional dimension of the unwritten principle connects directly to the individual dimension in the form of democratic rights and freedoms. Democracy requires a host of individual rights, including the right to vote, freedom of political expression, freedom of association, and freedom of the press. If legislatures are to be 'freely elected,' then that fact necessitates a 'popular franchise' (para 65). While the history of exclusion of minority groups, women, and Indigenous Peoples from the right to vote is long (see sections 1.4.1 and 1.4.2), the Secession Reference identifies these limits on the franchise as aberrations that do not detract from the foundational democratic nature of the Canadian Constitution and political tradition.

Democracy has a complex relationship between political majorities and political minorities. The Secession Reference identifies the substantive goal of self-government as being at the core of the unwritten principle of democracy. Self-government, however, is understood as going beyond majority rule. Majority rule is central to democracy, but must be circumscribed by minority rights whether it be through individual rights or by acknowledge of the reality in a federation of national minorities operating as majorities at the provincial level. According to the Supreme Court, majority rule is also checked by a deliberative ideal of democracy as a 'continuous process of discussion' rather than an exercise of majority power (para 68):

> 61 Democracy is a fundamental value in our constitutional law and political culture. While it has both an institutional and an individual aspect, the democratic principle was also argued before us in the sense of the supremacy of the sovereign will of a people, in this case potentially to be expressed by Quebecers in support of unilateral secession. It is useful to explore in a summary way these different aspects of the democratic principle.
> 62 The principle of democracy has always informed the design of our constitutional structure, and continues to act as an essential interpretive consideration to this day. A majority of this Court in OPSEU v. Ontario, supra, at p. 57, confirmed that "the basic structure of our Constitution, as established by the Constitution Act, 1867, contemplates the existence of certain political institutions, including freely elected legislative bodies at the federal and provincial levels". As is apparent from an earlier line of decisions emanating from this Court, including Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] SCR 285, Saumur v. City of Quebec, 1953 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1953] 2 SCR 299, Boucher v. The King, 1950 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1951] SCR 265, and Reference re Alberta Statutes, 1938 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1938] SCR 100, the democracy principle can best be understood as a sort of baseline against which the framers of our Constitution, and subsequently, our elected representatives under it, have always operated. It is perhaps for this reason that the principle was not explicitly identified in the text of the Constitution Act, 1867 itself. To have done so might have appeared redundant, even silly, to the framers. As explained in the Provincial Judges Reference, supra, at para. 100, it is evident that our Constitution contemplates that Canada shall be a constitutional democracy. Yet this merely demonstrates the importance of underlying constitutional principles that are nowhere explicitly described in our constitutional texts. The representative and democratic nature of our political institutions was simply assumed.
> 63 Democracy is commonly understood as being a political system of majority rule. It is essential to be clear what this means. The evolution of our democratic tradition can be traced back to the Magna Carta (1215) and before, through the long struggle for Parliamentary supremacy which culminated in the English Bill of Rights of 1689, the emergence of representative political institutions in the colonial era, the development of responsible government in the 19th century, and eventually, the achievement of Confederation itself in 1867. "[T]he Canadian tradition", the majority of this Court held in Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 158, at p. 186, is "one of evolutionary democracy moving in uneven steps toward the goal of universal suffrage and more effective representation". Since Confederation, efforts to extend the franchise to those unjustly excluded from participation in our political system — such as women, minorities, and aboriginal peoples — have continued, with some success, to the present day.
> 64 Democracy is not simply concerned with the process of government. On the contrary, as suggested in Switzman v. Elbling, supra, at p. 306, democracy is fundamentally connected to substantive goals, most importantly, the promotion of self-government. Democracy accommodates cultural and group identities: Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries, at p. 188. Put another way, a sovereign people exercises its right to self-government through the democratic process. In considering the scope and purpose of the Charter, the Court in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, articulated some of the values inherent in the notion of democracy (at p. 136):

> The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.
> 65 In institutional terms, democracy means that each of the provincial legislatures and the federal Parliament is elected by popular franchise. These legislatures, we have said, are "at the core of the system of representative government": New Brunswick Broadcasting, supra, at p. 387. In individual terms, the right to vote in elections to the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures, and to be candidates in those elections, is guaranteed to "Every citizen of Canada" by virtue of s. 3 of the Charter. Historically, this Court has interpreted democracy to mean the process of representative and responsible government and the right of citizens to participate in the political process as voters (Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries, supra) and as candidates (Harvey v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 163 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 876). In addition, the effect of s. 4 of the Charter is to oblige the House of Commons and the provincial legislatures to hold regular elections and to permit citizens to elect representatives to their political institutions. The democratic principle is affirmed with particular clarity in that s. 4 is not subject to the notwithstanding power contained in s. 33.
> 66 It is, of course, true that democracy expresses the sovereign will of the people. Yet this expression, too, must be taken in the context of the other institutional values we have identified as pertinent to this Reference. The relationship between democracy and federalism means, for example, that in Canada there may be different and equally legitimate majorities in different provinces and territories and at the federal level. No one majority is more or less "legitimate" than the others as an expression of democratic opinion, although, of course, the consequences will vary with the subject matter. A federal system of government enables different provinces to pursue policies responsive to the particular concerns and interests of people in that province. At the same time, Canada as a whole is also a democratic community in which citizens construct and achieve goals on a national scale through a federal government acting within the limits of its jurisdiction. The function of federalism is to enable citizens to participate concurrently in different collectivities and to pursue goals at both a provincial and a federal level.
> 67 The consent of the governed is a value that is basic to our understanding of a free and democratic society. Yet democracy in any real sense of the word cannot exist without the rule of law. It is the law that creates the framework within which the "sovereign will" is to be ascertained and implemented. To be accorded legitimacy, democratic institutions must rest, ultimately, on a legal foundation. That is, they must allow for the participation of, and accountability to, the people, through public institutions created under the Constitution. Equally, however, a system of government cannot survive through adherence to the law alone. A political system must also possess legitimacy, and in our political culture, that requires an interaction between the rule of law and the democratic principle. The system must be capable of reflecting the aspirations of the people. But there is more. Our law's claim to legitimacy also rests on an appeal to moral values, many of which are imbedded in our constitutional structure. It would be a grave mistake to equate legitimacy with the "sovereign will" or majority rule alone, to the exclusion of other constitutional values.
> 68 Finally, we highlight that a functioning democracy requires a continuous process of discussion. The Constitution mandates government by democratic legislatures, and an executive accountable to them, "resting ultimately on public opinion reached by discussion and the interplay of ideas" (Saumur v. City of Quebec, supra, at p. 330). At both the federal and provincial level, by its very nature, the need to build majorities necessitates compromise, negotiation, and deliberation. No one has a monopoly on truth, and our system is predicated on the faith that in the marketplace of ideas, the best solutions to public problems will rise to the top. Inevitably, there will be dissenting voices. A democratic system of government is committed to considering those dissenting voices, and seeking to acknowledge and address those voices in the laws by which all in the community must live.
> 69 The Constitution Act, 1982 gives expression to this principle, by conferring a right to initiate constitutional change on each participant in Confederation. In our view, the existence of this right imposes a corresponding duty on the participants in Confederation to engage in constitutional discussions in order to acknowledge and address democratic expressions of a desire for change in other provinces. This duty is inherent in the democratic principle which is a fundamental predicate of our system of governance.

The unwritten principle of democracy has been subject to less judicial elaboration than other principles such as federalism or the rule of law. Significant uncertainty exists as to whether the unwritten principle of democracy should be interpreted as primarily procedural in nature, therefore mostly ensuring free, fair, and competitive elections, or whether it offers a thicker, substantive standard: See Michael Pal, "The Unwritten Principle of Democracy" (2019) 65:2 McGill LJ 69.

1.1.1.2 Toronto (City) v Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34 (CanLII), [2021] 2 SCR 845

In Toronto (City) v Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34 (CanLII), [2021] 2 SCR 845 (City of Toronto), the Supreme Court of Canada shifted the role of unwritten principles in constitutional interpretation, including in relation to democracy. A majority of the Supreme Court held that the principle of democracy, like the other unwritten principles, cannot be the sole basis through which a reviewing court invalidates a statute. The reasoning of the majority was that the written text cannot be superseded by the unwritten principles.

At issue in the case was whether the unwritten principle of democracy could be the basis to invalidate a provincial law changing the number of wards in Toronto and their boundaries in the middle of a municipal election. While the majority allowed that unwritten principles can be used to guide interpretation of the text, they declined to use the democracy principle to interpret s.2(b) of the Charter in the context of a municipal election. The minority would have permitted unwritten principles to have the force of law in exceptional scenarios, particularly where there is a 'gap' in the constitutional text.

> [49] The Constitution of Canada embodies written and unwritten norms. This Court has recognized that our Constitution describes an architecture of the institutions of state and of their relationship to citizens that connotes certain underlying principles (Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3, at para. 93; Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 50-51). These principles, such as democracy and the rule of law, "infuse our Constitution" (Secession Reference, at para. 50). Although not recorded outside of "oblique reference[s]" in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 and to the Constitution Act, 1982 (para. 51), these principles are "foundational" (para. 49), without which "it would be impossible to conceive of our constitutional structure" (para. 51). These principles have "full legal force" and may give rise to substantive legal obligations (para. 54, quoting Reference re Resolution to Amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753, at p. 845). "[L]ike all principles of political morality, [they] can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches" (C.A. reasons, at para. 84, citing British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49, [2005] 2 SCR 473, at para. 52).

The Court also set out how the unwritten principles may be used by the courts:

> [55] First, they may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions. Indeed, that is the "full legal force" that this Court described in Secession Reference (para. 54). In this way, the unwritten constitutional principles of judicial independence and the rule of law have aided in the interpretation of ss 96 to 100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which have come to safeguard the core jurisdiction of the courts which fall within the scope of those provisions (Provincial Court Judges Reference, at paras. 88-89; MacMillan Bloedel, at paras. 10-11 and 27-28; Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59, [2014] 3 SCR 31, at paras. 29-33). When applied to Charter rights, unwritten principles assist with purposive interpretation, informing "the character and the larger objects of the Charter itself, … the language chosen to articulate the specific right or freedom, [and] the historical origins of the concepts enshrined" (Quebec (Attorney General), at para. 7, quoting Big M Drug Mart Ltd., at p. 344; see also R. v. Poulin, 2019 SCC 47, at para. 32).

[57] Neither of these functions support the proposition advanced by the City that the force of unwritten principles extends to invalidating legislation. Indeed, the truth of the matter is to the contrary. Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.

[58] First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers…

[59] Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter — rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority — the concep[t] of democracy . . . ha[s] no canonical formulatio[n]" (C.A. reasons, at para. 85). Unlike the written text of the Constitution, then, which "promotes legal certainty and predictability" in the exercise of judicial review (Secession Reference, at para. 53), the nebulous nature of the unwritten principles makes them susceptible to be interpreted so as to "render many of our written constitutional rights redundant and, in doing so, undermine the delimitation of those rights chosen by our constitutional framers" (Imperial Tobacco, at para. 65). Accordingly, there is good reason to insist that "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box" (para. 66). In our view, this statement should be understood as covering all possible bases for claims of right (i.e., "unjust or unfair" or otherwise normatively deficient).

1.2 Textual sources and the unwritten constitution

Democracy in Canada is reflected in constitutional text as well as unwritten portions of the Constitution. In the Constitution Act, 1867, textual provisions include the establishment of the House of Commons and the Senate and the distribution of seats in both Houses of Parliament to the Provinces. In the Constitution Act, 1982, 'democratic rights' are set out in the sections 3-5 of the Charter. Other relevant provisions of the Charter include in particular s.2 in relation to freedom of political expression and association.

1.2.1 The textual locus for the principle of democracy

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

Democratic rights of citizens

3 Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

Maximum duration of legislative bodies

4 (1) No House of Commons and no legislative assembly shall continue for longer than five years from the date fixed for the return of the writs of a general election of its members.

Continuation in special circumstances

(2) In time of real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection, a House of Commons may be continued by Parliament and a legislative assembly may be continued by the legislature beyond five years if such continuation is not opposed by the votes of more than one-third of the members of the House of Commons or the legislative assembly, as the case may be.

Annual sitting of legislative bodies

5 There shall be a sitting of Parliament and of each legislature at least once every twelve months.

A few points are important to highlight regarding s.3 in order to frame the discussion that follows. The right to vote is restricted to every Canadian citizen (restrictions on the right to vote are discussed more fully below in section 1.4.1). The right to vote is guaranteed by s.3 of the Charter for federal and provincial elections, but not municipal elections.

A majority of the Supreme Court laid down a firm line in the City of Toronto case on s.3 not protecting municipal voting rights:

[45] Section 3 guarantees citizens the right to vote and run for office in provincial and federal elections, and includes a right to effective representation. The text of s. 3 makes clear, however, that it guarantees "only the right to vote in elections of representatives of the federal and the provincial legislative assemblies" (Haig, at p. 1031 (emphasis added)) and "does not extend to municipal elections" (p. 1031 (emphasis added), citing P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd ed. 1992), vol. 2, at p. 42-2). Simply put, ss. 2(b) and 3 record distinct rights which must be given independent meaning (Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 877, at paras. 79-80; Harper, at para. 67). Effective representation is not a principle of s. 2(b), nor can the concept be imported wholesale from a different Charter right.

Note that municipal voting rights are still protected by the equality guarantee in s.15 of the Charter, meaning that if municipality has elections, voting rights in those elections must be available equally to all within the meaning of s 15 (and s 1) of the Charter.

Section 3 is not subject to the notwithstanding clause in s.33 of the Charter. Section 3 is subject to section 1 through the Oakes test, such that limits on the right to vote can be upheld as valid if they are reasonable limits 'prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.' Across Canada, at both the federal and provincial levels, statutes prescribe limits on the right to vote. Some of these limits have not been found to be justifiable, while others remain.

Similarly, statutes prescribe limits on who is eligible to be a candidate in a federal or provincial election. Again, various limits on the ability to run for office have been invalidated, but some remain (discussed below in Part 1.4.1).

Finally, note that section 3 does not refer to the Senate. Sections 23 and 24 of the Constitution Act, 1867 prescribe the qualifications for being a Senator, qualifications which were the main issue in the famous Persons case excerpted in section 1.4.1.2.

1.2.2 Democratic conventions and parliament privilege: the unwritten practices of democracy

For the unwritten portions of the Constitution of Canada, the unwritten principle addressed above is complemented by a number of constitutional conventions. Conventions dictate relationships between branches of government, particularly between the executive and legislative branches. For a convention to exist, there must be a rule that political actors feel is binding and which has a reason underlying it: Re: Resolution to amend the Constitution, 1981 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 753. Courts can declare that a convention exists and whether it has been breached or not, but there are generally no legal remedies for a breach of a convention, only political ones. Whether courts would impose legal remedies for a breach of a convention in extraordinary circumstances is more possible in Canada than in the past: see Miller v. the Prime Minister, 2019 UKSC 0192 .

One of the most important conventions for Canadian democracy is 'responsible government.' Responsible government dictates that the government is accountable to the House of Commons. It is reflected in the fact that a government falls if it loses a vote in the House on a matter of confidence, including money bills. Important conventions also operate around the calling of elections and the operation of the House post-election.

Another set of rights that are largely unwritten stem from 'parliamentary privilege.' Members of Parliament and Senators have certain rights which are protected by parliamentary privilege. An example is the right of an MP not to be subject to civil liability for comments made in the House in parliamentary proceedings. These privileges have been partly codified into standing orders and some statutes and are recognized but also limited by the Constitution Act, 1867. The House and Senate as institutions also have some collective privileges. The courts have gradually narrowed privileges over time to protect only those necessary to the functioning of the legislative body: Chagnon v Syndicat de la fonction publique et parapublique du Québec, 2018 SCC 39 (CanLII), [2018] 2 SCR 687 (Chagnon).

Chagnon sets out the role of parliamentary privilege in Canadian democracy:

> [18] Legislative assemblies in Canada, including provincial legislative assemblies, received "certain very moderate [parliamentary] privileges" through the common law as an inherent and necessary component of their legislative function, and by virtue of the preamble of the Constitution Act, 1867 (New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 319, at p. 377, citing R. M. Dawson, The Government of Canada (5th ed. 1970), at p. 338; see also New Brunswick Broadcasting, at pp. 345 and 374-81; Canada (House of Commons) v. Vaid, 2005 SCC 30, [2005] 1 SCR 667, at para. 29(3); J. P. J. Maingot, Parliamentary Immunity in Canada (2016), at pp. 13 and 19).
> [19] Parliamentary privilege is defined as "the sum of the privileges, immunities and powers enjoyed by the Senate, the House of Commons and provincial legislative assemblies, and by each member individually, without which they could not discharge their functions" (Vaid, at para. 29(2)). These privileges, immunities, and powers exceed those afforded to the general population (Erskine May's Treatise on The Law, Privileges, Proceedings and Usage of Parliament (24th ed. 2011), by M. Jack, at p. 203). Therefore, parliamentary privilege "is an exemption from some duty, burden, attendance or liability to which others are subject" (Maingot, at p. 13). Decisions falling within the scope of parliamentary privilege cannot be reviewed by an external body, including a court (Stockdale v. Hansard (1839), 9 Ad. & E. 1, 112 E.R. 1112 (Q.B.), at p. 1168; New Brunswick Broadcasting, at pp. 350 and 382-84; Vaid, at para. 29(9)).
> [20] Many countries afford special protections to the legislative branch of government. For instance, numerous civil law and common law jurisdictions guarantee the immunity of elected representatives from liability for speech that relates to their legislative work.[1] Legislative immunities ensure the proper functioning of a representative democracy. They cultivate a space in which the voices of the people, including those who hold potentially unpopular opinions, can be heard and considered.[2]
> [21] Legislative privileges also allow legislative bodies to fearlessly hold the executive branch of government to account. They thus help preserve the separation and balance of power between the different branches of government (see e.g. Gravel v. United States, 408 U.S. 606 (1972), at p. 616; R. S. Mehta, "Sir Thomas' Blushes: Protecting Parliamentary Immunity in Modern Parliamentary Democracies" (2012), 17 E.H.R.L.R. 309, at p. 309).

1.2.3 Duration of legislative bodies

How long the House of Commons may continue between elections has been a long-standing constitutional issue. The constitutional convention is for elections to occur at least every four years. In a parliamentary system, elections can occur earlier if the government loses a confidence vote or when the Prime Minister recommends that the Governor General dissolve the House.

A statutory 'fixed-election date' in the Canada Elections Act at s.56.1 sets an election four years after the previous one. A statutory fixed-election date does not alter the Governor General's constitutional authority to dissolve Parliament earlier at the request of the Prime Minister (Conacher v Canada (Prime Minister), 2009 FC 920, affirmed by 2010 FCA 131, leave to appeal to the SCC denied, [2010] S.C.C.A. No. 315) (excerpted below at subsection 1.4.5).

The Charter now sets an outer constitutional limit on the duration of the House of Commons or a provincial legislature, echoing earlier provisions in the Constitution Act, 1867. Section 4(1) of the Charter sets a maximum duration for the House of Commons or a provincial legislature at 5 years. This provision operates as a guarantee of periodic elections, so that the House or a legislature may remain democratically accountable.

Section 4(2) permits the House or a provincial legislature to continue beyond five years in narrow and extraordinary circumstances. In situations of 'real or apprehended war, invasion or insurrection' the five year limit does not apply. Note that the grounds for the extension do not include a public health emergency.

An extension of the time between elections to more than five years pursuant to s.4(2) requires a 2/3 majority vote in the House or a provincial legislature. This requirement will in most situations require Opposition legislators to vote with the government to obtain the requisite super-majority in the House or legislature. It is unclear if uses of s.4(2) would be subject to s.1 of the Charter. Section 1 requires pursuant to the Oakes test that any limits on a right in the Charter must be proportionate and demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. If Oakes does not apply, then the super-majority requirement and the narrow grounds for invoking s.4(2), which relate to armed conflict, are the checks on its potential misuse.

1.3 The range of meanings for democracy and democratic rights

Part 1.1.1 discussed two key cases which together provide the fullest jurisprudential understanding of the unwritten principle of democracy in Canadian public law. Part 1.2 set out the key textual sources for the principle of democracy in the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Constitution Act, 1982. Both the unwritten and written sources for this fundamental principle connect with a larger historical and philosophical conversation about the meaning of democracy and democratic rights.

The most basic understanding of democracy is the idea of government by majority rule which includes a process in which the governed consent to be governed. The Supreme Court emphasized this understanding of democracy—the "supremacy of the sovereign will of the people"—in the Secession Reference excerpted above (at paras 61-62). We can source this idea back to the ancient Greeks who, in the 5th century, created democracy as a system of government instantiated and run by eligible individuals (demokratia, or rule by the people). Who exactly is considered to be an eligible or qualified elector is a recurring problem for democracies—this is a constitutive question of membership in a political community, the answer to which has changed over time. The ancient Greeks limited the class of eligible persons to propertied male citizens. We will consider the history of exclusion and inclusion in Canadian democracy in Part 1.4 below. The most prominent contemporary exclusion is the section 3 Charter restriction on the right to vote and to hold office to 'citizens'; non-citizens, such as permanent residents and refugees, do not have a full set of democratic rights in our polity.

Elections are the process we use to facilitate and determine consent and sovereign will. In Canada, consent and sovereign will are manifested in the existence of freely elected legislative bodies at both the provincial (eg, legislative assemblies) and federal level (eg, the House of Commons). At the federal level, Parliament is not fully democratic since the second House—the Senate—is currently appointed, rather than elected. Provinces do not have second chambers.

Elections also communicate citizens' views about who best represents them in government and how that resulting government will realize particular public policy preferences. These public policy preferences can become the content of statutes and amendments as well as inform decisions made by executive actors in, for example, Cabinet and in the administrative state. In a direct democracy, law is made by the people themselves through processes like referenda.

The Westminster system traditionally contemplates government by the party that wins a majority of the seats in a first-past-the-post electoral process, but this is not the only valid and legitimate form of government. Majority, minority and coalition governments are all possible in the Westminster system and each type realizes electoral preferences in different ways. For a vigorous defence of the benefits of minority governments in Canada, see constitutional law scholar Peter H. Russell's Two Cheers for Minority Government, 2nd ed (Toronto: UofT Press, 2023). Proportional representation systems tend to track the popular vote better and also provide more room for smaller parties to have a share of the electoral results.

The fact that legislatures represent the preferences of the citizen-electorate (often, though not always, through one party receiving a majority) connects the democratic principle to the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. Before 1982, Canadian courts followed British tradition by charactering the parliamentary principle as 'supreme'—ie, parliamentary supremacy. As a result of section 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 which enshrines constitutional supremacy, this principle has been re-branded the principle of parliamentary sovereignty. Parliament is therefore still an independent branch of government with its own jurisdiction and rule-making powers which represents the will of the people (ie, sovereign), but it no longer reigns supreme over the other two branches. This fundamental change has had special import for the judicial branch which can now review executive action (as it has traditionally done) and can now fully review legislative action. Prior to 1982, courts could only review legislative action on federalism grounds so judicial power has significantly expanded in scope. Critics of judicial power worry that parliamentary supremacy has been replaced by judicial supremacy, a recurring theme in this casebook concerning the tension between judicial creativity and judicial activism (see, eg, Ran Hirschl, Towards Juristocracy: The Origins and Consequences of the New Constitutionalism (Cambridge, MA: Harvard UP, 2004)).

1.4 Historical significance of the right to vote

This section briefly considers the history of enfranchisement—meaning the right to vote—in Canada. As discussed above in Part 1.1.1, the principle of democracy is not expressly part of the first Canadian Constitution; rather, it is implied through the Preamble in Constitution Act, 1867 which says that Canada's Constitution is "similar in principle to that of the United Kingdom".

Historically, legislative bodies could enact voting qualifications as they saw fit and could also, through clear statutory language, take away the right to vote. In Canada, provinces often protected the right to vote through human rights codes (eg, section 8 of the Saskatchewan Human Rights Code) or provincial charters (eg, section 22 of the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms) and courts traditionally protected the right to vote through statutory interpretation. Significantly, no constitutional right to vote (or the right to stand as a candidate in an election) existed until 1982 with the Charter's section 3 guarantee of democratic rights. When viewing the franchise over time, which Part 1.4.1 does in more detail, voting for most of the Canadian populace prior to the Charter was better conceived of as a privilege than a right. The inclusion in the Charter of s.3, with its constitutional protection for the right to vote, was therefore a seminal moment for Canadian democratic rights.

1.4.1 Extension of the franchise over time and current restrictions on the right to vote

At the time of Confederation, only men 21 years of age or older, who were British subjects and who owned property, were able to vote in federal elections (see, eg, section 41 New Brunswick and section 84 Ontario and Quebec in the Constitution Act, 1867). Indeed, only 15% of Canadians could vote in 1867, compared to 72% in 2011. At Confederation, the federal franchise was largely determined by criteria set by the provinces. Anyone who was excluded from voting provincially, could not vote federally. Control over the franchise shifted between the federal and the provincial levels until after the First World War.

This subsection presents a brief overview of the historical restrictions on the right to vote, how the franchise was expanded to include different people over time, and explains the current set of restrictions on this right.

1.4.1.1 Class and age

Until 1920, a property-based qualification required voters to own property of a certain value, and/or to pay rent, and/or to make a certain annual income in order to vote. Property restrictions on the right to vote were removed in 1920.

As a result of the Wartime Elections Act and Military Voters Act in 1917, all male members of the armed forces serving overseas could vote in a federal election. This change enabled some men under the age of 21 to vote.

In 1970, Parliament passed legislation that lowered the voting age from 21 to 18. Historically, then, the largest category of eligible voters has been men, with the expansion of the franchise to men of 18 years of age providing maximal historical inclusion in this category.

1.4.1.2 Women

At common law, women were generally denied the right to vote on the bases that, if married, they were not independent from their husbands, and also that they lacked the general competency to act in the public sphere. There are some pre-Confederation examples of women voting in Canada, but these instances remain an exception. At Confederation, both the federal level and all five of the existing provinces excluded women from the right to vote.

We can see the conventional legal view of women expressed in Edwards v. Canada (Attorney General), 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC) where Lord Sankey discussed the historical perception of women as lacking the competency to engage in public matters:

> The exclusion of women from all public offices is a relic of days more barbarous than ours, but it must be remembered that the necessity of the times often forced on man customs which in later years were not necessary. Such exclusion is probably due to the fact that the deliberative assemblies of the early tribes were attended by men under arms, and women did not bear arms. … Yet the tribes did not dispise the advice of women. …
> In England no woman under the degree of a Queen or a Regent, married or unmarried, could take part in the government of the State. A woman was under a legal incapacity to be elected to serve in Parliament and even if a peeress in her own right she was not, nor is, entitled as an incident of peerage to receive a writ of summons to the House of Lords.
> … Women were, moreover, subject to a legal incapacity to vote at the election of Members of Parliament … . …
> No doubt in the course of centuries there may be found cases of exceptional women and exceptional instances, but as Lord Usher, MR., said in De Souza v. Cobden, [1891] 1 Q.B. 687, at p. 691:— "By the common law of England women are not in general deemed capable of exercising public functions, though there are certain exceptional cases where a well-recognised custom to the contrary has become established." An instance may be referred to in the case of women being entitled to act as churchwardens and as sextons, the latter being put upon the ground that a sexton's duty was in the nature of a private trust … . The tradition existed till quite modern times: see Bebb v. Law Society, [1914] 1 Ch. 286, where it was held by the Court of Appeal that by inveterate usage women were under a disability by reason of their sex to become attorneys or solicitors.

The JCPC famously ruled that 'persons' included both sexes and therefore women could be considered 'qualified Persons' able to be summoned to the office of Senator under section 24 of the Constitution Act, 1867 .

Driving the extension of enfranchisement for women was, of course, the suffrage movement which had been advocating for the women's franchise since the middle of the 19th century, though the Canadian suffrage movement did not become fully active until the early years of the 20th century. The original draft of the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885 expanded the federal franchise to unmarried women and widows with property, but the final version reverted to the older eligibility requirement of being "male person[s]".

In the 19th century, women obtained the right to vote in some municipal and school board elections in some provinces. Women's suffrage was first achieved in 1916 in Manitoba where women who were of British descent or citizenship, 21 years of age or older, and not otherwise disqualified could vote provincially and/or hold provincial office. Saskatchewan and Alberta quickly followed that same year with the first women being elected into office in Alberta in 1917. Women won the franchise and the right to hold provincial office in Ontario in 1917 and also in British Columbia (with the exception of Asian and Indigenous women), while Nova Scotia followed in 1918.

Change happened again at the federal level during the First World War. In 1917, Parliament enacted the Wartime Elections Act and Military Voters Act which extended the right to vote to women serving in the armed forces and female relatives of soldiers. In 1918, women won the right to vote in federal elections if they met the same eligibility criteria as men, although First Nations women could only vote if they give up their status and treaty rights. In 1919, women became eligible to stand for office in the House of Commons.

Women won right to vote and hold elected office in the Yukon in 1919, in 1922 in Prince Edward Island, in 1925 in Newfoundland and Labrador, in 1940 in Quebec, and in 1951 in the Northwest Territories.

It was not until 1957 that Ellen Louks Fairclough became the first female member of federal Cabinet.

1.4.1.3 Minority groups

A number of minority groups were prevented from exercising their democratic rights in Canada: African Canadians, Asian and South Asian Canadians, and some Canadians of European descent from countries considered enemy powers during wartime.

The British Slavery Abolition Act of 1833 abolished slavery throughout the British colonies, but did not take effect in Canada until August 1, 1834. Black people become British citizens and therefore African Canadian men became entitled to vote. Unsurprisingly, racial discrimination continued to impede their ability to exercise the vote for decades after.

While Canada initially welcomed immigration from China in order to build the transcontinental railway, national sentiment turned and in the same year as the 'last spike' was driven for the CPR railway at Eagle Pass in British Columbia, the Electoral Franchise Act of 1885 barred Chinese Canadians from voting at the federal level. Provincial exclusion had occurred earlier in British Columbia which disenfranchised Chinese Canadians in 1872. Previously, Chinese men (indeed, every male inhabitant of that province) had been able to vote and in some districts, Chinese Canadian residents formed the majority of voters. Saskatchewan passed a similar disenfranchisement law in 1908, but restored the franchise to Chinese Canadians in 1944. In 1895, British Columbia amended the Provincial Voters' Act in order to disenfranchise male Chinese, Japanese, and South Asian (ie, so-called 'Indian' and 'Hindu') Canadians. The disenfranchisement of Chinese and Japanese Canadians in British Columbia was upheld by the JCPC in Cunningham v Tomey Homma [1903] A.C. 151 (at p2):

> There is no doubt that, if it is within the capacity of the Province to enact the electoral law, the claimant is disqualified by the express language of the Statute, but it is contended that the 91st and 92nd sections of the British North American Act have deprived the Province of the power of making any such provision as to disqualify a naturalized Japanese from electoral privileges. It is maintained that section 91(25) enacts that the whole subject of naturalization is reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of the Dominion, while the Naturalization Act of Canada enacts that a naturalized alien shall within Canada be entitled to all political and other rights, powers, and privileges to which a natural-born British subject is entitled in Canada. To this it is replied that by section 92(1) the constitution of the Province and any amendment of it are placed under the exclusive control of the provincial Legislature. The question which their Lordships have to determine is which of these two views is the right one, and in determining that question the policy or impolicy of such an enactment as that which excludes a particular race from the franchise is not a topic which their Lordships are entitled to consider.

While the 1917 federal Wartime Elections Act extended the right to vote to women in the armed forces and female relatives of military men, citizens of 'enemy alien' birth, primarily Germans and Ukrainians Canadians due to those countries' membership in the Austro-Hungarian empire, and some pacifist communities like the Mennonites, Doukhobors, and Hutterites were disenfranchised. In 1931 the federal government granted the franchise to Japanese Canadian veterans. They were the first Japanese Canadians able to exercise their right to vote.

The Dominion Elections Act of 1920 enfranchised many who had been disenfranchised during the First World War, such as those originating from countries with which Canada had been at war. Nevertheless, the Act stated that anyone who was disenfranchised by provincial legislation because of race would remain disenfranchised from the federal vote, and this exclusion applied to Chinese Canadians in Saskatchewan, and Indigenous, Chinese, Japanese, and South Asian Canadians in British Columbia.

Conscientious objectors were once again deprived of their voting rights from 1938 to 1955. Canadians born in an enemy nation or whose primary language was that of an enemy country were also again denied the right to vote.

The federal Citizenship Act extended the right to vote federally and provincially to Chinese Canadian and South Asian Canadian men and women in 1947, but not to Indigenous peoples and Japanese Canadians. That same year, British Columbia removed the words 'Chinese' and 'Hindus' from the list of those persons considered ineligible to vote. Finally, the federal government amended the Elections Act in 1948 removing race as a ground for exclusion from voting in federal elections. This change enabled Japanese Canadians to be enfranchised, but not Indigenous Canadians.

Since the 1950s, then, with the exception of First Nations and Inuit peoples, Canada has not denied the franchise—federally or provincially—on the basis of race.

1.4.1.4 Persons with disabilities

From 1898 to 1993, many citizens with intellectual disabilities were not permitted to vote in federal elections. Until 1993, section 14(4)(f) of the Canada Elections Act stipulated that a person who was "restrained of his liberty of movement or deprived of the management of his property by reason of 'mental disease'" could not vote. This language was removed partly in response to a successful Charter challenge in 1988. In Canadian Disability Rights Council v Canada, 1988 CanLII 9443 (FC), [1988] 3 FC 62, Reed J held that section 14(4)(f) conflicted with section 3 of the Charter and could not be saved under section 1. She reasoned that:

> Section 1 of the Charter allows for limitations which are demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. I have no doubt that one such limitation might be what I will call a requirement of mental competence or judgmental capacity. But, paragraph 14(4)(f) as presently drafted does not address itself only to mental competence or capacity in so far as that quality is required for the purposes of voting.
> It is more broadly framed than that. It denies people the right to vote on the basis of "mental disease". This clearly will include individuals who might suffer from a personality disorder which impairs their judgment in one aspect of their life only. There may be no reason on that basis to deprive them of the right to vote. What is more, paragraph 14(4)(f) does not deny all persons suffering from mental disease the right to vote, but only those whose liberty of movement has been restrained or whose property is under the control of a committee of estate. As counsel argued, a person mentally handicapped or suffering from a personality disorder might be supported at home or cared for by his or her family. That person would fall under neither of the categories in paragraph 14(4)(f) and would be entitled to vote.
> The limitation prescribed by paragraph 14(4)(f) is in that sense arbitrary. If it is intended as a test of mental competency, it is at the same time both too narrow and too wide. It catches people within its ambit who should not be there and, arguably, it does not catch people who perhaps should be.
> I accept counsel for the plaintiffs' argument that the assumption that a person suffering from any mental disability is incapacitated for all purposes, including voting, is simply a false assumption.

As a result, narrower restrictions exist on the right to vote at the federal level for people with mental disabilities. The current Act provides:

> 52 (1) The Chief Electoral Officer shall delete from the Register of Electors or Register of Future Electors the name of any person who
> (a) is dead;
> (b) is not an elector or future elector, as the case may be, subject to subsection 44(4);
> (c) requests in writing to have his or her name deleted;
> (d) is, by reason of mental incapacity, under a court-ordered protective regime, including guardianship, tutorship or curatorship, and whose authorized representative under the regime requests in writing that the person's name be deleted; or
> (e) is a future elector with a mental incapacity whose parent requests in writing that the future elector's name be deleted.

In 1992, Bill C-78 (An Act to Amend Certain Acts with Respect to Persons with Disabilities) amended the Canada Elections Act to make the voting and electoral processes more accessible to people with disabilities. These changes were partly in response to a 1992 Canadian Human Rights Tribunal decision—Canadian Paraplegic Assn. v Canada (Elections Canada), 1992 CanLII 284 (CHRT)—which found that, by failing to provide adequate access for persons in wheelchairs at several Manitoba polling station during the 1984 federal election, Elections Canada had discriminated against persons with disabilities. The current Act states:

> 121 (1) A polling station shall be in premises that are accessible to electors with a disability.

Further legislative change occurred in 1993 where Bill C-114 amended the Canada Elections Act to replace the onerous process of proxy voting with special ballot voting (ie, voting by mail) to all electors. This created a more level playing field for persons with disabilities and others who cannot or do not wish to vote at their local station either on election day or at advance polls. Other sections of the Act (see, eg, section 18) consider the means to communicate with voters who have disabilities and the use of technology to assist voters with disabilities.

Barriers still remain for people with mental and physical disabilities, however, in terms of being able to access the ballot box or because they require assistance in order to mark their ballot at the voting station. In another case concerning (in)accessibility of polling stations, Hughes and Canadian Human Rights Commission v Elections Canada (Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, February 12, 2010, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal underscored the importance of elections and the right to vote electors who have disabilities:

> [40] The right to vote is protected in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: section 3. It is a right, and I would argue, a responsibility or duty of citizens of this country. It is the legal duty of the State to ensure that all barriers, whenever possible, are removed so that citizens may vote. Nowhere is this more significant than for people with disabilities. Professor Frazee was eloquent in articulating the barriers that people with disabilities face in our society, structurally and attitudinally, including the intricacies of disability disadvantage. She set out the context as it would affect a person with a disability attempting to vote. Included in this was the impact of disabled voters going to separate but equal facilities to exercise their franchise or facilities with only back entrances available to them. There should be no hierarchy of citizenship when it comes to voting in Canada: no second class voters. Professor Frazee's expert evidence and Mr. Hughes' testimony showed the damaging impact on persons with disabilities going away from the polling site thinking that their presence was at best unexpected, and at worst unwelcome.
> [41] I also note the evidence of the 2006 Statistics Canada report showing the number of persons with various impairments and disabilities in Canada: 4.4 million Canadians with an activity limitation yielding a disability rate of 14.3%. What is more telling is the demographic trend upward of Canadians reaching the status of senior citizen and the resulting increase of persons with disabilities in Canada, including those with mobility impairments.

1.4.1.5 Absentee citizens, Expatriates and Prisoners

Absentee citizens, expatriate Canadians, and prisoners who were citizens were also historically excluded from the franchise. Section 3.1 Who has the right to cast a ballot considers how the Charter struck down these restrictions and changed the Canada Elections Act, with the result that all these citizens are now enfranchised.

Restrictions on persons temporarily absent from Canada were declared unconstitutional in Hoogbruin v A.G.B.C., 1985 CanLII 335 (BC CA). The reviewing court held that where the sole reason BC voters were unable to exercise their right to vote was that no procedural mechanism like absentee ballots existed which would reasonably enable them to do offended s. 3 of the Charter. Moreover, the omission of provision for an absentee ballot contradicted the purpose of the provincial Election Act. The court also looked to the federal level and other provinces which enabled absentee voting to bolster its conclusion. This changed federally in 2018. Prior to the federal changes, Canadians living abroad for extended periods of time could only vote if they were in the federal civil service, the military, or worked for an international organization of which Canada was a member.

Persons who are absent from Canada can vote by a special mail-in ballot. To be included in the International Register of Electors, a Canadian vote must be qualified to vote (ie, a Canadian citizen at least 18 years old on election day) and have lived in Canada at some point in their life.

1.4.1.6 Current restrictions

In earlier times, members of certain occupations (eg, government workers, judges, and election officials) could not vote. Before the Charter, provincial civil servants unsuccessfully challenged their disqualification from the vote due to the restrictions on the political activity by public servants (see Ontario (Attorney General) v OPSEU, 1987 CanLII 71 (SCC), [1987] 2 SCR 2). Federally appointed judges first got the right to vote in 1988 as a result of Muldoon v Canada, 1988 CanLII 9407 (FC), [1988] 3 FC 628.

Prior to the Elections Modernization Act, S.C. 2018, c. 31, the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada and the Assistant Chief Electoral Officer could not vote due to an occupational restriction. The rationale for the restriction was to ensure that the CEO and Elections Canada would be perceived as neutral. This Act repealed the restriction contained in section 5 of the Canada Elections Act.

At this moment, to exercise the right to vote federally, one must be a Canadian citizen who is at least 18 years old on election day and can prove their identity and address. Unhoused individuals will not be denied their right to vote. Many types of identity cards are accepted and community shelters or soup kitchens can provide a letter confirming that person's identity and/or address. A registered voter can also 'vouch' for an unhoused individual to confirm their identity and address.

As it now stands, all disqualifications of citizens, and restrictions on the right to vote, are contrary to the Charter unless they can be justified under section 1. Key questions remain concerning whether non-citizens should be eligible to vote at the provincial or municipal levels of government and whether the voting age should be lowered below the age of 18 for citizens. Section 3.1 Who has the right to cast a ballot more closely examines recent legal challenges to the current age restriction on voting.

1.4.2 First Nations, Inuit, and Métis peoples

Before Confederation in 1867, Indigenous peoples were not overtly excluded from the franchise. Nevertheless, voting qualifications, the fact that many lived on reserves, and their status as 'wards' of the State effectively denied them the ability to vote. Indigenous men could vote if they explicitly gave up their status in order to assimilate. Two colonial statutes promoted this route: the Gradual Civilization Act of 1857 and the 1859 Act Respecting Civilization and Enfranchisement of Certain Indians. The link between colonial oppression and democratic rights is historically strong in Canada.

In 1876, the Indian Act implemented a number of harmful policies that pivoted around the right to vote. Section 86(1) required compulsory enfranchisement for First Nations who received a university degree and/or pursued a profession (eg, clergymen, medical doctors, lawyers). This version of the Indian Act also enabled First Nations peoples to vote if they give up their Indian status and treaty rights in exchange for enfranchisement. Giving up their status meant that they were no longer 'Indian,' a political result which was part of the overall assimilationist efforts of the federal government under then Prime Minister Sir John A Macdonald. Despite this, since most Indigenous men could not meet the property qualifications, they were effectively barred from voting even if they gave up their status. Additionally, status Indian women were barred from voting in band council elections. The Corbiere case, excerpted in section 4.1.1.1, considers in depth the discrimination and exclusion faced by Indigenous women and their children as a result of the 'marrying out' policy.

When Prime Minister Sir John A. Macdonald introduced the original draft of the Electoral Franchise Act in 1885, the Act contemplated expanding the franchise to First Nations living on reserves who met the property qualifications. The final version excluded this change partly in reaction to the North-West Resistance. In what can only be seen as retaliation, the final version excluded all 'Indians' in Manitoba, British Columbia, Keewatin, and the North-West Territories as well as those on reserves who did not own property of a certain value. These restrictions were removed by Prime Minister Wilfrid Laurier in 1898.

Many Indigenous Canadians signed up to serve in the First World War. The Military Voters Act in 1917 enabled First Nations men who were enrolled in the armed forces to vote federally without giving up their status. In order to increase both enfranchisement and assimilation, the federal government amended the Indian Act in 1920 to force the enfranchisement of approximately 5,000 First Nations individuals without their consent. In 1924, the federal franchise was extended to status Indian veterans of the First World War, including those living on reserves.

Given that enfranchisement usually involved loss of status and treaty rights, and the fact that Canadian society did not generally support extending the franchise to Indigenous persons, very little changed between the First and Second World Wars. Importantly, after both wars, Indigenous veterans who lived on a reserve lost the right to vote.

After the Second World War, provinces began to extend the franchise to members of First Nations communities: British Columbia (1949), Manitoba, (1952), Ontario (1954), Saskatchewan, the Northwest Territories and Yukon (1960), New Brunswick (1963), Prince Edward Island (1963), Alberta (1965), and finally Quebec (1969).

It was not until 1960 that amendments to the Canada Elections Act gave persons with the legal status of 'Indian' the right to vote and run as a candidate in Canadian elections. This change meant that First Nations women and men could vote no matter where they lived and without giving up their status.

Inuit peoples did not have the right to vote in the early days as they inhabited lands that were under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company. Legislation enacted in 1934 specifically disqualified Inuit peoples from voting in federal elections. This changed in 1950 when Inuit peoples became eligible to vote in federal elections. They could not effectively exercise this vote, however, until 1952 when more ballot boxes were placed in communities, especially those more isolated communities in the north. Members of Inuit nations now comprise the majority of voters in four northern regions: Inuvialuit, Nunavut, Nunavik, and Nunatsiavut (collectively known as Inuit Nunangat).

Throughout this history, so long as Métis individuals met existing qualifications, they could vote both provincially and federally. Métis women, along with most Canadian women, could vote in 1918.

As discussed above in section 1.3, the principle of democracy is comprised of a number of key features. According to the Supreme Court in the Secession Reference, the democratic principle is connected to the self-government of a sovereign people. While the Court was primarily considering the principle of self-government in relation to Canada and Quebec, this component of democracy is constitutionally crucial for Indigenous peoples. Section 4 below considers both colonial and customary modes of self-government exercised through either Western-style voting or traditional practices to select leaders.

1.4.3 Voting and links to other constitution principles

Canada's history of the right to vote shows how the principle of democracy is inextricably linked to other important constitutional principles such as the rule of law, federalism, parliamentary sovereignty, responsible government, equality, and the protection of minorities. It also underscores how the colonial history of the franchise has negatively impacted Indigenous peoples and the principles of self-government and reconciliation in that context. What this history discloses is the denial, not just of democratic rights, but other important constitutional principles: the unequal treatment of women, lower income individuals, and persons with disabilities; the lack of protection for minority groups; and, the subordination of Indigenous sovereignty to colonial power.

Our electoral system imperfectly assists in ensuring that our representatives reflect a diverse society. The hope remains that Canadian democracy is an "evolutionary democracy moving in uneven steps toward the goal of universal suffrage and more effecting representation" (R*eference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.),* 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 15 cited in the Secession Reference at para 63). In Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), [2002] 3 SCR 519, 2002 SCC 68, considered more fully below in Part 3.1, the Supreme Court highlighted this aspect of the democratic principle when it struck down section 51(e) of the Canada Elections Act which denied the right to vote to penitentiary inmates serving a sentence of two years of more. The Majority held that the section 3 right to vote is so fundamental for a well-functioning democracy that the government would have to provide a very compelling justification under section 1 to deny it. The Majority disagreed that the denial of such a fundamental right could legitimately advance democratic values such as inclusiveness, equality, and citizen participation. Moreover, the Majority rejected disenfranchisement as a valid form of state punishment, partly because the history of disenfranchisement has had such a deleterious effect on Indigenous peoples who are also disproportionately incarcerated in Canadian penitentiaries.

Our history shows that this more robust conception of the democratic principle, and constant political and legal activity by democratic citizens, has supported the extension of the franchise to men without property, women, minority groups, and Indigenous peoples.

1.4.4 Elections and judicial review of contested election results

Contested elections are a problem for any political system. One can only look to the United States where two examples of context elections have produced an enormous amount of discord and instability: 1) the constitutional case Bush v. Gore, 531 U.S. 98 (2000); and 2) President Trump's repeated assertions that the 2020 election result was illegitimate and that he should have won.

Canada's experience with contested election results has been much more low key. Historically, the judiciary have had little involvement in the electoral process. Before the Charter, judges' involvement mostly consisted of resolving election disputes as well as recounts in particularly close races.

The 41st federal election held on May 2, 2011 generated a number of disputes and accusations about electoral improprieties and errors such as dirty tricks, fraud, and improperly cast or counted votes in particular ridings. Conservative MP Ted Opitz narrowly won Etobicoke Centre by a plurality of only 26 votes over Liberal incumbent Borys Wrzesnewskyj. Errors and mistakes made by electoral officials in record keeping came to light. Wrzesnewskyj applied to have the election annulled on the basis that there existed "irregularities … that affected the result of the election" under s. 524(1)(b) of the Canada Elections Act ('Act'). Wrzesnewskyj contested the ballot results at the Ontario Superior Court of Justice. The Court granted the application, finding that 79 votes could be counted as 'irregularities' under the Act and that, since this number exceeded the plurality of 26 votes, the election results could not stand and would be overturned. Opitz appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada as of right.

1.4.4.1 Opitz v Wrzesnewskyj, 2012 SCC 55 (CanLII), [2012] 3 SCR 7

Opitz v Wrzesnewskyj, 2012 SCC 55 (CanLII), [2012] 3 SCR 7 marks the first time that the Supreme Court of Canada has ruled on an election outcome since the Second World War. In the Majority decision, jointly written by Justices Marshall Rothstein and Michael Moldaver, the SCC ruled that minor or technical administrative errors should not be sufficient to overturn an election. Chief Justice McLachlin penned a sharp dissent in which she agreed with the lower court and, by tallying up the disqualified votes differently, disagreed with the Majority's evidentiary conclusions. She therefore agreed that the election should be annulled. This case is an apt example of how a reviewing court has used the principles of statutory interpretation to determine the scope and meaning of the Canada Elections Act.

> The judgment of Deschamps, Abella, Rothstein and Moldaver JJ was delivered by
> ROTHSTEIN AND MOLDAVER JJ:
> I. Introduction
> [1] A candidate who lost in a close federal election attempts to set aside the result of that election. We are asked to disqualify the votes of several Canadian citizens based on administrative mistakes, notwithstanding evidence that those citizens were in fact entitled to vote. We decline the invitation to do so. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canada Elections Act, S.C. 2000, c. 9 ("Act"), have the clear and historic purposes of enfranchising Canadian citizens, such that they may express their democratic preference, and of protecting the integrity of our electoral process. Following these objectives and the wording of the Act, we reject the candidate's attempt to disenfranchise entitled voters and so undermine public confidence in the electoral process.
> [2] At issue in this appeal are the principles to be applied when a federal election is challenged on the basis of "irregularities". We are dealing here with a challenge based on administrative errors. There is no allegation of any fraud, corruption or illegal practices. Nor is there any suggestion of wrongdoing by any candidate or political party. Given the complexity of administering a federal election, the tens of thousands of election workers involved, many of whom have no on-the-job experience, and the short time frame for hiring and training them, it is inevitable that administrative mistakes will be made. If elections can be easily annulled on the basis of administrative errors, public confidence in the finality and legitimacy of election results will be eroded. Only irregularities that affect the result of the election and thereby undermine the integrity of the electoral process are grounds for overturning an election.
> [3] The 41st Canadian federal election took place on May 2, 2011. In the electoral district (or "riding") of Etobicoke Centre, 52,794 votes were cast. After a judicial recount, Ted Opitz was the successful candidate with a plurality of 26 votes. Borys Wrzesnewskyj was the runner-up.
> [4] Mr. Wrzesnewskyj applied under s. 524(1)(b) of the Act, to have the election annulled, on the basis that there were "irregularities … that affected the result of the election". The relevant provisions of the Act are contained in the Appendix to these reasons. The application was heard by Justice Lederer of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice (2012 ONSC 2873, 110 O.R. (3d) 350). Lederer J. concluded that 79 votes amounted to irregularities that affected the result of the election. He declared the election "null and void" (para. 154). Mr. Opitz appealed as of right to this Court and Mr. Wrzesnewskyj cross-appealed (s. 532(1) of the Act).

III. Analysis

A. The Canada Elections Act

[10] The right of every citizen to vote, guaranteed by s. 3 of the Charter, lies at the heart of Canadian democracy. The franchise has gradually broadened in Canada over the course of history from male property owners 21 years of age and older to the present universal suffrage of citizens aged 18 and over. Universal suffrage is reflected in s. 3 of the Act, which provides that a person is "qualified" to vote if he or she is a Canadian citizen and is 18 years of age or older.

[12] The Act also sets out detailed procedures for voting that turn the constitutional right of citizens to vote into a reality on election day. What follows is a brief description of the procedural provisions that give rise to the issues in this appeal.

[14] Many electors will be on the OLE of their assigned polling division, by "enumeration". Since age and citizenship are prerequisites for inclusion on the OLE, those listed do not have to establish their age and citizenship when they come to vote. To vote, these electors must prove their identity and residence by one of three means: (a) providing government-issued identification with photo and address (s. 143(2)(a)); (b) providing two pieces of authorized identification, at least one of which establishes their address (s. 143(2)(b)); or (c) taking a prescribed oath and being vouched for by someone on the OLE in the same polling division (s. 143(3)). Once identity and residence are established, the voter is given a ballot.

[15] Electors who are not on the OLE can have their names added on election day by the process of "registration" (s. 161(1)). To register, the elector must provide proof of identity and residence. Where the elector satisfies these requirements, the DRO will complete a registration certificate and the elector will sign it (s. 161(4)). Electors who register must also establish their age and citizenship. This is accomplished by signing a declaration to that effect, which appears on the registration certificate.

[17] Vouching is a procedure designed to enable persons to vote who lack appropriate identification. An elector may prove his or her identity by being vouched for by a person whose name appears on the list of electors for the same polling division. A voucher can only vouch once. A person who has been vouched for cannot vouch for someone else in the same election (s. 161(1)(b), (6) and (7)).

[18] The Act also establishes requirements for record-keeping by election officials. After the issue of the writ to call an election, a returning officer appoints one DRO and one poll clerk for each polling station in the electoral district for which he or she is responsible (s. 32). Once the DRO is satisfied that an elector's identity and residence have been proven, the name of the elector is crossed off the OLE and the elector is allowed to vote (s. 143(4)). Once the elector has voted, the poll clerk is required to indicate on the list that the vote was cast by placing a check mark in a box set aside for that purpose (s. 162(b)). The poll clerk is also required to make entries in a "poll book". The required entries include various matters, such as whether an elector has taken an oath, the type of oath he or she has taken and the fact that the elector has voted using a registration certificate (s. 162(f) and (j)).

B. Interpreting the Relevant Statutory Provision

(1) Part 20 of the Act

[19] Part 20 of the Act deals with contested elections. Section 524(1) provides:

> 524. (1) Any elector who was eligible to vote in an electoral district, and any candidate in an electoral district, may, by application to a competent court, contest the election in that electoral district on the grounds that
> (a) under section 65 the elected candidate was not eligible to be a candidate; or
> (b) there were irregularities, fraud or corrupt or illegal practices that affected the result of the election.

[20] The remedy the court may provide is in s. 531(2):

> 531. …
> (2) After hearing the application, the court may dismiss it if the grounds referred to in paragraph 524(1)(a) or (b), as the case may be, are not established and, where they are established, shall declare the election null and void or may annul the election, respectively.

The use of the word "respectively" means that where the grounds in s. 524(1)(a) are established, a court must declare the election null and void; where the grounds in s. 524(1)(b) are established, a court may annul the election. Conversely, a court may not annul an election unless the grounds in s. 524(1)(b) are established.

[22] Under those provisions, if the grounds in para. (a) of s. 524(1) are established (the elected candidate was ineligible), then a court must declare the election null and void. In such circumstances it is as if no election was held. By contrast, if the grounds in para. (b) are established (there were irregularities, fraud or corrupt or illegal practices that affected the result of the election), a court may annul the election. Under these circumstances, a court must decide whether the election held was compromised in such a way as to justify its annulment.

[23] In deciding whether to annul an election, an important consideration is whether the number of impugned votes is sufficient to cast doubt on the true winner of the election or whether the irregularities are such as to call into question the integrity of the electoral process. Since voting is conducted by secret ballot in Canada, this assessment cannot involve an investigation into voters' actual choices. If a court is satisfied that, because of the rejection of certain votes, the winner is in doubt, it would be unreasonable for the court not to annul the election.

(2) Meaning of "Irregularities … That Affected the Result of the Election"

[24] This case involves interpreting the phrase "irregularities … that affected the result of the election". The phrase is composed of two elements: "irregularities" and "affected the result". As we shall explain, "irregularities" are serious administrative errors that are capable of undermining the electoral process — the type of mistakes that are tied to and have a direct bearing on a person's right to vote.

[25] "Affected the result" asks whether someone not entitled to vote, voted. Manifestly, if a vote is found to be invalid, it must be discounted, thereby altering the vote count, and in that sense, affecting the election's result. "Affected the result" could also include a situation where a person entitled to vote was improperly prevented from doing so, due to an irregularity on the part of an election official. That is not the case here and we need not address it.

[26] In construing the meaning of "irregularities … that affected the result", we have taken into account a number of aides to statutory interpretation, among them: (1) the constitutional right to vote and the objectives of the Act; (2) the text and context of s. 524; and (3) the competing democratic values engaged.

(a) The Constitutional Right to Vote and the Objectives of the Act

[27] Canadian democracy is founded upon the right to vote. Section 3 of the Charter provides:

> 3. Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

[28] The fundamental purpose of s. 3 of the Charter was described in Figueroa v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 37, [2003] 1 SCR 912, by Iacobucci J., for the majority, at para. 30:

> In the final analysis, I believe that the Court was correct in Haig [v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995], to define s. 3 with reference to the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process. Democracy, of course, is a form of government in which sovereign power resides in the people as a whole. In our system of democracy, this means that each citizen must have a genuine opportunity to take part in the governance of the country through participation in the selection of elected representatives. The fundamental purpose of s. 3, in my view, is to promote and protect the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the political life of the country. Absent such a right, ours would not be a true democracy.

[29] The constitutional guarantee of the right to vote in s. 3 of the Charter is a fundamental provision, not subject to constitutional override under s. 33 of the Charter. Section 3 provides that citizens have the right to vote "in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly". The right to vote in the election of "members of the House of Commons" reflects Canada's constitutional character as a parliamentary form of government. Citizens have the right to vote in a specific electoral district, choosing among various candidates who wish to be the Member of Parliament for that district: see Henry v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 BCSC 610, 7 B.C.L.R. (5th) 70, at para. 139.

[30] Section 6 of the Act recognizes that all persons meeting the three requirements of age, citizenship and residence are "entitled" to vote. It reads:

> 6. Subject to this Act, every person who is qualified as an elector is entitled to have his or her name included in the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she is ordinarily resident and to vote at the polling station for that polling division.

Section 6 uses the term "polling division". Polling divisions exist within electoral districts for administrative simplicity and voter convenience on election day (J. P. Boyer, Election Law in Canada: The Law and Procedure of Federal, Provincial and Territorial Elections (1987), vol. I, at p. 101). The Charter right to vote is for the Member of Parliament for the electoral district in which the voter resides.

[31] On a plain reading of s. 6, qualification and residence in a polling division give an individual the entitlement or right to be included on the list of electors for that polling division, and to vote. Section 6 does not provide that inclusion on the list of electors is a prerequisite to the right to vote. Such a reading reverses the effect of the provision. Entitlement to be on the list and entitlement to vote are consequences of being a citizen, being of age and being resident in the polling division.

[32] In this regard, it should be noted that s. 6 is a complete definition of "entitlement" in the Act. The definition is not altered by any other provision. "Entitlement" consists only of the fundamental requirements of age, citizenship, and residence.

[33] In so concluding, we recognize that the opening words of s. 6 are "[s]ubject to this Act". However, a distinction must be made between the requirements of "entitlement" in s. 6 itself, which appears in Part 1 of the Act under the heading "Electoral Rights", and the procedural mechanisms applicable on election day which appear in Part 9 of the Act under the heading "Voting". The Act establishes procedures to allow those citizens who have the right to vote to do so on election day. For example, ss. 148.1 and 149, which appear in Part 9, require procedures to be followed in establishing identity and residence, and in registering, before voting. These are procedural provisions designed to satisfy election officials that voters have the attributes that entitle them to vote. The purpose of procedural provisions in the Act is to enfranchise those persons having a right to vote under s. 6, and to prevent persons without the right to vote, from voting.

[34] The procedural safeguards in the Act are important; however, they should not be treated as ends in themselves. Rather, they should be treated as a means of ensuring that only those who have the right to vote may do so. It is that end that must always be kept in sight.

[37] It is well recognized in the jurisprudence that where electoral legislation is found to be ambiguous, it should be interpreted in a way that is enfranchising: Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995. Although he was in dissent in that case, Cory J. made the following observations at pp. 1049-50, with which L'Heureux-Dubé J., for the majority, at p. 1028, expressed total agreement:

> The courts have always recognized the fundamental importance of the vote and the necessity to give a broad interpretation to the statutes which provide for it. This traditional approach is not only sound it is essential for the preservation of democratic rights. The principle was well expressed in Cawley v. Branchflower (1884), 1 B.C.R. (Pt. II) 35 (S.C.). There Crease J. wrote at p. 37:
> > The law is very jealous of the franchise, and will not take it away from a voter if the Act has been reasonably complied with … . It looks to realities, not technicalities or mere formalities, unless where forms are by law, especially criminal law, essential, or affect the subject-matter under dispute.
> > To the same effect in Re Lincoln Election (1876), 2 O.A.R. 316, Blake V.C. stated (at p. 323):
> > The Court is anxious to allow the person who claims it the right to exercise the franchise, in every case in which there has been a reasonable compliance with the statute which gives him the right he seeks to avail himself of. No merely formal or immaterial matter should be allowed to interfere with the voter exercising the franchise … .
> > It can be seen that enfranchising statutes have been interpreted with the aim and object of providing citizens with the opportunity of exercising this basic democratic right. Conversely restrictions on that right should be narrowly interpreted and strictly limited. [Emphasis deleted.]

[38] While enfranchisement is one of the cornerstones of the Act, it is not free-standing. Protecting the integrity of the democratic process is also a central purpose of the Act. The same procedures that enable entitled voters to cast their ballots also serve the purpose of preventing those not entitled from casting ballots. These safeguards address the potential for fraud, corruption and illegal practices, and the public's perception of the integrity of the electoral process. (See Henry, at paras. 305-6.) Fair and consistent observance of the statutory safeguards serves to enhance the public's faith and confidence in fair elections and in the government itself, both of which are essential to an effective democracy: Longley v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 ONCA 852, 88 O.R. (3d) 408, at para. 64, leave to appeal refused, [2008] 1 SCR x.

(b) The Text and Context of Section 524

[39] Just as the enfranchising purpose of the Act informs the interpretation of the phrase "irregularities … that affected the result" in s. 524, so too does the text of the provision itself. Parliament's use of the word "irregularities" in s. 524 of the Act is significant. A different phrase, "any non-compliance with the provisions of the Act", could have been used. Moreover, if Parliament had intended that any deviation from the statutory procedure be a basis on which to annul an election, it would have spoken in terms of "non-compliance". Instead, it used "irregularities", suggesting that Parliament intended to restrict the scope of administrative errors that give rise to overturning an election.

[40] How is the meaning of "irregularities" restricted? The well-known "associated words" or "noscitur a sociis" rule of interpretation assists in this regard. The rule states that a term or an expression should not be interpreted without taking the surrounding terms into account. "The meaning of a term is revealed by its association with other terms: it is known by its associates": 2747-3174 Québec Inc. v. Quebec (Régie des permis d'alcool), 1996 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 919, at para. 195 (emphasis deleted).

> The associated words rule is properly invoked when two or more terms linked by "and" or "or" serve an analogous grammatical and logical function within a provision. This parallelism invites the reader to look for a common feature among the terms. This feature is then relied on to resolve ambiguity or limit the scope of the terms. Often the terms are restricted to the scope of their broadest common denominator.

[42] The word "irregularities" appears as part of the following phrase: "irregularities, fraud or corrupt or illegal practices". These are words that speak to serious misconduct. To interpret "irregularity" as meaning any administrative error would mean reading it without regard to the related words.

[43] The common thread between the words "irregularities, fraud or corrupt or illegal practices" is the seriousness of the conduct and its impact on the integrity of the electoral process. Fraud, corruption and illegal practices are serious. Where they occur, the electoral process will be corroded. In associating the word "irregularity" with those words, Parliament must have contemplated mistakes and administrative errors that are serious and capable of undermining the integrity of the electoral process. (See Cusimano v. Toronto (City), 2011 ONSC 7271, 287 O.A.C. 355, at para. 62.)

(c) Competing Democratic Values

[44] Central to the issue before us is how willing a court should be to reject a vote because of statutory non-compliance. Although there are safeguards in place to prevent abuse, the Act accepts some uncertainty in the conduct of elections, since in theory, more onerous and accurate methods of identification and record-keeping could be adopted. The balance struck by the Act reflects the fact that our electoral system must balance several interrelated and sometimes conflicting values. Those values include certainty, accuracy, fairness, accessibility, voter anonymity, promptness, finality, legitimacy, efficiency and cost. But the central value is the Charter-protected right to vote.

[45] Our system strives to treat candidates and voters fairly, both in the conduct of elections and in the resolution of election failures. As we have discussed, the Act seeks to enfranchise all entitled persons, including those without paper documentation, and to encourage them to come forward to vote on election day, regardless of prior enumeration. The system strives to achieve accessibility for all voters, making special provision for those without identification to vote by vouching. Election officials are unable to determine with absolute accuracy who is entitled to vote. Poll clerks do not take fingerprints to establish identity. A voter can establish Canadian citizenship verbally, by oath. The goal of accessibility can only be achieved if we are prepared to accept some degree of uncertainty that all who voted were entitled to do so.

[46] The practical realities of election administration are such that imperfections in the conduct of elections are inevitable. As recognized in Camsell v. Rabesca, 1987 CanLII 8600 (NWT SC), [1987] N.W.T.R. 186 (S.C.), it is clear that "in every election, a fortiori those in urban ridings, with large numbers of polls, irregularities will virtually always occur in one form or another" (p. 198). A federal election is only possible with the work of tens of thousands of Canadians who are hired across the country for a period of a few days or, in many cases, a single 14-hour day. These workers perform many detailed tasks under difficult conditions. They are required to apply multiple rules in a setting that is unfamiliar. Because elections are not everyday occurrences, it is difficult to see how workers could get practical, on-the-job experience.

[47] The provision for contesting elections in Part 20 of the Act serves to restore accuracy and reliability where it has been compromised. However, tension exists between allowing an application to contest an election on the basis of irregularities and the need for a prompt, final resolution of election outcomes. The Act provides, in s. 525(3):

(3) An application shall be dealt with without delay and in a summary way. …

[48] It should be remembered that annulling an election would disenfranchise not only those persons whose votes were disqualified, but every elector who voted in the riding. That voters will have the opportunity to vote in a by-election is not a perfect answer, as Professor Steven F. Huefner writes:

> … a new election can never be run on a clean slate, but will always be colored by the perceived outcome of the election it superseded. New elections may also be an inconvenience for the voters, and almost certainly will mean that a different set of voters, with different information, will be deciding the election. Moreover, there can be no guarantee that the new election will itself be free from additional problems, including fraud. In the long term, rerunning elections might lead to disillusionment or apathy, even if in the short term they excite interest in the particular contest. Frequent new elections also would undercut democratic stability by calling into question the security and efficiency of the voting mechanics.

[49] Permitting elections to be lightly overturned would also increase the "margin of litigation". The phrase "margin of litigation" describes an election outcome close enough to draw post-election legal action: Huefner, at pp. 266-67.

[50] The current system of election administration in Canada is not designed to achieve perfection, but to come as close to the ideal of enfranchising all entitled voters as possible. Since the system and the Act are not designed for certainty alone, courts cannot demand perfect certainty. Rather, courts must be concerned with the integrity of the electoral system. This overarching concern informs our interpretation of the phrase "irregularities … that affected the result".

(d) Conclusion: The Meaning of "Irregularities ... That Affected the Result"

[51] Having regard to the centrality of the constitutional right to vote, the enfranchising purpose of the Act, the language of s. 524, and the numerous democratic values engaged, we conclude that an "irregularit[y] ... that affected the result" of an election is a breach of statutory procedure that has resulted in an individual voting who was not entitled to vote. Such breaches are serious because they are capable of undermining the integrity of the electoral process.

(3) When Is an "Irregularit[y] … That Affected the Result" Established?

[52] An applicant who seeks to annul an election bears the legal burden of proof throughout. … As earlier noted, the present situation is governed by s. 531(2) of the Act. For ease of reference, the provision is reproduced below:

> (2) After hearing the application, the court may dismiss it if the grounds referred to in paragraph 524(1)(a) or (b), as the case may be, are not established and, where they are established, shall declare the election null and void or may annul the election, respectively.

[54] Two approaches have been used in the past by courts to determine whether there was an "irregularit[y] … that affected the result" of an election. A strict procedural approach was followed by courts … . Under that approach, all votes cast pursuant to an irregular procedure were held to be invalid. The failure to comply with a procedural step aimed at determining entitlement was considered to directly affect the result of the election. In these cases, even where the elector's right to vote in the election could have been proven to the court after the fact, failure to comply with the procedural safeguards sufficed to discount the votes in question.

[55] A second approach, sometimes referred to as the "substantive" approach, emphasizes the substantive right of the elector to vote. An approach along these lines has been followed in other Canadian contested election cases… . On this approach, failure to follow a procedural safeguard is not determinative of whether the result of the election has been affected.

[56] In our view, adopting a strict procedural approach creates a risk that an application under Part 20 could be granted even where the result of the election reflects the will of the electors who in fact had the right to vote. This approach places a premium on form over substance, and relegates to the back burner the Charter right to vote and the enfranchising objective of the Act. It also runs the risk of enlarging the margin of litigation, and is contrary to the principle that elections should not be lightly overturned, especially where neither candidates nor voters have engaged in any wrongdoing. Part 20 of the Act should not be taken by losing candidates as an invitation to examine the election records in search of technical administrative errors, in the hopes of getting a second chance.

[58] There are two steps to this approach. First, an applicant must prove that there was an "irregularity": breach of a statutory provision designed to establish a person's entitlement to vote. We do not understand the minority to suggest otherwise. For example, a breach of s. 148.1 or s. 149 would amount to an "irregularity" because these provisions go to establishing entitlement.

[59] Second, an applicant must demonstrate that the irregularity "affected the result" of the election: someone not entitled to vote, voted. Where that is established, the vote is invalid, and must be rejected. Rejecting a vote affects the result of the election in the sense that it changes the vote count. It is at this second step that our approach departs from that of the minority.

[60] An "irregularity" constitutes evidence from which it may be inferred that a voter was not entitled to vote, because it is a breach of a procedure designed to establish the voter's entitlement. As indicated, proof of an irregularity may itself be sufficient to show that an invalid vote was cast, thereby affecting the result of the election.

[61] Under our approach, an applicant who has led evidence from which an irregularity could be found will have met his or her prima facie evidentiary burden. At that point, the respondent runs the risk of having the votes in issue set aside, unless he or she can adduce or point to evidence from which it may reasonably be inferred that no irregularity occurred, or that despite the irregularity, the votes in question were nevertheless valid. For example, where registration certificates cannot be located and there is a question as to whether they were completed as required, the respondent may point to evidence showing that they were completed, such as a list of names of people who voted by registration, or evidence from the polling officials that registration took place. Or, the respondent may show that the voters were entitled to vote by reference to their inclusion on a list of voters in the electoral district.

[62] Once all of the evidence from both parties is before the judge, the judge will decide, focusing on substance rather than form, whether the applicant has met his or her burden of establishing on a balance of probabilities that someone who voted was not entitled to do so. If the court is not so satisfied, then the applicant has failed to meet his or her onus.

C. The Consequences of Statutory Non-Compliance

[63] Our approach to contested elections allows a judge to consider evidence that an individual was entitled to vote on election day. It has to be remembered that "entitlement" is concerned with age, citizenship and residence. A judge may look at any evidence that is relevant to these criteria. This approach best ensures the accuracy of election results. Some prior jurisprudence in the lower courts suggests that this approach introduces uncertainty into election results. (See Hogan, at para.77.) With respect, this concern is unfounded.

[65] Any concern that our approach would result in the inconsistent application of the Act is unfounded. The minority suggests that since some entitled voters may be turned away on election day by election officials properly following procedures in the Act, it is unfair for a court to allow votes to stand where there was an administrative procedural error but other evidence that the voter was entitled to vote (para. 167). However, unlike the rejection of a valid vote, turning away a voter on election day is not fatal to that person's right to vote. If at first that voter could not comply with a procedural requirement, with some additional effort, he or she can return to the polling station and obtain a ballot. As well, if a person feels that he or she should be permitted to vote, scrutineers may be available to help resolve the matter.

[66] By contrast, if a vote cast by an entitled voter were to be rejected in a contested election application because of an irregularity, the voter would be irreparably disenfranchised. This is especially undesirable when the irregularity is outside of the voter's control, and is caused solely by the error of an election official.

[67] For example, compare the situation of two voters who arrive at the polling station with inadequate identification. The DRO personally knows one of the voters, and vouches for him, enabling him to cast a ballot. The DRO does not live in the polling division, so he has vouched in a manner not permitted by the Act. However, the voter leaves the polling station believing that he has cast a valid vote. If a court later rejects the voter's vote, he is irreparably disenfranchised, through no fault of his own. In the case of the second voter, the DRO properly refuses to let her vote without proper identification. This voter can return to the polling station later in the day, accompanied by a voucher who lives in the polling division, and cast her ballot. She has not been disenfranchised.

[68] Nor will the approach that we endorse encourage non-compliance with the Act. The election process is open and public. Polling officials work in a public environment at a polling station where their actions can be observed by other election officials, candidates or candidates' representatives and members of the public present to vote. If there is a reasonable concern about whether a person is entitled to vote, any polling official, candidate or candidate's representative can ask that the person take an oath before voting (s. 144).

[69] In recognizing that mistakes are inevitable, this Court does not condone any relaxation of training and procedures. The Commissioner of Canada Elections appointed by the CEO has an obligation to ensure, as far as reasonably possible, that procedures are followed (s. 509). Failure to live up to this mandate would shake the public's confidence in the election system as a whole and render it vulnerable to abuse and manipulation.

[70] The Commissioner of Canada Elections is responsible for compliance with and enforcement of the Act (s. 509). The Chief Electoral Officer may refer any matter for investigation to the Commissioner, and, with respect to specific offences, may direct the Commissioner to "make any inquiry that appears to be called for in the circumstances", and the Commissioner shall do so (s. 510). Following an inquiry, the Commissioner may refer the matter to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who will decide whether to prosecute the offence (s. 511). Alternatively, the Commissioner may enter into an agreement with the offender aimed at providing for compliance with the Act (s. 517). Overturning an election is but one of several consequences that may flow from the failure of election officers to follow rules. A declaration that an election is annulled may be considered the ultimate public consequence of violating provisions of the Act, and accordingly should be reserved for serious cases.

D. Should an Election Be Annulled? The "Magic Number" Test

[71] To date, the only approach taken by Canadian courts in assessing contested election applications has been the "magic number" test referred to in O'Brien (p. 93). On this test, the election must be annulled if the rejected votes are equal to or outnumber the winner's plurality (Blanchard, at p. 320).

[72] The "magic number" test is simple. However, it inherently favours the challenger. It assumes that all of the rejected votes were cast for the successful candidate. In reality, this is highly improbable. However, no alternative test has been developed. No evidence has been presented in this case to support any form of statistical test that would be reliable and that would not compromise the secrecy of the ballot.

[73] Accordingly, for the purposes of this application, we would utilize the magic number test. The election should be annulled when the number of rejected votes is equal to or greater than the successful candidate's margin of victory. However, we do not rule out the possibility that another, more realistic method for assessing contested election applications might be adopted by a court in a future case.

E. Summary

[74] The following approach should be followed in determining whether there were "irregularities ... that affected the result of the election": An applicant must prove that a procedural safeguard designed to establish an elector's entitlement to vote was not respected. This is an "irregularity". An applicant must then demonstrate that the irregularity "affected the result" of the election because an individual voted who was not entitled to do so. In determining whether the result was affected, an application judge may consider any evidence in the record capable of establishing that the person was in fact entitled to vote despite the irregularity, or that the person was not in fact entitled to vote.

[75] If it is established that there were "irregularities … that affected the result of the election", a court may annul the election. In exercising this discretion, if a court is satisfied that, because of the rejection of certain votes, the winner is in doubt, it would be unreasonable for the court not to annul the election. For the purposes of this application, the "magic number" test will be used to make that determination.

The CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting) —

I. Introduction

[138] I would dismiss the appeal. The election result in Etobicoke Centre should be annulled because of "irregularities … that affected the result of the election". The irregularities in this case concerned ballots cast by individuals who were not entitled to vote.

[139] An individual must be entitled to vote before casting a ballot for the Member of Parliament for the riding where she is ordinarily resident. The Act sets out a comprehensive scheme defining entitlement to vote: ss. 6, 143(2), (3), 148.1, 149 and 161. In general, there are three prerequisites to entitlement to vote: qualification, registration and identification. First, an individual must be qualified to vote, in terms of citizenship and age. Second, she must be registered to vote, generally either by being on the list of electors or filing a registration certificate. Third, she must be identified at the polling station in a way permitted under the Act, whether by providing appropriate pieces of identification or by taking an oath and being vouched for by another elector. There are different ways in which the requirements of entitlement to vote under the Act can be fulfilled, but if any of the prerequisites of entitlement are not satisfied, an individual is not permitted to cast a ballot.

[140] Whether a person is entitled to vote is a distinct question from whether she is qualified to vote. All Canadian citizens who are 18 years or older on election day are qualified electors: s. 3 of the Act. Being a qualified elector is a necessary but not sufficient condition for entitlement to vote. Qualified electors must fulfill all the prerequisites of an entitlement procedure under the Act before voting. These procedures ensure that election officials have verified the qualifications and identity of prospective voters before they cast their ballots. They are fundamental safeguards for the integrity of the electoral system.

[141] Votes cast by persons not entitled to vote are irregularities that can affect the result of the election under s. 524(1)(b) of the Act. If the number of such irregular votes is equal to or exceeds the winner's plurality, then the result of the election is affected and the election should be annulled. This is known as the "magic number" rule. In the present case, the winning candidate in Etobicoke Centre, Ted Opitz, had a plurality of 26 votes. Therefore, the application judge should have annulled the election only if the applicant established that 26 or more ballots were cast by non-entitled voters. The onus was on the applicant to establish the existence of irregularities sufficient to annul the election.

[142] While the application judge in this case improperly set aside some votes, he did not err with respect to 65 ballots cast by persons not entitled to vote. As this exceeds the plurality of 26 votes, under the "magic number" rule the appeal should be dismissed and the election annulled.

II. Analysis

A. Applicable Principles of Statutory Construction

[144] The overriding principle of statutory interpretation is that "the words of an Act are to be read in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87, quoted in Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at para. 21). The best indication of Parliament's intent is found in the language of the statutory provisions: R. v. Knott, 2012 SCC 42, [2012] 2 SCR 470, at para. 54.

[145] The words of the statute must be interpreted with a view to the objectives of the Act. Courts have considered different aspects of the purpose of the Act but none has identified the broad and overarching purpose of the legislation: see, e.g., Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, [2004] 1 SCR 827; Henry v. Canada (Attorney General), 2010 BCSC 610, 7 B.C.L.R. (5th) 70, at para. 139. The overarching purpose of the Act is to ensure the democratic legitimacy of federal elections in Canada. This broad purpose encompasses several discrete objectives. The first is to enfranchise individuals who are qualified to vote: Haig v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995, at p. 1058 (per Cory J.). A second and complementary objective is to ensure that people who are not qualified to vote do not do so: see Haig, at p. 1027, per L'Heureux-Dubé J. A third objective is to promote efficiency and certainty in the electoral process. In considering these objectives, we must be careful to respect the words chosen by Parliament: Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission) v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 53, [2011] 3 SCR 471, at para. 33.

B. The Meaning of "Irregularities … That Affected the Result of the Election" Under Section 524(1)(b) of the Act

[146] Any elector or any candidate in an electoral district may apply to a competent court to contest an election on the grounds that "there were irregularities, fraud or corrupt or illegal practices that affected the result of the election" (s. 524(1)(b)). If the elements of s. 524(1)(b) are established, a court may annul the election (s. 531(2)).

[148] The objective of efficiency and certainty in the electoral process suggests that there ought to be strict compliance with the requirements of the Act. The objective of ensuring that those not qualified to vote not do so pulls in the same direction. On the other hand, the objective of enfranchisement suggests that "irregularities" should not be interpreted in a technical or trivial way that improperly disenfranchises voters. The votes of Canadian citizens 18 years of age or over should not be set aside over trifles … . Based on the language and purposes of the Act, I conclude that "irregularities" under s. 524(1)(b) should be interpreted to mean failures to comply with the requirements of the Act, unless the deficiency is merely technical or trivial.

[149] Only irregularities that "affected the result of the election" permit the annulment of the election under s. 531(2). Irregularities must be of a type that could affect the result of the election, and impact a sufficient number of votes to have done so. An irregularity resulting in a vote being cast that should not have been is of a type that could affect the result of the election. To have actually affected the result of the election, the number of such votes must be equal to or exceed the winning candidate's plurality. If the irregularities are of this type and impact this number of votes, then a court can and should annul the election under s. 531(2). This is known as the "magic number" rule. …

[150] The critical question raised in this case is the following: What kinds of irregularities result in a vote being cast that should not have been? The answer lies in the principle of entitlement to vote, which is a central pillar of our electoral system.

C. Entitlement to Vote

[151] Every electoral system must strike a balance between enabling those who have the constitutional right to vote to do so, and ensuring that those who do not have that right are not allowed to vote. The formal system of entitlement is our mechanism for striking the right balance between these two valid concerns, while ensuring the efficiency and certainty of the electoral process. It aims to safeguard both the right to vote and the integrity of elections.

(1) Prerequisites to Entitlement to Vote

[152] In general, there are three prerequisites to entitlement to vote under the Act. These prerequisites concern qualification, registration and identification as a voter. Only when all of these elements are met is a person entitled to vote for the Member of Parliament for the riding where she is ordinarily resident.

(a) Qualification

[153] The first prerequisite of entitlement to vote is qualification. This means that the voter must be a Canadian citizen and 18 years of age or older. Section 3 of the Act defines a qualified elector as "[e]very person who is a Canadian citizen and is 18 years of age or older on polling day". Section 6 of the Act sets out the qualification prerequisite of entitlement to vote:

> 6. Subject to this Act, every person who is qualified as an elector is entitled to have his or her name included in the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she is ordinarily resident and to vote at the polling station for that polling division.

[154] The words "[s]ubject to this Act" make clear that entitlement to vote is also conditioned on other prerequisites to entitlement found in the Act. In order to be given a ballot and permitted to vote on election day, it is not enough that a person be qualified. Entitlement to vote goes beyond qualification … .

(b) Registration

[155] The second prerequisite of entitlement to vote is registration, through (a) inclusion on the list of electors in the polling division where the voter is ordinarily resident or (b) filing a registration certificate. Other exceptional voter registration procedures exist under the Act, but these are not applicable in this case and will not be dealt with here. The Act makes clear that a voter shall not be allowed to vote unless one of these registration procedures is satisfied.

[156] Section 149 of the Act provides:

> 149. An elector whose name does not appear on the official list of electors in his or her polling station shall not be allowed to vote unless
> (c) the elector gives the deputy returning officer a registration certificate described in subsection 161(4).

[157] Inclusion on the list of electors is one way that an individual can satisfy the registration prerequisite of entitlement to vote. Prior to election day, election officials prepare a list of electors for each polling division, listing qualified electors who are ordinarily resident in that polling division (s. 106). These lists are then used by election officials at the polling station for each polling division on election day. If a person is on the list of electors, then s. 149 is no barrier to voting entitlement.

[158] If a person is not on the list of electors, s. 149(c) provides an alternative means of registering to vote: filing a registration certificate. A person is entitled to vote despite not being on the list of electors if she satisfies the registration certificate procedure.

[159] The registration certificate procedure under s. 149(c) requires a prospective voter to prove her identity and residence, and to sign a declaration that she is a Canadian citizen 18 years of age or older (s. 161). The declaration on the registration certificate states:

> I, the person whose name appears in Box 1, certify that I am a Canadian citizen, 18 years of age or over on polling day and have been ordinarily resident at the address appearing in box 2. … I certify that the information provided on this form is accurate.

If a person voting by registration certificate does not sign this declaration, she has not established her age and citizenship as required by the Act. The declaration is therefore a vital prerequisite of entitlement to vote. Upon completing the registration certificate, a person is deemed to be included on the list of electors (s. 161(5)).

(c) Identification

[160] The third prerequisite of entitlement to vote is identification. A prospective voter must prove her identity and residence at the polling station in a way permitted by the Act. Section 148.1(1) of the Act states:

> 148.1 (1) An elector who fails to prove his or her identity and residence in accordance with subsection 143(2) or (3) or to take an oath otherwise required by this Act shall not receive a ballot or be allowed to vote.

[161] A person can prove her identity and residence in two ways: (a) providing the necessary piece or pieces of identification (such as a driver's licence); or (b) taking a prescribed oath and being vouched for by another person in the manner set out in the Act. These two options are available both for individuals who are on the list of electors and for individuals voting by registration certificate (ss. 143(2), (3) and 161(1)).

[162] If the oath and vouching procedure is used, the person vouching for the prospective voter must (i) be on the list of electors for the same polling division, (ii) provide the required piece or pieces of identification to prove his identity and residence, (iii) state a prescribed oath, (iv) not have already vouched for another elector in the election, and (v) not have herself been vouched for in that election (ss. 143(3), (5), (6), 161(1)(b), (6) and (7)). If these conditions are not met, the vouching is invalid and the prospective voter's identity and residence have not been proved in a manner permitted by the Act.

[163] Only if all of the prerequisites to entitlement to vote are met is a person permitted to cast a ballot in a Canadian federal election. The Act expressly states that a person who is not entitled to vote shall not receive a ballot or be allowed to vote, even if he is qualified to vote, in the sense of meeting the citizenship and age requirements (ss. 148.1 and 149). The constitutionality of these entitlement provisions is not at issue in this appeal, so this Court must adhere to the unambiguous directions from Parliament as to the prerequisites to exercising the right to vote: Pharmascience Inc. v. Binet, 2006 SCC 48, [2006] 2 SCR 513, at para. 29; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, 2002 SCC 42, [2002] 2 SCR 559.

[164] My colleagues, with respect, merge the concepts of qualification and entitlement. They take the position that everyone who is qualified to vote and ordinarily resident in the electoral district is entitled to vote. Thus, a voter who is not on the electoral list and has not filed a registration certificate (s. 149) can be later held to have been "entitled" to vote if he was qualified to vote and ordinarily resident in the electoral district. I cannot accept this view.

[166] Second, the objective of certainty in the electoral process requires that entitlement be established before receiving and casting a ballot. Nothing in the Act suggests that a person who on election day is not entitled to vote should be permitted to do so and to establish his entitlement later. If we decline to set aside votes cast by non-entitled people on the grounds that they are subsequently proven to be qualified and ordinarily resident in the electoral district, the result is a system where the only way to be confident in the accuracy of an election outcome is to investigate the identity, residence and qualification of voters after the election.

[167] Third, such an approach would be unfair. It disregards the fact that other qualified electors who did not follow the necessary steps to become entitled to vote may have rightly been turned away from the polling station and not permitted to vote on election day. The Act sets out the rules and procedures electors must follow in order to exercise their constitutional right to vote. Those rules must be applied fairly and consistently if the right is to have meaning.

V. Conclusion

[216] Of the 79 votes set aside by the application judge, I conclude that 65 were properly set aside …

This exceeds the 26-vote plurality in this electoral district.

[217] Therefore, the applicant succeeded in establishing the existence of "irregularities ... that affected the result of the election" under s. 524(1)(b) and the election is properly annulled as contemplated under s. 531(2) of the Act. There is no need to consider the cross-appeal. The appeal should be dismissed and the fresh evidence motion dismissed.

Note the presence of judicial anxieties concerning the remedy in Opitz. Annulling an election result may have the effect of opening up, not only particular election results across the country, but an entire election itself. Anxieties about the separation of powers also exist concerning the question of whose responsibility it is to correct a problem with the legislation: the courts or Parliament?

For a critical view on the utility of the 'magic number test' see Francis Hane and Heather Emptage, 'Disputed Election Results: A More Rigorous "Magic Number Test"' (2013) 22:3 Constitutional Forum 27-33, 2013 CanLIIDocs 716 where they argue that, properly understood, the statistical evidence would have shown that Wrzesnewskyj could have won the election, not Opitz. They propose a 'more rigorous' test that is simple, consistent with constitutional and Charter values as well as with the principle of the rarity of election annulments, and minimizes "election litigation by ensuring that votes which are legitimately cast remain valid." Do you agree?

1.4.5 Elections and judicial interpretation of fixed election date legislation

The 2006 federal election introduced a new idea for electoral reform: fixed election dates. This idea would change the traditional Westminster practice where a Prime Minister could exercise their discretion to call an election at any time during their (maximum) five-year term in power. This context continued to be informed, however, by the possibility of a successful non-confidence vote resulting in an election at any time. Bill C-16, An Act to Amend the Canada Elections Act introduced a number of amendments including section 56.1 which seemed to establish a fixed election date. These changes came into force in 2007. One goal of section 56.1 was to prevent parties in power from calling so-called 'snap' elections early in their mandate in order to take advantage of a political climate favoured an electoral win, thereby extending their term. Fixed election dates aim to level the playing field between the party in power and competing parties. Fixed term dates therefore represent a constitutional constraint on what traditionally has been considered the unfettered discretionary prerogative power of the Prime Minister.

In September 2008, Prime Minister Stephen Harper advised Governor General Michaëlle Jean to dissolve Parliament and set an election date of October 14, 2008. This request contradicted section 56.1 of the now amended Canada Elections Act. The Governor General, following convention, agreed to his request. The subsequent election resulted in a second minority government for the Conservative Party and one where they increased their number of seats. This second term, however, only lasted until March 25, 2011 when Harper's Cabinet was defeated in a no-confidence vote after being found in contempt of Parliament.

Democracy Watch (a national non-profit organization) launched a legal challenge asking the courts to review Prime Minister Harper's 'advice' to the Governor General to call the snap election. Democracy Watch's argument was that this advice violated the Prime Minister's statutory obligations in the Canada Elections Act not to call a snap election and that the Conservatives had timed a general election to their partisan advantage thereby defeating the very purpose of section 56.1.

The Federal Court rejected Democracy Watch's argument that a new constitutional convention had crystallized that limited the discretion of the Prime Minister to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament such that it was only to be exercised in accordance with the terms of section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act, unless there had been a prior vote of non-confidence. The reviewing court also disagreed that the Prime Minister's decision contravened Section 3 of the Charter. These issues from Conacher v Canada (Prime Minister), 2009 FC 920 (CanLII), [2010] 3 FCR 411 are excerpted below.

SHORE J:

IV. Issues

[14] There are five issues in this application:

(1) Is the Prime Minister's decision appropriate subject-matter for a judicial review?

(2) Did section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act create a constitutional convention whereby the discretion of the Prime Minister, to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament, is only to be exercised in accordance with the terms of section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act, unless there has been a prior vote of non-confidence?

(3) Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 contravene section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act?

(4) Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament contravene section 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

(5) Is declaratory relief an appropriate remedy in these circumstances?

V. Relevant provisions

[15] Section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act states:

56.1 (1) Nothing in this section affects the powers of the Governor General, including the power to dissolve Parliament at the Governor General's discretion.

(2) Subject to subsection (1), each general election must be held on the third Monday of October in the fourth calendar year following polling day for the last general election, with the first general election after this section comes into force being held on Monday, October 19, 2009.

[16] The applicants' submissions also mention section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1867, section 3 of the Charter and section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 [Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]]:

Section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1867 states:

50. Every House of Commons shall continue for Five Years from the Day of the Return of the Writs for choosing the House (subject to be sooner dissolved by the Governor General), and no longer.

Section 3 of the Charter, states:

3. Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein.

Section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, states:

41. An amendment to the Constitution of Canada in relation to the following matters may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province:

(a) the office of the Queen, the Governor General and the Lieutenant Governor of a province;

(b) the right of a province to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of Senators by which the province is entitled to be represented at the time this Part comes into force;

(c) subject to section 43, the use of the English or the French language;

(d) the composition of the Supreme Court of Canada; and (e) an amendment to this Part.

VI. Analysis of the Court of the parties' submissions as to the respective issues …

Issue 3: Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 contravene section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act?

[48] This is a question of statutory interpretation. The Supreme Court of Canada held that the preferred approach to statutory interpretation is to read the words of an Act in their entire context and "in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament" (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at paragraph 21).

[49] Section 56.1 has two parts: subsection 56.1(1) leaves the Governor General's power untouched and subsection 56.1(2) states when elections are to be held.

[50] The applicants submit that the objective of section 56.1 is to preclude the calling of "snap elections" by prohibiting prime ministers from requesting dissolution except in accordance with the terms of section 56.1(2) or if there has been a prior vote of non-confidence (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 60). They ask this Court to interpret section 56.1 to include these limitations.

[51] The respondents reply with evidence that shows section 56.1 was never intended to be legally binding on the Prime Minister (respondents' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraphs 14–15). They also submit that amendments to the Office of the Governor General cannot be accomplished by ordinary statute, but require a constitutional amendment under section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[53] It is important to examine the constitutional context because Canada has a system of constitutional supremacy that lays out the boundaries of Parliament's power. In this case, the constitutional context is that the Governor General has discretion to dissolve Parliament pursuant to Crown prerogative and section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1867. Any tampering with this discretion may not be done via an ordinary statute, but requires a constitutional amendment under section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which requires unanimous consent of all provincial governments as well as the federal government before a change can be made to the "office of the Governor General". Subsection 56.1(1) explicitly leaves the Governor General's discretion untouched.

[55] The respondents are correct that the Hansard record is ambiguous, especially in respect of the intended effects of section 56.1. For example, the applicants submit a statement from the Prime Minister to the House of Commons that the fixed-date legislation was "modelled on those of the provinces, to set elections every four years and set the next election for October 2009" (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 5 [see also House of Commons Debates, No. 029 (May 30, 2006), at page 1722]). This suggests an intention to change the electoral rules. The applicants' memorandum also contains a statement from Minister Rob Nicholson that "by providing that elections are to be held every four years in October, the bill establishes a statutory expectation that the relevant political and administrative officers will govern themselves accordingly to accomplish this end—working within the rules and conventions of parliamentary and responsible government" (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 8 [see also Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. Proceedings, No. 18 (December 7, 2006), at page 18:145]). This suggests an intention to leave the existing electoral rules unchanged. The respondents also point to other statements of Minister Nicholson, such as "[t]he Governor General's legal power under the Constitution and the exercise of that power on the advice of the Prime Minister are fundamentally and inseparably linked. If one limits the Prime Minister's ability to advise, one risks constraining the Governor General's power in a way that would be unconstitutional" to show that there was never any intention for Bill C-16 to bind the Prime Minister (respondents' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 14 [see also Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affaires. Evidence, No. 018 (September 26, 2006), at page 2]). It is the Court's conclusion that the Hansard record is ambiguous and does not establish an intention to bind the Prime Minister.

[56] A quote from Hansard that is not raised by the parties is a statement by Minister Rob Nicholson before the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. When questioned about whether Bill C-16 would leave the Prime Minister with the power to recommend the dissolution of Parliament at any time before the prescribed date, Minister Nicholson said that Bill C-16 "is crafted in a way that the prerogatives of the Prime Minister to advise the Governor General, and the Governor General's prerogatives, are in no way diminished" [emphasis added] (applicants' record, Volume I, Exhibit "I" to the affidavit of Duff Conacher, at page 90 [see also Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs. Evidence, No. 18 (September 26, 2006), at page 5]). This statement is another example of the ambiguity of Hansard, if used alone, and the statement demonstrates an intention not to legally bind the Prime Minister's discretion.

[57] The applicants ask this Court to interpret section 56.1 to include a condition that the Prime Minister will not request dissolution unless there has been a prior vote of non-confidence. The applicants submit that Bill C-16 had the purpose of requiring that federal elections be held on specific dates unless there is a prior vote of non-confidence (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 1). The applicants submit statements from Hansard as evidence of this purpose (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraphs 6–9). It is on Hansard that the applicants hang their case and, as specified, the Hansard record, alone, is ambiguous. The applicants' submissions are not supported by the language of section 56.1. Subsection 56.1(1) states that the Governor General's discretion is not affected by section 56.1. Subsection 56.1(1) states that the Governor General's discretion is not affected by section 56.1. Subsection 56.1(2) states that elections must be held on certain dates and says nothing about votes of non-confidence.

[59] It is also important that "vote of non-confidence" does not have a firm definition. Hogg writes that there are several ways that a government can lose the confidence of Parliament. He writes that if the House of Commons passes a motion of "no confidence", the government will have lost the confidence of the House. He also writes that "the defeat of the government on any important vote is usually regarded as a withdrawal of confidence" (emphasis added). He also writes that a defeat of the government on a minor matter is not usually considered to be a loss of confidence, but he does not rule out that possibility (Hogg, Volume 1, at page 288). A government losing the confidence of the House of Commons is an event that does not have a strict definition and often requires the judgment of the Prime Minister. If this Court is to interpret section 56.1 in the manner the applicants suggest, this Court would have to define a "vote of non-confidence" or else leave section 56.1 ambiguous. It is the Court's conclusion that votes of non-confidence are political in nature and lack legal aspects. The determination of when a government has lost the confidence of the House should be left to the Prime Minister and not be turned into a legal issue for the courts to decide.

Issue 4: Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament contravene section 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[60] The applicants submit that the Prime Minister's decision contravened the principles of electoral fairness enshrined in section 3 of the Charter. The basis of the applicants' submission is their belief that the Prime Minister's discretion creates an unfair advantage for the Prime Minister's political party. The applicants submit that their interpretation of section 56.1 eliminates that which the applicants perceive as a potential problem in the electoral system and that it was unfair for the Prime Minister not to abide by the terms of that section (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 52).

[61] There are several problems with the applicants' submissions. First, the applicants do not provide any legal reasons to support their submission that the election of 2008 was unfair. The Supreme Court outlined the purpose of section 3 in the case of Figueroa v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 37, [2003] 1 SCR 912. In that case, the Court held that the purpose of section 3 is to protect the "right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process" (at paragraph 26). The Supreme Court defined a "fair election" in the case of Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33, [2004] 1 SCR 827 as the right to "meaningfully participate" in the electoral process. The Court held that participation is "meaningful" when a citizen is able to vote in an informed manner (at paragraph 71). The applicants submit that the Prime Minister's discretion "differentiates between political parties" in a way that has an adverse impact on the ability of citizens to play a "meaningful role in the electoral process" (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 50). The respondents reply that there is no evidence that the applicants, or the political parties whose interests they purport to defend, were disadvantaged by the dissolution of Parliament on September 7, 2008 (respondents' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraphs 72, 75 and 76).

[62] Second, a finding that the election of 2008 violated section 3 would have an enormous impact on parties outside of this application. The respondents submit that a finding that the election of 2008 violated section 3 would mean that every federal election since April 17, 1982 also violated section 3 (respondents' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 78). Although the applicants try to limit their argument to so-called "snap elections" (elections that are called while the Prime Minister has the confidence of the House of Commons), the Governor General has complete discretion to dissolve Parliament and the Prime Minister has complete discretion to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament. Therefore, all Canadian federal elections could be perceived to be "snap elections" because none of them have any legal limitation on when they are to be called.

VII. Court Conclusions as to the Respective Issues

Issue 3: Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 contravene section 56.1 of the Canada Elections Act?

[73] It is vitally important under constitutional supremacy that the separation of powers be respected. Justice McLachlin (as she then was, prior to becoming Chief Justice) writes at page 389 of New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 319:

> Our democratic government consists of several branches: the Crown, as represented by the Governor General and the provincial counterparts of that office; the legislative body; the executive; and the courts. It is fundamental to the working of government as a whole that all these parts play their proper role. It is equally fundamental that no one of them overstep its bounds, that each show proper deference for the legitimate sphere of activity of the other. [Emphasis added.]

[74] The applicants ask this Court to interpret section 56.1 in a manner that would make political issues justiciable. If their submission that section 56.1 is intended to force the Prime Minister to only request dissolution after a vote of non-confidence is accepted, litigants could take the Prime Minister to court to determine whether or not a government had lost the confidence of the House of Commons. Similarly, a court would be able to force the Prime Minister to dissolve Parliament, effectively dictating to the Governor General to exercise his or her discretion.

[75] It is the Court's conclusion that the applicants' submissions do not demonstrate a proper understanding of the separation of powers. This Court disposes of this matter to ensure that political issues (in time and context) are not made to be legal ones. The remedy for the applicants' contention is not for the Federal Court to decide, but rather one for the count of the ballot box.

Issue 4: Did the Prime Minister's decision of September 7, 2008 to advise the Governor General to dissolve Parliament contravene section 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[76] No evidence was submitted by the applicants to the Court that the 2008 election was "unfair", as based on the factors in Figueroa and Harper, above. In the case of Figueroa, the Supreme Court held that section 3 gives the right to "meaningful participation" in the electoral process (at paragraph 25). Although the applicants allege surprise and disruption prior to the election, it is insufficient to ground a claim on such an issue because, as the respondents submit, there is no evidence that Democracy Watch could not perform its normal functions during the election period (applicants' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraphs 20–22; respondents' memorandum of fact and law, at paragraph 74).

JUDGMENT

> THIS COURT ORDERS that the application of the applicants be denied, however, without costs due to the nature of the proceeding which necessitated that the separation of powers, on the issues in question, be explained for the understanding of the public.

Democracy Watch appealed the decision, but Federal Court of Appeal agreed with Justice Shore. Writing for the court in Conacher v Canada (Prime Minister), 2010 FCA 131 (CanLII), [2011] 4 FCR 22, Justice Stratas concluded:

> [4] Section 56.1 must be interpreted in light of the constitutional status and role of the Governor General. Section 56.1 does not prohibit the Governor General from dissolving Parliament and setting an election date. In fact, this discretion and power (enshrined in section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1867 [30 & 31 Vict., c. 3 (U.K.) (as am. By Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.), Schedule to the Constitution Act, 1982, Item 1) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 5]]) is specifically preserved by subsection 56.1(1). The Governor General's status, role, powers, and discretions are unaffected by section 56.1.
> [5] Various conventions are associated with the Governor General's status, role, powers, and discretions. Some of these conventions, which are open to debate as to their scope, concern the Prime Minister's advice to the Governor General about the dissolution of Parliament and how the Governor General should respond: Peter W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 5th ed., Vol. 1, loose-leaf (Toronto: Carswell, 2007), at pages 9-29 to 9-33. In our view, given the connection between the Governor General and the Prime Minister in this regard, the preservation of the Governor General's powers and discretions under subsection 56.1(1) arguably may also extend to the Prime Minister's advice-giving role. In any event, it seems to us that if Parliament meant to prevent the Prime Minister from advising the Governor General that Parliament should be dissolved and an election held, Parliament would have used explicit and specific wording to that effect in section 56.1. Parliament did not do so. In saying this, we offer no comment on whether such wording, if enacted, would be constitutional.
> [6] The appellants forcefully argued that this interpretation leaves section 56.1 with no meaning. We disagree. Subsection 56.1(2) is a clear expression of the will of Parliament, a will that, on the express terms of subsection 56.1(1), in no way binds the Governor General. But under our constitutional framework and as a matter of law, the Governor General may consider a wide variety of factors in deciding whether to dissolve Parliament and call an election. In this particular case, this may include any matters of constitutional law, any conventions that, in the Governor General's opinion, may bear upon or determine the matter, Parliament's will as expressed in subsection 56.1(2), advice from the Prime Minister, and any other appropriate matters.
> [7] If the section were interpreted in the manner suggested by the appellants, the Prime Minister would be prohibited from advising the Governor General that an election should be held because of dire need or an event of grave importance. We do not accept that section 56.1 has that result. Such a drastic result would require the clearest of statutory wording. This is a further indication that section 56.1, as drafted, does not affect the Prime Minister's ability to give advice to the Governor General.
> [8] The appellants urge this Court to have regard to the purpose of section 56.1, as exemplified by Parliamentary statements in Hansard. We see no need to have to resort to Parliamentary statements, as the wording of section 56.1 is clear. In any event, the Court below found the Parliamentary statements concerning the purpose of section 56.1 to be unhelpful, as there are statements that go in opposite directions. Based on our review of this material, we see no reason to disagree with and interfere with that finding of the Court below.
> [9] In any event, the purpose behind section 56.1 that the appellants proffer—to prohibit dissolution of Parliament and the calling of a "snap election" at times other than those set out in subsection 56.1(2)—is not reflected in the wording chosen by Parliament in section 56.1. As we have held above, the wording of section 56.1 expresses the will of Parliament but leaves the Prime Minister and the Governor General able to act in the way they did.
> [10] Therefore, based on our interpretation of section 56.1, the Court below was correct in declining to issue a declaration that the Prime Minister contravened section 56.1.
> [11] Likewise, we agree with the Court below that the Prime Minister's act in advising the Governor General did not infringe the rights of Canadian citizens to vote and to run for office under section 3 of the Charter [Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, being Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, Schedule B, Canada Act 1982, 1982, c. 11 (U.K.) [R.S.C., 1985, Appendix II, No. 44]]. In this regard, the appellants submitted that the Prime Minister caused the election to take place before the times set out in subsection 56.1(2) and this may have caught certain political parties unprepared. To the extent that this may have caused any infringement of section 3 of the Charter, as a matter of law it was the Governor General that called the election, not the Prime Minister. Further, on this issue, the political parties allegedly affected by this are not before this Court. We query the appellants' standing to litigate those parties' section 3 rights; those parties were well placed to bring such a claim themselves: Canadian Council of Churches v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1992 CanLII 116 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 236, at pages 254–256.
> [12] Finally, we decline to make a declaration that there is a new constitutional convention that limits the ability of the Prime Minister to advise the Governor General in these circumstances. The Court below found as a fact that no such convention exists. That finding is amply supported by the evidentiary record in this case.
> [13] As a result, we will dismiss the appeal. In these unusual circumstances and given the novel issues involved, we will not order costs.

The Supreme Court of Canada denied leave to appeal (Duff Conacher et al. v The Prime Minister of Canada et al., 2011 CanLII 2101 (SCC)).

Craig Forcese and Aaron Freeman argue that the exception in this legislation is broader than is "absolutely necessary" (Craig Forcese, and Aaron Freeman. The Laws of Government: The Legal Foundations of Canadian Democracy (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2011), p 97)). Do you agree? Would you agree that one solution is to amend the legislation to require a lost confidence vote?

2 The Architecture of Democracy in Canada

The principle of democracy requires an institutional architecture in order to become effective and to enable it to endure over time. A complex institutional network sustains the laws of democracy. One constitutive element is the Canada Elections Act, the comprehensive statute that regulates federal elections and referendums (ie, the electoral process and its actors as well as the conduct and financing of political campaigns). It also establishes Elections Canada, the national agency charged with administering the statute and associated regulations. This statute is so important that it is certainly considered to be quasi-constitutional, if not near constitutional in legal status.

Recall that the democratic principle is only implied through the Preamble in the Constitution Act, 1867. It was assumed that Canadian elections would follow the British first-past-the-post model. While the Constitution Act, 1867 enabled the creation of electoral districts, and mandated that a federal election should be held every five years, it lacked any details about who should vote, how they should vote, and what the rules of voting should be.

The CEO and Elections Canada are part of what is increasingly come to be seen as the 'fourth branch' of government. Statutory delegates and administrative agencies are conventionally considered part of the executive branch. But, a select set of these bodies benefit from stricter independence and/or quasi-constitutional status and, because of this relative autonomy from the other three branches, comprise a distinct branch. Other examples of roles or agencies include the Auditor General, the Information Commissioner, the Bank of Canada, and Statistics Canada.

2.1 Canada Elections Act

Precursors to the Canada Elections Act include numerous statutes at both the provincial and federal levels in the 19th century. Federally, the first elections law was the 1874 Dominion Elections Act. These earlier legal frameworks became the Canada Elections Act in 1970.

The Canada Elections Act forms a near complete code for the administration of federal elections. It creates and empowers Elections Canada and sets rules for voter registration, voting, counting ballots, and election advertising. It covers a host of regulated entities, notably candidates, electoral district associations, political parties, leadership contestants, and third parties (individuals and groups other than political parties and their affiliated entities such as district associations)..

2.2 Chief Electoral Officer

Elections would lack integrity if they were administered by the government directly or by political parties with a vested interest in the outcome. Canada (like most other democracies) therefore has a non-partisan, independent election commission, namely Elections Canada. The head of Elections Canada is the Chief Electoral Officer (CEO). The CEO has a special role and status: they are a legislative officer. The CEO is not under the control of the political executive and, instead, reports directly to the House of Commons. The CEO must follow the tightly prescribed rules in the Canada Elections Act, though they possess significant discretionary authority in interpreting the legislation and in exercising powers in exigent or emergency situations.

Note that the existence of the office of the CEO and its powers are set out in a statute, subject to amendment by a majority in Parliament. Section 13 of the Canada Elections Act sets out the terms of the CEO's appointment:

> 13 (1) There shall be a Chief Electoral Officer who shall be appointed by resolution of the House of Commons to hold office during good behaviour for a term of 10 years. He or she may be removed for cause by the Governor General on address of the Senate and House of Commons.

Is this a sufficient guarantee of independence? Federal judges are also required to be independent and are appointed until the retirement age of 75, whereas the CEO serves a 10 year term. A majority of democracies now empower their election commission in the domestic Constitution, partly to make it harder for a regular political majority to undermine its non-partisanship, independence, or powers.

2.3 Electoral boundaries and Electoral Boundary Commissions

The Constitution Act, 1867 sets the rules determining how many seats each province is entitled to in the House of Commons. The distribution of seats has been a topic of paramount political importance to the provinces since Confederation. Seats are distributed generally on the basis of population, but with guarantees of a minimum number of seats for the less populous provinces. Section 51(1) requires that the seat allocation be adjusted every 10 years following the Census, which provides up to date population numbers. No province may have fewer seats in the House than it has Senators (s. 51A). Under the constitutional amendment procedures set out in Part V of the Constitution Act, 1982, the unanimous consent of Parliament and the provincial legislatures is required to change the rule (s.41(b) of the Constitution Act, 1982).

Parliament has also used its power in s.44 of the Constitution Act, 1982 to unilaterally amend the Constitution in relation to the House of Commons and to amend s.51(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 so as to further guarantee a minimum number of seats for some provinces. The 'grandfather clause' in s.51(1)1 guarantees that no province may have fewer seats than it had in the 43rd Parliament. The effect of the amendment was to ensure that Quebec did not lose a seat in the redistribution that occurred after the 2021 Census.

Once each province is assigned its number of districts, the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act mandates that an electoral boundary commission in each province be empowered to establish the boundaries of electoral districts in that province: ss. 3-12.

These commissions are non-partisan and independent of government. They must weigh various factors set out in s.15 of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act in determining the boundaries. These factors include populations in each riding of relatively equal numbers, community of interest or identity in the riding, and ridings of manageable geographic size. Unlike in the United States, district populations are permitted to vary significantly from representation by population under the statute.

2.3.1 Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 158

The Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 158 established that electoral maps and the decisions of boundary commissions must be in accordance with the Charter. Section 3 requires that commissions ensure the 'effective representation' of the population as a whole and its component groups. 'Effective representation' permits deviations from one person, one vote where doing so would lead to more effective representation:

> It is my conclusion that the purpose of the right to vote enshrined in s. 3 of the Charter is not equality of voting power per se, but the right to "effective representation". Ours is a representative democracy. Each citizen is entitled to be represented in government. Representation comprehends the idea of having a voice in the deliberations of government as well as the idea of the right to bring one's grievances and concerns to the attention of one's government representative; as noted in Dixon v. B.C. (A.G.), 1989 CanLII 248 (BC SC), [1989] 4 W.W.R. 393, at p. 413, elected representatives function in two roles -- legislative and what has been termed the "ombudsman role".
> What are the conditions of effective representation? The first is relative parity of voting power. A system which dilutes one citizen's vote unduly as compared with another citizen's vote runs the risk of providing inadequate representation to the citizen whose vote is diluted. The legislative power of the citizen whose vote is diluted will be reduced, as may be access to and assistance from his or her representative. The result will be uneven and unfair representation.
> But parity of voting power, though of prime importance, is not the only factor to be taken into account in ensuring effective representation. Sir John A. Macdonald in introducing the Act to re-adjust the Representation in the House of Commons, S.C. l872, c. 13, recognized this fundamental fact (House of Commons Debates, Vol. III, 4th Sess., p. 926 (June 1, 1872)):
> > ...it will be found that,... while the principle of population was considered to a very great extent, other considerations were also held to have weight; so that different interests, classes and localities should be fairly represented, that the principle of numbers should not be the only one.
> Notwithstanding the fact that the value of a citizen's vote should not be unduly diluted, it is a practical fact that effective representation often cannot be achieved without taking into account countervailing factors.
> First, absolute parity is impossible. It is impossible to draw boundary lines which guarantee exactly the same number of voters in each district. Voters die, voters move. Even with the aid of frequent censuses, voter parity is impossible.

> Secondly, such relative parity as may be possible of achievement may prove undesirable because it has the effect of detracting from the primary goal of effective representation. Factors like geography, community history, community interests and minority representation may need to be taken into account to ensure that our legislative assemblies effectively represent the diversity of our social mosaic. These are but examples of considerations which may justify departure from absolute voter parity in the pursuit of more effective representation; the list is not closed.
> It emerges therefore that deviations from absolute voter parity may be justified on the grounds of practical impossibility or the provision of more effective representation. Beyond this, dilution of one citizen's vote as compared with another's should not be countenanced. I adhere to the proposition asserted in Dixon, supra, at p. 414, that "only those deviations should be admitted which can be justified on the ground that they contribute to better government of the populace as a whole, giving due weight to regional issues within the populace and geographic factors within the territory governed."

The 'effective representation' doctrine provides much room for interpretation by boundary commissions. The Reference neither dictated a particular range to determine how much deviation from voter parity is consistent with effective representation nor did it provide specific guidance on how to incorporate the interests of minority communities into the boundary design process. Commissions have in their work since the Reference moved closer to representation by population overall, but have adopted very divergent interpretations of how to account for voter parity and minority representation. See Michael Pal, "The Fractured Right to Vote: Democracy, Discretion, and Designing Electoral Districts" 2016 CanLIIDocs 337. Some commissions seek to enhance minority representation where this is deemed appropriate while others have viewed it as beyond their mandate, despite the language in the Reference about the 'social mosaic.'

Are widely varying interpretations of 'effective representation' by the commissions a breach of s.3? Or is it reflective of local circumstances and flexibility in a federal system?

3 Right to Vote

The right to vote is protected by s.3 of the Charter. Section 3 states that "Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein."

Section 3 guarantees a right to cast a ballot in federal and provincial elections. It has been interpreted by the courts as not applying to other types of elections, including municipal and First Nations band council elections, or referendums. The courts have held that s.3 protects more than the bare right to put a piece of paper in a ballot box, as it extends to protecting broader factors that ensure a fair and equitable democratic process through the doctrines of 'meaningful participation' and 'effective representation.'

The text of s.3 assigns the right to citizens only. Permanent residents of Canada and temporary visitors of various kinds are therefore excluded from its ambit. Notably, s.3 makes no reference in its text to residency, age, or criminal convictions. The courts in the Charter-era have therefore had to resolve whether limits on voting by residency or criminal status/imprisonment are consistent with the Charter.

3.1 Who has the right to cast a ballot

On the right to cast a ballot, the two leading cases in the Charter-era are Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 2002 SCC 68 (CanLII) and Frank v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2019] 1 SCR 3. In Sauvé v. Canada (Sauvé #2), a majority of the Supreme Court of Canada in a 5-4 split struck down a ban on voting by incarcerated individuals who were serving 2 or more years imprisonment. It had in an earlier companion case which struck down a blanket restriction that banned all incarcerated individuals from voting, no matter the duration of their sentence (Sauvé #1: Sauvé v Canada (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 92 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 438).

3.1.1 Sauvé v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 2002 SCC 68 (CanLII)

At the heart of Sauvé #2 was whether the Court should show deference to Parliament on the inherently political matter of which citizens are permitted to cast a ballot. The majority favoured a strict approach to justification on a foundational political right.

> A. The Approach to Section 1 Justification
> 7 To justify the infringement of a Charter right, the government must show that the infringement achieves a constitutionally valid purpose or objective, and that the chosen means are reasonable and demonstrably justified: R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103. This two-part inquiry — the legitimacy of the objective and the proportionality of the means — ensures that a reviewing court examine rigorously all aspects of justification. Throughout the justification process, the government bears the burden of proving a valid objective and showing that the rights violation is warranted — that is, that it is rationally connected, causes minimal impairment, and is proportionate to the benefit achieved.
> 8 My colleague Justice Gonthier proposes a deferential approach to infringement and justification. He argues that there is no reason to accord special importance to the right to vote, and that we should thus defer to Parliament's choice among a range of reasonable alternatives. He further argues that in justifying limits on the right to vote under s. 1, we owe deference to Parliament because we are dealing with "philosophical, political and social considerations", because of the abstract and symbolic nature of the government's stated goals, and because the law at issue represents a step in a dialogue between Parliament and the courts.
> 9 I must, with respect, demur. The right to vote is fundamental to our democracy and the rule of law and cannot be lightly set aside. Limits on it require not deference, but careful examination. This is not a matter of substituting the Court's philosophical preference for that of the legislature, but of ensuring that the legislature's proffered justification is supported by logic and common sense.
> 15 The Charter charges courts with upholding and maintaining an inclusive, participatory democratic framework within which citizens can explore and pursue different conceptions of the good. While a posture of judicial deference to legislative decisions about social policy may be appropriate in some cases, the legislation at issue does not fall into this category. To the contrary, it is precisely when legislative choices threaten to undermine the foundations of the participatory democracy guaranteed by the Charter that courts must be vigilant in fulfilling their constitutional duty to protect the integrity of this system.
> 16 Nor can I concur in the argument that the philosophically based or symbolic nature of the government's objectives in itself commands deference. To the contrary, this Court has held that broad, symbolic objectives are problematic, as I discuss below: see U.F.C.W., Local 1518 v. KMart Canada Ltd., 1999 CanLII 650 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 1083, at para. 59, per Cory J.; Thomson Newspapers Co. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1998 CanLII 829 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 877, at para. 87, per Bastarache J.; RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 1995 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1995] 3 SCR 199, at paras. 143-44, per McLachlin J. (as she then was). Parliament cannot use lofty objectives to shield legislation from Charter scrutiny. Section 1 requires valid objectives and proportionality.

The majority made the rare finding that the pressing and substantial purposes put forward by the Crown for the limit on the s.3 right to vote of incarcerated individuals failed to meet the necessary standard under the Oakes test. The Crown's stated objectives for limiting the right were overly "vague and symbolic."

> 21 Section 51(e) denying penitentiary inmates the right to vote was not directed at a specific problem or concern. Prisoners have long voted, here and abroad, in a variety of situations without apparent adverse effects to the political process, the prison population, or society as a whole. In the absence of a specific problem, the government asserts two broad objectives as the reason for this denial of the right to vote: (1) to enhance civic responsibility and respect for the rule of law; and (2) to provide additional punishment, or "enhanc[e] the general purposes of the criminal sanction". The record leaves in doubt how much these goals actually motivated Parliament; the Parliamentary debates offer more fulmination than illumination. However, on the basis of "some glimmer of light", the trial judge at p. 878 concluded that they could be advanced as objectives of the denial. I am content to proceed on this basis.
> 22 This leaves the question of whether the objectives of enhancing respect for law and appropriate punishment are constitutionally valid and sufficiently significant to warrant a rights violation. Vague and symbolic objectives such as these almost guarantee a positive answer to this question. Who can argue that respect for the law is not pressing? Who can argue that proper sentences are not important? Who can argue that either of these goals, taken at face value, contradicts democratic principles? However, precisely because they leave so little room for argument, vague and symbolic objectives make the justification analysis more difficult. Their terms carry many meanings, yet tell us little about why the limitation on the right is necessary, and what it is expected to achieve in concrete terms. The broader and more abstract the objective, the more susceptible it is to different meanings in different contexts, and hence to distortion and manipulation. One articulation of the objective might inflate the importance of the objective; another might make the legislative measure appear more narrowly tailored. The Court is left to sort the matter out.
> 23 At the end of the day, people should not be left guessing about why their Charter rights have been infringed. Demonstrable justification requires that the objective clearly reveal the harm that the government hopes to remedy, and that this objective remain constant throughout the justification process. As this Court has stated, the objective "must be accurately and precisely defined so as to provide a clear framework for evaluating its importance, and to assess the precision with which the means have been crafted to fulfil that objective": per Cory J. in U.F.C.W., Local 1518, supra, at para. 59; see also Thomson Newspapers, supra, at para. 96; RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 144. A court faced with vague objectives may well conclude, as did Arbour J.A. (as she then was) in Sauvé No. 1, supra, at p. 487, that "the highly symbolic and abstract nature of th[e] objective … detracts from its importance as a justification for the violation of a constitutionally protected right". If Parliament can infringe a crucial right such as the right to vote simply by offering symbolic and abstract reasons, judicial review either becomes vacuously constrained or reduces to a contest of "our symbols are better than your symbols". Neither outcome is compatible with the vigorous justification analysis required by the Charter.
> 24 The rhetorical nature of the government objectives advanced in this case renders them suspect. The first objective, enhancing civic responsibility and respect for the law, could be asserted of virtually every criminal law and many non-criminal measures. Respect for law is undeniably important. But the simple statement of this value lacks the context necessary to assist us in determining whether the infringement at issue is demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. To establish justification, one needs to know what problem the government is targeting, and why it is so pressing and important that it warrants limiting a Charter right. Without this, it is difficult if not impossible to weigh whether the infringement of the right is justifiable or proportionate.
> 25 The second objective — to impose additional punishment on people serving penitentiary sentences — is less vague than the first. Still, problems with vagueness remain. The record does not disclose precisely why Parliament felt that more punishment was required for this particular class of prisoner, or what additional objectives Parliament hoped to achieve by this punishment that were not accomplished by the sentences already imposed. This makes it difficult to assess whether the objective is important enough to justify an additional rights infringement.
> 26 Quite simply, the government has failed to identify particular problems that require denying the right to vote, making it hard to say that the denial is directed at a pressing and substantial purpose. Nevertheless, despite the abstract nature of the government's objectives and the rather thin basis upon which they rest, prudence suggests that we proceed to the proportionality analysis, rather than dismissing the government's objectives outright. The proportionality inquiry allows us to determine whether the government's asserted objectives are in fact capable of justifying its denial of the right to vote. At that stage, as we shall see, the difficulties inherent in the government's stated objectives become manifest.

[The dissent would instead have shown deference to Parliament given legislators' superior comparative expertise on electoral matters and the fact that competing social and political philosophies provided different answers to the question of whether it was democratic to deprive the incarcerated person of the right to cast a ballot. The dissent concluded that those persons convicted of criminal offences had violated the 'social contract' and that it was reasonable to deprive them of the right to vote on that basis.]

> 92 As emerges from the submissions before this Court, there seem generally to be two options available for dealing with the issue at hand. The first, that chosen by the Chief Justice, is to prefer an inclusive approach to democratic participation for serious criminal offenders incarcerated for two years or more. This view locates democratic participation as a central dimension of rehabilitation, insofar as the incarcerated offenders remain citizens with the fullest exercise of their democratic rights. By the same token, the unrestricted franchise enhances democratic legitimacy of government, and confirms or enhances the citizenship or standing of prisoners in society. To do otherwise, it is suggested, undermines the "dignity" or "worth" of prisoners. The alternative view, adopted by Parliament, considers that the temporary suspension of the prisoner's right to vote, in fact, enhances the general purposes of the criminal sanction, including rehabilitation. It does so by underlining the importance of civic responsibility and the rule of law. This approach sees the temporary removal of the vote as a deterrent to offending or re-offending and the return of the vote as an inducement to reject further criminal conduct. In withdrawing for a time one expression of political participation concurrently with personal freedom, the significance of both are enhanced. Rather than undermine the dignity or worth of prisoners, the removal of their vote takes seriously the notion that they are free actors and attaches consequences to actions that violate certain core values as expressed in the Criminal Code.
> 93 Both of these approaches, however, entail accepting logically prior political or social philosophies about the nature and content of the right to vote. The former approach, that accepted by the reasons of the Chief Justice, entails accepting a philosophy that preventing criminals from voting does damage to both society and the individual, and undermines prisoners' inherent worth and dignity. The latter approach also entails accepting a philosophy, that not permitting serious incarcerated criminals to vote is a social rejection of serious crime which reflects a moral line which safeguards the social contract and the rule of law and bolsters the importance of the nexus between individuals and the community. Both of these social or political philosophies, however, are aimed at the same goal: that of supporting the fundamental importance of the right to vote itself. Further, both of these social or political philosophies are supported by the practices of the various Canadian provinces, the practices of other liberal democracies, and academic writings. Finally, neither position can be proven empirically — rather, the selection of one over the other is largely a matter of philosophical preference. What is key to my approach is that the acceptance of one or the other of these social or political philosophies dictates much of the constitutional analysis which ensues, since the reasonableness of any limitation upon the right to vote and the appropriateness of particular penal theories and their relation to the right to vote will logically be related to whether or not the justification for that limitation is based upon an "acceptable" social or political philosophy.

94 The reasons of the Chief Justice hold, at para. 18, that the challenge of the government is to present a justification that is "convincing, in the sense that it is sufficient to satisfy the reasonable person looking at all the evidence and relevant considerations, that the state is justified in infringing the right at stake to the degree it has". I agree with this test, subject only to a recognition that as the context of the case at bar involves evaluating competing social or political philosophies, the analysis runs the risk of lapsing into the realm of ipse dixit. In the realm of competing social or political philosophies, reasonableness is the predominant s. 1 justification consideration.

Sauvé #2 is a central case in the debate about dialogue theory. Christopher Manfredi argued that Sauvé #2 represented 'The Day the Dialogue Died' (2007 CanLIIDocs 725). Sauvé was what dialogue theorists had called a 'second-look case.' The Court was reviewing the constitutionality of the more narrowly-tailored law that Parliament had drafted after the blanket ban on voting by all incarcerated individuals was struck down in Sauvé #1. For Manfredi, if the Supreme Court did not defer to Parliament on its 'second look,' then there was no true dialogue between courts and Parliament.

Chief Justice McLachlin rejected the idea of general deference on 'second-look' cases. She viewed a stringent standard of justification as necessary to protect a foundational political right:

17 Finally, the fact that the challenged denial of the right to vote followed judicial rejection of an even more comprehensive denial, does not mean that the Court should defer to Parliament as part of a "dialogue". Parliament must ensure that whatever law it passes, at whatever stage of the process, conforms to the Constitution. The healthy and important promotion of a dialogue between the legislature and the courts should not be debased to a rule of "if at first you don't succeed, try, try again".

3.1.2 Frank v Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2019] 1 SCR 3

The other leading case is Frank v Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2019] 1 SCR 3*,* which challenged a residency-based restriction on voting in federal elections. Canadian citizens living abroad for 5 or more years were prohibited from voting unless they returned to Canada and re-established residence. Following closely the reasoning in Sauvé, a majority of the Supreme Court struck down the prohibition. The majority rejected once again the 'social contract' reasoning favoured by the dissent in Sauvé #2, and the need for stringent justification given the foundational importance in a democracy of the right to vote.

Per the Frank majority:

[25] The right of every citizen to vote lies at the heart of Canadian democracy (Sauvé #2, at para. 1; Opitz, at para. 10). In Sauvé #2, a seminal decision on the right to vote, this Court reviewed the nature and purpose of s. 3 at length before striking down legislation which prevented inmates serving sentences of two years or more from voting in federal elections. McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, stressed the critical importance of a broad and purposive interpretation of the right to vote. She stated that the framers of the Charter had "signaled the special importance of this right not only by its broad, untrammeled language, but by exempting it from legislative override under s. 33's notwithstanding clause" (para. 11). As a result, any intrusions on this core democratic right are to be reviewed on the basis of a stringent justification standard (para. 14).

[26] The central purpose of s. 3 is to ensure the right of each citizen to participate meaningfully in the electoral process (Figueroa v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 37, [2003] 1 SCR 912, at paras. 25-26). Civic participation is fundamentally important to the health of a free and democratic society. Democracy demands that each citizen have a genuine opportunity to participate in the governance of the country through the electoral process. If this right were not protected adequately, ours would not be a true democracy (Figueroa, at para. 30).

[27] Therefore, a broad interpretation of s. 3 enhances the quality of our democracy and strengthens the values on which our free and democratic state is premised (Figueroa, at para. 27). As a corollary, an overly narrow interpretation of the right to vote would diminish the quality of democracy in our system of government. As this Court observed in Sauvé #2, a government that restricted the franchise to a select group would effectively weaken the legitimacy of the country's democratic system and undermine its own claim to power (para. 34).

The majority held that residency in Canada was not an unstated, internal limit on the right to vote in s. 3 and noted that residency had to be considered in light of the increasing mobility of Canadian citizens:

[31] It follows that a broad and purposive interpretation of s. 3 does not allow for residence to operate as an internal limit on the right to vote. As this Court held in Sauvé #2, the ambit of the s. 3 right to vote "should not be limited by countervailing collective concerns … These concerns are for the government to raise under s. 1 in justifying the limits it has imposed on the right" (para. 11). This does not of course foreclose the possibility that an infringement of the right to vote could be justified in the context of a reasonable limits analysis or that legislative restrictions on the right to vote are necessarily unconstitutional. What it does mean, however, is that limits on the right to vote must, if raised, be justified under s. 1, and not indirectly incorporated into the scope of the right itself. Accordingly, residence is not an essential requirement of the right to vote; rather, it is a countervailing consideration which must be justified by the AGC under s. 1 of the Charter.

[32] Nor, in my view, does the jurisprudence establish that residence is essential to the Charter right to vote. In no case has this Court held that residence is an essential and implicit requirement of the right to vote. On the contrary, as I mentioned above, it is clear from the jurisprudence that a broad and liberal interpretation is particularly critical in the case of the right to vote and that s. 3 must be "construed as it reads" (Sauvé #2, at para. 11). And although this Court described residence as a "fundamental requirement" in Opitz, it did so in relation to the definition of the statutory entitlement to vote set out in s. 6 of the Act, not to the scope of the right to vote under s. 3 of the Charter (para. 32). Moreover, the issue in Opitz was whether an election should be set aside because of administrative errors, not the scope of the right to vote in the context of a Charter challenge to electoral legislation. I therefore do not take Opitz to stand for the proposition that residence is an essential requirement of the right to vote under the Charter.

[33] In any event, the role of residence in our electoral system must be understood in its historical context. The requirement emerged at a time when citizens were generally unable to travel as easily and extensively as they do today and tended to spend their lives in one community. At that time, the right to vote was linked to the ownership of land, and only male property owners could vote. The residence requirement was designed, in part, to prevent "plural voting", that is, to prevent a person who owned property in several ridings from casting a vote in each of them (Haig v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995, at p. 1052).

> [34] Today, in contrast, we live in a globalized society. The ability of citizens not only to move, but to remain connected and maintain communications in so doing, is unprecedented. Many Canadians live abroad, and many do so for five years or more. The application judge cited evidence showing that in 2009, approximately 2.8 million Canadians — or 8 percent of Canada's population at the time — had been living abroad for one year or more, and that there were well over one million Canadians to whom the non-residence limit in the Act applied. He also noted that the results of one research project show that non-resident Canadian citizens maintain strong connections, both family- and employment-related, to Canada, as well as a strong sense of belonging. According to Penny J., the evidence revealed that, in addition to socio-cultural connections, many non-residents maintain strong economic ties to Canada by contributing to social insurance programs, paying taxes and receiving benefits. Further, he noted that 60 percent of surveyed respondents were solely Canadian citizens and, if denied the right to vote in Canada, would be unable to vote in any other country (see application judge's reasons, at paras. 19-30).
> [35] In sum, the world has changed. Canadians are both able and encouraged to live abroad, but they maintain close connections with Canada in doing so. The right to vote is no longer tied to the ownership of property and bestowed only on select members of society. And citizenship, not residence, defines our political community and underpins the right to vote.

Echoing Chief Justice McLachlin's majority reasons in Sauvé #2, the majority in Frank placed great emphasis on the fact that legislation depriving non-resident citizens of the right to vote sent an impermissible message that such Canadians were less 'worthy' than their fellow citizens:

> [82] Voting is the cornerstone of our democracy. Denying citizens the right to vote not only strikes at the heart of their fundamental rights, but also comes at the expense of their dignity and their sense of self-worth (Sauvé #2, at para. 35). As McLachlin C.J. noted in Sauvé #2: "When basic political rights are denied, proof of additional harm is not required" (para. 59). In other words, denial of the fundamental right to vote, in and of itself, inflicts harm on affected citizens. This is particularly true where there is simply no convincing rationale to support the denial. In the absence of evidence pointing to a concrete problem, the justification boils down to an argument based on worthiness: the non-resident citizens in question are deemed to be less deserving of the right to vote than the resident majority on the basis that they have voluntarily left Canada and severed their connection to the country. However, this Court has quite properly foreclosed the use of such worthiness rationales to justify restrictions on the right to vote in past cases. Worthiness cannot be used to justify the disenfranchisement of non-resident Canadian citizens in the case at bar.

The dissent preferred the reasoning of Gonthier J. in dissent in Sauvé #2 and transferred it from the context of incarceration to residency. Canadians living abroad for an extended period of time had exempted themselves from the full weight of Canadian law by living out of the country's jurisdiction. These citizens had therefore deliberately through their own life choices breached the 'social contract' and could be deprived of the right to cast a ballot in response. The dissent also emphasized the role that residence inevitably plays in a first past the post electoral system with geographic districts, which Canada inherited from the U.K.:

> [154] Second, preserving the relationship between electors and their communities through limits on long-term non-resident voting protects the integrity of the Canadian electoral system, which is founded on geographical representation. In this sense, it serves "the broader concept of effective representation which best serves the interests of a free and democratic society" (Ref. re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), at p. 189). The Constitution Act, 1867, establishes Canada as a parliamentary democracy with a "Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom" having, accordingly, an electoral system resting on geographically-defined electoral districts for the House of Commons, the Senate and the provincial legislatures (Constitution Act, 1867, preamble, ss. 21, 22, 37 to 40, 52 and 69 to 72). In Canada, as in the United Kingdom and other Westminster democracies, the origins of the voting system are rooted in "the notion of territorial representation" (V. Bogdanor, "Introduction", in V. Bogdanor and D. Butler, eds., Democracy and Elections: Electoral Systems and Their Political Consequences (1983), at p. 2). Before us, the appellants acknowledged that "residence was a defining feature" of Canada's democratic system (transcript, at pp. 19-20).
> [155] Under our Westminster parliamentary system, then, Canadian electors vote for a Member of Parliament (specifically, a member of the House of Commons), who serves as the representative of the electorate in a geographically defined community (Haig v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995, at p. 1031). At Confederation, this regional nature of the composition of the House of Commons was constitutionally entrenched (Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 37 and 40). (Although s. 40 is now considered spent, Parliament continues to provide for electoral districts under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. E-3; see A. Dodek, The Canadian Constitution (2nd ed. 2016), at p. 54.) While Parliament, as the aggregate of its members, represents "all constituencies, all of the territory, all parties, all interests, all citizens, all inhabitants" (J. Ajzenstat, The Canadian Founding: John Locke and Parliament (2007), at p. 61), the s. 3 voting right is premised upon electors voting for a representative of their community. This regional structure must therefore inform any consideration of the electoral system, and Canadians' participation therein.
> [156] Indeed, the regionally based composition of the House of Commons features prominently in our jurisprudence on the redrawing of boundaries, which permits "geography, demography and communities of interest" to be considered in determining constituency boundaries, even where such considerations may result in otherwise inequitable voting power disparities (Reference re Prov. Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), at p. 172; see also R. MacGregor Dawson, The Government of Canada (4th ed. 1963), at p. 341). Likewise, the notion of "ordinarily resident" is central to the Act, as it determines the polling division in which an elector exercises his or her right to vote (ss. 3 and 6, and Opitz, at para. 11). It is defined as "the place that has always been, or that has been adopted as, his or her dwelling place, and to which the person intends to return when away from it" (s. 8). Limiting long-term non-resident voting thus ensures that the electors residing in a particular constituency, who share a community of interests that is typically derived from (at least in part) geographical proximity, retain the power to decide for themselves who would best advance those shared interests on their behalf in the House of Commons. It follows that the appellants' and the majority's (at para. 69) insistence that connections to Canada can be maintained via, for example, online news websites, misses the point of the 1993 amendments: connections to particular communities are not so easily maintained.
> [157] The majority itself equivocates as to the role that residence plays, or should play, in Canada's voting rights regime. While recognizing that residence is an "important device", and that it "underpins our geographically determined, constituency-based system of electoral representation", it then minimizes residence as merely an "instrumental necessity," and not an "essential requirement" of the right to vote (paras. 28 and 31-32). With respect, the distinction between an instrumental necessity and an essential quality — a distinction that underpins the majority's entire analysis — eludes us. It also flies in the face of this Court's acknowledgement in Opitz that residence is a fundamental requirement of the right to vote, not simply an organizing mechanism — an observation that applies equally in the Charter context (para. 32). And, in any event, the majority offers no reason why residence should not be understood as an essential requirement — a judgement that is clearly at odds with that of Parliament and this Court's jurisprudence and one which finds no justification in the majority's reasons.

The dissent put emphasis on the fact that the disenfranchisement was only temporary, as citizens could return to Canada and resume voting, in response to the majority's concern that prohibiting non-resident citizens from voting communicated that they were less worthy than resident citizens:

> [168] Further, any adult Canadian citizen can still exercise the right to vote at any point, provided that he or she re-establishes residence in Canada. Thus, the restriction at issue is not a permanent denial of the right to vote. Just like the age requirement, it represents a distinction "based on the experiential situation of all citizens" in that category (Sauvé #2, at para. 37); it is not a distinction based on moral worth (which > was the Court's concern in Sauvé #2). The deleterious effects of the limit are therefore of less significance, and are outweighed by the other salutary effects that we have discussed — namely, ensuring reciprocity between exercising the right to vote and bearing the burden of Canadian laws, and protecting the integrity of Canada's electoral system.

Justice Rowe's concurrence focused on the issue of how residency requirements operate provincially. Some provinces require that individuals be resident in the jurisdiction for a period of months prior to being eligible to cast a ballot in provincial elections. In the context of the right to vote, Justice Rowe's reasoning would carve out greater space for residency requirements to be upheld as reasonable limits on the right to vote in provincial and territorial law than under federal law, given the need to protect the autonomy of smaller jurisdictions. The concurrence raised the unresolved general point of interpretation as to whether provisions of the Charter must necessarily have the same meaning when applied to federal as opposed to provincial legislation:

> [91] Section 3 protects the right to vote, but it does not follow as a corollary that there is a right to vote in the constituency or province of one's choosing. The provinces and territories have each crafted residence requirements that reflect the concerns and circumstances that are particular to their jurisdiction. For example, in Nunavut, to be eligible to vote in a territorial election, a person must have been resident in that territory for "a consecutive period of at least 12 months" (Nunavut Elections Act, S. Nu. 2002, c. 17, s. 7(1)). The Nunavut Elections Act also provides that "[n]o person is to be considered resident in a home or dwelling that the person occupies seasonally for a period not exceeding a total of 180 days a year, unless at the time of an election the person has no residence in any other place" (Nunavut Elections Act, s. 4(12)). In Ontario, as a general rule, individuals who are absent for more than two years lose their eligibility to vote in a provincial election (Election Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.6, s. 15(1.1)). In Quebec, persons must have been "domiciled" in the province for six months to be eligible to vote in a provincial election (Election Act, R.S.Q., c. E-3.3, s. 1). In my view, the concession by the AGC that the impugned measures infringe s. 3 does not prejudice provincial/territorial governments in arguing that their legislation does not. Nor does it decide the constitutionality of any other federal residence requirement. In any event, different considerations will apply at the s. 1 analysis of any established (or conceded) breach of s. 3 at the provincial level. I would note that in Reference re Yukon Election Residence Requirements (1986), 1986 CanLII 3944 (YK CA), 1 Y.R. 23 (C.A.), in considering the constitutionality of the territory's residence requirements, the Yukon Territory Court of Appeal considered the small margin by which many constituencies in the territory are won in elections (at para. 15), and the significant transient population passing through the territory (at para. 18), which could significantly impact local interests. Yukon residence requirements were upheld as constitutional in light of these circumstances. As this Court held in Haig, "[t]erritorial exigencies, such as those present in the northern territories, may justify a host of rules particular to a given province, and the possibility of such divergence is woven into the very fabric of Canadian federalism itself" (Haig v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 1993 CanLII 58 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 995, at p. 1029). Evidence of the circumstances relating to the various residence requirements in each of the provinces and territories may well affect the analysis of any alleged Charter infringement. It seems to me that all the above residence requirements would run afoul of the Charter if we take the view, which I do not, that residence bears no rational connection to electoral fairness and can never be the basis for limiting the right to vote. While their constitutionality awaits consideration another day (should they be challenged), the approach adopted in this case will surely be relevant.

The next major dispute about the right to cast a ballot under s.3 is likely to be about the voting age, as that is the last remaining significant restriction other than citizenship. Whereas the text of s.3 limits the rights holder to citizens, it does not mention age. The Canada Elections Act and most provincial electoral statutes limit voting to those aged 18 and above.

Does prohibiting 14 or 16 year-olds from voting send an impermissible message that they are unworthy, similar to the residency restriction struck down in Frank? Or is it reasonable given the fact that the law generally accepts a minimum age for a host of activities, including driving, marriage, working, and so on? Many of the potential rationales for limiting voting by those under-aged - such as a lack of education, capacity, experience, contributions to society, and so on - would result in the disenfranchisement of many adults if applied to them as a requirement to vote.

The dissent in Frank interpreted the majority in Sauvé #2 as supporting age-based restrictions, though took that to mean that residency-based restrictions should also be upheld:

> [144] Another voting rights restriction in the Act prevents minors from voting. Again, such a restriction is irreconcilable with an absolutist approach to s. 3's guarantee that "[e]very citizen … has the right to vote". We appreciate that this Court, in Sauvé #2, sought to distinguish the age restriction as "regulating a modality of the universal franchise" (para. 37 (emphasis added)), thereby casting it as a categorically different restriction from other limits to the s. 3 right. Parliament, we are told in Sauvé #2, "is making a decision based on the experiential situation of all citizens when they are young" (para. 37). But this rationale would presumably apply to support any line-drawing exercise. For example, on this logic, Parliament, in "making a decision based on the experiential situation of all citizens when they are young", could permissibly set the voting age at 75 without running afoul of s. 3. More to the point of this appeal, however, the distinction between a limit on the s. 3 right and a mere restriction on the modality of voting is not evident. Why is an age requirement a permissible "modality" of regulating the right to vote, but a residence requirement is not? And more particularly, if (as the appellants suggest) the distinguishing feature of the age requirement is that "it's just a timing [issue] as to when [a citizen can vote]" (transcript, at p. 21), why would that same rationale not also apply to a residence requirement, since a long-term non-resident is permitted to vote if and when they re-establish residence in Canada — a matter that is, unlike age, entirely within his or her control?
> [145] The only coherent account for the Act's restriction on the right to vote for Canadian citizens under the age of 18 — especially in light of the appellants' contention that the s. 3 right necessarily applies to all citizens — is that such a limit to the s. 3 right is justified. And as with the impugned measure here, that justification necessarily reflects a certain normative or philosophical theory — one that trades off some considerations (ensuring an informed electorate that is capable of exercising rational and independent choice) against others (extending the scope of the franchise to all citizens) in a particular manner. Properly understood, the uncontested capacity of lawmakers to prohibit minors from voting — whether cast as a limit, or as a regulation of a modality of the right to vote — supports the notion that Parliament has a critical role to play in shaping the boundaries of the s. 3 right, and that it necessarily exercises that role in pursuit of certain philosophical, moral, or otherwise normative objectives. Further, the age restriction on voting plainly belies the notion that a lack of Canadian citizenship is the only constitutionally permissible basis upon which Parliament may deny someone the right to vote.

3.1.3 Section 3 and Section 33

The voting rights cases have engaged with the fact that the notwithstanding clause in s.33 of the Charter is inapplicable to s.3. In Sauvé #2, Chief Justice McLachlin interpreted the inapplicability of s.33 to democratic rights as a textual indication of the importance of the right to vote in a democracy and, consequently, the need for courts to zealously guard the right against undue intrusion:

> 11 At the first stage, which involves defining the right, we must follow this Court's consistent view that rights shall be defined broadly and liberally: Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 156; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 344; Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 624, at para. 53. A broad and purposive interpretation of the right is particularly critical in the case of the right to vote. The framers of the Charter signaled the special importance of this right not only by its broad, untrammeled language, but by exempting it from legislative override under s. 33's > notwithstanding clause. I conclude that s. 3 must be construed as it reads, and its ambit should not be limited by countervailing collective concerns, as the government appears to argue. These concerns are for the government to raise under s. 1 in justifying the limits it has imposed on the right.

> 13 The core democratic rights of Canadians do not fall within a "range of acceptable alternatives" among which Parliament may pick and choose at its discretion. Deference may be appropriate on a decision involving competing social and political policies. It is not appropriate, however, on a decision to limit fundamental rights. This case is not merely a competition between competing social philosophies. It represents a conflict between the right of citizens to vote — one of the most fundamental rights guaranteed by the Charter — and Parliament's denial of that right. Public debate on an issue does not transform it into a matter of "social philosophy", shielding it from full judicial scrutiny. It is for the courts, unaffected by the shifting winds of public opinion and electoral interests, to safeguard the right to vote guaranteed by s. 3 of the Charter.
> 14 Charter rights are not a matter of privilege or merit, but a function of membership in the Canadian polity that cannot lightly be cast aside. This is manifestly true of the right to vote, the cornerstone of democracy, exempt from the incursion permitted on other rights through s. 33 override. Thus, courts considering denials of voting rights have applied a stringent justification standard: Sauvé v. Canada (Attorney General) (1992), 1992 CanLII 2786 (ON CA), 7 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.) ("Sauvé No. 1"), and Belczowski v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 8580 (FCA), [1992] 2 F.C. 440 (C.A.).

A majority of the Supreme Court in Frank took the same view*:*

> [25] The right of every citizen to vote lies at the heart of Canadian democracy (Sauvé #2, at para. 1; Opitz, at para. 10). In Sauvé #2, a seminal decision on the right to vote, this Court reviewed the nature and purpose of s. 3 at length before striking down legislation which prevented inmates serving sentences of two years or more from voting in federal elections. McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, stressed the critical importance of a broad and purposive interpretation of the right to vote. She stated that the framers of the Charter had "signaled the special importance of this right not only by its broad, untrammeled language, but by exempting it from legislative override under s. 33's notwithstanding clause" (para. 11). As a result, any intrusions on this core democratic right are to be reviewed on the basis of a stringent justification standard (para. 14)

The dissent in Sauvé #2 opined that there was little historical evidence to support the majority's view on how to interpret the fact that s.3 is exempt from s.33:

> 96 The analysis cannot be skirted by qualifying the right to vote as a core democratic right. It does not follow from the fact that Parliament is denied the authority to remove or qualify the right to vote in its sole discretion under s. 33 that limitations on that right may not be justified under s. 1, or that a more onerous s. 1 analysis must necessarily apply. Constitutional writers and commentators point out that s. 33 was a political compromise, meant to bring together provinces opposed to the entrenchment of constitutional rights, with those in favour: P. Macklem et al., Canadian Constitutional Law (2nd ed. 1997), at pp. 597 and 646. Indeed Macklem et al. write at p. 597: "Added to the Charter at the last moment, this controversial provision captured the final political compromise among the provinces and federal government that facilitated the adoption of the Charter". There is little evidence of the intention behind excluding democratic rights (along with mobility rights, language rights, and enforcement provisions) from the ambit of s. 33, nor has this Court ever seriously considered the significance of such exclusion. The Chief Justice's conclusion at para. 11 that "[t]he framers of the Charter signaled the special importance of this right … by exempting it from legislative override …" requires examination before it can be used as support for nearly insulating the right to vote from s. 1 limitations. In fact, s. 33 and s. 1 are clearly different in their purpose, and the Charter clearly distinguishes their application to the right to vote. It does not behoove the Court to read s. 33 into s. 3 by finding in s. 3, when divorced from s. 1, the statement of a political philosophy which preempts another political philosophy which is reasonable and justified under the latter section. The Charter was not intended to monopolize the ideological space.

The dissenting opinion in Frank interprets the fact that s.3 is exempt from s.33 as compelling not robust judicial scrutiny of limits on the right to vote but, instead, judicial restraint and deference:

> [141] The majority's approach leaves no room for a meaningful limitations analysis by reasoning that "the Charter tethers voting rights to citizenship, and citizenship alone" (para. 29). This Court did not go so far in Sauvé #2 as to state the s. 3 right in such absolutist terms; indeed, the very indication that the s. 3 right to vote "cannot lightly be cast aside" and is subject to a "stringent justification standard" confirms that this right can be justifiably limited (Sauvé #2, at para. 14). Further, the majority's point that s. 3 cannot be overridden by s. 33's notwithstanding clause should not, in our respectful view, be taken as conferring judicial license to strike down legislation on the basis of disagreement with Parliament's policy objectives in legislating on the exercise of the right to vote. Rather, it should encourage judicial restraint in considering those objectives, knowing that a finding of constitutional invalidity would absolutely foreclose Parliament from pursuing them. Three considerations support the view that Parliament is permitted, within limits, to shape the scope of voting rights under s. 1.

Who do you think has the better argument about the relationship between s.3 and s.33?

The fact that s.3 is exempt from the notwithstanding clause is proving to be consequential, since provincial governments have shown a new willingness to invoke s.33, including in relation to democratic rights. Section 33 does not apply to either s.3 (the right to vote), s.4(duration of a legislature), and s.5 (legislatures must meet at least once a year) of the Charter. Yet it still applies to other rights and freedoms necessary for democracy to function, including notably freedom of political expression in s.2(b). For further discussion, see Dwight Newman, "Key Foundations for the Notwithstanding Clause in Institutional Capacities, Democratic Participatory Values, and Dimensions of Canadian Identities" in Peter L. Biro, ed, The Notwithstanding Clause and the Canadian Charter: Rights, Reforms, and Controversies (McGill-Queen's University Press, 2024) 69; Michael Pal, "Democracy and the Notwithstanding Clause" 2024 CanLIIDocs 3217; and, Marion Sandilands and Danielle Bennett, "The Charter's Federal Spine: Why Are Certain Charter Rights Immune From the Notwithstanding Clause?" (2022) 43:2 NJCL 169.

Claimants in cases involving rights – such as expression, association, and equality – in the context of elections are now likely to frame their claims as being s.3 violations tied to the expressive, associational, or equality dimensions of 'meaningful participation' or 'effective representation.' Doing so allows them to avoid the prospect that they might win in court, thereby invaliding a law for breaching s.2 or s.15, only to have the law re-passed in identical form under s.33's ambit.

3.2 Challenges to the electoral system

There have been a number of challenges to the constitutionality of the electoral system itself under s.3. Like the United Kingdom , Canada has the first-past-the-post system where the winner of each riding is the individual who receives the largest number of votes. Most other democracies use some form of proportional representation, where there is a closer relationship between total votes cast and the seats in Parliament for each party than under first-past-the-post. A claim that first-past-the-post harms small parties and their supporters and therefore violates s.3 of the Charter was rejected by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Daoust c Québec (Directeur general des élections), 2011 QCCA 1634 (CanLII). The QCCA found that s.3 does not require proportional representation:

> [56] Once there is effective representation of citizens, which implies the possibility that each elector can exercise his right to vote periodically, freely, and secretly, be a candidate for office, vote for the party of his choice, and express himself in public, the right to vote enshrined in s. 3 of the Canadian Charter and s. 22 of the Quebec Charter is respected. [Footnote omitted.]

In Fair Voting BC v Canada (Attorney General), 2024 ONCA 619 (CanLII), an Ontario court rejected the claim that first-past-the-post violated s.3 for disproportionately harming racial minorities and women, an argument which was not directly addressed in Daoust. In doing so, they also rejected the underlying claim of electoral reformers that first-past-the-post results in 'wasted votes' by those who vote for a losing candidate in a riding:

> [60] Having said that, the Supreme Court of Canada has indicated on several occasions that elected representatives are responsible to their electoral constituency as a whole, who have a right to meaningful participation in the electoral process but not to fashioning the post-election composition of Parliament in their own image: Figueroa, at para. 26. Thus, MPs are responsible to their entire constituency, which includes those who did not vote for them or their party as well as those who did: Haig, at 1031.
> [61] This understanding of the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process has been described as a "complete statement of the purpose of s. 3 of the Charter": Figueroa, at para. 25. Accordingly, the Supreme Court has been willing to state emphatically that no votes, including those cast for an unsuccessful party or candidate, are "wasted votes". The Court has instead viewed the views of voters supporting candidates who do not end up in Parliament in a positive light: "As a public expression of individual support for certain perspectives and opinions, such votes are an integral component of a vital and dynamic democracy": Ibid,, at para. 45.

3.3 Political parties and the Charter

The Supreme Court has interpreted s.3 as not just guaranteeing the right to cast a ballot, but also protecting the background factors that ensure fair political competition. This approach has been most evident in relation to political parties, which are essential features of contemporary democracy but not mentioned in the Constitution.

In Figueroa v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2003] 1 SCR 912 (Figueroa), the head of the Communist Party of Canada argued that various provisions of the Canada Elections Act unduly harmed small political parties and, as a result, favoured large political parties. The Supreme Court agreed on the reasoning that while parties are not rights holders under s.3 (which says that 'Every citizen' has the right), individuals channel their participation through parties and that activity attracts s.3 protection. Legislation which limits 'meaningful participation' breaches s.3, according to the Court. While only large parties have a realistic shot of forming government, participation through small parties is equally protected by the Charter.

3.3.1 Figueroa v Canada (Attorney General), 2003 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2003] 1 SCR 912

> 26 Support for the proposition that s. 3 should be understood with reference to the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process, rather than the election of a particular form of government, is found in the fact that the rights of s. 3 are participatory in nature. Section 3 does not advert to the composition of Parliament subsequent to an election, but only to the right of each citizen to a certain level of participation in the electoral process. On its very face, then, the central focus of s. 3 is the right of each citizen to participate in the electoral process. This signifies that the right of each citizen to participate in the political life of the country is one that is of fundamental importance in a free and democratic society and suggests that s. 3 should be interpreted in a manner that ensures that this right of participation embraces a content commensurate with the importance of individual participation in the selection of elected representatives in a free and democratic state. Defining the purpose of s. 3 with reference to the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process, rather than the composition of Parliament subsequent to an election, better ensures that the right of participation that s. 3 explicitly protects is not construed too narrowly.
> 27 An understanding of s. 3 that emphasizes the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process also is sensitive to the full range of reasons that individual participation in the electoral process is of such importance in a free and democratic society. As Dickson C.J. wrote in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, at p. 136:
>
> > The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.
> In this passage, Dickson C.J. was addressing s. 1. Yet since reference to "a free and democratic society" is essential to an enriched understanding of s. 3, this passage indicates that the best interpretation of s. 3 is one that advances the values and principles that embody a free and democratic state, including respect for a diversity of beliefs and opinions. Defining the purpose of s. 3 with reference to the right of each citizen to meaningful participation in the electoral process, best reflects the capacity of individual participation in the electoral process to enhance the quality of democracy in this country.
> 28 As this Court frequently has acknowledged, the free flow of diverse opinions and ideas is of fundamental importance in a free and democratic society. In R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, at pp. 763-64, Dickson C.J. described the connection between the free flow of diverse opinions and ideas and the values essential to a free and democratic society in the following terms:
>
> > The connection between freedom of expression and the political process is perhaps the linchpin of the s. 2(b) guarantee, and the nature of this connection is largely derived from the Canadian commitment to democracy. Freedom of expression is a crucial aspect of the democratic commitment, not merely because it permits the best policies to be chosen from among a wide array of proffered options, but additionally because it helps to ensure that participation in the political process is open to all persons. Such open participation must involve to a substantial degree the notion that all persons are equally deserving of respect and dignity. The state therefore cannot act to hinder or condemn a political view without to some extent harming the openness of Canadian democracy and its associated tenet of equality for all.
> Put simply, full political debate ensures that ours is an open society with the benefit of a broad range of ideas and opinions: see Switzman v. Elbling, 1957 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1957] SCR 285, at p. 326; RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573, at p. 583; Edmonton Journal v. Alberta (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 20 (SCC), [1989] 2 SCR 1326, at p. 1336; and R. v. Sharpe, [2001] 1 SCR 45, 2001 SCC 2, at para. 23. This, in turn, ensures not only that policy makers are aware of a broad range of options, but also that the determination of social policy is sensitive to the needs and interests of a broad range of citizens.
> 29 It thus follows that participation in the electoral process has an intrinsic value independent of its impact upon the actual outcome of elections. To be certain, the electoral process is the means by which elected representatives are selected and governments formed, but it is also the primary means by which the average citizen participates in the open debate that animates the determination of social policy. The right to run for office provides each citizen with the opportunity to present certain ideas and opinions to the electorate as a viable policy option; the right to vote provides each citizen with the opportunity to express support for the ideas and opinions that a particular candidate endorses. In each instance, the democratic rights entrenched in s. 3 ensure that each citizen has an opportunity to express an opinion about the formation of social policy and the functioning of public institutions through participation in the electoral process.

> 30 In the final analysis, I believe that the Court was correct in Haig, supra, to define s. 3 with reference to the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process. Democracy, of course, is a form of government in which sovereign power resides in the people as a whole. In our system of democracy, this means that each citizen must have a genuine opportunity to take part in the governance of the country through participation in the selection of elected representatives. The fundamental purpose of s. 3, in my view, is to promote and protect the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the political life of the country. Absent such a right, ours would not be a true democracy.

3.4 Right to stand as a candidate

A lesser-explored aspect of s.3 is its protection of the right to stand as a candidate: 'Every citizen has…the right to be qualified for membership therein [meaning election to the House and provincial legislatures].' The right serves to protect individuals who wish to run for office, but also acts as an indirect guarantee that voters will be able to select a representative of their choice.

Limits excluding groups of citizens from standing as a candidate should generally be assumed to breach s.3 and require justification under s.1 of the Charter. Individuals are barred from running as a candidate in federal and provincial electoral statutes if they have engaged in criminal activity of various kinds, particularly if the conviction is for offences related to the electoral process. In Harvey v New Brunswick (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 163 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 876 (Harvey), the Supreme Court upheld a five-year ban on Mr. Harvey running for office after he had been convicted of electoral offences. The majority read the language in s.3 as providing an untrammeled right to stand as a candidate, so that any limit on that right had to be justified under s.1:

3.4.1 Harvey v New Brunswick (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 163 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 876

> 28 …I agree with the appellant that the provisions of s. 119(c) are prima facie unconstitutional as violating his rights under s. 3 of the Charter. My reasons are twofold. First, there is the language of s. 3. Admittedly in the English version the words "right to be qualified" are somewhat ambiguous. The use of the word "qualified" suggests that certain criteria must be met before a citizen can run for office. However, since there exists a right to be qualified, it would appear that qualification is automatic regardless of any criteria set out by statute. If it was Parliament's intent to confer on every citizen the right to be a candidate, clearer language should have been used. But we are not left in doubt. A more precise statement of the right appears in the equally authoritative French text, which uses the phrase "Tout citoyen canadien ... est éligible aux élections …". The word "éligible" translates as "eligible" in English and is defined in Le Nouveau Petit Robert (1994), at p. 733, as one who has met the relevant conditions so that they can be chosen. This suggests that the English version of s. 3 should be read as "[e]very citizen … is qualified for membership therein". In short, while the English version is somewhat lacking in clarity, the French version is straightforward and indicates that the right to be a candidate and to sit as a member of Parliament or a legislative assembly should be read in a broad manner.

The majority in Harvey viewed disqualification from running for office for electoral offences as justified for protecting electoral integrity:

> 41 I am also of the view that the five-year disqualification is rationally connected to the objective. A mandatory disqualification acts as a strong deterrent and helps to promote confidence in the electoral system. Again, the appellant's contention that the disqualification displays paternalism on the part of the legislature misses the point. The provision is meant to protect the public not only from a particular offender, but from offenders in general. In other words the legislature is aiming at both general and specific deterrence.
> 42 I would also reject the appellant's contention that the operation of s. 119(c) is arbitrary because it is mandatory in nature and applies to everyone convicted of a corrupt or illegal practice. While the section is mandatory, it only comes into play when an individual has been convicted of one of a number of prescribed offences each of which involves an attack on the integrity of the democratic process, albeit some may be more serious than others. If a Member of the Legislative Assembly is convicted of any of these offences the whole of the electoral process may be brought into disrepute. The argument that the penalty is arbitrary is also weakened by the fact that it is only imposed after a conviction in a court of law. Finally, the fact that the trial judge has no discretion with respect to this part of the penalty is no more arbitrary than any minimum sentence found in the Criminal Code or any other penal statute.

The Harvey majority accepted that a five-year disqualification was a significant penalty. An elected representative would have to vacate their seat if convicted of one of the electoral offences and would be ineligible to run in the by-election or the subsequent general election, as five years is the maximum constitutionally permitted duration between elections. The Court upheld the five year disqualification as not more than minimally impairing of the right to stand as a candidate:

> 46 The imposition of a five-year disqualification raises a more difficult issue. Accepting, as I do, that there is a rational connection between some term of disqualification and the desired objective, the question is reduced to what period of disqualification represents a minimal impairment of the appellant's s. 3 Charter rights. It clearly makes sense that the appellant should not be allowed to run in the by-election that arises from him vacating his seat, but how much further should it go? In settling on a five-year disqualification the legislature has ensured that the appellant is ineligible to run in the next general election. While it is true that there could be several elections within that time, the legislature has chosen a fixed term, presumably because of its added certainty. In addition, a five-year disqualification provides for a time of cleansing, allowing the integrity of the electoral process to be renewed both in real terms and in the mind of the electorate.

Existing restrictions in electoral statutes on standing as a candidate include administrative requirements of various kinds to ensure the integrity of the process. The courts have struck down limits on candidacy where they appear to have a disproportionate impact on a particular group of citizens. The requirement to pay a deposit in order to stand as a candidate, for example, was struck down for disadvantaging individuals who could not meet the financial requirement (De Jong v Ontario (Attorney General), (2007) CanLII 44348 (ON SC)).

3.5 Campaign finance law

Campaign finance law has been a perpetual matter of controversy in Canada, because it brings together competing constitutional values. Freedom of political expression implies that political speech, and by necessity spending on election advertising and on contributions to political entities, should be as untrammelled as possible (See Richard Moon, The Life and Death of Freedom of Expression (University of Toronto Press, 2024) 93-121). Yet unlimited spending in an unequal society means that those with access to resources may dominate electoral discourse through advertising or have undue influence in the form of large contributions to parties and candidates. Such a dynamic can reasonably be seen as likely to lead to public policy that favours the wealthy and the well-organized.

In response to concerns about inegalitarian politics because of disparities in wealth leading to disparities in access and influence, federal election law restricts contributions to political parties, candidates, leadership contestants, and electoral district associations. Election law imposes spending limits on political parties, candidates, third parties, and electoral district associations. Many provinces have similar legislation, though there are outliers. These laws limit freedom of political expression in order to facilitate democratic equality.

The Supreme Court has upheld electoral laws limiting political spending on the theory that they reflect a valid 'egalitarian model' of elections even where there are limits on freedom of expression: Colin Feasby, 'Libman v. Quebec (A.G.) and the Administration of the Process of Democracy Under the Charter: The Emerging Egalitarian Model, 1999 CanLIIDocs 57.

The Supreme Court of Canada in Libman v Quebec (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 569 (Libman), in the context of a referendum, struck down strict rules on spending by organized 'yes' and 'no' campaigns, because for some expressers they amounted to a 'total ban' on spending:

3.5.1 Libman v Quebec (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 569

> 75 While it is true that the impugned provisions do not totally prohibit the freedom of expression of these individuals and groups, which should normally make the infringement easier to justify (see: Ramsden v. Peterborough (City), 1993 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1993] 2 SCR 1084, at pp. 1105-6; RJR-MacDonald, at pp. 343-44 and 353), the forms of expression provided for in s. 404 Special Version are so restrictive that they come close to being a total ban. While ss. 404(1) and (3) authorize expression by means of the print, radio or television media, they require that the opinion be circulated or broadcast "without payment, reward or promise of payment or reward". The ability to express a point of view through these media thus depends on a third party, which limits the effectiveness of this exception to regulated expenses considerably. Since not the slightest amount may be spent, it will ultimately be the radio or television broadcaster or the print publisher who will decide whether the opinion will be disseminated. Section 404(2) provides for the possibility of publishing a book during the referendum campaign provided that the publication was planned before the campaign began. This exception is also very limited, since in most cases it will be much more appropriate to write a book during the referendum campaign, and after having read the referendum question, than before. Furthermore, writing a book requires substantial resources that are not available to all those who would like to present their points of view in the referendum debate. Sections 404(4) and (5) provide that a person may pay, out of his or her own money, any expenses he or she incurs for transportation, meals and lodging while travelling "for referendum purposes", if these expenses are not reimbursed. However, it is not sufficient to permit people to pay their travelling expenses, as they still have to be able to pay to have their point of view heard once they reach their destination. The final relevant exception is found in s. 404(9), which authorizes incurring up to $600 in costs to hold a meeting, including the cost of renting a hall and convening the participants. Without ruling on the reasonableness of the amount in question, it must be recognized that this exception, like the others, is very restrictive, as it is limited to the organization of a meeting.

They noted, however, that spending limits with a different design would be constitutional on an egalitarian rationale. In doing so, they were agreeing with the influential recommendations of the Royal Commission on Electoral Reform and Party Financing (1991), also known as the Lortie Commission. The Lortie Commission remains the most comprehensive study of the various dimensions of election law reform in Canada:

> 52 Limits on independent spending are essential to maintain an equilibrium in the financial resources available to candidates and political parties and thus ensure the fairness of elections (Lortie Commission, supra, at p. 327). Furthermore, according to another survey conducted in 1991, 75 percent of Canadians supported limits on spending by interest groups (Lortie Commission, supra, at p. 337). These statistics also show the importance of controlling spending in order to maintain public confidence in the electoral system.
> 53 In our view, the Lortie Commission's comments on the importance of limits on independent spending for preserving the fairness of the Canadian electoral system should apply, mutatis mutandis, to the Quebec referendum system. In a referendum, "options" are submitted to voters rather than candidates or political parties. The national committees are the principal structure set up by the Quebec legislature to promote each of these options. Spending by the national committees is subject to limits to ensure that equivalent financial resources are available to the proponents of each option for addressing the public. Referendum period spending limits are essential to guarantee the fairness of the referendum. The appellant does not contest this limit on the national committees.
> 54 However, the spending limit system would lose all its effectiveness if independent spending were not also limited. Spending by individuals or groups who do not wish to or cannot join or affiliate themselves with one of the national committees must be limited for the same reasons as underlie the limits on independent spending during an election campaign. Independent spending during a referendum campaign directly or indirectly favours one of the options over the others. Even independent individuals and groups advocating abstention indirectly favour one of the options over the others (testimony of Professor Aucoin, Case on Appeal, at p. 155). Independent spending must therefore be controlled to ensure that the promotion of one of the options does not benefit from far greater financial resources. The limit on independent spending must also be stricter than that granted to the national committees. Since it cannot be assumed that each option will benefit from the same amount of independent spending in its favour, such spending must be restricted to preserve a balance in the promotion of the options and favour an informed and truly free exercise of the right to vote. In this light, the regulation of referendum spending pursues one of the objectives underlying freedom of expression, namely the ability to make informed choices (Ford v. Quebec (Attorney General), supra, at p. 767).
> 55 The appellant relied on Somerville v. Canada (Attorney General) (1996), 1996 ABCA 217 (CanLII), 136 D.L.R. (4th) 205, in support of his submissions concerning the unfairness of the limits on independent spending in the Referendum Act. In that case, the Alberta Court of Appeal declared certain provisions of the Canada Elections Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. E-2, relating to limits on independent spending similar to the ones at issue here to be unconstitutional. Among other things, these provisions allowed third parties to incur "advertising expenses" provided that they did not exceed $1000 and were not pooled. These advertising expenses included all expenses incurred "for the production, publication, broadcast and distribution of any advertising for the purpose of [directly] promoting or opposing" a party or candidate during an election (s. 259). In the view of the Alberta Court of Appeal, the impugned legislation violated the freedoms of expression and association guaranteed by the Canadian Charter . It stressed that the objective of limiting third party spending was itself inconsistent with the Canadian Charter because it gave preferential treatment to the expression of candidates and political parties, to the detriment of third parties.
> 56 However, it is our view that the objective of Quebec's referendum legislation is highly laudable, as is that of the Canada Elections Act. We agree in this respect with the analysis of the Lortie Commission and of the expert witness P. Aucoin regarding the need to limit spending both by the principal parties (the national committees in the case of a referendum) and by independent individuals and groups in order to preserve the fairness of elections and, in the present case, referendums. The system set up by the legislature to ensure a certain equality of resources between the options submitted to a referendum and thereby enhance democratic expression would become ineffective if independent individuals and groups were allowed unlimited spending or spending with a ceiling similar to that of the national committees. As we pointed out earlier, it cannot be presumed that the same financial resources will be available to the different independent individuals or groups or that those resources will be divided equally to support the various options. The legislature's objective can only be achieved through stricter limits on independent spending, which are supported by a large majority of Canadians.
> 57 The evidence adduced by the Attorney General of Quebec demonstrates the need to prevent an unequal distribution of financial resources among the options that would undermine the fairness of the referendum process. The evidence also shows that unless independent spending is controlled, any system for limiting the spending of the national committees would become futile. In our view, there is clearly a rational connection between limits on independent spending and the legislature's objective.

In Harper v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2004] 1 SCR 827 (Harper), the Supreme Court was faced with a s.2(b) Charter challenge to federal rules applicable to third parties (interest groups and individuals other than political parties and candidates). The legislation applied registration and reporting requirements, anti-collusion provisions to prevent third parties from evading spending limits by collaborating with each other or with political parties, and, most importantly, a spending limit that applied during the official election campaign period.

The majority of the Supreme Court reiterated the doctrine from Libman that limits on spending by interest groups could be constitutional if they permitted some meaningful amount of spending. It also further developed the egalitarian model in its reasoning upholding the challenged portions of the Canada Elections Act:

3.5.2 Harper v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33 (CanLII), [2004] 1 SCR 827

> 72 The question, then, is what promotes an informed voter? For voters to be able to hear all points of view, the information disseminated by third parties, candidates and political parties cannot be unlimited. In the absence of spending limits, it is possible for the affluent or a number of persons or groups pooling their resources and acting in concert to dominate the political discourse. The respondent's factum illustrates that political advertising is a costly endeavour. If a few groups are able to flood the electoral discourse with their message, it is possible, indeed likely, that the voices of some will be drowned out; see Libman, supra; Figueroa, supra, at para. 49. Where those having access to the most resources monopolize the election discourse, their opponents will be deprived of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard. This unequal dissemination of points of view undermines the voter's ability to be adequately informed of all views. In this way, equality in the political discourse is necessary for meaningful participation in the electoral process and ultimately enhances the right to vote. Therefore, contrary to the respondent's submission, s. 3 does not guarantee a right to unlimited information or to unlimited participation.
> 73 Spending limits, however, must be carefully tailored to ensure that candidates, political parties and third parties are able to convey their information to voters. Spending limits which are overly restrictive may undermine the informational component of the right to vote. To constitute an infringement of the right to vote, these spending limits would have to restrict information in such a way as to undermine the right of citizens to meaningfully participate in the political process and to be effectively represented.
> 74 The question, then, is whether the spending limits set out in s. 350 interfere with the right of each citizen to play a meaningful role in the electoral process. In my view, they do not. The trial judge found that the advertising expense limits allow third parties to engage in "modest, national, informational campaigns" as well as "reasonable electoral district informational campaigns" but would prevent third parties from engaging in an "effective persuasive campaign" (para. 78). He did not give sufficient attention to the potential number of third parties or their ability to act in concert. Meaningful participation in elections is not synonymous with the ability to mount a media campaign capable of determining the outcome. In fact, such an understanding of "meaningful participation" would leave little room in the political discourse for the individual citizen and would be inimical to the right to vote. Accordingly, there is no infringement of s. 3 in this case and no conflict between the right to vote and freedom of expression.

One of the features of the legislation was that third parties faced much lower spending limits than political parties. Political parties could therefore spend much more during the campaign than third parties. The logic behind this policy was that there was a small number of political parties but an infinite number of potential third parties, so the differential limit was required to ensure that political parties could get their message out, given the fact that only political parties and candidates, not third parties, compete for elected office.

The dissent in Harper accepted egalitarian goals broadly, but would have struck down the law as imposing too onerous a set of restrictions, thereby chilling speech and, because of the lower spending limit for third parties, providing a near monopoly on debate to political parties:

> 19 The Canada Elections Act undercuts the right to listen by withholding from voters an ingredient that is critical to their individual and collective deliberation: substantive analysis and commentary on political issues of the day. The spending limits impede the ability of citizens to communicate with one another through public fora and media during elections and curtail the diversity of perspectives heard and assessed by the electorate. Because citizens cannot mount effective national television, radio and print campaigns, the only sustained messages voters see and hear during the course of an election campaign are from political parties.
> 20 It is clear that the right here at issue is of vital importance to Canadian democracy. In the democracy of ancient Athens, all citizens were able to meet and discuss the issues of the day in person. In our modern democracy, we cannot speak personally with each of our fellow citizens. We can convey our message only through methods of mass communication. Advertising through mail-outs and the media is one of the most effective means of communication on a large scale. We need only look at the reliance of political parties on advertising to realize how important it is to actually reaching citizens — in a word, to effective participation. The ability to speak in one's own home or on a remote street corner does not fulfill the objective of the guarantee of freedom of expression, which is that each citizen be afforded the opportunity to present her views for public consumption and attempt to persuade her fellow citizens. Pell J.'s observation could not be more apt: "[s]peech without effective communication is not speech but an idle monologue in the wilderness"; see United States v. Dellinger, 472 F.2d 340 (7th Cir. 1972), at p. 415.
> 21 This is the perspective from which we must approach the question whether the limitation on citizen spending is justified. It is no answer to say that the citizen can speak through a registered political party. The citizen may hold views not espoused by a registered party. The citizen has a right to communicate those views. The right to do so is essential to the effective debate upon which our democracy rests, and lies at the core of the free expression guarantee. That does not mean that the right cannot be limited. But it does mean that limits on it must be supported by a clear and convincing demonstration that they are necessary, do not go too far, and enhance more than harm the democratic process.

Note that in Harper the spending limits at issue only applied during the official election campaign period. The spending limits on third parties and political parties were therefore only applicable for a month to a month and a half during the usual four year period between elections, though at the most consequential moment for voter choice. Third parties and political parties became more sophisticated in their communications strategy and the media environment changed after Harper. Politics has become a 'permanent campaign' operating online and off-line 24/7/365. As the spending limit only applied during the campaign in most jurisdictions in Canada, unlimited spending was possible in the pre-campaign or 'pre-writ' period.

Some jurisdictions implemented pre-writ spending limits in response to increased spending prior to the permanent campaign. For example, federal legislation was amended to imposed a three month pre-writ period in the lead up to a fixed election date. Ontario initially implemented legislation imposing a 6 month pre-writ regulated period with a spending limit on third parties and political parties. The Ford government subsequently extended the regulated pre-writ period from 6 months to 12 months, but did not increase the spending limit.

The Supreme Court struck down the pre-writ limits on third parties in Ontario (Attorney General) v Working Families Coalition (Canada) Inc., 2025 SCC 5 (CanLII) (Working Families). The Court was particularly concerned with the extension of the time period in which the spending limit applied without an increase in the permitted amount. They also found constitutionally deficient the relative amount of spending permitted to political parties and third parties. Disadvantaging third parties to such an extent was seen as disproportionate and a violation of s.3 not saved by s.1:

3.5.3 Ontario (Attorney General) v Working Families Coalition (Canada) Inc., 2025 SCC 5 (CanLII)

> [6] The application judge relied on expert evidence suggesting that both a 6- and 12-month spending limit for third parties would promote electoral fairness, and concluded that the challenged provision did not violate s. 3 of the Charter. He determined that third parties could still advertise within the spending limit, and that expensive television advertisements did not contribute to policy debates. The application judge thus concluded that the law respected the right of voters to meaningfully participate in the electoral process through an informed vote.

[7] With respect, I disagree. An examination of the extent of low-cost advertising that third parties can still engage in does not capture the broader impacts of the spending limit that, by design, creates absolute disproportionality, or a disproportionality that is so marked on its face that it allows political parties to drown out the voices of third parties on political issues from reaching citizens during an entire year of legislative activity.

[9] In this way, this Court has held that the purpose of s. 3 is for voters to be effectively represented in government, and to play a meaningful role in the electoral process. A legislative measure that undermines or interferes with citizens' ability to meaningfully participate in the electoral process will infringe the right to vote. And meaningful participation requires that citizens be able to vote in an informed way (Harper, at paras. 71 and 73). An informed vote is foundational to the health of the electoral system and a properly functioning democracy.

[10] An egalitarian model of elections — endorsed by this Court in Libman v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 326 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 569, and Harper — aims to achieve a balance in the political discourse, such that no one participant in the electoral system can exert undue influence. These participants include candidates, political parties and third parties (Harper, at para. 87). Assessing whether spending limits may lead to a disequilibrium in that discourse is necessarily a comparative analysis. Given the competitive nature of elections, the capacities of different actors to participate fairly in the electoral process are interconnected and will be affected by how all actors are regulated (Figueroa, at para. 49). In principle, spending limits may level the playing field and ensure wealth cannot be mobilized to drown out other voices (Harper, at para. 72). However, limits that restrict rather than promote citizens' access to diverse information and views may violate their right to meaningfully participate in the political process (Harper, at para. 74).

[11] This Court's jurisprudence is clear that s. 3 does not require that all participants in the electoral system be treated equally. However, s. 3 will be infringed if spending limits allow any political actor or third party a disproportionate voice in the political discourse given their role in the electoral process, thus depriving voters of a broad range of views and perspectives on social and political issues.

[13] In my view, the spending limit infringes s. 3 of the Charter. The spending limit applies to issue-based political advertising during a full quarter of the standard life of a legislative assembly, during which citizens' s. 3 rights are engaged and the government is engaged in policy development and lawmaking. It has the clear potential to severely curtail voters' exposure to different views on the political issues that define their community in the year before the election period. During this period, the legislature will sit, as it must do under s. 5 of the Charter, debating policies and influencing the election agenda. Third parties are strictly limited in their ability to inform citizens while political parties face no restrictions in the first six months of the pre-writ year. This differential treatment creates a disproportionality in the political discourse. Further, this disproportionality in political discourse persists over the second six months: if third parties do provide their perspective during the first six months of the pre-writ year, they may be unable to contribute meaningful information closer to the election. As a result, on their face, the statutory provisions create an absolute disproportionality in the broader political discourse that deprives voters of a broad range of views and perspectives on issues during a critical period in the democratic cycle. This undermines the voter's right to an informed vote and to meaningful participation in the electoral process.

The dissent would have upheld the law on egalitarian grounds and viewed the spending limits as permitting meaningful participation:

[120] The right to meaningful participation is engaged by third party spending limits because third parties can be individual citizens or entities that act as a voice for multiple citizens during the electoral process. This Court has previously held that the s. 3 right to meaningful participation is engaged when legislation regulates political actors that serve as both a "vehicle and outlet" for individual citizens to participate in the electoral process (Figueroa, at para. 39). For example, in Figueroa, this Court confirmed that legislation that disadvantaged small political parties engaged the right to meaningful participation because political parties serve a participatory function for citizens in the electoral process (see paras. 39-46). Likewise, in Harper, this Court recognized that the right is engaged by the regulation of third parties because they are "important and influential participants in the electoral process" (para. 63).

[121] Both the expressive and informational components of the right to meaningful participation are engaged by third party spending limits. Third parties often use political advertisements to comment on the merits and faults of a particular candidate or party, bring new issues to the political discourse, and add new perspectives on issues associated with candidates and political parties (see Harper, at para. 55; see also Libman, at para. 49). Regulation of third party advertising may thus restrict citizens' opportunity to become informed of political issues, parties, and candidates.

[122] However, the right to meaningful participation under s. 3 does not guarantee a right to "unlimited participation" (Harper, at para. 72). When expression is unlimited, well-resourced third parties can dominate political discourse, drown out the voices of their opponents, and prevent other citizens from having the opportunity to speak and be heard (para. 72; Libman, at para. 47; Figueroa, at para. 49). Thus, the enactment of spending limits on third parties is not in itself a violation of s. 3.

[156] The respondents submit that the 12-month $600,000 spending limit does not provide a reasonable opportunity for third parties to communicate their views and for citizens to become informed of them. The appellant submits that this Court should accept the application judge's conclusion that, although there is no perfect quantum or length for third party political advertising spending limits, the limit under the EFA does not prevent third parties from sufficiently communicating information to citizens.

[157] In our view, in addition to the communications that do not count against the spending limit, third parties can engage in a range of political advertising activities within the spending limit. The application judge's findings of fact supported his conclusion that the EFA does not deny some citizens a reasonable opportunity to disseminate political information throughout the pre-writ period without surpassing the $600,000 limit.

[158] The application judge found that television advertisements, the most expensive advertising medium, are the main form of advertising affected by the spending limit. He recognized that the spending limit curtails a third party's ability to engage in television advertising, noting that according to Stephen Freeman, a communications expert, a "'minimally effective', two-week advertising campaign" across multiple platforms that included television would cost at least $1.2 million (paras. 44-46 and 78; see Affidavit of Stephen Freeman, at p. 1672).

[159] The application judge correctly noted, however, that the right to meaningful participation under s. 3 is not synonymous with the ability of third parties to engage in an "effective persuasive campaign" or "the ability to mount a media campaign capable of determining the outcome" (Harper, at para. 74). As was the case in Harper, the $600,000 pre-writ spending limit here appears on the evidence to be "high enough to allow third parties to engage in a significant amount of low cost forms of advertising" (para. 115). While television advertising may be among the more persuasive tools for influencing citizens, a s. 3 analysis must remain focused on whether citizens have a reasonable opportunity to express viewpoints and become informed of facts, ideas, and others' perspectives.

[160] The application judge found that the evidence suggested television advertising had an attenuated impact on voters' ability to understand their political options and make an informed choice among them. The application judge carefully examined the television advertisements introduced as evidence by the respondents and found that they had low informational content (paras. 82 and 85-86). He found that these advertisements do not amount to "policy discourse" nor do they "convey any detailed information" (paras. 83 and 87). He concluded that while this kind of polemical advertisement "certainly constitutes legitimate free speech", it does not meaningfully inform voters (para. 87). Analogizing such advertisements to political cartoons in a newspaper's editorial page, he said that eliminating them "would be a serious interference with freedom of expression, but it could not be said to deprive readers of information needed to inform themselves since all of the print information would remain intact" (ibid.).

[162] The extent to which the application judge found that the spending limit curtails television advertising does not, in our view, rise to the level of an infringement of s. 3. Putting aside the application judge's commentary on the informational value of the television advertisements in the record, the thrust of his findings indicate that citizens have not been deprived of a reasonable opportunity to speak or be heard due to the availability of other media platforms for citizens to exchange ideas and opinions. Therefore, neither the expressive nor the informational component of s. 3 were infringed by the inability to run television advertisements.

[163] The application judge found that numerous forms of low-cost political advertising methods remain available to third parties. This is in addition to the forms of political communication enumerated in s. 1(1) that are expressly exempted from the spending limit, such as editorials, columns, or books. After reviewing the evidence from advertising and communications experts, he found that today's multimedia environment allows for a variety of forms of advertising that are inexpensive enough to remain within the spending limit. He specifically noted that:

> Blogs, advertisements in print media, op-eds, press releases, interviews, radio spots, mass mailings (via e-mail or traditional post), tweets, Facebook posts and other social media disseminations, can all be engaged in without great expense and readily within the EFA's spending limits. It is not realistic to say that the statute works to "silence" any viewpoint or any electoral discourse in today's multi-media environment. These various media choices are all "highly effective" … in engaging with and informing the public of election issues. [para. 77]

[164] Several of the respondents' witnesses gave evidence that demonstrated how political advertising could be conducted and disseminated within the spending limit (see, e.g., Affidavit of Peter Macdonald, reproduced in Exhibit Book, vol. III, at pp. 945-46; Reply Affidavit of Patrick Dillon, at pp. 240-42). The application judge was only required to find that there was a reasonable opportunity for citizens to express their ideas and inform voters. On the evidence presented by the respondents, the application judge did not commit a reversible error in finding that the EFA does not prevent the "modest informational campaigns" that this Court held in Harper was a constitutionally-compliant degree of opportunity (para. 74).

[166] In sum, while the quantum and duration of the spending limit will have the effect of limiting the extent to which third parties can engage in television advertising, the evidence supports the finding that the limit does not deprive citizens of a reasonable opportunity to convey political information to other citizens through various forms of inexpensive and effective advertising within the spending limit.

[167] In light of this conclusion, we would further reject the respondents' position that the anti-coordination restrictions or the registration and reporting requirements contribute to a denial of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard. In our view, s. 37.10.1(3), which prevents third parties from circumventing the spending limit by acting in collusion, splitting themselves into multiple coordinated entities, or otherwise colluding or sharing information with political parties or each other, ensures that the most well-funded third parties and political parties cannot cover the field to the detriment of smaller participants. These restrictions do not curtail the right of meaningful participation, but rather give effect to it. Likewise, there is insufficient evidence to suggest that the interim reporting requirements for third parties under s. 37.10.2 burdens third parties to a degree that effectively denies them a reasonable opportunity to contribute to the political discourse.

The dissent also cast doubt on the majority's test of 'disproportionality.' The dissent viewed stricter spending limits on third parties than on political parties as necessary given that third parties are not seeking elected office:

[172] The respondents have failed to meet their burden. Again, this Court has noted that "[i]t is … important to limit independent spending more strictly than spending by candidates or political parties" (Libman, at para. 50). As the "primary political organizations" in the electoral process, the voices of political parties and candidates must have the opportunity to be heard clearly (Lortie Commission, at pp. 11-13, 209 and 228). Without stricter limits for third parties, "owing to their numbers, the impact of [independent] spending on one of the candidates or political parties to the detriment of the others could be disproportionate" (Libman, at para. 50). In other words, stricter limits for third parties may be necessary to ensure the citizens who wish to communicate their views via political parties and become informed of such views are not deprived of a reasonable opportunity to do so.

[173] The Court continued in Libman to explain that "[l]imits on independent spending are essential to maintain an equilibrium in the > financial resources available to candidates and political parties and thus ensure the fairness of elections" (para. 52). By extension, asymmetry in the length of time in which third parties and political parties are subject to spending restrictions may assist in promoting electoral fairness and "balance […] the promotion of the [electoral] options" (para. 54). An infringement of the right to meaningful participation is only made out if a citizen can demonstrate that the asymmetry at issue has deprived them of a reasonable opportunity to speak and be heard.

> [174] Although some third parties engage in political advertising more than six months prior to the issue of the writ, the application judge's factual findings confirm that most election-specific advertising is concentrated around the issue of the writ and during the election period (para. 53). For example, the application judge invoked expert evidence by Professor Andrea Lawlor to the effect that "although third parties do attempt to engage in election-oriented advertising more than six months prior to the dropping of the writ [period], election-related advertising by third parties is generally concentrated around the election period" (para. 49). In addition, the application judge accepted evidence from two of the respondents' expert witnesses, who confirmed that the bulk of their election-related activity is concentrated around the issue of the writ and during the election period (para. 51).

After Working Families, what room is left for egalitarian campaign finance law? Would a more narrowly tailored law or one that permitted more spending by third parties be consistent with its reasoning? See Michael Pal, "Is the Permanent Campaign the End of the Egalitarian Model of Elections?" in Richard Albert, Paul Daly, and Vanessa MacDonnell, eds, The Canadian Constitution in Transition (University of Toronto Press, 2019).

4 Elections in Indigenous Communities

One way that leadership is selected in Indigenous communities is through the election of a chief and councillors for First Nations' bands. As part of the assimilationist colonial project, Western-style elections were imposed on First Nations through the Indian Act in the nineteenth century. Some communities, however, continued their traditional ways of recognizing leaders through, for example, hereditary systems. Still others maintained hybrid systems, where both elected and hereditary leadership co-existed.

Currently, selection of leadership can occur:

- through processes proscribed by the Indian Act and Indian Band Election Regulations;
- the optional First Nations Elections Act and First Nations Elections Regulations;
- through processes codified in a self-government agreement;
- using the communally recognized traditional processes (still anachronistically called 'custom').

4.1 Band councils, custom election codes, and self-government

Less than one-quarter of First Nations—or approximately 140 communities—hold elections under the Indian Act framework and its associated regulations.

The First Nations Elections Act (FNEA) and associated regulations came into force in 2015 after consultation with, and in collaboration with, several First Nations organizations. Approximately 75 communities conduct their elections under the First Nations Elections Act framework, having voluntarily decided to remove themselves from the Indian Act's electoral system in order to be regulated by the FNEA. The FNEA does not alter the colonial elections model set out in the Indian Act, but merely provides an alternative electoral process. Like the Indian Act, elected chiefs and councils comprise governments under the FNEA. The FNEA does, however, reduce Ministerial control and regulate elections, neither of which the Indian Act does. For example, it provides for a longer term of office (4 instead of 2 years), common election days for groups of First Nations, advance polls, recounts and other procedural matters. Contested elections are not investigated by the Minister or subject to being set aside by Governor in Council; instead, election appeals are directed to superior provincial courts or federal courts which have the jurisdiction to set aside an election.

While elections under the Indian Act and the First Nations Elections Act may be democratic, they do not reflect or represent Indigenous self-government or sovereignty due to the continued oversight by the Minister of Indigenous Services. It is only through self-government and customary selection processes that Indigenous communities exercise a truly autonomous power to choose their leaders.

First Nations that hold elections under the Indian Act system can develop their own community election codes and request that the Minister of Indigenous Services remove them from the application of the Indian Act's electoral provisions. While these election codes are usually written, the nature of the rules and how they work varies according to the community.

One of the legacies of colonialism is disputed leadership selection in Indigenous communities. Judicial review of elections—under any of the four processes list above—occurs frequently in the courts, especially at Federal Court and Federal Court of Appeal. Earlier cases usually involved disputed elections under the Indian Act, but increasingly these cases involve Indigenous laws and legal orders. This trend, a result of Canada's multijuridicalism, raises foundational questions about the suitability of these cases for judicial review given the specialized legal knowledge that they require for resolution, the desire to have these issues resolved within the communities using their own laws, a diversity of procedures and decision-makers, and the need to recognize Indigenous modes of self-government and Indigenous legal orders.

4.1.1 Disputed elections and membership in Indigenous communities: tensions among the Charter and principles of democracy, self-government, and reconciliation

Three cases are examined below: one involving the Indian Act, one involving customary election laws, and one involving the intersection of the Charter and a community under a self-government agreement. Judicial review under the First Nations Elections Act will not be considered here. Each case raises different issues for the principles of democracy, self-government, and reconciliation as well as regarding the appropriateness of judicial review for these matters. Proper recognition of Indigenous principles and laws is crucial. For example, it is important to distinguish consensus-driven modes of decision-making in Indigenous communities from majority decision-making in non-Indigenous modes of governance.

It also is important to highlight that control over membership in a community and electoral rights are indicia of sovereignty. Many cases involving disputes over membership for the purposes of voting or running for office, as well as disputed election procedures and results, are the subject of judicial review in constitutional and administrative law. Because it only recognizes 'bands,' one major effect of the Indian Act has been its fragmentation of political leadership and the lesser status it accords to band governance as a form akin to a local government or municipality.

With the growing recognition of self-government, the hope is that these disputes will be resolved internally using Indigenous laws and procedures though this hope remains uncertain given the ruling in Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation in s. 4.1.1.4 below. Nevertheless, the principles of judicial review in both administrative and constitutional law (ie, the principle of deference) urge reviewing courts to respect the laws and choices made by First Nations communities and to limit judicial interference with Indigenous decision-making processes as much as possible.

4.1.1.1 Corbiere v Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203

In this foundational case, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the Indian Act's requirement that members must reside on the reserve in order to vote in band elections. The Court held that the distinction which denied off reserve members the ability to vote violated s. 15 of the Charter. As the case discusses, the residency requirement especially discriminated against Indigenous women living off the reserve due to the gendered impact of colonialism in Indigenous communities. Indigenous women who 'married out,' meaning marriage to someone outside their home community, were deprived of their Indigenous status and often residence on their home reserve. Indigenous women who had lost their status in this way, regained it under the 1985 amendments to the Indian Act, though complications remained for their children.

This case is important remedially for the application of the principle of equality to protect vulnerable persons and to re-empower off-reserve members. But it also represents both the problematic continuation of the Indian Act's imposed system of Western-style governance and resort to non-Indigenous laws and dispute resolution processes through judicial review.

> 14 L'Heureux-Dubé J. ultimately concludes that "Aboriginality-residence" as it pertains to whether an Aboriginal band member lives on or off the reserve is an analogous ground. We agree. L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s discussion makes clear that the distinction goes to a personal characteristic essential to a band member's personal identity, which is no less constructively immutable than religion or citizenship. Off-reserve Aboriginal band members can change their status to on-reserve band members only at great cost, if at all.
> 15 Two brief comments on this new analogous ground are warranted. First, reserve status should not be confused with residence. The ordinary "residence" decisions faced by the average Canadians should not be confused with the profound decisions Aboriginal band members make to live on or off their reserves, assuming choice is possible. The reality of their situation is unique and complex. Thus no new water is charted, in the sense of finding residence, in the generalized abstract, to be an analogous ground. Second, we note that the analogous ground of off-reserve status or Aboriginality-residence is limited to a subset of the Canadian population, while s. 15 is directed to everyone. In our view, this is no impediment to its inclusion as an analogous ground under s. 15. Its demographic limitation is no different, for example, from pregnancy, which is a distinct, but fundamentally interrelated form of discrimination from gender. "Embedded" analogous grounds may be necessary to permit meaningful consideration of intra-group discrimination.
> 16 Having concluded that the distinction made by the impugned law is made on an analogous ground, we come to the final step of the s. 15(1) analysis: whether the distinction at issue in this case in fact constitutes discrimination. In plain words, does the distinction undermine the presumption upon which the guarantee of equality is based — that each individual is deemed to be of equal worth regardless of the group to which he or she belongs?
> 17 Applying the applicable Law factors to this case — pre-existing disadvantage, correspondence and importance of the affected interest — we conclude that the answer to this question is yes. The impugned distinction perpetuates the historic disadvantage experienced by off-reserve band members by denying them the right to vote and participate in their band's governance. Off-reserve band members have important interests in band governance which the distinction denies. They are co-owners of the band's assets. The reserve, whether they live on or off it, is their and their children's land. The band council represents them as band members to the community at large, in negotiations with the government, and within Aboriginal organizations. Although there are some matters of purely local interest, which do not as directly affect the interests of off-reserve band members, the complete denial to off-reserve members of the right to vote and participate in band governance treats them as less worthy and entitled, not on the merits of their situation, but simply because they live off-reserve. The importance of the interest affected is underlined by the findings of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (1996), vol. 1, Looking Forward, Looking Back, at pp. 137-91. The Royal Commission writes in vol. 4, Perspectives and Realities, at p. 521:
> > Throughout the Commission's hearings, Aboriginal people stressed the fundamental importance of retaining and enhancing their cultural identity while living in urban areas. Aboriginal identity lies at the heart of Aboriginal peoples' existence; maintaining that identity is an essential and self-validating pursuit for Aboriginal people in cities.
> And at p. 525:
> > Cultural identity for urban Aboriginal people is also tied to a land base or ancestral territory. For many, the two concepts are inseparable. … Identification with an ancestral place is important to urban people because of the associated ritual, ceremony and traditions, as well as the people who remain there, the sense of belonging, the bond to an ancestral community, and the accessibility of family, community and elders.
> 18 Taking all this into account, it is clear that the s. 77(1) disenfranchisement is discriminatory. It denies off-reserve band members the right to participate fully in band governance on the arbitrary basis of a personal characteristic. It reaches the cultural identity of off-reserve Aboriginals in a stereotypical way. It presumes that Aboriginals living off-reserve are not interested in maintaining meaningful participation in the band or in preserving their cultural identity, and are therefore less deserving members of the band. The effect is clear, as is the message: off-reserve band members are not as deserving as those band members who live on reserves. This engages the dignity aspect of the s. 15 analysis and results in the denial of substantive equality.
> 19 The conclusion that discrimination exists at the third stage of the Law test does not depend on the composition of the off-reserve band members group, its relative homogeneity or the particular historical discrimination it may have suffered. It is the present situation of the group relative to that of the comparator group, on-reserve band members, that is relevant. All parties have accepted that the off-reserve group comprises persons who have chosen to live off-reserve freely, persons who have been forced to leave the reserve reluctantly because of economic and social considerations, persons who have at some point been expelled then restored to band membership through Bill C-31 (An Act to amend the Indian Act, S.C. 1985, c. 27), and descendants of these people. It is accepted that off-reserve band members are the object of discrimination and constitute an underprivileged group. It is also accepted that many off-reserve band members were expelled from the reserves because of policies and legal provisions which were changed by Bill C-31 and can be said to have suffered double discrimination. But Aboriginals living on reserves are subject to the same discrimination. Some were affected by Bill C-31. Some left the reserve and returned. The relevant social facts in this case are those that relate to off-reserve band members as opposed to on-reserve band members. Even if all band members living off-reserve had voluntarily chosen this way of life and were not subject to discrimination in the broader Canadian society, they would still have the same cause of action. They would still suffer a detriment by being denied full participation in the affairs of the bands to which they would continue to belong while the band councils are able to affect their interests, in particular by making decisions with respect to the surrender of lands, the allocation of land to band members, the raising of funds and making of expenditures for the benefit of all band members. The effect of the legislation is to force band members to choose between living on the reserve and exercising their political rights, or living off-reserve and renouncing the exercise of their political rights. The political rights in question are related to the race of the individuals affected, and to their cultural identity. As mentioned earlier, the differential treatment resulting from the legislation is discriminatory because it implies that off-reserve band members are lesser members of their bands or persons who have chosen to be assimilated by the mainstream society.

21 Having found that s. 77(1) is discriminatory, we must address the s. 1 argument of the appellants. The applicable test was recently described by Iacobucci J. in Egan v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 513, at para. 182. We are satisfied that the restriction on voting is rationally connected to the aim of the legislation, which is to give a voice in the affairs of the reserve only to the persons most directly affected by the decisions of the band council. It is admitted that although all band members are subject to some decisions of the band council, most decisions would only impact on members living on the reserve. The restriction of s. 15 rights is however not justified under the second branch of the s. 1 test; it has not been demonstrated that s. 77(1) of the Indian Act impairs the s. 15 rights minimally. Even if it is accepted that some distinction may be justified in order to protect legitimate interests of band members living on the reserve, it has not been demonstrated that a complete denial of the right of band members living off-reserve to participate in the affairs of the band through the democratic process of elections is necessary. Some parties and interveners have mentioned the possibility of a two-tiered council, of reserved seats for off-reserve members of the band, of double-majority votes on some issues. The appellants argue that there are important difficulties and costs involved in maintaining an electoral list of off-reserve band members and in setting up a system of governance balancing the rights of on-reserve and off-reserve band members. But they present no evidence of efforts deployed or schemes considered and costed, and no argument or authority in support of the conclusion that costs and administrative convenience could justify a complete denial of the constitutional right. Under these circumstances, we must conclude that the violation has not been shown to be demonstrably justified.

[The Majority considered the appropriate remedy in this case. The SCC rejected the Court of Appeal's remedy which was to grant a permanent constitutional exemption for the Batchewana Band instead of declaring s. 77(1) of the Indian Act to be unconstitutional. Instead, the Majority struck out the words "and is ordinarily resident on the reserve" in s. 77(1) of the Indian Act because they were found to be inconsistent with s. 15(1). This section of the Indian Act could not be saved under s. 1. The Court suspended the declaration for 18 months.]

The reasons of L'Heureux-Dubé, Gonthier, Iacobucci and Binnie JJ. were delivered by

L'Heureux-Dubé J.

25 L'Heureux-Dubé J. – Section 77(1) of the Indian Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-5, defines voter eligibility in bands whose election regime is governed by the Act's provisions. The section requires band members to be at least 18 years old, and "ordinarily resident on the reserve" to be entitled to vote. This appeal requires a determination of whether the residence requirement violates s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and, if so, whether the legislation is justified under s. 1 of the Charter. The appeal also requires the Court to consider whether the legislation violates s. 15 in relation only to the Batchewana Band, or whether the violation occurs generally, as well as the appropriate remedy, if any, for the violation.

I. Factual Background

26 The chiefs and councils of Indian Act bands, pursuant to the definition of "council of the band" in s. 2(1), are chosen following the band's custom, or, if an order in council has been made under s. 74(1), by the procedures set out in the Act, including s. 77(1). The trial judge found that the policy of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs Canada is that a band will not be deleted from the order in council placing it under the election procedures of the Indian Act unless the band council and the current "electors" so approve, either through a plebiscite or at a public meeting. Certain other conditions must also be met. The most recent order in council, the Indian Bands Council Elections Order, SOR/97-138, which came into effect on March 4, 1997, provides that 288 bands select their leadership in accordance with the Indian Act. This number represents just under half of the Indian Act bands in Canada.

27 The respondents are members of the Batchewana Indian Band, which has three reserves near the city of Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario: the Rankin, Goulais Bay, and Obadjiwan reserves. The Batchewana Band is included in the 1997 order in council, its councillors are not chosen in electoral sections, and voter eligibility for its elections is therefore governed by s. 77(1) of the Indian Act. The respondent John Corbiere resides on the Rankin Reserve, while the other three respondents are members of the Batchewana Band who do not live on any of the reserves. They take this action on their own behalf and on behalf of all non-resident members of the band. Of the 1,426 members of the band who were registered in 1991, 958 members, or 67.2 percent, lived off-reserve. The Batchewana Band's history, like that of many First Nations, involved the loss of most of its traditional land base. Prior to 1850, the Batchewana and other bands of the Ojibway occupied large areas of land along the eastern and northern shores of Lake Huron, the northern shore of Lake Superior, and various areas inland. In 1850, as part of the Robinson-Huron Treaty, this land was surrendered to the Crown and the Batchewana obtained a reserve of 246 square miles. In 1859, the band surrendered all of this reserve through the Pennefather treaty, leaving it only with Whitefish Island, a small island in the St. Marys River. Under this treaty, the band's members were promised that the band would be given land on the reserve of the Garden River Band near Sault Ste. Marie. This promise was never fulfilled. For 20 years, therefore, the band owned only approximately 15 acres of land.

28 After 1879, the band began to re-acquire land. In that year, the band council purchased what is now the Goulais Bay Reserve north of Sault Ste. Marie, and its size was increased by a donation from the Roman Catholic Church in 1885. When Whitefish Island was expropriated by three railway companies in 1900 and 1902, the Goulais Bay Reserve became the band's only land. Until the 1960s or early 1970s, therefore, most band members lived on the Garden River Reserve belonging to another band. In the 1940s, the band council, made up of and elected by non-residents, assembled land which became the Rankin Reserve in 1952. The main portion of this land is surrounded by the city of Sault Ste. Marie, and portions of it also border the St. Marys River and the Garden River Reserve. The third reserve, the Obadjiwan Reserve, which became part of the Batchewana Band's land base in 1962, is quite small and, like the Goulais Bay Reserve, is located in a rural area north of Sault Ste. Marie. The largest percentage of those who live on one of the band's reserves live on the Rankin Reserve.

29 Residence on the reserve was required, by law, for band members to be eligible to vote for band councils, beginning with The Indian Advancement Act, 1884, S.C. 1884, c. 28, s. 5. This requirement was also contained in The Indian Advancement Act, R.S.C. 1886, c. 44, s. 5(1), the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1906, c. 81, s. 172(b), and the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 98, s. 163(a). In addition, band members were required to be over 21 and male. To vote on the surrender or release of land, historically, the requirement was not as strict, requiring, for example, residence "on or near" the lands in question (An Act providing for the organisation of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, and for the management of Indian and Ordinance Lands, S.C. 1868, c. 42, s. 8(1)) and later, requiring voters on these questions to be resident "on or near" and "interested in" the reserve (Indian Act, R.S.C. 1927, c. 98, s. 51(2)). Voter eligibility provisions similar to the present ones, though they provided for a minimum age of 21 years, were introduced in The Indian Act, S.C. 1951, c. 29, ss. 2(1)(e) and 76(1). From the first election in 1902 until 1962, the residency requirement was not enforced in Batchewana Band elections. Since that time, only band members living on one of the three reserves have been allowed to vote.

30 The number of Batchewana Band members has risen dramatically since 1985, and at the same time the percentage of band members living on the reserves has dramatically fallen. In 1985, 71.1 percent of the 543 registered members of the band lived on-reserve. In 1991, only 32.8 percent of the 1,426 registered members lived on the reserves. The parties agree that this trend is continuing. This dramatic increase in the number of off-reserve members occurred largely because of the passage of An Act to amend the Indian Act, S.C. 1985, c. 27 ("Bill C-31"), by Parliament. This legislation restored Indian status to most of those who had lost this status because of the operation of certain sections of the Indian Act, as well as to the descendants of such people. Prior to this legislation, women with Indian status who married non-Indian men lost their status, and their children did not get status, though men who married non-Indian women, and their children, maintained Indian status. Registered Indians who voluntarily "enfranchised" also lost Indian status. For the Batchewana Band, approximately 85 percent of the growth in band membership consisted of people who were reinstated to Indian status and band membership because of Bill C-31. Similar trends may be seen in many other bands.

II. Relevant Constitutional, Statutory, and Regulatory Provisions

[L'Heureux-Dubé J set out the relevant constitutional provisions: sections 1, 15(1), 24, and 25 from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; and sections 35 and 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

L'Heureux-Dubé J then set out the relevant provisions from the Indian Act. These provisions demonstrate the extent of the Minister's discretionary power over Indigenous communities. L'Heureux-Dubé J also set out the provisions determining the jurisdiction of band councils to make by-laws. Only those provisions which relate to elections are excerpted here.]

Indian Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-5

2. (1) In this Act,

"band" means a body of Indians

(a) for whose use and benefit in common, lands, the legal title to which is vested in Her Majesty, have been set apart before, on or after September 4, 1951,

(b) for whose use and benefit in common, moneys are held by Her Majesty, or

(c) declared by the Governor in Council to be a band for the purposes of this Act;

"council of the band" means

(a) in the case of a band to which section 74 applies, the council established pursuant to that section,

(b) in the case of a band to which section 74 does not apply, the council chosen according to the custom of the band, or, where there is no council, the chief of the band chosen according to the custom of the band;

"elector" means a person who

(a) is registered on a Band List,

(b) is of the full age of eighteen years, and

(c) is not disqualified from voting at band elections;

74. (1) Whenever he deems it advisable for the good government of a band, the Minister may declare by order that after a day to be named therein the council of the band, consisting of a chief and councillors, shall be selected by elections to be held in accordance with this Act.

75. (1) No person other than an elector who resides in an electoral section may be nominated for the office of councillor to represent that section on the council of the band.

(2) No person may be a candidate for election as chief or councillor unless his nomination is moved and seconded by persons who are themselves eligible to be nominated.

77. (1) A member of a band who has attained the age of eighteen years and is ordinarily resident on the reserve is qualified to vote for a person nominated to be chief of the band and, where the reserve for voting purposes consists of one section, to vote for persons nominated as councillors.

(2) A member of a band who is of the full age of eighteen years and is ordinarily resident in a section that has been established for voting purposes is qualified to vote for a person nominated to be councillor to represent that section.

[Section III analysis of the lower court judgments has been omitted as has Section IV's statement of the issues. The first two subsections of the Section V analysis have also been omitted: whether the s. 15 analysis should focus only on the Batchewana Band and whether the Court should consider section 25 of the Charter and section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.]

C. Section 15(1) Analysis

[L'Heureux-Dubé J first set out the s15(1) framework from Law.]

(2) First Stage: Differential Treatment

57 The first stage of inquiry is easily satisfied in the present case. Section 77(1) of the Indian Act draws a distinction between band members who live on-reserve and those who live off-reserve, by excluding the latter from the definition of "elector" within the band. This constitutes differential treatment.

(3) Second Stage: Analogous Grounds

58 The differential treatment in this case is based on the status of holding membership in an Indian Act band, but living off that band's reserve. This combination of traits does not fall under one of the enumerated or already recognized analogous grounds. The fundamental consideration at the second stage, if the ground is not enumerated or already recognized as analogous, is whether recognition of the basis of differential treatment as an analogous ground would further the purposes of s. 15(1): Law, supra, at para. 93. These purposes are, as stated at para. 51 of Law:

[T]o prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social > prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration.

62 Here, several factors lead to the conclusion that recognizing off-reserve band member status as an analogous ground would accord with the purposes of s. 15(1). From the perspective of off-reserve band members, the choice of whether to live on- or off-reserve, if it is available to them, is an important one to their identity and personhood, and is therefore fundamental. It involves choosing whether to live with other members of the band to which they belong, or apart from them. It relates to a community and land that have particular social and cultural significance to many or most band members. Also critical is the fact that as discussed below during the third stage of analysis, band members living off-reserve have generally experienced disadvantage, stereotyping, and prejudice, and form part of a "discrete and insular minority" defined by race and place of residence. In addition, because of the lack of opportunities and housing on many reserves, and the fact that the Indian Act's rules formerly removed band membership from various categories of band members, residence off the reserve has often been forced upon them, or constitutes a choice made reluctantly or at high personal cost. For these reasons, the second stage of analysis has been satisfied, and "off-reserve band member status" is an analogous ground. It will hereafter be recognized as an analogous ground in any future case involving this combination of traits. I note that in making this determination, I make no findings about "residence" as an analogous ground in contexts other than as it affects band members who do not live on the reserve of the band to which they belong.

(4) Third Stage of Analysis

63 At the third stage, the appropriate focus is on how, in the context of the legislation and Canadian society, the particular differential treatment impacts upon the people affected by it. This requires examining whether the legislation conflicts with the purposes of s. 15(1): to recognize all individuals and groups as equally deserving, worthy, and valuable, to remedy stereotyping, disadvantage and prejudice, and to ensure that all are treated as equally important members of Canadian society. Determining whether legislation violates these purposes requires examining the legislation in the context in which it applies, with attention to the interests it affects, and the situation and history in Canadian society of those who are treated differentially by it. It must be examined how "a person legitimately feels when confronted with a particular law": Law, supra, at para. 53.

(a) Disadvantage, Vulnerability, Stereotyping, and Prejudice

70 Groups or individuals who are generally subject to unfair treatment in society because of their characteristics or circumstances are already demeaned in dignity, and further differential treatment of them is more likely to have a discriminatory impact, since it often perpetuates or increases that disadvantage: Law, supra, at para. 63. Pre-existing disadvantage, stereotyping, and vulnerability are important to the analysis in this case in three particular ways.

71 First, band members living off-reserve form part of a "discrete and insular minority", defined by both race and residence, which is vulnerable and has at times not been given equal consideration or respect by the government or by others in Canadian or Aboriginal society. Decision makers have not always considered the perspectives and needs of Aboriginal people living off reserves, particularly their Aboriginal identity and their desire for connection to their heritage and cultural roots. As noted by the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples,

> [b]efore the Commission began its work, however, little attention had been given to identifying and meeting the needs, interests and aspirations of urban Aboriginal people. Little thought had been given to improving their circumstances, even though their lives were often desperate, and relations between Aboriginal people and the remainder of the urban population were fragile, if not hostile.
> The information and policy vacuum can be traced at least in part to long-standing ideas in non-Aboriginal culture about where Aboriginal people 'belong'.
> (Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples (1996), vol. 4, Perspectives and Realities, at p. 519.)

Similarly, there exist general stereotypes in society relating to off-reserve band members. People have often been only seen as "truly Aboriginal" if they live on reserves. The Royal Commission wrote:

> MANY CANADIANS THINK of Aboriginal people as living on reserves or at least in rural areas. This perception is deeply rooted and persistently reinforced. …
> … There is a history in Canada of putting Aboriginal people 'in their place' on reserves and in rural communities. Aboriginal cultures and mores have been perceived as incompatible with the demands of industrialized urban society. This leads all too easily to the assumption that Aboriginal people living in urban areas must deny their culture and heritage in order to succeed -- that they must assimilate into this other world. The corollary is that once Aboriginal people migrate to urban areas, their identity as Aboriginal people becomes irrelevant.
> (Perspectives and Realities, supra, at p. 519.)

72 Second, off-reserve band members experience particular disadvantages compared to those living on-reserve because of their separation from the reserve. They are apart from communities to which many feel connection, and have experienced racism, culture shock, and difficulty maintaining their identity in particular and serious ways because of this fact. Third, it should be noted that the context is one in which, due to various factors, Aboriginal women, who can be said to be doubly disadvantaged on the basis of both sex and race, are among those particularly affected by legislation relating to off-reserve band members, because of their history and circumstances in Canadian and Aboriginal society.

(b) Relationship Between the Basis of the Differential Treatment and the Claimant's Characteristics or Circumstances

73 The second factor set out by Iacobucci J. examines the relationship between the basis on which the differential treatment occurs and the characteristics of the claimant and others, with the goal of recognizing the human dignity and right to full participation in society of all of them. Some distinctions may correspond to the needs, capacities, or circumstances of a group in a manner that does not affect their human dignity or that of others, viewed from a subjective-objective perspective (Law, supra, at paras. 69-71).

74 In the case at bar, considering this factor involves examining the legislative context surrounding the distinction at issue. The voting rights at issue affect other sections of the legislation; it must be determined how the functions of electors and powers of the band council chosen by them relate to the needs, circumstances, and human dignity of the band members included and excluded by the voting scheme. In my opinion, if the powers of electors or the chief and council they vote for affect issues that are purely local, and do not affect the interests of off-reserve band members, the differential treatment between band members contained in s. 77(1) cannot be considered to violate the right to substantive equality of the off-reserve members. Such differential treatment would relate to the different positions and needs of the two groups and could not be said, in my opinion, to stereotype off-reserve members or suggest they are less deserving, worthy, or important band members from the perspective of someone affected by them. However, if the powers of the electors and the band council affect the interests and needs of both groups, this will be an indicator that the differential treatment is more likely to be discriminatory.

75 The band council chosen by the electors has by-law making powers under s. 81(1), which include the regulation of traffic on the reserve, control over the observance of law and order, and other such powers. Strayer J., the trial judge, found that these powers are mostly of a local nature, related to the governance of the reserve itself, and he suggested that they primarily affect residents. I would agree, in general, with this characterization, and I would add to the list of provisions affecting primarily local functions the powers contained in s. 85.1. However, I would note that several paragraphs of s. 81(1) affect in a particular way all band members, irrespective of residence on the reserve. Section 81(1)(i) allows the band council to allot land on the reserve, where this authority has been given by the Governor in Council. Sections 81(1)(p) and 81(1)(*p.*1) allow by-laws relating to residence and trespass on the reserve, which may affect the ability of non-residents to use the facilities and land on the reserve, and return to live there. The ability to live on the reserve, or to participate in activities on reserve lands if they desire, has been shown to be important to non-residents, and these functions of the band council affect their circumstances and needs directly and in a fundamental way: see Perspectives and Realities, supra, at p. 49.

76 Section 83 gives the council power to make money by-laws, which include taxation of land on the reserve, licensing of businesses, appropriation of moneys to defray band expenses, and payment of remuneration to chiefs and councillors. These powers, in my opinion, are a mixture of functions that affect residents on the reserve only, and also all members of the band. While the taxation of land and businesses on the reserve and the licensing of businesses are primarily local functions, appropriation of money for various band purposes and the amounts to be paid to chiefs and councillors are matters in which all band members have an interest. In addition, under s. 83(1)(f), the band may make by-laws relating to "the raising of money from band members to support band projects" which may have the potential to affect all band members.

77 Although the band council's powers under ss. 81(1) and 83(1) are similar, in many ways, to those of a municipality, the exclusion of non-residents from voting rights affects other powers of the band council that relate to the needs of all members of the band, whether or not they are ordinarily resident on the reserve. Section 64(1) allows the expenditure by the Minister, with the band council's consent, of the band's capital moneys for various purposes, including distributions per capita to members of the band, and construction of new housing. The band's capital moneys come from the sale of surrendered lands or capital assets of the band (s. 62), assets that belong, collectively, to all members of the band. As found by Strayer J., all band members have important interests in these expenditures. Similarly, under s. 66(1), the Minister, with the approval of the band council, can make orders appropriating the band council's revenue moneys; the band council may be authorized to do so under s. 69. Expenditures by the band council may include matters like education, creation of new housing, creation of facilities on reserves, and other matters that may affect off-reserve band members' economic interest in its assets and the infrastructure that will be available to help them return to the reserve if they wish. Finally, s. 39(1)(b) requires the consent of a majority of "electors" of the band for the surrender of band lands. The definition of "elector" in s. 2(1) excludes band members who are disqualified from voting in band elections, so the wording of s. 77(1) excludes off-reserve members from voting on the question of whether the lands they own in common will be surrendered.

78 The wording of s. 77(1), therefore, gives off-reserve band members no voice in electing a band council that, among other functions, spends moneys derived from land owned by all members, and money provided to the band council by the government to be spent on all band members. The band council also determines who can live on the reserve and what new housing will be built. The legislation denies those in the position of the claimants a vote in decisions about whether the reserve land owned by all members of the band will be surrendered. In addition, members who live in the vicinity of the reserve, as shown by the evidence of several of the plaintiffs in this case, may take advantage of services controlled by the band council such as schools or recreational facilities. Moreover, as a practical matter, representation of Aboriginal peoples in processes such as land claims and self-government negotiations often takes place through the structure of Indian Act bands. The need for and interest in this representation is shared by all band members, whether they live on- or off-reserve. Therefore, although in some ways, voting for the band council and chief relates to functions affecting reserve members much more directly than others, in other ways it affects all band members. Since interests are affected that are unrelated to the basis upon which the differential treatment is made (off-reserve residence status), considering the principle of respect for human dignity and substantive equality, this is an important indicator that the differential treatment is discriminatory.

(c) Nature of the Affected Interest

79 The fourth contextual factor which was described by Iacobucci J. in Law, supra, at paras. 74-75, and which is of particular importance in this case, is the nature of the affected interest. In general, the more important and significant the interest affected, the more likely it will be that differential treatment affecting this interest will amount to a discriminatory distinction within the meaning of s. 15(1).

80 Several social and legislative facts are important to analysing this contextual factor. The first is the important financial interest that non-residents have in the affairs of the band. As I outlined in the previous section, the band council must give consent for expenditures of the band's capital and revenue moneys. The band's electors also control decisions about the surrender of band lands which are owned collectively by all band members. Second, the band council controls the allotment of land and by-laws relating to trespass and residence, which affect in important ways the ability to return and live on the reserve. Third, the council makes decisions about the availability of services that may be important to non-residents, particularly those who may live near the reserve. Also important is the role of band leadership in the work of the Assembly of First Nations and other Aboriginal organizations at the regional, national and international levels. All these factors show that the functions and powers of the band council have important significance for the lives of off-reserve band members. Denying them voting rights when band leadership is chosen through a system of democracy affects significant interests they have in band governance.

81 The importance many band members place on maintaining a connection to their cultural roots is also particularly significant. Maintaining one's cultural identity will mean different things to different off-reserve band members, but to many it will entail an identification of interests with their band. When band leadership is chosen through a democratic system, one of the most powerful expressions of identification with that band is through the exercise of voting. When certain band members are not given any say in that system, the denial of that voice affects their belonging and connection to the band of which they are members.

82 Moreover, the band council has the power to affect directly the cultural interests of those off-reserve band members who identify with their band and reserve. The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples stated that sources of traditional Aboriginal culture include "contact with the land, elders, Aboriginal languages and spiritual ceremonies" (Perspectives and Realities, supra, at p. 522). As outlined in the previous section, the band council has many powers affecting access to the reserve, management of the reserve lands, and the expenditure of money for the welfare of the band. Furthermore, the "electors" of the band can vote on the surrender of band lands. The band council therefore has considerable power to safeguard, develop and promote the sources of traditional Aboriginal culture and to affect the access of off-reserve band members to these sources.

83 Historical circumstances that have had and continue to have repercussions for the members of this group add to the reasons why the interest affected by this legislation is of important societal significance for those in the position of the claimants. Indeed, the creation of the group of off-reserve Aboriginal people can be seen as a consequence, in part, of historic policies toward Aboriginal peoples. The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples describes the relationship between the federal government and Aboriginal peoples during the period from the early 1800s to 1969 as one of "displacement and assimilation" (Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, vol. 1, Looking Forward, Looking Back, at pp. 137-91).

84 Maintaining a connection with the band of which they are members is of particular importance to those in the position of the claimants because they often live apart from reserves due to factors that are likely largely beyond their control. Lack of land, what are often scarce job opportunities on reserves, and the need to go far from the community for schooling, are among the reasons that members left the reserve in the past, and continue to leave. There are also particular issues affecting Aboriginal women's migration: Perspectives and Realities, supra, at pp. 573-76. The fact that those affected or their ancestors may well have had no choice but to leave the reserve signals that the interest in keeping a connection with the band of which they are members is particularly important to them because the separation from other members of the band and the reserve may well have been undesired or unchosen.

85 A considerable number of the band members who live off-reserve recently gained or regained this status under Bill C-31. This legislation modified sections of the Indian Act that denied Indian status to various categories of band members, though not all those who were restored to status became members of a band. It is, therefore, helpful to examine the history of the legislation that removed Indian status from them or from their ancestors. I must emphasize that this discussion is in no way related to the constitutionality of Bill C-31, in general or in the context of particular bands. Rather, I refer to it for the purpose of examining the context underlying the current legislative distinction and showing why the interest affected is an important one for band members.

86 Many of those affected are women, and the descendants of women, who lost their Indian status because they married men who did not have Indian status (see Indian and Northern Affairs Canada, Impacts of the 1985 Amendments to the Indian Act (Bill C-31): Summary Report (1990)). Aboriginal women who married outside their band became members of their husband's band. See, for example, The Indian Act, S.C. 1951, c. 29, ss. 12 and 14, now repealed. Legislation depriving Aboriginal women of Indian status has a long history. The involuntary loss of status by Aboriginal women and children began in Upper and Lower Canada with the passage of An Act to encourage the gradual Civilization of the Indian Tribes in the Province, and to amend the Laws respecting Indians, S. Prov. C. 1857, 20 Vict., c. 26. A woman whose husband "enfranchised" had her status removed along with his. This legislation introduced patriarchal concepts into many Aboriginal societies which did not exist before: see Public Inquiry into the Administration of Justice and Aboriginal People, Report of the Aboriginal Justice Inquiry of Manitoba (1991), vol. 1, The Justice System and Aboriginal People, at pp. 476-79. As the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples stated in Perspectives and Realities, supra, at p. 26:

> In the pre-Confederation period, concepts were introduced that were foreign to Aboriginal communities and that, wittingly or unwittingly, undermined Aboriginal cultural values. In many cases, the legislation displaced the natural, community-based and self-identification approach to determining membership – which included descent, marriage, residency, adoption and simple voluntary association with a particular group – and thus disrupted complex and interrelated social, economic and kinship structures. Patrilineal descent of the type embodied in the Gradual Civilization Act, for example, was the least common principle of descent in Aboriginal societies, but through these laws, it became predominant. From this perspective, the Gradual Civilization Act was an exercise in government control in deciding who was and was not an Indian.

This continued in the Gradual Enfranchisement Act, S.C. 1869, c. 6. This legislation, for the first time, instituted the policy that women who married men without Indian status lost their own status, and their children would not receive status. The rationale for these policies, given at the time, focussed on concerns about control over reserve lands, and the need to prevent non-Indian men from gaining access to them (Perspectives and Realities, supra, at p. 27). These policies were continued and expanded upon with the passage of the Indian Act in 1876, and amendments to it in subsequent years, particularly a major revision that took place in 1951.

87 The 1951 legislation was challenged under the Canadian Bill of Rights, S.C. 1960, c. 44 (reprinted in R.S.C., 1985, App. III), in Attorney General of Canada v. Lavell, 1973 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1974] SCR 1349. The majority of this Court, using an approach to equality that was later rejected in Andrews, supra, held that the provisions did not violate the right to equality in the Canadian Bill of Rights and that even if they did, they could not be struck down as inconsistent with it.

88 These were not the only people who lost their status. The enfranchisement provisions of the Indian Act were designed to encourage Aboriginal people to renounce their heritage and identity, and to force them to do so if they wished to take a full part in Canadian society. In order to vote or hold Canadian citizenship, status Indians had to "voluntarily" enfranchise. They were then given a portion of the former reserve land in fee simple, and they lost their Indian status. At various times in history, status Indians who received higher education, or became doctors, lawyers, or ministers were automatically enfranchised. Those who wanted to be soldiers in the military during the two World Wars were required to enfranchise themselves and their whole families, and those who left the country for more than five years without permission also lost Indian status. (See L. Gilbert, Entitlement to Indian Status and Membership Codes in Canada (1996), at pp. 23-30.)

89 This history shows that Aboriginal policy, in the past, often led to the denial of status and the severing of connections between band members and the band. It helps show why the interest in feeling and maintaining a sense of belonging to the band free from barriers imposed by Parliament is an important one for all band members, and especially for those who constitute a significant portion of the group affected, who have been directly affected by these policies and are now living away from reserves, in part, because of them.

90 All these facts emphasize the importance, for band members living off-reserve, of having their voices included when band leadership is chosen through a process of common suffrage as set out in this legislation. They show why the interest in s. 77(1) is a fundamental one, and why the denial of voting rights in this context has serious consequences from the perspective of those affected. They show why there is not only economic, but also important societal significance to the interests affected by the differential treatment contained in s. 77(1): Law, supra, at para. 74.

(d) Conclusions on the Third Stage of Analysis

91 In summary, therefore, a contextual view of the people affected and the differential treatment in question leads to the conclusion that this legislative distinction conflicts with the purposes of s. 15(1). The people affected by this distinction, in general, are vulnerable and disadvantaged. They experience stereotyping and disadvantage as Aboriginal people and band members living away from reserves. They form part of a "discrete and insular minority" defined by race and residence, and it is more likely that further disadvantage will have a discriminatory impact upon them. Second, the distinction in question does not correspond with the characteristics or circumstances of the claimants and on-reserve band members in a manner which "respects and values their dignity and difference": Law, supra, at para. 28. The powers of the band council affect cultural, political, and financial interests and needs that are shared by band members living on and off the reserve. Third, the nature of the interests affected is fundamental. Given the form of representative democracy provided for in the Indian Act, failure to give any voice in that process to certain members of the band affects an important attribute of membership, and places a barrier between them and a community which has particular importance to them. The council and electors also make decisions about important financial, cultural, and political interests of the members that have important significance within the band and Canadian society. Finally, the interest affected is also significant because of the ways in which, in the past, ties between band members and the band or reserve have been involuntarily or reluctantly severed. Those affected or their parents may have left the reserve for many reasons that do not signal a lack of interest in the reserve given the various historical circumstances surrounding reserve communities in Canada such as an often inadequate land base, a serious lack of economic opportunities and housing, and the operation of past Indian status and band membership rules imposed by Parliament.

92 In the context of this vulnerable group, and these important interests, this distinction reinforces the stereotype that band members who do not live on reserves are "less Aboriginal", and less valuable members of their bands than those who do. A reasonable person in the position of the claimants, fully apprised of the context, would see the differential treatment contained in s. 77(1) as suggesting that off-reserve band members are less worthy or valuable as band members and members of Canadian society, and giving them less concern, respect and consideration than band members living on reserves. Based upon this finding of discriminatory impact, the third stage of analysis, the identification of discrimination based on a violation of substantive equality and human dignity in the circumstances of this case, has been satisfied.

93 The factors discussed above outline the context surrounding the differential treatment contained in s. 77(1) of the Indian Act. This case involves people who have generally experienced significant historical disadvantage, and interests that are particularly important to those affected by the legislation. Taken together, they lead to a finding that from a subjective-objective perspective, the differential treatment in question violates off-reserve band members' equality rights. Yet neither of these factors should be seen as essential to my conclusions. I would also note that my discussion of the general history of off-reserve band members does not suggest that the conclusion that this legislation violates s. 15(1) would not apply to a band affected by s. 77(1) whose off-reserve members had a different composition or history from that of the general population of off-reserve band members in Canada. Every case of alleged discrimination, of course, must be considered in its own legislative and social context to determine whether it violates the constitutional rights of those affected, but in this case, both the general disadvantage and vulnerability of those affected, and the importance to all band members of the affected interests are compelling factors in my conclusions at the third stage of analysis.

94 The above analysis also does not suggest that any distinction between on-reserve and off-reserve band members would be stereotypical, interfere with off-reserve members' dignity, or conflict with the purposes of s. 15(1). There are clearly important differences between on-reserve and off-reserve band members, which Parliament could legitimately recognize. Taking into account, recognizing, and affirming differences between groups in a manner that respects and values their dignity and difference are not only legitimate, but necessary considerations in ensuring that substantive equality is present in Canadian society. The current powers of the band council, as discussed earlier, include some powers that are purely local, affecting matters such as taxation on the reserve, the regulation of traffic, etc. In addition, those living on the reserve have a special interest in many decisions made by the band council. For example, if the reserve is surrendered, they must leave their homes, and this affects them in a direct way it does not affect non-residents. Though non-residents may have an important interest in using them, educational or recreational services on the reserve are more likely to serve residents, particularly if the reserve is isolated or the non-residents live far from it. Many other examples can be imagined.

95 Recognizing non-residents' right to substantive equality in accordance with the principle of respect for human dignity, therefore, does not require that non-residents have identical voting rights to residents. Rather, what is necessary is a system that recognizes non-residents' important place in the band community. It is possible to think of many ways this might be done, while recognizing, respecting, and valuing the different positions, needs, and interests of on-reserve and off-reserve band members. One might be to divide the "local" functions which relate purely to residents from those that affect all band members and have different voting regimes for these functions. A requirement of a double majority, or a right of veto for each group might also respect the full participation and belonging of non-residents. There might be special seats on a band council for non-residents, which give them meaningful, but not identical, rights of participation. The solution may be found in the customary practices of Aboriginal bands. There may be a separate solution for each band. Many other possibilities can be imagined, which would respect non-residents' rights to meaningful and effective participation in the voting regime of the community, but would also recognize the somewhat different interests of residents and non-residents. However, without violating s. 15(1), the voting regime cannot, as it presently does, completely deny non-resident band members participation in the electoral system of representation. Nor can that participation be minimal, insignificant, or merely token.

96 Therefore, I conclude that the present wording of s. 77(1) violates the right to equality without discrimination of the off-reserve members of bands affected by it. This finding is a general one, and is in no way related to the specific situation of the Batchewana Band. Since the provision has been found to be discriminatory as it applies to all bands affected by it, there is no need to consider the specific circumstances of the Batchewana Band.

D. Section 1

[L'Heureux-Dubé J set out the section 1 analytic framework from Oakes. She found that the legislation had a valid purpose by restricting the vote to those living on the reserve because on-reserve residents had a more direct interest in the decisions of the band council and need to maintain voting control over the decisions that affect the future of the reserve. But, she also found that the complete exclusion of non-residents from the right to vote violated their equality rights. The legislation therefore did not minimally impair the affected rights and could not be justified under s. 1.]

E. Remedy

[L'Heureux-Dubé J considered the appropriate remedy. She rejected a constitutional exemption for the Batchewana Band on the basis that the legislation applies to all bands and that it would place a heavy burden on off-reserve band members from different bands to take legal action to vindicate their equality claim. She also rejected the remedy of 'reading in' voting rights for non-residents into the Indian Act because it would interfere too much with the legislative scheme and usurp Parliament's ability to choose amongst various possible options in order to meet constitutional obligations and tailor the remedy on a band-by-band basis.]

116 There are a number of ways this legislation may be changed so that it respects the equality rights of non-resident band members. Because the regime affects band members most directly, the best remedy is one that will encourage and allow Parliament to consult with and listen to the opinions of Aboriginal people affected by it. The link between public discussion and consultation and the principles of democracy was recently reiterated by this Court in Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 68: "a functioning democracy requires a continuous process of discussion". The principle of democracy underlies the Constitution and the Charter, and is one of the important factors guiding the exercise of a court's remedial discretion. It encourages remedies that allow the democratic process of consultation and dialogue to occur. In P. W. Hogg and A. A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures (Or Perhaps the Charter of Rights Isn't Such A Bad Thing After All)" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75, the authors characterize judicial review under the Charter as a "dialogue" between courts and legislatures. The remedies granted under the Charter should, in appropriate cases, encourage and facilitate the inclusion in that dialogue of groups particularly affected by legislation. In determining the appropriate remedy, a court should consider the effect of its order on the democratic process, understood in a broad way, and encourage that process. As Iacobucci J. observed in Vriend, supra, at para. 176:

> [T]he concept of democracy means more than majority rule as Dickson C.J. so ably reminded us in Oakes, supra. In my view, a democracy requires that legislators take into account the interests of majorities and minorities alike, all of whom will be affected by the decisions they make.

117 Constitutional remedies should encourage the government to take into account the interests, and views, of minorities. In this way, the principle of democracy that was recognized as an underlying principle of the Constitution in Reference re Secession of Quebec, supra, and was emphasized as an important remedial consideration in Schachter, supra, and Vriend, supra, will best be given expression.

118 The above principles suggest, in my view, that the appropriate remedy is a declaration that the words "and is ordinarily resident on the reserve" in s. 77(1) are invalid, and that the effect of this declaration of invalidity be suspended for 18 months. The suspension is longer than the period that would normally be allotted in order to give legislators the time necessary to carry out extensive consultations and respond to the needs of the different groups affected. It will also allow Parliament, if it wishes, to modify s. 77(2) at the same time, which contains the same residency requirement for bands whose councillors are elected in electoral sections, and which, given the values espoused in this decision, will also require revision to conform with s. 15(1). Severing the offending words from the rest of the statute will ensure that, should Parliament choose not to act, all non-residents will be included as voters under s. 77(1), but the nature of band governance and the requirements for voting will otherwise remain the same.

119 I recognize that suspending the effect of the declaration, combined with the extension of the suspension for such a long period is, in the words of the Chief Justice in Schachter, supra, at p. 716, "a serious matter from the point of view of the Charter. A delayed declaration allows a state of affairs which has been found to violate standards embodied in the Charter to persist for a time despite the violation". However, this best embodies the principles of respect for Charter rights and respect for democracy that should guide remedial considerations. Should Parliament decide to change the scheme, it will have an extended period of time in which to consult with those affected by the legislation and balance the affected interests in a manner that respects Aboriginal rights and all band members' equality interests. Should Parliament not change the scheme, off-reserve band members will gain voting rights within the existing scheme.

4.1.1.2 Kahkewistahaw First Nation v Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30, [2015] 2 SCR 548

The Election Code for Kahkewistahaw First Nation included a Grade 12 education requirement for candidates who wished to be Chief or a Band Councillor. Louis Taypotat, had previously served as Chief for a total of 27 years, having been elected under the Indian Act provisions. He was 76 years old at the time of the challenge and had a Grade 10 education. As a Chief and as a community member, he had also participated in the communal process of developing the Election Code, a process that took 13 years and which was open and public. In order to become valid, an election code requires ministerial authorization, part of which includes acknowledgement that the election code complies with the Charter. Once the code has been approved, candidates for Chief or Band Councillor have to demonstrate to the local Electoral Officer that they have met the stipulated requirements before they are permitted to run.

For the first election under the Kahkewistahaw Election Act, Taypotat submitted his documents to run for the position of Chief, but the Electoral Officer rejected his candidacy because he did not have a Grade 12 or equivalent level of education. As a result of the denial of the opportunity to stand as Chief, Taypotat sought judicial review of the certification process that was authorized by the Kahkewistahaw Election Act, despite his involvement in the creation of the code. He argued that the education requirement violated s.15(1) of the Charter because educational attainment is analogous to race and age.

At the Federal Court, de Montigny J dismissed his application because of a lack of evidence regarding the section 15 argument. Taypotat appealed—with 9 out of 10 arguments dismissed by the Federal Court of Appeal—and the Federal Court did not reject his argument that residential school survivors without a Grade 12 education constituted an analogous group for the purposes of s. 15. Instead, it based its decision on the grounds of age and residence on a reserve, which were not pleaded.

The Kahkewistahaw Election Act provided in article 5 that: "We believe and accept the fact that democracy is founded on the principle that everyone is equal and that no one is above the law". But, this articulation of the principle of equality embedded in the Act was not argued before the court. Instead, the Supreme Court focused on the s. 15(1) equality arguments made under the Charter. This case illustrates the difficulty of successfully establishing 'analogous grounds' under the Charter.

The judgment of the court was delivered by [15] While facially neutral qualifications like education requirements may well be a proxy for, or mask, a discriminatory impact, this case falls not on the existence of the requirement, but on the absence of any evidence linking the requirement to a disparate impact on members of an enumerated or analogous group.

Analysis

[Abella J set out the approach to section 15.]

[22] The question in this case is which "enumerated or analogous group" faces discrimination, and whether Mr. Taypotat has established that the education requirement set out in the Kahkewistahaw Election Act has a disproportionate effect on the members of any such group.

[23] There is no question that education requirements for employment could, in certain circumstances, be shown to have a discriminatory impact in violation of s. 15. In Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971), for example, the United States Supreme Court concluded that it was a violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 for an employer to require that employees have a high school diploma to work as, among other things, a coal handler or in maintenance at a power plant. The effect of this facially neutral requirement was to disproportionately exclude African Americans from positions in the plant. The court concluded that:

> … practices, procedures, or tests neutral on their face, and even neutral in terms of intent, cannot be maintained if they operate to "freeze" the status quo of prior discriminatory employment practices. [p. 430]

As the court observed, employment requirements that are unrelated to measuring job capability can operate as "built-in headwinds" for minority groups, and will therefore be discriminatory: p. 432. See also British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v. BCGSEU, 1999 CanLII 652 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 3.

[24] In this case, however, there is virtually no evidence about the relationship between age, residency on a reserve, and education levels in the Kahkewistahaw First Nation to demonstrate the operation of such a "headwind". Nor is there any evidence about the effect of the education provisions on older community members, on community members who live on a reserve, or on individuals who belong to both of these groups.

[25] That may well be because the bases on which the Federal Court of Appeal decided the s. 15 issue — age and residence on a reserve — were not pleaded by Louis Taypotat either in his judicial review application or as a ground of appeal from the Federal Court to the Federal Court of Appeal. The Federal Court of Appeal instead appears to have raised the issues on its own initiative.

[26] In R. v. Mian, 2014 SCC 54 (CanLII), [2014] 2 SCR 689, at para. 41, this Court clarified that an appellate court may only raise new issues on its own initiative when failing to do so would risk an injustice. The court must also be satisfied that there is a "sufficient basis in the record on which to resolve the issue": para. 51. The Federal Court of Appeal's decision to raise the issue of residence on a reserve on its own initiative is particularly troubling because "residence on a reserve" has not been recognized as an analogous ground for the purposes of s. 15. Corbiere recognized off-reserve residence as an analogous ground, but declined to address whether residence on a reserve would similarly trigger the protection of s. 15: paras. 6 and 62. The Court's recognition of off-reserve residence as an analogous ground in Corbiere relied in part on the argument that First Nations people living off-reserve have experienced unique disadvantages relative to community members living on a reserve and that, for many, the decision to live off-reserve was either forced or heavily constrained. With respect, I would be reluctant to impose a simple mirror inference without argument or evidence from the parties.

[27] In this case, there was no factual record to support deciding the appeal as a violation of the s. 15 rights of community members who live on a reserve. Most significantly, the record is silent about the education levels of members of the Kahkewistahaw First Nation who live on a reserve. The only evidence on the record dealing with education and residence on a reserve covers First Nations persons between 20 and 24 in Saskatchewan as a whole. The data does not address education levels among other age groups: John Richards, Closing the Aboriginal/non-Aboriginal Education Gaps (2008) (online) (the "C.D. Howe Report"), at p. 4.

[28] Finally, even if it had been properly raised and argued by the parties, I have serious doubts about the merits of the argument that the education requirements in the Kahkewistahaw Election Act have the effect of imposing arbitrary disadvantage on community members based on their residence on the reserve. The Kahkewistahaw Election Act specifically requires that the Chief and three of the four Councillors must reside on the reserve during their term: ss. 9.04 and 9.05. Far from having the effect of excluding community members who live on the reserve, the Kahkewistahaw Election Act is specifically designed to foster their participation in community governance. As a result, in the context of the Kahkewistahaw Election Act as a whole, it is difficult to conclude that it has the effect of perpetuating arbitrary disadvantage against these community members.

[29] Accordingly, in my view the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that the education provisions in the Kahkewistahaw Election Act represent a prima facie violation of the s. 15 rights of community members who live on the reserve.

[30] Turning to the conclusion reached by the Federal Court of Appeal that the education requirements discriminate against older members of the community, we confront similar evidentiary vacuums. The Federal Court of Appeal relied on two pieces of statistical evidence in support of this conclusion. The first was data from the 2006 census, about which the Federal Court of Appeal took judicial notice. That data showed that

[31] Census data can certainly be a useful evidentiary tool to demonstrate that a law has a disadvantaging impact. But this case is about a particular Election Code in a particular First Nations community. I find it difficult to draw even a weak inference about the correlation between age and education among the almost 2000 members of the Kahkewistahaw First Nation from census data about the Canadian population generally. As a result, in my respectful view, the Court of Appeal erred in taking judicial notice of this data as a key to its conclusion that the Kahkewistahaw First Nation's Election Code would have a disadvantaging effect on older community members.

[32] The second statistical basis for the Federal Court of Appeal's finding was aggregate educational data in the C.D. Howe Report dealing with all aboriginal people in Canada: pp. 4-5. The Federal Court of Appeal used this data to conclude that the provision would have a disproportionate impact on older community members in the Kahkewistahaw First Nation. But the data relates to all Aboriginal people in Canada, including the Métis, the Inuit, and First Nations. It is less helpful in shedding light on the relationship between age and education in the specific context of the members of the Kahkewistahaw First Nation. It captures a vastly larger, more diverse population than the community affected by the Code in this case and does not meaningfully illuminate whether and to what extent the Grade 12 education requirement functions to disadvantage older community members of the Kahkewistahaw First Nation.

[33] Finally, in his submissions before this Court, Mr. Taypotat reframed the Federal Court of Appeal's conclusion slightly, asserting that the education provisions discriminate against older community members who live on a reserve, rather than, as the Court of Appeal found, against both older community members and those who live on the reserve. On this issue, too, the record is silent and we are left only with Mr. Taypotat's bare assertion. This is not to say that statistical evidence is invariably required to establish that a facially neutral law infringes s. 15. In some cases, the disparate impact on an enumerated or analogous group will be apparent and immediate. The evidence in this case, however, does not point to any such link between the education requirement and a disparate impact on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground.

[34] I think intuition may well lead us to the conclusion that the provision has some disparate impact, but before we put the Kahkewistahaw First Nation to the burden of justifying a breach of s. 15 in its Kahkewistahaw Election Act, there must be enough evidence to show a prima facie breach. While the evidentiary burden need not be onerous, the evidence must amount to more than a web of instinct. The evidence before us, even in combination, does not rise to the level of demonstrating any relationship between age, residence on a reserve, and education among members of the Kahkewistahaw First Nation, let alone that arbitrary disadvantage results from the impugned provisions.

[35] I would therefore allow the appeal with costs and restore the decision of de Montigny J.

4.1.1.3 Dickson v Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10 (CanLII) (Dickson)

Of the three cases in this section, Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation exercises the fullest form of self-determination because it has a self-government agreement. Despite this self-government agreement, a majority of the justices at the Supreme Court of Canada held that the Charter applied. Rowe J, in dissent, concluded that the Charter was only meant to apply to federal and provincial governments, not Indigenous. The core issue was how to read section 25 of the Charter, especially in the context of self-government: should section 25 shield self-governing Indigenous communities unless they have voluntarily committed to the application of the Charter? In other words, if self-government is an Aboriginal right, then the Charter should not infringe that right by limiting Indigenous governments. Alternatively, and looking to the interaction of the Charter with both administrative and the common law, are self-governing Indigenous communities immune from the reach of Charter values? As it currently stands, section 25 provides circumscribed immunity from the Charter.

Kasirer and Jamal JJ. —

I. Overview

[1] As a self-governing Indigenous community in the Yukon, the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation (or the VGFN) has its own Constitution that provides for certain rights and freedoms for its citizens, rules for the organization of its government, as well as electoral rules and standards. At the heart of this appeal is a requirement in the VGFN Constitution that the elected Chief and Councillors reside on the settlement land of the First Nation, or relocate there within 14 days of the election. The VGFN's seat of government is based in Old Crow, a village located about 800 kilometres north of Whitehorse in the traditional territory of the Vuntut Gwitchin and constituting the VGFN's main community in its settlement land.

[2] Cindy Dickson, a citizen of the VGFN and of Canada, lives in Whitehorse and is constrained, for personal reasons, to stay there. She wishes to stand for election as a VGFN Councillor and says the residency requirement discriminates against her as a non-resident of the settlement land. She brought a petition in the Supreme Court of Yukon arguing that the requirement violates both her right to equality guaranteed under s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and her right to equality guaranteed by Article IV of the VGFN Constitution (in this Court, Ms. Dickson did not pursue her original challenge based on the equality guarantee in the VGFN Constitution).

[3] Here the debate has focused on the application of the Charter to the VGFN, the ambit of Ms. Dickson's equality right under s. 15(1), and the proper interpretation of s. 25 of the Charter. The VGFN says the Charter does not apply to it as a self-governing First Nation. Alternatively, should the Charter apply, the residency requirement does not violate Ms. Dickson's right to equality and, even if it did, the requirement is nevertheless valid as it is "shielded" by s. 25 of the Charter. Specifically, the VGFN submits that the residency requirement protects collective minority rights relating to its traditional Indigenous modes of government and leadership. As a collective Indigenous right, the provision of the VGFN Constitution cannot be abrogated or derogated from by Ms. Dickson's individual Charter right.

[4] This appeal raises two novel issues bearing on the application of the Charter to a self-governing Indigenous community. First, it invites the Court to consider whether, pursuant to s. 32(1) of the Charter, the VGFN is a government by nature or whether it is exercising a governmental activity so that Ms. Dickson's individual Charter right would apply to its residency requirement. Second, if the Charter does apply to the VGFN, the Court must determine whether s. 25 can be invoked by the VGFN to shield the residency requirement from Ms. Dickson's Charter challenge. Both the Supreme Court of Yukon and the Court of Appeal held that the Charter applied and that if Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) equality right was infringed, the residency requirement was shielded by s 25. Ms. Dickson appealed on the question of the constitutional validity of the residency requirement, and the VGFN cross-appealed on the question of the application of the Charter.

[5] We would dismiss Ms. Dickson's appeal. The Charter applies to the VGFN and to its citizens like Ms. Dickson, principally, but not only, because the VGFN is a government by nature. The circumstances here show that for Indigenous communities, s. 32(1) and s. 25 are intimately connected. It is true that the application of individual Charter rights to a self-governing Indigenous community may be thought to inhibit the pursuit of rules designed to protect minority Indigenous rights and interests. But s. 25, by providing protection for collective Indigenous interests as a social and constitutional good for all Canadians, acts as a counterweight. Properly understood, s. 25 allows for the assertion of individual Charter rights except where they conflict with Aboriginal rights, treaty rights, or "other rights or freedoms" that are shown to protect Indigenous difference.

[6] While Ms. Dickson has succeeded in showing a prima facie infringement of her right to equality under s. 15(1) of the Charter, as a non-resident seeking election to the VGFN government, the VGFN has satisfied us that s. 25 protects its residency requirement from abrogation or derogation by her Charter right. Tied to ancient practices of government that connect leadership of the VGFN community to the settlement land, the residency requirement protects Indigenous difference and, pursuant to s. 25, cannot be abrogated or derogated from by Ms. Dickson's individual Charter right with which it is in irreconcilable conflict.

II. Background

A. The Parties

[7] The appellant, Cindy Dickson, is a Canadian citizen and a citizen of the respondent, the VGFN, whose traditional territory is in northern Yukon. The VGFN's seat of government is in the village of Old Crow, which is located in the VGFN's settlement land. Ms. Dickson currently lives in Whitehorse, the capital of the Yukon, about 800 kilometres south of Old Crow.

[8] Old Crow is the northernmost community in the Yukon and the most northwest in Canada. Because there are no all-season roads to Old Crow, the community is regularly accessible only by plane: it is a "fly in, fly out" community. About 260 VGFN citizens live in Old Crow; about 301 VGFN citizens live elsewhere, primarily in Whitehorse but also in other parts of Canada. The Vuntut Gwitchin were traditionally a nomadic people.

[9] During her lifetime, Ms. Dickson has lived in both Whitehorse and Old Crow, in other Yukon communities, and in Victoria, British Columbia. She was born in Whitehorse, lived in Old Crow from the age of 9 to 16, and then moved back to Whitehorse to finish high school because Old Crow did not have a full high school program. She visited during the summers and still owns a cabin there. She also has family and friends in Old Crow.

B. Ms. Dickson's Constitutional Challenge

[10] Ms. Dickson wishes to stand for election as a VGFN Councillor — a paid full-time position. In her petition before the Supreme Court of Yukon, she asserted that her right to equality under s. 15(1) of the Charter, or in the alternative, under the equality guarantee in Article IV of the VGFN Constitution, is unjustifiably infringed by a provision of the VGFN Constitution requiring the elected Chief and Councillors to reside on the VGFN's settlement land at the time of their election or to relocate there within 14 days after their election. She says she cannot move to Old Crow largely because her son requires access to medical care unavailable there, but also because her job and her son's father are in Whitehorse.

[11] The VGFN says the residency requirement reflects the VGFN's longstanding practice that its Chief and Councillors live on its traditional territory. As the trial judge found, the Vuntut Gwitchin have governed themselves according to their traditional practices since well before Confederation. From time immemorial, all VGFN Chiefs and Councillors have lived on the VGFN's traditional territory. In the last 30 years, they have always lived in Old Crow. Under funding arrangements with the federal and Yukon governments, most programs and services administered by the VGFN government are for VGFN citizens living on the VGFN's settlement land.

C. Legal Framework for VGFN Self-Government and the Residency Requirement

[12] Ms. Dickson's challenge to the residency requirement arises in the context of the legal framework established by the modern land claim treaty process and self-government agreements among the VGFN and the federal and Yukon governments. That framework involves an "umbrella agreement" negotiated with all 14 of the Yukon First Nations, as well as specific modern treaties and self-government agreements with 11 individual First Nations, including the VGFN, which have been approved and given effect by federal and territorial legislation.

[13] Ms. Dickson's challenge also arises in the context of the legal framework of self-government cultivated by the Vuntut Gwitchin since time immemorial. Many aspects of that framework are reflected in the VGFN Constitution. The residency requirement is said to be grounded in the culture, law, and values of the Vuntut Gwitchin, and to be an expression of their longstanding land-based governance system.

(1) The Umbrella Agreement

[14] In 1993, after 20 years of negotiation, representatives of all Yukon First Nations and the federal and Yukon governments concluded an "umbrella agreement" to establish a framework for modern comprehensive land claims agreements in the Yukon. The umbrella agreement contemplated specific agreements between the federal government, the Yukon government, and individual First Nations that would be constitutionally protected as treaties under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[15] The umbrella agreement has been described as a "monumental achievement" (Beckman v. Little Salmon/Carmacks First Nation, 2010 SCC 53, [2010] 3 SCR 103, at para. 2). It established a framework for Indigenous self-government and the management of land and resources by Yukon First Nations. Under treaties concluded after "lengthy negotiations between well-resourced and sophisticated parties", the Yukon First Nations "surrendered their Aboriginal rights in almost 484,000 square kilometres, roughly the size of Spain, in exchange for defined treaty rights in respect of land tenure and a quantum of settlement land (41,595 square kilometres), access to Crown lands, fish and wildlife harvesting, heritage resources, financial compensation, and participation in the management of public resources" (para. 9).

[16] The umbrella agreement has also been called a "model for reconciliation" (First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun v. Yukon, 2017 SCC 58, [2017] 2 SCR 576, at para. 10). The 11 specific treaties negotiated under this agreement promote reconciliation "not only by addressing grievances over the land claims but by creating the legal basis to foster a positive long-term relationship" between Indigenous and non-Indigenous communities and by placing that relationship "in the mainstream legal system with its advantages of continuity, transparency, and predictability" (Beckman, at paras. 10 and 12). The Yukon treaties are modern treaties with a "sui generis nature" that "set out in precise terms a co-operative governance relationship" (First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun, at para. 33).

(2) The VGFN Final Agreement

[17] In 1993, the VGFN and the federal and Yukon governments concluded the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Final Agreement, a land claim agreement under the framework of the umbrella agreement. The Final Agreement provides for the negotiation of a self-government agreement addressing a host of the VGFN's self-government powers "in conformity with the Constitution of Canada" (s. 24.1.2). It also states that any self-government agreement "shall not affect" the rights of VGFN persons "as Canadian citizens" and, unless otherwise provided under a self-government agreement or legislation enacted thereunder, "their entitlement to all of the services, benefits and protections of other citizens applicable from time to time" (s. 24.1.3). Among other things, the Final Agreement provides that, in order to be tax exempt under s. 149(1) of the Income Tax Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 1 (5th Supp.), the VGFN would be conferred the status of a "municipality or public body performing the functions of government or a municipal corporation" (s. 24.8.1). Absent agreement to the contrary, the VGFN is restricted "to the provision of government or other public services", and is not permitted to engage in commercial activities (s. 24.8.2).

[18] Like the other Yukon First Nations land claim agreements, the VGFN's Final Agreement has been approved and given effect by federal and territorial legislation. It has also been given the status of a treaty under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (see Yukon First Nations Land Claims Settlement Act, S.C. 1994, c. 34, s. 6(1); An Act Approving Yukon Land Claim Final Agreements, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 240, s. 2). The federal legislation provides that the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, no longer applies to the VGFN settlement land, but otherwise federal and territorial laws generally continue to apply to the VGFN and its settlement land (Yukon First Nations Land Claims Settlement Act, ss. 12 and 13).

(3) The VGFN Self-Government Agreement, the Self-Government Legislation, and the VGFN Constitution

(a) The VGFN's Self-Government Agreement

[19] As contemplated by the Final Agreement, the VGFN and the federal and Yukon governments concluded the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Self-Government Agreement (1993), which states that the VGFN "shall have" self-government powers, including, among other things, the power to adopt a VGFN Constitution (s. 10.0), legislative powers (s. 13.0), and taxation powers (s. 14.0).

[20] As required by the Final Agreement, the Self-Government Agreement "shall not affect the rights of [VGFN] Citizens as Canadian citizens", and, unless otherwise provided pursuant to the Self-Government Agreement or a law enacted by the VGFN, "the entitlement of [VGFN] Citizens to all of the benefits, services, and protections of other Canadian citizens applicable from time to time" (s. 3.6).

[21] The Self-Government Agreement, unlike the Final Agreement, does not have the status of a treaty under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (Final Agreement, at s. 24.12.1). Even so, this does not preclude the VGFN from later acquiring constitutional protection for self-government under future constitutional amendments, if agreed to by the VGFN and the federal government (Final Agreement, at s. 24.12.2).

[22] The VGFN says that the Final Agreement and the Self-Government Agreement are silent regarding the application of the Charter, and that during the negotiations it opposed provisions that would have applied the Charter to VGFN self-government. The VGFN's position is that the "VGFN did not agree the Charter would apply. Instead, [it] enacted [its] own Constitution, which provides protection for individual rights of VGFN Citizens within contemporary VGFN self-governance" (R.F., at para. 3).

(b) The Self-Government Legislation

[23] The VGFN's Self-Government Agreement has been approved and given effect by federal and territorial legislation (Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, S.C. 1994, c. 35; First Nations (Yukon) Self-government Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 90). The Yukon legislation approves the various self-government agreements and gives them "the force of law" (s. 2). The federal legislation regulates the exercise of self-government powers by Yukon First Nations in greater detail:

- Yukon First Nation self-government agreements are to be "in accordance with the Constitution of Canada" (preamble).

- Each of the Yukon First Nations is "a legal entity having the capacity, rights, powers and privileges of a natural person" (s. 7). Further, each Yukon First Nation "succeeds to the rights, titles, interests, obligations, assets and liabilities of its predecessor band [which was constituted as a band under the Indian Act] and that band ceases to exist" (ss. 2, 6(1) and Sch. I).
- The constitution of a Yukon First Nation "shall", among other matters, "in a manner consistent with its self-government agreement, provide for … the governing bodies of the first nation and their composition, membership, powers, duties and procedures" and "the recognition and protection of the rights and freedoms of citizens" (s. 8(1)(b) and (d)).
- Federal and territorial laws apply to Yukon First Nations (s. 16), except for the Indian Act, which no longer applies to Yukon First Nations, other than to register First Nation citizens as "Indians" (s. 17(1)).
- The federal legislation prescribes rules and procedures for a Yukon First Nation's exercise of lawmaking authority. Yukon First Nations must maintain a register of laws and adopt procedures for the registration of laws, and the federal legislation stipulates rules for the commencement and proof of laws (s. 10). The federal legislation also lists the specific legislative powers that Yukon First Nations may exercise (s. 11 and Sch. III).
- Each Yukon First Nation is deemed to be "a public body performing a function of government in Canada" in order to be tax exempt under s. 149(1)(c) of the Income Tax Act (s. 18(1)).
- For greater certainty, the Yukon First Nation settlement lands are stated to "remain lands reserved for the Indians within the meaning of class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867" (s. 22(4)).

(c) The VGFN Constitution

[24] In accordance with the federal legislation, the VGFN Constitution details how the VGFN is governed, and it is stated to be the supreme law of the VGFN, subject only to the VGFN's Self-Government Agreement (Article II(3)). The VGFN Constitution states that "[t]he seat of government for the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation shall be located within Settlement Land" (Article II(2)). As noted above, the Self-Government Agreement decrees that it "shall not affect the rights of [VGFN] Citizens as Canadian citizens" (s. 3.6.1).

[25] The rights and freedoms set out in the VGFN Constitution are themselves "subject only to such reasonable limits as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic Vuntut Gwitchin society" (Article IV(1)). The VGFN Constitution guarantees certain rights of VGFN citizens (Article IV), including the right of individuals to be equal before and under the laws of the VGFN and the right to the equal protection and benefit of VGFN law without discrimination (Article IV(7)). The Constitution states that every VGFN citizen "has the right to make political choices, to participate in political activities, and to express a view on any public issue" (Article IV(3)). The Constitution also outlines the organization of the VGFN government (Article V), and establishes an elected Council to govern the VGFN consisting of one Chief and four Councillors (Article VIII).

[26] Under the VGFN Constitution, a VGFN citizen who seeks to run for the position of Chief or Councillor must be 18 years or older and have no indictable offence convictions for five years before the election (Article XI(1)). Candidates for office must also meet the residency requirement — they must reside on the VGFN's settlement land or relocate there "within 14 days after election day" (Article XI(2)). This is the provision challenged by Ms. Dickson.

[27] The validity of a VGFN law (including the VGFN Constitution) may be challenged in the Yukon Supreme Court until the VGFN establishes its own court (Article II(5)). To date, no VGFN court has been established.

Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Constitution

ARTICLE II — VUNTUT GWITCHIN FIRST NATION AUTHORITY/LOCATION

2. The seat of government for the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation shall be located within Settlement Land as advised by the General Assembly.

3. This Constitution is the supreme law of the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, subject only to the:

(a) Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Self-Government Agreement; and

(b) rights and freedoms set out in this Constitution.

ARTICLE XI — TERMS OF OFFICE AND QUALIFICATIONS

1. Any person desiring to run for Chief or Councillor must meet the following qualifications:

(a) Be 18 years or older;

(b) Be ordinarily resident in Canada;

(c) No indictable offence convictions for 5 years preceding the election; and

(d) Be a [VGFN] Citizen.

2. If an eligible candidate for Chief or Councillor does not reside on Settlement Land during the election and wins their desired seat they must relocate to Settlement Land within 14 days after election day.

V. Issues

[39] This appeal raises two issues. The first issue is whether the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement. If the Charter applies, the second issue is whether the residency requirement unjustifiably infringes s. 15(1) of the Charter by barring Ms. Dickson from serving on the VGFN Council unless she moves from Whitehorse to Old Crow within 14 days of her election to the VGFN Council. The second issue requires the Court to consider the framework for analyzing whether Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) Charter right, properly construed, abrogates or derogates from an Aboriginal, treaty, or other right or freedom pertaining to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada under s. 25 of the Charter, as well as the consequences that follow if it does, and those that follow if it does not.

VI. Analysis

A. Does the Charter Apply to the VGFN's Residency Requirement?

(2) Indigenous Self-Government and the Charter

[46] Before considering whether the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement, it is useful to review the historical and policy context for Indigenous self-government in Canada, including under the Charlottetown Accord of 1992, the federal government's "Inherent Right Policy" since 1995, and the final Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples published in 1996. It is also useful to review how courts have consistently applied the Charter to Indigenous governments.

[47] As a preliminary matter, we note that although this Court has yet to recognize an inherent right to Indigenous self-government as an Aboriginal right protected under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (see R. v. Pamajewon, 1996 CanLII 161 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 821, at para. 24; Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010, at para. 171), an inherent right to Indigenous self-government has now been affirmed on the international plane by Article 4 of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples, U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295, October 2, 2007. In 2016, the Canadian government supported the Declaration and committed to adopt and implement it in accordance with the Canadian Constitution. Recent federal legislation has affirmed the Declaration as "a universal international human rights instrument with application in Canadian law" and provides "a framework for the Government of Canada's implementation of the Declaration" (United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.C. 2021, c. 14 ("UNDRIP Act"), s. 4). For example, the Declaration has been implemented specifically in respect of the provision of Indigenous child and family services under the Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, S.C. 2019, c. 24 (see Reference re An Act respecting First Nations, Inuit and Métis children, youth and families, 2024 SCC 5).

(a) The Charlottetown Accord of 1992

[48] Section 32(1) of the Charter does not expressly provide that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments. However, the Draft Legal Text of the Charlottetown Accord of 1992 had proposed to amend s. 32 of the Charter to recognize, in s. 32(1)(c), that the Charter applies "to all legislative bodies and governments of the Aboriginal peoples of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of their respective legislative bodies" (p. 36). It had also proposed to add a new s. 35.1 of the Constitution Act, 1982 to provide in part that "[t]he Aboriginal peoples of Canada have the inherent right of self-government within Canada" (p. 37). The Accord was approved by the federal, provincial, and territorial governments and by the Assembly of First Nations, Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, Native Council of Canada, and Métis National Council, but was not ratified because it did not receive the support of a majority of Canadians in a national referendum (see Hogg and Wright, §§ 4:3 and 28:42). Even so, it is noteworthy that these proposed constitutional amendments saw the inherent right to self-government as compatible with the obligation of Indigenous governments to comply with the Charter.

(b) Federal Government Policy Since 1995

[49] Despite the failure of the Charlottetown Accord, since 1995 the federal government's policy, first articulated under its "Inherent Right Policy", has been that Indigenous peoples in Canada have an inherent right to self-government guaranteed under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, but also that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments. The policy recognizes the historical fact that Indigenous peoples were living in self-governing communities before Europeans arrived, and seeks to ensure that Indigenous governments, like other governments in Canada, comply with the Charter. The federal government sees these two policy objectives as compatible. As the Government of Canada explained in its "Inherent Right Policy":

> The Government is committed to the principle that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms should bind all governments in Canada, so that Aboriginal peoples and non-Aboriginal Canadians alike may continue to enjoy equally the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter. Self-government agreements, including treaties, will, therefore, have to provide that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies to Aboriginal governments and institutions in relation to all matters within their respective jurisdictions and authorities.
> The Charter itself already contains a provision (section 25) directing that it must be interpreted in a manner that respects Aboriginal and treaty rights, which would include, under the federal approach, the inherent right. The Charter is thus designed to ensure a sensitive balance between individual rights and freedoms, and the unique values and traditions of Aboriginal peoples in Canada.

[50] Since 1995, the federal government has negotiated many self-government agreements with Indigenous communities across Canada, which have recognized that the Charter, the Canadian Human Rights Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. H-6, and the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, continue to apply to Indigenous peoples (Crown-Indigenous Relations and Northern Affairs Canada, Self-government, last updated August 25, 2020 (online); see, e.g., the Tsawwassen First Nation Final Agreement (2007), c. 2, s. 9, which provides that the Charter applies to the Tsawwassen government in respect of all matters within its authority; Nisga'a Final Agreement (1999), c. 2, s. 9; Maa-nulth First Nations Final Agreement (2009), s. 1.3.2). The federal government has also affirmed that self-government agreements negotiated before 1995 will, as a general principle, "continue to operate according to their existing terms" (The Government of Canada's Approach to Implementation of the Inherent Right and the Negotiation of Aboriginal Self-Government). This includes the Self-Government Agreement with the VGFN.

(c) The Legal Policy Debate About Applying the Charter to Indigenous Governments

[51] Shortly after the failure to ratify the 1992 Charlottetown Accord, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples extensively studied whether the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments exercising inherent self-government powers. The Royal Commission concluded that the Charter applies, but in accordance with s. 25, it should be "given a flexible interpretation that takes account of the distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices of Aboriginal peoples" (Report of the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples ("RCAP Final Report"), vol. 2, Restructuring the Relationship (1996), at p. 234). We will return later to the Royal Commission's perspective on the intimate connection between ss. 32 and 25 of the Charter. That perspective takes a broad view of the application of the Charter to Indigenous governments under s. 32(1), but also interprets the Charter under s. 25 with sensitivity to the collective rights of Indigenous peoples, to protect what the Royal Commission referred to as their "distinctive philosophies, traditions and cultural practices" — or what Professor Patrick Macklem has encapsulated in the term "[I]ndigenous difference" (Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada (2001)). As we explain below, s. 25 was included in the Charter as a protection for the distinctive minority rights of Indigenous peoples that might be abrogated or derogated from by the application of individual Charter rights.

[52] The RCAP Final Report, published in 1996, described two approaches to addressing whether the Charter applies to Indigenous governments exercising inherent self-government powers. The first approach claims that Indigenous governments should be bound by the Charter as a matter of basic constitutional principle, because "it would be highly anomalous if Canadian citizens enjoyed the protection of the Charter in their relations with every government in Canada except for Aboriginal governments" (vol. 2, at p. 227). This approach does not see the Charter as necessarily inconsistent with Indigenous values, because the Charter itself is "modelled on international standards with universal application" (p. 228).

[53] The second approach described by the RCAP Final Report asserts that Indigenous governments should not be bound by the Charter, because Indigenous peoples did not "consen[t] to the application of the Charter in a binding constitutional instrument, such as a self-government treaty with the Crown" (vol. 2, at p. 228). It also claims that "some Charter provisions reflect individualistic values that are antithetical to many Aboriginal cultures, which place greater emphasis on the responsibilities of individuals to their communities" (p. 230). This approach claims that applying the Charter to Indigenous governments "could hamper and even stifle the efforts of Aboriginal nations to revive and strengthen their cultures and traditions" and "might operate as the unwitting servant of the forces of assimilation and domination" (p. 230).

[54] After studying these issues extensively, the Royal Commission settled on an intermediate approach embodying three basic principles. First, all Canadians — Indigenous and non-Indigenous alike — are "entitled to enjoy the protection of the Charter's general provisions in their relations with governments in Canada, no matter where in Canada the people are located or which governments are involved" (p. 230). Second, Indigenous governments "occupy the same basic position relative to the Charter as the federal and provincial governments" (p. 230). And third, the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments and be "interpreted in a manner that allows considerable scope for distinctive Aboriginal philosophical outlooks, cultures and traditions", based on the "interpretive rule … found in section 25 of the Charter" (p. 230).

[55] The Royal Commission's final recommendation was thus that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments, but under s. 25, the Charter must be interpreted flexibly to account for the distinctive philosophies, traditions, and cultural practices of Indigenous peoples (RCAP Final Report, vol. 2, at p. 234; see also Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Partners in Confederation: Aboriginal Peoples, Self-Government, and the Constitution (1993), at pp. 39-41; Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Bridging the Cultural Divide: A Report on Aboriginal People and Criminal Justice in Canada (1996), at pp. 262-64).

[56] The debate on whether the Charter should apply to Indigenous governments is complex and has generated a rich academic literature on both sides of the issue, some of which the Royal Commission drew on in reaching its conclusions and making its recommendations (see, e.g., B. Slattery, "First Nations and the Constitution: A Question of Trust" (1992), 71 Can. Bar Rev. 261; J. Borrows, "Contemporary Traditional Equality: The Effect of the Charter on First Nation Politics" (1994), 43 U.N.B.L.J. 19; P. W. Hogg and M. E. (d) Courts Have Consistently Applied the Charter to Indigenous Governments

[57] Against this policy backdrop, courts at all levels have recognized that the Charter applies to Indian band councils exercising governmental powers under the Indian Act, because such powers have a statutory foundation and are delegated by Parliament (see, e.g., Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203; Taypotat v. Taypotat, 2013 FCA 192, 365 D.L.R. (4th) 485, at paras. 36-39, rev'd 2015 SCC 30, [2015] 2 SCR 548; McCarthy v. Whitefish Lake First Nation No. 128, 2023 FC 220, 524 C.R.R. (2d) 103, at para. 93; *Linklater v. Buist, Halsbury's Laws of Canada — Aboriginal (2020 Reissue), at pp. 110-11).

[58] Courts have also recognized that the Charter applies to Indigenous governments operating under legislation outside the framework of the Indian Act (see, e.g., Chisasibi Band v. Napash, 2014 QCCQ 10367, [2015] 1 C.N.L.R. 16, at paras. 49-106).

[59] We now turn to consider in greater detail the legal framework for applying s. 32(1) of the Charter, before applying that framework to the VGFN's residency requirement.

[Discussion and the first part of the Eldridge framework for applying section 32(1) of the Charter has been omitted.]

[78] We agree with the submissions of Ms. Dickson and several government and Indigenous interveners that the VGFN as an Indigenous government illustrates indicia for "government by nature" identified by this Court in Godbout, and thus the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 34; I.F., A.G. Canada, at paras. 18-19; I.F., A.G. Quebec, at para. 6; I.F., A.G. Alberta, at para. 7; I.F., Congress of Aboriginal Peoples, at paras. 6-7; I.F., Band Members Alliance and Advocacy Association of Canada, at paras. 14-21).

[79] First, the VGFN Council consists of members who are elected by eligible voters of the VGFN and are democratically accountable to their constituents, much like members of Parliament or a provincial legislature (VGFN Constitution, Article VIII). If elected, members swear or affirm loyalty to the VGFN and obedience to the VGFN Constitution as a "sacred responsibility of government" (Sch. II).

[80] Second, the VGFN has general taxing powers that are materially indistinguishable from those of Parliament or the provinces. The VGFN has status as "a municipality or public body performing the functions of government or a municipal corporation" under the Income Tax Act (Final Agreement, s. 24.8.1). This status is contingent on the VGFN restricting its activities "to the provision of government or other public services" (s. 24.8.2; see also Self-Government Agreement, ss. 14.0 (Taxation) and 15.0 (Taxation Status); Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, s. 18).

[81] Third, like Parliament and provincial legislatures, the VGFN is empowered to make, administer, and enforce coercive laws that are binding on VGFN citizens and on the public generally within its settlement land (Self-Government Agreement, s. 13.0; Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, ss. 9 to 12). To quote La Forest J. in Godbout, this is a "quintessentially governmental function" (para. 51 (emphasis deleted), citing McKinney, at p. 270).

[82] Fourth, although (as the trial judge found) the Vuntut Gwitchin have been self-governing since time immemorial, and even if the VGFN has lawmaking authority under an inherent right to self-government, the VGFN is also recognized as a legal entity under the federal implementing legislation. To that extent, it derives at least some of its lawmaking authority under federal law. In other words, at least one source of the VGFN's lawmaking authority flows from Parliament, in that the VGFN exercises powers that Parliament otherwise would have exercised through its legislative jurisdiction under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. This of course is not to suggest that Indigenous self-government is necessarily an emanation of federal authority. Parliament can, as here, be a source of the self-government authority, and it is this fact that triggers the application of the Charter in this case.

[83] In the first place, the federal legislation recognizes the VGFN as "a legal entity having the capacity, rights, powers and privileges of a natural person" (Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, s. 7). It also states that the VGFN succeeds to the "rights, titles, interests, obligations, assets and liabilities" of the predecessor Vuntut Gwitchin Tribal Council that was constituted as a band under the Indian Act, and which henceforth is deemed to "ceas[e] to exist" (ss. 2, 6(1) and Sch. I). In highlighting this, we distinguish the VGFN as a legal entity recognized under federal legislation, and the Vuntut Gwitchin as an Indigenous people who do not rely on federal legislation to exercise self-government powers that the trial judge found they have exercised since time immemorial. In our view, in the present context it is sufficient for the VGFN to be recognized as a legal entity and to derive a source of its lawmaking authority from federal legislation, without necessarily deriving all of its lawmaking authority, or its existence, from federal legislation. In Godbout, La Forest J. spoke of municipalities deriving their "existence" from federal or provincial legislation, but this was because municipalities are entirely creatures of statute, whereas self-governing Indigenous governments manifestly are not. In short, Parliament can recognize the existence of an Indigenous government to which it confers some part of its lawmaking authority under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867, without creating that Indigenous government and without necessarily being the only source of its lawmaking authority.

[84] In the second place, even if the VGFN has an inherent power of self-government that is not derived from federal legislation, it is undeniable that the VGFN also exercises powers conferred by Parliament under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 that would otherwise be performed by the federal or territorial government, as indeed they were before the Self-Government Agreement was implemented by federal legislation. The VGFN exercises legislative powers that both the federal government and the VGFN have agreed shall be exercised by the VGFN under the Self-Government Agreement, as approved by the federal and territorial implementing legislation. The federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act is an exercise of Parliament's legislative authority under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 to enact laws in relation to "Indians, and Lands reserved for the Indians". The legislation imposes rules agreed to by the VGFN, which pertain to the exercise of the VGFN's self-government powers, and which find their source at least in part under the Constitution Act, 1867, even if they also arise from the Vuntut Gwitchin's inherent self-government authority.

[85] It is also significant that the federal legislation expressly provides that lands transferred to a Yukon First Nation in accordance with a self-government agreement "remain lands reserved for the Indians within the meaning of class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867" (s. 22(4)). This reflects the reality that Parliament has not abandoned its legislative jurisdiction in relation to the transferred lands, even though the VGFN exercises self-government powers under the Self-Government Agreement. Indeed, as this Court stated in R. v. Sparrow, 1990 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1075, Parliament's "power" to legislate under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 must be "reconciled" with its "duty" to Indigenous peoples under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 (p. 1109). Parliament cannot abandon its constitutional duty to Indigenous peoples. Parliament's "power" to legislate under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867 and its "duty" to Indigenous peoples under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 both subsist even after entering into a self-government agreement with an Indigenous people.

[86] In addition, whatever the source of the VGFN's self-government powers — whether it is an inherent right, federal legislation, or both — it is undeniable that the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act also regulates the exercise of the VGFN's self-government powers and makes them binding against third parties. In short, all the VGFN's self-government powers under the Self-Government Agreement and implemented by the federal and territorial self-government legislation must be exercised in accordance with that legislation. In our view, this constitutes sufficient involvement by Parliament to trigger the application of the Charter.

[87] Although not determinative, it bears noting that the view that the Charter applies to the VGFN's exercise of self-government powers was also expressed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Hon. Ron Irwin, at the second reading of the federal self-government legislation before the House of Commons. He stated that "[t]he principles embodied in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution of Canada as a whole will continue to apply" (House of Commons Debates, vol. 133, No. 76, 1st Sess., 35th Parl., June 1, 1994, at p. 4716). He added that "First Nation constitutions will also provide protections for the rights and freedoms of First Nation citizens" (p. 4716). Thus, in the Minister's view, the citizens of self-governing First Nations would be entitled to invoke Charter rights alongside their rights under First Nations constitutions, just as Ms. Dickson did in this case. This Court has recognized that, while Hansard evidence has frailties, it may "play a limited role in the interpretation of legislation" (Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at para. 35). In our view, the Minister's statement before the House of Commons lends some support to the view that Parliament intended the exercise of self-government powers under the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act to be subject to the Charter.

[88] We hasten to say that in concluding that the VGFN engages each of the four illustrative indicia identified by this Court in Godbout for an entity that is government by nature, we do not of course suggest that an Indigenous government such as the VGFN exercising self-government powers is similar to a municipality. Unlike municipalities, which have no independent constitutional status, are entirely creatures of statute, and exercise only those powers conferred by legislation, Indigenous peoples are expressly recognized under the Constitution Act, 1867 (s. 91(24)), the Charter (s. 25), and the Constitution Act, 1982 (ss. 35 and 35.1). Indigenous peoples pre-existed the arrival of European settlers and the founding of Canada as a country; they do not depend on federal, provincial, or territorial legislation to exist as autonomous self-governing peoples.

[91] We would also add that our conclusion that the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement adopted under the framework of the federal self-government legislation differs from — and is narrower than — the conclusions apparently reached by the trial judge and Court of Appeal. The trial judge (at para. 130) and the Court of Appeal (at para. 98) both appeared to decide that the Charter applies to the exercise of the VGFN's self-government powers, whether viewed as an exercise of the VGFN's inherent right of self-government or under the self-government agreements with the federal and Yukon governments, as implemented by federal and territorial legislation. We conclude that the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement only insofar as that requirement flows from an exercise of statutory power under s. 91(24) of the Constitution Act, 1867. We make no comment on whether an exercise of an inherent right of self-government untethered from federal legislation would be subject to the Charter, which in our view need not be decided in this case in view of the self-government arrangements in issue. As this Court has often noted, a "policy [of] restraint in constitutional cases is sound" as it is "based on the realization that unnecessary constitutional pronouncements may prejudice future cases, the implications of which have not been foreseen" (Phillips v. Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy), 1995 CanLII 86 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 97, at para. 9; see also Canadian Council for Refugees v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2023 SCC 17, at para. 181; Reference re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial

Court of Prince Edward Island, 1997 CanLII 317 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 3, at para. 301, per La Forest J., dissenting in part). This Court in Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217 ("Secession Reference"), at para. 105, referred to this as "the usual rule of prudence in constitutional cases". The rule of prudence is especially salutary in this appeal, which in our view can be decided without addressing whether an inherent Indigenous right of self-government operating outside a statutory framework would be subject to the Charter.

[92] In our view, therefore, the Charter applies to the VGFN's residency requirement because the VGFN is government by nature.

[93] Although in view of this conclusion it is unnecessary to consider the second branch of Eldridge, we will do so briefly for the sake of completeness.

[Analysis of the second branch of Eldridge—whether the Charter also applies to the residency requirement as a "government activity"—has been omitted.]

(d) Conclusion

[101] We conclude that the Charter applies to the residency requirement, either because the VGFN is government by nature, or because the enactment and enforcement of the residency requirement is a "governmental activity" operating under a statutory power of compulsion. We reach this conclusion by applying the Eldridge framework to the specific agreements, implementing legislation, and Indigenous constitution at issue in this case. We expressly refrain from commenting on whether the Charter would apply to an Indigenous government exercising an inherent self-government authority untethered from federal, provincial, or territorial legislation.

B. Sections 15, 25, and 1 of the Charter

(1) Overview

[102] Section 25 of the Charter is central to evaluating Ms. Dickson's claim that the residency requirement in the VGFN Constitution infringes her right to equality under s. 15(1) of the Charter. The VGFN agrees with the courts below that s. 25 operates as a shield to protect the residency requirement from challenge under the s. 15(1) Charter right. Ms. Dickson answers that s. 25 is not a bar to her claim. Properly balanced against the protection provided to Indigenous rights in s. 25 and considering s. 1 of the Charter, she says the residency requirement violates her right to be free from discrimination and cannot be justified in the circumstances.

[104] Over the life of the Charter, this Court has had relatively few occasions to consider the meaning of s. 25. When the Court has done so — as in R. v. Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, [2008] 2 SCR 483, and Corbiere — it has addressed the equality right in circumstances different from this case. This case involves a dispute between a First Nation and one of its own members, and invites the Court to interpret s. 25 in connection with a residency requirement that is itself part of the constitutional law of a self-governing First Nation.

[105] Corbiere did consider the constitutionality of a voting requirement that might be compared to the rule contested by Ms. Dickson, but the requirement in that case was under the Indian Act rather than an Indigenous constitution. Kapp involved a discrimination complaint based on s. 15(1) of the Charter and the possible relevance of s. 25 as an answer to that challenge, but that case was brought by a non-Indigenous person and did not concern an Indigenous law. And while Taypotat (SCC) involved a challenge under s. 15(1) of the Charter to a First Nation's rule on electoral qualifications brought by an Indigenous community member, the appeal was decided without addressing s. 25. Further complicating the relationship between the VGFN's collective right in s. 25 and the individual right invoked by Ms. Dickson is the reality that, ultimately, they are both rooted in Indigeneity (see generally Swiffen, at p. 34).

[107] The purpose of s. 25 is to uphold certain collective rights and freedoms of Indigenous peoples when those collective rights conflict with an individual's Charter rights. When an individual's Charter right would abrogate or derogate from an Aboriginal, treaty, or other right, s. 25 requires the collective Indigenous right to take precedence, even if the Charter claimant is a member of the First Nation concerned.

[108] When Aboriginal, treaty, or "other rights or freedoms" specified in s. 25 are engaged, the limits on a competing individual Charter right need not be justified as would ordinarily be the case under s. 1 of the Charter. Unlike s. 1, s. 25 reflects a constitutional choice to protect the collective rights and freedoms associated with Indigenous peoples in Canada as a distinct minority. "[R]espect for minority rights" was identified by the Court in the Secession Reference, at para. 49, as an underlying constitutional principle that infuses the Constitution as a whole. The protection of linguistic and religious minorities are examples of this underlying principle, as is the protection of the rights of Indigenous peoples as a distinctive minority. This Court stated that, in keeping with a long tradition of respect for minorities, s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides protection for existing Aboriginal and treaty rights, while s. 25 similarly set forth a "non-derogation clause in favour of the rights of [A]boriginal peoples" (Secession Reference, at para. 82). The Court allied the protection of s. 25 with the "strength [of the] promise" to the Indigenous peoples of Canada in s. 35 that it had explained in Sparrow, at p. 1083. That promise "recognized not only the ancient occupation of land by [A]boriginal peoples, but their contribution to the building of Canada, and the special commitments made to them by successive governments" (Secession Reference, at para. 82).

[109] Consonant with the principle of the protection of Indigenous peoples as a distinct minority, the "other rights or freedoms" in s. 25 are limited to those that protect Indigenous difference. All the collective Indigenous rights and freedoms referred to in s. 25 must be upheld, even when they conflict with individual Charter rights, in order to ensure respect for minority rights as a constitutional value.

[110] The protection of Aboriginal, treaty, and other rights in s. 25 is not, however, absolute. Priority is given to collective Indigenous rights only when they conflict with an individual's Charter right. In any given case, the individual and collective rights referred to in s. 25 may not actually be in conflict. Some individual rights are part of Indigenous law and coexist with collective interests, as both the UNDRIP Act and the VGFN Constitution itself make plain (see Metallic, at p. 15; G. Otis, "Élection, gouvernance traditionnelle et droits fondamentaux chez les peuples autochtones du Canada" (2004), 49 McGill L.J. 393, at pp. 409-11). In addition, s. 25 would not apply if the individual Charter right invoked conflicted with an Indigenous right that does not rest on Indigenous difference. In such circumstances, any limit on the individual right must be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. And like s. 35 rights, the primacy afforded to the collective rights under s. 25 is subject to the equality guarantee for "male and female persons" under s. 28 of the Charter and s. 35(4) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[111] In the reasons that follow, we seek to develop a framework to apply s. 25 to the circumstances of this case. The parties and interveners have described s. 25 as either a "shield" or an "interpretative prism" (or "interpretive prism"), but in our respectful view, neither term offers a full account of the provision. Section 25 mandates that when a Charter right abrogates or derogates from an Aboriginal, treaty, or other right belonging to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada, it can "shield" collective Indigenous rights from certain applications of the Charter. But to determine whether the individual Charter right conflicts with the collective Indigenous right or freedom, s. 25 directs that the individual Charter right must first be "construed". Similarly, determining whether the residency requirement in the VGFN Constitution is an "other righ[t] or freedo[m] that pertain[s] to the aboriginal peoples of Canada" under s. 25 requires an exercise of interpretation.

[112] In what follows, we first consider s. 25 in light of its purpose, with due consideration to its text, the Charter's character and larger object, and the provision's history. Second, we address the "other" collective rights and freedoms under s. 25 and their relationship to Indigenous difference. Finally, we discuss the scope of the so-called "shield" and "interpretative" aspects of s. 25, before considering whether the provision protects the residency requirement in the VGFN Constitution from Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) challenge, and further, whether the VGFN needs to justify its residency requirement under s. 1 of the Charter.

(2) Purpose of Section 25

[The analysis of the purpose of section 25 has been omitted.]

(e) Conclusion on the Purpose of Section 25

[143] We thus conclude that the purpose of s. 25 is to protect certain Indigenous collective rights from the application of conflicting individual Charter rights or freedoms, when such application would diminish the Indigenous difference protected and recognized by the collective rights. When the application of the individual right would undermine in an essential or non-incidental way the Indigenous difference protected by the collective right, s. 25 directs that the collective right be given primacy. This differs from the process of determining whether the impairment of an individual Charter right is justified in a free and democratic society under s. 1 of the Charter, which is not solely targeted at protecting the collective minority right as a social and constitutional good.

[The analysis of the rights within the scope of as well as operation of section 25 has been omitted.]

(5) Summary of the Section 25 Framework

[179] First, the Charter claimant must show that the impugned conduct prima facie breaches an individual Charter right. If no prima facie case is made out, then the Charter claim fails and there is no need to proceed to s. 25.

[181] Third, the party invoking s. 25 must show irreconcilable conflict between the Charter right and the Aboriginal, treaty, or other right or its exercise. If the rights are irreconcilably in conflict, s. 25 will act as a shield to protect Indigenous difference.

[182] Fourth, courts must consider whether there are any applicable limits to the collective interest relied on. When s. 25's protections apply, for instance, the collective right may yield to limits imposed by s. 28 of the Charter or s. 35(4) of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[183] Finally, where s. 25 is found not to apply, the party defending against the Charter claim may show that the impugned action is justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

(6) Application of Sections 15(1) and 25 to This Case

[184] Applying the above analysis, we conclude that Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) Charter right was prima facie breached by the residency requirement, which created a distinction based on non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community and reinforced and exacerbated her existing disadvantage as a non-resident member of the VGFN.

[185] Second, the VGFN has established that the residency requirement in the VGFN Constitution is an exercise of an Aboriginal, treaty, or other right under s. 25. It is an exercise of an "other right", namely, the right to set criteria for membership in its governing body — a right that protects Indigenous difference.

[187] Finally, we find that there are no other applicable limits to the application of s. 25 in this case.

[The Majority turned to section 15(1) to consider whether or not a prima facie breach existed in this case. They concluded that Ms. Dickson had demonstrated a prima facie breach, not on the analogous ground of 'Aboriginality-residence,' but on the newly articulated ground of 'non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community'. In coming to this conclusion, the Majority affirmed that the governing principles for identifying analogous grounds in Corbiere remain useful to determine whether or not distinctions based on non-resident status are discriminatory.]

3. The Residency Requirement Reinforces, Perpetuates, or Exacerbates Disadvantage

[201] .... As the Court of Appeal noted, the trial judge's conclusion that Ms. Dickson had been advantaged by living in Whitehorse stands contrary to Corbiere, and the evidence in that case, detailed above, remains applicable to non-resident citizens of Indigenous communities. The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples observed perceptions of incompatibility between Indigenous cultures and urban life, leading to the "assumption that Aboriginal people living in urban areas must deny their culture and heritage in order to succeed — that they must assimilate into this other world. The corollary is that once Aboriginal people migrate to urban areas, their identity as Aboriginal people becomes irrelevant" (RCAP Final Report, vol. 4, Perspectives and Realities (1996), at p. 519). Similarly, the 2019 report issued by the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls found that, because of past government conduct, Indigenous women in urban areas have found themselves "alienated from their home communities, sometimes as single parents and sole providers for their children" and are "often hundreds of kilometres from their homes and social support systems, navigating racist barriers deeply embedded in urban services and experiences" (Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, vol. 1a (2019), at p. 273).

[202] It is helpful to recall Abella J.'s explanation in Taypotat of the relevance of discriminatory disadvantage rooted in arbitrariness for the second branch of s. 15(1). A court should consider "whether the impugned law fails to respond to the actual capacities and needs of the members of the group and instead imposes burdens or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating or exacerbating their disadvantage" (para. 20).

[203] Here, Ms. Dickson is being denied, or at least significantly deterred from, the exercise of a fundamental democratic right — the right to run for Council — because of her non-resident status. This distinction on the basis of the analogous ground of non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community reinforces, perpetuates, and exacerbates her disadvantage as a non-resident. Not allowing her to participate in the electoral politics of her community further distances her from that community, making it difficult "to preserve her identity as a VGFN citizen" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 65). We conclude that Ms. Dickson has made out both branches of a prima facie s. 15(1) breach.

(b) The Residency Requirement Falls Within the Scope of Section 25 as an "Other" Right

[204] The adoption of the residency requirement is an exercise of an "other" right under s. 25. The VGFN has a right to restrict the membership and composition of its governing bodies. The VGFN's exercise of this right through the residency requirement protects interests associated with Indigenous difference. Whether or not the residency requirement might also be understood as an exercise of an inherent right to self-government, we conclude that it is an "other" right protected under s. 25.

[205] The trial judge found that the VGFN's right to adopt the residency requirement is an "other" right that pertains to the Aboriginal peoples of Canada (para. 212). He stated that even if such rights had to be of a "constitutional character", this criterion would be met since the residency requirement "is not simply a law passed by Chief and Council", but is rather "the will of the First Nation expressed at its General Assembly as part of its Constitution … based upon hundreds of years of leadership by those who reside on the land, understand the essence of being Vuntut Gwitchin and that the custom or tradition exists today" (para. 207).

[206] The Court of Appeal agreed that the residency requirement is protected under s. 25, explaining that the Vuntut Gwitchin have always emphasized "[their] leaders' connection to the land, their expectation of ongoing personal interaction between leaders and others, and their wish to resist the 'pull' of outside influences" (para. 147). The court concluded that the residency requirement reflected the exercise, in modern guise, of an ancient right pertaining to Aboriginal peoples.

[207] The VGFN argues that the residency requirement is an exercise of its inherent right to self-government. It asserts that this right to self-government, which includes its selection of leaders, is an Aboriginal or "other" right within the meaning of s. 25 (R.F., at para. 114). Alternatively, the VGFN submits that its right to adopt the residency requirement is also a right that exists under a land claim agreement, as the parties to the Final Agreement "intended to recognize VGFN's collective, exclusive right to be self-governing over [its] own lands and internal affairs under [its] own Constitution and laws" (para. 117).

[208] By contrast, Ms. Dickson argues that the residency requirement is not an exercise of an Aboriginal, treaty, or other right. She says that it is expressly not a treaty right, nor is it an Aboriginal right proven under the Van der Peet test. Ms. Dickson also submits that the right at issue is not an "other" right, because it does not have constitutional status, it does not pertain to a historical practice of the VGFN, and it is not a collective right since it creates intra-group distinctions between VGFN citizens.

[209] For a party seeking s. 25 protection to show that a collective Indigenous right, or its exercise, constitutes an "other" right or freedom, it must demonstrate the existence of the right and also show that the right, or its exercise, protects interests associated with Indigenous difference. In our view, both requirements are met here:

(i) The VGFN has a statutory right to provide for the membership and composition of its governing bodies.

(ii) There is no dispute that the VGFN has the right to enact a constitution providing for the membership and composition of its governing bodies. As we have seen, the Final Agreement, a s. 35 treaty, provides that negotiations regarding First Nation constitutions may include the composition, structure, and powers of the Yukon First Nation government institutions, as well as membership and election procedures (s. 24.5.1 generally, and see especially ss. 24.5.1.1, 24.5.1.2 and 24.5.1.3). The Self-Government Agreement and the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act include similar language requiring First Nations like the VGFN to address such matters in their constitution (see Self-Government Agreement, s. 10.1.2, and the Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, s. 8(1)(b), respectively). The Self-Government Agreement stipulates that the "Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Constitution shall establish governing bodies and provide for their powers, duties, composition, membership and procedures" (s. 10.1). Finally, s. 8(1)(b) of the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act directs that the constitution of a First Nation, consistent with its self-government agreement, shall provide for "the governing bodies of the first nation and their composition, membership, powers, duties and procedures". Such a right necessarily includes the right to set criteria for membership. It would be impossible to provide for a governing body's membership without setting out the parameters of such membership. The VGFN therefore has a right to restrict the membership of its governing body. As a result, we turn to the question of whether this right, or its exercise, protects or recognizes Indigenous difference.

(c) The Residency Requirement Protects and Recognizes Interests Associated With Indigenous Difference

[210] As the Court of Appeal observed, the right to impose residency-based restrictions on the membership of its governing bodies enables Vuntut Gwitchin society to preserve the distinctive emphasis it places on "its leaders' connection to the land" (para. 147). This is plainly a foundation for the connection between Indigenous difference and the residency requirement in the VGFN Constitution.

[211] At first instance, the trial judge made key factual findings about the historical and cultural context of residency. He noted that the historical evidence showed that "the Vuntut Gwitchin show a preference for leaders who demonstrate a knowledge of the land and traditions, commitment to community service, effective communication skills and wealth", and that "the consistent leadership theme narrated by the Elders is being accountable to the Vuntut citizens on a daily basis in Old Crow and at the annual General Assembly" (para. 7).

[212] The trial judge summarized his factual findings with respect to VGFN leadership and residency (at para. 44), including:

1. The Vuntut Gwitchin people have governed themselves according to their traditional practices pre-dating the creation of Canada in 1867.

2. Since time immemorial to the present day, all VGFN Chiefs and Councillors have been residents in the VGFN Traditional Territory.

3. Even in modern times, post the Final Agreement in 1993, the practice is for elected citizens to reside in Old Crow. Chief Tizya-Tramm, former Chiefs Bruce Charlie and Robert Bruce Jr. all resided in Whitehorse at various times but all returned to reside in Old Crow during their terms as Chiefs.

[213] The Court of Appeal also emphasized the significance of the connection between VGFN leadership and VGFN land, noting the evidence of a former VGFN Chief that "the very identity of the Vuntut Gwitchin has always been deeply rooted in the land itself" and that "Vuntut Gwitchin practices, customs and traditions related to leadership and governance are also rooted in the land itself" (para. 27 (emphasis deleted); A.R., vol. VI, at pp. 136-37). In the Chief's view, the VGFN's "decision-making processes are based on reaching consensus and having a Council who does not reside in our community would be wholly incompatible with our traditional governance" (C.A. reasons, at para. 28 (emphasis deleted), quoting A.R., vol. VI, at pp. 139-40).

[214] Before this Court, the VGFN relies on the findings of the courts below regarding the importance of residency to its self-government and identity as a representative body for the Vuntut Gwitchin. The VGFN argues that, by adopting the residency requirement, it "seeks to protect and promote VGFN's spiritual and economic relationship to the Traditional Territory; the Vuntut Gwitchin way of life including democratic deliberation and consensus-based decision-making among Citizens; and the general welfare of the collective" (R.F., at para. 116). The VGFN argues that the residency requirement "is a provision that seeks to preserve and enhance 'Indigenous difference' through the continuation of an inherent Indigenous legal order that survived colonization and for which VGFN has secured space in the fabric of the Canadian legal system" (para. 121).

[215] Ms. Dickson submits that the residency requirement does not protect Indigenous difference. Relying on affidavit evidence from VGFN citizens, she claims that the residency requirement disconnects citizens living away from the community, "making it hard for them to preserve their culture and identity" (A.F., at para. 83). Because the requirement effectively excludes non-resident citizens from Council, she argues that it does not preserve or protect Indigenous difference, "but undermines it, treating [them] as … 'less valuable' member[s] of VGFN" (para. 90). Ms. Dickson also marshals arguments against the idea that the residency requirement is based on traditional VGFN identity. She submits that the requirement is a modern adoption of a democratic system of governance, "a recent addition … enacted in 2006" (para. 82; see also para. 84).

[216] The inquiry at this stage is whether the residency requirement protects Indigenous difference, such that it should be protected from abrogation or derogation by Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) Charter right. We have considered Ms. Dickson's arguments that the residency requirement works to erode Indigenous difference by making non-resident citizens feel like "less valuable" members of the community and distancing them from the community's governance structure, on the one hand, and that the requirement is not based on traditional practices, on the other. However, we cannot accept Ms. Dickson's arguments that there is no evidence that the residency of the Councillors is "demonstrative of their knowledge of the land, or their interest in the land" or that the requirement is based on modern ideas of democracy (para. 83).

[217] In light of the evidence and the factual findings at trial, we are satisfied that the residency requirement is an exercise of a right that protects interests associated with Indigenous difference. Requiring VGFN leaders to reside on settlement land helps preserve the leaders' connection to the land, which is deeply rooted in the VGFN's distinctive culture and governance practices. The residency requirement promotes the VGFN's expectation that its leaders will be able to maintain ongoing personal interactions between leaders and other community members. It also bolsters the VGFN's ability to resist the outside forces that pull citizens away from its settlement land and prevents erosion of its important connection with the land. Such interests are associated with various aspects of Indigenous difference, including Vuntut Gwitchin cultural difference and prior sovereignty, as well as their participation in the treaty process that culminated in the enactment of the VGFN Constitution.

[218] Finally, we agree with both courts below that the residency requirement is of a "constitutional character" in a substantive, rather than formal, sense (trial reasons, at para. 207; C.A. reasons, at para. 147). The question of whether a "constitutional character" will always be required for s. 25 protection need not be decided: here it is clear that the residency requirement has a significant constitutional dimension. Beyond the mere fact that the residency requirement is part of the VGFN Constitution, it is an aspect of the First Nation's law that preserves and enshrines an important dimension of VGFN leadership traditions and practices, and VGFN leaders' connection to the land. We particularly note the Court of Appeal's conclusion that the residency requirement "is clearly intended to reflect and promote the VGFN's particular traditions and customs relating to governance and leadership — a matter of fundamental importance to a small first nation in a vast and remote location" (para. 147). On any reasonable understanding of what it means for a right or its exercise to have a "constitutional character", the residency requirement meets this standard.

(d) The VGFN Has Established That the Conflict Between the Two Rights Is Irreconcilable

[219] The Court must further determine whether the VGFN has established that the conflict between the two rights is irreconcilable, such that the s. 25 right would be protected from the abrogation or derogation that would flow from giving effect to Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) right. We conclude that the VGFN has demonstrated that the conflict between the two rights is irreconcilable and that, as a result, s. 25 can be invoked to protect the VGFN residency requirement.

[220] The conflict is plain when the two rights are first properly interpreted, then compared to one another, as required by the s. 25 framework.

[221] With respect to the content of Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) right, she has made out a prima facie case as a result of the distinction drawn on the basis of the analogous ground of non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community. She is unable to hold a position on the VGFN Council because she lives away from the settlement land. This distinction on the basis of her non-resident status reinforces and exacerbates the historical and continuing disadvantage faced by Indigenous people living away from their traditional lands.

[223] Ms. Dickson argues that the VGFN could have adopted measures that would "giv[e] effect to both the individual democratic rights at stake, and VGFN's collective rights to govern and set eligibility criteria for their elected leaders" (A.F., at para. 13). For example, at the 2019 General Assembly, Ms. Dickson proposed that a single Councillor be selected from the VGFN citizens living in Whitehorse (para. 119). Ms. Dickson presents this alternative in the context of her argument on minimal impairment under s. 1 of the Charter. However, her suggestion that this alternative would give effect to both her individual Charter right and the VGFN's right warrants consideration under s. 25, as it is essentially an argument that the two rights are, in fact, reconcilable.

[224] The VGFN points to the Court of Appeal's holding that "to apply s. 15(1) would indeed derogate from the Vuntut Gwitchin's rights to govern themselves in accordance with their own particular values and traditions and in accordance with the 'self-government' arrangements entered into in 1993 with Canada and Yukon" (R.F., at para. 122, quoting C.A. reasons, at para. 149 (emphasis in original)).

[225] We agree with the Court of Appeal. Permitting one Councillor to reside in Whitehorse would undermine, in a non-incidental way, the VGFN's right to decide on the membership of its governing bodies. As set out above, the Indigenous difference protected by the residency requirement is inextricably tied to leaders' connection to the settlement land. The Court of Appeal cited evidence from the Executive Director of the VGFN that Ms. Dickson's initial proposal to eliminate the residency requirement was not supported because it conflicted "with the widely held view that Vuntut Gwitchin self-government and the protection of our culture is critically linked to the seat of our government being in Old Crow" (para. 30 (emphasis deleted); A.R., vol. VIII, at p. 158). In our view, for this Court to allow one of the four Councillors to reside in Whitehorse would unacceptably diminish this connection.

[226] As a result, we cannot accept that the effects of such a change to the composition of the VGFN Council on the interests that the residency requirement advances would be merely incidental. To borrow the words of Professor Macklem, giving effect to Ms. Dickson's Charter right in such a manner would pose "a real risk to the continued vitality of [I]ndigenous difference" (p. 232). Giving effect to Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) right would abrogate or derogate from an "other" right that belongs to the VGFN. The two rights are, therefore, irreconcilably in conflict.

(e) No Other Limits Apply

[227] While s. 25 protections may be subject to other limits, including those imposed in relation to s. 28 of the Charter and s. 35(4) of the Constitution Act, 1982, no such restrictions are relevant here. The Court of Appeal found that s. 25's protections extended to the entire residency requirement, including the 14-day relocation rule. Before this Court, Ms. Dickson has not sought Charter relief regarding the 14-day relocation rule (A.R., vol. I, at pp. 209-10) or made arguments on severance. Given the burdens resting on Charter claimants under s. 25, we would not limit s. 25's protection in relation to that rule. Finally, because s. 25 applies to the residency requirement, the VGFN need not justify the residency requirement under s. 1 of the Charter.

[228] We conclude that s. 25 operates as a shield to protect the residency requirement from Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) claim.

VII. Conclusion and Disposition

[Section VII has been omitted.]

The following are the reasons delivered by

Martin and O'Bonsawin JJ. —

[234] This claim raises numerous issues of fundamental importance concerning the extent to which the Charter protects the rights and freedoms of Indigenous people in respect of actions taken by Indigenous governments. In our view, the Charter applies to governmental action taken by self-governing Indigenous nations because they are both governmental in nature and because the purpose of s. 32(1) was to extend the Charter's protections to address the power imbalance between the governed and those who govern in Canada. As the contours of Indigenous self-government evolve, it is essential that no Charter-free zones in Canada be created, that everyone be equally protected by its constitutionally entrenched guarantees, and that all forms of government be constrained by its limits.

[235] The inclusion of s. 25 in the Charter, which stipulates that individual Charter rights "shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada", was motivated by a specific concern about Indigenous difference and the distinct rights Indigenous peoples possess as "aboriginal peoples of Canada". Section 25 is a unique provision with a particular purpose, operating as an important interpretive aid to help protect these special collective rights held by Indigenous peoples from abrogation or derogation. Section 25 primarily protects against non-Indigenous people making claims that would have the effect of taking away from Indigenous peoples what is rightly theirs precisely because they are Indigenous peoples.

[236] We do not accept the broader proposition that s. 25 shields the actions of a self-governing Indigenous nation from Charter claims brought by members of that community. To interpret s. 25 in such a non-purposive manner would lead to the far-reaching result of creating and affirming Charter-free zones, with the consequence that minorities within Indigenous communities would not be protected from the actions of their own governments. All Canadians, including Indigenous people, need constitutional tools to hold their governments accountable for breaches of their entrenched rights and freedoms. It is against the purposes of the Charter and s. 25, as well as being profoundly inequitable, to deny members of self-governing Indigenous nations similar rights, remedies and recourse.

[237] We therefore apply the Charter, and the claimed s. 15(1) equality right, to the impugned residency requirement. We conclude that Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) Charter claim must succeed. The residency requirement draws a discriminatory distinction between VGFN citizens that live on the settlement land and those that do not. The analogous ground of "Aboriginality-residence" applies in this context. We are not satisfied that the residency requirement falls within the ambit of s. 25 as the requirement is directed at the internal regulation of the VGFN and is not aimed at recognizing the special status of Indigenous collectives within the broader Canadian state. Even under a contextual and culturally sensitive approach to applying s. 1 of the Charter in this case, one grounded in and respectful of Indigenous difference, the residency requirement is not minimally impairing and therefore not demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[238] We would allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal for the reasons that follow.

II. Section 32(1) of the Charter

[Analysis of s. 32(1) of the Charter is omitted.]

B. Application of Section 32(1) to the VGFN

(1) Delegation Does Not Accurately Describe the Relationship Between the Crown and Self-Governing Indigenous Nations

[273] Recognition and acceptance of the VGFN's historic and ongoing self-governance is clear. The preamble to the VGFN Self-Government Agreement affirms that the "Vuntut Gwitchin have traditional decision-making structures and are desirous of maintaining these structures". It specifies that "the Parties wish to support and promote the contemporary and evolving political institutions and processes of the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation". The VGFN Constitution preamble notes that the Constitution is adopted in furtherance of a "desir[e] to exercise our inherent right of self-government".

[274] The VGFN Self-Government Agreement has been recognized and affirmed by federal and territorial legislation (Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, S.C. 1994, c. 35; First Nations (Yukon) Self-government Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 90). The stated purpose of the federal legislation is to "bring into effect self-government agreements" concluded with Indigenous nations, including the VGFN (ss. 4 and 5(1)). The territorial legislation provides, inter alia, for the approval of self-government agreements, including that of the VGFN, and the recognition of such agreements as having "the force of law" (ss. 1 and 2).

[275] Legislative recognition of the VGFN's self-governance authority does not transform it into delegated authority. The federal and territorial legislation confirms the self-government powers set out in the agreements and, as the VGFN puts it, "create[s] a space for their practical and contemporary exercise through legal recognition by Canada and Yukon" (R.F., at para. 51 (footnote omitted)). We agree with Ms. Dickson's submission that this statutory recognition "does not undermine the fact that [the] VGFN is a rights-holding Indigenous collective in Canada" that practiced its own legal traditions prior to European settlement and continues to do so (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 34). Given the historic and ongoing self-governance practices of Indigenous societies, it would be inapt to characterize Indigenous self-government as a delegated authority.

[276] As we have explained, however, it is not a prerequisite to the applicability of the Charter that an entity exercise delegated authority from Parliament or a provincial legislature. Therefore, we need not go further on the source of Indigenous self-government authority. Rather, under the first branch of Eldridge, the Charter applies to governmental action in respect of "matters within the authority" of Parliament and the provincial legislatures. The key question is whether the VGFN, as an entity, is a government by its very nature.

(2) The VGFN Is a Government by Its Very Nature

[277] We have no hesitation concluding that the VGFN is subject to the Charter. It is inherently governmental. The VGFN's long-standing history reinforces its governmental nature; as the trial judge noted, "[t]he Vuntut Gwitchin were constituted as a political entity prior to the assertion of British sovereignty and have governed themselves in accordance with their own laws since time immemorial" (2020 YKSC 22, 461 C.R.R. (2d) 230, at para. 11).

[280] The VGFN's structure and functions reflect its inherently governmental nature: it creates laws and makes decisions that benefit, order, and restrict the lives of its citizens. We accordingly conclude that the VGFN is a government by its very nature. Its enactment of the residency requirement must attract Charter scrutiny.

C. Conclusion on Section 32(1)

[281] "The Charter is a nation-building instrument" (J. Harrington, "Interpreting the Charter", in Oliver, Macklem and Des Rosiers, The Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution, 621, at p. 622). It was intended to solidify a national identity and preserve individual rights and freedoms in the face of governmental action. This purpose aligns with its application to self-governing Indigenous nations, including the VGFN. All orders of government in Canada are bound to uphold the Charter's protections as these protections represent an integral feature of the relationship between the governed and those who govern. Any narrower approach to s. 32(1) risks the creation of Charter-free zones and would undermine the balance intended to be struck by the introduction of constitutionally entrenched rights in Canada.

[282] Section 32(1) can be read to recognize the political and constitutional evolution that has occurred in respect of Indigenous self-government. Indigenous nations like the VGFN have been self-governing since time immemorial and our reasons affirm that, whatever the source of their self-government authority, self-governing Indigenous nations are subject to the Charter pursuant to s. 32(1) and in accordance with a modified Eldridge framework when they engage in governmental action.

III. Section 25 of the Charter

[283] The constitutional place of Indigenous peoples and the application of the Charter to them engages a series of special considerations. While the Charter primarily protects individual rights, Indigenous peoples also have collective rights and interests, including group title to land (Tsilhqot'in Nation v. British Columbia, 2014 SCC 44, [2014] 2 SCR 257) and the right to self-government recognized in the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (U.N. Doc. A/RES/61/295, October 2, 2007 ("UNDRIP"), Articles 3 and 4; see also United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.C. 2021, c. 14). Although the original peoples in Canada, the various nations — even taken together — are presently a minority within the Canadian population and polity. They have been, and continue to be, subjected to the forces of colonialism in ways that distinguish them from other groups protected and recognized by the Charter. Section 25 plays a distinct role from other Charter provisions, operating to preserve a form of collective rights unique to Indigenous peoples in Canada while at the same time recognizing that when Indigenous governments make distinctions between their citizens, as all governments do, individuals and minorities within the collective should nevertheless benefit from all the constitutionally entrenched protections of the Charter.

[285] We take a view that is different from what Kasirer and Jamal JJ. propose concerning both the operation of s. 25 and the scope of the rights and freedoms captured by the provision. In our view, a purposive approach to s. 25 leads to the conclusion that this provision is an interpretive tool, not an impenetrable shield. Moreover, the rights within the scope of s. 25 are limited to those that are unique to Indigenous peoples because they are Indigenous and do not extend to all matters on which Indigenous governments may act. This conception ensures that s. 25 does not serve to effectively create extensive Charter-free zones in the context of Indigenous self-government, depriving Indigenous peoples of fundamental rights protections and immunizing governments "from the rights and freedoms floor established in the Charter" (I.F., Canadian Constitution Foundation, at para. 17). Though our analyses diverge, we understand Canadian constitutionalism as one wherein contending ideas are not a flaw that must be overcome, but are instead essential to our constitutional democracy (see J. Webber, The Constitution of Canada: A Contextual Analysis (2nd ed. 2021), at pp. 7-8).

(7) Conclusion on the Operation of Section 25

[320] For the foregoing reasons, s. 25 should serve as an interpretive prism and not operate as a shield. The extent to which this prism refracts and colours the Charter's application will depend on who brings the claim, against whom, and when. Adapting for context can create a "strong hedge" around Aboriginal, treaty, and other rights in challenges brought by external parties, while ensuring that member-initiated challenges based on Charter principles can continue to exist (G. Christie, "Aboriginal Citizenship: Sections 35, 25 and 15 of Canada's Constitution Act, 1982" (2003), 7 Citizsh. Stud. 481, at p. 491).

[321] We add this. While we reject the shield approach to s. 25, we should not be taken as suggesting that the protection of fundamental rights can only occur through the Charter, or that self-governing Indigenous nations have no role to play in this regard. As governments in their own right, Indigenous nations can and often do entrench the rights of their citizens in constitutional documents. The VGFN Constitution, for example, provides that "[e]very individual is equal before and under the laws of the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation and has the right to the equal protection [and] equal benefit of Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation law without discrimination" (Article IV(7)). The rights and freedoms set out in the VGFN Constitution are subject "only to such reasonable limits as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic Vuntut Gwitchin society" (Article IV(1)). The VGFN correctly notes that Ms. Dickson has the ability to bring a claim under Article IV(7) of the VGFN Constitution (R.F., at para. 95; see also 2021 YKCA 5, 495 C.R.R. (2d) 98, at paras. 156-57).

[322] Indigenous legal orders do not stand separate and apart from Canadian law; they form an integral part of it (Mitchell, at paras. 10-11; Pastion v. Dene Tha' First Nation, 2018 FC 648, [2018] 4 F.C.R. 467, at para. 8). This does not, however, immunize Indigenous governments from the responsibility of respecting the individual rights and freedoms articulated in the Charter see I.F., Canadian Constitution Foundation). In effect, the Charter establishes a "floor" of constitutionally protected rights and freedoms that must be respected by all governments, subject to the interpretive function performed by s. 25 when collective Indigenous rights are implicated.

[323] Nothing prevents Indigenous governments from protecting rights or interpreting them. Indigenous courts — including the Vuntut Gwitchin Court (which has yet to be established) — will have a meaningful role to play (see VGFN Constitution, Article XV; C.A. reasons, at paras. 23 and 25). The Constitution Act, 1982, which includes the Charter, is a pluralist document that is capable of incorporating and reflecting Indigenous and non-Indigenous perspectives alike. The living tree interpretive doctrine ensures that these perspectives can be built upon in the future. Professor Borrows writes that the dialectical interaction of traditional Indigenous practices and the Charter created a productive cultural exchange during constitutional conferences and invigorated equality movements within Indigenous communities. We agree that "[t]he process of injecting new understandings into customary ancient practices is very much in agreement with the cyclical world-view of many First Nations people and follows the culturally reproductive patterns of oral tradition" ((1994), at pp. 31-33 (footnote omitted)).

[324] The Charter and Indigenous peoples' right to self-determination can peacefully co-exist (I.F., Band Members Alliance and Advocacy Association of Canada). Our understanding of constitutional rights such as equality both consists of universally applicable animating norms and is coloured by relevant context. There is no doubt that the proliferation of Indigenous rights instruments and greater activity by Indigenous courts will shape other courts' understanding of the context in which Charter protections are engaged. Courts must learn from each other to give effect to individual rights, in whatever form, in their proper context.

B. Rights Within the Scope of Section 25

[328] It is not enough, in our view, for a right to relate to Indigenous peoples to bring it within the scope of s. 25 (see Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203, at para. 52, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., concurring). We similarly view it as insufficient to attract the protection of s. 25, in the context of self-government, for an Indigenous nation to possess broad rights to govern its community. Not everything that Indigenous governments do represents the exercise of a unique collective right stemming from the community's distinctive culture. Self-governing Indigenous nations often govern in a manner no different than any other governmental entity.

[329] Accordingly, in the context of Indigenous self-government, intra-group distinctions will generally fall outside the ambit of s. 25, including laws that distinguish between members of the Indigenous community on the basis of personal grounds such as age, gender, gender identity, sexual orientation, or disability, to name a few. Professor Patrick Macklem explains that a broad interpretation of s. 25 "in the context of an internal restriction potentially sacrifices the interests of less powerful members of Aboriginal societies, in cases where the restriction may entail serious deleterious consequences to certain members and may bear only a loose relation to interests associated with indigenous difference" (Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada (2001), at p. 226 (emphasis added); see also I.F., Congress of Aboriginal Peoples, at para. 18). Even though an Indigenous government may seek to justify such laws on cultural grounds, they are usually not aimed at recognizing the special status of Indigenous collectives within the broader Canadian state. Therefore, Indigenous governments that enact legislation drawing internal distinctions on the basis of personal characteristics unrelated to Indigenous identity will generally "be required to satisfy the Oakes test to resist a challenge" when an infringement of s. 15(1) of the Charter has been made out (Kapp, at para. 99, per Bastarache J.; see also Macklem, at pp. 226-27).

[330] Conversely, s. 25 could capture "laws that distinguish between Aboriginal people and non-Aboriginal people for the purpose of protecting interests associated with indigenous difference" (Macklem, at p. 225). Such laws can empower an Indigenous community "against threats posed to its difference by the larger society in which it is located" (p. 225 (footnote omitted)). For example, Kapp is precisely the type of case where the implicated collective Indigenous right would fit within the purpose of s. 25. Kapp concerned a federal program granting a special communal fishing licence to three Indigenous bands. The licence conferred the exclusive right to fish for salmon in the mouth of the Fraser River for a 24-hour period. A group of mainly non-Indigenous commercial fishers brought a s. 15(1) claim, alleging that the licence discriminated on the basis of race. In his concurring reasons concluding that s. 25 applied, Bastarache J. recognized that the licence was a unique right possessed by the Indigenous peoples to whom it was granted. He noted the unique relationship between the fishery and the British Columbia Indigenous communities (para. 119); in other words, the right was held by the Indigenous peoples because they were Indigenous. Therefore, in Bastarache J.'s view, s. 25 could be relied upon to resist a Charter claim brought by external, non-Indigenous litigants.

[331] Section 25 was not intended to create Charter-free zones. As Bastarache J. observed in Kapp, at para. 99:

> There is no reason to believe that s. 25 has taken Aboriginals out of the Charter protection scheme. … It is not at all obvious in my view that it is necessary to constrain the individual rights of Aboriginals in order to recognize collective rights under s. 25 … .

We are concerned, however, that Kasirer and Jamal JJ.'s broad interpretation of the rights within the scope of s. 25 may yield or justify this result. Members of Indigenous communities must be able to challenge the actions of their own governments.

[334] In our view, the "Indigenous difference" criterion does not serve a meaningful filtering function here. The focus must be on the collective right itself and whether it is unique to an Indigenous community on the basis of Indigeneity, not the justification for why an Indigenous nation exercised its self-government powers in a certain way. If all that is required to attract the protective effect of s. 25 is for an Indigenous nation to have broad self-government powers, and exercise those powers in a manner that is expressly linked to some aspect of Indigenous difference, the result will be broad immunity for Indigenous governments from Charter compliance. By definition, there will always be a link to Indigeneity when an Indigenous government acts, but that constant cannot meet the standard of an Aboriginal, treaty or other right under s. 25.

[337] In our view, a more precise conception of the provision's purpose leads to the conclusion that rights within the scope of s. 25 are limited to those that are truly unique to Indigenous peoples because they are Indigenous. In the context of Indigenous self-government, laws creating intra-group distinctions on the basis of a personal characteristic other than Indigeneity will generally not fall within s. 25's ambit.

IV. Application of Sections 15(1) and 25 to This Case

[The full analysis of the section 15(1) infringement has been omitted.]

[363] Due to the legacy of the Indian Act, some VGFN citizens are forced to make the challenging decision of whether to live proximate to other members of their community or jeopardize certain opportunities, including access to appropriate housing, social services, education, and employment. The "choice" to live outside their traditional territory puts them at risk of having their interests overlooked or having their views underrepresented within political spheres of power (see Corbiere, at para. 62, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.). While the context of off-reserve band members is not identical to that of Vuntut Gwitchin citizens living outside their traditional territory, the legacy of colonialism through the Indian Act is a common thread that connects the two groups, such that the analogous ground of "Aboriginality-residence" remains applicable in the instant case. Though the VGFN is no longer subject to the Indian Act, the discrimination faced by Indigenous people living away from their communities as identified in Corbiere continues to be experienced by VGFN citizens and was not erased when the VGFN entered into a self-government agreement (para. 62). We therefore agree with Ms. Dickson that the analogous ground of "Aboriginality-residence" applies here.

[370] First, the claimant must establish that the distinction denies a benefit or imposes a burden. The residency requirement denies Ms. Dickson the benefit of serving in government. This is a form of political exclusion (Sharma, at para. 52; Fraser, at para. 76, citing Sheppard, at pp. 62-63) that bars Ms. Dickson from a core aspect of democratic participation and the opportunity to affect decision-making processes that impact her.

[371] We agree with Ms. Dickson that "[t]he right to run for, and serve, in office is a defining feature of democracy" and "a pillar of democratic governments, protected in both s. 3 of the Charter and Article 25 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. It is not a 'narrow' right but a fundamental political right, and its denial is severe" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 68, citing Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 65; Frank v. Canada (Attorney General), 2019 SCC 1, [2019] 1 SCR 3, at para. 82; Sauvé v. Canada (Chief Electoral Officer), 2002 SCC 68, [2002] 3 SCR 519, at para. 59; Harvey v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), 1996 CanLII 163 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 876, at paras. 23-30). The residency requirement satisfies the requirement that the distinction deny a benefit.

[374] Ms. Dickson argues that the distinction created by the residency requirement "perpetuates and reinforces the stereotype, observed in Corbiere and the cases that followed, that Indigenous citizens living outside their community are not interested in maintaining a meaningful connection with their nation and are less interested in the preservation of their land, sending the message they are less deserving members of the nation" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 65). Further, she submits that the residency requirement exacerbates her inability to maintain a connection to her community and to preserve her identity as a citizen of the VGFN.

[375] We agree. For over a century, governments sought to encourage "enfranchisement", or assimilation of Indigenous people into mainstream Canadian society. The increase in Indigenous people living away from their home territories is intricately tied to a legacy of discrimination. Indigenous people were encouraged to renounce their identity, and it is "[a]s a result of this history [that] a large number of off-reserve status Indians who are nominally members of First Nations have little or no connection to the reserves or to 'home' communities" (I.F., Congress of Aboriginal Peoples, at para. 12). The unequal rights afforded to those living on- and off-reserve under the Indian Act, such as the exclusion of off-reserve band members from voting on band governance, splintered relations between those groups and in many cases permanently alienated off-reserve members from their communities. Historically, Canada has also enacted laws that deprived women of Indian status if they married non-status men. In 1985, Bill C-31, which became an Act to amend the Indian Act, S.C. 1985, c. 27, reversed this discriminatory policy and restored Indian status to many women and to some of their descendants. However, this led to an abrupt increase in the number of status Indian women living off-reserve (Corbiere, at paras. 30 and 85-86, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.).

[376] Indigenous people in urban centres "have experienced racism, culture shock, and difficulty maintaining their identity in particular and serious ways" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 57, citing Corbiere, at para. 72, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.; see also Royal Commission, vol. 4, at pp. 519-26). In 2019, the report issued by the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls found that, as a result of past government conduct, Indigenous women in urban areas are "alienated from their home communities, sometimes as single parents and sole providers for their children" and are "often hundreds of kilometres from their homes and social support systems, navigating racist barriers deeply embedded in urban services and experiences" (Reclaiming Power and Place: The Final Report of the National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls, vol. 1a (2019), at p. 273; see also R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 61).

[378] The residency requirement reinforces the stereotype that non-resident VGFN citizens are less worthy and entitled because they live off their traditional territory. The "powers of the band council … affect the interests and needs of both [on- and off-settlement land citizens]" (Corbiere, at para. 74, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.). By preventing Ms. Dickson and other VGFN citizens that live away from the settlement land from participating in government decision-making, the residency requirement at the very least perpetuates disadvantage. Direct evidence of this can be found in the record. VGFN citizens living outside of Old Crow, the only village on the settlement land, stated feeling as though they were not valued members of their community because of where they lived (A.R., vol. II, at pp. 22, 38 and 42). One citizen mentioned having inadequate access to information or decision-making, rendering it difficult for non-residents to stay connected to the community (p. 22). Another citizen stated feeling "disconnected and forgotten" because of where she lived, and that her views were not represented on council (p. 38). A third citizen stated that she feels it is more difficult for VGFN citizens who live outside of Old Crow to "participate in the governance of our nation and maintain a connection to the nation" (p. 42). By excluding non-resident citizens from meaningful democratic participation, the residency requirement reinforces the stereotype that to be "truly Aboriginal", one has to live on the reserve or the settlement land (Corbiere, at para. 71, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.; Cardinal, at para. 54).

[379] As observed in Corbiere (at para. 71 (emphasis added)), the Royal Commission noted that "[d]ecision makers have not always considered the perspectives and needs of Aboriginal people living off reserves, particularly their Aboriginal identity and their desire for connection to their heritage and cultural roots" (vol. 4, at p. 519). The right to vote, without ever being able to vote for someone who represents or understands the perspective of those who live away from the settlement land, is inadequate. Several cases from the Federal Court have similarly concluded that being able to vote is not a replacement for holding office as a council member. In Esquega v. Canada (Attorney General), 2007 FC 878, [2008] 1 F.C.R. 795, rev'd on other grounds by 2008 FCA 182, [2009] 1 F.C.R. 448, the Federal Court found that the residency requirement in s. 75(1) of the Indian Act violated s. 15(1) of the Charter. Under the terms of this provision, "[n]o person other than an elector who resides in an electoral section may be nominated for the office of councillor to represent that section on the council of the band." Relying on Corbiere, the Federal Court found that "band members who live off-reserve have historically faced disadvantage as a result of legislation and policies designed to deny them the right to participate in band governance" and that "[s]uch legislation perpetuates the wrongful notion that band members who live off-reserve have no interest in participating in band governance and are therefore less worthy of doing so" (para. 88). The court also found that off-reserve members "hold a fundamental interest in participating in band council and making decisions on behalf of their band" (para. 91). The court concluded that s. 75(1) of the Indian Act discriminated "against off-reserve members by prohibiting them from participating in the representative governance of their band through band council on the basis of their 'Aboriginality-residence' status" (para. 92).

[380] Similarly, in Joseph v. Dzawada'enuxw (Tsawataineuk) First Nation Band Council, 2013 FC 974, [2014] 1 C.N.L.R. 149, the Dzawada'enuxw (Tsawataineuk) First Nation's 2011 election code provided governing positions for both resident and non-resident band members. However, while three quarters of the band members were non-resident, three out of the four positions on council were not available to them, including the position of the Chair. The court noted that even if the non-resident members were represented in council deliberations by the non-resident councillor, "when push comes to shove, that Councillor can be easily outvoted by the resident Councillors" (para. 57). The court found that the distinction in the code created "a disadvantage by perpetuating the stereotype that non-resident Band members have reduced ability or interest in contributing to Band governance" and concluded that the restriction therefore violated s. 15(1) of the Charter (para. 58).

[381] In this case, the residency requirement is not absolute. Non-residents can run for office, so long as they "relocate to Settlement Land within 14 days after election day" (VGFN Constitution, Article XI(2)). Any burden of relocating is mitigated by a four-year paid salary and Vuntut Gwitchin staff housing (R.F., at para. 157, citing trial reasons, at para. 156). The VGFN argues this relocation requirement means that "there is no exclusion from participation generally and there is not a 'total' exclusion from candidacy, but instead a limited effect only on those who are ultimately elected" (R.F., at para. 157 (emphasis deleted)).

[382] We agree with Ms. Dickson that requiring a non-resident citizen to relocate to the settlement land to participate in community governance means requiring a person to change a constructively immutable characteristic (R.F. on cross-appeal, at paras. 70-71). "This Court has consistently held that differential treatment can be discriminatory even if it is based on choices made by the affected individual or group" (Fraser, at para. 86). Once it is accepted, as we have, that Aboriginality-residence is an analogous ground outside the reserve context, choice is no longer relevant as a matter of law (Fraser, at para. 91, citing Miron, at para. 153; see also J. Koshan and J. Watson Hamilton, Tugging at the Strands: Adverse Effects Discrimination and the Supreme Court Decision in Fraser, November 9, 2020 (online)). In Cardinal, the Federal Court struck down a requirement that elected councillors must relocate to the reserve within three months of being elected, finding that it perpetuates "the pre-existing disadvantage of the group it was intended to benefit" and "the stereotype that only members on the reserve are able to decide the affairs of the band" (paras. 58 and 65). Similarly, in the instant case, having found that there is a discriminatory distinction based on the analogous ground of Aboriginality-residence, Ms. Dickson's illusory choice to move back to the settlement land is no longer relevant under the s. 15(1) analysis. Asking Ms. Dickson to relocate once elected is to ask her to change a constructively immutable characteristic — akin to changing religion or citizenship. Relocating to Old Crow is not simply a matter of cost, and it is not sufficiently mitigated by the fact that VGFN councillors earn a salary or that housing will be arranged. As was recognized in Corbiere, claimants live apart from their home communities due to factors that are beyond their control such as "[l]ack of land, what are often scarce job opportunities on reserves, and the need to go far from the community for schooling" (para. 84, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.). In Ms. Dickson's case, she cannot move primarily due to her son's medical condition (A.R., vol. II, at p. 63).

[383] The distinction created by the residency requirement imposes a burden and denies a benefit to non-resident citizens like Ms. Dickson in a manner that has the effect of perpetuating the erroneous notion that citizens who do not live on the settlement land have no interest in and a reduced ability to participate in community governance. The distinction also reinforces the stereotype that non-resident citizens are less worthy to serve on the basis of where they live (Cardinal, at para. 52).

B. Does the Residency Requirement Fall Within the Scope of Section 25?

[385] The second question is whether s. 25 is engaged. Does this case implicate a collective Indigenous right within the scope of s. 25?

[386] As we have explained, the rights within the scope of s. 25 are those that are unique to Indigenous peoples because they are Indigenous. Moreover, as s. 25 was not intended to create Charter-free zones, we agree with the Attorney General of Alberta's submission that a s. 25 right relating to self-government must be cast in terms of a "right to impose a specific rule [or] law" rather than a right to govern or regulate in general (I.F., at para. 73 (emphasis in original)). Otherwise, Charter protections could be minimized in relation to a broad range of inherently governmental action. Section 25 is narrower than that.

[387] The VGFN has the right to regulate the composition of its governing bodies. Its ability to do so stems from a number of sources, including s. 8(1)(b) of the Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act (the constitution shall provide for the "composition" and "membership" of the first nation's governing bodies), s. 24.5.1 of the VGFN Final Agreement (negotiations regarding the constitution may include the composition and structure of government institutions), and s. 10.1.2 of the VGFN Self-Government Agreement (the constitution shall establish governing bodies and provide for their "powers, duties, composition, membership and procedures").

[388] But is a self-governing Indigenous nation's right to regulate the composition of its governing bodies a unique collective right, belonging to Indigenous peoples because they are Indigenous? We cannot say that it is.

[389] There is growing recognition that Indigenous communities are law-makers, in addition to being rights-bearers. Self-government agreements, such as the Umbrella Final Agreement with Yukon First Nations and the VGFN Self-Government Agreement, are examples of this recognition. There is no doubt that Indigenous self-government, which for the VGFN has been a reality since time immemorial, is a means of recognizing and protecting Indigenous difference.

[390] However, not everything that an Indigenous government does can be fairly said to be the exercise of a unique right tied to the community's collective identity. Many laws and actions of a self-governing Indigenous nation will be best characterized as simply governmental. There is nothing unique about governments — whether federal, provincial, territorial, municipal, or Indigenous — enacting laws concerning the composition of their governing bodies. All governments do so. Governments across Canada also impose residency requirements for service in legislatures and other governing bodies (see, e.g., Legislative Assembly Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 136, ss. 4 and 8, referentially incorporating the Elections Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 63, ss. 3(c) and 6; Legislative Assembly Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.10, s. 6; Local Authorities Election Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-21, s. 21). The VGFN is not unique in this regard. As Ms. Dickson notes, the residency requirement reflects the VGFN's "adoption of a democratic system of governance" (A.F., at para. 84).

[391] The residency requirement draws an intra-group distinction on the basis of residency; it has the effect of excluding non-resident VGFN citizens like Ms. Dickson from a core aspect of democratic participation in their community. It is directed at the internal regulation of the VGFN and is not aimed at recognizing the special status of Indigenous collectives within the broader Canadian state. We are therefore not satisfied that the residency requirement constitutes the exercise of a right falling within the ambit of s. 25. As it infringes s. 15(1) of the Charter, it should be subject to a justification analysis under s. 1.

C. In the Alternative, Does Section 25 Operate to Protect the Residency Requirement?

[392] Alternatively, even if we were to share Kasirer and Jamal JJ.'s view that the residency requirement constitutes the exercise of a right within the scope of s. 25, we would nevertheless conclude that s. 25 would not give primacy to the collective right in this case. Given this conclusion, the VGFN should bear the burden of justifying the residency requirement, which infringes s. 15(1) of the Charter, under s. 1.

[394] Similarly, any impact on the VGFN's right to regulate the composition of its governing bodies that results from giving effect to Ms. Dickson's equality rights under the Charter would be minor. We agree with Ms. Dickson that the VGFN would be well positioned to enact a residency requirement that reflects the community's unique circumstances but does not fully bar the hundreds of citizens that live away from the settlement land from a core aspect of democratic participation. Respect for equality rights can co-exist with robust Indigenous self-government.

[395] Accordingly, interpreting the competing rights in a manner that is respectful of the purpose of s. 25 reveals that giving effect to Ms. Dickson's Charter rights would not "abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada". Section 25 does not operate to give primacy to the residency requirement over individual Charter rights in this case.

V. Section 1 of the Charter

[396] Our conclusion that s. 25 does not apply in this case does not mean that Indigenous difference is an irrelevant consideration in assessing the Charter claim. On the contrary — it has a significant role to play in the s. 1 justification analysis. Courts must respectfully take into account the perspective of the Indigenous community at all analytical stages. Like all s. 1 analyses, the assessment is contextual. As Professor Macklem explains:

> Because of the constitutional significance of indigenous difference, the judiciary ought to extend a wide margin of appreciation to Aboriginal forms of social and political organization when assessing the constitutionality of an internal restriction. Most Aboriginal nations in Canada, for example, place great emphasis on the interconnectedness of family and clan. Densely textured forms of social and political organization that reflect … the unique identity of an Aboriginal nation should not be dismantled through Charter litigation because they might appear to be foreign to Western norms of individualism. In the event of an infringement, an Aboriginal community should be required to justify the restriction in the name of indigenous difference by demonstrating its relevance to the community's past and future. [Emphasis added; footnote omitted; p. 226.]

[397] Section 1 of the Charter permits a government entity to justify an infringement of an individual's Charter rights. To establish that the s. 15(1) infringement is justified in this case, the VGFN has the onus of demonstrating that the residency requirement furthers a pressing and substantial objective and that the means chosen to achieve it are proportionate to it (R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, at pp. 138-39).

A. Pressing and Substantial Objective

[398] The residency requirement serves to advance the pressing and substantial objective of "the promotion and maintenance of self-governance and connection to the homelands" (R.F., at para. 162). Requiring members of the governing body to reside on the settlement land fosters a real, substantial and present connection to the community. This facilitates the pursuit of meaningful and effective self-government by and for VGFN citizens, in the context of the cultural erosion that has occurred as a result of Crown policy (see R.F., at para. 169). We accept that the residency requirement was enacted for a pressing and substantial objective.

B. Proportionality

(1) Rational Connection

[399] The question at the first step of the proportionality inquiry is whether the measure that has been adopted is rationally connected to the objective it was designed to achieve. Ms. Dickson argues that VGFN culture is enhanced by broad participation of citizens who are knowledgeable about VGFN land and traditions and possess leadership skills, regardless of where they live. As many VGFN citizens do not live on the settlement land, mandating a non-resident councillor would better represent the "needs and issues" of the non-resident community (A.F., at para. 117, citing A.R., vol. VI, at p. 140). As such, the residency requirement is not rationally connected to its objectives.

[400] The VGFN submits that as a self-governing Indigenous community with a legal order rooted in its traditional territory, it is critical and logical that elected leaders be connected to the territory by being physically present on those lands. Currently, non-resident citizens can participate in and influence band governance by voting, but governance positions are limited to local citizens. This limitation is necessary to maintain traditional place-based decision-making structures, including the VGFN's practice of deliberative assembly (R.F., at para. 170, citing A.R., vol. VI, at pp. 139-40; trial reasons, at para. 12). The Gwitchin traditions encapsulate particular attributes of leadership, including the ability to maintain enduring relationships with their people and with the land (C.A. reasons, at para. 115, citing S. M. Beairsto, Dinjii Kat Chih Ahaa: Gwich'in Notions of Leadership (1999)).

[401] We accept the VGFN's statement on the rationale of the residency requirement. Moreover, the requirement for residential connection of an elected representative to the relevant jurisdiction is consistently expressed in non-Indigenous electoral rules (Legislative Assembly Act (Yukon), ss. 4 and 8, referentially incorporating the Elections Act, ss. 3(c) and 6; Municipal Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 154, ss. 48(1)(c), 50(1) and 193.04(1)(a)(iii); trial reasons, at para. 209). Such a requirement is no less relevant in the context of Indigenous self-government. We therefore conclude that the residency requirement is rationally connected to its purposes.

(2) Minimal Impairment

[403] Under s. 1, the means chosen by governments to achieve an objective are accorded a degree of deference (C.P., at para. 179, per Kasirer J., concurring; Quebec v. A, at para. 439; RJR-MacDonald, at para. 160; Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567, at paras. 37 and 53). The need for courts to defer to governmental decision-making is even more acute in the context of a self-governing Indigenous nation such as the VGFN. Indigenous peoples must be given latitude "to develop their cultures and societies in the way they see fit" (see I.F., Band Members Alliance and Advocacy Association of Canada, at para. 23).

[404] The residency requirement seeks to balance the legitimate competing social values of preserving the VGFN's collective identity and maximizing opportunities for VGFN citizens to participate in self-governance (R.F., at para. 172). While we accept that some distinction may be justified in order to protect the collective interests of citizens living on the settlement land, a minimally impairing measure must make at least some accommodation of the right to participate in community governance for non-resident citizens (see Corbiere, at para. 21; Esquega FC), at para. 96; Clifton, at para. 17). As the majority noted in Hutterian Brethren, at para. 55 (emphasis deleted), at the minimal impairment stage, "the court need not be satisfied that the alternative would satisfy the [pressing and substantial] objective to exactly the same extent or degree as the impugned measure". The availability of alternative measures that would "give sufficient protection, in all the circumstances, to the government's goal" should be considered (para. 55).

[405] A majority of the Court in Corbiere found the restriction on voting, while rationally connected to the aim of the legislation, was not minimally impairing (para. 21). The Court could not accept that a complete denial of voting rights of band members living off-reserve was necessary to achieve the objective. A similar conclusion was reached in Esquega ((FC), at para. 96). Without any efforts to seek alternatives to an outright ban, the Federal Court found that preventing off-reserve band members from participating in a governing role does not minimally impair their equality rights (para. 95). While the VGFN's residency requirement is not a form of total political exclusion, as citizens living off-settlement retain their voting rights, it does exclude non-resident citizens from serving on council and therefore precludes them from a core aspect of democratic participation.

[406] We are sensitive to the VGFN's argument that colonialism and decades of assimilationist policies have eroded the VGFN's land and culture to the point where the residency requirement is one of the few mechanisms available to preserve what remains. However, it is these same policies that have forced individuals like Ms. Dickson to live away from the settlement land. The residency requirement wholly bars non-resident citizens from serving on the VGFN's council despite this reality.

[407] We also take account of the fact that successful candidates for a VGFN council position are able to access staff housing in Old Crow (trial reasons, at para. 44). Moreover, councillors receive a full-time salary during their term of office (paras. 44 and 156). We agree with the VGFN that these factors mitigate to some degree the burden associated with a non-resident having to move to the settlement land if elected (see R.F., at para. 172).

[408] However, while affording a margin of appreciation to the VGFN is important, there is no evidence that the VGFN has sought any meaningful alternatives to the residency requirement itself. As we have explained above, obliging Ms. Dickson to change a constructively immutable characteristic in order to assume a council position is simply too invasive. As a result, we conclude that the residency requirement is not minimally impairing.

[409] In the past, Ms. Dickson has asserted at a VGFN General Assembly gathering that a minimally restrictive rule would reserve one council seat for non-resident citizens (see A.F., at para. 119). While we would defer to the VGFN to modify its residency requirement in a manner it sees fit, some adjustment must be made to ensure that non-resident citizens' rights are impaired no more than is reasonably necessary.

(3) Salutary and Deleterious Effects

[410] Our conclusion that the residency requirement is not minimally impairing of Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) Charter right is sufficient to conclude that it is not justified under s. 1. However, for the sake of completeness, we turn to the final step of the Oakes analysis.

[411] At this stage, the court considers whether there is proportionality between the overall effects of the Charter-infringing measure and the legislative objective (Oakes, at p. 139; Hutterian Brethren, at paras. 72-73). As we note above, we accept the VGFN's position that the residency requirement furthers self-government by maintaining the connection of the VGFN's elected leaders to traditional territory. The rule ameliorates the effects of colonial dislocation of the Vuntut Gwitchin peoples from control over that territory (R.F., at para. 173).

[412] However, the residency requirement mandates the political exclusion of non-resident citizens by denying them the ability to serve as an elected member of government. The ability to move back to the settlement land if elected is not a meaningful option for individuals like Ms. Dickson, who are displaced through no real choice of their own, and thus cannot be a mitigating consideration in these circumstances. As in Frank, this type of justification "is based on a misinterpretation of the nature of the choice available to non-resident citizens and also, more fundamentally, distorts the proper approach to the justification of a Charter infringement" (para. 81). The infringement of Ms. Dickson's Charter rights would not end if she resumed residence in Old Crow after becoming elected, and would not "detract from the harm done by an absolute prohibition" on her ability as a non-resident to hold a position on council if elected (para. 81). While the residency requirement is not a complete bar to democratic participation given that non-residents retain the right to vote, it nonetheless represents a significant incursion (para. 81).

[413] In our view, the VGFN has not shown that the benefits of the residency requirement outweigh the negative effects of the s. 15(1) breach at issue.

VI. Conclusion

[Martin and O'Bonsawin JJ concluded that the residency requirement infringed Ms. Dickson's s. 15(1) right to equality and could not be saved under s. 1. Section 25 did not operate to shield the collective Indigenous right to self-government. It was therefore declared to be of no force or effect.]

The following are the reasons delivered by

Rowe J. —

I. Overview

[417] Central to these reasons is the foundational premise that it is for Indigenous peoples to "define themselves and to choose by what means to make their decisions, according to their own laws, customs and practices" (R. v. Desautel, 2021 SCC 17, [2021] 1 SCR 533, at para. 86).

[419] In my view, the VGFN's enactment of the residency requirement in its Constitution is not subject to the Charter. In light of this conclusion, it is not necessary to address arguments concerning ss. 15(1) or 25 of the Charter. My reasons address and reject several arguments relating to the Charter's application.

[420] First, the applicability of the Charter is determined under s. 32(1) of the Charter. Arguments made before this Court that seek to circumvent s. 32(1) by relying on other bases for Charter applicability are inconsistent with this Court's jurisprudence.

[421] Second, arguments that seek to bring the VGFN or its activities within s. 32(1) on the basis that the VGFN is a government are contrary to the text of s. 32(1), its history and place within the structure of the Constitution Act, 1982, and this Court's jurisprudence on the provision's purpose and scope. This jurisprudence confirms that the Charter applies to the federal and provincial governments. The meaning of "government" under s. 32(1) has been interpreted purposively so as to encompass the numerous manifestations of the federal and provincial governments, but other entities or their activities must exhibit a significant connection to one of those governments to fall within s. 32(1). Importantly, the rights of Indigenous peoples, including those relating to Indigenous governance, were dealt with separately in the Constitution Act, 1982, and their internal governance does not fall within the scope of the Charter unless there exists a significant connection to either the federal or a provincial government. While this connection may be present with band council structures imposed by the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, the same cannot be said for governance structures chosen by the Vuntut Gwitchin themselves, absent particular arrangements with the federal government or a provincial/territorial government.

[422] Third, the various arrangements between the VGFN and the federal and/or Yukon governments do not satisfy the significant connection necessary to bring the VGFN or its enactment of the residency requirement within the scope of s. 32(1). The VGFN's governance structures and internal decisions are rooted in the Vuntut Gwitchin's own legal traditions and choices and do not attract Charter scrutiny under s. 32(1).

[423] Fourth, imposing the Charter on the VGFN is not consistent with the objective of reconciliation and with the need to respect the ability and the right of the Vuntut Gwitchin to make decisions pursuant to their own laws, customs, and practices. This includes decisions about the adoption and amendment of protections for the rights and freedoms of VGFN citizens.

[424] Finally, contrary to Ms. Dickson's submissions, the VGFN never agreed to adopt the protections set out in the Charter. Rather, the VGFN has enacted its own protections for the rights of its citizens, many of which mirror the Charter but are adjusted to its people's own laws, customs, and practices. The protections in the VGFN Constitution include protections for equality rights. Ms. Dickson's challenge to a provision of the VGFN Constitution must be addressed pursuant to the VGFN's own internal structures and processes.

[425] Ultimately, this case is about whether, in crafting their own Constitution, the Vuntut Gwitchin can make their own choices about their affairs — including as to how they wish to protect fundamental rights and freedoms — or whether their choices are subject to judicial scrutiny under the Charter. I conclude that the choice is theirs. I would therefore dismiss Ms. Dickson's appeal and allow the VGFN's cross-appeal, on the basis that the Charter does not apply to the VGFN's enactment of the residency requirement.

[Section II regarding how the applicability of the Charter is determined under section 32 (1) and Section III regarding how the Charter applies to federal and provincial governments and entities or activities with a significant connection to those governments have been omitted.]

D. Summary

[469] It is clear that the Charter applies under s. 32(1) to the federal and provincial governments. While the jurisprudence recognizes that "government" takes on various forms in the modern administrative state, an entity or activity must bear a significant connection to the federal or a provincial government in order to fall within the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter. Consequently, to determine whether the Charter applies to an entity such as the VGFN or to its activities, the focus must be on a connection to the federal or provincial government.

IV. The VGFN Arrangements Do Not Establish a Significant Connection to Either the Federal or the Yukon Government

[470] Having examined the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter, I turn to whether the VGFN or its activities — namely, its enactment of the residency requirement — fall within that scope.

[471] In light of their flawed interpretation of this Court's s. 32(1) jurisprudence, many of the arguments made by the interveners, including the Attorney General of Canada, make no effort to demonstrate a significant connection to either the federal or the Yukon government. However, some of Ms. Dickson's arguments are directed to the VGFN's connection to the federal government by virtue of the various arrangements concerning self-government agreed to and adopted around 1993-1994 ("VGFN Arrangements"). She suggests that the VGFN Arrangements are sufficient to connect the VGFN to the federal government in the manner required under s. 32(1). These arguments are the focus of this section of my reasons.

[472] The VGFN Arrangements include multiple instruments. First, the signatories entered into the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Final Agreement (1993). It incorporates the terms of the Umbrella Final Agreement signed in 1993 between the federal and Yukon governments and the Council for Yukon Indians, which represented various Yukon First Nations, including the VGFN. The Final Agreement is a treaty protected by s. 35(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. It implements a framework designed to "establis[h] institutions for self-government and the management of lands and resources" (First Nation of Nacho Nyak Dun v. Yukon, 2017 SCC 58, [2017] 2 SCR 576, at para. 10). Further to this framework, the signatories also agreed to the Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Self-Government Agreement (1993). The Final Agreement stipulates that the Self-Government Agreement is not a treaty under s. 35, although its content and implementation flow directly from the parameters set out by the Final Agreement. Finally, legislation, including the federal Yukon First Nations Self-Government Act, S.C. 1994, c. 35 ("Federal Act"), was passed by Parliament and the Yukon legislature to give effect to the aforementioned agreements (see, e.g., Federal Act, s. 4). I note that the adoption of such legislation was expressly contemplated in the Umbrella Final Agreement and the Final Agreement, including a commitment to negotiate with and consult Yukon First Nations.

[473] Ms. Dickson's submissions relying on the VGFN Arrangements as establishing a significant connection to the federal government are often unclear, both in terms of their underlying assumptions and the branch of the Eldridge framework being relied upon. For clarity, I will examine her arguments within the framework set out in Eldridge and explain why they must be rejected under both branches.

A. The Nature of the VGFN

[474] The question under the first branch of Eldridge is whether there exists a significant connection between the VGFN and either the federal or the Yukon government, such that the VGFN is itself "government" in the sense required by s. 32(1). As I have explained, this is assessed based on either the nature of the entity or the degree of control exercised by the federal or the Yukon government over the entity. It is not suggested that the VGFN is controlled by the federal or the Yukon government, nor is it suggested that the VGFN is, by its very nature, part of the Yukon government; thus, the only question is whether the VGFN itself falls within the federal "government" by its very nature, as demonstrated by its creation, structure, and powers.

[475] Ms. Dickson suggests that "[t]he VGFN constitution and all VGFN laws" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 29; see also para. 30) are given effect through a statutory delegation or grant of authority by the federal government to the Vuntut Gwitchin through the VGFN Arrangements. For example, she relies on the Federal Act to characterize the VGFN's "powers" as "creatures of legislation" and suggests that the VGFN's responsibilities were "transferred" to it by the federal government (para. 34). Taken together, the thrust of her position is that the VGFN Arrangements have the effect of the federal government creating and structuring VGFN governance and delegating powers to the VGFN in a manner sufficient to bring the VGFN within the scope of the federal government under s. 32(1).

[476] This argument fundamentally misconceives the special relationship between the Vuntut Gwitchin on one hand and the federal government as one of the successors to the Imperial Crown on the other. It also misconceives the restorative effect of the VGFN Arrangements on the Vuntut Gwitchin's internal governance structures.

[477] This Court's jurisprudence has consistently affirmed the special relationship between Indigenous peoples and the Crown (Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, 1997 CanLII 302 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 1010; Rio Tinto Alcan Inc. v. Carrier Sekani Tribal Council, 2010 SCC 43, [2010] 2 SCR 650, at paras. 59-60; Nacho Nyak Dun, at para. 33). This relationship stems from the prior existence of Indigenous peoples and their occupation of the territory that now encompasses Canada: "Long before Europeans explored and settled North America, aboriginal peoples were occupying and using most of this vast expanse of land in organized, distinctive societies with their own social and political structures" (Mitchell v. M.N.R., 2001 SCC 33, [2001] 1 SCR 911, at para. 9; see also R. v. Van der Peet, 1996 CanLII 216 (SCC), [1996] 2 SCR 507, at para. 30). This Court has also repeatedly recognized the distinction between Indigenous and non-Indigenous legal traditions (Delgamuukw, at paras. 144-47; R. v. Marshall, 2005 SCC 43, [2005] 2 SCR 220, at para. 130), which reflects the fact that each tradition was developed by distinct structures of governance. The Vuntut Gwitchin are no exception: they had formed their own society long before the assertion of Crown sovereignty (trial reasons, at para. 11). Within this society, they developed their own laws, rules, and customs, pursuant to their own governance structures (para. 43).

[478] In the early period of Crown-Indigenous relations, the Imperial Crown largely did not interfere in matters of Indigenous peoples' internal governance and instead developed relationships with Indigenous leaders and communities (see, e.g., the Royal Proclamation, 1763 (G.B.), 3 Geo. 3 (reproduced in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1), and the Treaty of Niagara (1764)). However, Crown respect for Indigenous governance eventually gave way to the "superimposition of European laws and customs" (Manitoba Metis Federation Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2013 SCC 14, [2013] 1 SCR 623, at para. 67, citing Van der Peet, at para. 248), particularly through the Indian Act's band council system (trial reasons, at paras. 11-13). Internally, the Vuntut Gwitchin continued to make significant governance decisions collectively (trial reasons, at para. 12); however, their legal traditions were effectively relegated [translation] "to a space frequented by members of the community, but not third parties. In this way, [Indigenous] law has become invisible in the public space and in the structures and institutions of the dominant society that do not recognize it as having any validity" (G. Motard, "Regards croisés entre le droit innu et le droit québécois: territorialités en conflit" (2020), 65 McGill L.J. 421, at p. 442). As described by the trial judge, "[t]he displacement and alienation of Vuntut Gwitchin people from Vuntut Gwitchin Territory through imposed colonial laws and policies including residential schools, Indian Act administration and resource development without Vuntut Gwitchin consent or involvement has caused significant harm to the integrity and health of the Vuntut Gwitchin as a collective" (trial reasons, at para. 13). Such experiences are not unique to the Vuntut Gwitchin.

[479] It is in light of this historical context that modern treaties and similar agreements have sought to undo structures of imposed governance such as the Indian Act. To use the vocabulary of Professor Motard, they restore a "space" for Indigenous peoples to govern their own affairs pursuant to their own laws, customs, and practices. These acts of restoration are protected by binding commitments by the Crown to "relinquis[h] the historic control that the Canadian government has exerted", thereby "creating physical and jurisdictional space for such communities to express and foster cultural difference" (K. Manley-Casimir, "Toward a Bijural Interpretation of the Principle of Respect in Aboriginal Law" (2016), 61 McGill L.J. 939, at p. 974). The mutual commitments made within these agreements are necessary to ensure that Indigenous governance structures and traditions are not ignored by federal, provincial, or territorial institutions or rendered invisible in the face of conflicting laws. This is a legitimate concern, since Indigenous governance structures are emerging from a lengthy period in which this was what had occurred.

[480] The ongoing connection entailed by the mutual commitments in a modern treaty or other such agreement does not mean that the Indigenous governance structures derive their existence or authority from the federal government. Rather, such agreements are "sui generis" in nature (Nacho Nyak Dun, at para. 33); they "attempt to further the objective of reconciliation … by creating the legal basis to foster a positive long-term relationship between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal communities" (Beckman, at para. 10). As Deschamps J. explained in Beckman regarding the various agreements with Yukon First Nations pursuant to the Umbrella Final Agreement, these agreements are "binding on the parties with respect to the matters they cover" and "[t]hrough these agreements, the First Nations concerned have taken control of their destiny" (para. 91).

> 2.1 The Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation has traditional decision-making structures and desires to maintain these traditional structures integrated with contemporary forms of government.

This is what occurred. The VGFN enacted its own Constitution, which sets out the VGFN's governance structures, including four branches of government: the General Assembly, the Elders Council, the Council, and the Vuntut Gwitchin Court (VGFN Constitution, Article V(1)). These structures constitute the "modern expression" of traditional Vuntut Gwitchin governance and were developed by the Vuntut Gwitchin through their traditional "governance practice of making significant decisions collectively through processes of community deliberation and discussion" (trial reasons, at para. 12). They do not owe their existence or authority to either the federal or the Yukon government.

[482] In spite of the foregoing, Ms. Dickson points to various provisions in the Federal Act to say that the VGFN Constitution and VGFN laws are "given the force of law in Canada" and thus derive their authority "as legislative instruments given force of law by Parliament" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at paras. 30-31; see also para. 29). This misunderstands what the Federal Act does. Statutes like the Federal Act are routinely adopted by the federal and provincial or territorial governments to ratify and implement modern treaties and agreements with Indigenous peoples. Indeed, the signatories to the VGFN Final Agreement and Self-Government Agreement expressly contemplated that Parliament and the Yukon legislature would enact legislation to implement these agreements, and that such legislation would be the product of negotiation and consultation with Yukon First Nations. This is not the sort of statute that would establish a significant connection between the federal government and the VGFN, as required under Eldridge. Indeed, the nature of the federal government's involvement within the VGFN Arrangements has the opposite effect of what is required by Eldridge, by ensuring that the federal government respects the VGFN's autonomy pursuant to commitments arrived at by agreement.

[483] Ms. Dickson also misconstrues the effect of particular provisions of the Federal Act. For example, she points to the fact that s. 8 of the Federal Act requires First Nations to enact a constitution. But this provision simply implements what Yukon First Nations had previously agreed to in the Umbrella Final Agreement. A written constitution fits within the restorative purpose of the VGFN Arrangements, because it is "an essential step in bridging the gap between Indigenous legal traditions and the Canadian legal system" (A. Geddes, "Indigenous Constitutionalism Beyond Section 35 and Section 91(24): The Significance of First Nations Constitutions in Canadian Law" (2019), 3 Lakehead L.J. 1, at p. 15; Final Agreement, s. 24.5; Self-Government Agreement, s. 10.1; Federal Act, s. 8(1)). It facilitates a transition from Crown-led to Indigenous-led governance by setting out, in a publicly accessible manner, the basic governance structures chosen by the Vuntut Gwitchin.

[484] Ms. Dickson also relies on s. 10 of the Federal Act. This is an administrative provision that again merely repeats the procedures agreed to by Yukon First Nations in the Umbrella Final Agreement and by the VGFN in the Self-Government Agreement. For example, s. 10 establishes a register of Yukon First Nation laws to make those laws easy to access (Self-Government Agreement, s. 21), a default rule for when laws come into force in order to avoid uncertainty (Federal Act, s. 10(4)), and an evidence provision on how the content of Yukon First Nations laws can be proved before Canadian legal institutions (s. 10(5)). Nothing in this provision suggests that the underlying exercises of VGFN governance derive their authority from the federal government.

[485] Nor does the fact that the VGFN agreed to a list of subject matters in the Final Agreement that would be the focus of further negotiation, or that the Federal Act and Self-Government Agreement entrenched VGFN authority in relation to particular subject matters, indicate a delegation of power by the federal government. Rather, the enumeration of specific subject matters is an important part of binding the federal government to respect the VGFN's spheres of governance authority. It would be impossible for the VGFN agreements to restore a protected space for Vuntut Gwitchin governance if the signatories did not make the scope of that space clear. To avoid this, the VGFN agreements seek to make the scope of the federal and territorial governments' commitments unequivocal. For example, the VGFN agreements recognize the VGFN's exclusive authority to regulate certain areas, with the corollary being that the Crown will withdraw from regulating these areas in relation to the VGFN (see, e.g., Final Agreement, s. 13.1; Federal Act, s. 11(1)(a)). This focus on giving practical effect to the restoration of space for VGFN governance explains why significant portions of the VGFN agreements are devoted to the applicability (or inapplicability) of federal laws to VGFN citizens and the resolution of conflicts between federal and VGFN laws.

[486] Of course, the Federal Act is an act of Parliament and is therefore subject to the Charter. Thus, Ms. Dickson may challenge the Federal Act or any of its provisions pursuant to the Charter. I note that in Stoffman, McKinney, and Harrison, there existed a network of provincial legislation concerning the structure and by-laws of hospitals or universities, any of which could be challenged under the Charter, yet the Charter was found not to apply to those entities' own activities. As in those cases, Ms. Dickson is not challenging the Federal Act itself or any of its provisions, but rather a provision found within the VGFN Constitution concerning the VGFN's internal governance structures.

[487] Finally, the courts below and certain interveners seek to apply the Charter by analogizing the VGFN to Indian Act band councils or municipalities, which have been viewed as extensions of the federal and provincial governments respectively in the existing jurisprudence (see, e.g., I.F., Attorney General of Quebec, at para. 7; trial reasons, at paras. 124-25; C.A. reasons, at para. 84). These comparisons are misplaced.

[488] Band councils are "a creature of the Indian Act" whose powers and constraints arise by virtue of federal legislation (Public Service Alliance of Canada v. Francis, 1982 CanLII 195 (SCC), [1982] 2 SCR 72, at p. 78; see also pp. 76-77). By contrast, as I have explained, the VGFN Arrangements remove the band council layer of Crown-imposed governance and sever various connections to the federal government, in order for the Vuntut Gwitchin to restore and carry forward their own governance structures. I therefore disagree with the intervener the Attorney General of Quebec that it is [translation] "illogical for Indian Act band councils to be subject to the Charter but for other Indigenous governance entities not to be" (I.F., at para. 7). To the contrary, to proceed as if the Crown-imposed band council and the present-day VGFN are indistinguishable extensions of the federal government is to disregard the very purpose of the VGFN Arrangements and the "incredible accomplishment of replacing the Indian Act with the VGFN Constitution" (trial reasons, at para. 152; C.A. reasons, at para. 51).

[489] Similarly, as I have previously noted, municipalities "derive their existence and law-making authority from the provinces; that is, they exercise powers conferred on them by provincial legislatures" (Godbout, at para. 51), and they are subject to the province's "absolute and unfettered legal power to do with them as it wills" (Toronto (City), at para. 2, citing Ontario Public School Boards' Assn. v. Ontario (Attorney General) (1997), 1997 CanLII 12352 (ON SC), 151 D.L.R. (4th) 346 (Ont. C.J. (Gen. Div.)), at p. 361). This is clearly not the case with the VGFN's governance structures, whose autonomy the federal and Yukon governments have bound themselves to respect.

[490] It is clear from the foregoing that the VGFN is not, by its nature, part of the apparatus of the federal government in the sense required under s. 32(1). Rather, its internal governance structures are rooted in the VGFN's own laws, customs, and practices. The VGFN Arrangements give the VGFN's unique governance structures effect within contemporary Canada through mutually binding commitments between the VGFN and the Crown.

B. The Nature of the Residency Requirement

[493] It is clear that the decision to enact the residency requirement is an autonomous act of Vuntut Gwitchin governance, not a decision "ascribable" to the federal government. The residency requirement is a provision of the VGFN's own Constitution. It was enacted by the VGFN, following a General Assembly with VGFN citizens, in keeping with the consensus-based practices of traditional Vuntut Gwitchin leadership selection (trial reasons, at para. 11). It was enacted to regulate the internal elections of the VGFN Council, which is one of the branches of VGFN government created by the Vuntut Gwitchin. It is clearly not the "implementation of a specific statutory scheme or a government program" (Eldridge, at para. 44) of the federal government and does not constitute what is required under the second branch of Eldridge. There is no specific, identifiable federal policy akin to what was found in Eldridge, where the Court concluded that hospitals "act as agents for the government in providing the specific medical services set out in the [Hospital Insurance Act]" (para. 51). That finding was based on the legislation that hospitals operate under and with a clear connection to the mandate of the provincial government. As La Forest J. explained, "it is the government, and not hospitals, that is responsible for defining both the content of the service to be delivered and the persons entitled to receive it" (para. 49). Hospitals were "merely the vehicles the legislature has chosen to deliver this program" (para. 50). Through its enactment of the residency requirement, the VGFN is not "merely the vehicl[e]" for a policy choice of the federal government.

[494] The case for applying the Charter to the residency requirement is even less compelling than in Stoffman, where the Charter was held not to apply to a hospital's by-laws. Although the by-laws were expressly subject to approval by the government before coming into force, they did not implement a specific governmental policy and were thus not subject to the Charter. Indeed, there was considerable variety between the by-laws adopted by different hospitals, which indicated that the policies were "left to the judgment of those entrusted with the responsibility of managing individual hospitals" (p. 508). Not only can there be considerable variety in the constitutions of various Yukon First Nations, but there is nothing akin to the oversight found in Stoffman. This is to be expected for arrangements which are about VGFN self-government.

C. Summary

[496] Taken together, none of the aspects of the VGFN Arrangements show that either branch of the Eldridge framework applies. To the contrary, they reinforce that the VGFN is distinct from the Crown, including in enacting the residency requirement pursuant to its own laws, customs, and practices. To apply the Charter in this case would amount to viewing the VGFN as an extension of the federal or the Yukon government, or its enactment of the residency requirement as ascribable to one of them. Such an understanding is not only inconsistent with the VGFN Arrangements, but is also inconsistent with the special relationship between the federal and territorial governments and the Vuntut Gwitchin.

V. A Proper Application of Section 32(1) Promotes the Objective of Reconciliation [497] A faithful application of this Court's jurisprudence leads inexorably to the conclusion that the VGFN and its enactment of the residency requirement do not fall within the scope of s. 32(1) of the Charter. Underlying Ms. Dickson and the interveners' arguments on the Charter's applicability are, in reality, policy arguments: that the Charter's protections should apply, because the VGFN is a government with significant authority over its citizens, and the inapplicability of the Charter under s. 32(1) would amount to creating a "'Charter-free' zon[e]" (R.F. on cross-appeal, at para. 43). Such policy arguments are not a sound basis in law to impose the Charter on the VGFN in a manner that effectively amends s. 32(1). Moreover, for the courts to impose the Charter on the VGFN would be contrary to the objective of reconciliation.

[498] Both the Charter and the diversity of Indigenous legal traditions are concerned with the protection of human dignity, but the Charter represents only one way to achieve this (L. E. Trakman, "Native Cultures in a Rights Empire Ending the Dominion" (1997), 45 Buff. L. Rev. 189; M. Boldt and J. A. Long, "Tribal Philosophies and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms", in M. Boldt and J. A. Long, eds., The Quest for Justice: Aboriginal Peoples and Aboriginal Rights (1985), 165; N. Metallic, "Checking our Attachment to the Charter and Respecting Indigenous Legal Orders: A Framework for Charter Application to Indigenous Governments" (2022), 31:2 Const. Forum 3, at p. 15). The Charter exhibits one conception of how the individual interacts with the state, inspired by liberal enlightenment philosophy (Van der Peet, at para. 18; T. S. Axworthy, "Colliding Visions: the Debate Over the Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1980-81", in Weiler and Elliot, Litigating the Values of a Nation (1986), 13, at p. 15; Strayer, at p. 219). Thus, it has been suggested that "the rights guaranteed in the Charter erect around each individual, metaphorically speaking, an invisible fence over which the state will not be allowed to trespass" (R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, at p. 164, per Wilson J., concurring).

[499] These philosophical underpinnings of the Charter may not necessarily be commensurate with some Indigenous worldviews (A. Swiffen, "Constitutional Reconciliation and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (2019), 24 Rev. Const. Stud. 85, at pp. 110-12; K. McNeil, "Aboriginal Governments and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms" (1996), 34 Osgoode Hall L.J. 61; J. Y. Henderson, First Nations Jurisprudence and Aboriginal Rights: Defining the Just Society (2006)) and with the structure of Indigenous governing bodies which seek to "maintain … traditional structures integrated with contemporary forms of government" (Self-Government Agreement, s. 2.1). For example, there may be tensions between the Charter's general focus on negative rights and certain communities' preference for a more relational, reciprocal understanding of "relationships, duties, and responsibilities" (Henderson, at p. 126; Boldt and Long, at p. 167). Some scholars have noted the potential for cultural disconnect between the Charter's anthropocentric focus on human rights-holders, and a more ecocentric or cosmocentric understanding of rights and responsibilities (A. Mills, "The Lifeworlds of Law: On Revitalizing Indigenous Legal Orders Today" (2016), 61 McGill L.J. 847, at pp. 864-65; Boldt and Long, at p. 166; Manley-Casimir, at p. 953). Finally, depending on the systems upon which Indigenous governance structures are created, Indigenous communities may see the balance between individual and collective rights, and between individuals and the state, differently (Trakman, at pp. 193-94).

[500] Even where the value systems and legal traditions of specific Indigenous communities point to the same result as the Charter, their mode of reasoning may differ. For example, Indigenous stories, customs, covenants, ceremonies and deliberative circles can be powerful sources of Indigenous law, including on the limits of government power (see, e.g., In re: Certified Questions II, 6 Nav. R. 105 (1989); Henderson, at pp. 127 and 163-77). These can form the basis for Indigenous communities to codify a charter of rights that is adapted to their culture, traditions, and outlook. Rather than a "monolithic form of rights analysis", Indigenous communities can craft protections for human rights which integrate their particular and distinct forms of Indigenous law (H. P. Glenn, Legal Traditions of the World: Sustainable Diversity in Law (5th ed. 2014), at p. 92). These alternative sources of rights and responsibilities can "serve the goal of human dignity as effectively as a western code of human rights" (p. 93). By contrast, the imposition of the Charter by the courts risks enabling litigants to "constitutionally interrogate the rich complexity of Aboriginal societies according to a rigid analytic grid of individual right and state obligation" (P. Macklem, Indigenous Difference and the Constitution of Canada (2001), at p. 195).

[501] Of course, the foregoing analysis is not to say that Charter protections are inherently in tension with the desires of Indigenous communities, including the VGFN. Indigenous value systems and legal traditions should not be treated as monolithic, and it should not be assumed that individual rights are necessarily in conflict with collective Indigenous governance (Metallic, at p. 15). Moreover, Indigenous communities are not static: interaction with other societies over centuries, and the adoption of different systems of governance via treaty, may increase the commensurability of Charter protections (G. Otis, "La gouvernance autochtone avec ou sans la Charte Canadienne?" (2005), 36 Ottawa L. Rev. 207). The Charter remains an exceptional achievement, which explains why a variety of Indigenous groups, especially women's groups, have supported its content (see, e.g., Swiffen, at pp. 110-12; Metallic, at p. 6).

[502] What is clear, however, is that the Charter should not be imposed on Indigenous communities. As noted by Professor McNeil, "[f]or the Charter to be unilaterally imposed on their governments today through a questionable interpretation of section 32(1) would turn the clock back to a time when the Aboriginal peoples were often not given the opportunity to participate when important decisions affecting their constitutional rights were made" (pp. 70-71). It is not for this Court to scrutinize the wisdom or fairness of the VGFN's choices by transposing an instrument designed by and for the federal and provincial governments onto the Vuntut Gwitchin, who did not participate in its creation or agree to its terms. To do so would be to subject the Vuntut Gwitchin to the sort of federal oversight from which it sought to remove itself through the VGFN Arrangements.

[503] Some scholars suggest that s. 25 can serve as a flexible way to remedy such concerns, without sacrificing Charter protection (see, e.g., P. W. Hogg and M. E. Turpel, "Implementing Aboriginal Self-Government: Constitutional and Jurisdictional Issues", in Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples, Aboriginal Self-Government: Legal and Constitutional Issues (1995), 375; Otis). This position may have superficial appeal, but it does not withstand closer scrutiny. First, whether s. 25 is used as a shield or an interpretative prism, the VGFN is still "subjected to having its legal order intensely scrutinized by standards foreign to it" (Metallic, at p. 8). For example, on the proposed approach of the Attorney General of Canada, courts would be tasked with evaluating the prima facie engagement of a Charter right, whether there is a "true conflict" between the Charter right and the Aboriginal right, and if so, whether the exercise of the implicated right is necessary "to the maintenance of the Indigenous group's distinctive culture" (I.F., at para. 27). This is highly intrusive, calling for the VGFN to justify the exercise of its authority by reference to standards not of their own choosing.

[504] Second, many claims may not be shielded by s. 25 at all. On the Attorney General of Canada's approach, s. 25 would be reserved for Aboriginal and treaty rights, and other rights of a "constitutional character" (I.F., at para. 44, citing R. v. Kapp, 2008 SCC 41, [2008] 2 SCR 483, at para. 63). Moreover, Indigenous governments would have the burden of demonstrating the existence of such a right or freedom. Decades of s. 35(1) litigation have shown that this is a lengthy and evidence-heavy process. As McLachlin C.J. noted in Haida Nation v. British Columbia (Minister of Forests), 2004 SCC 73, [2004] 3 SCR 511, "proving rights may take time, sometimes a very long time" (para. 26). Ultimately, the s. 25 analysis would force Indigenous governments to expend significant resources in order to protect their laws from the scrutiny of an instrument which was imposed upon them.

[505] As for policy arguments suggesting that the inapplicability of the Charter under s. 32(1) would create a "Charter-free zone", such arguments are dismissive of Indigenous approaches to protecting their members. Indeed, they rest on the erroneous assumption that if the Charter is not imposed, Indigenous community members will have no protections.

[506] Indigenous communities can and have enacted protections to regulate the interaction between members and their governments. A number of related approaches have been given effect across Canada. An Indigenous community can choose, on its own initiative, to implement an instrument that incorporates protections for members (as the federal and provincial governments did in enacting the Charter). Alternatively, it can commit via agreement or treaty — including through self-government agreements — to enact such an instrument. In either case, however, the Indigenous community plays an active role in deciding how it wants to craft such an instrument. Thus, it may enact — or agree to enact — its own protections rooted in its legal traditions; it may adopt an instrument that is inspired by the Charter; or it may even agree to the application of Charter protections. This may also be a subject of discussion among parties during the negotiation of self-government agreements. I note in passing that since 1995, Canada's negotiation policy has been to seek the insertion of a provision accepting the application of the Charter within self-government agreements (see, e.g., the Nisga'a Final Agreement (1999) and the Tla'amin Final Agreement (2014)).

Numerous questions arise concerning the effect of such an agreement (e.g., is the actual Charter being applied, or are its protections being incorporated? How are such rights enforced, and by which adjudicative bodies? What happens if the Charter is amended pursuant to the amending formula between the federal and provincial governments?), but it is not possible to answer these questions in the present case.

[507] What is crucial, and what the arguments of Ms. Dickson and certain interveners fail to appreciate, is that the foregoing avenues are a product of Indigenous choice. Indigenous communities can choose how to implement effective protections — whether on their own initiative or by mutual agreement with federal, provincial, and territorial authorities — rather than being subjected to the Charter via a distorted interpretation of s. 32(1). As I explained, taking reconciliation seriously means respecting Indigenous peoples' ability to "define themselves and to choose by what means to make their decisions, according to their own laws, customs and practices" (Desautel, at para. 86).

VI. The VGFN Agreed to the Enactment of Its Own Rights Protections, Rather Than the Application of Charter Protections

[508] This brings me to the final argument for the Charter's applicability to the VGFN and its enactment of the residency requirement. Ms. Dickson suggests that even if the Charter does not apply pursuant s. 32(1), the VGFN expressly agreed to the applicability of Charter protections to its Constitution and laws. This argument is without merit. The VGFN did not agree to the applicability of the Charter; to the contrary, it agreed to enact its own rights protection instrument that is similar to, but still distinct from, the Charter.

A. The VGFN Arrangements Do Not Contain an Agreement as to the Applicability of the Charter

[516] In short, none of the provisions of the Final Agreement or the Self-Government Agreement suggest, much less "clearly and unambiguously" state, that the VGFN agreed to the applicability of the Charter. However, as I explain below, this does not mean that the VGFN fails to have regard to fundamental rights or freedoms, or that Canada and the Yukon did not, during negotiations, seek to ensure some measure of rights protections.

B. The VGFN Has Enacted Its Own Rights Protections

[517] The signatories to the Self-Government Agreement agreed to the following provision concerning the VGFN Constitution:

> 10.1 The Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation Constitution shall:
> 10.1.4 recognize and protect the rights and freedoms of Citizens;

Furthermore, s. 10.1.6 stipulates that the VGFN Constitution shall "provide for amending the Constitution by the Citizens" — that is, the citizens of the VGFN. Just as the federal and provincial governments have had the authority to amend the Constitution of Canada since patriation in 1982, s. 10.1.6 provides that the VGFN is able to amend its own Constitution, including the instrument stipulated in s. 10.1.4 recognizing and protecting the rights and freedoms of citizens.

[518] Section 10.1.4's inclusion in the Self-Government Agreement confirms the signatories' agreed-upon method for protecting the rights and freedoms of VGFN citizens in a manner that is reconcilable with Vuntut Gwitchin laws, customs, and practices. The provision makes no reference to the Charter. Instead, the signatories provided more generally for the recognition and protection of the rights and freedoms of citizens, without requiring the adoption of the exact rights and freedoms set out in the Charter, and while providing for the VGFN to amend those protections through its own governance structures.

[519] The VGFN has made good on its commitments by adopting Article IV of its Constitution on the "Rights of Citizens". Much of Article IV is clearly inspired by the Charter, and many of the enumerated rights are nearly identical in wording to Charter rights. Despite these similarities, Article IV of the VGFN Constitution is uniquely tailored to the VGFN's own traditions, values, or priorities. For example, the VGFN has chosen to recognize Gwich'in as its official language and to protect its use (Articles IV(15) to (18)). And the VGFN has enshrined a right to access personal information possessed or controlled by the VGFN government (Article IV(20)(a)) — a right with no analogue in the Charter. Crucially, for the purposes of the present case, the right to hold office in Vuntut Gwitchin Government is expressly "[s]ubject to residency and other requirements set out in Vuntut Gwitchin Law" (Article IV(4)). The residency requirement itself is part of the VGFN Constitution under Article XI(2) and was added pursuant to constitutional amendments in 2006. The VGFN has thus elevated its view of the importance of its leaders residing on Settlement Land to constitutional status, pursuant to its own priorities and its own values for community leadership.

[520] Article IV of the VGFN Constitution exemplifies how an Indigenous community can enact protections for fundamental rights and freedoms that are commensurate with its own laws, customs, and practices. Contrary to the suggestions of Ms. Dickson and various interveners, it is not the case that individual rights are not respected by the VGFN or that VGFN citizens are deprived of fundamental rights and exist in a rights-free zone. The VGFN has constitutionally entrenched rights and freedoms — many of which mirror those in the Charter — alongside procedures for VGFN citizens to challenge VGFN laws.

[521] Indeed, Ms. Dickson's own petition pursued an alternative claim that the residency requirement was invalid under the VGFN Constitution. This claim under the VGFN Constitution was mentioned briefly by the trial judge, but the courts below did not decide the claim on the merits, preferring to resolve the case under the Charter. The VGFN argues that Ms. Dickson's claim is properly addressed under the VGFN Constitution, rather than under the Charter. I agree. Ms. Dickson seeks to challenge an internal rule of the VGFN in order to participate in its governance; her claim must be addressed based on the rights enshrined within the VGFN Constitution, pursuant to the VGFN's own governance structures and processes.

VII. Conclusion

[522] The VGFN governs the affairs of the Vuntut Gwitchin pursuant to its own governance structures and processes. This fulfills the goal of self-government enshrined in the VGFN Arrangements: to restore the Vuntut Gwitchin to a place wherein they make and implement decisions according to their own laws, customs, and practices. Having regard to the architecture of the Constitution Act, 1982, the relationship between Indigenous peoples and the federal and provincial governments, and the jurisprudence of this Court, it is my view that decisions about how to implement protections for the fundamental rights and freedoms of its citizens also rest with the VGFN. This in no way lessens the rights and freedoms that they enjoy vis-à-vis the federal and provincial governments under the Charter as citizens of Canada. Giving effect to Vuntut Gwitchin self-government is a critical part of the promise of reconciliation. This necessarily entails the right for the Vuntut Gwitchin themselves to decide what is fair and just in accordance with those rights and freedoms that they choose to enshrine in their own Constitution.

[523] I would dismiss Ms. Dickson's appeal and allow the VGFN's cross-appeal, on the basis that the Charter does not apply to the VGFN's enactment of the residency requirement, and set aside the orders of the lower courts.

5 Emerging Issues and Conclusion

Canadian democracy is in a constant state of evolution, despite apparent stability with a parliamentary form of government, a first-past-the-post electoral system, federalism, and judicial review with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

This section sets out important emerging issues likely to shape, and challenge, Canadian democracy in the coming years.

5.1 Emerging issues

Democratic Decline and Resilience - Canada is one of the world's longest standing democracies. It is not immune from broader, global trends. A decrease in the number of democracies globally, and the quality of democracy within the remaining group, has triggered extensive debate about democratic decline. Scholarship indicates that would-be authoritarians undermine democracy through law, by hindering accountability institutions, decreasing judicial independence, attacking the free press, and so on. What are the vulnerable points in Canadian democracy? How resilient is Canadian democracy? See Richard Albert and Michael Pal, "The Democratic Resilience of the Canadian Constitution" in Mark Graber, Mark Tushnet, and Sanford Levinson, eds, Constitutional Democracy in Crisis? (Oxford University Press, 2018).

Foreign Interference in Elections - Another global trend concerns foreign interference in elections. While not a new problem, the internet, social media platforms, and online politics have facilitated foreign interference in Canadian federal, provincial, and municipal elections. The Hogue Inquiry (Public Inquiry into Foreign Interference in Federal Electoral Processes and Democratic Institutions) into foreign interference in federal elections concluded in 2025 that foreign interference through social media, particularly through the spread of disinformation (deliberate lies) and misinformation (information believed by the communicator to be true but which is false) existed and constituted the single biggest risk to Canadian democracy. Disinformation about the electoral system and the trustworthiness of electoral results is a now-standard tactic of foreign interference, designed to undermine confidence in democracy and the perceived legitimacy of elected representatives. The Hogue Inquiry and the Chief Electoral Officer have recommended a number of legislative changes to address the issue, but foreign interference seems likely to be an ongoing challenge to be managed for Canadian democracy.

The Notwithstanding Clause - As discussed in Chapter 17, the notwithstanding clause is a controversial and increasingly relevant part of the Charter. Section 33 can be invoked by Parliament or a provincial legislature so as to shield a statute from invalidation by the courts for breaching select Charter rights or freedoms. Section 33 does not apply to some core democratic rights, notably the right to vote in s.3. Section 33 does not apply to structural guarantees of democracy in the Charter, namely the requirements that the House of Commons or provincial legislature meet at least once a year (s.5) and that there be an election at least every 5 years absent emergencies of a narrowly-defined type (s.4). Section 33 does still apply to freedom of political expression (s.2(b)), which is central to democratic life, and freedom of association (s.2(d)), which protects third parties and political parties among other organizations also key to democracy. Are there special considerations which should apply if s.33 is used in relation to the electoral or democratic aspects of s.2(b) or s.2(d)? If legislatures continue to use s.33 in relation to electoral statutes, courts may be confronted with uses of the notwithstanding clause that can be said to harm democracy as a whole.

Artificial Intelligence - No discussion of emerging issues in the law is complete without considering AI. AI has the potential to change elections, as a tool used by parties and candidates as well as by third parties. Electoral law has been updated many times to account for new technologies, such as the radio, political advertising on television, political party websites, and social media communication. Election law will no doubt need to be updated to address the uses and, inevitably, abuses of AI in the electoral context. The constitutional dimension includes whether such laws will be justified infringements of the freedom of expression of entities using AI.

5.2 Conclusion

Canadian democratic rights are set out in the Charter, but are mainly brought to life by electoral statutes, legislatures, and the practice of electoral politics. At a difficult time for democracy globally, these rights are central to ensuring that the full promise of democracy is realized in Canada.

Chapter 23: Section 7

By Debra M Haak and Gillian MacNeil

1 Introduction

Section 1(a) of the Canadian Bill of Rights (1960) provides:

> It is hereby recognized and declared that in Canada there have existed and shall continue to exist without discrimination by reason of race, national origin, colour, religion or sex, the following human rights and fundamental freedoms, namely,
> (a) the right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property, and the right not to be deprived thereof except by due process of law

Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

Notice the differences between these provisions. Peter Hogg suggested that property was not included in section 7 to reduce the class of governmental acts to which section 7 would apply. Similarly, he suggested the framers of section 7 replaced "due process of law" with "the principles of fundamental justice" to provide only procedural protections to life, liberty and security of the person rather than substantive protections. As you read this chapter, consider whether the scope of section 7 has, in fact, been limited in these ways. See Peter W Hogg, "The Brilliant Career of Section 7 of the Charter" (2012) 58 SCLR (2d) 195.

This chapter sets out the general framework for assessing the constitutionality of governmental action under section 7 of the Charter, the interests protected by section 7, and the principles of fundamental justice. It also briefly considers the relationship between section 7 and section 1 of the Charter. At the end of this chapter, you will find excerpts from legal texts and recently decided section 7 cases to help you think through the application of section 7 in areas of ongoing Charter dialogue like the commercial exchange of sex and medically assisted death, and in two other contemporary contexts: economic rights, and the environment.

2 The framework of section 7

To establish a violation of section 7, a claimant must demonstrate that state conduct has deprived them of their right to life, liberty or security of the person and that the impugned state conduct fails to accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

As you will see from the following cases, section 7 has impacted Canada's legislative approach to a wide range of important social and policy issues including: abortion, medical assistance in dying, supervised injection sites, and the commercial exchange of sex. Section 7 cases often involve subjects about which there is no societal consensus. Many of the key cases involve differently situated policy stakeholders making competing demands on the state and seeking recognition of their rights under the Charter. As you consider these cases, you may want to think about whether the current framework of section 7 and the current approach to section 1 in section 7 cases allow courts to meaningfully consider all the experiences, interests, values, and rights at stake in policymaking in highly contested policy spaces.

3 The right to life, liberty, and security of the person

The first step in a section 7 claim is establishing a deprivation of one of the rights protected by the section. Section 7 protects life, liberty, and security of the person - each of which has been interpreted to capture different interests. Each of the guaranteed rights is considered in turn, followed by a consideration of the causal connection that must be established between the negative impact on the claimant and the impugned state action.

3.1 The right to life

Judicial pronouncements on the scope of the right to life guaranteed by the Charter have been limited. In the following three cases, the right to life was considered in context of medical services. In the first case, Chaoulli v Quebec, the Supreme Court considered whether the prohibition on private health insurance in the province of Quebec violated section 7 of the Charter and section 1 of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms.

3.1.1 Chaoulli v Quebec (Attorney General)

Chaoulli v Quebec (Attorney General)*, 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 SCR 791

Per McLachlin, CJ and Major and Bastarache JJ (Deschamps J concurring, Binnie, LeBel and Fish JJ. dissenting) …

110 The issue at this stage is whether the prohibition on insurance for private medical care deprives individuals of their life, liberty or security of the person protected by s. 7 of the Charter.

111 …It is common ground that the effect of the prohibition on insurance is to allow only the very rich, who do not need insurance, to secure private health care in order to avoid the delays in the public system. Given the ban on insurance, most Quebeckers have no choice but to accept delays in the medical system and their adverse physical and psychological consequences.

112 Delays in the public system are widespread and have serious, sometimes grave, consequences. There was no dispute that there is a waiting list for cardiovascular surgery for life-threatening problems. Dr. Daniel Doyle, a cardiovascular surgeon who teaches and practises in Quebec City, testified that a person with coronary disease is [translation] "sitting on a bomb" and can die at any moment. He confirmed, without challenge, that patients die while on waiting lists: A.R., at p. 461. Inevitably, where patients have life-threatening conditions, some will die because of undue delay in awaiting surgery.

113 The same applies to other health problems. In a study of 200 subjects aged 65 and older with hip fractures, the relationship between pre-operative delay and post-operative complications and risk of death was examined. While the study found no relationship between pre-operative delay and post-operative complications, it concluded that the risk of death within six months after surgery increased significantly, by 5 percent, with the length of pre-operative delay: A. Laberge, P. M. Bernard and P. A. Lamarche, "Relationships between the delay before surgery for a hip fracture, postoperative complications and risk of death" (1997), 45 Rev. Epidém. et Santé Publ. 5, at p. 9.

114 Dr. Eric Lenczner, an orthopaedic surgeon, testified that the one-year delay commonly incurred by patients requiring ligament reconstruction surgery increases the risk that their injuries will become irreparable (A.R., at p. 334). Dr. Lenczner also testified that 95 percent of patients in Canada wait well over a year, and many two years, for knee replacements. While a knee replacement may seem trivial compared to the risk of death for wait-listed coronary surgery patients, which increases by 0.5 percent per month (A.R., at p. 450), the harm suffered by patients awaiting replacement knees and hips is significant. Even though death may not be an issue for them, these patients "are in pain", "would not go a day without discomfort" and are "limited in their ability to get around", some being confined to wheelchairs or house bound (A.R., at pp. 327-28).

115 Both the individual members of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology who intervened in this appeal and the Canadian Medical Association cited a Statistics Canada study demonstrating that over one in five Canadians who needed health care for themselves or a family member in 2001 encountered some form of difficulty, from getting an appointment to experiencing lengthy waiting times: C. Sanmartin et al., Access to Health Care Services in Canada, 2001 (June 2002), at p. 17. Thirty-seven percent of those patients reported pain.

After finding the applicants' right to security of the person was engaged, the Court turned to whether their right to life was also engaged.

123 ….As we noted above, there is unchallenged evidence that in some serious cases, patients die as a result of waiting lists for public health care. Where lack of timely health care can result in death, s. 7 protection of life itself is engaged.

What follows next is a short excerpt from a case where the Supreme Court considered whether a ministerial decision not to exempt a safe injection facility for intravenous drug users from the criminal prohibitions on narcotics possession constituted a deprivation of section 7 interests that did not accord with the principles of fundamental justice that laws should not be arbitrary or grossly disproportionate. We will return to this case again later in this chapter. For now, focus on the right to life and the right to receive medical care.

3.1.2 Canada (Attorney General) v PHS Community Services Society

Canada (Attorney General) v PHS Community Services Society*, 2011 SCC 44, [2011] 3 SCR 134

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] The Chief Justice — Since 2003, the Insite safe injection facility has provided medical services to intravenous drug users in the Downtown Eastside of Vancouver ("DTES"). Local, provincial and federal authorities came together to create a legal framework for a safe injection facility in which clients could inject drugs under medical supervision without fear of arrest and prosecution. Insite was widely hailed as an effective response to the catastrophic spread of infectious diseases such as HIV/AIDS and hepatitis C, and the high rate of deaths from drug overdoses in the DTES.

[2] In 2008, the federal government failed to extend Insite's exemption from the operation of criminal laws in the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, S.C. 1996, c. 19 ("CDSA"). Faced with the threat that Insite would have to stop offering services, the claimants brought an action for declarations that the CDSA is inapplicable to Insite and that its application to Insite resulted in a violation of the claimants' s. 7 rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or, in the alternative, that the federal Minister of Health, in refusing to grant an extension of Insite's exemption, had violated the claimants' s. 7 rights.

[3] The question in this appeal is whether Insite is exempt from the federal criminal laws that prohibit the possession and trafficking of controlled substances … because the application of the criminal law would violate the Charter. For the reasons that follow, we conclude that the CDSA is applicable to Insite, and that … the actions of the federal Minister of Health in refusing to extend Insite's exemption under s. 56 of the CDSA are in violation of s. 7 of the Charter, and cannot be justified under s. 1. Accordingly, we order the Minister to grant Insite an extended exemption, and dismiss the appeal.

[91] The record supports the conclusion that, without an exemption from the application of the CDSA, the health professionals who provide the supervised services at Insite will be unable to offer medical supervision and counselling to Insite's clients. This deprives the clients of Insite of potentially lifesaving medical care, thus engaging their rights to life and security of the person. The result is that the limits on the s. 7 rights of staff will in turn result in limits on the s. 7 rights of clients.

In a more recent case, Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), the Court considered the criminal prohibition on providing assistance in dying. In this excerpt, the Court explained the content of the right to life. We will return to Carter several times in this chapter, including in the contemporary issues section at the end of the chapter. Consideration of the constitutionally acceptable parameters of criminal prohibition of medically assisted death is ongoing.

3.1.3 Carter v Canada (Attorney General)

Carter v Canada (Attorney General)*, 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331

The following is the judgment delivered by

The Court —

I. Introduction

[1] It is a crime in Canada to assist another person in ending her own life. As a result, people who are grievously and irremediably ill cannot seek a physician's assistance in dying and may be condemned to a life of severe and intolerable suffering. A person facing this prospect has two options: she can take her own life prematurely, often by violent or dangerous means, or she can suffer until she dies from natural causes. The choice is cruel.

[2] The question on this appeal is whether the criminal prohibition that puts a person to this choice violates her Charter rights to life, liberty and security of the person (s. 7) and to equal treatment by and under the law (s. 15). This is a question that asks us to balance competing values of great importance. On the one hand stands the autonomy and dignity of a competent adult who seeks death as a response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition. On the other stands the sanctity of life and the need to protect the vulnerable.

[4] We conclude that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is void insofar as it deprives a competent adult of such assistance where (1) the person affected clearly consents to the termination of life; and (2) the person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition (including an illness, disease or disability) that causes enduring suffering that is intolerable to the individual in the circumstances of his or her condition. We therefore allow the appeal.

[40] The main issue in this case is whether the prohibition on physician-assisted dying found in s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code violates the claimants' rights under ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. For the purposes of their claim, the appellants use "physician-assisted death" and "physician-assisted dying" to describe the situation where a physician provides or administers medication that intentionally brings about the patient's death, at the request of the patient. The appellants advance two claims: (1) that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying deprives competent adults, who suffer a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes the person to endure physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to that person, of their right to life, liberty and security of the person under s. 7 of the Charter; and (2) that the prohibition deprives adults who are physically disabled of their right to equal treatment under s. 15 of the Charter.

[57] The trial judge found that the prohibition on physician-assisted dying had the effect of forcing some individuals to take their own lives prematurely, for fear that they would be incapable of doing so when they reached the point where suffering was intolerable. On that basis, she found that the right to life was engaged.

[58] We see no basis for interfering with the trial judge's conclusion on this point. The evidence of premature death was not challenged before this Court. It is therefore established that the prohibition deprives some individuals of life.

[59] The appellants and a number of the interveners urge us to adopt a broader, qualitative approach to the right to life. Some argue that the right to life is not restricted to the preservation of life, but protects quality of life and therefore a right to die with dignity. Others argue that the right to life protects personal autonomy and fundamental notions of self-determination and dignity, and therefore includes the right to determine whether to take one's own life.

[60] In dissent at the Court of Appeal, Finch C.J.B.C. accepted the argument that the right to life protects more than physical existence (paras. 84-89). In his view, the life interest is "intimately connected to the way a person values his or her lived experience. The point at which the meaning of life is lost, when life's positive attributes are so diminished as to render life valueless, . . . is an intensely personal decision which 'everyone' has the right to make for him or herself" (para. 86). Similarly, in his dissent in Rodriguez, Cory J. accepted that the right to life included a right to die with dignity, on the ground that "dying is an integral part of living" (p. 630).

[61] The trial judge, on the other hand, rejected the "qualitative" approach to the right to life. She concluded that the right to life is only engaged when there is a threat of death as a result of government action or laws. In her words, the right to life is limited to a "right not to die" (para. 1322 (emphasis in original)).

[62] This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 SCR 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death (paras. 38 and 50, per Deschamps J.; para. 123, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care (para. 91). In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly. Conversely, concerns about autonomy and quality of life have traditionally been treated as liberty and security rights. We see no reason to alter that approach in this case.

[63] This said, we do not agree that the existential formulation of the right to life requires an absolute prohibition on assistance in dying, or that individuals cannot "waive" their right to life. This would create a "duty to live", rather than a "right to life", and would call into question the legality of any consent to the withdrawal or refusal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment. The sanctity of life is one of our most fundamental societal values. Section 7 is rooted in a profound respect for the value of human life. But s. 7 also encompasses life, liberty and security of the person during the passage to death. It is for this reason that the sanctity of life "is no longer seen to require that all human life be preserved at all costs" (Rodriguez, at p. 595, per Sopinka J.). And it is for this reason that the law has come to recognize that, in certain circumstances, an individual's choice about the end of her life is entitled to respect. It is to this fundamental choice that we now turn.

3.2 The right to liberty

The right to liberty contained in section 7 protects physical liberty. Accordingly, laws that provide for the possibility of detention or confinement constitute a deprivation of the section 7 right to liberty. The Supreme Court confirmed this early in section 7 case law, in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486, writing:

> Obviously, imprisonment (including probation orders) deprives persons of their liberty. An offence has that potential as of the moment it is open to the judge to impose imprisonment.

The right to liberty contained in section 7 has also been extended to include circumstances where there is no threat of imprisonment or physical detention. In the next case, the Supreme Court reasoned that liberty includes protection from state interference with personal autonomy and fundamental decisions about how an individual lives their life.

3.2.1 B(R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto

B(R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, 1995 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1995] 1 SCR 315

The judgment of La Forest, Gonthier and McLachlin JJ. was delivered by La Forest J.

LA FOREST J. -- This appeal raises the constitutionality of state interference with child-rearing decisions. The appellants are parents who argue that the Ontario Child Welfare Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 66, infringes their right to choose medical treatment for their infant in accordance with the tenets of their faith. They claim that this right is protected under both ss. 7and 2(a) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Facts

Sheena B. was born four weeks prematurely, on June 25, 1983. Soon after, she was transferred to the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto because of her physical condition. Within the first few weeks of her life she exhibited many physical ailments and received a number of medical treatments. Her parents, the appellants, consented to all the treatments provided during those initial weeks. At their request, the attending physicians avoided the use of a blood transfusion in the treatment of Sheena because, as Jehovah's Witnesses, the appellants objected to it for religious reasons; they also claimed it was unnecessary.

On July 30, the child's haemoglobin level had dropped to such an extent that the attending physicians believed her life was in danger and that she might require a blood transfusion to treat potentially life-threatening congestive heart failure. On July 31, following a hearing on short notice to the appellants, Judge Main of the Ontario Provincial Court (Family Division) granted the respondent Children's Aid Society a 72-hour wardship, on the basis of the evidence of Dr. Perlman that a transfusion might be necessary…On August 23, Sheena received a blood transfusion

Issues

The following constitutional questions were set by the Chief Justice:

1.Does the Child Welfare Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 66, s. 19(1)(b)(ix), together with the powers in ss. 30(1)2 and 41 and the procedures in ss. 21, 27, 28(1), (10) and (12), deny parents a right to choose medical treatment for their infants, contrary to s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Section 7 of the Charter

Turning now to s. 7 of the Charter, the appellants argued that the right to choose medical treatment for their infant is a liberty interest protected under s. 7 of the Charter, and that the infringement of that interest in the present case did not conform with the principles of fundamental justice....

Section 7 of the Charter and Parental Liberty

…while this case can be disposed of solely on the issue of the right of parents to choose medical treatment for their infant, it is not without consequence for child protection as a whole. Intervention may well be compelling here, but this appeal raises the more general question of the right of parents to rear their children without undue interference by the state.

The appellants claim that parents have the right to choose medical treatment for their infant, relying for this contention on s. 7 of the Charter, and more precisely on the liberty interest. They assert that the right enures in the family as an entity, basing this argument on statements made by American courts in the definition of liberty under their Constitution. While, as I will indicate, American experience may be useful in defining the scope of the liberty interest protected under our Constitution, I agree that s. 7 of the Charter does not afford protection to the integrity of the family unit as such. The Canadian Charter, and s. 7 in particular, protects individuals. It is the individual's right to liberty under the Charter with which we are here concerned. The concept of the integrity of the family unit is itself premised, at least in part, on that of parental liberty. N. Bala and J. D. Redfearn, "Family Law and the `Liberty Interest': Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights" (1983), 15 Ottawa L. Rev. 274, note that a general discussion of the "family unit" often obscures two separate interests, at p. 281:

> It is, however, possible to distinguish at least two different, yet interrelated interests. One is familial integrity -- an interest in upholding the family as an autonomous, independent unit in society. The other is parental authority -- a parental right to enjoy family life and control various aspects of a child's life, free from unnecessary outside interference. [Emphasis in original.]

The term "liberty" has yet to be authoritatively defined in this Court, although comments have been made on both ends of the spectrum. In Singh v. Minister of Employment and Immigration, 1985 CanLII 65 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 177, Wilson J., speaking for Dickson C.J., Lamer J. (as he then was) as well, noted that it was incumbent upon the Court to define "liberty", and conceded that the concept was susceptible of a broad range of meanings. Although she did not venture to define the scope of the liberty interest protected under s. 7 of the Charter, she cited the following dictum of Stewart J. in Board of Regents of State Colleges v. Roth, 408 U.S. 564 (1972), at p. 572, as an example of the liberal interpretation the United States Supreme Court has given to the Fourteenth Amendment, at p. 205:

> "While this Court has not attempted to define with exactness the liberty ... guaranteed (by the Fourteenth Amendment), the term has received much consideration and some of the included things have been definitely stated. Without doubt, it denotes not merely freedom from bodily restraint but also the right of the individual to contract, to engage in any of the common occupations of life, to acquire useful knowledge, to marry, establish a home and bring up children, to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, and generally to enjoy those privileges long recognized ... as essential to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men." Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390, 399. In a Constitution for a free people, there can be no doubt that the meaning of "liberty" must be broad indeed. See, e.g., Bolling v. Sharpe, 347 U.S. 497, 499-500; Stanley v. Illinois, 405 U.S. 645.

In R. v. Jones, supra, speaking alone in dissent, Wilson J. gave a broad formulation of the concept of liberty. She stated, at p. 318:

> I believe that the framers of the Constitution in guaranteeing "liberty" as a fundamental value in a free and democratic society had in mind the freedom of the individual to develop and realize his potential to the full, to plan his own life to suit his own character, to make his own choices for good or ill, to be non-conformist, idiosyncratic and even eccentric -- to be, in to-day's parlance, "his own person" and accountable as such. John Stuart Mill described it as "pursuing our own good in our own way". This, he believed, we should be free to do "so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs or impede their efforts to obtain it".

While she was of the view that s. 7 protected the right of parents to bring up and educate their children according to their conscientious beliefs, Wilson J. acknowledged that this freedom was not "untrammelled". Some limits could be placed on the interest, as "liberty" did not imply the right to bring up and educate one's children "as one sees fit".

On the other hand, Lamer J., speaking for himself alone in Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, rejected the line of American cases pertaining to contractual liberty, noting that such an extension of the liberty interest had also been subject to criticism in the United States. The text of the Canadian Charter -- which does not mention "property" -- and the context of its adoption were sufficiently different to mandate a distinct interpretation. According to him, s. 7, which appears in the Charter under the heading "Legal Rights", had to be construed in light of the rights enunciated in ss. 8 to 14, which set out traditional criminal law guarantees. Further, the term "liberty" had to be read in conjunction with its modifier, the principles of fundamental justice. Thus, a restriction on liberty had to occur as a result of an interaction with the justice system. Lamer J. appeared to limit "liberty" to its physical dimension, though he would appear to give the expression "security of the person" a somewhat broader ambit. He summarized his position as follows, at pp. 1177-78:

> Put shortly, I am of the view that s. 7 is implicated when the state, by resorting to the justice system, restricts an individual's physical liberty in any circumstances. Section 7 is also implicated when the state restricts individuals' security of the person by interfering with, or removing from them, control over their physical or mental integrity. Finally, s. 7 is implicated when the state, either directly or through its agents, restricts certain privileges or liberties by using the threat of punishment in cases of non-compliance.
> Although this may appear to be a limited reading of s. 7, it is my view that it is neither wise nor necessary to subsume all other rights in the Charter within s. 7. A full and generous interpretation of the Charter that extends the full benefit of its protection to individuals can be achieved without the incorporation of other rights and freedoms within s. 7. [Emphasis in original.]

Lamer J. added, however, that "[t]his is not to say that `liberty' as a value underlying the Charter does not permeate the document in a broader, more general sense, especially as it relates to the maintenance of Canada as a `free and democratic society'" (p. 1179). In that case, Lamer J. was concerned with the narrower issue of "economic liberty" and the right to choose one's profession. The case did not address an issue similar to that raised in the present appeal, where the interest claimed by the appellants is of a different nature altogether, and where the state does use the justice system to restrict it.

Although the English version of the Charter employs two different words, "freedom" and "liberty", both emanate from the same concept. In French, the term "liberté" is used in s. 2 as well as in s. 7.

The above-cited cases give us an important indication of the meaning of the concept of liberty. On the one hand, liberty does not mean unconstrained freedom; see Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486 (per Wilson J., at p. 524); R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713 (per Dickson C.J., at pp. 785-86). Freedom of the individual to do what he or she wishes must, in any organized society, be subjected to numerous constraints for the common good. The state undoubtedly has the right to impose many types of restraints on individual behaviour, and not all limitations will attract Charter scrutiny. On the other hand, liberty does not mean mere freedom from physical restraint. In a free and democratic society, the individual must be left room for personal autonomy to live his or her own life and to make decisions that are of fundamental personal importance. In R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, Wilson J. noted that the liberty interest was rooted in the fundamental concepts of human dignity, personal autonomy, privacy and choice in decisions going to the individual's fundamental being. She stated, at p. 166:

> Thus, an aspect of the respect for human dignity on which the Charter is founded is the right to make fundamental personal decisions without interference from the state. This right is a critical component of the right to liberty. Liberty, as was noted in Singh, is a phrase capable of a broad range of meaning. In my view, this right, properly construed, grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance.

While I was in dissent in that case, I agree with this statement, and, indeed, I later observed in R. v. Beare, 1988 CanLII 126 (SCC), [1988] 2 SCR 387, at p. 412, that I was sympathetic to the view that s. 7 of the Charter included a right to privacy. On this point, the American experience can give us valuable guidance as to the proper meaning and limits of liberty. The United States Supreme Court has given a liberal interpretation to the concept of liberty, as it relates to family matters. It has elevated both the notion of the integrity of the family unit and that of parental rights to the status of constitutional values, through its interpretation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. …

Where to draw the line between interests and regulatory powers falling within the accepted ambit of state authority will often raise difficulty. But much on either side of the line is clear enough. On that basis, I would have thought it plain that the right to nurture a child, to care for its development, and to make decisions for it in fundamental matters such as medical care, are part of the liberty interest of a parent. As observed by Dickson J. in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, the Charter was not enacted in a vacuum or absent a historical context. The common law has long recognized that parents are in the best position to take care of their children and make all the decisions necessary to ensure their well-being. In Hepton v. Maat, 1957 CanLII 18 (SCC), [1957] SCR 606, our Court stated (at p. 607): "The view of the child's welfare conceives it to lie, first, within the warmth and security of the home provided by his parents". This recognition was based on the presumption that parents act in the best interest of their child. The Court did add, however, that "when through a failure, with or without parental fault, to furnish that protection, that welfare is threatened, the community, represented by the Sovereign, is, on the broadest social and national grounds, justified in displacing the parents and assuming their duties" (pp. 607-8). Although the philosophy underlying state intervention has changed over time, most contemporary statutes dealing with child protection matters, and in particular the Ontario Act, while focusing on the best interest of the child, favour minimal intervention. In recent years, courts have expressed some reluctance to interfere with parental rights, and state intervention has been tolerated only when necessity was demonstrated. This only serves to confirm that the parental interest in bringing up, nurturing and caring for a child, including medical care and moral upbringing, is an individual interest of fundamental importance to our society.

The respondents have argued that the "parental liberty" asserted by the appellants is an obligation owed to the child which does not fall within the scope of s. 7 of the Charter. Some decisions seem to give credit to this thesis. In Re C.P.L.(1988), 1988 CanLII 5490 (NL SC), 70 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 287 (Nfld. U.F.C.), for example, a case similar to the present one, Riche J. observed, at p. 303:

> The parents have individual rights which they hold as members of society. With respect to their children, they have obligations or responsibilities. The parents have a right to custody of their children while they are children and for as long as they discharge their obligations to those children. The parents maintain a right to attempt to raise their children in the same religious faith as their's [sic]. As between the parents and the children, the parents have few rights and many obligations.

Riche J. concluded that the right of the child to parental care, rather than the rights of the parents, had been breached in a manner that did not conform to the principles of fundamental justice.

While acknowledging that parents bear responsibilities towards their children, it seems to me that they must enjoy correlative rights to exercise them. The contrary view would not recognize the fundamental importance of choice and personal autonomy in our society. As already stated, the common law has always, in the absence of demonstrated neglect or unsuitability, presumed that parents should make all significant choices affecting their children, and has afforded them a general liberty to do as they choose. This liberty interest is not a parental right tantamount to a right of property in children. (Fortunately, we have distanced ourselves from the ancient juridical conception of children as chattels of their parents.) The state is now actively involved in a number of areas traditionally conceived of as properly belonging to the private sphere. Nonetheless, our society is far from having repudiated the privileged role parents exercise in the upbringing of their children. This role translates into a protected sphere of parental decision-making which is rooted in the presumption that parents should make important decisions affecting their children both because parents are more likely to appreciate the best interests of their children and because the state is ill-equipped to make such decisions itself. Moreover, individuals have a deep personal interest as parents in fostering the growth of their own children. This is not to say that the state cannot intervene when it considers it necessary to safeguard the child's autonomy or health. But such intervention must be justified. In other words, parental decision-making must receive the protection of the Charter in order for state interference to be properly monitored by the courts, and be permitted only when it conforms to the values underlying the Charter.

The respondents also argued that the infant's rights were paramount to those of the appellants and, on that basis alone, state intervention was justified. This was the conclusion reached by Whealy Dist. Ct. J. Children undeniably benefit from the Charter, most notably in its protection of their rights to life and to the security of their person. As children are unable to assert these, our society presumes that parents will exercise their freedom of choice in a manner that does not offend the rights of their children. If one considers the multitude of decisions parents make daily, it is clear that in practice, state interference in order to balance the rights of parents and children will arise only in exceptional cases. In fact, we must accept that parents can, at times, make decisions contrary to their children's wishes -- and rights -- as long as they do not exceed the threshold dictated by public policy, in its broad conception. For instance, it would be difficult to deny that a parent can dictate to his or her child the place where he or she will live, or which school he or she will attend. However, the state can properly intervene in situations where parental conduct falls below the socially acceptable threshold. But in doing so, the state is limiting the constitutional rights of parents rather then vindicating the constitutional rights of children. On this point, N. Bala and J. D. Redfearn, supra, observe, at. p. 301:

> . . . while the state may be justified in limiting parental rights, it is wrong to conceive of this as a situation where the court or state is somehow protecting constitutional rights of the child. Rather this should be viewed as a situation in which the state limits the constitutional rights of parents, and sometimes those of a child, to promote the welfare of the child. . . . However, it seems inappropriate to allow an agency of the state to invoke the Charter of Rights to limit the rights of a citizen. The Charter is intended to protect individuals from the state, not to justify state interference. [Emphasis in original.]

A similar approach, albeit in a different context, was taken in R. v. Keegstra, 1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, where a majority of this Court agreed that it would be inappropriate to limit the scope of an individual's freedom of expression under s. 2(b) by reference to the conflicting s. 15 and s. 27 rights of others.

Once it is decided that the parents have a liberty interest, further balancing of parents' and children's rights should be done in the course of determining whether state interference conforms to the principles of fundamental justice, rather than when defining the scope of the liberty interest. Even assuming that the rights of children can qualify the liberty interest of their parents, that interest exists nonetheless. In the case at bar, the application of the Act deprived the appellants of their right to decide which medical treatment should be administered to their infant. In so doing, the Act has infringed upon the parental "liberty" protected in s. 7 of the Charter. I now propose to determine whether this deprivation was made in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

In the next case, the Supreme Court considers how expansive the right to make fundamental personal choices is.

3.2.2 R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine

R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine*, 2003 SCC 74, [2003] 3 SCR 571

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache and Binnie JJ. was delivered by Gonthier and Binnie JJ

81 The appellant Malmo-Levine argues that smoking marihuana is integral to his preferred lifestyle, and that the criminalization of marihuana in both its possession and trafficking aspects is an unacceptable infringement of his personal liberty.

82 The appellant Caine, on the other hand, takes aim at the potential for imprisonment for conviction of possession of marihuana, and argues that imprisonment for such an offence is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If the penalty falls, he says, the substantive offence must fall with it.

83 These "liberty" interests are, of course, very different. We propose therefore first to identify the s. 7 "interest" properly at stake, then secondly to discuss the applicable principles of fundamental justice. Thirdly we will examine whether the deprivation of the s. 7 interest thus identified is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice relevant to these appeals. As will be seen, we find no s. 7 infringement. It will therefore not be necessary to move to s. 1 to determine if an infringement would be justified in a free and democratic society.

1. The Interests at Stake

84 We say at once that the availability of imprisonment for the offence of simple possession is sufficient to trigger s. 7 scrutiny: Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486. However, Malmo-Levine's position (which is supported by the intervener British Columbia Civil Liberties Association) requires us to address whether broader considerations of personal autonomy, short of imprisonment, are also sufficient to invoke s. 7 protection. The appellant Caine, whose factum talks of the "fun" or "social" use of cannabis, writes, at para. 30:

> It is submitted that a decision whether or not to possess and consume Cannabis (marijuana), even if potentially harmful to the user, is analogous to the decision by an individual as to what food to eat or not eat and whether or not to eat fatty foods, and as such is a decision of fundamental personal importance involving a choice made by the individual involving that individual's personal autonomy.

85 In Morgentaler, supra, Wilson J. suggested that liberty "grants the individual a degree of autonomy in making decisions of fundamental personal importance", "without interference from the state" (p. 166). Liberty accordingly means more than freedom from physical restraint. It includes "the right to an irreducible sphere of personal autonomy wherein individuals may make inherently private choices free from state interference": Godbout v. Longueuil (City), 1997 CanLII 335 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 844, at para. 66; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, 1995 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1995] 1 SCR 315, at para. 80. This is true only to the extent that such matters "can properly be characterized as fundamentally or inherently personal such that, by their very nature, they implicate basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence": Godbout, supra, at para. 66. …

86 While we accept Malmo-Levine's statement that smoking marihuana is central to his lifestyle, the Constitution cannot be stretched to afford protection to whatever activity an individual chooses to define as central to his or her lifestyle. One individual chooses to smoke marihuana; another has an obsessive interest in golf; a third is addicted to gambling. The appellant Caine invokes a taste for fatty foods. A society that extended constitutional protection to any and all such lifestyles would be ungovernable. Lifestyle choices of this order are not, we think, "basic choices going to the core of what it means to enjoy individual dignity and independence" (Godbout, supra, at para. 66).

87 In our view, with respect, Malmo-Levine's desire to build a lifestyle around the recreational use of marihuana does not attract Charter protection. There is no free-standing constitutional right to smoke "pot" for recreational purposes.

3.3 The right to security of the person

The third interest, security of the person, is engaged by state interference with bodily integrity and severe state-imposed psychological distress. The next case considered this interest in the context of abortion, which was criminalized at the time.

3.3.1 R v Morgentaler

R v Morgentaler*, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30

Dickson CJ (Lamer J concurring): …

B. Security of the Person

The law has long recognized that the human body ought to be protected from interference by others. At common law, for example, any medical procedure carried out on a person without that person's consent is an assault. Only in emergency circumstances does the law allow others to make decisions of this nature. Similarly, art. 19 of the Civil Code of Lower Canada provides that "The human person is inviolable" and that "No person may cause harm to the person of another without his consent or without being authorized by law to do so". "Security of the person", in other words, is not a value alien to our legal landscape. With the advent of the Charter, security of the person has been elevated to the status of a constitutional norm. This is not to say that the various forms of protection accorded to the human body by the common and civil law occupy a similar status. "Security of the person" must be given content in a manner sensitive to its constitutional position. The above examples are simply illustrative of our respect for individual physical integrity. (See R. Macdonald, "Procedural Due Process in Canadian Constitutional Law", 39 U. Fla. L. Rev. 217 (1987), at p. 248.) Nor is it to say that the state can never impair personal security interests. There may well be valid reasons for interfering with security of the person. It is to say, however, that if the state does interfere with security of the person, the Charter requires such interference to conform with the principles of fundamental justice.

The appellants submitted that the "security of the person" protected by the Charter is an explicit right to control one's body and to make fundamental decisions about one's life. The Crown contended that "security of the person" is a more circumscribed interest and that, like all of the elements of s. 7, it at most relates to the concept of physical control, simply protecting the individual's interest in his or her bodily integrity.

It may well be that constitutional protection of the above interests is specific to, and is only triggered by, the invocation of our system of criminal justice. It must not be forgotten, however, that s. 251 of the Code, subject to subs. (4), makes it an indictable offence for a person to procure the miscarriage and provides a maximum sentence of two years in the case of the woman herself, and a maximum sentence of life imprisonment in the case of another person. Like Beetz J., I do not find it necessary to decide how s. 7 would apply in other cases.

The case law leads me to the conclusion that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal law context, constitute a breach of security of the person. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether the right extends further, to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy, or interests unrelated to criminal justice.

I wish to reiterate that finding a violation of security of the person does not end the s. 7 inquiry. Parliament could choose to infringe security of the person if it did so in a manner consistent with the principles of fundamental justice. The present discussion should therefore be seen as a threshold inquiry and the conclusions do not dispose definitively of all the issues relevant to s. 7. With that caution, I have no difficulty in concluding that the encyclopedic factual submissions addressed to us by counsel in the present appeal establish beyond any doubt that s. 251 of the Criminal Code is prima facie a violation of the security of the person of thousands of Canadian women who have made the difficult decision that they do not wish to continue with a pregnancy.

At the most basic, physical and emotional level, every pregnant woman is told by the section that she cannot submit to a generally safe medical procedure that might be of clear benefit to her unless she meets criteria entirely unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations. Not only does the removal of decision-making power threaten women in a physical sense; the indecision of knowing whether an abortion will be granted inflicts emotional stress. Section 251 clearly interferes with a woman's bodily integrity in both a physical and emotional sense. Forcing a woman, by threat of criminal sanction, to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations, is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus a violation of security of the person. Section 251, therefore, is required by the Charter to comport with the principles of fundamental justice.

Although this interference with physical and emotional integrity is sufficient in itself to trigger a review of s. 251 against the principles of fundamental justice, the operation of the decision-making mechanism set out in s. 251 creates additional glaring breaches of security of the person. The evidence indicates that s. 251 causes a certain amount of delay for women who are successful in meeting its criteria. In the context of abortion, any unnecessary delay can have profound consequences on the woman's physical and emotional well-being.

It is no doubt true that the overall complication and mortality rates for women who undergo abortions are very low, but the increasing risks caused by delay are so clearly established that I have no difficulty in concluding that the delay in obtaining therapeutic abortions caused by the mandatory procedures of s. 251 is an infringement of the purely physical aspect of the individual's right to security of the person. I should stress that the marked contrast between the relative speed with which abortions can be obtained at the government-sponsored community clinics in Quebec and in hospitals under the s. 251 procedure was established at trial. The evidence indicated that at the government-sponsored clinics in Quebec, the maximum delay was less than a week. One must conclude, and perhaps underline, that the delay experienced by many women seeking a therapeutic abortion, be it of one, two, four, or six weeks' duration, is caused in large measure by the requirements of s. 251 itself.

The above physical interference caused by the delays created by s. 251, involving a clear risk of damage to the physical well-being of a woman, is sufficient, in my view, to warrant inquiring whether s. 251 comports with the principles of fundamental justice. However, there is yet another infringement of security of the person. It is clear from the evidence that s. 251 harms the psychological integrity of women seeking abortions. A 1985 report of the Canadian Medical Association, discussed in the Powell Report, at p. 15, emphasized that the procedure involved in s. 251, with the concomitant delays, greatly increases the stress levels of patients and that this can lead to more physical complications associated with abortion. A specialist in fertility control, Dr. Henry David, was qualified as an expert witness at trial on the psychological impact upon women of delay in the process of obtaining an abortion. He testified that his own studies had demonstrated that there is increased psychological stress imposed upon women who are forced to wait for abortions, and that this stress is compounded by the uncertainty whether or not a therapeutic abortion committee will actually grant approval.

In summary, s. 251 is a law which forces women to carry a foetus to term contrary to their own priorities and aspirations and which imposes serious delay causing increased physical and psychological trauma to those women who meet its criteria. It must, therefore, be determined whether that infringement is accomplished in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, thereby saving s. 251 under the second part of s. 7.

The next case involved the longstanding blanket prohibition on what was then referred to as assisted suicide, contained in section 241(b) of the Criminal Code. This case predates the decision in Carter, introduced earlier in this chapter in relation to the right to life. You may want to think about how and why the Supreme Court's assessment of whether section 241(b) violates section 7 of the Charter changed. At the end of this chapter, you can see how Parliament responded to Carter and consider ongoing constitutional challenges to Canada's current legislative approach to medically assisted death.

3.3.2 Rodriguez v British Columbia (Attorney General)

Rodriguez v British Columbia (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 519

The following facts are taken from the dissenting reasons of Lamer CJ:

I. Facts

The facts of this case are straightforward and well known. Sue Rodriguez is a 42-year-old woman living in British Columbia. She is married and the mother of an 8½-year-old son. Ms. Rodriguez suffers from amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS), which is widely known as Lou Gehrig's disease; her life expectancy is between 2 and 14 months but her condition is rapidly deteriorating. Very soon she will lose the ability to swallow, speak, walk and move her body without assistance. Thereafter she will lose the capacity to breathe without a respirator, to eat without a gastrotomy and will eventually become confined to a bed.

Ms. Rodriguez knows of her condition, the trajectory of her illness and the inevitability of how her life will end; her wish is to control the circumstances, timing and manner of her death. She does not wish to die so long as she still has the capacity to enjoy life. However, by the time she no longer is able to enjoy life, she will be physically unable to terminate her life without assistance. Ms. Rodriguez seeks an order which will allow a qualified medical practitioner to set up technological means by which she might, by her own hand, at the time of her choosing, end her life.

Ms. Rodriguez applied to the Supreme Court of British Columbia for an order that s. 241(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, be declared invalid, pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, on the ground that it violates her rights under ss. 7, 12 and 15(1) of the Charter, and was therefore, to the extent it prohibits a terminally ill person from committing "physician-assisted" suicide, of no force and effect by virtue of s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Melvin J. of the Supreme Court of British Columbia dismissed the appellant's application: (1992), 18 W.C.B. (2d) 279, [1993] B.C.W.L.D. 347. The British Columbia Court of Appeal dismissed the appellant's appeal, McEachern C.J.B.C. dissenting: (1993), 1993 CanLII 1191 (BC CA), 76 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145, 22 B.C.A.C. 266, 38 W.A.C. 266, 14 C.R.R. (2d) 34, 79 C.C.C. (3d) 1, [1993] 3 W.W.R. 553.

The judgment of La Forest, Sopinka, Gonthier, Iacobucci and Major JJ. was delivered by SOPINKA J. -- I have read the reasons of the Chief Justice and those of McLachlin J. herein. The result of the reasons of my colleagues is that all persons who by reason of disability are unable to commit suicide have a right under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms to be free from government interference in procuring the assistance of others to take their life. They are entitled to a constitutional exemption from the operation of s. 241 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, which prohibits the giving of assistance to commit suicide (hereinafter referred to as "assisted suicide"). The exemption would apply during the period that this Court's order would be suspended and thereafter Parliament could only replace the legislation subject to this right. I must respectfully disagree with the conclusion reached by my colleagues and with their reasons. In my view, nothing in the Charter mandates this result which raises the following serious concerns:

1. It recognizes a constitutional right to legally assisted suicide beyond that of any country in the western world, beyond any serious proposal for reform in the western world and beyond the claim made in this very case. The apparent reason for the expansion beyond the claim in this case is that restriction of the right to the terminally ill could not be justified under s. 15.

2. It fails to provide the safeguards which are required either under the Dutch guidelines or the recent proposals for reform in the states of Washington and California which were defeated by voters in those states principally because comparable and even more stringent safeguards were considered inadequate.

3. The conditions imposed are vague and in some respects unenforceable. While the proposals in California were criticized for failure to specify the type of physician who is authorized to assist and the Dutch guidelines specify the treating physician, the conditions imposed by my colleagues do not require that the person assisting be a physician or impose any restriction in this regard. Since much of the medical profession is opposed to being involved in assisting suicide because it is antithetical to their role as healers of the sick, many doctors will refuse to assist, leaving open the potential for the growth of a macabre specialty in this area reminiscent of Dr. Kervorkian and his suicide machine.

4. To add to the uncertainty of the conditions, they are to serve merely as guidelines, leaving it to individual judges to decide upon application whether to grant or withhold the right to commit suicide. In the case of the appellant, the remedy proposed by the Chief Justice, concurred in by McLachlin J., would not require such an application. She alone is to decide that the conditions or guidelines are complied with. Any judicial review of this decision would only occur if she were to commit suicide and a charge were laid against the person who assisted her. The reasons of McLachlin J. remove any requirement to monitor the choice made by the appellant to commit suicide so that the act might occur after the last expression of the desire to commit suicide is stale-dated.

I have concluded that the conclusion of my colleagues cannot be supported under the provisions of the Charter. Reliance was placed on ss. 7, 12 and 15 and I will examine each in turn.

Section 7

The most substantial issue in this appeal is whether s. 241(b) infringes s. 7 in that it inhibits the appellant in controlling the timing and manner of her death. I conclude that while the section impinges on the security interest of the appellant, any resulting deprivation is not contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. I would come to the same conclusion with respect to any liberty interest which may be involved.

Section 7 of the Charter provides as follows:

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

The appellant argues that, by prohibiting anyone from assisting her to end her life when her illness has rendered her incapable of terminating her life without such assistance, by threat of criminal sanction, s. 241(b) deprives her of both her liberty and her security of the person. The appellant asserts that her application is based upon (a) the right to live her remaining life with the inherent dignity of a human person, (b) the right to control what happens to her body while she is living, and (c) the right to be free from governmental interference in making fundamental personal decisions concerning the terminal stages of her life. The first two of these asserted rights can be seen to invoke both liberty and security of the person; the latter is more closely associated with only the liberty interest.

(a) Life, Liberty and Security of the Person

The appellant seeks a remedy which would assure her some control over the time and manner of her death. While she supports her claim on the ground that her liberty and security of the person interests are engaged, a consideration of these interests cannot be divorced from the sanctity of life, which is one of the three Charter values protected by s. 7.

None of these values prevail a priori over the others. All must be taken into account in determining the content of the principles of fundamental justice and there is no basis for imposing a greater burden on the propounder of one value as against that imposed on another.

Section 7 involves two stages of analysis. The first is as to the values at stake with respect to the individual. The second is concerned with possible limitations of those values when considered in conformity with fundamental justice. In assessing the first aspect, we may do so by considering whether there has been a violation of Ms. Rodriguez's security of the person and we must consider this in light of the other values I have mentioned.

As a threshold issue, I do not accept the submission that the appellant's problems are due to her physical disabilities caused by her terminal illness, and not by governmental action. There is no doubt that the prohibition in s. 241(b) will contribute to the appellant's distress if she is prevented from managing her death in the circumstances which she fears will occur. Nor do I accept the submission that the appellant cannot avail herself of s. 7 because she is not presently engaged in interaction with the criminal justice system, and that she will likely never be so engaged. It was argued that the comments concerning security of the person found in R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, and the Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123, were not applicable to this case and that the appellant could not seek the protection of s. 7 at all, as that section is concerned with the interaction of the individual with the justice system. In my view, the fact that it is the criminal prohibition in s. 241(b) which has the effect of depriving the appellant of the ability to end her life when she is no longer able to do so without assistance is a sufficient interaction with the justice system to engage the provisions of s. 7 assuming a security interest is otherwise involved.

I find more merit in the argument that security of the person, by its nature, cannot encompass a right to take action that will end one's life as security of the person is intrinsically concerned with the well-being of the living person. This argument focuses on the generally held and deeply rooted belief in our society that human life is sacred or inviolable (which terms I use in the non-religious sense described by Dworkin (Life's Dominion: An Argument About Abortion, Euthanasia, and Individual Freedom (1993)) to mean that human life is seen to have a deep intrinsic value of its own). As members of a society based upon respect for the intrinsic value of human life and on the inherent dignity of every human being, can we incorporate within the Constitution which embodies our most fundamental values a right to terminate one's own life in any circumstances? This question in turn evokes other queries of fundamental importance such as the degree to which our conception of the sanctity of life includes notions of quality of life as well.

Sanctity of life, as we will see, has been understood historically as excluding freedom of choice in the self-infliction of death and certainly in the involvement of others in carrying out that choice. At the very least, no new consensus has emerged in society opposing the right of the state to regulate the involvement of others in exercising power over individuals ending their lives.

The appellant suggests that for the terminally ill, the choice is one of time and manner of death rather than death itself since the latter is inevitable. I disagree. Rather it is one of choosing death instead of allowing natural forces to run their course. The time and precise manner of death remain unknown until death actually occurs. There can be no certainty in forecasting the precise circumstances of a death. Death is, for all mortals, inevitable. Even when death appears imminent, seeking to control the manner and timing of one's death constitutes a conscious choice of death over life. It follows that life as a value is engaged even in the case of the terminally ill who seek to choose death over life.

Indeed, it has been abundantly pointed out that such persons are particularly vulnerable as to their life and will to live and great concern has been expressed as to their adequate protection, as will be further set forth.

I do not draw from this that in such circumstances life as a value must prevail over security of person or liberty as these have been understood under the Charter, but that it is one of the values engaged in the present case.

What, then, can security of the person be said to encompass in the context of this case? The starting point for the answer to this question is Morgentaler, supra, in which this Court struck down Criminal Code provisions which had the effect of preventing women access to therapeutic abortion unless they complied with an administrative scheme found to be contrary to principles of fundamental justice. In finding a violation of security of the person, Beetz J. held, at p. 90, that:

> "Security of the person" must include a right of access to medical treatment for a condition representing a danger to life or health without fear of criminal sanction.

Whether or not Beetz J. can be said to have restricted his reasoning to criminal prohibitions limiting access to medical treatment which improves health, he made it clear (at p. 90) that his reasons should not be taken as delineating the bounds of s. 7 in other contexts. In any event, Dickson C.J. does not appear to have limited his reasons in this manner. The former Chief Justice stated as follows, at pp. 54-57:

> Canadian courts have already had occasion to address the scope of the interest protected under the rubric of "security of the person". In R. v. Caddedu (1982), 1982 CanLII 2138 (ON SC), 40 O.R. (2d) 128, at p. 139, the Ontario High Court emphasized that the right to security of the person, like each aspect of s. 7, is a basic right, the deprivation of which has severe consequences for an individual. This characterization was approved by this Court in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, at p. 501. The Ontario Court of Appeal has held that the right to life, liberty and security of the person "would appear to relate to one's physical or mental integrity and one's control over these..." (R. v. Videoflicks Ltd. (1984), 1984 CanLII 44 (ON CA), 48 O.R. (2d) 395, at p. 433.)
>
> The case law leads me to the conclusion that state interference with bodily integrity and serious state-imposed psychological stress, at least in the criminal law context, constitute a breach of the security of the person. It is not necessary in this case to determine whether the right extends further, to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy, or interests unrelated to criminal justice.
> Although this interference with physical and emotional integrity is sufficient in itself to trigger a review of s. 251 against the principles of fundamental justice, the operation of the decision-making mechanism set out in s. 251 creates additional glaring breaches of security of the person. [Emphasis added.]

Wilson J. took a broader view, preferring to decide the case under the rubric of the liberty interest in s. 7. Nonetheless, she agreed that security of the person "protects both the physical and psychological integrity of the individual" and that state control over the woman's capacity to reproduce "is a direct interference with her physical "person" as well" (p. 173).

> In my view, then, the judgments of this Court in Morgentaler can be seen to encompass a notion of personal autonomy involving, at the very least, control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference and freedom from state-imposed psychological and emotional stress. In Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), supra, Lamer J. also expressed this view, stating at p. 1177 that "[s]ection 7 is also implicated when the state restricts individuals' security of the person by interfering with, or removing from them, control over their physical or mental integrity". There is no question, then, that personal autonomy, at least with respect to the right to make choices concerning one's own body, control over one's physical and psychological integrity, and basic human dignity are encompassed within security of the person, at least to the extent of freedom from criminal prohibitions which interfere with these.
> The effect of the prohibition in s. 241(b) is to prevent the appellant from having assistance to commit suicide when she is no longer able to do so on her own. She fears that she will be required to live until the deterioration from her disease is such that she will die as a result of choking, suffocation or pneumonia caused by aspiration of food or secretions. She will be totally dependent upon machines to perform her bodily functions and completely dependent upon others. Throughout this time, she will remain mentally competent and able to appreciate all that is happening to her. Although palliative care may be available to ease the pain and other physical discomfort which she will experience, the appellant fears the sedating effects of such drugs and argues, in any event, that they will not prevent the psychological and emotional distress which will result from being in a situation of utter dependence and loss of dignity. That there is a right to choose how one's body will be dealt with, even in the context of beneficial medical treatment, has long been recognized by the common law. To impose medical treatment on one who refuses it constitutes battery, and our common law has recognized the right to demand that medical treatment which would extend life be withheld or withdrawn. In my view, these considerations lead to the conclusion that the prohibition in s. 241(b) deprives the appellant of autonomy over her person and causes her physical pain and psychological stress in a manner which impinges on the security of her person. The appellant's security interest (considered in the context of the life and liberty interest) is therefore engaged, and it is necessary to determine whether there has been any deprivation thereof that is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

The majority in Rodriguez found that while the prohibition engaged section 7, the deprivation did not fail to accord with principles of fundamental justice, ultimately upholding s 241(b) as constitutional. Four judges dissented in Rodriguez, including McLachlin JJ (as she then was), later part of the unanimous court that found the same provision unconstitutional in Carter.

We now turn to a more recent case involving criminal prohibitions on the commercial exchange of sex, referred to throughout the case as prostitution, a word that has largely fallen out of favour. While many now prefer to use the term sex work, that term is not always synonymous with the activity captured by criminal laws targeting only commercial acts involving sexual touching. For a discussion of the conceptual distinction, see Debra M Haak, "Re(de)fining Prostitution and Sex Work: Conceptual Clarity for Legal Thinking" (2019) 40 WRLSI 67. This is another area where the Charter and section 7 have played an important role in shaping policy. We consider it here for its contribution to our understanding of security of the person. We will revisit Bedford later in this chapter when considering the principles of fundamental justice and the Charter dialogue between the judiciary and the legislature that followed that decision.

3.3.3 Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford

Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford*, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 SCR 1101

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] The Chief Justice — It is not a crime in Canada to sell sex for money. However, it is a crime to keep a bawdy-house, to live on the avails of prostitution or to communicate in public with respect to a proposed act of prostitution. It is argued that these restrictions on prostitution put the safety and lives of prostitutes at risk, and are therefore unconstitutional.

[2] These appeals and the cross-appeal are not about whether prostitution should be legal or not. They are about whether the laws Parliament has enacted on how prostitution may be carried out pass constitutional muster. I conclude that they do not. I would therefore make a suspended declaration of invalidity, returning the question of how to deal with prostitution to Parliament.

1. The Case

[3] Three applicants, all current or former prostitutes, brought an application seeking declarations that three provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, are unconstitutional.

[4] The three impugned provisions criminalize various activities related to prostitution. They are primarily concerned with preventing public nuisance, as well as the exploitation of prostitutes. Section 210 makes it an offence to be an inmate of a bawdy-house, to be found in a bawdy-house without lawful excuse, or to be an owner, landlord, lessor, tenant, or occupier of a place who knowingly permits it to be used as a bawdy-house. Section 212(1)(j) makes it an offence to live on the avails of another's prostitution. Section 213(1)(c) makes it an offence to either stop or attempt to stop, or communicate or attempt to communicate with, someone in a public place for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or hiring a prostitute.

[5] However, prostitution itself is not illegal. It is not against the law to exchange sex for money. Under the existing regime, Parliament has confined lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and "out-calls" — where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home. This reflects a policy choice on Parliament's part. Parliament is not precluded from imposing limits on where and how prostitution may be conducted, as long as it does so in a way that does not infringe the constitutional rights of prostitutes.

[6] The applicants allege that all three provisions infringe s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by preventing prostitutes from implementing certain safety measures — such as hiring security guards or "screening" potential clients — that could protect them from violent clients. The applicants also allege that s. 213(1)(c) infringes s. 2(b) of the Charter, and that none of the provisions are saved under s. 1.

[18] In considering the legislative scheme as it exists and the evidence before her, Himel J. found that each of the impugned laws deprived the applicants and others like them of their liberty (by reason of potential imprisonment) and their security of the person (because they increased the risk of injury). The increased risk of violence created by the laws constituted a "sufficient" cause, engaging the security of the person protected by s. 7. She stated:

> With respect to s. 210, the evidence suggests that working in-call is the safest way to sell sex; yet, prostitutes who attempt to increase their level of safety by working in-call face criminal sanction. With respect to s. 212(1)(j), prostitution, including legal out-call work, may be made less dangerous if a prostitute is allowed to hire an assistant or a bodyguard; yet, such business relationships are illegal due to the living on the avails of prostitution provision. Finally, s. 213(1)(c) prohibits street prostitutes, who are largely the most vulnerable prostitutes and face an alarming amount of violence, from screening clients at an early, and crucial stage of a potential transaction, thereby putting them at an increased risk of violence.
> In conclusion, these three provisions prevent prostitutes from taking precautions, some extremely rudimentary, that can decrease the risk of violence towards them. Prostitutes are faced with deciding between their liberty and their security of the person. Thus, while it is ultimately the client who inflicts violence upon a prostitute, in my view the law plays a sufficient contributory role in preventing a prostitute from taking steps that could reduce the risk of such violence. [paras. 361-62]

[57] In the discussion that follows, I first consider whether the applicants have established that the impugned laws impose limits on security of the person, thus engaging s. 7. I then examine the argument of the appellant Attorneys General that the laws do not cause the alleged harms. I go on to consider whether any limits on security of the person are in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(1) Is Security of the Person Engaged?

[58] Section 7 provides that the state cannot deny a person's right to life, liberty or security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. At this stage, the question is whether the impugned laws negatively impact or limit the applicants' security of the person, thus bringing them within the ambit of, or engaging, s. 7 of the Charter.

[59] Here, the applicants argue that the prohibitions on bawdy-houses, living on the avails of prostitution, and communicating in public for the purposes of prostitution, heighten the risks they face in prostitution — itself a legal activity. The application judge found that the evidence supported this proposition and the Court of Appeal agreed.

[60] For reasons set out below, I am of the same view. The prohibitions at issue do not merely impose conditions on how prostitutes operate. They go a critical step further, by imposing dangerous conditions on prostitution; they prevent people engaged in a risky — but legal — activity from taking steps to protect themselves from the risks.

(a) Sections 197 and 210: Keeping a Common Bawdy-House

[61] It is not an offence to sell sex for money. The bawdy-house provisions, however, make it an offence to do so in any "place" that is "kept or occupied" or "resorted to" for the purpose of prostitution (ss. 197 and 210(1) of the Code). The reach of these provisions is broad. "Place" includes any defined space, even if unenclosed and used only temporarily (s. 197(1) of the Code; R. v. Pierce (1982), 1982 CanLII 2153 (ON CA), 37 O.R. (2d) 721 (C.A.)). And by definition, it applies even if resorted to by only one person (s. 197(1); R. v. Worthington (1972), 1972 CanLII 1334 (ON CA), 10 C.C.C. (2d) 311 (Ont. C.A.)).

[62] The practical effect of s. 210 is to confine lawful prostitution to two categories: street prostitution and out-calls (application decision, at para. 385). In-calls, where the john comes to the prostitute's residence, are prohibited. Out-calls, where the prostitute goes out and meets the client at a designated location, such as the client's home, are allowed. Working on the street is also permitted, though the practice of street prostitution is significantly limited by the prohibition on communicating in public (s. 213(1)(c)).

[63] The application judge found, on a balance of probabilities, that the safest form of prostitution is working independently from a fixed location (para. 300). She concluded that indoor work is far less dangerous than street prostitution — a finding that the evidence amply supports. She also concluded that out-call work is not as safe as in-call work, particularly under the current regime where prostitutes are precluded by virtue of the living on the avails provision from hiring a driver or security guard. Since the bawdy-house provision makes the safety-enhancing method of in-call prostitution illegal, the application judge concluded that the bawdy-house prohibition materially increased the risk prostitutes face under the present regime. I agree.

[64] First, the prohibition prevents prostitutes from working in a fixed indoor location, which would be safer than working on the streets or meeting clients at different locations, especially given the current prohibition on hiring drivers or security guards. This, in turn, prevents prostitutes from having a regular clientele and from setting up indoor safeguards like receptionists, assistants, bodyguards and audio room monitoring, which would reduce risks (application decision, at para. 421). Second, it interferes with provision of health checks and preventive health measures. Finally — a point developed in argument before us — the bawdy-house prohibition prevents resort to safe houses, to which prostitutes working on the street can take clients. In Vancouver, for example, "Grandma's House" was established to support street workers in the Downtown Eastside, at about the same time as fears were growing that a serial killer was prowling the streets — fears which materialized in the notorious Robert Pickton. Street prostitutes — who the application judge found are largely the most vulnerable class of prostitutes, and who face an alarming amount of violence (para. 361) — were able to bring clients to Grandma's House. However, charges were laid under s. 210, and although the charges were eventually stayed — four years after they were laid — Grandma's House was shut down (supplementary affidavit of Dr. John Lowman, May 6, 2009, J.A.R., vol. 20, at p. 5744). For some prostitutes, particularly those who are destitute, safe houses such as Grandma's House may be critical. For these people, the ability to work in brothels or hire security, even if those activities were lawful, may be illusory.

[65] I conclude, therefore, that the bawdy-house provision negatively impacts the security of the person of prostitutes and engages s. 7 of the Charter.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

[66] Section 212(1)(j) criminalizes living on the avails of prostitution of another person, wholly or in part. While targeting parasitic relationships (R. v. Downey, 1992 CanLII 109 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 10), it has a broad reach. As interpreted by the courts, it makes it a crime for anyone to supply a service to a prostitute, because she is a prostitute (R. v. Grilo (1991), 1991 CanLII 7241 (ON CA), 2 O.R. (3d) 514 (C.A.); R. v. Barrow (2001), 2001 CanLII 8550 (ON CA), 54 O.R. (3d) 417 (C.A.)). In effect, it prevents a prostitute from hiring bodyguards, drivers and receptionists. The application judge found that by denying prostitutes access to these security-enhancing safeguards, the law prevented them from taking steps to reduce the risks they face and negatively impacted their security of the person (para. 361). As such, she found that the law engages s. 7 of the Charter.

[67] The evidence amply supports the judge's conclusion. Hiring drivers, receptionists, and bodyguards, could increase prostitutes' safety (application decision, at para. 421), but the law prevents them from doing so. Accordingly, I conclude that s. 212(1)(j) negatively impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in a Public Place

[68] Section 213(1)(c) prohibits communicating or attempting to communicate for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute, in a public place or a place open to public view. The provision extends to conduct short of verbal communication by prohibiting stopping or attempting to stop any person for those purposes (R. v. Head (1987), 1987 CanLII 2823 (BC CA), 59 C.R. (3d) 80 (B.C.C.A.)).

[69] The application judge found that face-to-face communication is an "essential tool" in enhancing street prostitutes' safety (para. 432). Such communication, which the law prohibits, allows prostitutes to screen prospective clients for intoxication or propensity to violence, which can reduce the risks they face (paras. 301 and 421). This conclusion, based on the evidence before her, sufficed to engage security of the person under s. 7.

[70] The application judge also found that the communicating law has had the effect of displacing prostitutes from familiar areas, where they may be supported by friends and regular customers, to more isolated areas, thereby making them more vulnerable (paras. 331 and 502).

[71] On the evidence accepted by the application judge, the law prohibits communication that would allow street prostitutes to increase their safety. By prohibiting communicating in public for the purpose of prostitution, the law prevents prostitutes from screening clients and setting terms for the use of condoms or safe houses. In these ways, it significantly increases the risks they face.

[72] I conclude that the evidence supports the application judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) impacts security of the person and engages s. 7.

We will return again to Bedford when we consider principles of fundamental justice.

Last in our consideration of the interests protected by section 7, we return to Carter, where we see the Court considering liberty and security of the person together. Are you able to clearly distinguish between these rights?

3.3.4 Carter v Canada (Attorney General)

Carter v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 331; 2015 SCC 5

(2) Liberty and Security of the Person

[64] Underlying both of these rights is a concern for the protection of individual autonomy and dignity. Liberty protects "the right to make fundamental personal choices free from state interference": Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 SCR 307, at para. 54. Security of the person encompasses "a notion of personal autonomy involving . . . control over one's bodily integrity free from state interference" (Rodriguez, at pp. 587-88, per Sopinka J., referring to R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30) and it is engaged by state interference with an individual's physical or psychological integrity, including any state action that causes physical or serious psychological suffering (New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 46, at para. 58; Blencoe, at paras. 55-57; Chaoulli, at para. 43, per Deschamps J.; para. 119, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.). While liberty and security of the person are distinct interests, for the purpose of this appeal they may be considered together.

[65] The trial judge concluded that the prohibition on assisted dying limited Ms. Taylor's s. 7 right to liberty and security of the person, by interfering with "fundamentally important and personal medical decision-making" (para. 1302), imposing pain and psychological stress and depriving her of control over her bodily integrity (paras. 1293-94). She found that the prohibition left people like Ms. Taylor to suffer physical or psychological pain and imposed stress due to the unavailability of physician-assisted dying, impinging on her security of the person. She further noted that seriously and irremediably ill persons were "denied the opportunity to make a choice that may be very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity" and that is "consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326).

[66] We agree with the trial judge. An individual's response to a grievous and irremediable medical condition is a matter critical to their dignity and autonomy. The law allows people in this situation to request palliative sedation, refuse artificial nutrition and hydration, or request the removal of life-sustaining medical equipment, but denies them the right to request a physician's assistance in dying. This interferes with their ability to make decisions concerning their bodily integrity and medical care and thus trenches on liberty. And, by leaving people like Ms. Taylor to endure intolerable suffering, it impinges on their security of the person.

[67] The law has long protected patient autonomy in medical decision-making. In A.C. v. Manitoba (Director of Child and Family Services), 2009 SCC 30, [2009] 2 SCR 181, a majority of this Court, per Abella J. (the dissent not disagreeing on this point), endorsed the "tenacious relevance in our legal system of the principle that competent individuals are — and should be — free to make decisions about their bodily integrity" (para. 39). This right to "decide one's own fate" entitles adults to direct the course of their own medical care (para. 40): it is this principle that underlies the concept of "informed consent" and is protected by s. 7's guarantee of liberty and security of the person (para. 100; see also R. v. Parker (2000), 2000 CanLII 5762 (ON CA), 49 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.)). As noted in Fleming v. Reid (1991), 1991 CanLII 2728 (ON CA), 4 O.R. (3d) 74 (C.A.), the right of medical self-determination is not vitiated by the fact that serious risks or consequences, including death, may flow from the patient's decision. It is this same principle that is at work in the cases dealing with the right to refuse consent to medical treatment, or to demand that treatment be withdrawn or discontinued…

[68] In Blencoe, a majority of the Court held that the s. 7 liberty interest is engaged "where state compulsions or prohibitions affect important and fundamental life choices" (para. 49). In A.C., where the claimant sought to refuse a potentially lifesaving blood transfusion on religious grounds, Binnie J. noted that we may "instinctively recoil" from the decision to seek death because of our belief in the sanctity of human life (para. 219). But his response is equally relevant here: it is clear that anyone who seeks physician-assisted dying because they are suffering intolerably as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition "does so out of a deeply personal and fundamental belief about how they wish to live, or cease to live" (ibid.). The trial judge, too, described this as a decision that, for some people, is "very important to their sense of dignity and personal integrity, that is consistent with their lifelong values and that reflects their life's experience" (para. 1326). This is a decision that is rooted in their control over their bodily integrity; it represents their deeply personal response to serious pain and suffering. By denying them the opportunity to make that choice, the prohibition impinges on their liberty and security of the person. As noted above, s. 7 recognizes the value of life, but it also honours the role that autonomy and dignity play at the end of that life. We therefore conclude that ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code, insofar as they prohibit physician-assisted dying for competent adults who seek such assistance as a result of a grievous and irremediable medical condition that causes enduring and intolerable suffering, infringe the rights to liberty and security of the person.

[69] We note, as the trial judge did, that Lee Carter and Hollis Johnson's interest in liberty may be engaged by the threat of criminal sanction for their role in Kay Carter's death in Switzerland. However, this potential deprivation was not the focus of the arguments raised at trial, and neither Ms. Carter nor Mr. Johnson sought a personal remedy before this Court. Accordingly, we have confined ourselves to the rights of those who seek assistance in dying, rather than of those who might provide such assistance.

3.4 Causation

What is the required degree of connection between legislative action and any limits to section 7 guarantees? The Supreme Court clarified this in Bedford.

3.4.1 Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford

Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford*, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 SCR 1101

[73] For the reasons discussed above, the application judge concluded — and I agree — that the impugned laws negatively impact and thus engage security of the person rights of prostitutes. However, the appellant Attorneys General contend that s. 7 is not engaged because there is an insufficient causal connection between the laws and the risks faced by prostitutes. First, they argue that the courts below erroneously measured causation by an attenuated standard. Second, they argue that it is the choice of the applicants to engage in prostitution, rather than the law, that is the causal source of the harms they face. These arguments cannot succeed.

(a) The Nature of the Required Causal Connection

[74] Three possible standards for causation are raised for our consideration: (1) "sufficient causal connection", adopted by the application judge (paras. 287-88); (2) a general "impact" approach, adopted by the Court of Appeal (paras. 108-9); and (3) "active and foreseeable" and "direct" causal connection, urged by the appellant Attorneys General (A.G. of Canada factum, at paras. 64-68; A.G. of Ontario factum, at paras. 12-17).

[75] I conclude that the "sufficient causal connection" standard should prevail. This is a flexible standard, which allows the circumstances of each particular case to be taken into account. Adopted in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 SCR 307, and applied in a number of subsequent cases (see, e.g., United States v. Burns, 2001 SCC 7, [2001] 1 SCR 283; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 SCR 3), it posits the need for "a sufficient causal connection between the state-caused [effect] and the prejudice suffered by the [claimant]" for s. 7 to be engaged (Blencoe, at para. 60 (emphasis added)).

[78] Finally, from a practical perspective, a sufficient causal connection represents a fair and workable threshold for engaging s. 7 of the Charter. This is the port of entry for s. 7 claims. The claimant bears the burden of establishing this connection. Even if established, it does not end the inquiry, since the claimant must go on to show that the deprivation of her security of the person is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Although mere speculation will not suffice to establish causation, to set the bar too high risks barring meritorious claims. What is required is a sufficient connection, having regard to the context of the case.

(b) Is the Causal Connection Negated by Choice or the Role of Third Parties?

[79] The Attorneys General of Canada and Ontario argue that prostitutes choose to engage in an inherently risky activity. They can avoid both the risk inherent in prostitution and any increased risk that the laws impose simply by choosing not to engage in this activity. They say that choice — and not the law — is the real cause of their injury.

[85] For the following reasons, I cannot accept the argument that it is not the law, but rather prostitutes' choice and third parties, that cause the risks complained of in this case.

[86] First, while some prostitutes may fit the description of persons who freely choose (or at one time chose) to engage in the risky economic activity of prostitution, many prostitutes have no meaningful choice but to do so. …Realistically, while they may retain some minimal power of choice — what the Attorney General of Canada called "constrained choice" (transcript, at p. 22) — these are not people who can be said to be truly "choosing" a risky line of business (see PHS, at paras. 97-101).

[87] Second, even accepting that there are those who freely choose to engage in prostitution, it must be remembered that prostitution — the exchange of sex for money — is not illegal. The causal question is whether the impugned laws make this lawful activity more dangerous. …

[88] Nor is it accurate to say that the claim in this case is a veiled assertion of a positive right to vocational safety. The applicants are not asking the government to put into place measures making prostitution safe. Rather, they are asking this Court to strike down legislative provisions that aggravate the risk of disease, violence and death.

[89] It makes no difference that the conduct of pimps and johns is the immediate source of the harms suffered by prostitutes. The impugned laws deprive people engaged in a risky, but legal, activity of the means to protect themselves against those risks. The violence of a john does not diminish the role of the state in making a prostitute more vulnerable to that violence.

[92] For all these reasons, I reject the arguments of the Attorneys General that the cause of the harm is not the impugned laws, but rather the actions of third parties and the prostitutes' choice to engage in prostitution. As I concluded above, the laws engage s. 7 of the Charter. That conclusion remains undisturbed.

4 Principles of fundamental justice

4.1 What is a principle of fundamental justice?

For a claimant to establish that government action has deprived them of their life, liberty, or security of the person in a manner which limits their section 7 Charter right, the claimant must show that any deprivation of one of those protected interests was done in a way that does not accord with a principle of fundamental justice. Early in its Charter jurisprudence, the Supreme Court adopted a broad understanding of the principles of fundamental justice. In the BC Motor Vehicle Reference, Justice Lamer (writing for the majority) addressed the debate as to whether the principles of fundamental justice could be substantive or, whether they were purely procedural in nature. As readers will see in the following extract, Justice Lamer concluded that the principles of fundamental justice could be either procedural or substantive.

4.1.1 Re BC Motor Vehicle Act

Re BC Motor Vehicle Act*, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC); [1985] 2 SCR 486

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Beetz, Chouinard, Lamer and Le Dain JJ. was delivered by

1. Lamer J.--

Introduction

2. A law that has the potential to convict a person who has not really done anything wrong offends the principles of fundamental justice and, if imprisonment is available as a penalty, such a law then violates a person's right to liberty under s. 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms (Constitution Act, 1982 , as enacted by the Canada Act, 1982, 1982 (U.K.), c. 11).

3. In other words, absolute liability and imprisonment cannot be combined.

The Facts

4. On August 16, 1982, the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of British Columbia referred the following question to the Court of Appeal of that province, by virtue of s. 1 of the Constitutional Question Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 63:

> Is s. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, as amended by the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982, consistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

5. On February 3, 1983, the Court of Appeal handed down reasons in answer to the question in which it stated that s. 94(2) of the Act is inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: (1983), 1983 CanLII 268 (BC CA), 42 B.C.L.R. 364, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 539, 4 C.C.C. (3d) 243, 33 C.R. (3d) 22, 5 C.R.R. 148, 19 M.V.R. 63, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 756. The Attorney General for British Columbia launched an appeal to this Court.

The Legislation

6. Motor Vehicle Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 288, s. 94, as amended by the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982, 1982 (B.C.), c. 36, s. 19:

> 94. (1) A person who drives a motor vehicle on a highway or industrial road while
> (a) he is prohibited from driving a motor vehicle under sections 90, 91, 92 or 92.1, or
> (b) his driver's licence or his right to apply for or obtain a driver's licence is suspended under section 82 or 92 as it was before its repeal and replacement came into force pursuant to the Motor Vehicle Amendment Act, 1982, > commits an offence and is liable,
> (c) on a first conviction, to a fine of not less than $300 and not more than $2 000 and to imprisonment for not less than 7 days and not more than 6 months, and
> (d) on a subsequent conviction, regardless of when the contravention occurred, to a fine Of not less than $300 and not more than $2 000 and to imprisonment for not less than 14 days and not more than one year.
> (2) Subsection (1) creates an absolute liability offence in which guilt is established by proof of driving, whether or not the defendant knew of the prohibition or suspension.

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; Constitution Act, 1982:

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

7. Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

11. Any person charged with an offence has the right

...

(d) to be presumed innocent until proven guilty according to law in a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal;

52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

3. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

23. … The outcome of this case is dependent upon the meaning to be given to that portion of the section which states "and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice". …

25. Given that, as the Attorney General for Ontario has acknowledged, "when one reads the phrase 'principles of fundamental justice', a single incontrovertible meaning is not apparent", its meaning must, in my view, be determined by reference to the interests which those words of the section are designed to protect and the particular role of the phrase within the section. As a qualifier, the phrase serves to establish the parameters of the interests but it cannot be interpreted so narrowly as to frustrate or stultify them. For the narrower the meaning given to "principles of fundamental justice" the greater will be the possibility that individuals may be deprived of these most basic rights. This latter result is to be avoided given that the rights involved are as fundamental as those which pertain to the life, liberty and security of the person, the deprivation of which "has the most severe consequences upon an individual" (R. v. Cadeddu (1982), 1982 CanLII 2138 (ON SC), 40 O.R. (2d) 128 (H.C.), at p. 139).

26. For these reasons, I am of the view that it would be wrong to interpret the term "fundamental justice" as being synonymous with natural justice as the Attorney General of British Columbia and others have suggested. To do so would strip the protected interests of much, if not most, of their content and leave the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in a sorely emaciated state. Such a result would be inconsistent with the broad, affirmative language in which those rights are expressed and equally inconsistent with the approach adopted by this Court toward the interpretation of Charter rights in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, 1984 CanLII 3 (SCC), [1984] 1 SCR 357, per Estey J., and Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra.

27. It would mean that the right to liberty would be narrower than the right not to be arbitrarily detained or imprisoned (s. 9), that the right to security of the person would have less content than the right to be secure against unreasonable search or seizure (s. 8). Such an interpretation would give the specific expressions of the "right to life, liberty and security of the person" which are set forth in ss. 8 to 14 greater content than the general concept from which they originate.

28. Sections 8 to 14, in other words, address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are designed to protect, in a specific manner and setting, the right to life, liberty and security of the person set forth in s. 7. It would be incongruous to interpret s. 7 more narrowly than the rights in ss. 8 to 14. The alternative, which is to interpret all of ss. 8 to 14 in a "narrow and technical" manner for the sake of congruity, is out of the question (Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, supra, at p. 366).

29. Sections 8 to 14 are illustrative of deprivations of those rights to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice. For they, in effect, illustrate some of the parameters of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person; they are examples of instances in which the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person would be violated in a manner which is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. To put matters in a different way, ss. 7 to 14 could have been fused into one section, with inserted between the words of s. 7 and the rest of those sections the oft utilised provision in our statutes, "and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing (s. 7) the following shall be deemed to be in violation of a person's rights under this section". Clearly, some of those sections embody principles that are beyond what could be characterized as "procedural".

30. Thus, ss. 8 to 14 provide an invaluable key to the meaning of "principles of fundamental justice". Many have been developed over time as presumptions of the common law, others have found expression in the international conventions on human rights. All have been recognized as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in "the dignity and worth of the human person" (preamble to the Canadian Bill of Rights, R.S.C. 1970, App. III) and on "the rule of law" (preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms).

31. It is this common thread which, in my view, must guide us in determining the scope and content of "principles of fundamental justice". In other words, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system. Such an approach to the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" is consistent with the wording and structure of s. 7, the context of the section, i.e., ss. 8 to 14, and the character and larger objects of the Charter itself. It provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee all the while avoiding adjudication of policy matters.

32. Thus, it seems to me that to replace "fundamental justice" with the term "natural justice" misses the mark entirely. It was, after all, clearly open to the legislator to use the term natural justice, a known term of art, but such was not done. We must, as a general rule, be loath to exchange the terms actually used with terms so obviously avoided.

33. Whatever may have been the degree of synonymy between the two expressions in the past, (which in any event has not been clearly demonstrated by the parties and interveners), as of the last few decades this country has given a precise meaning to the words natural justice for the purpose of delineating the responsibility of adjudicators (in the wide sense of the word) in the field of administrative law.

34. It is, in my view, that precise and somewhat narrow meaning that the legislator avoided, clearly indicating thereby a will to give greater content to the words "principles of fundamental justice", the limits of which were left for the courts to develop but within, of course, the acceptable sphere of judicial activity.

Conclusion

59. I have, in this judgment, undertaken a purposive analysis of the term "principles of fundamental justice" in s. 7 of the Charter in accordance with the method established by this Court in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra. Accordingly, the point of departure for the analysis has been a consideration of the general objectives of the Charter in the light of the general principles of Charter interpretation set forth in Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, supra, and Hunter v. Southam Inc., supra. This was followed by a detailed analysis of the language and structure of the section as well as its immediate context within the Charter.

61. Consequently, my conclusion may be summarized as follows:

62. The term "principles of fundamental justice" is not a right, but a qualifier of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person; its function is to set the parameters of that right.

63. Sections 8 to 14 address specific deprivations of the "right" to life, liberty and security of the person in breach of the principles of fundamental justice, and as such, violations of s. 7. They are therefore illustrative of the meaning, in criminal or penal law, of "principles of fundamental justice"; they represent principles which have been recognized by the common law, the international conventions and by the very fact of entrenchment in the Charter, as essential elements of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon the belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and the rule of law.

64. Consequently, the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets and principles, not only of our judicial process, but also of the other components of our legal system.

65. We should not be surprised to find that many of the principles of fundamental justice are procedural in nature. Our common law has largely been a law of remedies and procedures and, as Frankfurter J. wrote in McNabb v. United States 318 U.S. 332 (1942), at p. 347, "the history of liberty has largely been the history of observance of procedural safeguards". This is not to say, however, that the principles of fundamental justice are limited solely to procedural guarantees. Rather, the proper approach to the determination of the principles of fundamental justice is quite simply one in which, as Professor L. Tremblay has written, "future growth will be based on historical roots" ("Section 7 of the Charter: Substantive Due Process?"(1984), 18 U.B.C.L. Rev. 201, at p. 254).

66. Whether any given principle may be said to be a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7 will rest upon an analysis of the nature, sources, rationale and essential role of that principle within the judicial process and in our legal system, as it evolves.

67. Consequently, those words cannot be given any exhaustive content or simple enumerative definition, but will take on concrete meaning as the courts address alleged violations of s. 7.

68. I now turn to such an analysis of the principle of mens rea and absolute liability offences in order to determine the question which has been put to the Court in the present Reference.

Absolute Liability and Fundamental Justice in Penal Law

69. It has from time immemorial been part of our system of laws that the innocent not be punished. This principle has long been recognized as an essential element of a system for the administration of justice which is founded upon a belief in the dignity and worth of the human person and on the rule of law. It is so old that its first enunciation was in Latin actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea.

70. As Glanville Williams said:

> There is no need here to go into the remote history of mens rea; suffice it to say that the requirement of a guilty state of mind (at least for the more serious crimes) had been developed by the time of Coke, which is as far back as the modern lawyer needs to go. "If one shoot at any wild fowl upon a tree, and the arrow killeth any reasonable creature afar off, without any evil intent in him, this is per infortunium."
> (Glanville Williams, Criminal Law, The General Part, 2nd ed. (London, 1961), at p. 30.)

71. One of the many judicial statements on the subject worth mentioning is of the highest authority, per Goddard C.J. in Harding v. Price, [1948] 1 K.B. 695, at p. 700, where he said:

> The general rule applicable to criminal cases is actus non facit reum nisi mens sit rea, and I venture to repeat what I said in Brend v. Wood (1946), 62 T.L.R. 462, 463: `It is of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a court should always bear in mind that, unless a statute either clearly or by necessary implication rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, the court should not find a man guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has a guilty mind'.

72. This view has been adopted by this Court in unmistakable terms in many cases, amongst which the better known are Beaver v. The Queen, 1957 CanLII 14 (SCC), [1957] SCR 531, and the most recent and often quoted judgment of Dickson J. writing for the Court in R. v. City of Sault Ste. Marie, supra.

73. This Court's decision in the latter case is predicated upon a certain number of postulates one of which, given the nature of the rules it elaborates, has to be to the effect that absolute liability in penal law offends the principles of fundamental justice. Those principles are, to use the words of Dickson J., to the effect that "there is a generally held revulsion against punishment of the morally innocent". He also stated that the argument that absolute liability "violates fundamental principles of penal liability" was the most telling argument against absolute liability and one of greater force than those advanced in support thereof.

74. In my view it is because absolute liability offends the principles of fundamental justice that this Court created presumptions against legislatures having intended to enact offences of a regulatory nature falling within that category. This is not to say, however, and to that extent I am in agreement with the Court of Appeal, that, as a result, absolute liability per se offends s. 7 of the Charter.

75. A law enacting an absolute liability offence will violate s. 7 of the Charter only if and to the extent that it has the potential of depriving of life, liberty, or security of the person.

Section 94(2)

89. No doubt s. 94(2) enacts in the clearest of terms an absolute liability offence, the conviction for which a person will be deprived of his or her liberty, and little more, if anything, need be added. …

93. In the final analysis, it seems that both the appellant and the respondent agree that s. 94 will impact upon the right to liberty of a limited number of morally innocent persons. … To me, that is sufficient for it to be in violation of s. 7.

Justice McIntyre, in a one-paragraph concurrence, agreed with Justice Lamer that the principles of fundamental justice were both procedural and substantive, and agreed with Justice Lamer's disposition of the case. Justice Wilson, in her concurrence, cast doubt on the utility of drawing a distinction between substance and procedure when interpreting the phrase "principles of fundamental justice".

While in the BC Motor Vehicle Reference, Justice Lamer held that "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system" (para 31, extracted above), he did not establish a clear framework for identifying those principles. That was done by Justice Sopinka, in his judgment in Rodriguez v British Columbia (Attorney General) introduced earlier in the chapter.

(b)The Principles of Fundamental Justice

Discerning the principles of fundamental justice with which deprivation of life, liberty or security of the person must accord, in order to withstand constitutional scrutiny, is not an easy task. A mere common law rule does not suffice to constitute a principle of fundamental justice, rather, as the term implies, principles upon which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice are required. Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles. …

This Court has often stated that in discerning the principles of fundamental justice governing a particular case, it is helpful to look at the common law and legislative history of the offence in question (Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act and Morgentaler, supra, and R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 933). It is not sufficient, however, merely to conduct a historical review and conclude that because neither Parliament nor the various medical associations had ever expressed a view that assisted suicide should be decriminalized, that to prohibit it could not be said to be contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. Such an approach would be problematic for two reasons. First, a strictly historical analysis will always lead to the conclusion in a case such as this that the deprivation is in accordance with fundamental justice as the legislation will not have kept pace with advances in medical technology. Second, such reasoning is somewhat circular, in that it relies on the continuing existence of the prohibition to find the prohibition to be fundamentally just.

The way to resolve these problems is not to avoid the historical analysis, but to make sure that one is looking not just at the existence of the practice itself (i.e., the continued criminalization of assisted suicide) but at the rationale behind that practice and the principles which underlie it.

The appellant asserts that it is a principle of fundamental justice that the human dignity and autonomy of individuals be respected, and that to subject her to needless suffering in this manner is to rob her of her dignity. The importance of the concept of human dignity in our society was enunciated by Cory J. (dissenting, Lamer C.J. concurring) in Kindler v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 1991 CanLII 78 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 779, at p. 813. Respect for human dignity underlies many of the rights and freedoms in the Charter.

That respect for human dignity is one of the underlying principles upon which our society is based is unquestioned. I have difficulty, however, in characterizing this in itself as a principle of fundamental justice within the meaning of s. 7. While respect for human dignity is the genesis for many principles of fundamental justice, not every law that fails to accord such respect runs afoul of these principles. To state that "respect for human dignity and autonomy" is a principle of fundamental justice, then, is essentially to state that the deprivation of the appellant's security of the person is contrary to principles of fundamental justice because it deprives her of security of the person. This interpretation would equate security of the person with a principle of fundamental justice and render the latter redundant.

Justice Sopinka's view that the principles of fundamental justice had to be legal principles about "which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice", that "[t]hey must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result" was affirmed in the subsequent judgments in Malmo-Levine (an extract of which you saw earlier in the section on the Court's development of the liberty interest) and Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth, and the Law.

1 Gonthier and Binnie JJ. …

112 In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, Lamer J. (as he then was) explained that the principles of fundamental justice lie in "the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system" (p. 503). This Court provided further guidance as to what constitutes a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, in Rodriguez, supra, per Sopinka J. (at pp. 590-91 and 607):

> A mere common law rule does not suffice to constitute a principle of fundamental justice, rather, as the term implies, principles upon which there is some consensus that they are vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice are required. Principles of fundamental justice must not, however, be so broad as to be no more than vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral. They must be capable of being identified with some precision and applied to situations in a manner which yields an understandable result. They must also, in my view, be legal principles.
> . . .
> While the principles of fundamental justice are concerned with more than process, reference must be made to principles which are "fundamental" in the sense that they would have general acceptance among reasonable people. [Emphasis added.]

113 The requirement of "general acceptance among reasonable people" enhances the legitimacy of judicial review of state action, and ensures that the values against which state action is measured are not just fundamental "in the eye of the beholder only": Rodriguez, at pp. 607 and 590 (emphasis in original). In short, for a rule or principle to constitute a principle of fundamental justice for the purposes of s. 7, it must be a legal principle about which there is significant societal consensus that it is fundamental to the way in which the legal system ought fairly to operate, and it must be identified with sufficient precision to yield a manageable standard against which to measure deprivations of life, liberty or security of the person.

At issue in Malmo-Levine was whether the "harm principle" was a principle of fundamental justice: Justices Gonthier and Binnie found that it was not on the basis that it was not a legal principle and that, in any event, there was insufficient societal consensus that the harm principle was the only permissible basis for criminalizing conduct.

4.1.4 Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Canada (Attorney General)

Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Canada (Attorney General)*, 2004 SCC 4; [2004] 1 SCR 76

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache and LeBel JJ. was delivered by

1 The Chief Justice — The issue in this case is the constitutionality of Parliament's decision to carve out a sphere within which children's parents and teachers may use minor corrective force in some circumstances without facing criminal sanction. The assault provision of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, s. 265, prohibits intentional, non-consensual application of force to another. Section 43 of the Criminal Code excludes from this crime reasonable physical correction of children by their parents and teachers. It provides:

> Every schoolteacher, parent or person standing in the place of a parent is justified in using force by way of correction toward a pupil or child, as the case may be, who is under his care, if the force does not exceed what is reasonable under the circumstances.

The Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law (the "Foundation") seeks a declaration that this exemption from criminal sanction: (1) violates s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms because it fails to give procedural protections to children, does not further the best interests of the child, and is both overbroad and vague; …

2 The trial judge and the Court of Appeal rejected the Foundation's contentions and refused to issue the declaration requested. Like them, I conclude that the exemption from criminal sanction for corrective force that is "reasonable under the circumstances" does not offend the Charter. …

8 Jurisprudence on s. 7 has established that a "principle of fundamental justice" must fulfill three criteria: R. v. Malmo-Levine, [2003] 3 SCR 571, 2003 SCC 74, at para. 113. First, it must be a legal principle. This serves two purposes. First, it "provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee"; second, it avoids the "adjudication of policy matters": Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486, at p. 503. Second, there must be sufficient consensus that the alleged principle is "vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice": Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1993 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 519, at p. 590. The principles of fundamental justice are the shared assumptions upon which our system of justice is grounded. They find their meaning in the cases and traditions that have long detailed the basic norms for how the state deals with its citizens. Society views them as essential to the administration of justice. Third, the alleged principle must be capable of being identified with precision and applied to situations in a manner that yields predictable results. Examples of principles of fundamental justice that meet all three requirements include the need for a guilty mind and for reasonably clear laws.

9 The "best interests of the child" is a legal principle, thus meeting the first requirement. A legal principle contrasts with what Lamer J. (as he then was) referred to as "the realm of general public policy" (Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at p. 503), and Sopinka J. referred to as "broad" and "vague generalizations about what our society considers to be ethical or moral" (Rodriguez, supra, at p. 591), the use of which would transform s. 7 into a vehicle for policy adjudication. The "best interests of the child" is an established legal principle in international and domestic law. Canada is a party to international conventions that treat "the best interests of the child" as a legal principle: see the Convention on the Rights of the Child, Can. T.S. 1992 No. 3, Art. 3(1), and the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, Can. T.S. 1982 No. 31, Arts. 5(b) and 16(1)(d). Many Canadian statutes explicitly name the "best interests of the child" as a legal consideration: see, for example, Immigration and Refugee Protection Act, S.C. 2001, c. 27, ss. 25, 28, 60, 67, 68 and 69 ; Youth Criminal Justice Act, S.C. 2002, c. 1, ss. 25(8), 27(1), 30(3) and (4); Divorce Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 3 (2nd Supp .), ss. 16(8), (10), 17(5) and (9). Family law statutes are saturated with references to the "best interests of the child" as a legal principle of paramount importance: though not an exhaustive list, examples include: Family Relations Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 128, s. 24(1); Child and Family Services Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.11, s. 1(a); Children's Law Reform Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.12, s. 19(a). Clearly, the "best interests of the child" has achieved the status of a legal principle; the first requirement is met.

10 However, the "best interests of the child" fails to meet the second criterion for a principle of fundamental justice: consensus that the principle is vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice. The "best interests of the child" is widely supported in legislation and social policy, and is an important factor for consideration in many contexts. It is not, however, a foundational requirement for the dispensation of justice. Article 3(1) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child describes it as "a primary consideration" rather than "the primary consideration" (emphasis added). Drawing on this wording, L'Heureux-Dubé J. noted in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817, at para. 75:

> [T]he decision-maker should consider children's best interests as an important factor, give them substantial weight, and be alert, alive and sensitive to them. That is not to say that children's best interests must always outweigh other considerations, or that there will not be other reasons for denying an H & C claim even when children's interests are given this consideration.

It follows that the legal principle of the "best interests of the child" may be subordinated to other concerns in appropriate contexts. For example, a person convicted of a crime may be sentenced to prison even where it may not be in his or her child's best interests. Society does not always deem it essential that the "best interests of the child" trump all other concerns in the administration of justice. The "best interests of the child", while an important legal principle and a factor for consideration in many contexts, is not vital or fundamental to our societal notion of justice, and hence is not a principle of fundamental justice.

11 The third requirement is that the alleged principle of fundamental justice be "capable of being identified with some precision" (Rodriguez, supra, at p. 591) and provide a justiciable standard. Here, too, the "best interests of the child" falls short. It functions as a factor considered along with others. Its application is inevitably highly contextual and subject to dispute; reasonable people may well disagree about the result that its application will yield, particularly in areas of the law where it is one consideration among many, such as the criminal justice system. It does not function as a principle of fundamental justice setting out our minimum requirements for the dispensation of justice.

12 To conclude, "the best interests of the child" is a legal principle that carries great power in many contexts. However, it is not a principle of fundamental justice.

While many procedural and substantive principles of fundamental justice have been recognized, the Supreme Court has identified the principles of arbitrariness, gross disproportionality, and over-breadth as central to section 7 jurisprudence (see Carter v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331 at para 72). To this list we would add the principle of fundamental justice that a law cannot be unconstitutionally vague. As the Supreme Court has recognized, a vague law creates the risk that individuals will be governed by the rule of persons, rather than the rule of law. See Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law v Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 4; [2004] 1 SCR 76, para 16 (below).

4.2 Vagueness

C. Vagueness and Overbreadth

(1) Vagueness

13 The Foundation argues that s. 43 is unconstitutional because first, it does not give sufficient notice as to what conduct is prohibited; and second, it fails to constrain discretion in enforcement. The concept of what is "reasonable under the circumstances" is simply too vague, it is argued, to pass muster as a criminal provision.

14 Applying the legal requirements for precision in a criminal statute to s. 43, I conclude that s. 43, properly construed, is not unduly vague.

(a) The Standard for "Vagueness"

15 A law is unconstitutionally vague if it "does not provide an adequate basis for legal debate" and "analysis"; "does not sufficiently delineate any area of risk"; or "is not intelligible". The law must offer a "grasp to the judiciary": R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, 1992 CanLII 72 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 606, at pp. 639-40. Certainty is not required.

As Gonthier J. pointed out in Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, supra, at pp. 638-39, > conduct is guided by approximation. The process of approximation sometimes results in quite a narrow set of options, sometimes in a broader one. Legal dispositions therefore delineate a risk zone, and cannot hope to do more, unless they are directed at individual instances. [Emphasis added.]

16 A law must set an intelligible standard both for the citizens it governs and the officials who must enforce it. The two are interconnected. A vague law prevents the citizen from realizing when he or she is entering an area of risk for criminal sanction. It similarly makes it difficult for law enforcement officers and judges to determine whether a crime has been committed. This invokes the further concern of putting too much discretion in the hands of law enforcement officials, and violates the precept that individuals should be governed by the rule of law, not the rule of persons. The doctrine of vagueness is directed generally at the evil of leaving "basic policy matters to policemen, judges, and juries for resolution on an ad hoc and subjective basis, with the attendant dangers of arbitrary and discriminatory application": Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972), at p. 109.

17 Ad hoc discretionary decision making must be distinguished from appropriate judicial interpretation. Judicial decisions may properly add precision to a statute. Legislators can never foresee all the situations that may arise, and if they did, could not practically set them all out. It is thus in the nature of our legal system that areas of uncertainty exist and that judges clarify and augment the law on a case-by-case basis.

18 It follows that s. 43 of the Criminal Code will satisfy the constitutional requirement for precision if it delineates a risk zone for criminal sanction. This achieves the essential task of providing general guidance for citizens and law enforcement officers.

(b) Does Section 43 Delineate a Risk Zone for Criminal Sanction?

19 The purpose of s. 43 is to delineate a sphere of non-criminal conduct within the larger realm of common assault. It must, as we have seen, do this in a way that permits people to know when they are entering a zone of risk of criminal sanction and that avoids ad hoc discretionary decision making by law enforcement officials. People must be able to assess when conduct approaches the boundaries of the sphere that s. 43 provides.

20 To ascertain whether s. 43 meets these requirements, we must consider its words and court decisions interpreting those words. The words of the statute must be considered in context, in their grammatical and ordinary sense, and with a view to the legislative scheme's purpose and the intention of Parliament: Rizzo & Rizzo Shoes Ltd. (Re), 1998 CanLII 837 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 27, at para. 21; Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, [2002] 2 SCR 559, 2002 SCC 42, at para. 26. Since s. 43 withdraws the protection of the criminal law in certain circumstances, it should be strictly construed: see Ogg-Moss v. The Queen, 1984 CanLII 77 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 173, at p. 183.

21 Section 43 delineates who may access its sphere with considerable precision. The terms "schoolteacher" and "parent" are clear. The phrase "person standing in the place of a parent" has been held by the courts to indicate an individual who has assumed "all the obligations of parenthood": Ogg-Moss, supra, at p. 190 (emphasis in original). These terms present no difficulty.

22 Section 43 identifies less precisely what conduct falls within its sphere. It defines this conduct in two ways. The first is by the requirement that the force be "by way of correction". The second is by the requirement that the force be "reasonable under the circumstances".

23 I turn first to the requirement that the force be "by way of correction". These words, considered in conjunction with the cases, yield two limitations on the content of the protected sphere of conduct.

24 First, the person applying the force must have intended it to be for educative or corrective purposes: Ogg-Moss, supra, at p. 193. …

25 Second, the child must be capable of benefiting from the correction. This requires the capacity to learn and the possibility of successful correction. Force against children under two cannot be corrective, since on the evidence they are incapable of understanding why they are hit …

26 The second requirement of s. 43 is that the force be "reasonable under the circumstances". …

27 … the law has long used reasonableness to delineate areas of risk, without incurring the dangers of vagueness. … the criminal law is thick with the notion of "reasonableness".

29 Is s. 43's reliance on reasonableness, considered in this way, unconstitutionally vague? Does it indicate what conduct risks criminal sanction and provide a principled basis for enforcement? While the words on their face are broad, a number of implicit limitations add precision.

30 The first limitation arises from the behaviour for which s. 43 provides an exemption, simple non-consensual application of force. Section 43 does not exempt from criminal sanction conduct that causes harm or raises a reasonable prospect of harm. …

31 Within this limited area of application, further precision on what is reasonable under the circumstances may be derived from international treaty obligations. Statutes should be construed to comply with Canada's international obligations: Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437, at para. 137. Canada's international commitments confirm that physical correction that either harms or degrades a child is unreasonable.

34 Section 43's ambit is further defined by the direction to consider the circumstances under which corrective force is used. National and international precedents have set out factors to be considered. Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 213 U.N.T.S. 221, forbids inhuman and degrading treatment. The European Court of Human Rights, in determining whether parental treatment of a child was severe enough to fall within the scope of Article 3, held that assessment must take account of "all the circumstances of the case, such as the nature and context of the treatment, its duration, its physical and mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim": Eur. Court H.R., A. v. United Kingdom, judgment of 23 September 1998, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-VI, p. 2699. These factors properly focus on the prospective effect of the corrective force upon the child, as required by s. 43.

35 By contrast, it is improper to retrospectively focus on the gravity of a child's wrongdoing, which invites a punitive rather than corrective focus. … Obviously, force employed in the absence of any behaviour requiring correction by definition cannot be corrective.

36 Determining what is "reasonable under the circumstances" in the case of child discipline is also assisted by social consensus and expert evidence on what constitutes reasonable corrective discipline. …

37 Based on the evidence currently before the Court, there are significant areas of agreement among the experts on both sides of the issue (trial decision, at para. 17). Corporal punishment of children under two years is harmful to them, and has no corrective value given the cognitive limitations of children under two years of age. Corporal punishment of teenagers is harmful, because it can induce aggressive or antisocial behaviour. Corporal punishment using objects, such as rulers or belts, is physically and emotionally harmful. Corporal punishment which involves slaps or blows to the head is harmful. These types of punishment, we may conclude, will not be reasonable.

38 Contemporary social consensus is that, while teachers may sometimes use corrective force to remove children from classrooms or secure compliance with instructions, the use of corporal punishment by teachers is not acceptable. ... Section 43 will protect a teacher who uses reasonable, corrective force to restrain or remove a child in appropriate circumstances. Substantial societal consensus, supported by expert evidence and Canada's treaty obligations, indicates that corporal punishment by teachers is unreasonable.

39 Finally, judicial interpretation may assist in defining "reasonable under the circumstances" under s. 43. … the issue is not whether s. 43 has provided enough guidance in the past, but whether it expresses a standard that can be given a core meaning in tune with contemporary consensus.

40 When these considerations are taken together, a solid core of meaning emerges for "reasonable under the circumstances", sufficient to establish a zone in which discipline risks criminal sanction. Generally, s. 43 exempts from criminal sanction only minor corrective force of a transitory and trifling nature. On the basis of current expert consensus, it does not apply to corporal punishment of children under two or teenagers. Degrading, inhuman or harmful conduct is not protected. Discipline by the use of objects or blows or slaps to the head is unreasonable. Teachers may reasonably apply force to remove a child from a classroom or secure compliance with instructions, but not merely as corporal punishment. Coupled with the requirement that the conduct be corrective, which rules out conduct stemming from the caregiver's frustration, loss of temper or abusive personality, a consistent picture emerges of the area covered by s. 43. …

41 The fact that borderline cases may be anticipated is not fatal. As Gonthier J. stated in Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical, supra, at p. 639, "it is inherent to our legal system that some conduct will fall along the boundaries of the area of risk; no definite prediction can then be made. Guidance, not direction, of conduct is a more realistic objective".

42 Section 43 achieves this objective. It sets real boundaries and delineates a risk zone for criminal sanction. The prudent parent or teacher will refrain from conduct that approaches those boundaries, while law enforcement officers and judges will proceed with them in mind. It does not violate the principle of fundamental justice that laws must not be vague or arbitrary.

Justice Arbour, in her dissenting opinion, used the same vagueness standard relied on by the Chief Justice in her judgment in Canadian Foundation for Children, Youth and the Law. However, unlike the Chief Justice, Justice Arbour found that section 43 of the Criminal Code was unconstitutionally vague.

4.3 Arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality

As noted above, the Supreme Court identified the principles of fundamental justice of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality as having emerged as central to the section 7 analysis. These principles are not new. Writing in R v Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30 (Morgentaler No 2), Justice Beetz characterized some of the procedural requirements of then s 251 of the Criminal Code as being "manifestly unfair" on the basis that they "have no connection whatsoever with Parliament's objectives in establishing the administrative structure". That notion of "manifest unfairness" is now expressed through the principle of arbitrariness. The concept of gross disproportionality first emerged in the s 12 Charter context in the late 1980s (see for example R v Smith, 1987 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 1045), while the concept of overbreadth seems to have made its first appearance at the Supreme Court level in 1990 (see Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123). The most significant clarification of these principles has come in more recent cases beginning with the Supreme Court's 2011 decision in Insite.

[18] … [Insite] operates under the authority of the VCHA [the Vancouver Coastal Health Authority], and its personnel are guided by strict policies and procedures. It does not provide drugs to its clients, who must check in, must sign a waiver, and are closely monitored during and after injection. There are guidelines for staff to follow in the disposal of used injection equipment and the containment of leftover drugs.

[20] The federal CDSA is the federal government's response to the problem of illegal drug use across Canada. By way of the CDSA, the federal government has chosen an approach that favours a blanket prohibition on possession and trafficking in illegal drugs. At the same time, Parliament has recognized that there are good reasons to allow the use of illegal substances in certain circumstances. The federal Minister of Health can issue exemptions for medical and scientific purposes under s. 56 of the CDSA. Section 55 of the CDSA allows for the Governor in Council to make regulations for the medical, scientific and industrial use of illegal substances. In this manner, Parliament has attempted to balance the two competing interests of public safety and public health. In 2008, the federal exemption for Insite from the operation of the criminal drug laws expired. This action was started in an effort to keep Insite open.

VI. Charter Claims

[74] Three Charter claims fall for consideration.

[75] Ms. Tomic, Mr. Wilson and PHS argue that ss. 4(1) and 5(1) of the CDSA, which prohibit possession and trafficking respectively, are invalid because they limit the claimants' s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person and are not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[76] In the alternative, they assert that their s. 7 rights have been infringed by the Minister's refusal to extend the exemption for Insite from the application of the federal drug laws.

C. Has the Minister's Decision Violated the Claimants' Section 7 Rights?

[116] The main issue, as the appeal was argued, was the constitutionality of the CDSA itself. I have concluded that, properly interpreted, the statute is valid. This leaves the question of the Minister's decision to refuse an exemption. … The issue was raised at the hearing and the parties afforded an opportunity to address it. It is therefore properly before us and the Attorney General of Canada cannot complain that it would be unfair to deal with it. Most importantly, justice requires us to consider this issue. The claimants have established that their s. 7 rights are at stake. They should not be denied a remedy and sent back for another trial on this point simply because it is the Minister's decision and not the statute that causes the breach when the matter has been pleaded and no unfairness arises.

[117] The discretion vested in the Minister of Health is not absolute: as with all exercises of discretion, the Minister's decisions must conform to the Charter: Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 SCR 3. If the Minister's decision results in an application of the CDSA that limits the s. 7 rights of individuals in a manner that is not in accordance with the Charter, then the Minister's discretion has been exercised unconstitutionally.

(1) Has the Minister Made a Decision?

[120] In my view, the record establishes that the Minister has made a decision on the request for an exemption for Insite, and that that decision was to refuse the exemption.

(2) Are the Claimants' Section 7 Rights Engaged by the Minister's Decision?

[126] The last ministerial exemption expired on June 30, 2008. … I conclude that the Minister's rejection of the application for a s. 56 exemption … engages the s. 7 rights of the claimants. …

(3) Does the Minister's Refusal to Grant an Exemption to Insite Accord With the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

[127] The next question is whether the Minister's decision that the CDSA applies to Insite is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. On the basis of the facts established at trial, which are consistent with the evidence available to the Minister at the relevant time, I conclude that the Minister's refusal to grant Insite a s. 56 exemption was arbitrary and grossly disproportionate in its effects, and hence not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[128] As noted above, the Minister, when exercising his discretion under s. 56, must respect the rights guaranteed by the Charter. This means that, where s. 7 rights are at stake, any limitations imposed by ministerial decision must be in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The Minister cannot simply deny an application for a s. 56 exemption on the basis of policy simpliciter; insofar as it affects Charter rights, his decision must accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

(a) Arbitrariness

[129] When considering whether a law's application is arbitrary, the first step is to identify the law's objectives. Decisions of the Minister under s. 56 of the CDSA must target the purpose of the Act. The legitimate state objectives of the CDSA (then the Narcotic Control Act, R.S.C. 1986, c. N-1) were identified by this Court in Malmo-Levine as the protection of health and public safety.

[130] The second step is to identify the relationship between the state interest and the impugned law, or, in this case, the impugned decision of the Minister. The relationship between the general prohibition on possession in the CDSA and the state objective was recognized in Malmo-Levine with respect to marihuana:

> The criminalization of possession is a statement of society's collective disapproval of the use of a psychoactive drug such as marihuana . . ., and, through Parliament, the continuing view that its use should be deterred. The prohibition is not arbitrary but is rationally connected to a reasonable apprehension of harm. In particular, criminalization seeks to take marihuana out of the hands of users and potential users, so as to prevent the associated harm and to eliminate the market for traffickers. [para. 136]

The question is whether the decision that the CDSA applies to the activities at Insite bears the same relationship to the state objective. As noted above, the burden is on the claimants to establish that the limit imposed by the law is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[131] The trial judge's key findings in this regard are consistent with the information available to the Minister, and are those on which successive federal Ministers have relied in granting exemption orders over almost five years, including the facts that: (1) traditional criminal law prohibitions have done little to reduce drug use in the DTES; (2) the risk to injection drug users of death and disease is reduced when they inject under the supervision of a health professional; and (3) the presence of Insite did not contribute to increased crime rates, increased incidents of public injection, or relapse rates in injection drug users. On the contrary, Insite was perceived favourably or neutrally by the public; a local business association reported a reduction in crime during the period Insite was operating; the facility encouraged clients to seek counselling, detoxification and treatment. Most importantly, the staff of Insite had intervened in 336 overdoses since 2006, and no overdose deaths had occurred at the facility. (See trial judgment, at paras. 85 and 87-88.) These findings suggest not only that exempting Insite from the application of the possession prohibition does not undermine the objectives of public health and safety, but furthers them.

[132] The jurisprudence on arbitrariness is not entirely settled. In Chaoulli, three justices (per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.) preferred an approach that asked whether a limit was "necessary" to further the state objective (paras. 131-32). Conversely, three other justices (per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), preferred to avoid the language of necessity and instead approved of the prior articulation of arbitrariness as where "[a] deprivation of a right . . . bears no relation to, or is inconsistent with, the state interest that lies behind the legislation" (para. 232). It is unnecessary to determine which approach should prevail, because the government action at issue in this case qualifies as arbitrary under both definitions.

(b) Gross Disproportionality

[133] The application of the possession prohibition to Insite is also grossly disproportionate in its effects. Gross disproportionality describes state actions or legislative responses to a problem that are so extreme as to be disproportionate to any legitimate government interest: Malmo-Levine, at para. 143. Insite saves lives. Its benefits have been proven. There has been no discernable negative impact on the public safety and health objectives of Canada during its eight years of operation. The effect of denying the services of Insite to the population it serves is grossly disproportionate to any benefit that Canada might derive from presenting a uniform stance on the possession of narcotics.

(c) Overbreadth

[134] Having found the Minister's decision arbitrary and its effects grossly disproportionate, I need not consider this aspect of the argument.

[135] I conclude that, on the basis of the factual findings of the trial judge, the claimants have met the evidentiary burden of showing that the failure of the Minister to grant a s. 56 exemption to Insite is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(4) Conclusion on the Challenge to Minister's Decision

[136] The Minister made a decision not to extend the exemption from the application of the federal drug laws to Insite. The effect of that decision, but for the trial judge's interim order, would have been to prevent injection drug users from accessing the health services offered by Insite, threatening the health and indeed the lives of the potential clients. The Minister's decision thus engages the claimants' s. 7 interests and constitutes a limit on their s. 7 rights. Based on the information available to the Minister, this limit is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. It is arbitrary, undermining the very purposes of the CDSA, which include public health and safety. It is also grossly disproportionate: the potential denial of health services and the correlative increase in the risk of death and disease to injection drug users outweigh any benefit that might be derived from maintaining an absolute prohibition on possession of illegal drugs on Insite's premises.

As Chief Justice McLachlin noted in her reasons in Insite (para 132), the meaning of the principle of fundamental justice of arbitrariness was unsettled. While she did not decide in Insite on a final meaning of the term, the Court revisited the issue in the Bedford and Carter decisions.

(3) Principles of Fundamental Justice

(a) The Applicable Norms

[93] I have concluded that the impugned laws deprive prostitutes of security of the person, engaging s. 7. The remaining step in the s. 7 analysis is to determine whether this deprivation is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. If so, s. 7 is not breached.

[96] The Motor Vehicle Reference recognized that the principles of fundamental justice are about the basic values underpinning our constitutional order. The s. 7 analysis is concerned with capturing inherently bad laws: that is, laws that take away life, liberty, or security of the person in a way that runs afoul of our basic values. The principles of fundamental justice are an attempt to capture those values. Over the years, the jurisprudence has given shape to the content of these basic values. In this case, we are concerned with the basic values against arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality.

[97] The concepts of arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality evolved organically as courts were faced with novel Charter claims.

[107] Although there is significant overlap between these three principles, and one law may properly be characterized by more than one of them, arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality remain three distinct principles that stem from what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality" — the situation where the law is "inadequately connected to its objective or in some sense goes too far in seeking to attain it" (Fundamental Justice: Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2012), at p. 151). As Peter Hogg has explained:

> The doctrines of overbreadth, disproportionality and arbitrariness are all at bottom intended to address what Hamish Stewart calls "failures of instrumental rationality", by which he means that the Court accepts the legislative objective, but scrutinizes the policy instrument enacted as the means to achieve the objective. If the policy instrument is not a rational means to achieve the objective, then the law is dysfunctional in terms of its own objective.

[110] Against this background, it may be useful to elaborate on arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality.

[111] Arbitrariness asks whether there is a direct connection between the purpose of the law and the impugned effect on the individual, in the sense that the effect on the individual bears some relation to the law's purpose. There must be a rational connection between the object of the measure that causes the s. 7 deprivation, and the limits it imposes on life, liberty, or security of the person (Stewart, at p. 136). A law that imposes limits on these interests in a way that bears no connection to its objective arbitrarily impinges on those interests. Thus, in Chaoulli, the law was arbitrary because the prohibition of private health insurance was held to be unrelated to the objective of protecting the public health system.

[112] Overbreadth deals with a law that is so broad in scope that it includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose. In this sense, the law is arbitrary in part. At its core, overbreadth addresses the situation where there is no rational connection between the purposes of the law and some, but not all, of its impacts. For instance, the law at issue in Demers required unfit accused to attend repeated review board hearings. The law was only disconnected from its purpose insofar as it applied to permanently unfit accused; for temporarily unfit accused, the effects were related to the purpose.

[113] Overbreadth allows courts to recognize that the law is rational in some cases, but that it overreaches in its effect in others. Despite this recognition of the scope of the law as a whole, the focus remains on the individual and whether the effect on the individual is rationally connected to the law's purpose. For example, where a law is drawn broadly and targets some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose in order to make enforcement more practical, there is still no connection between the purpose of the law and its effect on the specific individual. Enforcement practicality may be a justification for an overbroad law, to be analyzed under s. 1 of the Charter.

[114] It has been suggested that overbreadth is not truly a distinct principle of fundamental justice. The case law has sometimes said that overbreadth straddles both arbitrariness and gross disproportionality. Thus, in Heywood, Cory J. stated: "The effect of overbreadth is that in some applications the law is arbitrary or disproportionate" (p. 793).

[115] And in R. v. Clay, 2003 SCC 75, [2003] 3 SCR 735, the companion case to Malmo-Levine, Gonthier and Binnie JJ. explained:

> Overbreadth in that respect addresses the potential infringement of fundamental justice where the adverse effect of a legislative measure on the individuals subject to its strictures is grossly disproportionate to the state interest the legislation seeks to protect. Overbreadth in this aspect is, as Cory J. pointed out [in Heywood], related to arbitrariness. [Emphasis deleted; para. 38.]

[116] In part this debate is semantic. The law has not developed by strict labels, but on a case-by-case basis, as courts identified laws that were inherently bad because they violated our basic values.

[117] Moving forward, however, it may be helpful to think of overbreadth as a distinct principle of fundamental justice related to arbitrariness, in that the question for both is whether there is no connection between the effects of a law and its objective. Overbreadth simply allows the court to recognize that the lack of connection arises in a law that goes too far by sweeping conduct into its ambit that bears no relation to its objective.

[118] An ancillary question, which applies to both arbitrariness and overbreadth, concerns how significant the lack of correspondence between the objective of the infringing provision and its effects must be. Questions have arisen as to whether a law is arbitrary or overbroad when its effects are inconsistent with its objective, or whether, more broadly, a law is arbitrary or overbroad whenever its effects are unnecessary for its objective (see, e.g., Chaoulli, at paras. 233-34).

[119] As noted above, the root question is whether the law is inherently bad because there is no connection, in whole or in part, between its effects and its purpose. This standard is not easily met. The evidence may, as in Morgentaler, show that the effect actually undermines the objective and is therefore "inconsistent" with the objective. Or the evidence may, as in Chaoulli, show that there is simply no connection on the facts between the effect and the objective, and the effect is therefore "unnecessary". Regardless of how the judge describes this lack of connection, the ultimate question remains whether the evidence establishes that the law violates basic norms because there is no connection between its effect and its purpose. This is a matter to be determined on a case-by-case basis, in light of the evidence.

[120] Gross disproportionality asks a different question from arbitrariness and overbreadth. It targets the second fundamental evil: the law's effects on life, liberty or security of the person are so grossly disproportionate to its purposes that they cannot rationally be supported. The rule against gross disproportionality only applies in extreme cases where the seriousness of the deprivation is totally out of sync with the objective of the measure. This idea is captured by the hypothetical of a law with the purpose of keeping the streets clean that imposes a sentence of life imprisonment for spitting on the sidewalk. The connection between the draconian impact of the law and its object must be entirely outside the norms accepted in our free and democratic society.

[121] Gross disproportionality under s. 7 of the Charter does not consider the beneficial effects of the law for society. It balances the negative effect on the individual against the purpose of the law, not against societal benefit that might flow from the law. As this Court said in Malmo-Levine:

> In effect, the exercise undertaken by Braidwood J.A. was to balance the law's salutary and deleterious effects. In our view, with respect, that is a function that is more properly reserved for s. 1. These are the types of social and economic harms that generally have no place in s. 7. [para. 181]

[122] Thus, gross disproportionality is not concerned with the number of people who experience grossly disproportionate effects; a grossly disproportionate effect on one person is sufficient to violate the norm.

[123] All three principles — arbitrariness, overbreadth, and gross disproportionality — compare the rights infringement caused by the law with the objective of the law, not with the law's effectiveness. That is, they do not look to how well the law achieves its object, or to how much of the population the law benefits. They do not consider ancillary benefits to the general population. Furthermore, none of the principles measure the percentage of the population that is negatively impacted. The analysis is qualitative, not quantitative. The question under s. 7 is whether anyone's life, liberty or security of the person has been denied by a law that is inherently bad; a grossly disproportionate, overbroad, or arbitrary effect on one person is sufficient to establish a breach of s. 7.

(4) Do the Impugned Laws Respect the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

(a) Section 210: The Bawdy-House Prohibition

(i) The Object of the Provision

[130] The bawdy-house provision has remained essentially unchanged since it was moved to Part V of the Criminal Code, "Disorderly Houses, Gaming and Betting", in the 1953-54 Code revision (c. 51, s. 182). In Rockert v. The Queen, 1978 CanLII 31 (SCC), [1978] 2 SCR 704, Estey J. found "little, if any, doubt" in the authorities that the disorderly house provisions were not directed at the mischief of betting, gaming and prostitution per se, but rather at the harm to the community in which such activities were carried on in a notorious and habitual manner (p. 712). This objective can be traced back to the common law origins of the bawdy-house provisions (see, e.g., E. Coke, The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England: Concerning High Treason, and Other Pleas of the Crown and Criminal Causes (1817, first published 1644), at pp. 205-6).

[132] There is no evidence to support a reappraisal of this purpose by Parliament. The doctrine against shifting objectives does not permit a new object to be introduced at this point (R. v. Zundel, 1992 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 731). … I therefore agree with the lower courts that the objectives of the bawdy-house provision are to combat neighbourhood disruption or disorder and to safeguard public health and safety.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[133] The courts below considered whether the bawdy-house prohibition is overbroad, or grossly disproportionate.

[134] I agree with them that the negative impact of the bawdy-house prohibition on the applicants' security of the person is grossly disproportionate to its objective. I therefore find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition is overbroad insofar as it applies to a single prostitute operating out of her own home (C.A., at para. 204). The application judge found on the evidence that moving to a bawdy-house would improve prostitutes' safety by providing the "safety benefits of proximity to others, familiarity with surroundings, security staff, closed-circuit television and other such monitoring that a permanent indoor location can facilitate" (para. 427). Balancing this against the evidence demonstrating that "complaints about nuisance arising from indoor prostitution establishments are rare" (ibid.), she found that the harmful impact of the provision was grossly disproportionate to its purpose.

[135] The Court of Appeal acknowledged that empirical evidence on the subject is difficult to gather, since almost all the studies focus on street prostitution. However, it concluded that the evidence supported the application judge's findings on gross disproportionality — in particular, the evidence of the high homicide rate among prostitutes, with the overwhelming number of victims being street prostitutes. The Court of Appeal agreed that moving indoors amounts to a "basic safety precaution" for prostitutes, one which the bawdy-house provision makes illegal (paras. 206-7).

[136] In my view, this conclusion was not in error. The harms identified by the courts below are grossly disproportionate to the deterrence of community disruption that is the object of the law. Parliament has the power to regulate against nuisances, but not at the cost of the health, safety and lives of prostitutes. A law that prevents street prostitutes from resorting to a safe haven such as Grandma's House while a suspected serial killer prowls the streets, is a law that has lost sight of its purpose.

(b) Section 212(1)(j): Living on the Avails of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[137] This Court has held, per Cory J. for the majority in Downey, that the purpose of this provision is to target pimps and the parasitic, exploitative conduct in which they engage:

> It can be seen that the majority of offences outlined in s. 195 are aimed at the procurer who entices, encourages or importunes a person to engage in prostitution. Section 195(1)(j) [now s. 212(1)(j)] is specifically aimed at those who have an economic stake in the earnings of a prostitute. It has been held correctly I believe that the target of s. 195(1)(j) is the person who lives parasitically off a prostitute's earnings. That person is commonly and aptly termed a pimp. [p. 32]

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[139] The courts below concluded that the living on the avails provision is overbroad insofar as it captures a number of non-exploitative relationships which are not connected to the law's purpose. …

[140] I agree with the courts below that the living on the avails provision is overbroad.

[141] The provision has been judicially restricted to those who provide a service or good to a prostitute because she is a prostitute, thus excluding grocers and doctors, for instance (Shaw v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1962] A.C. 220 (H.L.)). It also has been held to require that exploitation be proven in the case of a person who lives with the prostitute, in order to exclude people in legitimate domestic relationships with a prostitute (Grilo). These refinements render the prohibition narrower than its words might suggest.

[142] The question here is whether the law nevertheless goes too far and thus deprives the applicants of their security of the person in a manner unconnected to the law's objective. The law punishes everyone who lives on the avails of prostitution without distinguishing between those who exploit prostitutes (for example, controlling and abusive pimps) and those who could increase the safety and security of prostitutes (for example, legitimate drivers, managers, or bodyguards). It also includes anyone involved in business with a prostitute, such as accountants or receptionists. In these ways, the law includes some conduct that bears no relation to its purpose of preventing the exploitation of prostitutes. The living on the avails provision is therefore overbroad.

(c) Section 213(1)(c): Communicating in Public for the Purposes of Prostitution

(i) The Object of the Provision

[146] The object of the communicating provision was explained by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference:

> Like Wilson J., I would characterize the legislative objective of s. 195.1(1)(c) [now s. 213(1)(c)] in the following manner: the provision is meant to address solicitation in public places and, to that end, seeks to eradicate the various forms of social nuisance arising from the public display of the sale of sex. My colleague Lamer J. finds that s. 195.1(1)(c) is truly directed towards curbing the exposure of prostitution and related violence, drugs and crime to potentially vulnerable young people, and towards eliminating the victimization and economic disadvantage that prostitution, and especially street soliciting, represents for women. I do not share the view that the legislative objective can be characterized so broadly. In prohibiting sales of sexual services in public, the legislation does not attempt, at least in any direct manner, to address the exploitation, degradation and subordination of women that are part of the contemporary reality of prostitution. Rather, in my view, the legislation is aimed at taking solicitation for the purposes of prostitution off the streets and out of public view.
> The Criminal Code provision subject to attack in these proceedings clearly responds to the concerns of home-owners, businesses, and the residents of urban neighbourhoods. Public solicitation for the purposes of prostitution is closely associated with street congestion and noise, oral harassment of non-participants and general detrimental effects on passers-by or bystanders, especially children. [pp. 1134-35]

[147] It is clear from these reasons that the purpose of the communicating provision is not to eliminate street prostitution for its own sake, but to take prostitution "off the streets and out of public view" in order to prevent the nuisances that street prostitution can cause. The Prostitution Reference belies the argument of the Attorneys General that Parliament's overall objective in these provisions is to deter prostitution.

(ii) Compliance With the Principles of Fundamental Justice

[148] The application judge concluded that the harm imposed by the prohibition on communicating in public was grossly disproportionate to the provision's object of removing the nuisance of prostitution from the streets. This was based on evidence that she found established that the ability to screen clients was an "essential tool" to avoiding violent or drunken clients (application decision, at para. 432).

[149] The majority of the Court of Appeal found that the application judge erred in her analysis of gross disproportionality by attaching too little importance to the objective of s. 213(1)(c), and by incorrectly finding on the evidence that face-to-face communication with a prospective customer is essential to enhancing prostitutes' safety (paras. 306 and 310).

[150] In my view, the Court of Appeal majority's reasoning on this question is problematic, largely for the reasons set out by MacPherson J.A., dissenting in part. Four aspects of the majority's analysis are particularly troubling.

[151] First, in concluding that the application judge accorded too little weight to the legislative objective of s. 213(1)(c), the majority of the Court of Appeal criticized her characterization of the object of the provision as targeting "noise, street congestion, and the possibility that the practice of prostitution will interfere with those nearby" (C.A., at para. 306). But the application judge's conclusion was in concert with the object of s. 213(1)(c) established by Dickson C.J. in the Prostitution Reference, which the majority of the Court of Appeal endorsed earlier in their reasons (para. 286).

[152] Compounding this error, the majority of the Court of Appeal inflated the objective of the prohibition on public communication by referring to "drug possession, drug trafficking, public intoxication, and organized crime" (para. 307), even though Dickson C.J. explicitly excluded the exposure of "related violence, drugs and crime" to vulnerable young people from the objectives of s. 213(1)(c). At most, the provision's effect on these other issues is an ancillary benefit — and, as such, it should not play into the gross disproportionality analysis, which weighs the actual objective of the provision against its negative impact on the individual's life, liberty and security of the person.

[153] The three remaining concerns with the majority's reasoning relate to the other side of the balance: the assessment of the impact of the provision.

[154] First, the majority of the Court of Appeal erroneously substituted its assessment of the evidence for that of the application judge. …

[155] Second, the majority ignored the law's effect of displacing prostitutes to more secluded, less secure locations. …

[156] Related to this is the uncontested fact that the communication ban prevents street workers from bargaining for conditions that would materially reduce their risk, such as condom use and the use of safe houses.

[157] Finally, the majority of the Court of Appeal …, in rejecting the application judge's conclusions, relied on its own speculative assessment of the impact of s. 213(1)(c):

> While it is fair to say that a street prostitute might be able to avoid a "bad date" by negotiating details such as payment, services to be performed and condom use up front, it is equally likely that the customer could pass muster at an early stage, only to turn violent once the transaction is underway. It is also possible that the prostitute may proceed even in the face of perceived danger, either because her judgment is impaired by drugs or alcohol, or because she is so desperate for money that she feels compelled to take the risk. [para. 312]

[158] It is certainly conceivable, as this passage suggests, that some street prostitutes would not refuse a client even if communication revealed potential danger. It is also conceivable that the danger may not be perfectly predicted in advance. However, that does not negate the application judge's finding that communication is an essential tool that can decrease risk. The assessment is qualitative, not quantitative. If screening could have prevented one woman from jumping into Robert Pickton's car, the severity of the harmful effects is established.

[159] In sum … I would restore the application judge's conclusion that s. 213(1)(c) is grossly disproportionate. The provision's negative impact on the safety and lives of street prostitutes is a grossly disproportionate response to the possibility of nuisance caused by street prostitution.

4.3.3 Carter v Canada (Attorney General)

Carter v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 331; 2015 SCC 5

The following is the judgment delivered by

The Court…

B. The Principles of Fundamental Justice

[71] Section 7 does not promise that the state will never interfere with a person's life, liberty or security of the person — laws do this all the time — but rather that the state will not do so in a way that violates the principles of fundamental justice.

[72] Section 7 does not catalogue the principles of fundamental justice to which it refers. Over the course of 32 years of Charter adjudication, this Court has worked to define the minimum constitutional requirements that a law that trenches on life, liberty or security of the person must meet (Bedford, at para. 94). While the Court has recognized a number of principles of fundamental justice, three have emerged as central in the recent s. 7 jurisprudence: laws that impinge on life, liberty or security of the person must not be arbitrary, overbroad, or have consequences that are grossly disproportionate to their object.

[73] Each of these potential vices involves comparison with the object of the law that is challenged (Bedford, at para. 123). The first step is therefore to identify the object of the prohibition on assisted dying.

[74] The trial judge, relying on Rodriguez, concluded that the object of the prohibition was to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness (para. 1190). All the parties except Canada accept this formulation of the object.

[75] Canada agrees that the prohibition is intended to protect the vulnerable, but argues that the object of the prohibition should also be defined more broadly as simply "the preservation of life" (R.F., at paras 66, 108, and 109). We cannot accept this submission.

(1) Arbitrariness

[83] The principle of fundamental justice that forbids arbitrariness targets the situation where there is no rational connection between the object of the law and the limit it imposes on life, liberty or security of the person: Bedford, at para. 111. An arbitrary law is one that is not capable of fulfilling its objectives. It exacts a constitutional price in terms of rights, without furthering the public good that is said to be the object of the law.

[84] The object of the prohibition on physician-assisted dying is to protect the vulnerable from ending their life in times of weakness. A total ban on assisted suicide clearly helps achieve this object. Therefore, individuals' rights are not limited arbitrarily.

(2) Overbreadth

[85] The overbreadth inquiry asks whether a law that takes away rights in a way that generally supports the object of the law, goes too far by denying the rights of some individuals in a way that bears no relation to the object: Bedford, at paras. 101 and 112-13. Like the other principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, overbreadth is not concerned with competing social interests or ancillary benefits to the general population. A law that is drawn broadly to target conduct that bears no relation to its purpose "in order to make enforcement more practical" may therefore be overbroad (see Bedford, at para. 113). The question is not whether Parliament has chosen the least restrictive means, but whether the chosen means infringe life, liberty or security of the person in a way that has no connection with the mischief contemplated by the legislature. The focus is not on broad social impacts, but on the impact of the measure on the individuals whose life, liberty or security of the person is trammelled.

[86] Applying this approach, we conclude that the prohibition on assisted dying is overbroad. The object of the law, as discussed, is to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a moment of weakness. Canada conceded at trial that the law catches people outside this class: "It is recognised that not every person who wishes to commit suicide is vulnerable, and that there may be people with disabilities who have a considered, rational and persistent wish to end their own lives" (trial reasons, at para. 1136). The trial judge accepted that Ms. Taylor was such a person — competent, fully informed, and free from coercion or duress (para. 16). It follows that the limitation on their rights is in at least some cases not connected to the objective of protecting vulnerable persons. The blanket prohibition sweeps conduct into its ambit that is unrelated to the law's objective.

[87] Canada argues that it is difficult to conclusively identify the "vulnerable", and that therefore it cannot be said that the prohibition is overbroad. Indeed, Canada asserts, "every person is potentially vulnerable" from a legislative perspective (R.F., at para. 115 (emphasis in original)).

[88] We do not agree. The situation is analogous to that in Bedford, where this Court concluded that the prohibition on living on the avails of prostitution in s. 212(1) (j) of the Criminal Code was overbroad. The law in that case punished everyone who earned a living through a relationship with a prostitute, without distinguishing between those who would assist and protect them and those who would be at least potentially exploitive of them. Canada there as here argued that the line between exploitative and non-exploitative relationships was blurry, and that, as a result, the provision had to be drawn broadly to capture its targets. The Court concluded that that argument is more appropriately addressed under s. 1 (paras. 143-44).

(3) Gross Disproportionality

[89] This principle is infringed if the impact of the restriction on the individual's life, liberty or security of the person is grossly disproportionate to the object of the measure. As with overbreadth, the focus is not on the impact of the measure on society or the public, which are matters for s. 1, but on its impact on the rights of the claimant. The inquiry into gross disproportionality compares the law's purpose, "taken at face value", with its negative effects on the rights of the claimant, and asks if this impact is completely out of sync with the object of the law (Bedford, at para. 125). The standard is high: the law's object and its impact may be incommensurate without reaching the standard for gross disproportionality (Bedford, at para. 120; Suresh v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 2002 SCC 1, [2002] 1 SCR 3, at para. 47).

[90] The trial judge concluded that the prohibition's negative impact on life, liberty and security of the person was "very severe" and therefore grossly disproportionate to its objective (para. 1378). We agree that the impact of the prohibition is severe: it imposes unnecessary suffering on affected individuals, deprives them of the ability to determine what to do with their bodies and how those bodies will be treated, and may cause those affected to take their own lives sooner than they would were they able to obtain a physician's assistance in dying. Against this it is argued that the object of the prohibition — to protect vulnerable persons from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness — is also of high importance. We find it unnecessary to decide whether the prohibition also violates the principle against gross disproportionality, in light of our conclusion that it is overbroad.

In Bedford, the Supreme Court had apparently settled the meaning of the principle of fundamental justice of arbitrariness. In light of what the Court said at paragraph 83 of Carter, has the meaning of arbitrariness become unsettled again?

5 The relationship between section 7 and section 1

The Supreme Court has never found a violation of section 7 justified under section 1. As you read the following cases, think about whether the analysis undertaken by the courts, when assessing the principles of fundamental justice, may overlap with the test laid out in Oakes. Consider whether you think a violation of section 7 could ever be demonstrably justified.

5.1 Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act

Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act*, 1985 CanLII 81 (SCC), [1985] 2 SCR 486

Per Lamer, J (in obiter) …

83. Indeed, as I said, in penal law, absolute liability always offends the principles of fundamental justice irrespective of the nature of the offence; it offends s. 7 of the Charter if as a result, anyone is deprived of his life, liberty or security of the person, irrespective of the requirement of public interest. In such cases it might only be salvaged for reasons of public interest under s. 1.

84. In this latter regard, something might be added.

85. Administrative expediency, absolute liability's main supportive argument, will undoubtedly under s. 1 be invoked and occasionally succeed. Indeed, administrative expediency certainly has its place in administrative law. But when administrative law chooses to call in aid imprisonment through penal law, indeed sometimes criminal law and the added stigma attached to a conviction, exceptional, in my view, will be the case where the liberty or even the security of the person guaranteed under s. 7 should be sacrificed to administrative expediency. Section 1 may, for reasons of administrative expediency, successfully come to the rescue of an otherwise violation of s. 7, but only in cases arising out of exceptional conditions, such as natural disasters, the outbreak of war, epidemics, and the like.

Per Wilson J, concurring (in obiter) …

119. I have already indicated that in my view a law which interferes with the liberty of the citizen in violation of the principles of fundamental justice cannot be saved by s. 1 as being either reasonable or justified. The concepts are mutually exclusive. This is not, of course, to say that no limits can be put upon the right to life, liberty and security of the person. They clearly can, but only if they are imposed in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice and survive the tests in s. 1 as being reasonable and justified in a free and democratic society. Nor is the government precluded from resort to s. 33 of the Charter in order to dispense with the requirements of fundamental justice when, in a case of emergency, it seeks to impose restrictions on the s. 7 right. This, however, will be a policy decision for which the government concerned will be politically accountable to the people. As it is, s. 94 cannot, in my view, be saved by s. 1 if it violates s. 7. The sole question is whether it violates s. 7.

5.2 R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine

R v Malmo-Levine; R v Caine*, 2003 SCC 74 (CanLII), [2003] 3 SCR 571

Per McLachlin, CJ and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major, Bastarache and Binnie JJ; Arbour, LeBel and Deschamps JJ. dissenting in part …

96 We do not think that these authorities should be taken as suggesting that courts engage in a free-standing inquiry under s. 7 into whether a particular legislative measure "strikes the right balance" between individual and societal interests in general, or that achieving the right balance is itself an overarching principle of fundamental justice. Such a general undertaking to balance individual and societal interests, independent of any identified principle of fundamental justice, would entirely collapse the s. 1 inquiry into s. 7. The procedural implications of such a collapse are significant. Counsel for the appellant Caine, for example, urges that the appellants having identified a threat to the liberty or security of the person, the evidentiary onus should switch at once to the Crown within s. 7 "to provide evidence of the significant harm that it relies upon to justify the use of criminal sanctions" (Caine's factum, at para. 24).

97 We do not agree. In R. v. Mills, 1999 CanLII 637 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 668, a majority of this Court pointed out that, despite certain similarities between the balancing of interests in ss. 7 and 1, there are important differences. Firstly, the issue under s. 7 is the delineation of the boundaries of the rights and principles in question whereas under s. 1 the question is whether an infringement may be justified (para. 66). Secondly, it was affirmed that under s. 7 it is the claimant who bears the onus of proof throughout. It is only if an infringement of s. 7 is established that the onus switches to the Crown to justify the infringement under s. 1. Thirdly, the range of interests to be taken into account under s. 1 is much broader than those relevant to s. 7. The Court said in Mills, at para. 67:

> Because of these differences, the nature of the issues and interests to be balanced is not the same under the two sections. As Lamer J. (as he then was) stated in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at p. 503: "the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system". In contrast, s. 1 is concerned with the values underlying a free and democratic society, which are broader in nature. In R. v.

Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103, Dickson C.J. stated, at p. 136, that these values and principles "embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society". In R. v. Keegstra,1990 CanLII 24 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 697, at p. 737, Dickson C.J. described such values and principles as "numerous, covering the guarantees enumerated in the Charter and more".

98 The balancing of individual and societal interests within s. 7 is only relevant when elucidating a particular principle of fundamental justice. As Sopinka J. explained in Rodriguez, supra, "in arriving at these principles [of fundamental justice], a balancing of the interest of the state and the individual is required" (pp. 592-93 (emphasis added)). Once the principle of fundamental justice has been elucidated, however, it is not within the ambit of s. 7 to bring into account such "societal interests" as health care costs. Those considerations will be looked at, if at all, under s. 1. As Lamer C.J. commented in R. v. Swain, 1991 CanLII 104 (SCC), [1991] 1 SCR 933, at p. 977:

It is not appropriate for the state to thwart the exercise of the accused's right by attempting to bring societal interests into the principles of fundamental justice and to thereby limit an accused's s. 7 rights. Societal interests are to be dealt with under s. 1 of the Charter, where the Crown has the burden of proving that the impugned law is demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

5.3 Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford

Canada (Attorney General) v Bedford*, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 SCR 1101

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

[1] The Chief Justice —

[129] It has been said that a law that violates s. 7 is unlikely to be justified under s. 1 of the Charter (Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518). The significance of the fundamental rights protected by s. 7 supports this observation. Nevertheless, the jurisprudence has also recognized that there may be some cases where s. 1 has a role to play (see, e.g., Malmo-Levine, at paras. 96-98). Depending on the importance of the legislative goal and the nature of the s. 7 infringement in a particular case, the possibility that the government could establish that a s. 7 violation is justified under s. 1 of the Charter cannot be discounted.

[161] The appellant Attorneys General have not seriously argued that the laws, if found to infringe s. 7, can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Only the Attorney General of Canada addressed this in his factum, and then, only briefly. I therefore find it unnecessary to engage in a full s. 1 analysis for each of the impugned provisions. However, some of their arguments under s. 7 of the Charter are properly addressed at this stage of the analysis.

[162] In particular, the Attorneys General attempt to justify the living on the avails provision on the basis that it must be drafted broadly in order to capture all exploitative relationships, which can be difficult to identify. However, the law not only catches drivers and bodyguards, who may actually be pimps, but it also catches clearly non-exploitative relationships, such as receptionists or accountants who work with prostitutes. The law is therefore not minimally impairing. Nor, at the final stage of the s. 1 inquiry, is the law's effect of preventing prostitutes from taking measures that would increase their safety, and possibly save their lives, outweighed by the law's positive effect of protecting prostitutes from exploitative relationships.

[163] The Attorneys General have not raised any other arguments distinct from those considered under s. 7. I therefore find that the impugned laws are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

Why do you think the Attorneys General did not make a serious section 1 argument in this case? Should the Attorneys General have made such an argument? In contrast with the decision in Bedford, the Supreme Court in Carter heard argument about section 1 and undertook a detailed analysis of the section. What does this suggest about the difference between section 7 and section 1?

5.4 Carter v Canada (Attorney General)

Carter v Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5 (CanLII), [2015] 1 SCR 331; 2015 SCC 5

The following is the judgment delivered by

[79] Before turning to the principles of fundamental justice at play, a general comment is in order. In determining whether the deprivation of life, liberty and security of the person is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7, courts are not concerned with competing social interests or public benefits conferred by the impugned law. These competing moral claims and broad societal benefits are more appropriately considered at the stage of justification under s. 1of the Charter (Bedford, at paras. 123 and 125).

[94] In order to justify the infringement of the appellants' s. 7 rights under s. 1 of the Charter, Canada must show that the law has a pressing and substantial object and that the means chosen are proportional to that object. A law is proportionate if (1) the means adopted are rationally connected to that objective; (2) it is minimally impairing of the right in question; and (3) there is proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the law: R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103.

[95] It is difficult to justify a s. 7 violation: see Motor Vehicle Reference, at p. 518; G. (J.), at para. 99. The rights protected by s. 7 are fundamental, and "not easily overridden by competing social interests" (Charkaoui, at para. 66). And it is hard to justify a law that runs afoul of the principles of fundamental justice and is thus inherently flawed (Bedford, at para. 96). However, in some situations the state may be able to show that the public good — a matter not considered under s. 7, which looks only at the impact on the rights claimants — justifies depriving an individual of life, liberty or security of the person under s. 1 of the Charter. More particularly, in cases such as this where the competing societal interests are themselves protected under the Charter, a restriction on s. 7 rights may in the end be found to be proportionate to its objective.

[96] Here, the limit is prescribed by law, and the appellants concede that the law has a pressing and substantial objective. The question is whether the government has demonstrated that the prohibition is proportionate.

[97] At this stage of the analysis, the courts must accord the legislature a measure of deference. Proportionality does not require perfection: Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v. Whatcott, 2013 SCC 11, [2013] 1 SCR 467, at para. 78. Section 1 only requires that the limits be "reasonable". This Court has emphasized that there may be a number of possible solutions to a particular social problem, and suggested that a "complex regulatory response" to a social ill will garner a high degree of deference (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 37).

[98] On the one hand, as the trial judge noted, physician-assisted death involves complex issues of social policy and a number of competing societal values. Parliament faces a difficult task in addressing this issue; it must weigh and balance the perspective of those who might be at risk in a permissive regime against that of those who seek assistance in dying. It follows that a high degree of deference is owed to Parliament's decision to impose an absolute prohibition on assisted death. On the other hand, the trial judge also found — and we agree — that the absolute prohibition could not be described as a "complex regulatory response" (para. 1180). The degree of deference owed to Parliament, while high, is accordingly reduced.

Rational Connection

[99] The government must show that the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying is rationally connected to the goal of protecting the vulnerable from being induced to take their own lives in times of weakness. The question is whether the means the law adopts are a rational way for the legislature to pursue its objective. If not, rights are limited for no good reason. To establish a rational connection, the government need only show that there is a causal connection between the infringement and the benefit sought "on the basis of reason or logic": RJR-MacDonald, at para. 153.

[100] We agree with Finch C.J.B.C. in the Court of Appeal that, where an activity poses certain risks, prohibition of the activity in question is a rational method of curtailing the risks (para. 175). We therefore conclude that there is a rational connection between the prohibition and its objective.

[101] The appellants argue that the absolute nature of the prohibition is not logically connected to the object of the provision. This is another way of saying that the prohibition goes too far. In our view, this argument is better dealt with in the inquiry into minimal impairment. It is clearly rational to conclude that a law that bars all persons from accessing assistance in suicide will protect the vulnerable from being induced to commit suicide at a time of weakness. The means here are logically connected with the objective.

Minimal Impairment

[102] At this stage of the analysis, the question is whether the limit on the right is reasonably tailored to the objective. The inquiry into minimal impairment asks "whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal" (Hutterian Brethren, at para. 53). The burden is on the government to show the absence of less drastic means of achieving the objective "in a real and substantial manner" (ibid., at para. 55). The analysis at this stage is meant to ensure that the deprivation of Charter rights is confined to what is reasonably necessary to achieve the state's object.

[103] The question in this case comes down to whether the absolute prohibition on physician-assisted dying, with its heavy impact on the claimants' s. 7 rights to life, liberty and security of the person, is the least drastic means of achieving the legislative objective. It was the task of the trial judge to determine whether a regime less restrictive of life, liberty and security of the person could address the risks associated with physician-assisted dying, or whether Canada was right to say that the risks could not adequately be addressed through the use of safeguards.

[104] This question lies at the heart of this case and was the focus of much of the evidence at trial. In assessing minimal impairment, the trial judge heard evidence from scientists, medical practitioners, and others who were familiar with end-of-life decision-making in Canada and abroad. She also heard extensive evidence from each of the jurisdictions where physician-assisted dying is legal or regulated. In the trial judge's view, an absolute prohibition would have been necessary if the evidence showed that physicians were unable to reliably assess competence, voluntariness, and non-ambivalence in patients; that physicians fail to understand or apply the informed consent requirement for medical treatment; or if the evidence from permissive jurisdictions showed abuse of patients, carelessness, callousness, or a slippery slope, leading to the casual termination of life (paras. 1365-66).

[105] The trial judge, however, expressly rejected these possibilities. After reviewing the evidence, she concluded that a permissive regime with properly designed and administered safeguards was capable of protecting vulnerable people from abuse and error. While there are risks, to be sure, a carefully designed and managed system is capable of adequately addressing them:

> My review of the evidence in this section, and in the preceding section on the experience in permissive jurisdictions, leads me to conclude that the risks inherent in permitting physician-assisted death can be identified and very substantially minimized through a carefully-designed system imposing stringent limits that are scrupulously monitored and enforced. [para. 883]

[106] The trial judge found that it was feasible for properly qualified and experienced physicians to reliably assess patient competence and voluntariness, and that coercion, undue influence, and ambivalence could all be reliably assessed as part of that process (paras. 795-98, 815, 837, and 843). In reaching this conclusion, she particularly relied on the evidence on the application of the informed consent standard in other medical decision-making in Canada, including end-of-life decision-making (para. 1368). She concluded that it would be possible for physicians to apply the informed consent standard to patients who seek assistance in dying, adding the caution that physicians should ensure that patients are properly informed of their diagnosis and prognosis and the range of available options for medical care, including palliative care interventions aimed at reducing pain and avoiding the loss of personal dignity (para. 831).

[107] As to the risk to vulnerable populations (such as the elderly and disabled), the trial judge found that there was no evidence from permissive jurisdictions that people with disabilities are at heightened risk of accessing physician-assisted dying (paras. 852 and 1242). She thus rejected the contention that unconscious bias by physicians would undermine the assessment process (para. 1129). The trial judge found there was no evidence of inordinate impact on socially vulnerable populations in the permissive jurisdictions, and that in some cases palliative care actually improved post-legalization (para. 731). She also found that while the evidence suggested that the law had both negative and positive impacts on physicians, it did support the conclusion that physicians were better able to provide overall end-of-life treatment once assisted death was legalized (para. 1271). Finally, she found no compelling evidence that a permissive regime in Canada would result in a "practical slippery slope" (para. 1241).

[114] At trial Canada went into some detail about the risks associated with the legalization of physician-assisted dying. In its view, there are many possible sources of error and many factors that can render a patient "decisionally vulnerable" and thereby give rise to the risk that persons without a rational and considered desire for death will in fact end up dead. It points to cognitive impairment, depression or other mental illness, coercion, undue influence, psychological or emotional manipulation, systemic prejudice (against the elderly or people with disabilities), and the possibility of ambivalence or misdiagnosis as factors that may escape detection or give rise to errors in capacity assessment. Essentially, Canada argues that, given the breadth of this list, there is no reliable way to identify those who are vulnerable and those who are not. As a result, it says, a blanket prohibition is necessary.

[115] The evidence accepted by the trial judge does not support Canada's argument. Based on the evidence regarding assessment processes in comparable end-of-life medical decision-making in Canada, the trial judge concluded that vulnerability can be assessed on an individual basis, using the procedures that physicians apply in their assessment of informed consent and decisional capacity in the context of medical decision-making more generally. Concerns about decisional capacity and vulnerability arise in all end-of-life medical decision-making. Logically speaking, there is no reason to think that the injured, ill, and disabled who have the option to refuse or to request withdrawal of lifesaving or life-sustaining treatment, or who seek palliative sedation, are less vulnerable or less susceptible to biased decision-making than those who might seek more active assistance in dying. The risks that Canada describes are already part and parcel of our medical system.

[116] As the trial judge noted, the individual assessment of vulnerability (whatever its source) is implicitly condoned for life-and-death decision-making in Canada. In some cases, these decisions are governed by advance directives, or made by a substitute decision-maker. Canada does not argue that the risk in those circumstances requires an absolute prohibition (indeed, there is currently no federal regulation of such practices). In A.C., Abella J. adverted to the potential vulnerability of adolescents who are faced with life-and-death decisions about medical treatment (paras. 72-78). Yet, this Court implicitly accepted the viability of an individual assessment of decisional capacity in the context of that case. We accept the trial judge's conclusion that it is possible for physicians, with due care and attention to the seriousness of the decision involved, to adequately assess decisional capacity.

[117] The trial judge, on the basis of her consideration of various regimes and how they operate, found that it is possible to establish a regime that addresses the risks associated with physician-assisted death. We agree with the trial judge that the risks associated with physician-assisted death can be limited through a carefully designed and monitored system of safeguards.

[118] Canada also argues that the permissive regulatory regime accepted by the trial judge "accepts too much risk", and that its effectiveness is "speculative" (R.F., at para. 154). In effect, Canada argues that a blanket prohibition should be upheld unless the appellants can demonstrate that an alternative approach eliminates all risk. This effectively reverses the onus under s. 1, requiring the claimant whose rights are infringed to prove less invasive ways of achieving the prohibition's object. The burden of establishing minimal impairment is on the government.

[119] The trial judge found that Canada had not discharged this burden. The evidence, she concluded, did not support the contention that a blanket prohibition was necessary in order to substantially meet the government's objectives. We agree. A theoretical or speculative fear cannot justify an absolute prohibition. As Deschamps J. stated in Chaoulli, at para. 68, the claimant "d[oes] not have the burden of disproving every fear or every threat", nor can the government meet its burden simply by asserting an adverse impact on the public. Justification under s. 1 is a process of demonstration, not intuition or automatic deference to the government's assertion of risk (RJR-MacDonald, at para. 128).

[120] Finally, it is argued that without an absolute prohibition on assisted dying, Canada will descend the slippery slope into euthanasia and condoned murder. Anecdotal examples of controversial cases abroad were cited in support of this argument, only to be countered by anecdotal examples of systems that work well. The resolution of the issue before us falls to be resolved not by competing anecdotes, but by the evidence. The trial judge, after an exhaustive review of the evidence, rejected the argument that adoption of a regulatory regime would initiate a descent down a slippery slope into homicide. We should not lightly assume that the regulatory regime will function defectively, nor should we assume that other criminal sanctions against the taking of lives will prove impotent against abuse.

[121] We find no error in the trial judge's analysis of minimal impairment. We therefore conclude that the absolute prohibition is not minimally impairing.

Deleterious Effects and Salutary Benefits

[122] This stage of the Oakes analysis weighs the impact of the law on protected rights against the beneficial effect of the law in terms of the greater public good. Given our conclusion that the law is not minimally impairing, it is not necessary to go on to this step.

[123] We conclude that s. 241(b) and s. 14 of the Criminal Code are not saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

Following these cases, the Ontario Court of Appeal found a law that violates section 7 justified under section 1.

5.5 R v Michaud

R v Michaud*, 2015 ONCA 585

The judgment of the court was delivered by

[1] LAUWERS J.A.: — Gene Michaud, the late appellant, was a commercial truck driver. He was required by law to equip his truck with a functional speed limiter set to a maximum speed of 105 km/h. The speed limiter on Mr. Michaud's truck was functional, but was set to 109.4 km/h. He was charged with contravening s. 68.1(1) of the Highway Traffic Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. H.8 ("HTA") and s. 14(1) of the equipment regulation, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 587 (the "legislation"), which together impose the speed limiter requirement. Mr. Michaud admitted the facts.

[2] The justice of the peace at first instance acquitted Mr. Michaud on the basis that the legislation infringed his right to security of the person and thereby violated s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ... On appeal, the Ontario Court of Justice admitted fresh evidence, found no Charter violation and set aside the trial decision.

[114] In considering the application of s. 1 of the Charter to a breach of s. 7, the court must first determine whether the purposes, goals or objectives of the limit established by the impugned legislation are pressing and substantial.

(a) Pressing and substantial objectives

[115] It is not disputed that the government's goals in enacting the speed limiter legislation were to improve highway safety by preventing accidents and reducing the severity of collisions, and to reduce greenhouse gas emissions. The daily carnage on our roads shows that the operation of motor vehicles is one of the most common yet potentially dangerous activities carried out routinely by large numbers of individuals in modern society. I accept that these objectives are pressing and substantial.

[116] The s. 1 Charter analysis next considers whether the means by which those purpose are advanced are proportionate: (1) Is the limit rationally connected to the purpose? (2) Does the limit minimally impair the right? (3) Is there proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the law? I address these requirements in turn.

(b) Rational connection

[117] The government must establish a rational "connection between the infringement and the benefit sought on the basis of reason or logic" (RJR-MacDonald Inc., at para. 153; Carter, at para. 99). It must show that the limit is not arbitrary in the sense of being totally unconnected to the purpose for which it was enacted. In doing so, the government need only demonstrate [page107] a reasonable prospect that the limit will further the objective to some extent, not that it will certainly do so: Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, [2009] 2 SCR 567, [2009] S.C.J. No. 37, 2009 SCC 37, at para. 48.

[118] The government argues that requiring trucks to be equipped with speed limiters set at 105 km/h is rationally connected to the objectives of the legislation. By controlling the maximum speed at which truck drivers can drive, speed limiters reduce both the frequency and severity of highway accidents. Highway accidents involving trucks can be very dangerous, and reducing the severity of accidents therefore would improve highway safety.

[119] The appeal judge relied on Dr. Saccomanno's evidence to conclude, at para. 63, that trucks are 20 to 30 times heavier than cars and require 20 to 40 per cent longer stopping distances. Dr. Saccomanno noted, at para. 19 of his affidavit, that "The severity of a crash is also expected to be lower when speed limiters are involved due to lower speed and reduced dissipation of kinetic energy." The trial justice's observation that, "once you are past a certain speed it does not matter" (p. 15), is not supported by the evidence and is counterintuitive. The appellant does not contest the link between speed and the severity of collisions.

[120] The expert evidence in this case, as accepted by the appeal judge, supports the Crown's argument. Beyond the argument about the permissible scope of the appeal addressed above in relation to the first issue, the appellant has not pointed to any palpable or overriding error in the appeal judge's finding of fact, at para. 135, that "the use of speed limiters does contribute to increased safety on the roads". Nor does the appellant point to any error in the appeal judge's finding of fact that speed limiters contribute to reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

[121] I therefore find that the speed limiter law is rationally connected to the goals of improving highway safety and reducing greenhouse gas emissions.

(c) Minimal impairment

[122] In the minimal impairment analysis, the court asks "whether there are less harmful means of achieving the legislative goal" while at the same time deferring to the legislature in instances where it is better situated to choose among a range of alternatives: Hutterian Brethren, at para. 53; Carter, at para. 102. In order to satisfy this branch of the Oakes test, an alternative must achieve the purpose of the legislation to the same extent: Hutterian Brethren, at para. 54. [page108]

[123] The Crown argues that the legislation is minimally impairing in improving highway safety by reducing the speed of trucks; it regulates individual truck drivers only to the degree required to ensure they approach compliance with valid and unchallenged speed limits. It even allows them a 5 per cent margin over the highest speed limit in Ontario.

[124] Although the appellant did not make a fully developed s. 1 argument, the implication of his s. 7 argument is that the legislation is not minimally impairing, because in some traffic conflicts involving trucks it would be safer for a truck driver to be able to accelerate beyond the speed enforced by the speed limiter. The implicit submission is that the legislature should have found a way to achieve highway safety without totally removing truck drivers' ability to accelerate above 105 km/h when it is in the interests of safety for them to be able to so do. For instance, the appellant argues, the use of traffic police officers and radar guns would accomplish the speed reduction objective.

[125] There are two implied assertions to the appellant's position: first, the government's regulatory approach is unsound; and second, the 105 km/h speed limit set for the limiter is itself arbitrary. I reject both assertions.

(i) The government's regulatory approach is not unsound

[126] The government could choose from the three types of regulation: "ex ante" or "precautionary"; "ex post" or deterrent to be enforced solely by penalties; or hybrid, being a combination of both. The hybrid model adopted by the government combines the effectiveness of both approaches in controlling the speed of trucks. This is entirely appropriate where human life or safety is at stake, and where there is scientific uncertainty as to the precise nature or magnitude of the possible risks.

[127] The Highway Traffic Act and its regulations constitute a complex regulatory response to the social problem of motor vehicle and highway safety. The regulatory structure is suffused with technical expertise related to safety, as the evidence in this case shows. There was a real debate between those who assert, like Dr. Saccomanno, that speed limiters enhance highway safety on balance, and those, like Ms. Cirillo, who assert that speed differences brought about by speed limiters cause traffic turbulence which increases the danger of collisions. Where there is debate about countervailing risks in a situation of uncertainty, the regulator must make the call and did so. This is precisely where the judicial "margin of appreciation" comes to the fore and courts ought to defer. [page109]

[128] As the Supreme Court noted in Hutterian Brethren, at para. 37:

> Where a complex regulatory response to a social problem is challenged, courts will generally take a more deferential posture throughout the s. 1 analysis than they will when the impugned measure is a penal statute directly threatening the liberty of the accused. . . . The bar of constitutionality must not be set so high that responsible, creative solutions to difficult problems would be threatened. A degree of deference is therefore appropriate.
> [Emphasis added; citations omitted]

[129] In Carter, the Supreme Court repeated, at para. 97, that "a complex regulatory response' to a social ill will garner a high degree of deference", citing Hutterian Brethren. However, the court added, at para. 98, that an "absolute prohibition could not be described as a complex regulatory response'".

[130] However, this is not a case in which the concept of prohibition can play a useful analytical role. Picking out one feature from a very complex regulatory structure is too granular an approach. Assuming that the limit could be seen as an absolute prohibition on excessive speeding by trucks, it does not automatically fail, as this court noted in Cochrane v. Ontario (Attorney General) (2008), 2008 ONCA 718 (CanLII), 92 O.R. (3d) 321, [2008] O.J. No. 4165 (C.A.), at para. 34 (pit bull ban).

[131] The legislature has determined that the objective of ensuring highway safety cannot be not achieved satisfactorily without a blanket prohibition on speeding by trucks, enforced by speed limiters. As stated in Hutterian Brethren, a minimal impairment analysis does not require the government to institute less impairing measures that do not achieve its objective.

[132] The choice of the hybrid form of safety regulation, and the specific decision to require trucks to be equipped with speed limiters, are uniquely within the purview of the regulator.

(ii) The 105 km/h speed limit set for the limiter is not arbitrary

[133] In the absence of specific evidence, the trial justice noted, at p. 17, that "it can only be surmised that the 105 km/ h [page110] figure was arrived at by the government without the benefit of science". His inference might actually be true given the state of the science. If so, is it fatal to the government's position? In my view, it is not.

[134] Once the policy decision was made to require truck speed limiters, the obvious question was: to what speed should trucks be limited? Although, as the appeal judge noted, truck speed limiters are becoming more prevalent in North America, the absence of experience on which the science would be based meant that Ontario had to select some number. Presumably, with experience, the number could change if it turned out not to be well tailored. The setting of any number in a safety standard has a degree of arbitrariness about it, in that the number could easily be slightly higher or slightly lower, but this is not arbitrariness in a constitutional sense. There is nothing obviously outlandish or "totally out of sync" in the limit of 105 km/h.

[135] In oral argument, in response to a question from the bench, counsel for Mr. Michaud said that he would be content with a speed limiter set to 110 km/h, since Mr. Michaud had set his limiter at 109.4 km/h. The fact that the live dispute in this appeal could boil down to a 5 km/h difference of opinion as to the maximum speed shows how necessary the margin of appreciation for regulators really is, and illustrates the inadvisability of the courts undertaking too searching an analysis of the legislative response to public safety concerns. Those qualified to assess the evidence and determine the appropriate response are the regulators and policy makers who have developed expertise in precisely this type of regulation and the cost-benefit analysis it demands.

[136] I would find that the legislative choice to set truck speed limiters at 105 km/h falls within the reasonable range of policy choices open to the government. The number reflects a 5 per cent margin over the legal speeding limit and is well within the margin of appreciation or room to manoeuvre due to the regulator. I would find the speed limiter legislation to be minimally impairing.

(d) The proportionality of the legislation's effects

[137] The proportionality analysis under s. 1 of the Charter differs from the analysis undertaken at the second stage of s. 7 relating to the application of the principles of fundamental justice. The s. 1 analysis is prescribed by the Supreme Court in Hutterian Brethren: Is the limit on the right proportionate in effect to the public benefit conferred by the limit (para. 73)? This analysis "takes full account of the severity of the deleterious [page111] effects of a measure on individuals or groups'" (para. 76). It entails a broad assessment of whether the "benefits of the impugned law are worth the costs of the rights limitation" (para. 77), or whether "the deleterious effects are out of proportion with the public good achieved by the infringing measure" (para. 78).

[138] The task involves balancing the harm done to Mr. Michaud's s. 7 right to security of the person, along with other truck drivers affected by the legislation, against the benefit to the public resulting from truck speed limiters set to 105 km/h.

[139] At its highest, the evidence shows that in 2 per cent of the traffic conflicts involving trucks, it would be less dangerous if a truck driver could accelerate to avoid a collision. It follows that in 98 per cent of such traffic conflicts, the inability to accelerate does not expose the truck driver to harm. Braking, steering and other evasive manoeuvres are sufficient.

[140] Moreover, the fact that acceleration is used as an evasive technique in only 2 per cent of traffic conflicts does not support the appellant's assertion that, in those situations, he must be able to accelerate up to speeds faster than 105 km/h in any event. I note that it is not clear from the evidence what proportion of the 2 per cent is made up of trucks moving at maximum speed. Traffic conflicts also happen in situations where the truck is not at maximum speed, such as entering the highway (appeal decision, para. 113) or exiting (appeal decision, para. 114). The actual proportion of traffic conflicts that would engage a truck's need to accelerate would therefore be smaller than 2 per cent. The 2 per cent statistic might overstate the deleterious effects on Mr. Michaud and his colleagues having their speed limiters set to 105 km/h.

[141] With respect to Ms. Cirillo's contention that the speed limiters cause traffic turbulence, which is itself dangerous, the appeal judge found, at para. 70, that Ms. Cirillo "was not aware of any studies on speed limiters at all let alone a study that showed that speed limiters make speed variance more likely or that accident rates increase". The appeal judge found, in the context of making out Mr. Michaud's s. 7 claim where the onus was on the appellant, at para. 102, that Ms. Cirillo did not offer any evidence that speed limiters lead to the speed differential she identified as a greater cause of accidents than speeding. Finally, the appeal judge found, at para. 104, that, in light of Dr. Saccomanno's evidence, Ms. Cirillo did not establish that speed differential caused more accidents than speeding.

[142] The evidence shows that forced speed reduction for trucks saves lives. As noted, the appeal judge accepted Dr. Saccomanno's evidence that speed limiters contribute to increased [page112] highway safety (paras. 135, 140). There was undisputed evidence that speed limiters decrease the severity of accidents. There was also evidence that speed limiter reduce the frequency of accidents. The appeal judge accepted this evidence (para. 60).

[143] In light of these findings, the established salutary effects of the speed limiter legislation outweigh its less well-established deleterious effects. There is no evidence that the effects of the speed limiter legislation are "out of all proportion" to its objectives: Bedford, at para. 22.

(e) Conclusion on the s. 1 Charter analysis

[144] To summarize, I would find, on the evidence, that the purposes of the speed limiter legislation for trucks, being the improvement of highway safety and the reduction of greenhouse gases, are pressing and substantial. The means by which these purposes are advanced are proportionate in that the limiter legislation is rationally connected to the purposes; in terms of the margin of appreciation due to the regulator, the speed limiter legislation minimally impairs the s. 7 right to security of the person of truck drivers; and there is proportionality between the deleterious and salutary effects of the legislation, since the public benefits associated with improved highway safety exceed the detrimental effects on the s. 7 right of truck drivers.

[145] I would uphold the legislation under s. 1 of the Charter. The Crown has justified the breach of Mr. Michaud's s. 7 Charter right as a "reasonable" limit that is "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society" under s. 1 of the Charter.

While the Supreme Court has not, to date, upheld a law found to violate section 7 under section 1, this possibility remains open.

5.6 R v Safarzadeh Markhali

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

R v Safarzadeh Markhali, 2016 SCC 14, [2016] 1 SCR 180

The Chief Justice —

[1] A person charged with a crime is held in custody pending trial unless released on bail. If found guilty at trial, an issue arises: In calculating the sentence, how much credit should the person receive for the time already spent in custody? A credit of one day for every day of pre-sentence custody will almost never put the person on equal footing with offenders released on bail, because the time spent in pre-sentence custody does not count for purposes of parole eligibility, earned remission and statutory release: R. v. Summers, 2014 SCC 26, [2014] 1 SCR 575, at para. 26. A one-for-one credit, in other words, results in longer incarceration for offenders detained in pre-sentence custody than for offenders released on bail. On account of this discrepancy and the reality that pre-sentence custody is generally more onerous than post-sentence custody, sentencing courts have historically given "enhanced" credit for time spent in pre-sentence custody.

[2] Parliament revised this regime in 2009. It did not do away with enhanced credit, but it capped that credit at one and a half days for each day of pre-sentence custody. Parliament also — which brings us to the issue in this case — removed a sentencing court's discretion to give any enhanced credit to offenders for pre-sentence custody, if they were denied bail primarily on the basis of their criminal record. The question is whether this law violates the right to liberty guaranteed by s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[3] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the provision infringes s. 7 of the Charter, and is not justified under s. 1 of the Charter.

C. Is the Infringement Justified Under Section 1 of the Charter?

[57] It is difficult, but not impossible, to justify a s. 7 violation under s. 1. Laws that deprive individuals of liberty contrary to a principle of fundamental justice are not easily upheld. However, a law may be saved under s. 1 if the state can point to public goods or competing social interests that are themselves protected by the Charter: Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331, at para. 95. Courts may accord deference to legislatures under s. 1 for breaches of s. 7 where, for example, the law represents a "complex regulatory response" to a social problem: Alberta v. Hutterian Brethren of Wilson Colony, 2009 SCC 37, [2009] 2 SCR 567, at para. 37.

6 Ongoing section 7 dialogue: commercial sex and medically assisted death

Charter cases are often followed by new legislation aimed at responding to the constitutional infirmities and sometimes pursuing the same objectives as the laws earlier found unconstitutional. The term "Charter dialogue" has been used to refer to this form of interaction between the judiciary and the legislature. See Peter W Hogg & Allison A Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue between Courts and Legislatures" (1997) 35:1 Osgoode Hall LJ 75 . Parliament responded to the Supreme Court's decisions in Bedford and Carter with new Criminal Code provisions aimed at addressing the constitutional deficiencies identified in those cases. Further constitutional challenges followed enactment of new criminal commodification offences and amendment of medically assisted death provisions. The following materials explain the ongoing Charter dialogue in these two policy areas, providing you with an opportunity to apply what you have learned about section 7.

6.1 Commercial exchange of sexual touching

As noted above, the Court in Bedford found that three criminal offence provisions relating to adult prostitution in Canada did not accord with principles of fundamental justice and were not demonstrably justified under section 1 of the Charter. The Court then declared the provisions to be invalid but suspended the declaration of invalidity for a period of one year to allow Parliament to decide how to respond.

Recall that in Bedford, the courts made several pronouncements about what the case before them was NOT about. The Application Judge began her decision as follows:

> It is important to state at the outset what this case is not about: the court has not been called upon to decide whether or not there is a constitutional right to sell sex or to decide which policy model regarding prostitution is better. That is the role of Parliament. Rather, it is this court's task to decide the merits of this particular legal challenge, which is whether certain provisions of the Criminal Code are in violation of the Charter…

The Supreme Court also set out at the beginning of its decision what it would and would not be addressing:

> These appeals and the cross-appeal are not about whether prostitution should be legal or not. They are about whether the laws Parliament has enacted on how prostitution may be carried out pass constitutional muster.

In response to the Supreme Court's decision in Bedford, Parliament enacted An Act to amend the Criminal Code in response to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Attorney General of Canada v Bedford and to make consequential amendments to other Acts, short title, The Protection of Communities and Exploited Persons Act (PCEPA). Portions of the Preamble to PCEPA are excerpted below. As you read the following materials, think about whether the laws Parliament enacted after the decision in Bedford pass constitutional muster. You will want to consider the following questions. What activities are – and are not – captured by the new offence provisions? What are the goals of the new offences? How do those goals compare with the goals of the offence provisions at issue in Bedford? How do the answers to these questions impact whether the new laws violate section 7 of the Charter? How might the answers to these questions impact whether a violation of section 7 might be demonstrably justified under section 1?

6.1.1 Bill C-36 – The Protection of Communities and Exploited Persons Act – Preamble

> Whereas the Parliament of Canada has grave concerns about the exploitation that is inherent in prostitution and the risks of violence posed to those who engage in it;
> Whereas the Parliament of Canada recognizes the social harm caused by the objectification of the human body and the commodification of sexual activity;
> Whereas it is important to protect human dignity and the equality of all Canadians by discouraging prostitution, which has a disproportionate impact on women and children;
>
> Whereas it is important to denounce and prohibit the purchase of sexual services because it creates a demand for prostitution;
> Whereas it is important to continue to denounce and prohibit the procurement of persons for the purpose of prostitution and the development of economic interests in the exploitation of the prostitution of others as well as the commercialization and institutionalization of prostitution;
> Whereas the Parliament of Canada wishes to encourage those who engage in prostitution to report incidents of violence and to leave prostitution;
> And whereas the Parliament of Canada is committed to protecting communities from the harms associated with prostitution;

Four new criminal offences were enacted by PCEPA. Notice the exceptions to the material benefit offence. How do these exceptions respond to the Supreme Court's decision in Bedford? Do they?

6.1.2 New Offences – commodification of sexual activity

> Obtaining sexual services for consideration
> 286.1 (1) Everyone who, in any place, obtains for consideration, or communicates with anyone for the purpose of obtaining for consideration, the sexual services of a person is guilty of [an offence]
>
> Material benefit from sexual services
> (1) Every person who receives a financial or other material benefit, knowing that it is obtained by or derived directly or indirectly from the commission of an offence under subsection 286.1(1), is guilty of [an offence]
> Presumption

(3) For the purposes of subsections (1) and (2), evidence that a person lives with or is habitually in the company of a person who offers or provides sexual services for consideration is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that the person received a financial or other material benefit from those services.

Exception

(4) Subject to subsection (5), subsections (1) and (2) do not apply to a person who receives the benefit

(a) in the context of a legitimate living arrangement with the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived;

(b) as a result of a legal or moral obligation of the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived;

(c) in consideration for a service or good that they offer, on the same terms and conditions, to the general public; or

(d) in consideration for a service or good that they do not offer to the general public but that they offered or provided to the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived, if they did not counsel or encourage that person to provide sexual services and the benefit is proportionate to the value of the service or good.

No exception

(5) Subsection (4) does not apply to a person who commits an offence under subsection (1) or (2) if that person

(a) used, threatened to use or attempted to use violence, intimidation or coercion in relation to the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived;

(b) abused a position of trust, power or authority in relation to the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived;

(c) provided a drug, alcohol or any other intoxicating substance to the person from whose sexual services the benefit is derived for the purpose of aiding or abetting that person to offer or provide sexual services for consideration;

(d) engaged in conduct, in relation to any person, that would constitute an offence under section 286.3; or

(e) received the benefit in the context of a commercial enterprise that offers sexual services for consideration.

Procuring

286.3 (1) Everyone who procures a person to offer or provide sexual services for consideration or, for the purpose of facilitating an offence under subsection 286.1(1), recruits, holds, conceals or harbours a person who offers or provides sexual services for consideration, or exercises control, direction or influence over the movements of that person, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term of not more than 14 years.

Advertising sexual services

286.4 Everyone who knowingly advertises an offer to provide sexual services for consideration is guilty of [an offence]

PCEPA also included an immunity from prosecution. Why do you think this immunity was included in the legislative scheme? How do you think this may impact the section 7 analysis?

Immunity — material benefit and advertising

286.5 (1) No person shall be prosecuted for

(a) an offence under section 286.2 if the benefit is derived from the provision of their own sexual services; or

(b) an offence under section 286.4 in relation to the advertisement of their own sexual services.

Immunity — aiding, abetting, etc.

(2) No person shall be prosecuted for aiding, abetting, conspiring or attempting to commit an offence under any of sections 286.1 to 286.4 or being an accessory after the fact or counselling a person to be a party to such an offence, if the offence relates to the offering or provision of their own sexual services.

The constitutionality of some of the new offence provisions enacted by PCEPA has been challenged in a series of criminal cases. All these cases involved charges against third parties (drivers or pimps/managers) who argued the Material Benefit Offence, the Procuring Offence, and the Advertising Offence violated sex workers' section 7 rights, relying on a device called a reasonable hypothetical. This allowed the applicants to ask the court to assess constitutionality without regard to the circumstances of the case before them but, rather, based on hypothetical circumstances that are reasonably likely to occur.

Excerpted below are portions of the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal in R v NS upholding the impugned offence provisions as constitutional. Do you agree with the decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal? Why or why not? Think about whether and how your personal perspective on this subject may have influenced your view on whether the case is correctly decided.

6.1.3 R v NS

R v NS*, 2022 ONCA 160

On appeal from the acquittals entered by Justice Phillip Sutherland of the Superior Court of Justice, on May 17, 2021.

Hoy J.A.: …

[2] The respondent was charged with several offences relating to his sale of the complainant's sexual services. He successfully challenged the constitutionality of three of the new provisions of the Criminal Code enacted by Bill C-36 – s. 286.2 (material benefit), s. 286.3 (procuring), and s. 286.4 (advertising) – on the basis that they infringe the rights of a hypothetical person to security of the person and, in some cases, to liberty under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms: R. v. N.S., 2021 ONSC 1628. The application judge found that the infringements were not a justifiable limit under s. 1 and struck down the impugned provisions.

[3] The Crown appeals.

[4] For the following reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the respondent's acquittals, and order a new trial.

[21] At the time of Bedford, it was not illegal to exchange sex for money. The PCEPA changed that. While some advocated for the decriminalization and regulation of the sex trade, Parliament adopted a variant of the so-called "Nordic Model", which had been adopted in several other countries. The Nordic Model views the sex trade as a form of sexual exploitation. It targets those who create the demand for prostitution and those who capitalize on it. Parliament did not accept that persons who provide sexual services for consideration should be viewed as "workers" and that prostitution should be legal sex "work"… It was concerned that prostitution was linked to human trafficking. As the Minister of Justice put it in debate at second reading, "[D]ecriminalization and legalization [of prostitution] lead to increased human trafficking for the purpose of sexual exploitation"

V. SECTION 7 AND THE PURPOSE OF THE PCEPA

[43] As explained in Bedford, a law's compliance with s. 7 of the Charter turns on a proper assessment of the law's objective. When an impugned provision engages s. 7, its purpose must be identified to determine whether the impairment of the s. 7 right is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Does it respect the basic values against arbitrariness, overbreadth and gross disproportionality?

[59] I would describe the purposes of the PCEPA differently from the application judge. In my view, the PCEPA has three purposes: first, to reduce the demand for prostitution with a view to discouraging entry into it, deterring participation in it and ultimately abolishing it to the greatest extent possible, in order to protect communities, human dignity and equality; second, to prohibit the promotion of the prostitution of others, the development of economic interests in the exploitation of the prostitution of others, and the institutionalization of prostitution through commercial enterprises in order to protect communities, human dignity and equality; and, third, to mitigate some of the dangers associated with the continued, unlawful provision of sexual services for consideration. In particular, Parliament's latter objective is to ensure that, as much as possible, persons who continue to provide their sexual services for consideration, contrary to law, can avail themselves of the safety-enhancing measures identified in Bedford and report incidents of violence, without fear of prosecution.

[60] The main difference between the parties is how they would describe the PCEPA's purpose in relation to protection or safety. The Crown argues that the PCEPA permits some measures to enhance safety as an "ancillary objective". The respondent and the interveners argue that the application judge correctly described one of the purposes of the PCEPA as to protect sex workers from violence, abuse and exploitation to protect the health and safety of sex workers. As is apparent from my articulation of the purposes of the PCEPA, I disagree with that latter characterization.

[61] There is no doubt that Parliament was concerned about the safety of those who engage in the provision of sexual services for consideration. There was express discussion about this issue during the parliamentary debates. The short title of the PCEPA (the Protection of Communities and Exploited Persons Act), the recognition in the preamble of "the risks of violence posed to those who engage in [prostitution]", the statements in the Technical Paper and the fact that the PCEPA permits those who provide their sexual services for consideration to employ the safety measures identified in Bedford further indicate that the safety of those who provide sexual services for consideration was a concern of Parliament.

[62] The PCEPA, however, was an explicit response to Bedford. While Parliament addressed the specific safety issues which were the focus in Bedford – working from a fixed indoor location, hiring persons who may enhance safety, and the ability to negotiate conditions for the sale of sexual services in a public place – it also chose to criminalize prostitution by prohibiting the demand and reinforcing the prohibition on the exploitation of others by third parties. As noted above, Minister MacKay was clear that Parliament sought to "create the climate in which prostitutes can take certain specific measures, steps to further protect themselves or insulate themselves from violence." He was also clear, however, that the best way to protect them was to reduce prostitution itself. This is reflected in the scheme of the PCEPA as a whole.

[63] It is for these reasons that I characterize the safety-related purpose of the PCEPA (beyond the protection of communities, human dignity and equality, through its first and second purposes) as being limited to ensuring that persons who continue to provide their sexual services for consideration, contrary to law, can avail themselves of the safety-enhancing measures identified in Bedford and report incidents of violence.

The Ontario Court of Appeal thereafter found: the Material Benefit Offence was not engaged because the hypothetical facts fell within the exceptions in section 286.2(4); the Procuring Offence violated the liberty of the hypothetical person who proposed that her young homeless friend engage in prostitution (because of the possibility of imprisonment) but accorded with principles of fundamental justice; and the Advertising Offence did not violate any of the rights protected by section 7.

The Supreme Court of Canada recently upheld the Material Benefit Offence and the Procuring Offence in R v Kloubakov, clarifying the objectives of PCEPA as follows:

[66] We would reformulate the Alberta and Ontario courts of appeal's statement of the purposes of the PCEPA for two reasons. First, as this Court recently emphasized in R. v. Ndhlovu, 2022 SCC 38, "[t]he law's purpose should be succinct, precise, and characterized at the appropriate level of generality, which 'resides between the statement of an "animating social value" — which is too general — and a narrow articulation' that amounts to a virtual repetition of the challenged provision, divorced from its context" (para. 62, quoting R. v. Safarzadeh-Markhali, 2016 SCC 14, [2016] 1 SCR 180, at para. 27, quoting Moriarity, at para. 28). With respect, the three purposes articulated by the Alberta and Ontario courts of appeal are not sufficiently succinct or precise and involve a summary of the animating social values of the PCEPA.

[67] Second, as this Court also emphasized in Ndhlovu, "[a] law's purpose is distinct from the means used to achieve that purpose" (para. 63, citing Safarzadeh-Markhali, at para. 26, and Moriarity, at para. 27). The three purposes identified by the Alberta and Ontario courts of appeal do not reflect this distinction and combine purposes and means.

[68] In order to frame the purposes of the PCEPA more succinctly and to maintain the essential distinction between purpose and means, we would identify the PCEPA as having two, rather than three, purposes: (1) to reduce the demand for sex work; and (2) to protect sex workers from the risks of violence, abuse, and exploitation associated with the sex work industry. The second purpose has two aspects: (a) to protect sex workers from third parties who commercialize the sale of sexual services; and (b) to allow sex workers to protect themselves from the dangers posed by purchasers of sexual services.

All the new offences enacted by PCEPA were challenged together in a case outside the criminal context. The offences were upheld as constitutional by the Ontario Superior Court of Justice in Canadian Alliance for Sex Work Law Reform v. Attorney General, 2023 ONSC 5197 (CanLII). That decision has been appealed.

6.2 Medical assistance in dying

You encountered the subject of medically assisted death in the Rodriguez and Carter cases considered earlier in this chapter. After the Supreme Court's decision in Carter, Parliament amended the Criminal Code to legally permit people with a grievous and irremediable medical condition whose natural death was reasonably foreseeable to access medical assistance in dying. Soon after, the first constitutional challenge to the new laws was heard in Quebec. Here you see some of the reasons of the Quebec Superior Court (in English translation). Consider whether you agree with this decision.

6.2.1 Truchon c Procureur general du Canada

Truchon c Procureur general du Canada*, 2019 QCCS 3792

BAUDOUIN, J.S.C.

[1] Is it permissible, in the absence of coercion or constraint, for a capable, adult person who is seriously ill with no chance of improvement, in an advanced state of irreversible decline in capability and enduring constant and intolerable suffering to receive medical assistance in dying even though he or she is not approaching death?

[2] Medical assistance in dying, legalized in the wake of the 2015 Supreme Court judgment in Carter, is strictly circumscribed in this country. To receive such assistance, a person must be of full age and eligible for publicly-funded healthcare. He or she must also be capable of making decisions with respect to his or her health, of making a voluntarily request, and of providing free and informed consent. There are also requirements relating to the person's medical condition.

[3] In Canada, the Criminal Code provides that a person must have a grievous and irremediable medical condition fulfilling the following criteria, all of which must be met: (a) they have a serious and incurable illness, disease or disability; (b) their medical condition is characterized by an advanced state of irreversible decline in capability; (c) they are subject to enduring physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to them and that cannot be relieved under conditions they consider acceptable; and (d) their natural death has become reasonably foreseeable.

[5] The applicants, Mr. Jean Truchon and Ms. Nicole Gladu, who have been declared ineligible for medical assistance in dying, challenge the constitutional validity of the requirements in s. 241.2(2)(d) of the Criminal Code and subsection 3 of the first paragraph of s. 26 of the Act respecting end-of-life care, which respectively require that their natural death be reasonably foreseeable or that they be at the end of life in order to obtain such assistance.

[6] They argue that these requirements infringe upon their right to life, liberty and security of the person and their right to equality, which are guaranteed by ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[7] In their view, these requirements also violate the principles set out in Carter, with the consequence of removing from them their right to obtain medical assistance in dying, which this decision had, in fact, granted them.

[9] The Attorney General of Canada argues that Parliament's response to Carter, which requires a reasonably foreseeable natural death, makes it possible to achieve the legislative objectives at issue. More specifically, he argues that permitting medical assistance in dying only for people whose deaths are reasonably foreseeable strikes a reasonable and appropriate balance between, on the one hand, the autonomy of persons who seek medical assistance in dying and, on the other, the interests of society and of vulnerable persons. Thus, this requirement appears to be consistent not only with the Charter but also with the spirit of the judgment in Carter.

6.2.2 Canada: legislative history of Bill C-14

[74] The judgment in Carter, rendered on February 6, 2015, shook up the country's established framework by decriminalizing assisted suicide under certain conditions. By declaring ss. 241(b) and 14 of the Criminal Code unconstitutional, the Supreme Court gave Parliament the option of establishing a legislative regime that complied with the principles in its judgment and ordered the suspension of the declaration of constitutional invalidity for one year.

[75] The government was granted an additional suspension period to complete its task.

[100] In April 2016, the government introduced Bill C-14 in the House of Commons. This came after several months of focused work that involved analyses of Carter, of the reports of the committees referred to above, of the consultations led by provincial physicians' associations and other medical associations, as well as of the substance of other legislative regimes to regulate medical assistance in dying, including the approach favoured by the Quebec legislator that would serve as a source of inspiration for Parliament.

[101] During the second reading of the Bill, the Minister of Justice described the government's process:

From the start, we have known from the Supreme Court of Canada's unanimous Carter decision, that it is not about whether or not to have medical assistance in dying; it is about how we will do it....

With all of this in mind, and in appreciating the limited time frame we have had to respond to the Carter decision, our government has chosen an approach that respects both the charter and the needs and values of Canadians.

First, it would permit physicians and nurse practitioners to provide medical assistance in dying, so that patients who are suffering intolerably from a serious medical condition, and whose death is reasonably foreseeable given all of their medical circumstances, can have a peaceful death and not be forced to endure slow and painful suffering.

> Second, it would commit to study the other situations in which a request for medical assistance in dying might be made; situations that were not in evidence before the court in the Carter litigation and were beyond the scope of its ruling.
> This evidenced-based approach will allow us to respect the autonomy and the charter rights of Canadians while ensuring robust protections for vulnerable persons. It is the right approach for our country.
> [119] …[T]he House of Commons passed Bill C-14, which received royal assent and came into force on June 17, 2016. As a result, several provisions of the Criminal Code were amended by the addition of ss. 241.1 to 241.4 respecting medical assistance in dying. Sections 241.2(1) and (2) more specifically, provide the following:
>
> Eligibility for medical assistance in dying
> 241.2 (1) A person may receive medical assistance in dying only if they meet all of the following criteria:
> (a) they are eligible — or, but for any applicable minimum period of residence or waiting period, would be eligible — for health services funded by a government in Canada;
> (b) they are at least 18 years of age and capable of making decisions with respect to their health;
> (c) they have a grievous and irremediable medical condition;
> (d) they have made a voluntary request for medical assistance in dying
> that, in particular, was not made as a result of external pressure; and
> (e) they give informed consent to receive medical assistance in dying after having been informed of the means that are available to relieve their suffering, including palliative care.
>
> Grievous and irremediable medical condition
> (2) A person has a grievous and irremediable medical condition only if they meet all of the following criteria:
> (a) they have a serious and incurable illness, disease or disability;
> (b) they are in an advanced state of irreversible decline in capability;
> (c) that illness, disease or disability or that state of decline causes them enduring physical or psychological suffering that is intolerable to them and that cannot be relieved under conditions that they consider acceptable; and
> (d) their natural death has become reasonably foreseeable, taking into account all of their medical circumstances, without a prognosis necessarily having been made as to the specific length of time that they have remaining.
> Has Carter Created a Constitutional Right to Medical Assistance in Dying?
> [467] In 2015, the Supreme Court's decision in Carter resolved the broad legal and social debate surrounding the legalization of a certain form of assisted suicide or euthanasia in Canada, which began over twenty years earlier. It laid the foundation for a new permissive regime that includes important guarantees and safeguards.
> [468] Previously, a highly divided Supreme Court in Rodriguez had upheld the general prohibition against assisted suicide in Canada. However, despite that decision, the country continued to debate the legalization of a certain form of euthanasia, and Canadian society's social and ethical evolution has since been marked by an increasing willingness to revisit our relationship with death and end-of-life care.
> [469] In 1983, well before Rodriguez, the Canadian Law Reform Commission had already noted that "the legal profession, the public and those working in the health professions are in favour of legal reforms or at least clarifications in the area of euthanasia, aiding suicide and cessation of treatment". Between 1991 and 2010, several draft bills and studies on the subject were debated in the House of Commons. The Senate submitted a report in 1995 on assisted suicide and euthanasia. In 2011, the Royal Society of Canada also published its report in favour of a certain degree of openness. In 2012, in Quebec, the Select Committee on Dying with Dignity tabled its report in the National Assembly, which served as the springboard for the enactment of the Act respecting end-of- life care that, for the first time in the country, provided for medical aid in dying as end-of-life care.
> [470] Meanwhile, society condemned a form of medical practice expressing therapeutic obstinacy and was aware of developments in foreign jurisdictions that had decided to allow euthanasia.
> [471] This historical context led to Carter, when, in 2012, the Honourable Lynn Smith of the Supreme Court of British Columbia heard a constitutional challenge to the Criminal Code provisions prohibiting assisted dying.
> [472] Of course, many remain opposed to any form of opening to or legalization of medical assistance in dying, either on cultural or religious grounds, or because they fear a change in the social paradigm of our relationship with death and, in particular, major shifts to the detriment of the most vulnerable persons in our society.
> [473] Also, during these same years, the case law on the principles of self- determination, autonomy and human dignity was evolving through a number of major Supreme Court decisions that attest to the rising importance of these values in our law. This trend had already been identified in Jones, Morgentaler and Rodriguez, but was subsequently consolidated in Blencoe, Chaoulli and PHS Community Services Society.
> [474] Thus, more than two decades after Rodriguez, the Supreme Court in Carter agreed to review the issue once again and analyze the rights enshrined in the Charter in light of social progress and with the goal of striking a balance between values that at first glance appear to be competing, namely, the autonomy, liberty and dignity of adults who wish to end their lives due to a grievous and irreversible medical condition, on the one hand, and the protection of the lives of vulnerable persons, on the other.
> [475] In this sense, Carter reaffirms the scope of the individual rights of life, liberty and security of the person and lays the foundation for the legalization of medical assistance in dying throughout Canada. It is, therefore, impossible to ignore it. As such, the teachings of the Supreme Court will guide the Court here.

The parties disagreed, however, on what Carter required. The applicants argued that the Supreme Court's ruling in Carter did not require that a person's natural death be reasonably foreseeable. The Attorney General argued that the reasonable foreseeability of natural death and end-of-life requirements were entirely consistent with the spirit of Carter where the factual circumstances related to Gloria Taylor, who was in the terminal stage of a neurodegenerative disease at the time she joined the litigation in that case. What do you think Carter requires?

The Quebec Superior Court found as follows:

> [532] For the reasons previously explained, the Court concludes that the Supreme Court's statements are general in nature and are not limited to people already in the terminal stage of their lives. Instead, they are intended to recognize the decision-making autonomy and the right of every person to make medical decisions affecting his or her own body, regardless of the timing and potential consequences of those decisions.
> [533] In this case, the applicants' position must be accepted. Mr. Truchon and Ms. Gladu are prevented from making this fundamental decision and from exercising this highly private decision-making autonomy that reflects their value and dignity as human beings. They do not control their physical integrity because the state, through the reasonably foreseeable natural death requirement, prevents them from accessing medical assistance in dying and, above all, forces them to endure painful physical and psychological suffering.
> [534] Therefore, the state, by enacting the reasonably foreseeable natural death requirement, directly interferes with their physical integrity, causes them physical and psychological pain and deprives them of the opportunity to make a fundamental decision that respects their personal dignity and integrity.
> [535] The Court has no hesitation in concluding that the reasonably foreseeable natural death requirement infringes Mr. Truchon and Ms. Gladu's rights to liberty and security, protected by section 7 of the Charter.
> Principles of Fundamental Justice
> [556] After having analyzed the new legislative regime, the challenged statutory provision, the parliamentary debates and the parties' submissions, the Court finds that the objective of s. 241.2(2)(d) Cr. C. is to protect vulnerable persons who might be induced to end their lives in a moment of weakness, by preventing errors when assessing requests for medical assistance in dying.
> [557] The impugned infringing measure lies in the exclusion of persons with a grievous and irremediable medical condition from eligibility for such assistance due to the fact that their natural death is not reasonably foreseeable.
> [563] In practical terms, Parliament sought to limit potential errors that could be committed when assessing people's eligibility and their consequences by imposing a temporal restriction on access to medical assistance in dying. As many of the Attorney General's experts observed, providing medical assistance in dying to a person who will die in the coming days or weeks in any event has less of an impact than to a person who could still live for many years.
> [576] …the object of the legislation is precisely to allow people who meet the state-imposed conditions to request medical assistance in dying. It is admitted that the applicants, having been examined and assessed by several experts, meet every legal requirement except for the one regarding end of life. There is no question of a potential error regarding their eligibility or of protecting them as vulnerable persons due to their medical condition.
> [577] The Court concludes that the reasonably foreseeable natural death requirement is overbroad as regards the applicants.
> [582] The Court… concludes that the provision's prejudicial effects on the applicants' life, liberty and security are very serious and therefore grossly disproportionate to its object. It deprives the applicants of their fundamental choice regarding appropriate care, of their self-determination and of their right to decide the time of their death. Furthermore, it forces them to continue living while experiencing intolerable and pointless suffering, given the irremediable nature of their afflictions.
> [583] This requirement therefore creates an actual state-imposed obligation to live. In the Court's opinion, this is precisely what the Supreme Court wished to avoid for some of our fellow citizens.
> [584] The basis of Carter is to allow competent individuals to end their intolerable suffering when they have a serious and incurable illness with no hope of improvement and are powerless in the face of an advanced state of irreversible decline in capability. The principle stated by the Supreme Court is not to require that people continue to live against their will until, after a given period, they naturally reach the stage of imminent death where they can request medical assistance in dying, after having suffered pointlessly and at the cost of the total denial of their dignity.
> [585] The Court, therefore, concludes that the impugned requirement is disproportionate to the measure's object.
> [587] In sum, the Court concludes that the reasonably foreseeable natural death requirement is overbroad and disproportionate, such that it is inconsistent with the principles of fundamental justice and infringes Mr. Truchon and Ms. Gladu's rights protected by section 7 of the Charter.

The Attorney General's section 1 argument was not successful, and Canada did not appeal the decision in Truchon. Do you think the decision in Truchon should have been appealed? Do you think the decision is correct?

In 2021, the Criminal Code was again amended to legally permit people whose natural death is not reasonably foreseeable but who are suffering intolerably from an irremediable medical condition or disability and who are in an advanced state of decline to access medical assistance in dying. In 2027, this amendment is scheduled to extend to people whose sole underlying medical condition is a mental health condition.

Concerns have been raised about the constitutionality of the current legislative regime. Here you see how constitutional challenges have been framed in two cases commenced in late 2024. Do you think these challenges will be successful?

6.2.3 Two Pending Claims

Notice of Application – Claire Elyse Brosseau, John Scully and Dying with Dignity Canada v AG Canada (August 19, 2024)

> 1. The Applicants, Claire Elyse Brosseau, John Scully, and Dying With Dignity Canada, make an application for the following relief:
> (a) a declaration that the exclusion in s. 241.2(2.1) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C.46, as amended…of individuals with the sole underlying medical condition of mental illness…from eligibility for medical assistance in dying infringes ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ("Charter') and that these violations cannot be justified under s. 1 of the Charter…
> 2. The Applicant, Claire Elyse Brosseau ("Claire"), is an individual residing in Toronto. Claire has been diagnosed with bipolar I disorder. Claire also experiences disordered eating, and has a substance use disorder in remission, and a significant trauma history.

3. Claire's mental illness is grievous, irremediable, and her sole underlying medical condition for the purposes of MAID. Claire has been independently assessed as eligible for MAID, but for the Mental Illness Exclusion.

4. The Applicant, John Scully ("John"), is an individual residing in Toronto. John has been diagnosed with severe chronic post-traumatic stress disorder and major depressive disorder.

5. John's mental illnesses are grievous, irremediable, and his sole underlying medical conditions for the purposes of MAID. John has been independently assessed as eligible for MAID, but for the Mental Illness Exclusion.

Fresh as Amended Notice of Application – KC, Kathrin Mentler, Inclusion Canada, Indigenous Disability Canada/The British Columbia Aboriginal Network on Disability Society, Council of Canadians with Disabilities and Disabled Women's Network of Canada v AG Canada (September 25, 2024)

1. The Applicants make application for:

(a) a declaration that section 241.2(3.1) of the Criminal Code (R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46) ("Criminal Code") as amended and/or enacted by Bill C-7 An act to amend the Criminal Code (medical assistance in dying), which received Royal Assent on March 17, 2021 and is now law ("Bill C-7"), violates section 7 and/or section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms…;

(b) a declaration that sections 227, 241.2(2), 241.2(5.1)(b), 241.2(6), 241.3 and 245(2) of the Criminal Code violate section 7 and/or section 15(1) of the Charter, to the extent that they apply to any provision of medical assistance in dying… under section 241.2 of the Criminal Code to persons whose natural death is not reasonably foreseeable;

Bill C-7 Repeals the Natural Foreseeability of Death Requirement

19. In 2019, the Quebec Superior Court in Truchon…held that the MAiD regime created by Bill C-14 violated sections 7 and 15 of the Charter and Quebec's Act Respecting End-of-Life Care, CQLR c S-32.0001 because the reasonable foreseeability of natural death requirement denied access to MAiD to disabled persons who were suffering intolerably but were not at the end of their lives.

20. In 2021, in response to Truchon, Parliament enacted Bill C-7 which amended the MAiD regime provided for by Bill C-14.

21. Critically, Bill C-7 removed the criterion of reasonable foreseeability of natural death for a grievous and irremediable medical condition (previously, section 241.2(2)(d) of the Criminal Code). As a result, the MAiD regime, as amended by Bill C-7, is no longer restricted to persons at the end of their natural lives ("MAiD Track 2"). The exemptions carved out by MAiD Track 2 are based on a distinction between those who are disabled and those who are not. In contrast, the distinction between those who are eligible for MAiD Track 1, is based on a distinction between those who are dying (their natural death is reasonably foreseeable) and those who are not dying.

22. Bill C-7 decriminalized murder, aiding suicide and administering a noxious thing for many persons with disabilities if performed according to the criteria of the Criminal Code.

23. Bill C-7 only created exemptions for aiding suicide, administering a noxious thing and murder for people who are disabled. Persons who are experiencing intolerable suffering but who are not disabled, are not eligible for MAiD Track 2. MAiD Track 2 is exclusively offered to persons with disabilities.

24. Bill C-7's MAiD Track 2 increases the risk that persons with a disability will be induced to end their lives as a response to suffering. Medical and nurse practitioners are presenting the ending-of-life as a form of medical treatment for people who are disabled. Bill C-7 does not require that treatment options be exhausted before accessing MAiD, which makes choosing death easier. MAiD is portrayed as a no-fail, painless way to alleviate suffering which may incentivize death over other options. Ultimately, this increases the risk that people with disabilities will choose death rather than other solutions for their intolerable suffering. Death should not be a solution for disabled people who experience intolerable suffering but are otherwise not at the end of their lives.

25. By transforming death into a form of medical treatment for persons with disabilities, Parliament has legitimized the idea that death is an appropriate response to feeling like, or being perceived to be, a burden on the health-care system or one's family, and that it is an appropriate response to other suffering reported by persons with disabilities as motivating their wish to die, including loss of dignity or loss of the ability for meaningful activities or activities of daily living.

26. People with disabilities often deal with socioeconomic disadvantage, inadequate housing, institutionalization, social isolation, and other forms of marginalization. Understandably, these problems can lead to intolerable suffering for persons with disabilities, just as they can lead to intolerable suffering for people without disabilities. The difference is that persons with grievous and irremediable medical conditions may now access MAiD Track 2 as a solution to those problems. People without a disability may not choose death. Death as a valid and reasonable solution to suffering is uniquely validated and normalized for persons with disabilities (and only persons with disabilities).

27. Bill C-7 fundamentally changes the relationship between a patient with disabilities, and their medical or nurse practitioners and other care providers. It can undermine the trust a person should have in their service providers. Death is presented as a form of medical treatment but only because they have a disability. Individuals with disabilities have been and continue to be discouraged from accessing health-care services or from disclosing suffering for fear that their provider will recommend death as a solution. Further, a health-care provider communicating to a person with a disability that the person could or should consider MAiD, and that death is an option for their suffering, can shape that person's perceptions of their value, dignity and the degree to which they are, or are perceived to be, a burden. An offer of MAiD also communicates that their circumstances are hopeless and that the health care and other systems do not value their lives, and cannot be relied upon to save or support them. MAiD Track 2 thus narrows the range of options that are available, or that persons with disabilities may perceive as available, for dealing with suffering they are finding intolerable.

28. Bill C-7 has led and/or will lead to a discrepancy in the level of care offered to a person with a disability, and one without. Individuals without a disability will be offered certain supports to treat, or otherwise manage, their condition. By contrast, individuals with a disability will also be offered the chance to die; this may lead to a medical or nurse practitioner not pursuing all possible supports or the person with a disability dying by MAiD because MAiD is easier, more accessible, more available, or more affordable.

7 Contemporary topics: economic rights and the environment

The scope of the rights guaranteed by section 7 continues to evolve. The recognition of new principles of fundamental justice remains possible. Some of the contemporary issues pressing the boundaries of section 7 include economic rights and environmental concerns. The following materials are concerned with the application of section 7 in these contemporary contexts.

7.1 Economic rights

The Supreme Court has left unsettled the extent to which section 7 of the Charter operates outside the context of the administration of justice. Similarly, there remain questions as to whether section 7 may extend to economic rights (at least those which implicate a basic level of human security). There is similar uncertainty as to whether section 7 may impose positive rights on government actors (in the absence of a pre-existing legal obligation). These issues continue to arise in the context of claims involving economic and environmental rights.

As you read the following cases, consider: is the approach of the courts in these cases consistent with the decisions in Bedford and Carter on questions of causation or the meaning of the protected interests? Should the Supreme Court revisit the extent to which section 7 protects a right to basic subsistence in light of more recent developments in section 7 jurisprudence?

7.1.1 Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (Attorney General)

Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927

> What is immediately striking about [section 7] is the inclusion of "security of the person" as opposed to "property". This stands in contrast to the classic liberal formulation, adopted, for example, in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments in the American Bill of Rights, which provide that no person shall be deprived "of life, liberty or property, without due process of law". The intentional exclusion of property from s. 7, and the substitution therefor of "security of the person" has, in our estimation, a dual effect. First, it leads to a general inference that economic rights as generally encompassed by the term "property" are not within the perimeters of the s. 7 guarantee. This is not to declare, however, that no right with an economic component can fall within "security of the person". Lower courts have found that the rubric of "economic rights" embraces a broad spectrum of interests, ranging from such rights, included in various international covenants, as rights to social security, equal pay for equal work, adequate food, clothing and shelter, to traditional property -- contract rights. To exclude all of these at this early moment in the history of Charter interpretation seems to us to be precipitous. We do not, at this moment, choose to pronounce upon whether those economic rights fundamental to human life or survival are to be treated as though they are of the same ilk as corporate-commercial economic rights. In so stating, we find the second effect of the inclusion of "security of the person" to be that a corporation's economic rights find no constitutional protection in that section.

7.1.2 Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General)

Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General)*, 2002 SCC 84; [2002] 4 SCR 429

> The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Gonthier, Iacobucci, Major and Binnie JJ. was delivered by
> 1 Louise Gosselin was born in 1959. She has led a difficult life, complicated by a struggle with psychological problems and drug and alcohol addictions. From time to time she has tried to work, attempting jobs such as cook, waitress, salesperson, and nurse's assistant, among many. But work would wear her down or cause her stress, and she would quit. For most of her adult life, Ms. Gosselin has received social assistance.
> 2 In 1984, the Quebec government altered its existing social assistance scheme in an effort to encourage young people to get job training and join the labour force. Under the scheme, which has since been repealed, the base amount payable to welfare recipients under 30 was lower than the base amount payable to those 30 and over. The new feature was that, to receive an amount comparable to that received by older people, recipients under 30 had to participate in a designated work activity or education program.
> 3 Ms. Gosselin contends that the lower base amount payable to people under 30 violates: … (2) s. 7 of the Canadian Charter, which prevents the government from depriving individuals of liberty and security except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice; …
> 4 On this basis, Ms. Gosselin asks this Court to order the Quebec government to pay the difference between the lower and the higher base amounts to all the people who: (1) lived in Quebec and were between the ages of 18 and 30 at any time from 1985 to 1989; (2) received the lower base amount payable to those under 30; and (3) did not participate in the government programs, for whatever reason. On her submissions, this would mean ordering the government to pay almost $389 million in benefits plus the interest accrued since 1985. Ms. Gosselin claims this remedy on behalf of over 75 000 unnamed class members, none of whom came forward in support of her claim.
> 5 In my view, the evidence fails to support Ms. Gosselin's claim on any of the asserted grounds. Accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal.
> II. Facts and Decisions
> 6 In 1984, in the face of alarming and growing unemployment among young adults, the Quebec legislature made substantial amendments to the Social Aid Act, R.S.Q., c. A-16, creating a new scheme — the scheme at issue in this litigation. Section 29(a) of the Regulation respecting social aid, R.R.Q. 1981, c. A-16, r. 1, made under the Act continued to cap the base amount of welfare payable to those under 30 at roughly one third of the base amount payable to those 30 and over. However, the 1984 scheme for the first time made it possible for people under 30 to increase their welfare payments, over and above the basic entitlement, to the same (or nearly the same) level as those in the 30-and-over group.
> 7 The new scheme was based on the philosophy that the most effective way to encourage and enable young people to join the workforce was to make increased benefits conditional on participation in one of three programs: On-the-job Training, Community Work, or Remedial Education. Participating in either On-the-job Training or Community Work boosted the welfare payment to a person under 30 up to the base amount for those 30 and over; participating in Remedial Education brought an under-30 within $100 of the 30-and-over base amount. The 30-and-over base amount still represented only 55 percent of the poverty level for a single person. For example, in 1987, non-participating under-30s were entitled to $170 per month, compared to $466 per month for welfare recipients 30 and over. According to Statistics Canada, the poverty level for a single person living in a large metropolitan area was $914 per month in 1987. Long-term dependence on welfare was neither socially desirable nor, realistically speaking, economically feasible. The Quebec scheme was designed to encourage under-30s to get training or basic education, helping them to find permanent employment and avoid developing a habit of relying on social assistance during these formative years.
> 8 The government initially made available 30 000 places in the three training programs. The record indicates that the percentage of eligible under-30s who actually participated in the programs averaged around one-third, but it does not explain this participation rate. Although Ms. Gosselin filed a class action on behalf of over 75 000 individuals, she provided no direct evidence of any other young person's experience with the government programs. She alone provided first-hand evidence and testimony as a class member in this case, and she in fact participated in each of the Community Work, Remedial Education and On-the-job Training Programs at various times. She ended up dropping out of virtually every program she started, apparently because of her own personal problems and personality traits. The testimony from one social worker, particularly as his clinic was attached to a psychiatric hospital and therefore received a disproportionate number of welfare recipients who also had serious psychological problems, does not give us a better or more accurate picture of the situation of the other class members, or of the relationship between Ms. Gosselin's personal difficulties and the structure of the welfare program.
> 9 Ms. Gosselin challenged the 1984 social assistance scheme on behalf of all welfare recipients under 30 subject to the differential regime from 1985 to 1989 (when, for reasons unrelated to this litigation, it was replaced by legislation that does not make age-based distinctions). …

B. Does the Social Assistance Scheme Violate Section 7 of the Canadian Charter?

76 The first inquiry is whether the right here contended for — the right to a level of social assistance sufficient to meet basic needs — falls within s. 7. This requires us to consider the content of the right to life, liberty and security of the person, and the nature of the interests protected by s. 7.

77 As emphasized by my colleague Bastarache J., the dominant strand of jurisprudence on s. 7 sees its purpose as guarding against certain kinds of deprivation of life, liberty and security of the person, namely, those "that occur as a result of an individual's interaction with the justice system and its administration": New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G. (J.), 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 46, at para. 65. "[T]he justice system and its administration" refers to "the state's conduct in the course of enforcing and securing compliance with the law" (G. (J.), at para. 65). This view limits the potential scope of "life, liberty and security of the person" by asking whom or what s. 7 protects against. Under this narrow interpretation, s. 7 does not protect against all measures that might in some way impinge on life, liberty or security, but only against those that can be attributed to state action implicating the administration of justice: see Reference re ss. 193 and 195.1(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Man.), 1990 CanLII 105 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 1123 (the "Prostitution Reference"), at pp. 1173-74, per Lamer J. (as he then was), writing for himself; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, 1995 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1995] 1 SCR 315, at paras. 21-23, per Lamer C.J., again writing for himself alone; and G. (J.), supra, for the majority. This approach was affirmed in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), [2000] 2 SCR 307, 2000 SCC 44, per Bastarache J. for the majority.

78 This Court has indicated in its s. 7 decisions that the administration of justice does not refer exclusively to processes operating in the criminal law, as Lamer C.J. observed in G. (J.), supra. Rather, our decisions recognize that the administration of justice can be implicated in a variety of circumstances: see Blencoe, supra (human rights process); B. (R.), supra (parental rights in relation to state-imposed medical treatment); G. (J.), supra (parental rights in the custody process); Winnipeg Child and Family Services (Northwest Area) v. G. (D.F.), 1997 CanLII 336 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 925 (liberty to refuse state-imposed addiction treatment). Bastarache J. argues that s. 7 applies only in an adjudicative context. With respect, I believe that this conclusion may be premature. An adjudicative context might be sufficient, but we have not yet determined that one is necessary in order for s. 7 to be implicated.

79 In my view, it is both unnecessary and undesirable to attempt to state an exhaustive definition of the administration of justice at this stage, delimiting all circumstances in which the administration of justice might conceivably be implicated. The meaning of the administration of justice, and more broadly the meaning of s. 7, should be allowed to develop incrementally, as heretofore unforeseen issues arise for consideration. The issue here is not whether the administration of justice is implicated — plainly it is not — but whether the Court ought to apply s. 7 despite this fact.

80 Can s. 7 apply to protect rights or interests wholly unconnected to the administration of justice? The question remains unanswered. In R. v. Morgentaler, 1988 CanLII 90 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 30, at p. 56, Dickson C.J., for himself and Lamer J. entertained (without deciding on) the possibility that the right to security of the person extends "to protect either interests central to personal autonomy, such as a right to privacy". Similarly, in Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), 1989 CanLII 87 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, at p. 1003, Dickson C.J., for the majority, left open the question of whether s. 7 could operate to protect "economic rights fundamental to human . . . survival". Some cases, while on their facts involving the administration of justice, have described the rights protected by s. 7 without explicitly linking them to the administration of justice: B.(R.), supra; G. (D.F.), supra.

81 Even if s. 7 could be read to encompass economic rights, a further hurdle emerges. Section 7 speaks of the right not to be deprived of life, liberty and security of the person, except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Nothing in the jurisprudence thus far suggests that s. 7 places a positive obligation on the state to ensure that each person enjoys life, liberty or security of the person. Rather, s. 7 has been interpreted as restricting the state's ability to deprive people of these. Such a deprivation does not exist in the case at bar.

82 One day s. 7 may be interpreted to include positive obligations. To evoke Lord Sankey's celebrated phrase in Edwards v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1929 CanLII 438 (UK JCPC), [1930] A.C. 124 (P.C.), at p. 136, the Canadian Charter must be viewed as "a living tree capable of growth and expansion within its natural limits": see Reference re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), 1991 CanLII 61 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 158, at p. 180, per McLachlin J. It would be a mistake to regard s. 7 as frozen, or its content as having been exhaustively defined in previous cases. In this connection, LeBel J.'s words in Blencoe, supra, at para. 188 are apposite:

> We must remember though that s. 7 expresses some of the basic values of the Charter. It is certainly true that we must avoid collapsing the contents of the Charter and perhaps of Canadian law into a flexible and complex provision like s. 7. But its importance is such for the definition of substantive and procedural guarantees in Canadian law that it would be dangerous to freeze the development of this part of the law. The full impact of s. 7 will remain difficult to foresee and assess for a long while yet. Our Court should be alive to the need to safeguard a degree of flexibility in the interpretation and evolution of s. 7 of the Charter.

The question therefore is not whether s. 7 has ever been — or will ever be — recognized as creating positive rights. Rather, the question is whether the present circumstances warrant a novel application of s. 7 as the basis for a positive state obligation to guarantee adequate living standards.

83 I conclude that they do not. With due respect for the views of my colleague Arbour J., I do not believe that there is sufficient evidence in this case to support the proposed interpretation of s. 7. I leave open the possibility that a positive obligation to sustain life, liberty, or security of the person may be made out in special circumstances. However, this is not such a case. The impugned program contained compensatory "workfare" provisions and the evidence of actual hardship is wanting. The frail platform provided by the facts of this case cannot support the weight of a positive state obligation of citizen support.

Do you think the Charter should apply outside the context of the administration of justice? Or should there be some requirement that a state actor is using the justice system to "trigger" the application of section 7? Why or why not?

Section 7 does not, on its face, apply to claims for economic rights, though as we see above, the Supreme Court left open the possibility that such claims could succeed. Because the Charter does not expressly protect economic rights, efforts to ground such rights in section 7 (and section 15(1)) have produced mixed results. While a majority of the Supreme Court dismissed Ms Gosselin's claim, individuals and groups have had some success in using section 7 to ground a right to basic, overnight, shelter. These cases generally arise in the context of efforts by municipalities to prevent the unhoused from constructing shelters in public places (for an early appellate level decision, see for example Victoria (City) v Adams, 2009 BCCA 563).

7.1.3 The Regional Municipality of Waterloo v Persons Unknown and to be Ascertained

The Regional Municipality of Waterloo v Persons Unknown and to be Ascertained*, 2023 ONSC 670

The Honourable Justice M.J. Valente

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

Introduction

[1] The issue in this application of The Regional Municipality of Waterloo (the 'Region') concerns the prohibition against erecting any type of structure, including a tent, on the Region-owned property, municipally known as 100 Victoria Street North, in the city of Kitchener (the 'Property'). More generally, however, the Region's application touches on the unfortunate, complex and nationwide social issue of homelessness.

The Parties and their Respective Positions

[2] In its application, the Region takes the position that the homeless persons who have erected shelters and are living on the Property are in breach of By-Law number 13-050, A By-Law Respecting the Conduct of Persons Entering Upon Buildings, Grounds and Public Transportation Vehicles Owned or Occupied by the Region (the 'By-Law'). The Region seeks, in addition to other relief, a declaration that the homeless living on the Property are in breach of the By-Law together with interim and final orders restraining and enjoining them from breaching the By-Law by remaining and/or re-entering onto the Property pursuant to section 440 of the Municipal Act, 2001, S.O. 2001, c.25, as amended (the 'Municipal Act').

[3] A number of the individuals living at the Property's encampment have filed notices of appearance. … The Named Respondents delivered a notice of constitutional question seeking remedies pursuant to sections 24(1) and 52(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982 c. 11 (the 'Charter'). The Named Respondents allege that the By-law and the trespass notice issued under it breach their section 7 (right to life, liberty and security of person) and section 15(1) (equality) Charter rights in a manner that is not demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

[4] Prior to the matter coming before me for argument, I ordered the appointment of amicus curiae "for the purpose of advocating on behalf of individuals living in the encampment… whose capacity to engage or instruct counsel is in question, who have not retained counsel, and who have no other identified way to participate in these proceedings."

[6] The Region's position is that it does not require the Court's assistance in the determination of its legal rights. It maintains that it may assert its legal rights to evict any trespasser on Region-owned property who are in breach of the By-Law. Rather, the Region brings this application to seek the direction of the Court in how it might enforce its legal rights. Once it has the Court's direction, including a ruling that the Charter rights of the Named Respondents have not been violated, the Region proposes to use this Court's order as a precedent for its treatment of other homeless encampments across the Region.

The By-Law

[7] It is undisputed that the Municipal Act gives the Region the express authority to pass by-laws respecting its public assets and the protection of persons and property (see Municipal Act, ss. 8, 9, and 11(2)). It is also acknowledged that the Trespass to Property Act, R.S.O. 1990, c.T21, as amended, ss. 3 to 8 (the 'TPA') allows an occupier of premises to prohibit or regulate entry onto premises and that the Courts have recognized municipalities as occupiers.

[8] Pursuant to the Municipal Act, the Region enacted the By-Law in December 2013. The By-Law prohibits certain activities on lands owned or occupied by the Region. The prohibited activities include erecting, without authorization, any form of structure on the lands as well as bringing any dangerous, illegal or flammable goods on the lands that are likely to cause injury or damage to the lands.

[9] The purpose of the By-Law is to (i) prevent physical damage to the lands owned or occupied by the Region (the 'Designated Premises') (ii) prevent the disruption of the Region's operations on the Designated Premises; and (iii) regulate the use and enjoyment of the Designated Premises by other persons.

[10] The Region's remedies pursuant to the By-Law are to lay a charge and/or exercise its available remedies under the TPA. These include issuing a written notice or posting a sign prohibiting the impugned conduct and/or requiring the person engaged in the prohibited activity to leave the property in question.

[11] Prior to December 2021, the By-Law was used by the Region to address and regulate homeless encampment complaints. In late November 2021, the Region's by-law enforcement staff attended at a homeless encampment at 34 Stirling Street East, in the city of Kitchener (the 'Stirling Encampment') to enforce the provisions of the By-Law prohibiting unauthorized occupation of Region-owned public lands. To assist with the eviction of the encampment residents, and because of certain health and safety concerns for the Region staff and members of the public stemming from the presence of unsanitary conditions, broken glass, large items and drug paraphernalia, the Region's enforcement staff enlisted the help of a road maintenance crew with heavy equipment to clear the Stirling Encampment.

[12] While the Region's Planning, Development, and Legislative Services and Legal Services Report to Regional Council of December 15, 2021 (the 'December 2021 Report'), maintains that the steps undertaken to evict the Stirling Encampment occupants "were consistent with the requirements of the [B]y-law," the same Report concedes that "the manner in which these actions were carried out did not reflect the dignity of those living at the encampment."

[13] As a result, the Region conducted a review of its then existing encampment eviction process and proposed a draft policy to Regional Council to supplement the By-Law as it specifically applies to homeless encampments. The draft policy was approved by Regional Council on December 15, 2021 (the 'Encampment Policy'). The details of the Encampment Policy are discussed below.

100 Victoria Street North, Kitchener

[14] The Region acquired the Property in November 2012. The Property is located on the corner of Victoria and Weber Streets in the city of Kitchener and is approximately one-half acre in size. It is a gravel parking lot. The VIA Rail/GO Transit and bus stations are to the east of the Property, a commercial plaza lies directly to the west, and a Metrolinx owned rail corridor is to the north. To the south of the Property are a variety of businesses and a church, including St. John's Kitchen, which provides meals during weekdays to persons in need.

[15] In May 2018, the Region and the province of Ontario entered into a Transfer Payment Agreement for the partial funding of the King Victoria Transit Hub (the 'Hub'). The Hub is a new train/bus station for the Region in close proximity to the Property. The Hub will require construction on Region lands. While there are no plans for any construction on the Property, the Region intends to use the Property in the short-term for additional motor vehicle parking for the VIA Rail and GO Transit stations across the street due to an anticipated increased use of the stations with the decline of the pandemic and as a lay-down area for the construction of the Hub. No evidence was, however, proffered by the Region respecting the immediate need for increased parking spaces to accommodate anticipated demand and although the evidence of Ellen McGaghey, the Region's Director of Facilities and Fleet Management, is that the construction of the Hub is projected for spring 2023, Ms. McGaghey admitted in cross-examination that there is no firm construction start date.

[16] In the long-term, the Region intends to use the Property for approximately one hundred dedicated transit customer parking spaces for the new Hub train/bus station. As a term of the Transfer Payment Agreement, the one hundred dedicated parking spaces are required of the Region upon the completion of the first stage of the Hub. It is projected that the contractually required parking will be required some time in late 2024, but there is no firm completion date.

Homelessness in the Region

[17] In 2014, the Region was the first Canadian community to count the number of people found to be experiencing homelessness. In 2018, the federal and provincial governments mandated bi-annual "Point in Time Counts" of the number of people experiencing homelessness. Based on the Region's Point in Time Count that was completed in September 2021, there were approximately 1,085 people experiencing homelessness in the Region. According to Kelly-Anne Salerno, Assistant Director of Housing Operations and Administration for the Region, the approximate 1,100 count is the most reliable information available on the extent of homelessness in the Region. According to the September 2021 Point in Time Count report, the number of people experiencing homelessness in the Region tripled from 2018 to 2021.

[18] In addition to the number of homeless in the Region, the Point in Time Count report also contains data about the demographics of the homeless in the Region. Specifically, of the 1085 experiencing homelessness, 412 were living rough (living on the street, sleeping in parks or squatting in temporary shelter), 385 were experiencing hidden homelessness (provisionally accommodated; couch surfing), 191 were accessing emergency shelters and 63 were institutionalized. Of the individuals who completed a survey during the Point in Time Count, 75% had been experiencing homelessness for more than six months in the last year, 30% of those counted were women, 67% were men, 10% were transgender, Two-Spirit or non-binary. Additionally, of the individuals counted, 17% identified as Indigenous or First Nations and 15% identified as part of a racialized community.

The Encampment

[19] In or around December 2021, a small number of people began erecting tents on the Property without the Region's permission. Over the following six months, approximately 70 temporary shelters were erected to house some 50 people on the Property (the 'Encampment'). As of the hearing of the application, no current evidence was provided with respect to the number of tents and number of homeless persons living on the Property. The most reliable evidence is that, on July 27, 2022, the Region surveyed 53 residents living in the Encampment.

[20] In March 2022 the Region hired Barber Collins Security to monitor the Encampment, to respond to any disruptions and to respond to any complaints from the public, and specifically, from the businesses located in the plaza to the south of the Property. In May 2022, the Region authorized the Barber Collins security staff to be posted at the entrance of the St. John's Kitchen to permit overnight access to the washrooms located at this facility.

[21] As of July 2022, the Region's monthly costs associated with its response to the Encampment was approximately $80,000. This cost not only included security services, but also garbage pick-up and janitorial services to clean the St. John's Kitchen washrooms.

The Encampment Residents

[22] The composition of the residents of the Encampment is reflective of the demographics of the Region's homeless population. They are individual men and women, couples, members of the 2SLGBTQ+ community, Indigenous people, members of racialized communities, as well as persons suffering from disabilities and substance abuse and domestic abuse survivors.

Section 7 of the Charter

[78] Section 7 of the Charter provides:

> Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

[79] The onus is on the rights claimant under section 7 of the Charter to establish on a balance of probabilities that the impugned legislation deprives him or her of either life, liberty, of security of the person, and that the deprivation is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. Should the claimant be successful in this respect, then the burden shifts to the respondent, under section 1 of the Charter, to justify the deprivation as a "reasonable" limit that is "demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society: see R. v. Michaud, 2015 ONCA 585, 127 O.R. (3d) 81, at para. 60. …

[80] I add one qualification to the above section 7 analysis described by the Ontario Court of Appeal in R. v. Michaud, based on the statement of Chief Justice McLachlin in Charkaoui v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2007 SCC 9, [2007] 1 SCR 350, who explained, at para.12, that the first of the two steps to be established by the moving party are meant to examine whether "there has been or could be a deprivation of the right to life, liberty or security of the person."

Section 7 and the History of the "Right to Shelter" Cases

[81] As homelessness continues to be a growing and problematic issue across Canada, the section 7 jurisprudence has continued to develop.

[82] The essence of the British Columbia decisions is the establishment of a constitutional right to shelter oneself when the number of homeless persons exceed the number of available and accessible indoor shelter spaces within a given jurisdiction.

[83] While the Region acknowledges the British Columbia jurisprudence, it submits that these decisions have been distinguished by Ontario decisions on the basis of an obiter comment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Victoria (City) v. Adams, 2009 BCCA 563, 100 B.C.L.R. (4th) 28, [Adams BCCA] and the Region urges me to follow these Ontario rulings.

[84] The British Court of Appeal stated, at para. 109:

> We agree with the trial judge that prohibiting the homeless from taking simple measures to protect themselves through the creation or utilization of rudimentary forms of overhead protection, in circumstances where there is no practicable shelter alternative, is a significant interference with their dignity and independence. The choice to shelter oneself in this context is properly included in the right to liberty under s. 7.

[85] However, the Court then goes on to comment in obiter as follows at para. 162:

> If there were adequate shelter beds or appropriate designated areas outside of parks to accommodate the homeless, the Bylaw provisions that we are concerned with might well be valid.

[86] In the recent Ontario decisions of Black v. Toronto (City), 2020 ONSC 6398, 152 O.R. (3d) 529 [Black] and Poff v. City of Hamilton, 2021 ONSC 7224 [Poff] homeless individuals sought an injunction to prevent the municipality from evicting them from city parks. In both instances, the Ontario Courts considered the British Columbia decisions and distinguished them on the basis of a factual finding that there were adequate shelter spaces to accommodate all of the cities' homeless.

[90] In the alternative, to urge my following the Black and Poff decisions, the Region submits that provided I find that there is adequate capacity in the shelter system to accommodate the residents of the Encampment, I should nonetheless find that the By-Law does not violate the section 7 rights of the Encampment residents.

[91] Apart from the position that there are not sufficient available spaces in the Region to shelter its homeless population, the Named Respondents and Amicus Curiae submit that it is not simply the number of available shelter spaces that frames the section 7 rights but also whether those spaces are truly accessible to the homeless. They also argue that the Ontario decisions mentioned above are distinguishable from the case before me on the basis that the two encampments, each in the cities of Toronto and Hamilton, were located in municipal parks and not in a vacant lot. Whereas the Ontario Courts found that there was significant public interest in ensuring that everyone had access to the parks, there is no such public interest in the Property.

[92] Based on the record before me, I find that despite the Region's past and current impressive efforts to accommodate its homeless population, there are not sufficient shelter spaces. I find that the number of homeless persons in the Region far outnumber the available shelter beds such that many of the Region's homeless have no alternative but to sleep outside. The most reliable evidence is that the Region has a homeless population of approximately 1,100 individuals. Excluding the motel spaces (because their availability is at the discretion of the motel operators and in many cases the rooms are available only to those with acute or severe medical needs or families), the most current information is that the Region has a maximum capacity of 416 shelter spaces. Even with the inclusion of the rooms at the YWCA and Working Centre (the Cambridge Shelter Overflow beds having already been included in the 416 available shelter spaces) the Region has a current capacity to shelter approximately 553 individuals (calculated on the assumption that each of the 23 families to be housed through the YWCA motel booking have 4 members). The available shelter spaces, unfortunately, fall short by some 50% of what is required. This result, in my opinion, does not equate to "adequate safe alternatives to sleeping in encampments" in the words of Justice Schabas.

[93] Furthermore, I accept that it is simply not a matter of counting the number of spaces. To be of any real value to the homeless population, the space must meet their diverse needs, or in other words, the spaces must be truly accessible. If the available spaces are impractical for homeless individuals, either because the shelters do not accommodate couples, are unable to provide required services, impose rules that cannot be followed due to addictions, or cannot accommodate mental or physical disability, they are not low barrier and accessible to the individuals they are meant to serve. Although not binding on me, I adopt and follow the decisions of the British Columbia Supreme Court in Shantz, Prince George (City) v. Stewart, 2021 BCSC 2089, 57 B.C.L.R. (6th) 118 [Stewart], and Bamberger, all of which hold that in order for the shelter spaces to be truly available, they must in fact be low barrier or accessible to accommodate the homeless population.

Does the By-Law Deprive the Encampment Residents of One of the Protected Section 7 Rights?

(a) Life

[95] The Supreme Court of Canada established in Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331 [Carter], that the right to life is engaged in a narrow set of circumstances. It observed, at para. 62, that:

> This Court has most recently invoked the right to life in Chaoulli v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 35, [2005] 1 SCR 791, where evidence showed that the lack of timely health care could result in death (paras. 38 and 50, per Deschamps J.; para. 123, per McLachlin C.J. and Major J.; and paras. 191 and 200, per Binnie and LeBel JJ.), and in PHS, where the clients of Insite were deprived of potentially lifesaving medical care (para. 91). In each case, the right was only engaged by the threat of death. In short, the case law suggests that the right to life is engaged where the law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly.

[96] Just as the British Columbia cases have found, and as Justice Schabas acknowledged in Black, so too do I conclude that the ability to provide adequate shelter for oneself is a necessity of life that falls within the right to life protected by section 7 of the Charter. Like Justice Ross in Adams BCSC, I have reached this conclusion because the very clear and uncontroverted evidence before me is that exposure to the elements without adequate shelter can result in serious harm, inducing death. The risk of harm is substantially increased during the late fall and winter months in the Region. Just as Chief Justice Hinkson was prepared to take judicial notice in Stewart that Prince George can be very cold in the fall and winter (at para. 64), so too am I prepared to take judicial notice of this reality facing the Region's homeless.

[97] Because the By-Law prohibits the erection of shelter protection that is necessary to protect homeless individuals from risk of serious harm, and there is currently inadequate shelter beds in the Region, I conclude that it violates the Charter protected right to life.

(b) Liberty

[101] I have found as a fact that there are not enough accessible shelter beds for the Region's homeless population. If evicted from the Encampment, the residents will likely be forced to live in the rough or set up camp somewhere else because there is an insufficient supply of low-barrier accessible beds in the Region. In these circumstances, creating shelter to protect oneself is, in my opinion, a matter critical to any individual's dignity and independence. The Region's attempt to prevent the homeless population from sheltering itself interferes with that population's choice to protect itself from the elements and is a deprivation of liberty within the scope of section 7.

(c) Security of the Person

[102] Security of the person includes the protection of both physical and psychological integrity. …

[104] In the case before me, the Region does not have adequate accessible shelter spaces for its homeless population of some 1100 individuals. The Region has made it clear that any order in its favour on this application will be used as a precedent to evict other encampments in the Region. As I have previously stated, an order in the Region's favour would therefore force the Encampment residents to choose between living outside in the rough or risk setting up an encampment elsewhere only to be evicted once again. At the end of the day, the By-Law's prohibition to the erection of temporary shelter exposes the homeless of the Region to risk of significant health problems, both physical and psychological in nature. The evidence before me is clear in that respect. Just as in R v. Parker, the state's action has deprived the homeless of access to shelter required for adequate protection. I therefore find that the Region's By-Law amounts to a deprivation of the security of the person.

[105] Whereas I find that in the circumstances of the Encampment residents, the constitutional right to shelter is invoked where the number of homeless individuals exceed the number of available and truly accessible indoor sheltering spaces, I also find that the Encampment residents' right to shelter is not limited to the overnight hours. I have reached this conclusion for two reasons. Like Chief Justice Hinkson found in Shantz, at para. 276, I find on the evidence that "there is a legitimate need for people to rest and shelter during the day" but, unlike the British Columbia's Supreme Court's Chief Justice, I find that there is no need in the case of the Encampment to balance their needs with the rights of the Region's other residents. Unlike in Adams and Shantz, the Property is not a park or other space designed with the purpose of being enjoyed by the public at large. Instead, the Property is a vacant lot to be used by the Region as a temporary parking lot and lay down construction area at some undefined future date. Therefore, based on these facts, there is no need to consider how the impact of the Encampment residents sheltering overnight may impair the interests and rights of other residents of the Region.

[106] Finally, I have considered the Region's submission that personal "choice" negates any claim to a breach of the section 7 protected rights. While some of the Encampment residents have chosen to live in the Encampment because they feel relatively safe and have a sense of community there rather than attempting to access a shelter that may not meet their needs, personal "choice", in my opinion, does not negate a claim that one's section 7 Charter rights have been breached. In my view, the overriding context in the matter before me is not one of freedom in the exercise of autonomous choice. As the Named Respondents submit, it is a context characterized by poverty, drug addiction, disability, and insufficient shelter alternatives.

[107] The question is not whether the Encampment residents' circumstances are self-made, but rather, whether enforcement of the By-Law will make the residents' already dire predicament worse.

Is the Deprivation in Accordance with the Principles of Fundamental Justice?

[108] Having found the By-Law constitutes a deprivation of the Unnamed Respondents' rights protected by section 7 of the Charter, the next issue is to determine whether this infringement is in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.

(a) Overbreadth

[109] The Supreme Court of Canada makes clear in Godbout that the principles of fundamental justice require that any restriction on life, liberty, and security of the person must not be more broadly framed than necessary to achieve the legislative purpose. …

[111] In essence, whether a law is overbroad within the meaning of section 7 turns on the relationship between the law's purpose and its effect: see R. v. Moriarity, 2015 SCC 55, [2015] 3 SCR485, at para. 24; R. v. Safarzadeh-Markhali, 2016 SCC 14, [2016] 1 SCR 180, at para. 24. In Adams BCSC, Justice Ross applied the test for overbreadth from Heywood with approval of the British Columbia Court of Appeal.

[114] … If the Region's purpose is to prevent physical damage to the physical premises, prevent disruption to regional operations, and prevent the disruption of the use and enjoyment of the Designated Premises by others, the Region could have accomplished this goal without punishing everyone who erects a shelter when there is no accessible shelter alternative. The homeless population of the Region needs to be able to create some shelter. If there were sufficient, truly accessible shelter beds in the Region, and the homeless chose not to use them, the situation would be quite different, but that is not the case here. I have also concluded that the rights of the homeless population have been limited for no valid reason by means which are broader than are necessary to accomplish the stated objective because, based on the record before me, I am not convinced that the Encampment has caused damage of any significance to the Property's physical premises, disrupted the Region's operations, or disrupted its use by "other persons" including the Region which has no immediate need for the Property.

(b) Gross Disproportionality

[115] Gross disproportionality is another principle of fundamental justice. This principle is infringed when the impact of the restriction on the individual's life, liberty, or security of person is grossly disproportionate to any legitimate government interest: see Shantz, at para. 204. The focus is not on the impact of the law on society or the public or its effectiveness, which are matters for the section 1 analysis, but on its impact on the rights of the claimants: see Carter, at para. 89. The inquiry into gross disproportionality compares the law's objective with its negative effect on the rights of the claimant and "asks if this impact is completely out of sync with the object of the law": Carter, at para. 89.

[116] Gross disproportionality is not concerned with the number of people who experience grossly disproportionate effects but rather a grossly disproportionate effect on just one person is sufficient to violate the norm: see Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 SCR 1101, at para. 122 [Bedford].

[118] … the evidence points to the conclusion that there are many benefits to encampment living. Both the Named Respondents and Dr. Sereda have attested to these benefits which include a safe place to rest, access to social services and healthcare, a sense of community (which correlates with mental health stabilization and emotional support), and privacy.

[119] Given that the accepted purpose of the By-Law is to prevent physical damage to the Designated Premises and disruption to the Region's operations as well as the use and enjoyment of the Designated Premises by others, I find that the proposed eviction of the Encampment residents is grossly disproportionate to the By-Law's goal. In short, the impact of the enforcement of the By-Law is "completely out of sync with the object of the law."

Disposition

[154] For all of the above reasons:

[157] I declare pursuant to section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, that the By-Law violates section 7 of the Charter in that it deprives the homeless residents of the Encampment of life, liberty and security of the person in a manner not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice and is not saved by section 1 of the Charter.

[158] I declare that the By-Law is inoperative insofar, and only insofar, as it applies to prevent the residents of the Encampment from living on and erecting temporary shelters without a permit on the Property when the number of homeless persons exceeds the number of available accessible shelter beds in the Region.

[159] Finally, I order that the Region may apply to terminate my declaration upon it being in a position to satisfy this Court that the By-Law no longer violates the section 7 rights of the Encampment residents.

Cases involving the constitutionality municipal bylaws that impact the unhoused continue to be brought before the courts. In recent years, trial courts in British Columbia, Ontario, and Alberta have issued decisions in such cases. The British Columbia Court of Appeal has addressed one such case on its merits (see Victoria (City) v Adams, 2009 BCCA 563 (CanLII) in which the narrow question was whether a municipality that did not prohibit the unhoused from sleeping overnight in public parks could nonetheless prohibit the unhoused from erecting temporary, overnight, shelter in those parks). The cases heard by trial courts in more recent years have yet to be tested before provincial courts of appeal. Do you agree that section 7 includes the right to basic, overnight, shelter? Compare the claim and the reasons given in The Regional Municipality of Waterloo case extracted above with the claim and reasons in Heegsma v Hamilton (City), 2024 ONSC 7154. Which approach do you think is more consistent with the Supreme Court's interpretation of section 7?

Do you think the interpretation of section 7 may extend to other "economic" rights? Or, do you think that to the extent section 7 protects "economic" rights, it is limited to the necessities of life (such as access to life-saving health care, or overnight shelter)? What are the reasons for your view? In thinking through these questions, consider the decision of Justice Arbour in Gosselin: note in particular Justice Arbour's critique of the Supreme Court's section 7 jurisprudence, and her analysis of Ms Gosselin's claim. Does Justice Arbour provide a convincing alternative approach to the interpretation of section 7?

7.2 The environment

In addition to efforts to use the Charter to advance the rights of the unhoused, there have been some efforts in recent years to use section 7 to protect the environmental rights of individuals, especially young people. The courts of Québec refused to certify a class action in which the claimants alleged that Canada's failure to fulfill its international obligations to reduce greenhouse gas emissions amounted to a violation of the section 7 rights of persons under the age of 35 (see Environnement Jeunesse c Procureur général du Canada, 2021 QCCA 1871). The Federal Court of Appeal has allowed two claims that the failure to address climate change is a violation of the section 7 rights of young people to proceed. This is subject to the claimants amending their pleadings (see La Rose v Canada, 2023 FCA 241, allowing appeals in part from La Rose v Canada, 2020 FC 1008, and Misdzi Yikh v Canada, 2020 FC 1059). The Mathur case in Ontario provides another example of claimants seeking to have the courts affirm that section 7 of the Charter encompasses the right to a healthy environment.

7.2.1 Mathur v Ontario

Mathur v Ontario*, 2024 ONCA 762

By the Court:

I. Overview

[1] This appeal involves the constitutionality of the greenhouse gas emission reduction target and plan enacted by the Ontario government ("Ontario") under climate change legislation. Specifically, can the alleged failure of Ontario to comply with its voluntarily imposed statutory obligations to combat climate change amount to a breach of the appellants' ss. 7 and 15 rights under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[2] In 2018, Ontario enacted the Cap and Trade Cancellation Act, 2018, S.O. 2018, c. 13 ("CTCA"). Section 16 of the CTCA repealed the Climate Change Mitigation and Low-carbon Economy Act, 2016, S.O. 2016, c. 7 ("Climate Change Act"), which had contained greenhouse gas emission reduction targets, and s. 3(1) required the government to set new reduction targets (the "Target"). The Target implemented by Ontario, which is articulated in the "Preserving and Protecting our Environment for Future Generations - A Made-in-Ontario Environmental Plan" (the " Plan"), calls for a 30% reduction of greenhouse gas emissions from 2005 levels by 2030. This is a much smaller reduction than prescribed under the Climate Change Act and, according to the unchallenged expert evidence filed that the application judge accepted, falls short of the international scientific consensus of the reductions recommended to mitigate the most catastrophic effects of climate change.

[3] The appellants are seven Ontario youth, some of whom are Indigenous. They brought an application for a declaration that Ontario's Target and the enacting provisions of ss. 3 and 16 of the CTCA are unconstitutional as they violate their rights under ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. They seek an order declaring their Charter rights have been violated and requiring Ontario to set a science-based emissions reduction target and to revise its climate change plan in accordance with international standards.

[4] The application judge dismissed their application. While she concluded that the issue of whether the appellants' ss. 7 and 15 Charter rights were violated was justiciable, she characterized the application as a positive rights case. She concluded that any deprivation of the right to life or security of the person was not contrary to the principles of fundamental justice under s. 7 and that s. 15 of the Charter did not impose a positive obligation on Ontario to take any specific steps to combat climate change. As a result, she determined that the appellants' ss. 7 and 15 rights were not breached.

[5] In our view, the application judge erred in her analytical approach. This is not a positive rights case. The application does not seek to impose on Ontario any new positive obligations to combat climate change. By enacting the CTCA, Ontario voluntarily assumed a positive statutory obligation to combat climate change and to produce the Plan and the Target for that purpose. Ontario was therefore obligated to produce a plan and a target that were Charter compliant. The application judge did not address whether Ontario failed to produce a plan and a target that was Charter compliant in accordance with its statutory mandate. As a result, the ss. 7 and 15 Charter issues raised by the appellants remain to be determined.

[6] The interveners raised relevant, important issues that were not determined by the application judge, either because they were not raised before her or did not affect her analysis, or because she declined to address them since they were not pleaded in the notice of application. They included whether the Target breached the Charter rights of Indigenous peoples in Ontario and their s. 35 rights under the Constitution Act, 1982; the integration of the public trust doctrine; the application of international law, including international environmental law, in the interpretation of Charter rights; the application of the best interests of the child principle; and the recognition and impact of certain unwritten constitutional principles, including societal preservation and ecological sustainability.

[7] For the reasons that follow, we allow the appeal. However, we decline to decide the application and to make the orders sought by the appellants in their notice of appeal. This court is not well placed to determine whether the declarations and directions sought should be granted. Although much of the expert evidence was uncontroverted, courts of first instance have a significant "institutional advantage in making the determinations necessary to a fair treatment" of ss. 7 and 15 claims: Canadian Council for Refugees v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2023 SCC 17, 481 D.L.R. (4th) 581, at para. 176. Moreover, if the appellants wish to have the additional issues raised by the interveners adjudicated, they will have to obtain leave to amend their notice of application and the evidentiary record may have to be amplified.

[8] Consequently, while we clarify in these reasons the question that must be determined at a new hearing, we are careful not to decide that question or otherwise limit the analysis to be undertaken, including the application of s. 1 of the Charter, if pursued. Given the seriousness of these matters, the additional issues raised, and the potential need for further evidence, it would not be in the interests of justice nor practically feasible for this court to take on the role of finder of fact and conduct the required analysis: Canadian Council for Refugees, at para. 178. We therefore remit the application for a new hearing before the same or another justice of the Superior Court.

II. Background

[9] To understand the issues on appeal, we will set out a summary of the legislative and evidentiary background and the application judge's factual findings with respect to the evidentiary record that informed her analysis and conclusions. The application record includes the legislative history leading up to the CTCA, the Plan and the Target, including international climate change conventions that informed them and the predecessor legislation that the CTCA repealed. It also includes the appellants' expert evidence on the deleterious effects of climate change and proposed remedial action. While Ontario proffered its own expert evidence, it accepted that anthropogenic climate change is real and poses risks to human health and well-being. Further, Ontario did not argue the application of s. 1 of the Charter.

(a) Climate change legislation, international conventions, and uncontroverted evidence of harm

[10] In 1992, the United Nations adopted its Framework Convention on Climate Change, U.N. Doc. A/AC.237/18 (Part II)/Add.1, May 15, 1992 ("UNFCCC"), the objective of which was to stabilize greenhouse gas concentrations in the atmosphere. In 2015, the Paris Agreement, U.N. Doc. FCCC/CP/2015/10/Add.1, December 12, 2015, was adopted under the UNFCCC. Article 2 of the Paris Agreement calls on signatories to hold the increase in global average temperature to well below 2 degrees Celsius and pursue efforts to limit the temperature increase to 1.5 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels. Canada is a party to both the UNFCCC and the Paris Agreement. Canada's original target was set as a 30% reduction from 2005 greenhouse gas emissions by 2030. In 2022, Canada announced a target of a 40–45% reduction from 2005 greenhouse gas emissions by 2030.

[11] The global carbon budget means total cumulative global carbon emissions. Scientists use the concept of a global "carbon budget" to define how much more carbon dioxide can be emitted into the atmosphere before certain levels of global temperature warming will be locked in and irreversible. As already noted, the scientific consensus at present is that the level of global temperature warming should be held to 1.5 degrees Celsius. Once the carbon budget is used up or exceeded, global temperatures could stabilize at a new dangerously high global temperature, even if measures are later taken to reduce global carbon dioxide emissions to net zero.

[12] The application judge accepted the expert evidence adduced by the appellants and found that it established the following:

- Warming in Canada is, on average, about double the magnitude of global warming;
- Deaths in Ontario are projected to increase significantly if global temperatures rise above 1.5 degrees Celsius;
- Heat waves are increasing in frequency, which will increase heat-related morbidity and mortality;
- Climate change has increased the burden of certain infectious diseases (i.e., through ticks and mosquitos, through food and waterborne disease, and through fungus and parasites) and this burden is likely to continue to increase;
- Climate change will increase the frequency and severity of wildfires in Ontario and across Canada, and smoke will cause increasing mortality and morbidity for Ontarians;
- Climate change will increase flooding frequency and magnitude, which will lead to health risks associated with the contamination of drinking water and food, exposure to mould and carbon monoxide poisoning, and mental health issues;
- Climate change will lead to further increases in cyanobacterial blooms in Ontario, which produce toxins harmful to human and wildlife health and threaten water quality and fish stocks;
- Above 2 degrees Celsius of warming, climate change will lead to increased mercury in Ontario aquatic ecosystems, including in fish, which has been linked to a range of neurodevelopmental, cardiovascular, and immunologic effects;
- Climate change has been linked to serious and wide-ranging negative mental health impacts, including emotional reactions, depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder, grief and loss, increased drug and alcohol use, social and family stress, increased suicidal ideation and suicide, loss of cultural knowledge and continuity, and deterioration and loss of place-based connection;
- With each additional degree of warming, there is an increase in probability of large-scale displacement, regional food security crises, and climate-related violence and conflict; and
- Every incremental increase in global temperature increases the likelihood of large-scale, devastating climate tipping points being crossed.

[13] The application judge further accepted the expert evidence adduced by the appellants showing that climate change has disproportionate impacts on young people and Indigenous peoples, and made the following findings:

- Children are more sensitive to heat and respiratory and communicable diseases;
- Young people are especially at risk from the impacts of wildfire smoke, flooding, extreme heat, vector-borne diseases, and toxic contamination;
- Young people are more vulnerable to the impacts of climate change given increased reliance on caregivers for protection and adaptation;
- Climate change may differentially impact the mental health of children and youth;
- Indigenous youth face particular mental health challenges due to their strong ties to the land;
- Indigenous peoples in Ontario have already observed significant harmful effects from climate change, impacting food and water security and traditional and subsistence practices such as fishing, hunting, and plant harvesting;
- The loss of traditional foods and cultural practices is impacting Indigenous peoples' mental and physical well-being; and
- Indigenous peoples are particularly vulnerable to mental health impacts of climate change, which include anxiety, depression, grief, family stress, loss of identity, increased likelihood of substance usage, and suicidal ideation.

[14] The application judge concluded that: "Based on the evidence before [her], it is indisputable that, as a result of climate change, the [appellants] and Ontarians in general are experiencing an increased risk of death and an increased risk to the security of the person."

[15] The application judge noted that there is no fixed scientific formula to determine exactly what reductions must be made by Ontario to correspond with its "fair share" to reduce global greenhouse gas emissions to the scientifically accepted international standard. However, a fair inference flows from her findings, including that the Target cannot be meaningless, that there is no question that Ontario must do something. The application judge found that Ontario's greenhouse gases contribute to climate change in a way that is "real, measurable and not speculative" and that "[e]very tonne of [carbon dioxide] emissions adds to global warming and lead[s] to a quantifiable increase in global temperatures that is essentially irreversible on human timescales."

[16] What Ontario is prepared to do at present is reflected in the CTCA, which was enacted in 2018. Section 16 of the CTCA repealed the former Climate Change Act. The repealed Climate Change Act provided for the following emission reduction targets in Ontario in s. 6(1):

> The following targets are established for reducing the amount of greenhouse gas emissions from the amount of emissions in Ontario calculated for 1990:
> 1. A reduction of 15 per cent by the end of 2020.
> 2. A reduction of 37 per cent by the end of 2030.
> 3. A reduction of 80 per cent by the end of 2050.

[17] The CTCA, in contrast, does not prescribe emissions reduction targets. Section 3(1) provides as follows: "The Government shall establish targets for the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions in Ontario and may revise the targets from time to time." It accordingly does not itself set a new target but requires Ontario to do so.

[18] The Target is articulated in the Plan, which Ontario released a few months after the CTCA was enacted for consultation and public comment. The Plan states that it "reflects our government's commitment to address [the] pressing challenges" Ontarians face and commits the government to "use the best science, real-time monitoring where available, and strong, transparent enforcement to protect our air, land and water, prevent and reduce litter and waste, support Ontarians to continue to do their share to reduce greenhouse gas emissions, and help communities and families prepare for climate change."

[19] With respect to specifically addressing climate change, the Plan acknowledges the severe impacts of climate change:

> The climate is changing. Severe rain, ice and wind storms, prolonged heat waves and milder winters are much more common. Forests, waters and wildlife across the province are and will continue to be significantly impacted by these changes. People across the province – especially Northern communities – and all sectors of the economy are feeling the impacts of climate change and paying more and more for the costs associated with those impacts.

[20] The Plan further indicates that it fulfills the government's commitment under the CTCA: "The following chapter of our environment plan acts as Ontario's climate change plan, which fulfills our commitment under the [CTCA]" (emphasis added).

[21] The application judge accepted that the Plan set the Target and did not, as argued by Ontario before her and on this appeal, merely refer to a non-binding, aspirational goal. In the Plan, Ontario undertakes to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 30% below 2005 levels by 2030 – which is consistent with Canada's commitment at the time when Canada signed on to the 2015 Paris Agreement, but a smaller reduction than under the repealed Climate Change Act and Canada's more recent commitment to reduce emissions by 40–45% from 2005 levels by 2030. The Plan states that:

> Ontario will reduce its emissions by 30% below 2005 levels by 2030.
> This target aligns Ontario with Canada's 2030 target under the Paris Agreement.
> This is Ontario's proposed target for the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions, which fulfills our commitment under the [CTCA]. [Emphasis deleted.]

[22] Ontario also undertakes that the Plan "will be reviewed on a four-year basis" and that Ontario "is committed to doing its part to address climate change. This includes leading by example". …

[23] The application judge observed that the United Nations' Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change ("IPCC") released a report the same year the Target was set stating that global net anthropogenic carbon dioxide emissions must be reduced by approximately 45% below 2010 levels by 2030 and must reach net zero by 2050 to limit global average surface warming to 1.5 degrees Celsius. She found that the reports produced by the IPCC were a reliable and comprehensive source on existing scientific knowledge about climate change and its impacts. Based on the IPCC report, the application judge observed that Ontario would have to reduce its 2005 emissions by approximately 52% (i.e., 22% more than the 30% Target) by 2030 to limit average global warming to 1.5 degrees Celsius. She found that the gap between the IPCC prescription and the Target is "large, unexplained and without any apparent scientific basis."

[34] While the appellants raise several grounds of appeal, the appeal turns on whether the application judge erred in finding that the application sought to impose a freestanding positive obligation on Ontario and in failing to address whether the execution of Ontario's statutorily imposed obligation to combat climate change was constitutionally compliant. As we shall explain, we conclude that she did.

(b) Overview

[36] The application judge correctly noted at para. 106 of her reasons that the Charter applies to the Target and the CTCA and that, as a result, the Charter issues raised by the appellants are justiciable because "the Constitution requires that courts review legislation and state action for Charter compliance when citizens challenge them, even when the issues are complex, contentious and laden with social values."

[37] However, the application judge erred in viewing this case as a positive rights case. Given the application judge's findings in para. 123 of her reasons that Ontario enacted the Plan and the Target further to the mandate in the CTCA and that they are not meant to be meaningless, there can be no question that Ontario has assumed a statutory obligation to do something about climate change and to enact a Target and formulate a Plan that would do something about climate change. The question should have been whether the execution of that voluntarily imposed statutory obligation was Charter compliant.

(d) Section 7 of the Charter

[42] Section 7 of the Charter provides that everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The Supreme Court formulated the analysis under s. 7 as a two-step test: first, claimants must show that the law interferes with, or deprives them of, their life, liberty or security of the person; and second, they must show that the deprivation in question is not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice: Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331, at para. 55.

[43] The right to life is engaged where the impugned law or state action imposes death or an increased risk of death on a person, either directly or indirectly: Carter, at para. 62. The right to security of the person is engaged when the impugned law or state action negatively impacts or limits the claimant's security of the person: Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72, [2013] 3 SCR 1101, at paras. 58-

[44] The application judge found, correctly in our view, that based on the evidence before her, "it is indisputable that, as a result of climate change, the [appellants] and Ontarians in general are experiencing an increased risk of death and an increased risk to the security of the person". She framed the "relevant question" before her as follows: "whether subsection 3(1) of the CTCA and the Target impose an increased risk of death, directly or indirectly, and/or whether they negatively impact or limit the [appellants'] security of the person."

[49] The application judge erred in treating this as a positive rights case. Although she concluded the appellants' rights to life and security of the person were engaged after assuming, without deciding, that positive obligations can be imposed under s. 7 in the special context of climate change, her incorrect framing of the application as a positive rights case coloured her analysis.

[50] This incorrect framing also affected the application judge's consideration of whether the deprivations she found were in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The application judge correctly noted that a law is arbitrary where "there is no connection between the effect of a provision and its purpose": Sharma, at para. 111; or "where there is no rational connection between the object of the law and the limit it imposes on life, liberty or security of the person": Carter, at para. 83. She defined the objective of the Target as: "To reduce [greenhouse gases] in Ontario to address and fight climate change."

[51] The application judge was unable to find that the Target was arbitrary because she erroneously considered the question through the lens of a positive claim case, stating: "In my view, the principle against arbitrariness is not well-adapted to a positive claim case under section 7 as it is premised on there being a state interference limiting the right to life, liberty or security of the person, and not a failure on the part of the state to do something." Although concluding that "the Target falls short and its deficiencies contribute to increasing the risks of death and to the security of the person", the appellants' complaint was that "the Target does not go far enough".

[53] The question before the application judge was not whether Ontario's Target did not go far enough in the absence of a positive obligation to do anything. Rather, she should have considered whether, given Ontario's positive statutory obligation to combat climate change that it had voluntarily assumed, the Target was Charter compliant. She erred by failing to consider the correct question.

(f) The relief requested by the appellants in their application

[66] The appellants' application is premised on the argument that Ontario is statutorily obliged to take positive steps to redress the future harms of climate change. They ask that the Target be replaced with a constitutionally compliant Target. As the application judge found, there is an unexplained gap between international standards and the Target. The appellants argue that the reality of the Target is that it allows more greenhouse gases into the atmosphere than recommended under international standards.

[67] Ontario sees this case as requesting that the court assume judicial control over environmental and climate policy. Moreover, Ontario says that the appellants' request that the Target conform to scientific standards is vague and imprecise. As a result, the remedy requested by the appellants is impossible to order.

[68] We disagree.

[69] First, the appellants' requested relief includes declaratory relief, including a declaration that the Target violates their ss. 7 and 15 Charter rights, which may be ordered without the necessity of telling Ontario precisely what to do to make its Target Charter compliant. As the Supreme Court stated in Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3, [2010] 1 SCR 44, at para. 47, a court can exercise its discretion to grant declaratory relief as a proper remedy and, "respectful of the responsibilities of the executive and the courts, … provide the legal framework for the executive to exercise its functions and to consider what actions to take … in conformity with the Charter."

[70] Second, the appellants are not requesting the court to order Ontario to set a particular target. As set out above, they seek an order directing Ontario to set a "science-based" target consistent with Ontario's share of the reductions necessary to limit global warming below 1.5 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial temperatures or, alternatively, well below 2 degrees Celsius. The unchallenged international standards and scientific consensus about global warming and climate change and the remaining carbon budget in the evidence on this application is not imprecise. If a breach of the appellants' Charter rights is declared, there are clear international standards based on accepted scientific consensus that can inform what a constitutionally compliant Target and Plan should look like. The international standards and the scientific evidence produced by the parties on the application clearly indicate how acceptable levels of greenhouse gas emissions are measured and calculated. Notably, this evidence also suggests that the amount of greenhouse gases that Ontario emits into the atmosphere can be calculated and that the level of reduction of gases that scientific experts opine should be implemented in order to conform with international standards are measurable.

[71] Finally, and importantly, Ontario's argument that ordering a "science-based" target would be "so devoid of content as to be effectively meaningless" is belied by its choice stated in the Plan to align its Target to Canada's 2030 target under the international standard of the Paris Agreement.

[72] In para. 145 of her reasons, the application judge noted that "it is appropriate in the context of this case to assess the Target in light of global targets that are based on scientific consensus/findings of the IPCC". The application judge noted the gap between the Target and international standards as follows:

> While…it is not this Court's role to determine how Ontario's "fair" share of the remaining carbon budget should be calculated, this Court can rely on the scientific consensus that [greenhouse gas emissions] must be reduced by approximately 45% below 2010 levels by 2030, and must reach "net zero" by 2050 in order to limited global average surface warming to 1.5 [degrees Celsius] and to avoid the significantly more deleterious impacts of climate change. …[I]n order to reduce its emissions by 45% by 2030 relative to the 2010 level, Ontario would have to reduce its emissions by approximately 52% below 2005 levels by 2030. This would require a 73% increase of the Target. Put differently, the reductions contemplated by the Target will only fulfil approximately 58% of the need to reduce [greenhouse gas emissions] by approximately 45% below 2010 levels by 2030.

[73] The application judge did not determine the question of remedy because of her dismissal of the application.

> [74] If the application is ultimately successful, the question of remedy can be determined by the court. While we do not wish to foreclose the range of potential remedies that may be appropriate, we note that ordering Ontario to produce a constitutionally compliant Plan and Target, for instance, is no different than in Khadr, where the Supreme Court left it to Canada to determine the precise Charter compliant steps it needed to take. Similarly, in Chaoulli, while finding Charter breaches, McLachlin C.J., Major and Bastarache JJ. did not order what exact measures the Quebec government was required to implement in order to render its health care scheme Charter compliant. [footnote omitted] Whether a similar or different remedy would be appropriate in this case if the application is successful is best left for the judge hearing the application.
> [75] For these reasons, the appeal is allowed and the application judge's order, including her costs disposition, is set aside. The issues raised on the application must be considered afresh and through the correct analytical lens.

The Supreme Court denied an application for leave to appeal, and cross-appeal, the Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in this case: 2025 CanLII 38373. As with economic rights, no provision of the Charter expressly protects environmental rights. Do you agree that section 7 includes the right to a healthy environment? What if a state actor has not already voluntarily undertaken to reduce greenhouse gas emissions? Should section 7 extend to imposing a positive obligation on state actors to take measures to address climate change generally? In thinking about these questions, recall that in the BC Motor Vehicle Act Reference, then-Justice Lamer stated in part (at para 31):

> …the principles of fundamental justice are to be found in the basic tenets of our legal system. They do not lie in the realm of general public policy but in the inherent domain of the judiciary as guardian of the justice system. Such an approach to the interpretation of "principles of fundamental justice" is consistent with the wording and structure of s. 7, the context of the section, i.e., ss. 8 to 14, and the character and larger objects of the Charter itself. It provides meaningful content for the s. 7 guarantee all the while avoiding adjudication of policy matters. (emphasis added)

As claimants continue to bring novel claims under section 7, is there a risk that they will ask the courts to cross the line from giving "meaningful content" to section 7, to "adjudicat[ing] … policy matters"?

Chapter 24: S. 15: Equality Rights

By Joshua Sealy-Harrington and Jennifer Koshan

1 The Text

The right to equality is protected by section 15 of the Charter. It provides:

> Equality Rights
> Equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law
> 15 (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.
> Affirmative action programs
> (2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

Another section referencing equality is found in section 28 of the Charter, which provides:

> Rights guaranteed equally to both sexes
> 28 Notwithstanding anything in this Charter, the rights and freedoms referred to in it are guaranteed equally to male and female persons.

For a discussion of the limited role section 28 has played under the Charter so far, see Kerri A Froc, "Is Originalism Bad for Women? The Curious Case of Canada's 'Equal Rights Amendment'" (2015) 19:2 Rev Const Stud 237.

2 Key Concepts: Equality, Discrimination, and Justification

2.1 Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 143

Andrews was the first Supreme Court of Canada decision to interpret section 15(1) of the Charter. McIntyre J. wrote the majority reasons on section 15(1), but dissented in the result, finding that an impugned citizenship requirement for entry into the legal profession was reasonable under section 1 of the Charter.

> The reasons of McIntyre and Lamer JJ. were delivered by
> MCINTYRE J. (dissenting in part) -- This appeal raises only one question. Does the citizenship requirement for entry into the legal profession contained in s. 42 of the Barristers and Solicitors Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 26, (the "Act") contravene s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms? Section 42 provides:
> 42. The benchers may call to the Bar of the Province and admit as a solicitor of the Supreme Court
> (a) a Canadian citizen with respect to whom they are satisfied that he . . .
> The respondent, Andrews, was a British subject permanently resident in Canada at the time these proceedings were commenced. He had taken law degrees at Oxford and had fulfilled all the requirements for admission to the practice of law in British Columbia, except that of Canadian citizenship. He commenced proceedings for a declaration that s. 42 of the Act violates the Charter…. His action was dismissed at trial before Taylor J. in the Supreme Court of British Columbia in a judgment reported at (1985), 1985 CanLII 604 (BC SC), 22 D.L.R. (4th) 9. An appeal was allowed in the Court of Appeal (Hinkson, Craig and McLachlin JJ.A., at (1986), 1986 CanLII 1287 (BC CA), 27 D.L.R. (4th) 600), and this appeal is taken by the Law Society of British Columbia, by leave granted November 27, 1986…. On January 28, 1987, the Chief Justice stated constitutional questions in the following terms:

> (1)Does the Canadian citizenship requirement to be a lawyer in the Province of British Columbia as set out in s. 42 of the Barristers and Solicitors Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 26 infringe or deny the rights guaranteed by s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?
> (2)If the Canadian citizenship requirement to be a lawyer in the Province of British Columbia as set out in s. 42 of the Barristers and Solicitors Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 26 infringes or denies the rights guaranteed by s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is it justified by s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Following the judgment in his favour, the respondent Andrews was called to the Bar and admitted as a solicitor in the Province of British Columbia and is now a Canadian citizen….

The Concept of Equality

Section 15(1) of the Charter provides for every individual a guarantee of equality before and under the law, as well as the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination. This is not a general guarantee of equality; it does not provide for equality between individuals or groups within society in a general or abstract sense, nor does it impose on individuals or groups an obligation to accord equal treatment to others. It is concerned with the application of the law. No problem regarding the scope of the word "law", as employed in s. 15(1), can arise in this case because it is an Act of the Legislature which is under attack. Whether other governmental or quasi-governmental regulations, rules, or requirements may be termed laws under s. 15(1) should be left for cases in which the issue arises.

The concept of equality has long been a feature of Western thought. As embodied in s. 15(1) of the Charter, it is an elusive concept and, more than any of the other rights and freedoms guaranteed in the Charter, it lacks precise definition. As has been stated by John H. Schaar, "Equality of Opportunity and Beyond", in Nomos IX: Equality, ed. J. Roland Pennock and John W. Chapman (1967), at p. 228:

> Equality is a protean word. It is one of those political symbols - liberty and fraternity are others -- into which men have poured the deepest urgings of their heart. Every strongly held theory or conception of equality is at once a psychology, an ethic, a theory of social relations, and a vision of the good society.

It is a comparative concept, the condition of which may only be attained or discerned by comparison with the condition of others in the social and political setting in which the question arises. It must be recognized at once, however, that every difference in treatment between individuals under the law will not necessarily result in inequality and, as well, that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality. This proposition has found frequent expression in the literature on the subject but, as I have noted on a previous occasion, nowhere more aptly than in the well-known words of Frankfurter J. in Dennis v. United States, 339 U.S. 162 (1950), at p. 184:

> It was a wise man who said that there is no greater inequality than the equal treatment of unequals.

The same thought has been expressed in this Court in the context of s. 2(b) of the Charter in R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, where Dickson C.J. said at p. 347:

> The equality necessary to support religious freedom does not require identical treatment of all religions. In fact, the interests of true equality may well require differentiation in treatment.

In simple terms, then, it may be said that a law which treats all identically and which provides equality of treatment between "A" and "B" might well cause inequality for "C", depending on differences in personal characteristics and situations. To approach the ideal of full equality before and under the law -- and in human affairs an approach is all that can be expected -- the main consideration must be the impact of the law on the individual or the group concerned. Recognizing that there will always be an infinite variety of personal characteristics, capacities, entitlements and merits among those subject to a law, there must be accorded, as nearly as may be possible, an equality of benefit and protection and no more of the restrictions, penalties or burdens imposed upon one than another. In other words, the admittedly unattainable ideal should be that a law expressed to bind all should not because of irrelevant personal differences have a more burdensome or less beneficial impact on one than another.

McLachlin J.A. in the Court of Appeal expressed the view, at p. 605, that:

> . . . the essential meaning of the constitutional requirement of equal protection and equal benefit is that persons who are "similarly situated be similarly treated" and conversely, that persons who are "differently situated be differently treated" . . .

In this, she was adopting and applying as a test a proposition which seems to have been widely accepted with some modifications in both trial and appeal court decisions throughout the country on s. 15(1) of the Charter [citations omitted]. The reliance on this concept appears to have derived, at least in recent times, from J. T. Tussman and J. tenBroek, "The Equal Protection of Laws" (1949), 37 Calif. L. Rev. 341. The similarly situated test is a restatement of the Aristotelian principle of formal equality -- that "things that are alike should be treated alike, while things that are unalike should be treated unalike in proportion to their unalikeness" (Ethica Nichomacea, trans. W. Ross, Book V3, at p. 1131a-6 (1925)).

The test as stated, however, is seriously deficient in that it excludes any consideration of the nature of the law. If it were to be applied literally, it could be used to justify the Nuremberg laws of Adolf Hitler. Similar treatment was contemplated for all Jews. The similarly situated test would have justified the formalistic separate but equal doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 637 (1896), a doctrine that incidentally was still the law in the United States at the time that Professor Tussman and J. tenBroek wrote their much cited article…

This approach was rejected in this Court by Ritchie J. in R. v. Drybones, 1969 CanLII 1 (SCC), [1970] SCR 282, in a … case involving a provision of the Indian Act making it an offence for an Indian to be intoxicated off a reserve. He said, at p. 297:

> . . . I cannot agree with this interpretation pursuant to which it seems to me that the most glaring discriminatory legislation against a racial group would have to be construed as recognizing the right of each of its individual members "to equality before the law", so long as all the other members are being discriminated against in the same way.

Thus, mere equality of application to similarly situated groups or individuals does not afford a realistic test for a violation of equality rights. For, as has been said, a bad law will not be saved merely because it operates equally upon those to whom it has application. Nor will a law necessarily be bad because it makes distinctions.

A similarly situated test focussing on the equal application of the law to those to whom it has application could lead to results akin to those in Bliss v. Attorney General of Canada, 1978 CanLII 25 (SCC), [1979] 1 SCR 183. In Bliss, a pregnant woman was denied unemployment benefits to which she would have been entitled had she not been pregnant. She claimed that the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, violated the equality guarantees of the Canadian Bill of Rights because it discriminated against her on the basis of her sex. Her claim was dismissed by this Court on the grounds that there was no discrimination on the basis of sex, since the class into which she fell under the Act was that of pregnant persons, and within that class, all persons were treated equally. This case, of course, was decided before the advent of the Charter.

For the reasons outlined above, the test cannot be accepted as a fixed rule or formula for the resolution of equality questions arising under the Charter. Consideration must be given to the content of the law, to its purpose, and its impact upon those to whom it applies, and also upon those whom it excludes from its application. The issues which will arise from case to case are such that it would be wrong to attempt to confine these considerations within such a fixed and limited formula.

It is not every distinction or differentiation in treatment at law which will transgress the equality guarantees of s. 15 of the Charter. It is, of course, obvious that legislatures may -- and to govern effectively -- must treat different individuals and groups in different ways. Indeed, such distinctions are one of the main preoccupations of legislatures. The classifying of individuals and groups, the making of different provisions respecting such groups, the application of different rules, regulations, requirements and qualifications to different persons is necessary for the governance of modern society. As noted above, for the accommodation of differences, which is the essence of true equality, it will frequently be necessary to make distinctions. What kinds of distinctions will be acceptable under s. 15(1) and what kinds will violate its provisions?

In seeking an answer to these questions, the provisions of the Charter must have their full effect.

The principle of equality before the law has long been recognized as a feature of our constitutional tradition and it found statutory recognition in the Canadian Bill of Rights. However, unlike the Canadian Bill of Rights, which spoke only of equality before the law, s. 15(1) of the Charter provides a much broader protection. Section 15 spells out four basic rights: (1) the right to equality before the law; (2) the right to equality under the law; (3) the right to equal protection of the law; and (4) the right to equal benefit of the law. The inclusion of these last three additional rights in s. 15 of the Charter was an attempt to remedy some of the shortcomings of the right to equality in the Canadian Bill of Rights. It also reflected the expanded concept of discrimination being developed under the various Human Rights Codes since the enactment of the Canadian Bill of Rights. The shortcomings of the Canadian Bill of Rights as far as the right to equality is concerned are well known. In Attorney General of Canada v. Lavell, 1973 CanLII 175 (SCC), [1974] SCR 1349, for example, this Court upheld s. 12(1)(b) of the Indian Act which deprived women, but not men, of their membership in Indian Bands if they married non-Indians. The provision was held not to violate equality before the law although it might, the Court said, violate equality under the law if such were protected. In Bliss, supra, this Court held that the denial of unemployment insurance benefits to women because they were pregnant did not violate the guarantee of equality before the law, because any inequality in the protection and benefit of the law was "not created by legislation but by nature" (p. 190). … It is readily apparent that the language of s. 15 was deliberately chosen in order to remedy some of the perceived defects under the Canadian Bill of Rights. The antecedent statute is part of the "linguistic, philosophic and historical context" of s. 15 of the Charter.

It is clear that the purpose of s. 15 is to ensure equality in the formulation and application of the law. The promotion of equality entails the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration. It has a large remedial component. Howland C.J. and Robins J.A. (dissenting in the result but not with respect to this comment) in Reference re an Act to Amend the Education Act (1986), 1986 CanLII 2863 (ON CA), 53 O.R. (2d) 513, attempt to articulate the broad range of values embraced by s. 15. They state at p. 554:

> In our view, s. 15(1) read as a whole constitutes a compendious expression of a positive right to equality in both the substance and the administration of the law. It is an all-encompassing right governing all legislative action. Like the ideals of "equal justice" and "equal access to the law", the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law now enshrined in the Charter rests on the moral and ethical principle fundamental to a truly free and democratic society that all persons should be treated by the law on a footing of equality with equal concern and respect.

It must be recognized, however, as well that the promotion of equality under s. 15 has a much more specific goal than the mere elimination of distinctions. If the Charter was intended to eliminate all distinctions, then there would be no place for sections such as 27 (multicultural heritage); 2(a) (freedom of conscience and religion); 25 (aboriginal rights and freedoms); and other such provisions designed to safeguard certain distinctions. Moreover, the fact that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality is recognized in s. 15(2), which states that the equality rights in s. 15(1) do "not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups . . ."

Discrimination

The right to equality before and under the law, and the rights to the equal protection and benefit of the law contained in s. 15, are granted with the direction contained in s. 15 itself that they be without discrimination. Discrimination is unacceptable in a democratic society because it epitomizes the worst effects of the denial of equality, and discrimination reinforced by law is particularly repugnant. The worst oppression will result from discriminatory measures having the force of law. It is against this evil that s. 15 provides a guarantee.

Discrimination as referred to in s. 15 of the Charter must be understood in the context of pre-Charter history. Prior to the enactment of s. 15(1), the Legislatures of the various provinces and the federal Parliament had passed during the previous fifty years what may be generally referred to as Human Rights Acts. With the steady increase in population from the earliest days of European emigration into Canada and with the consequential growth of industry, agriculture and commerce and the vast increase in national wealth which followed, many social problems developed. The contact of the European immigrant with the indigenous population, the steady increase in immigration bringing those of neither French nor British background, and in more recent years the greatly expanded role of women in all forms of industrial, commercial and professional activity led to much inequality and many forms of discrimination. In great part these developments, in the absence of any significant legislative protection for the victims of discrimination, called into being the Human Rights Acts…. Since then every jurisdiction in Canada has enacted broad-ranging Human Rights Acts which have attacked most of the more common forms of discrimination found in society…

What does discrimination mean? The question has arisen most commonly in a consideration of the Human Rights Acts and the general concept of discrimination under those enactments has been fairly well settled. …

I would say then that discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individual or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits, and advantages available to other members of society. Distinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capacities will rarely be so classed.

The Court in the case at bar must address the issue of discrimination as the term is used in s. 15(1) of the Charter. In general, it may be said that the principles which have been applied under the Human Rights Acts are equally applicable in considering questions of discrimination under s. 15(1). Certain differences arising from the difference between the Charter and the Human Rights Acts must, however, be considered. To begin with, discrimination in s. 15(1) is limited to discrimination caused by the application or operation of law, whereas the Human Rights Acts apply also to private activities. Furthermore, and this is a distinction of more importance, all the Human Rights Acts passed in Canada specifically designate a certain limited number of grounds upon which discrimination is forbidden. Section 15(1) of the Charter is not so limited. The enumerated grounds in s. 15(1) are not exclusive and the limits, if any, on grounds for discrimination which may be established in future cases await definition. The enumerated grounds do, however, reflect the most common and probably the most socially destructive and historically practised bases of discrimination and must, in the words of s. 15(1), receive particular attention. Both the enumerated grounds themselves and other possible grounds of discrimination recognized under s. 15(1) must be interpreted in a broad and generous manner, reflecting the fact that they are constitutional provisions not easily repealed or amended but intended to provide a "continuing framework for the legitimate exercise of governmental power" and, at the same time, for "the unremitting protection" of equality rights: see Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 155.

It should be noted as well that when the Human Rights Acts create exemptions or defences, … these generally have the effect of completely removing the conduct complained of from the reach of the Act…. In the Charter, however, while s. 15(1), subject always to subs. (2), expresses its prohibition of discrimination in absolute terms, s. 1 makes allowance for a reasonable limit upon the operation of s. 15(1). A different approach under s. 15(1) is therefore required. While discrimination under s. 15(1) will be of the same nature and in descriptive terms will fit the concept of discrimination developed under the Human Rights Acts, a further step will be required in order to decide whether discriminatory laws can be justified under s. 1. The onus will be on the state to establish this. This is a distinct step called for under the Charter which is not found in most Human Rights Acts, because in those Acts justification for or defence to discrimination is generally found in specific exceptions to the substantive rights.

Relationship Between s. 15(1) and s. 1 of the Charter

In determining the extent of the guarantee of equality in s. 15(1) of the Charter, special consideration must be given to the relationship between s. 15(1) and s. 1. It is indeed the presence of s. 1 in the Charter and the interaction between these sections which has led to the differing approaches to a definition of the s. 15(1) right, and which has made necessary a judicial approach differing from that employed under the Canadian Bill of Rights…

The distinguishing feature of the Charter, unlike the other enactments, is that consideration of such limiting factors is made under s. 1. This Court has described the analytical approach to the Charter in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103; R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, and other cases, the essential feature of which is that the right guaranteeing sections be kept analytically separate from s. 1. In other words, when confronted with a problem under the Charter, the first question which must be answered will be whether or not an infringement of a guaranteed right has occurred. Any justification of an infringement which is found to have occurred must be made, if at all, under the broad provisions of s. 1. It must be admitted at once that the relationship between these two sections may well be difficult to determine on a wholly satisfactory basis. It is, however, important to keep them analytically distinct if for no other reason than the different attribution of the burden of proof. It is for the citizen to establish that his or her Charter right has been infringed and for the state to justify the infringement.

Approaches to s. 15(1)

Three main approaches have been adopted in determining the role of s. 15(1), the meaning of discrimination set out in that section, and the relationship of s. 15(1) and s. 1. The first one, which was advanced by Professor Peter Hogg in Constitutional Law of Canada (2nd ed. 1985) would treat every distinction drawn by law as discrimination under s. 15(1). There would then follow a consideration of the distinction under the provisions of s. 1 of the Charter. He said, at pp. 800-801:

> I conclude that s. 15 should be interpreted as providing for the universal application of every law. When a law draws a distinction between individuals, on any ground, that distinction is sufficient to constitute a breach of s. 15, and to move the constitutional issue to s. 1. The test of validity is that stipulated by s. 1, namely, whether the law comes within the phrase "such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society".

He reached this conclusion on the basis that, where the Charter right is expressed in unqualified terms, s. 1 supplies the standard of justification for any abridgment of the right. He argued that the word "discrimination" in s. 15(1) could be read as introducing a qualification in the section itself, but he preferred to read the word in a neutral sense because this reading would immediately send the matter to s. 1, which was included in the Charter for this purpose.

The second approach put forward by McLachlin J.A. in the Court of Appeal involved a consideration of the reasonableness and fairness of the impugned legislation under s. 15(1). She stated, as has been noted above, at p. 610:

> The ultimate question is whether a fair-minded person, weighing the purposes of legislation against its effects on the individuals adversely affected, and giving due weight to the right of the Legislature to pass laws for the good of all, would conclude that the legislative means adopted are unreasonable or unfair.

She assigned a very minor role to s. 1 which would, it appears, be limited to allowing in times of emergency, war, or other crises the passage of discriminatory legislation which would normally be impermissible.

A third approach, sometimes described as an "enumerated or analogous grounds" approach, adopts the concept that discrimination is generally expressed by the enumerated grounds. Section 15(1) is designed to prevent discrimination based on these and analogous grounds. The approach is similar to that found in human rights and civil rights statutes which have been enacted throughout Canada in recent times.

The analysis of discrimination in this approach must take place within the context of the enumerated grounds and those analogous to them. The words "without discrimination" require more than a mere finding of distinction between the treatment of groups or individuals. Those words are a form of qualifier built into s. 15 itself and limit those distinctions which are forbidden by the section to those which involve prejudice or disadvantage.

I would accept the criticisms of the first approach made by McLachlin J.A. in the Court of Appeal. She noted that the labelling of every legislative distinction as an infringement of s. 15(1) trivializes the fundamental rights guaranteed by the Charter and, secondly, that to interpret "without discrimination" as "without distinction" deprives the notion of discrimination of content.

In rejecting the Hogg approach, I would say that it draws a straight line from the finding of a distinction to a determination of its validity under s. 1, but my objection would be that it virtually denies any role for s. 15(1).

> I would reject, as well, the approach adopted by McLachlin J.A. She seeks to define discrimination under s. 15(1) as an unjustifiable or unreasonable distinction. In so doing she avoids the mere distinction test but also makes a radical departure from the analytical approach to the Charter which has been approved by this Court. In the result, the determination would be made under s. 15(1) and virtually no role would be left for s. 1.
> The third or "enumerated and analogous grounds" approach most closely accords with the purposes of s. 15 and the definition of discrimination outlined above and leaves questions of justification to s. 1. However, in assessing whether a complainant's rights have been infringed under s. 15(1), it is not enough to focus only on the alleged ground of discrimination and decide whether or not it is an enumerated or analogous ground. The effect of the impugned distinction or classification on the complainant must be considered. Once it is accepted that not all distinctions and differentiations created by law are discriminatory, then a role must be assigned to s. 15(1) which goes beyond the mere recognition of a legal distinction. A complainant under s. 15(1) must show not only that he or she is not receiving equal treatment before and under the law or that the law has a differential impact on him or her in the protection or benefit accorded by law but, in addition, must show that the legislative impact of the law is discriminatory.
> Where discrimination is found a breach of s. 15(1) has occurred and -- where s. 15(2) is not applicable -- any justification, any consideration of the reasonableness of the enactment; indeed, any consideration of factors which could justify the discrimination and support the constitutionality of the impugned enactment would take place under s. 1. This approach would conform with the directions of this Court in earlier decisions concerning the application of s. 1 and at the same time would allow for the screening out of the obviously trivial and vexatious claim. In this, it would provide a workable approach to the problem.
> It would seem to me apparent that a legislative distinction has been made by s. 42 of the Barristers and Solicitors Act between citizens and non-citizens with respect to the practice of law. The distinction would deny admission to the practice of law to non-citizens who in all other respects are qualified. Have the respondents, because of s. 42 of the Act, been denied equality before and under the law or the equal protection of the law? In practical terms it should be noted that the citizenship requirement affects only those non-citizens who are permanent residents. The permanent resident must wait for a minimum of three years from the date of establishing permanent residence status before citizenship may be acquired. The distinction therefore imposes a burden in the form of some delay on permanent residents who have acquired all or some of their legal training abroad and is, therefore, discriminatory.
> The rights guaranteed in s. 15(1) apply to all persons whether citizens or not. A rule which bars an entire class of persons from certain forms of employment, solely on the grounds of a lack of citizenship status and without consideration of educational and professional qualifications or the other attributes or merits of individuals in the group, would, in my view, infringe s. 15 equality rights. Non-citizens, lawfully permanent residents of Canada, are -- in the words of the U.S. Supreme Court in United States v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938), at pp. 152-53, n. 4, subsequently affirmed in Graham v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 365 (1971), at p. 372 -- a good example of a "discrete and insular minority" who come within the protection of s. 15.
> [In separate concurring reasons, Wilson J and La Forest J agreed that the Act's citizenship requirement infringed section 15(1). Wilson J wrote the majority reasons on section 1, holding that the Oakes test should apply without modification to section 15(1) and that the infringement of section 15(1) could not be justified.]

2.2 Notes and Questions

1. Andrews is often said to have adopted "substantive equality" as the underlying purpose of section 15, although the Court did not use that term until Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 624. How would you define substantive equality and distinguish its approach from that of formal equality? Is formal equality sufficient in some cases to achieve equality of results? What is the connection between substantive (in)equality and systemic (in)equality? For a discussion of these concepts see Colleen Sheppard, Inclusive Equality: The Relational Dimensions of Systemic Discrimination in Canada (Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press, 2010); Carissima Mathen, "Equality before the Charter: Reflections on Fraser v Canada (Attorney (General)" (2022) 104 SCLR (2d) 105; William Black, Jennifer Koshan and Lynn Smith, "The Equality Rights", in Stéphane Beaulac and Errol Mendes, eds, Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, 6th Edition (LexisNexis, 2025).

   The connection between section 15(2) and substantive equality is discussed below in Part 5 of this Chapter.

2. The test for determining a violation of section 15(1) was articulated in Andrews, at para 174, as follows:

   > discrimination may be described as a distinction, whether intentional or not but based on grounds relating to personal characteristics of the individual or group, which has the effect of imposing burdens, obligations, or disadvantages on such individual or group not imposed upon others, or which withholds or limits access to opportunities, benefits, and advantages available to other members of society.

   The analytical framework for section 15(1) has been subject to differing interpretations over the years. Although the Court has always required proof of a distinction (either direct or indirect) based on enumerated or analogous grounds as a first step, the question of what constitutes "discrimination" has changed over time. For example, in Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 675 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 497, the Court's definition of discrimination focused on human dignity, with the purpose of section 15(1) said to be:

   > to prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration. (at para 88 per Iacobucci, J, writing for a unanimous Court)

   While this might seem like a fulsome definition of equality, the Court set out four contextual factors relevant to the assessment of human dignity, some of which were difficult for claimants to prove: (1) Pre-existing disadvantage, stereotyping, prejudice, or vulnerability experienced by the individual or group at issue; (2) The correspondence, or lack thereof, between the ground or grounds on which the claim is based and the actual need, capacity, or circumstances of the claimant or others; (3) The ameliorative purpose or effects of the impugned law upon a more disadvantaged person or group in society; and (4) The nature and scope of the interest affected by the impugned law (Law at para 88).

   The focus on human dignity as a measure of discrimination and four contextual factors – especially factors (2) and (3) – were barriers to proving equality claims during the Law era (see e.g. Bruce Ryder, Cidalia C. Faria, and Emily Lawrence, "What's Law Good For?: An Empirical Overview of Charter Equality Rights Decisions" (2004) 24:1 SCLR (2d) 103). The problems with this approach were recognized in R. v. Kapp, 2008 SCC 41 (CanLII), [2008] 2 SCR 483 at para 22, where the majority reasons authored by McLachlin C.J. and Abella J. noted that the human dignity test was overly abstract and malleable and subject to formalistic interpretation. Kapp reformulated the analytical framework for section 15(1) as:

   > (1) Does the law create a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground? (2) Does the distinction create a disadvantage by perpetuating prejudice or stereotyping? (at para 17)

This test was also subject to critique, in part because prejudice and stereotyping were too narrow a focus for assessing discrimination. See e.g. Margot E. Young, "Unequal to the Task: 'Kapp'ing the Substantive Potential of Section 15" (2010) 50 SCLR (2d) 183.

Most recently, the test for section 15(1) violations has largely returned to the formulation from Andrews, with "discrimination" at step 2 focused on whether the law reinforces, perpetuates, or exacerbates disadvantage. See Dickson v. Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10 (CanLII) at para 188, where Kasirer and Jamal JJ., for the majority, stated that a section 15(1) claimant must prove that:

> the impugned law or state action: (a) on its face or in its impact, creates a distinction based on enumerated or analogous grounds; and (b) imposes a burden or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage.

Some commentators have argued that the changing test for section 15(1) creates confusion for claimants and lower courts (not to mention students). See e.g. Jennifer Koshan and Jonnette Watson Hamilton, "The Continual Reinvention of Section 15 of the Charter" (2013) 64 UNB LJ 19. Others have argued that shifting approaches to the test are predictable and don't matter to the outcome as much as ideological divisions amongst members of the Court and different conceptions of equality (i.e., corrective of state wrongs versus distributive in addressing socio-economic inequalities) and the role of courts in advancing these types of equality. See e.g. Fay Faraday, "The Elephant in the Room and Straw Men on Fire" (2021) 30 Const F 15; Joshua Sealy-Harrington, "The Alchemy of Equality Rights" (2021) 30 Const F 53; Richard Moon, "Comment on Fraser v Canada (AG): The More Things Change" (2021) 30 Const F 85. Some commentators also note how the four equality rights in the text of section 15(1) have been overshadowed by the Court's focus on "discrimination." See Mary Eberts and Kim Stanton, "The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence" (2018) 38:1 NJ Con Law 89. For an alternative version of Andrews that takes the four equality rights seriously, see Melina Buckley, "Reference re: Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 197.

How important is the test for section 15(1) in achieving its purpose, substantive equality?

3. Andrews recognized that both direct and indirect/adverse effects discrimination are prohibited by section 15(1). Step 1 of the current formulation of the test for section 15(1) incorporates both types of discrimination by looking for a grounds-based distinction in the law or state action "on its face or in its impact." Andrews is a good example of a case involving direct discrimination, as the citizenship requirement was evident on the face of the legislation. Cases involving claims of adverse effects discrimination – i.e., where the government action is said to be facially neutral, with differential or disproportionate impacts on protected grounds – are discussed in Part 3 of this Chapter below.

4. Andrews emphasized that equality is a comparative concept, while at the same time warning "against a sterile similarly situated test focussed on treating 'likes' alike" (Kapp, supra at para 15). Despite this warning, comparative analysis under section 15(1) has sometimes been undertaken in a formalistic manner that has resulted in the rejection of equality rights claims (see e.g. Hodge v. Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development), 2004 SCC 65 (Can LII), [2004] 3 SCR 357; Auton (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 78 (CanLII), [2004] 3 SCR 657; for commentary see e.g. Daphne Gilbert and Diana Majury, "Critical Comparisons: The Supreme Court of Canada Dooms Section 15" (2006), 24 Windsor Y.B. Access Just. 111).

   In a companion case to Kapp, Withler v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 12 (CanLII), [2011] 1 SCR 396, the Court recognized the problems with a formalistic or "mirror" comparative analysis, in which the appropriate comparator group was that which "'mirrors the characteristics of the claimant (or claimant group) relevant to the benefit or advantage sought' except for the personal characteristic on which the claim was based" (Withler, at para 49). Writing for a unanimous Court, McLachlin C.J. and Abella J. had this to say about the proper approach to comparison:

   > It is unnecessary to pinpoint a particular group that precisely corresponds to the claimant group except for the personal characteristic or characteristics alleged to ground the discrimination. Provided that the claimant establishes a distinction based on one or more enumerated or analogous grounds, the claim should proceed to the second step of the analysis. This provides the flexibility required to accommodate claims based on intersecting grounds of discrimination. It also avoids the problem of eliminating claims at the outset because no precisely corresponding group can be posited. (Withler, at para 63)

   The Court also noted that multiple comparators may be relevant in some cases (at paras 58, 72). At the same time, they stated that in adverse effects discrimination cases, comparison may not be as straightforward and "the claimant will have more work to do at the first step. Historical or sociological disadvantage may assist in demonstrating that the law imposes a burden or denies a benefit to the claimant that is not imposed on or denied to others. The focus will be on the effect of the law and the situation of the claimant group" (at para 64). Comparison is also relevant at step 2, where it "may bolster the contextual understanding of a claimant's place within a legislative scheme and society at large, and thus help to determine whether the impugned law or decision perpetuates disadvantage or stereotyping" (at para 65). Is it possible to conceive of an approach to equality rights that is not comparative? If a claimant group has particular needs that are not shared by other groups, how might comparative analysis be undertaken in such a case?

5. Andrews kept separate the section 15(1) and section 1 stages of analysis by rejecting the BC Court of Appeal's suggestion that the reasonableness and fairness of the impugned legislation should be considered under section 15(1). However, Andrews did state that "a law expressed to bind all should not because of irrelevant personal differences have a more burdensome or less beneficial impact on one than another" (at para 165). This attention to the "relevance" of the ground(s) at play has come up in different ways since Andrews. It was the focus of a majority of members of the Court in a 1995 trilogy of cases: Miron v. Trudel, 1995 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 418; Egan v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 513; and Thibaudeau v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 99 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 627. Similarly, Law v. Canada stipulated that whether the impugned law corresponded to the actual needs, capacities, and circumstances of the claimant group was a contextual factor under section 15(1) (at paras 70-71). Other cases have focused on whether the law imposes "arbitrary" disadvantage on the claimant (see e.g. Kahkewistahaw First Nation v. Taypotat, 2015 SCC 30 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 548) or have reviewed the broader legislative context and government objectives in assessing section 15(1) (see e.g. Withler, supra). Whether these are required considerations under section 15(1), or are better left to section 1, was explicitly addressed in Fraser v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 SCC 28 (CanLII), [2020] 3 SCR 113 and R. v. Sharma, 2022 SCC 39 (CanLII), which are excerpted in Part 14.3.

   Does assessment of the relevance or arbitrariness of personal characteristics in relation to the impugned law or state action improperly import section 1 matters into section 15(1)? Does it return to a formal equality approach where the focus is on treating likes alike? Why might courts be inclined to use this approach in the section 15(1) analysis? For discussion see e.g. Sheilah Martin, "Balancing Individual Rights to Equality and Social Goals" (2001) 80 Can B Rev 299; Denise Réaume, "The Relevance of Relevance to Equality Rights" (2006) 31 Queen's LJ 696; Sonia Lawrence, "Equality and Anti-discrimination: The Relationship between Government Goals and Finding Discrimination in Section 15" in Peter Oliver et al, ed, Oxford Handbook of the Canadian Constitution (Oxford University Press, 2017).

3 Adverse Effects Discrimination

As discussed above—in Part 2: "Key Concepts: Equality, Discrimination, and Justification"—section 15 has been interpreted to include more than simply "direct" or "intentional" discrimination, which is an explicit departure from the formal equality doctrine in American constitutional law under the Equal Protection Clause. Indeed, adverse effects discrimination had been recognized in human rights jurisprudence in Canada since the mid-1980s, which influenced the interpretation of section 15 of the Charter in Andrews and subsequent cases.

At the same time, the cases below explore the contested boundaries of adverse effects claims, and relatedly, the meaning of substantive equality under section 15 in various circumstances of social hierarchy, e.g., disability (Eldridge), sexuality (Vriend), gender (Fraser), and race/Indigeneity (Sharma).

3.1 Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 624

Eldridge concerned disability discrimination. It addressed "whether a provincial government's failure to provide funding for sign language interpreters for deaf persons when they receive medical services" infringes s. 15(1) of the Charter (at para 1). The Court unanimously held that it did, and discussed discrimination in the following terms.

> The judgment of the Court was delivered by
> //La Forest J.//
> 58 … While this Court has not adopted a uniform approach to s. 15(1), there is broad agreement on the general analytic framework … A person claiming a violation of s. 15(1) must first establish that, because of a distinction drawn between the claimant and others, the claimant has been denied "equal protection" or "equal benefit" of the law. Secondly, the claimant must show that the denial constitutes discrimination on the basis of one of the enumerated grounds listed in s. 15(1) or one analogous thereto …
> 59 … There is no question that the distinction here is based on a personal characteristic that is irrelevant to the functional values underlying the health care system. Those values consist of the promotion of health and the prevention and treatment of illness and disease, and the realization of those values through the vehicle of a publicly funded health care system. There could be no personal characteristic less relevant to these values than an individual's physical disability.
> 60 The only question in this case, then, is whether the appellants have been afforded "equal benefit of the law without discrimination" within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter. On its face, the medicare system in British Columbia applies equally to the deaf and hearing populations. It does not make an explicit "distinction" based on disability by singling out deaf persons for different treatment. Both deaf and hearing persons are entitled to receive certain medical services free of charge. The appellants nevertheless contend that the lack of funding for sign language interpreters renders them unable to benefit from this legislation to the same extent as hearing persons. Their claim, in other words, is one of "adverse effects" discrimination.
> 61 This Court has consistently held that s. 15(1) of the Charter protects against this type of discrimination. In Andrews, supra, McIntyre J. found that facially neutral laws may be discriminatory. "It must be recognized at once", he commented, at p. 164, ". . . that every difference in treatment between individuals under the law will not necessarily result in inequality and, as well, that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality"; see also Big M Drug Mart Ltd., supra, at p. 347. Section 15(1), the Court held, was intended to ensure a measure of substantive, and not merely formal equality.
> 62 As a corollary to this principle, this Court has also concluded that a discriminatory purpose or intention is not a necessary condition of a s. 15(1) violation … A legal distinction need not be motivated by a desire to disadvantage an individual or group in order to violate s. 15(1). It is sufficient if the effect of the legislation is to deny someone the equal protection or benefit of the law. As McIntyre J. stated in Andrews, at p. 165, "[t]o approach the ideal of full equality before and under the law . . . the main consideration must be the impact of the law on the individual or the group concerned". In this the Court has staked out a different path than the United States Supreme Court, which requires a discriminatory intent in order to ground an equal protection claim under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution ...
> 63 This Court first addressed the concept of adverse effects discrimination in the context of provincial human rights legislation. In Simpsons-Sears, the Court was faced with the question of whether a rule requiring employees to be available for work on Friday evenings and Saturdays discriminated against those observing a Saturday Sabbath. Though this rule was neutral on its face in that it applied equally to all employees, the Court nevertheless found it to be discriminatory. Writing for the Court, McIntyre J. commented as follows, at p. 551:
> > A distinction must be made between what I would describe as direct discrimination and the concept already referred to as adverse effect discrimination in connection with employment. Direct discrimination occurs in this connection where an employer adopts a practice or rule which on its face discriminates on a prohibited ground. For example, "No Catholics or no women or no blacks employed here." . . . On the other hand, there is the concept of adverse effect discrimination. It arises where an employer for genuine business reasons adopts a rule or standard which is on its face neutral, and which will apply equally to all employees, but which has a discriminatory effect upon a prohibited ground on one employee or group of employees in that it imposes, because of some special characteristic of the employee or group, obligations, penalties, or restrictive conditions not imposed on other members of the work force.
> 66 … [I]n the present case the adverse effects suffered by deaf persons stem not from the imposition of a burden not faced by the mainstream population, but rather from a failure to ensure that they benefit equally from a service offered to everyone. It is on this basis that the trial judge and the majority of the Court of Appeal found that the failure to provide medically related sign language interpretation was not discriminatory. Their analyses presuppose that there is a categorical distinction to be made between state-imposed burdens and benefits, and that the government is not obliged to ameliorate disadvantage that it has not helped to create or exacerbate.
> 69 While this approach has a certain formal, logical coherence, in my view it seriously mischaracterizes the practical reality of health care delivery. Effective communication is quite obviously an integral part of the provision of medical services. At trial, the appellants presented evidence that miscommunication can lead to misdiagnosis or a failure to follow a recommended treatment. This risk is particularly acute in emergency situations, as illustrated by the appellant Linda Warren's experience during the premature birth of her twin daughters. That adequate communication is essential to proper medical care is surely so incontrovertible that the Court could, if necessary, take judicial notice of it. As Professor Pothier observes, for the hearing population "conversation between doctor and patient is so basic to the provision of medical services that it is taken for granted"; see Dianne Pothier, "M'Aider, Mayday: Section 15 of the Charter in Distress" (1996), 6 N.J.C.L. 295, at p. 335.
> 72 Once it is accepted that effective communication is an indispensable component of the delivery of medical services, it becomes much more difficult to assert that the failure to ensure that deaf persons communicate effectively with their health care providers is not discriminatory. In their effort to persuade this Court otherwise, the respondents and their supporting interveners maintain that s. 15(1) does not oblige governments to implement programs to alleviate disadvantages that exist independently of state action. Adverse effects only arise from benefit programs, they aver, when those programs exacerbate the disparities between the group claiming a s. 15(1) violation and the general population. They assert, in other words, that governments should be entitled to provide benefits to the general population without ensuring that disadvantaged members of society have the resources to take full advantage of those benefits.

73 In my view, this position bespeaks a thin and impoverished vision of s. 15(1). It is belied, more importantly, by the thrust of this Court's equality jurisprudence. It has been suggested that s. 15(1) of the Charter does not oblige the state to take positive actions, such as provide services to ameliorate the symptoms of systemic or general inequality … Whether or not this is true in all cases, and I do not purport to decide the matter here, the question raised in the present case is of a wholly different order. This Court has repeatedly held that once the state does provide a benefit, it is obliged to do so in a non-discriminatory manner … In many circumstances, this will require governments to take positive action, for example by extending the scope of a benefit to a previously excluded class of persons … Moreover, it has been suggested that, in taking this sort of positive action, the government should not be the source of further inequality …

77 This Court has consistently held, then, that discrimination can arise both from the adverse effects of rules of general application as well as from express distinctions flowing from the distribution of benefits. Given this state of affairs, I can think of no principled reason why it should not be possible to establish a claim of discrimination based on the adverse effects of a facially neutral benefit scheme. Section 15(1) expressly states, after all, that "[e]very individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination . . ." (emphasis added). The provision makes no distinction between laws that impose unequal burdens and those that deny equal benefits. If we accept the concept of adverse effect discrimination, it seems inevitable, at least at the s. 15(1) stage of analysis, that the government will be required to take special measures to ensure that disadvantaged groups are able to benefit equally from government services. As I will develop below, if there are policy reasons in favour of limiting the government's responsibility to ameliorate disadvantage in the provision of benefits and services, those policies are more appropriately considered in determining whether any violation of s. 15(1) is saved by s. 1 of the Charter.

80 In my view, therefore, the failure of the Medical Services Commission and hospitals to provide sign language interpretation where it is necessary for effective communication constitutes a prima facie violation of the s. 15(1) rights of deaf persons. This failure denies them the equal benefit of the law and discriminates against them in comparison with hearing persons.

3.2 Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493

Vriend concerned discrimination against sexual minorities. It addressed Alberta's "comprehensive scheme for the protection of individuals from discrimination in the private sector" (at para 94), but which excluded "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The Court unanimously held that this exclusion infringed section 15(1) of the Charter, albeit in three different opinions. The majority opinion—co-authored by Cory and Iacobucci JJ.—discussed discrimination as follows.

The judgment of Lamer C.J. and Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Bastarache was delivered by

1 CORY AND IACOBUCCI JJ. …

75 The respondents have argued that because the IRPA merely omits any reference to sexual orientation, this "neutral silence" cannot be understood as creating a distinction. They contend that the IRPA extends full protection on the grounds contained within it to heterosexuals and homosexuals alike, and therefore there is no distinction and hence no discrimination. It is the respondents' position that if any distinction is made on the basis of sexual orientation that distinction exists because it is present in society and not because of the IRPA.

76 These arguments cannot be accepted. They are based on that "thin and impoverished" notion of equality referred to in Eldridge (at para. 73). It has been repeatedly held that identical treatment will not always constitute equal treatment (see for example Andrews, supra, at p. 164). It is also clear that the way in which an exclusion is worded should not disguise the nature of the exclusion so as to allow differently drafted exclusions to be treated differently …

77 The respondents concede that if homosexuals were excluded altogether from the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they were not protected from discrimination on any grounds, this would be discriminatory. Clearly that would be discrimination of the most egregious kind. It is true that gay and lesbian individuals are not entirely excluded from the protection of the IRPA. They can claim protection on some grounds. Yet that certainly does not mean that there is no discrimination present. For example, the fact that a lesbian and a heterosexual woman are both entitled to bring a complaint of discrimination on the basis of gender does not mean that they have equal protection under the Act. Lesbian and gay individuals are still denied protection under the ground that may be the most significant for them, discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation …

80 If the mere silence of the legislation was enough to remove it from s. 15(1) scrutiny then any legislature could easily avoid the objects of s. 15(1) simply by drafting laws which omitted reference to excluded groups. Such an approach would ignore the recognition that this Court has given to the principle that discrimination can arise from underinclusive legislation. This principle was expressed with great clarity by Dickson C.J. in Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., 1989 CanLII 96 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1219, at p. 1240. There he stated: "Underinclusion may be simply a backhanded way of permitting discrimination".

81 It is clear that the IRPA, by reason of its underinclusiveness, does create a distinction. The distinction is simultaneously drawn along two different lines. The first is the distinction between homosexuals, on one hand, and other disadvantaged groups which are protected under the Act, on the other. Gays and lesbians do not even have formal equality with reference to other protected groups, since those other groups are explicitly included and they are not.

82 The second distinction, and, I think, the more fundamental one, is between homosexuals and heterosexuals. This distinction may be more difficult to see because there is, on the surface, a measure of formal equality: gay or lesbian individuals have the same access as heterosexual individuals to the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they could complain to the Commission about an incident of discrimination on the basis of any of the grounds currently included. However, the exclusion of the ground of sexual orientation, considered in the context of the social reality of discrimination against gays and lesbians, clearly has a disproportionate impact on them as opposed to heterosexuals. Therefore the IRPA in its underinclusive state denies substantive equality to the former group …

84 [T]he respondents' contention that the distinction is not created by law, but rather exists independently of the IRPA in society, cannot be accepted. It is, of course, true that discrimination against gays and lesbians exists in society. The reality of this cruel and unfortunate discrimination was recognized in Egan. Indeed it provides the context in which the legislative distinction challenged in this case must be analysed. The reality of society's discrimination against lesbians and gay men demonstrates that there is a distinction drawn in the IRPA which denies these groups equal protection of the law by excluding lesbians and gay men from its protection, the very protection they so urgently need because of the existence of discrimination against them in society. It is not necessary to find that the legislation creates the discrimination existing in society in order to determine that it creates a potentially discriminatory distinction …

86 The omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground in the IRPA creates a distinction on the basis of sexual orientation. The "silence" of the IRPA with respect to discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not "neutral". Gay men and lesbians are treated differently from other disadvantaged groups and from heterosexuals. They, unlike gays and lesbians, receive protection from discrimination on the grounds that are likely to be relevant to them …

94 The effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the protected grounds listed in the IRPA must be understood in the context of the nature and purpose of the legislation. The IRPA is a broad, comprehensive scheme for the protection of individuals from discrimination in the private sector …

95 The commendable goal of the legislation, then, is to affirm and give effect to the principle that all persons are equal in dignity and rights. It prohibits discrimination in a number of areas and with respect to an increasingly expansive list of grounds.

96 The comprehensive nature of the Act must be taken into account in considering the effect of excluding one ground from its protection. It is not as if the Legislature had merely chosen to deal with one type of discrimination. In such a case it might be permissible to target only that specific type of discrimination and not another … The case at bar presents a very different situation. It is concerned with legislation that purports to provide comprehensive protection from discrimination for all individuals in Alberta. The selective exclusion of one group from that comprehensive protection therefore has a very different effect.

97 The first and most obvious effect of the exclusion of sexual orientation is that lesbians or gay men who experience discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation are denied recourse to the mechanisms set up by the IRPA to make a formal complaint of discrimination and seek a legal remedy. Thus, the Alberta Human Rights Commission could not hear Vriend's complaint and cannot consider a complaint or take any action on behalf of any person who has suffered discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation. The denial of access to remedial procedures for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation must have dire and demeaning consequences for those affected. This result is exacerbated both because the option of a civil remedy for discrimination is precluded and by the lack of success that lesbian women and gay men have had in attempting to obtain a remedy for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation by complaining on other grounds such as sex or marital status. Persons who are discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation, unlike others protected by the Act, are left without effective legal recourse for the discrimination they have suffered …

99 Apart from the immediate effect of the denial of recourse in cases of discrimination, there are other effects which, while perhaps less obvious, are at least as harmful. In Haig, the Ontario Court of Appeal based its finding of discrimination on both the "failure to provide an avenue for redress for prejudicial treatment of homosexual members of society" and "the possible inference from the omission that such treatment is acceptable" (p. 503). It can be reasonably inferred that the absence of any legal recourse for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation perpetuates and even encourages that kind of discrimination. The respondents contend that it cannot be assumed that the "silence" of the IRPA reinforces or perpetuates discrimination, since governments "cannot legislate attitudes". However, this argument seems disingenuous in light of the stated purpose of the IRPA, to prevent discrimination. It cannot be claimed that human rights legislation will help to protect individuals from discrimination, and at the same time contend that an exclusion from the legislation will have no effect.

100 However, let us assume, contrary to all reasonable inferences, that exclusion from the IRPA's protection does not actually contribute to a greater incidence of discrimination on the excluded ground. Nonetheless that exclusion, deliberately chosen in the face of clear findings that discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation does exist in society, sends a strong and sinister message. The very fact that sexual orientation is excluded from the IRPA, which is the Government's primary statement of policy against discrimination, certainly suggests that discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not as serious or as deserving of condemnation as other forms of discrimination. It could well be said that it is tantamount to condoning or even encouraging discrimination against lesbians and gay men. Thus this exclusion clearly gives rise to an effect which constitutes discrimination.

101 The exclusion sends a message to all Albertans that it is permissible, and perhaps even acceptable, to discriminate against individuals on the basis of their sexual orientation. The effect of that message on gays and lesbians is one whose significance cannot be underestimated. As a practical matter, it tells them that they have no protection from discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation. Deprived of any legal redress they must accept and live in constant fear of discrimination. These are burdens which are not imposed on heterosexuals.

102 Perhaps most important is the psychological harm which may ensue from this state of affairs. Fear of discrimination will logically lead to concealment of true identity and this must be harmful to personal confidence and self-esteem. Compounding that effect is the implicit message conveyed by the exclusion, that gays and lesbians, unlike other individuals, are not worthy of protection. This is clearly an example of a distinction which demeans the individual and strengthens and perpetrates the view that gays and lesbians are less worthy of protection as individuals in Canada's society. The potential harm to the dignity and perceived worth of gay and lesbian individuals constitutes a particularly cruel form of discrimination.

103 Even if the discrimination is experienced at the hands of private individuals, it is the state that denies protection from that discrimination. Thus the adverse effects are particularly invidious …

104 In excluding sexual orientation from the IRPA's protection, the Government has, in effect, stated that "all persons are equal in dignity and rights", except gay men and lesbians. Such a message, even if it is only implicit, must offend s. 15(1), the "section of the Charter, more than any other, which recognizes and cherishes the innate human dignity of every individual" (Egan, at para. 128). This effect, together with the denial to individuals of any effective legal recourse in the event they are discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation, amount to a sufficient basis on which to conclude that the distinction created by the exclusion from the IRPA constitutes discrimination …

107 In summary, this Court has no choice but to conclude that the IRPA, by reason of the omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground, clearly violates s. 15 of the Charter. The IRPA in its underinclusive state creates a distinction which results in the denial of the equal benefit and protection of the law on the basis of sexual orientation, a personal characteristic which has been found to be analogous to the grounds enumerated in s. 15. This, in itself, would be sufficient to conclude that discrimination is present and therefore there is a violation of s. 15. The serious discriminatory effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act reinforce this conclusion. As a result, it is clear that the IRPA, as it stands, violates the equality rights of the appellant Vriend and of other gays and lesbians …

3.3 Fraser v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 SCC 28 (CanLII), [2020] 3 SCR 113

Fraser concerned sex discrimination. It addressed a pension scheme that excluded job-sharing employees—disproportionately, women with childcare obligations—from a buy-back option that let those employees top up their pension contributions to qualify for equivalent pension entitlements as other employees—disproportionately, men—who worked full time. The top-up contributions were paid entirely by the employees and not their employer, the RCMP (see para 14). Writing for a majority of the Court, Abella J. found the exclusion discriminatory under s. 15(1), and provided the Court's most detailed examination of adverse effects/systemic discrimination, while Brown, Rowe, and Côté JJ. dissented.

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. was delivered by

[28] Ms. Fraser does not suggest that the negative pension consequences of job-sharing are explicitly based on sex. Rather, she claims that they have an adverse impact on women with children.

[29] How adverse impact or systemic discrimination is applied has received extensive academic consideration (see, for example, Colleen Sheppard, Inclusive Equality: The Relational Dimensions of Systemic Discrimination in Canada (2010), at pp. 19-21; Evelyn Braun, "Adverse Effect Discrimination: Proving the Prima Facie Case" (2005), 11 Rev. Const. Stud. 119; Jonnette Watson Hamilton and Jennifer Koshan, "Adverse Impact: The Supreme Court's Approach to Adverse Effects Discrimination under Section 15 of the Charter" (2015), 19 Rev. Const. Stud. 191; Michèle Rivet and Anne-Marie Santorineos, "Juger à l'ère des droits fondamentaux" (2012), 42 R.D.U.S. 363, at p. 374; Diane L. Demers, "La discrimination systémique: variation sur un concept unique" (1993), 8 C.J.L.S. 83; Lisa Philipps and Margot Young, "Sex, Tax and the Charter: A Review of Thibaudeau v. Canada" (1995), 2 Rev. Const. Stud. 221). As Prof. Colleen Sheppard notes:

> Why is it so critical to expand on our understanding of adverse effect discrimination? If we do not, there is a significant risk that discrimination embedded in apparently neutral institutional policies, rules, or procedures will not be recognized as discriminatory. This risk is accentuated by the necessity in anti-discrimination law to connect the experience of exclusion, harm, prejudice, or disadvantage to a recognized ground of discrimination. . . . We need a sophisticated and coherent theory of adverse effect discrimination to assist claimants, lawyers, and adjudicators with the complexities of the manifestations of systemic discrimination.

[31] Increased awareness of adverse impact discrimination has been a "central trend in the development of discrimination law", marking a shift away from a fault-based conception of discrimination towards an effects-based model which critically examines systems, structures, and their impact on disadvantaged groups (Denise G. Réaume, "Harm and Fault in Discrimination Law: The Transition from Intentional to Adverse Effect Discrimination" (2001), 2 Theor. Inq. L. 349, at pp. 350-51; see also Béatrice Vizkelety, Proving Discrimination in Canada (1987), at p. 18; Sheppard (2010), at pp. 19-20). Accompanying this shift was the recognition that discrimination is "frequently a product of continuing to do things 'the way they have always been done'", and that governments must be "particularly vigilant about the effects of their own policies" on members of disadvantaged groups (Fay Faraday, "One Step Forward, Two Steps Back? Substantive Equality, Systemic Discrimination and Pay Equity at the Supreme Court of Canada" (2020), 94 S.C.L.R. (2d) 301, at p. 310; Sophia Moreau, "The Moral Seriousness of Indirect Discrimination", in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 123, at p. 145).

[32] Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971) was one of the first cases to apply this concept and is a classic example of adverse impact discrimination. An employer required employees to have a high school diploma and pass standardized tests to work in certain departments at a power plant. Neither requirement was significantly related to successful job performance; both, however, had the effect of disqualifying African Americans at a substantially higher rate than white applicants.

[33] The United States Supreme Court held that the education and testing requirements infringed Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub. L. 88-352, 78 Stat. 241 (1964). The court emphasized that the Act prohibits "practices that are fair in form, but discriminatory in operation":

> Congress has now provided that tests or criteria for employment or promotion may not provide equality of opportunity merely in the sense of the fabled offer of milk to the stork and the fox. On the contrary, Congress has now required that the posture and condition of the job seeker be taken into account. It has — to resort again to the fable — provided that the vessel in which the milk is proffered be one all seekers can use. The Act proscribes not only overt discrimination but also practices that are fair in form, but discriminatory in operation. . . . Good intent or absence of discriminatory intent does not redeem employment procedures or testing mechanisms that operate as "built-in headwinds" for minority groups and are unrelated to measuring job capability. [Emphasis added; pp. 431-32.]

[34] Griggs explains that the application of "neutral" rules may not produce equality in substance for disadvantaged groups. Membership in such groups often brings with it a unique constellation of physical, economic and social barriers. Laws which distribute benefits or burdens without accounting for those differences — without accounting for the "posture and condition of the job seeker", as in Griggs — are the prime targets of indirect discrimination claims. I agree with Profs. Lisa Philipps and Margot Young that > we are not always conscious of the ways in which the distinctions we draw . . . will implicate group identities and single out specific groups for distinctive treatment. This is because the constellations of factors or characteristics that go into the construction of identities often masquerade as unconnected, purely individual traits, behaviours, choices, or situations. Yet, in social reality they may be tightly linked to one group or another. So the law has had to recognize that state action may be discriminatory even though on its face and in terms of the intentions informing it there is no obvious evidence that such discrimination is occurring. [p. 258]

> (See also Sandra Fredman, Discrimination Law (2nd ed. 2011), at pp. 38 and 108.)

[35] Addressing adverse impact discrimination can be among the "most powerful legal measures available to disadvantaged groups in society to assert their claims to justice" (Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, "Indirect Discrimination Law: Controversies and Critical Questions", in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 1, at p. 30). Not only is such discrimination "much more prevalent than the cruder brand of openly direct discrimination", [5] it often poses a greater threat to the equality aspirations of disadvantaged groups:

> . . . even more common are situations where the discrimination occurs in a context like an employment relationship, government program or statute, or educational setting, and there is no single identifiable "villain", no single action identifiable as "discriminatory", and the outward appearance of a neutral set of rules or practices being applied across the board. This invisible structure, with its accompanying set of practices, is a powerful limit on the equality aspirations of many who must deal within that structure but have characteristics that do not match those of persons intended to benefit from the structure.
> (Mary Eberts and Kim Stanton, "The Disappearance of the Four Equality Rights and Systemic Discrimination from Canadian Equality Jurisprudence" (2018), 38 N.J.C.L. 89, at p. 92)

[36] By recognizing the exclusionary impact of such discrimination, courts can better address "discrimination in its diverse forms", including at "the systemic or institutional level" (Vizkelety, at p. viii; see also Colleen Sheppard, "Mapping anti-discrimination law onto inequality at work: Expanding the meaning of equality in international labour law" (2012), 151 Int'l Lab. Rev. 1, at p. 8; Faraday, at p. 319). Remedying adverse effects discrimination allows courts

> [to] go to the heart of the equality question, to the goal of transformation, to an examination of the way institutions and relations must be changed in order to make them available, accessible, meaningful and rewarding for the many diverse groups of which our society is composed.
> (Meiorin, at para. 41, quoting Shelagh Day and Gwen Brodsky, "The Duty to Accommodate: Who Will Benefit?" (1996), 75 Can. Bar Rev. 433, at p. 462) …

[47] There is no doubt … that adverse impact discrimination "violate[s] the norm of substantive equality" which underpins this Court's equality jurisprudence (Withler, at para. 2). At the heart of substantive equality is the recognition that identical or facially neutral treatment may "frequently produce serious inequality" (Andrews, at p. 164). This is precisely what happens when "neutral" laws ignore the "true characteristics of [a] group which act as headwinds to the enjoyment of society's benefits" (Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, 1997 CanLII 366 (SCC), [1997] 1 SCR 241, at para. 67; Eldridge, at para. 65).

[48] The "animating norm" of the current s. 15 framework guaranteeing substantive equality is also the core value engaged in cases of adverse effects discrimination (Withler, at para. 2; Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at pp. 192 and 197). This Court has never suggested that cases of adverse impact discrimination should be resolved under a different approach (see, for example, Andrews, at pp. 173-74; Eldridge, at paras. 59-60; Vriend, at paras. 81-82 and 87-89; Law, at paras. 36-39; Taypotat, at paras. 19-22; Alliance, at para. 25). On the contrary, we have clarified that the same approach applies regardless of whether the discrimination alleged is direct or indirect. Withler leaves little doubt on this point:

> The substantive equality analysis under s. 15(1), as discussed earlier, proceeds in two stages . . . . The role of comparison at the first step is to establish a "distinction".
> . . .
> In some cases, identifying the distinction will be relatively straightforward, because a law will, on its face, make a distinction on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground (direct discrimination) . . . . In other cases, establishing the distinction will be more difficult, because what is alleged is indirect discrimination: that although the law purports to treat everyone the same, it has a disproportionately negative impact on a group or individual that can be identified by factors relating to enumerated or analogous grounds . . . . In that kind of case, the claimant will have more work to do at the first step. Historical or sociological disadvantage may assist in demonstrating that the law imposes a burden or denies a benefit to the claimant that is not imposed on or denied to others. The focus will be on the effect of the law and the situation of the claimant group. [Emphasis added; paras. 61-62 and 64.]

[49] In the human rights context, the Court has not used different legal tests for direct and indirect discrimination since Meiorin (paras. 50-54; see also British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles) v. British Columbia (Council of Human Rights), 1999 CanLII 646 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 868, at paras. 18-19; Moore v. British Columbia (Education), 2012 SCC 61 (CanLII), [2012] 3 SCR 360, at para. 61). A unified approach, in my view, is equally justified under the Charter.

[50] To prove discrimination under s. 15(1), claimants must show that a law or policy creates a distinction based on a protected ground, and that the law perpetuates, reinforces or exacerbates disadvantage. These requirements do not require revision in adverse effects cases. What is needed, however, is a clear account of how to identify adverse effects discrimination, because the impugned law will not, on its face, include any distinctions based on prohibited grounds (Withler, at para. 64). Any such distinctions must be discerned by examining the impact of the law (Alliance, at para. 25).

[51] This inquiry has frequently been described as a search for a "disproportionate" impact on members of protected groups (see Vriend, at para. 82; Withler, at para. 64; Taypotat, at paras. 21-23; Action Travail, at p. 1139; Egan v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 513, at para. 138, per Cory and Iacobucci JJ. dissenting; Moreau (2010), at p. 154; Braun, at pp. 124-25; Vizkelety, at p. 176; Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at p. 196; Collins and Khaitan, at pp. 3-4; Dianne Pothier, "M'Aider, Mayday: Section 15 of the Charter in Distress" (1996), 6 N.J.C.L. 295, at p. 322).

[52] In other words, in order for a law to create a distinction based on prohibited grounds through its effects, it must have a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group. If so, the first stage of the s. 15 test will be met.

[53] How does this work in practice? Instead of asking whether a law explicitly targets a protected group for differential treatment, a court must explore whether it does so indirectly through its impact on members of that group (see Eldridge, at paras. 60-62; Vriend, at para. 82). A law, for example, may include seemingly neutral rules, restrictions or criteria that operate in practice as "built-in headwinds" for members of protected groups. The testing requirement in Griggs is the paradigmatic example; other examples include the aerobic fitness requirement in Meiorin, and the policy requiring employees to work on Saturdays in Simpsons-Sears (see also Central Alberta Dairy Pool v. Alberta (Human Rights Commission), 1990 CanLII 76 (SCC), [1990] 2 SCR 489). To assess the adverse impact of these policies, courts looked beyond the facially neutral criteria on which they were based, and examined whether they had the effect of placing members of protected groups at a disadvantage (Moreau (2018), at p. 125).

[54] In other cases, the problem is not "headwinds" built into a law, but the absence of accommodation for members of protected groups (Tarunabh Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (2015), at p. 77; Dianne Pothier, "Tackling Disability Discrimination at Work: Toward a Systemic Approach" (2010), 4 McGill J.L. & Health 17, at pp. 23-24). Eldridge is a good example. Under the health care scheme in that case, all patients lacked access to sign language interpreters — but this lack of access had a disproportionate impact on those who had hearing loss and required interpreters to meaningfully communicate with health care providers (paras. 69, 71 and 83).

[55] Disproportionate impact can be proven in different ways. In Eldridge, it was established because "the quality of care received by [those with hearing loss] was inferior to that available to hearing persons" (para. 83 (emphasis added)). In Griggs and Meiorin, by contrast, the relevant impact was the higher rate at which African Americans and women were disqualified from employment. Both are examples of how a law or policy can have a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group. Griggs, Meiorin, and other leading cases leave no doubt that disproportionate impact can be established if members of protected groups are denied benefits or forced to take on burdens more frequently than others. A difference in "quality" of treatment, as in Eldridge, may strengthen a claim of disproportionate impact, but it is not a necessary element (Philipps and Young, at pp. 244-45; see also Pothier (1996), at p. 322; Selene Mize, "Indirect Discrimination Reconsidered" (2007), N.Z.L. Rev. 27, at p. 39).

[56] Two types of evidence will be especially helpful in proving that a law has a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group. The first is evidence about the situation of the claimant group. The second is evidence about the results of the law.

[57] Courts will benefit from evidence about the physical, social, cultural or other barriers which provide the "full context of the claimant group's situation" (Withler, at para. 43; see also para. 64). This evidence may come from the claimant, from expert witnesses, or through judicial notice (see R. v. Spence, 2005 SCC 71 (CanLII), [2005] 3 SCR 458). The goal of such evidence is to show that membership in the claimant group is associated with certain characteristics that have disadvantaged members of the group, such as an inability to work on Saturdays or lower aerobic capacity (Homer v. Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police, [2012] 3 All E.R. 1287 (S.C.), at para. 14; Simpsons-Sears; Meiorin, at para. 11). These links may reveal that seemingly neutral policies are "designed well for some and not for others" (Meiorin, at para. 41). When evaluating evidence about the group, courts should be mindful of the fact that issues which predominantly affect certain populations may be under-documented. These claimants may have to rely more heavily on their own evidence or evidence from other members of their group, rather than on government reports, academic studies or expert testimony.

[58] Courts will also benefit from evidence about the outcomes that the impugned law or policy (or a substantially similar one) has produced in practice. Evidence about the "results of a system" may provide concrete proof that members of protected groups are being disproportionately impacted (Action Travail, at p. 1139; Vizkelety, at pp. 170-74). This evidence may include statistics, especially if the pool of people adversely affected by a criterion or standard includes both members of a protected group and members of more advantaged groups (Sheppard (2001), at pp. 545-46; Braun, at pp. 120-21).

[59] There is no universal measure for what level of statistical disparity is necessary to demonstrate that there is a disproportionate impact, and the Court should not, in my view, craft rigid rules on this issue. The goal of statistical evidence, ultimately, is to establish "a disparate pattern of exclusion or harm that is statistically significant and not simply the result of chance" (Sheppard (2001), at p. 546; see also Vizkelety, at p. 175; Fredman (2011), at pp. 186-87). The weight given to statistics will depend on, among other things, their quality and methodology (Vizkelety, at pp. 178-84).

[60] Ideally, claims of adverse effects discrimination should be supported by evidence about the circumstances of the claimant group and about the results produced by the challenged law. Evidence about the claimant group's situation, on its own, may amount to merely a "web of instinct" if too far removed from the situation in the actual workplace, community or institution subject to the discrimination claim (Taypotat, at para. 34). Evidence of statistical disparity, on its own, may have significant shortcomings that leave open the possibility of unreliable results. The weaknesses with each type of evidence can be overcome if they are both present (Braun, at p. 135; Vizkelety, at p. 192; Vancouver Area Network of Drug Users v. Downtown Vancouver Business Improvement Association (2018), 2018 BCCA 132 (CanLII), 10 B.C.L.R. (6th) 175 (C.A.), at para. 98). Prof. Colleen Sheppard (2001) recognizes this possibility:

> While in some cases the overwhelming correspondence between certain categories and the gender or racial composition of the category makes the sex or race discrimination claims relatively easy to substantiate, in other cases the statistical preponderance may be less marked. In such cases it may also be important to consider the qualitative components of the harm that constitutes discrimination. [p. 548]

[61] This is not to say, of course, that both kinds of evidence are always required. In some cases, evidence about a group will show such a strong association with certain traits — such as pregnancy with gender — that the disproportionate impact on members of that group "will be apparent and immediate" (Taypotat, at para. 33; see also Fredman (2011), at pp. 187-88; Sheppard (2001), at pp. 544-45; Gaz métropolitain inc. v. Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse, 2011 QCCA 1201, at paras. 27 and 47 (CanLII); Oršuš v. Croatia, No. 15766/03, ECHR 2010-II, at para. 153).

[62] Similarly, clear and consistent statistical disparities can show a disproportionate impact on members of protected groups, even if the precise reason for that impact is unknown. Prof. Sandra Fredman has argued forcefully against requiring claimants to specify "the reason why" they are being disadvantaged by a rule or policy:

> To require the complainants to show the 'reason why' the PCP [policy, criteria or practice] disadvantages the group as a whole is to fundamentally misunderstand the meaning of indirect discrimination. It is the disparate impact on the group of a PCP itself which constitutes the prima facie discrimination . . . .
> ("Direct and Indirect Discrimination: Is There Still a Divide?", in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 31, at p. 46; see also Sandra Fredman, "The Reason Why: Unravelling Indirect Discrimination" (2016), 45 Indus. L.J. 231.)

[63] I agree. If there are clear and consistent statistical disparities in how a law affects a claimant's group, I see no reason for requiring the claimant to bear the additional burden of explaining why the law has such an effect. In such cases, the statistical evidence is itself a compelling sign that the law has not been structured in a way that takes into account the protected group's circumstances (see Fredman (2011), at p. 181; Vizkelety, at pp. 174-76; Action Travail, at p. 1139) …

[68] Some further observations.

[69] First, whether the legislature intended to create a disparate impact is irrelevant (Sheppard (2001), at pp. 543-44; Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at pp. 196-97; Faraday, at p. 310). Proof of discriminatory intent has never been required to establish a claim under s. 15(1) (Andrews, at pp. 173-74; Eldridge, at para. 62; Vriend, at para. 93; Alliance, at para. 28; Centrale, at para. 35). Nor is an ameliorative purpose sufficient to shield legislation from s. 15(1) scrutiny (Centrale, at paras. 8 and 35; Alliance, at paras. 32-33).

[70] Second, if claimants successfully demonstrate that a law has a disproportionate impact on members of a protected group, they need not independently prove that the protected characteristic "caused" the disproportionate impact (Tarunabh Khaitan and Sandy Steel, "Wrongs, Group Disadvantage and the Legitimacy of Indirect Discrimination Law", in Hugh Collins and Tarunabh Khaitan, eds., Foundations of Indirect Discrimination Law (2018), 197, at pp. 203-4 and 220; Fredman (2018), at p. 46; Braun, at p. 146; Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at p. 197; West Yorkshire Police, at paras. 12-14; Essop, at paras. 24-27). Put differently, there was no need for the claimant in Griggs to address whether his exclusion was based on his race or lack of a high school education. The whole point of the adverse impact analysis was to show that the use of a high school education as a criteria for employment had a disproportionate impact on African Americans (Fredman (2011), at p. 189).

[71] It is also unnecessary to inquire into whether the law itself was responsible for creating the background social or physical barriers which made a particular rule, requirement or criterion disadvantageous for the claimant group. Returning to Griggs, this would amount to asking whether Duke Power Co. was responsible for lower rates of high school education among African Americans. Plainly, it was not — but this was entirely irrelevant to whether a disproportionate impact had been established. Section 15(1) has always required attention to the systemic disadvantages affecting members of protected groups, even if the state did not create them (Alliance, at para. 41; Centrale, at para. 32; Vriend, at paras. 84 and 97; Eldridge, at paras. 64-66; Eaton, at para. 67; R. v. Turpin, 1989 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1296, at pp. 1331-32).

[72] Third, claimants need not show that the criteria, characteristics or other factors used in the impugned law affect all members of a protected group in the same way. This Court has long held that "[t]he fact that discrimination is only partial does not convert it into non-discrimination" (Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., 1989 CanLII 96 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1219, at p. 1248, quoting James MacPherson, "Sex Discrimination in Canada: Taking Stock at the Start of a New Decade" (1980), 1 C.H.R.R. C/7, at p. C/11). In Brooks, the Court held that a corporate plan which denied benefits to employees during pregnancy discriminated on the basis of sex. The employer argued that the plan did not deny benefits to "women", but only to "women who are pregnant" (p. 1248, quoting MacPherson, at p. C/11). Writing for the Court, Dickson C.J. explained that practices amounting to "partial discrimination" are no less discriminatory than those in which all members of a protected group are affected (pp. 1247-48).

[73] The Court reiterated this principle in Janzen v. Platy Enterprises Ltd., 1989 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1252, where it held that the sexual harassment of two female employees was discrimination on the basis of sex. The Court rejected the employer's argument that sex discrimination had not occurred because only some of the female employees at the store had been sexually harassed. Dickson C.J. reiterated the approach to partial discrimination he had previously set out in Brooks:

> If a finding of discrimination required that every individual in the affected group be treated identically, legislative protection against discrimination would be of little or no value. It is rare that a discriminatory action is so bluntly expressed as to treat all members of the relevant group identically. In nearly every instance of discrimination the discriminatory action is composed of various ingredients with the result that some members of the pertinent group are not adversely affected, at least in a direct sense, by the discriminatory action. To deny a finding of discrimination in the circumstances of this appeal is to deny the existence of discrimination in any situation where discriminatory practices are less than perfectly inclusive. It is to argue, for example, that an employer who will only hire a woman if she has twice the qualifications required of a man is not guilty of sex discrimination if, despite this policy, the employer nevertheless manages to hire some women. [Emphasis added; pp. 1288-89.]

[74] The Court's approach in Brooks and Janzen "had obvious implications for claims based on multiple grounds of discrimination" (Dianne Pothier, "Connecting Grounds of Discrimination to Real People's Real Experiences" (2001), 13 C.J.W.L. 37, at p. 58). As Dianne Pothier has explained:

> It is an easy step to move from saying, as in Janzen, that not all women need be affected to constitute sex discrimination to also accepting that different groups of women . . . can be differently affected by, or have different experiences of, sex discrimination. Janzen also meant that a claim based on, for example, both gender and race could not be defeated simply by saying that it could not be sex discrimination because white women were unaffected or that it could not be race discrimination because Black men were unaffected. [p. 58]

[75] The Court subsequently confirmed that "heterogeneity within a claimant group does not defeat a claim of discrimination" (Quebec v. A, at para. 354). In Quebec v. A, for example, the Court held that certain provisions of the Civil Code of Québec that distinguished between de facto and legally married spouses for the purposes of support and division, discriminated on the basis of marital status. It reached this conclusion even though there was "a range of need or vulnerability among de facto spouses" (para. 354). Similarly, in Nova Scotia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Martin, 2003 SCC 54 (CanLII), [2003] 2 SCR 504, the Court held that a provincial compensation scheme that provided lesser benefits to those suffering from chronic pain, discriminated on the basis of disability. The Court confirmed that "differential treatment can occur on the basis of an enumerated ground despite the fact that not all persons belonging to the relevant group are equally mistreated" (para. 76; see also Centrale, at para. 28; Pothier (2010), at pp. 35-36; Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at pp. 197-98; Braun, at p. 147; Sheppard (2001), at p. 549).

[76] This brings us to the second step of the s. 15 test: whether the law has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage (Alliance, at para. 25). This inquiry will usually proceed similarly in cases of disparate impact and explicit discrimination. There is no "rigid template" of factors relevant to this inquiry (Quebec v. A, at para. 331, quoting Withler, at para. 66). The goal is to examine the impact of the harm caused to the affected group. The harm may include "[e]conomic exclusion or disadvantage, [s]ocial exclusion . . . [p]sychological harms . . . [p]hysical harms . . . [or] [p]olitical exclusion", and must be viewed in light of any systemic or historical disadvantages faced by the claimant group (Sheppard (2010), at pp. 62-63 (emphasis deleted)).

[77] The purpose of the inquiry is to keep s. 15(1) focussed on the protection of groups that have experienced exclusionary disadvantage based on group characteristics, as well as the protection of those "who are members of more than one socially disadvantaged group in society" (Colleen Sheppard, "Grounds of Discrimination: Towards an Inclusive and Contextual Approach" (2001), 80 Can. Bar Rev. 893, at p. 896; see also Withler, at para. 58). As the Court noted in Quebec v. A when discussing the second stage of the s. 15 test:

> The root of s. 15 is our awareness that certain groups have been historically discriminated against, and that the perpetuation of such discrimination should be curtailed. [para. 332]

(See also Taypotat, at para. 20.)

[78] Notably, the presence of social prejudices or stereotyping are not necessary factors in the s. 15(1) inquiry. They may assist in showing that a law has negative effects on a particular group, but they "are neither separate elements of the Andrews test, nor categories into which a claim of discrimination must fit" (Quebec v. A, at para. 329), since

> > [w]e must be careful not to treat Kapp and Withler as establishing an additional requirement on s. 15 claimants to prove that a distinction will perpetuate prejudicial or stereotypical attitudes towards them. Such an approach improperly focuses attention on whether a discriminatory attitude exists, not a discriminatory impact, contrary to Andrews, Kapp and Withler. [Emphasis in original; para. 327.]
> (See also paras. 329-31.)

[79] The perpetuation of disadvantage, moreover, does not become less serious under s. 15(1) simply because it was relevant to a legitimate state objective. I agree with Dean Mayo Moran that adding relevance to the s. 15(1) test — even as one contextual factor among others — risks reducing the inquiry to a search for a "rational basis" for the impugned law ("Protesting Too Much: Rational Basis Review Under Canada's Equality Guarantee", in Sheila McIntyre and Sanda Rodgers, eds., Diminishing Returns: Inequality and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2006), 71, at pp. 81-84; Eberts and Stanton, at pp. 90 and 119-20; Sheila McIntyre, "Deference and Dominance: Equality Without Substance", in Sheila McIntyre and Sanda Rodgers, eds., Diminishing Returns: Inequality and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2006), 95, at pp. 108-13). The test for a prima facie breach of s. 15(1) is concerned with the discriminatory impact of legislation on disadvantaged groups, not with whether the distinction is justified, an inquiry properly left to s. 1 (Andrews, at pp. 181-82; Turpin, at pp. 1325-26; Miron v. Trudel, 1995 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 418, at paras. 129-30; Eldridge, at paras. 77 and 79; Quebec v. A, at para. 333; Centrale, at para. 35).

> [80] Similarly, there is no burden on a claimant to prove that the distinction is arbitrary to prove a prima facie breach of s. 15(1). It is for the government to demonstrate that the law is not arbitrary in its justificatory submissions under s. 1 (see Eberts and Stanton, at p. 117; Jonnette Watson Hamilton and Jennifer Koshan, "Kahkewistahaw First Nation v. Taypotat: An Arbitrary Approach to Discrimination" (2016), 76 S.C.L.R. (2d) 243, at pp. 259-60; Alicja Puchta, "Quebec v A and Taypotat: Unpacking the Supreme Court's Latest Decisions on Section 15 of the Charter" (2018), 55 Osgoode Hall L.J. 665, at p. 704).
> [81] In sum, then, the first stage of the s. 15 test is about establishing that the law imposes differential treatment based on protected grounds, either explicitly or through adverse impact. At the second stage, the Court asks whether it has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage (Alliance, at para. 25).
> [82] Where possible, the two inquiries should be kept distinct, but there is clearly potential for overlap in adverse effects cases based on "the impossibility of rigid categorizations" (Sheppard (2010), at p. 21). What matters in the end is that a court asks and answers the necessary questions relevant to the s. 15(1) inquiry, not whether it keeps the two steps of the inquiry in two impermeable silos …

> [83] Returning to the claim before us in this appeal, as previously noted, full-time RCMP members who work regular hours, who are suspended, or who go on unpaid leave can obtain full pension credit for those periods of service under the pension plan. Full-time members who temporarily reduce their hours under a job-sharing agreement, however, are classified as part-time workers under the Regulations and are unable to acquire full-time pension credit for their service.
> [84] Under the pension scheme, therefore, a full-time RCMP member's temporary reduction in working hours results in their losing out on potential pension benefits. The question is whether this arrangement has a disproportionate impact on women …
> [97] In my respectful view, the use of an RCMP member's temporary reduction in working hours as a basis to impose less favourable pension consequences plainly has a disproportionate impact on women. The relevant evidence — the results of the system — showed that:
> - RCMP members who worked reduced hours in the job-sharing program were predominantly women with young children.
> - From 2010-2014, 100 percent of members working reduced hours through job-sharing were women, and most of them cited childcare as their reason for doing so.
> [98] These statistics were bolstered by compelling evidence about the disadvantages women face as a group in balancing professional and domestic work. Evidence submitted by Ms. Fraser indicated that women have historically borne the overwhelming share of childcare responsibilities, that part-time workers in Canada are disproportionately women, and that they are far more likely than men to work part-time due to child care responsibilities. As a result, they experience less stable employment and periods of "scaling back at work", including within police services.
> [99] This evidence finds firm support in commission reports, judicial decisions and academic work …
> [106] All of these sources — and more — show the clear association between gender and fewer or less stable working hours. They provide powerful support for Ms. Fraser's core argument: that the RCMP's use of a temporary reduction in working hours as a basis for imposing less favourable pension consequences has an adverse impact on women. The first part of the s. 15(1) test has therefore been met.
> [107] This leads me to the second part of the s. 15(1) inquiry: whether this adverse impact reinforces, exacerbates or perpetuates disadvantage.
> [108] There is no doubt that it does. I agree with Ms. Fraser that the negative pension consequences of job-sharing perpetuate a long-standing source of disadvantage to women: gender biases within pension plans, which have historically been designed "for middle and upper-income full-time employees with long service, typically male" (Report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Pensions in Ontario (1980), at p. 116) …
> [113] Pension design choices have, in sum, "far-reaching normative, political and tangible economic implications for women" (Shilton (2013), at p. 140, quoting Bernd Marin, "Gender Equality, Neutrality, Specificity and Sensitivity — and the Ambivalence of Benevolent Welfare Paternalism", in Bernd Marin and Eszter Zólyomi, eds., Women's Work and Pensions: What is Good, What is Best? Designing Gender-Sensitive Arrangements (2010), 203, at p. 210). Because the RCMP's design perpetuates a long-standing source of economic disadvantage for women, the second stage of the s. 15(1) test is satisfied and there is a prima facie breach of s. 15 based on the enumerated ground of sex.

The majority opinion went on to find the RCMP's section 15 breach unjustified under section 1. It did so at the first step of the justificatory analysis, concluding that "[t]he Attorney General … has identified no pressing and substantial policy concern, purpose or principle that explains why job-sharers should not be granted full-time pension credit for their service" (at para 126). Indeed, the majority described the RCMP's scheme as "entirely detached from the purposes of both the job-sharing scheme and the buy-back provisions, which were intended to ameliorate the position of RCMP members who take leave to care for their children" (ibid). The majority further noted that "[t]he distinction becomes even more difficult to understand when considering that buy-back rights are available to members who have been suspended" (ibid), but not members who job share. As noted above, the top-up contributions were paid entirely by the employees and not their employer. Despite this, the dissent by Brown and Rowe JJ. characterized the majority's opinion as providing a "freestanding positive obligation" on the state to "remedy" and even "eradicate" social inequality (see paras 209-212; emphasis in original). Those dissenters went on to form the majority in Sharma, excerpted next.

3.4 R. v. Sharma, 2022 SCC 39 (CanLII)

Sharma concerned discrimination relating to race/Indigeneity. It involved "a 20-year-old Indigenous mother to an infant daughter [who] was owing two months' rent, and facing eviction" (at para 116). Ms. Sharma pled guilty to importing over a kilogram of cocaine, a task she did for her then-partner in exchange for $20,000. But she challenged the constitutionality of a Criminal Code provision prohibiting a conditional sentence for her offence, in part, on the grounds that the prohibition was discriminatory against Indigenous offenders given "[t]he overrepresentation of Indigenous people in Canada's prisons […] a present-day product of this country's colonial past" (at para 114). A narrow majority of the Court—including the three Fraser dissenters—found the prohibition non-discriminatory, while the remaining four judges (per Karakatsanis J.) found the prohibition discriminatory. Relevant excerpts from the majority opinion follow.

> … [32] Deciding the issues raised in this appeal requires us to resolve three particular uncertainties associated with the s. 15(1) framework:
> (a) whether the claimant must prove that the impugned law or state conduct caused (in the sense of created or contributed to) the disproportionate impact on the claimant;
> (b) whether the entire legislative context is relevant to the s. 15(1) inquiry; and

(c) whether s. 15(1) imposes a positive obligation on the legislature to enact remedial legislation, and relatedly, whether the legislature can incrementally address disadvantage.

[33] On a careful reading, this Court's jurisprudence answers these questions. In so saying, we do not alter the two-step test for s. 15(1). Rather, we seek to bring clarity and predictability to its application, with a view to assisting parties to Charter challenges, judges adjudicating them, and legislators seeking to further s. 15's equality guarantee …

(1) Guidance on the Section 15(1) Framework

(b) Step One: Proving the Law, on its Face or in its Impact, Creates or Contributes to a Distinction on the Basis of a Protected Ground

[39] Two questions arise. First, what is the standard by which courts should measure impact? And secondly, how may claimants prove impact?

[40] We start with the difference between impact and disproportionate impact. All laws are expected to impact individuals; merely showing that a law impacts a protected group is therefore insufficient. At step one of the s. 15(1) test, claimants must demonstrate a disproportionate impact on a protected group, as compared to non-group members. Said differently, leaving a gap between a protected group and non-group members unaffected does not infringe s. 15(1).

[41] The disproportionate impact requirement necessarily introduces comparison into the first step. As McIntyre J. explained in Andrews: "[Equality] is a comparative concept, the condition of which may only be attained or discerned by comparison with the condition of others in the social and political setting in which the question arises" (p. 164; see also Fraser, at para. 55). This Court no longer requires a "mirror comparator group" (Withler, at paras. 55-64; Fraser, at para. 94). However, Withler confirms that comparison plays a role at both steps of the s. 15(1) analysis. At the first step, the word "distinction" itself implies that the claimant is treated differently than others, whether directly or indirectly (Withler, at para. 62, cited in Fraser, at para. 48).

[42] As we have explained, in adverse impact cases, the law appears facially neutral. At step one, the claimant must present sufficient evidence to prove the impugned law, in its impact, creates or contributes to a disproportionate impact on the basis of a protected ground (Fraser, at para. 60, citing Taypotat, at para. 34; Alliance, at para. 26; Symes v. Canada, 1993 CanLII 55 (SCC), [1993] 4 SCR 695, at pp. 764-65). Causation is thus a central issue …

[49] In confirming the claimant's causation burden at step one, we are mindful of the evidentiary hurdles and the asymmetry of knowledge (relative to the state) that many claimants face. In Fraser, Abella J. referred to two types of evidence that are helpful in proving that a law has a disproportionate impact: evidence about the "full context of the claimant group's situation" (Withler, at para. 43, cited in Fraser, at para. 57) and evidence about "the outcomes that the impugned law or policy . . . has produced in practice" (Fraser, at para. 58.) Ideally, claims of adverse impact discrimination should be supported by both (para. 60). To give proper effect to the promise of s. 15(1), however, a claimant's evidentiary burden cannot be unduly difficult to meet. In that regard, courts should bear in mind the following considerations:

(a) No specific form of evidence is required.

(b) The claimant need not show the impugned law or state action was the only or the dominant cause of the disproportionate impact — they need only demonstrate that the law was a cause (that is, the law created or contributed to the disproportionate impact on a protected group).

(c) The causal connection may be satisfied by a reasonable inference. Depending on the impugned law or state action at issue, causation may be obvious and require no evidence. Where evidence is required, courts should remain mindful that statistics may not be available. Expert testimony, case studies, or other qualitative evidence may be sufficient. In all circumstances, courts should examine evidence that purports to demonstrate a causal connection to ensure that it conforms with standards associated to its discipline.

(d) Courts should carefully scrutinize scientific evidence (see National Judicial Institute, Science Manual for Canadian Judges (2018); see also National Research Council and Federal Judicial Center, Reference Manual on Scientific Evidence (3rd ed. 2011)).

(e) If the scientific evidence is novel, courts should admit it only if it has a "reliable foundation" (R. v. J.-L.J., 2000 SCC 51, [2000] 2 SCR 600, at para. 33; see also R. v. Trochym, 2007 SCC 6, [2007] 1 SCR 239, at para. 36).

[50] In summary, the first step asks whether the impugned provisions create or contribute to a disproportionate impact on the claimant group based on a protected ground as compared to other groups. If a claimant establishes that the law or state action creates or contributes to a disproportionate impact, the court should proceed to the second step. But to be clear, while the evidentiary burden at the first step should not be undue, it must be fulfilled. The particular evidentiary burden on claimants will depend on the claim. What remains consistent is that there is a burden on claimants at step one.

(c) Step Two: Proving the Law Imposes Burdens or Denies Benefits in a Manner That Has the Effect of Reinforcing, Perpetuating, or Exacerbating Their Disadvantage

(i) Evidentiary Burden

[51] It has never been the view of this Court that every distinction is discriminatory (Andrews, at p. 182). Hence the importance of the second step of the s. 15(1) test, requiring the claimant to establish that the impugned law imposes burdens or denies benefits in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating the group's disadvantage. The question becomes, what does it mean to reinforce, perpetuate, or exacerbate disadvantage?

[52] Courts must examine the historical or systemic disadvantage of the claimant group. Leaving the situation of a claimant group unaffected is insufficient to meet the step two requirements …

[53] This Court has outlined several factors that may assist a judge in determining whether claimants have met their burden at step two: arbitrariness, prejudice, and stereotyping. These factors are not necessary components; while "[t]hey may assist in showing that a law has negative effects on a particular group, . . . they 'are neither separate elements of the Andrews test, nor categories into which a claim of discrimination must fit'" (Fraser, at para. 78, citing Quebec (Attorney General) v. A, 2013 SCC 5, [2013] 1 SCR 61, at para. 329). Nonetheless, courts may usefully consider whether these factors are present:

(a) Stereotyping or prejudice: These factors played a critical role at step two in Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38. There, the Court held that the impugned law had a discriminatory impact because it furthered stereotypes and "prejudicial notions" about persons with disabilities (para. 62), reinforced "the stigmatizing idea that those with mental illness are inherently and permanently dangerous" and, in so doing, perpetuated the disadvantage they experienced (para. 65).

(b) Arbitrariness: A distinction that does not withhold access to benefits or impose burdens, or that is based on an individual's actual capacities, will rarely be discriminatory (Andrews, at pp. 174-75). Abella J. described the role that arbitrariness can play in the analysis in both Quebec v. A (at paras. 221 and 331) and Taypotat (at paras. 16, 18, 20, 28 and 34). Taypotat focused on "arbitrary — or discriminatory — disadvantage, that is, whether the impugned law fails to respond to the actual capacities and needs of the members of the group and instead imposes burdens or denies a benefit in a manner that has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating or exacerbating their disadvantage" (para. 20 (emphasis added)).

[55] … [I]t is helpful to underline three points regarding the evidentiary burden at step two:

(a) The claimant need not prove that the legislature intended to discriminate (Fraser, at para. 69; Ontario v. G, at para. 46, citing Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 1997 CanLII 327 (SCC), [1997] 3 SCR 624, at para. 62; Andrews, at p. 173).

(b) Judicial notice can play a role at step two. As this Court recognized in Law, "a court may take judicial notice of notorious and undisputed facts, or of facts which are capable of immediate and accurate demonstration, by resorting to readily accessible sources of indisputable accuracy" (para. 77, citing J. Sopinka, S. N. Lederman and A. W. Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada (1992), at p. 976). Of note here, the Court has taken judicial notice of the history of colonialism and how it translates into higher levels of incarceration for Indigenous peoples (R. v. Ipeelee, 2012 SCC 13, [2012] 1 SCR 433, at para. 60).

(c) Courts may infer that a law has the effect of reinforcing, perpetuating, or exacerbating disadvantage, where such an inference is supported by the available evidence (Law, at para. 75). One must bear in mind, however, that inference is not mere assertion; nor is it a priori reasoning.

(ii) Legislative Context

[56] To determine whether a distinction is discriminatory under the second step, courts should also consider the broader legislative context.

[57] Such an approach is well-supported in our jurisprudence. In Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493, this Court held "[t]he comprehensive nature of the Act must be taken into account in considering the effect of excluding one ground from its protection" (para. 96). … Where the impugned provision is part of a larger legislative scheme (as is often so), the Court explained, that broader scheme must be accounted for (para. 3), and the "ameliorative effect of the law on others and the multiplicity of interests it attempts to balance will also colour the discrimination analysis" (para. 38 (emphasis added)) …

[58] Most recently, in C.P., the constitutionality of s. 37(10) of the Youth Criminal Justice Act, S.C. 2002, c. 1 ("YCJA") was at issue. The impugned provision did not provide young persons an automatic right of appeal to this Court where an appellate judge below dissents on a question of law, as the Criminal Code provides to adult offenders. Chief Justice Wagner, writing for four members of this Court, explicitly and carefully considered the entire legislative scheme, observing that the YCJA is designed to balance multiple goals — not only enhanced procedural protections, but also timely intervention and prompt resolution (para. 146). He further explained that an "approach requiring line-by-line parity with the Criminal Code without reference to the distinct nature of the underlying scheme of the YCJA would indeed be contrary to the contextual approach" (para. 145). In choosing not to provide young persons with an automatic right to appeal, he concluded "Parliament did not discriminate against them, but responded to the reality of their lives" (para. 162). Therefore, step two was not satisfied …

[59] Relevant considerations include: the objects of the scheme, whether a policy is designed to benefit a number of different groups, the allocation of resources, particular policy goals sought to be achieved, and whether the lines are drawn mindful as to those factors (Withler, at para. 67; see also paras. 3, 38, 40 and 81).

[60] A contextual approach is particularly significant when analyzing the constitutionality of sentencing regimes. Here, the impugned provisions cannot properly be considered in a manner that is divorced from the broader context of sentencing law as provided for in Part XXIII of the Criminal Code. Part XXIII reflects a balance or interaction among the statutory principles set out in s. 718 of the Criminal Code, including rehabilitation, denunciation and deterrence, reparations to victims, separation from society, and the principle of restraint in s. 718.2(e). Also relevant to the legislative context is the internal limit contained in s. 718.2(e). The provision instructs courts to consider for all offenders "all available sanctions, other than imprisonment, that are reasonable in the circumstances and consistent with the harm done to victims or to the community . . ., with particular attention to the circumstances of Aboriginal offenders" (see Proulx, at paras. 94-101).

[61] Parliament has the exclusive authority to legislate in matters of sentencing policy. There is no constitutional right to any particular sentence, including a conditional sentence … Parliament had no positive obligation to create the conditional sentence regime. This Court stated in Proulx that Parliament could "have easily excluded specific offences" from the conditional sentencing regime when it came into force in 1996 (para. 79). It chose to do so later, and may choose to do so in the future. That is inherent in the role of Parliament, informed by experience and by the wishes of the electorate. As we explain in greater detail below, Parliament is not bound by its past policy choices, and sentencing legislation must be assessed on its own to determine whether it is constitutionally compliant, without having regard to the prior legislative scheme (Alliance, at para. 33). In the context of equality claims regarding criminal sentencing policy, an area of law that involves multi-faceted and complex policy considerations, the s. 15(1) analysis must be conducted with sensitivity and due regard to the present legislative scheme.

(iii) The Scope of the State's Obligations to Remedy Social Inequalities

[62] Given the questions raised in this appeal, it is important to confirm two principles related to the government's obligations under s. 15(1).

[63] First, s. 15(1) does not impose a general, positive obligation on the state to remedy social inequalities or enact remedial legislation (Thibaudeau v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 99 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 627, at para. 37; Eldridge, at para. 73; Auton (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 78, [2004] 3 SCR 657, at para. 41; Alliance, at para. 42). Were it otherwise, courts would be impermissibly pulled into the complex legislative domain of policy and resource allocation, contrary to the separation of powers. In Alliance, this Court struck down amendments to Quebec's pay equity legislation that "interfere[d] with access to anti-discrimination law" by undermining existing legislative pay equity protections (para. 39). But in so doing, Abella J. expressly declined to impose a "freestanding positive obligation on the state to enact benefit schemes to redress social inequalities" (para. 42).

[64] Secondly, this Court in Alliance confirmed that, when the state does legislate to address inequality, it can do so incrementally …

[65] Incrementalism is deeply grounded in Charter jurisprudence. In R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713, the Court accepted that the state may implement reforms "one step at a time, addressing itself to the phase of the problem which seems most acute to the legislative mind" (p. 772 (emphasis added)). Expanding on the passage in Edwards Books, La Forest J. confirmed in McKinney v. University of Guelph, 1990 CanLII 60 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 229, that a legislature "must be given reasonable leeway to deal with problems one step at a time, to balance possible inequalities under the law against other inequalities resulting from the adoption of a course of action, and to take account of the difficulties, whether social, economic or budgetary, that would arise if it attempted to deal with social and economic problems in their entirety" (p. 317). He also emphasized that, generally, courts "should not lightly use the Charter to second-guess legislative judgment as to just how quickly it should proceed in moving forward towards the ideal of equality" (p. 318). See also Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 679; Gosselin v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 84, [2002] 4 SCR 429; and Auton, at paras. 61-62.

(2) Application to the Impugned Provisions

[66] For the reasons that follow, we are of the view that Ms. Sharma's claim fails at the first step of the s. 15(1) analysis. The impugned provisions do not create or contribute to a disproportionate impact on Ms. Sharma as an Indigenous offender.

[67] The sentencing judge rejected Ms. Sharma's s. 15(1) claim, concluding that there was "difficulty on this record" identifying an impact that he would classify as a distinction (para. 257). He held that Ms. Sharma adduced "no statistical information" demonstrating that the legislation caused a distinction (ibid.).

[68] The Court of Appeal disagreed with the sentencing judge's conclusion on the first step, relying on the observation that "Aboriginal offenders start from a place of substantive inequality in the criminal justice system" (para. 70). Since the impugned provisions removed a remedial provision designed to address overincarceration of Indigenous offenders, the effect was to "exacerbate the discriminatory effect" (para. 83).

[69] The Court of Appeal collapsed the two-step s. 15(1) framework into a single step. In doing so, it erred in two ways. First, it failed to clearly delineate Ms. Sharma's evidentiary burden at each step of analysis, using broad evidence of historic disadvantage to satisfy the causation burden at both steps:

> The distinction that is created by the impact of the impugned provisions relates to the overincarceration of Aboriginal offenders, not their overrepresentation in the criminal justice system. By removing the ability to impose a conditional sentence instead of a prison sentence for an offence, the effect on an Aboriginal offender is to undermine the purpose and remedial effect of s. 718.2*(e)* in addressing the substantive inequality between Aboriginal and non-Aboriginal people manifested in overincarceration within the criminal justice system, which has been acknowledged by Parliament and the courts as requiring redress. [Emphasis added; para. 79.]

[70] Secondly, when analyzing Ms. Sharma's evidence at the first step, the court erred by using the second-step s. 15(1) requirements:

> Where a law establishes a new benefit, but does so in a discriminatory manner, that law will "create" a distinction. But where, as here, a law removes a remedial provision that was put in place to alleviate the discriminatory effect of other laws, then the removal of that remedial provision may not create a new distinction, but it will reinforce, perpetuate, or exacerbate the discriminatory effect that was intended to be alleviated by the remedial provision. [Emphasis added; para. 83.]

[71] To recall, the focus at the first step is on a disproportionate impact, not historic or systemic disadvantage. The Court of Appeal addressed the wrong question at step one, focusing on the link between colonial policies and overincarceration of Indigenous peoples. While the situation of the claimant group is relevant at step one (see Fraser, at paras. 56-57), it is not sufficient on its own to establish disproportionate impact. Nor is it enough to show that the law restricts an ameliorative program.

[72] To explain this point, we must directly address Ms. Sharma's argument before this Court. Ms. Sharma submits that "conditional sentences are inextricably connected with s. 718.2(e), which does draw a race-based distinction, by expressly identifying Indigenous offenders as requiring particular consideration in the sentencing process. Any modification to the Gladue framework necessarily impacts Indigenous offenders differently than non-Indigenous offenders" (R.F., at para. 63 (emphasis in original)). She further submits that "[w]hile the Impugned Provisions apply to both Indigenous and non-Indigenous offenders, the undermining of the Gladue framework affects only Indigenous offenders" (para. 63). Our colleague adopts this argument, saying the distinction flows "from the combined effect of ss. 718.2(e) and 742.1" (para. 211).

[73] We accept that there is a link between the Gladue framework relating to s. 718.2(e) and the conditional sentence regime. Both were adopted as part of the same legislation aimed at reducing the use of prison as a sanction and expanding the use of restorative justice principles in sentencing (Gladue, at para. 48; Proulx, at paras. 15 and 18-21; Wells, at para. 6). However, Ms. Sharma's burden at step one was to demonstrate that the specific provisions she challenged created or contributed to a disproportionate impact on Indigenous offenders. While she did not have to prove that the impugned provisions removed access to a conditional sentence because she was Indigenous or that the impugned provisions were the only or the dominant cause of the disproportionate impact, she did have to demonstrate a causal connection.

[74] The sentencing judge did not accept that the impugned provisions disproportionately impact Indigenous offenders, for good reason. Dr. Murdocca testified that it was "unknown if recent statutory amendments that have restricted the use of conditional sentences may affect Aboriginal offenders disproportionately compared to non-Aboriginal offenders" (A.R., vol. II, at pp. 86-90 (emphasis added)). In light of all the evidence, the sentencing judge determined Ms. Sharma failed to satisfy step one. While the Court of Appeal overturned the sentencing judge's conclusion, it failed to identify any evidence supporting Ms. Sharma's argument that the impugned provisions created or contributed to a disproportionate impact on Indigenous offenders (see paras. 68-89). In saying this, we recognize that the Court of Appeal relied on fresh evidence, adduced by interveners, and expert evidence from Dr. Murdocca. It examined this evidence, however, at step two of its analysis (see paras. 90-105) …

[76] In short, the Court of Appeal erred by removing Ms. Sharma's evidentiary burden at step one. This is inconsistent with the sentencing judge's finding that Ms. Sharma failed to establish a distinction on the basis of a protected ground (para. 257). The Court of Appeal improperly substituted its own view of the matter. In this case, while Ms. Sharma was not required to adduce a specific type of evidence, she had to demonstrate that the impugned provisions created or contributed to a disproportionate impact. Ms. Sharma, for example, could have presented expert evidence or statistical data showing Indigenous imprisonment disproportionately increased for the specific offences targeted by the impugned provisions, relative to non-Indigenous offenders, after the SSCA came into force. Such evidence might establish that the removal of conditional sentences created or contributed to a disproportionate impact on Indigenous offenders.

[77] By overturning the sentence, the Court of Appeal not only departed from its proper role but misapplied the jurisprudence of this Court. In light of the sentencing judge's findings, Ms. Sharma's argument before this Court — that the impugned provisions "necessarily impac[t] Indigenous offenders differently" — cannot be accepted.

[78] Ms. Sharma argued that removing the availability of conditional sentences undermined a trial judge's ability to give effect to s. 718.2(e). She alleges that the removal of one "accommodation", the availability of conditional sentences for certain offences, disproportionately impacts Indigenous offenders. We do not accept this argument. It is clear that s. 718.2(e) is still meaningfully operable, as it was given effect in this case. As long as judges retain broad discretion to impose a range of available sentences, we query whether altering a single sentencing provision could undermine s. 718.2(e) in the manner Ms. Sharma suggests.

[79] It is undisputed that the sentencing judge must take account of the particular circumstances of Indigenous offenders, as that is what Parliament has directed in s. 718.2(e). How this is to be done may take various forms and the Criminal Code provides judges broad discretion to craft a proportionate sentence, given the offender's degree of responsibility, the gravity of the offence and the specific circumstance of each case (R. v. Lacasse, 2015 SCC 64, [2015] 3 SCR 1089, at para. 58). For instance, sentencing judges may consider other non-carceral options such as suspended sentences and probation. They may also reduce sentences below the typical range.

[80] It is true that suspended sentences are "primarily a rehabilitative sentencing tool", whereas conditional sentences "address both punitive and rehabilitative objectives" (Proulx, at para. 23). Suspended sentences are not irrelevant to applying s. 718.2(e). Proulx does not prohibit judges from using suspended sentences "to endeavour to achieve a truly fit and proper sentence in the particular case" (Gladue, at para. 33). Where conditional sentences are unavailable, judges may give effect to s. 718.2(e) by considering suspended sentences with openness and flexibility.

[81] In any event, and as we say, it is clear that s. 718.2(e) was given effect in the circumstances of this case. The judge sentenced Ms. Sharma to 18 months' incarceration, taking into account her experience as an Indigenous person under the Gladue framework, which was well below the established range for similar offences (sentencing reasons, at para. 80). As a reminder, s. 718.2(e) does not guarantee that Indigenous offenders will not receive carceral sentences …

[83] Given the above, there is no need to consider step two. Section 15(1) is not infringed.

3.5 Notes and Questions

1. The Sharma majority explained: "we do not alter the two-step test for s. 15(1). Rather, we seek to bring clarity and predictability to its application" (at para 33). Having now read Eldridge, Vriend, and Fraser, is this claim by the Sharma majority credible, or are there any tensions between Sharma and that prior section 15 jurisprudence? As a thought experiment, consider both the content and tone of the Sharma majority, and reflect on whether, unbridled by precedent, it would have decided in favour of the plaintiffs in Eldridge, Vriend, or Fraser.
2. Professor Jonnette Watson Hamilton observes that Fraser "is only the third adverse effects claim under s. 15(1) … to succeed since section 15 came into force in 1985", with the "other two cases" being Eldridge and Vriend ("Cautious Optimism: Fraser v Canada (Attorney General)", 2021 CanLIIDocs 1012). Why have adverse effects claims been so infrequently successful? And given the importance of those claims emphasized in Fraser, is there a gap between legal principle and practice relating to substantive inequality?
3. Professor Joshua Sealy-Harrington criticizes Canada's "Charter of Whites" for failing to engage with racial inequality:

   > I will be blunt: were "race" not listed as a protected ground under the Charter, it is not apparent to me that there would have been much difference in the Supreme Court's first four decades of equality jurisprudence – at least, not for Indigenous and Black people, who are the focus of my analysis here. The protected grounds enumerated in the Charter are "race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability." Yet the Supreme Court has barely considered racial discrimination claims. Race is, thus, first listed yet last enforced – a constitutional token to a promise of racial equality left not only with little success but with little attempt (Joshua Sealy-Harrington, "The Charter of Whites: Systemic Racism and Critical Race Equality in Canada" (2023) 39 Windsor Y B Access Just 544 ↗)

   What explains this constitutional silence? If there is systemic racism in Canada (for example, in criminal punishment, border regulation, or labour markets), why is it so scarcely considered by Canadian courts?
4. Pre-Fraser, Professors Jonnette Watson Hamilton and Jennifer Koshan argued that "the Court's approach to section 15(1) of the Charter, while accepting adverse effects discrimination in principle, has used direct discrimination as the paradigmatic case, and as a result, the Court's approach has had an adverse impact on adverse effects discrimination claims" (Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Koshan, "Adverse Impact: The Supreme Court's Approach to Adverse Effects Discrimination under Section 15 of the Charter" (2015) 19:2 Rev Const Stud 191). Post-Fraser (and Sharma) how would you say that the Court conceptualizes the "paradigmatic case" of discrimination? Did Fraser shift that paradigmatic case? And did Sharma reverse that shift?
5. The Fraser dissent by Brown and Rowe JJ. concluded that the "practical effect" of the majority imposed "a positive obligation" on the state to "eradicate" social inequality (at para 212; emphasis in original). In stark contrast, the majority explained that the RCMP's pension scheme was discriminatory "not because women continue to have disproportionate responsibility for childcare and less stable working hours than men, but because the pension plan 'institutionalize[s] those traits as a basis on which to unequally distribute' pension benefits to job-sharing participants." Which characterization of the majority opinion is more persuasive? And insofar as social inequality necessarily entangles with law and policy, is it possible to interpret substantive inequality without reference to social inequality?
6. The idea of "choice" has loomed large in equality jurisprudence, both under human rights codes (see e.g., Stewart v. Elk Valley Coal Corp., 2017 SCC 30 (CanLII), [2017] 1 SCR 591 at paras 32-35, 50, and 97-102) and under section 15 the Charter.

   For example, in Fraser the lower courts relied heavily on choice: the Federal Court found no discrimination because women make a "difficult" choice to job share (at para 137) and the Federal Court of Appeal found no discrimination because women "elected to job-share" (at para 53). These judgments focused on the differential access to pension benefits as between job-sharers and those on leave without pay, and thus as a matter of choice of job status rather than gendered adverse impact for part-time workers. Even the dissenting opinions at the Supreme Court, while equivocal on the relevance of choice, still seemed to reason that choice should, in cases like this, limit the scope of substantive equality (at paras 197 and 249-250). In stark contrast, the majority opinion expressly rejected this over-emphasis on choice when analyzing discrimination:

   > [86] In relying on Ms. Fraser's "choice" to job-share as grounds for dismissing her claim, the Federal Court and Court of Appeal, with respect, misapprehended our s. 15(1) jurisprudence. This Court has consistently held that differential treatment can be discriminatory even if it is based on choices made by the affected individual or group.
   > [87] In Brooks, for example, Dickson C.J. rejected an employer's argument that providing unequal benefits to pregnant women is not sex discrimination because pregnancy is "voluntary" (pp. 1237-38) …
   > [91] The case before us highlights the flaws of over-emphasizing choice in the s. 15 inquiry. For many women, the decision to work on a part-time basis, far from being an unencumbered choice, "often lies beyond the individual's effective control" (Miron, at para. 153; Quebec v. A, at para. 316; see also Watson Hamilton and Koshan (2015), at p. 202). Deciding to work part-time, for many women, is a "choice" between either staying above or below the poverty line …
   > [92] By invoking the "choice" to job-share as a basis for rejecting the s. 15(1) claim, the Federal Court and Court of Appeal removed the "challenged inequality from scrutiny, effectively taking it off the radar screen so as to circumvent examination of the equality issues at stake" (Majury, at p. 219). It is an approach that this Court's s. 15 jurisprudence eschews.

   This tension over "choice" has a long history in section 15 jurisprudence in both adverse effects and direct discrimination cases. Consider Gosselin v. Québec (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 84 (CanLII), [2002] 4 SCR 429, which concerned a Quebec welfare scheme that provided residents under age 30 with financial support that was "far below not just the government's poverty line, but its basic survival amount" unless they participated in certain employment training programs (at para 252; per Bastarache J., dissenting but not on this point).

   The Court divided 5-4 on whether the welfare scheme was discriminatory, with a clear divergence on how—or whether—choice should inform equality analysis.

McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, held the scheme was not discriminatory. She implicitly criticized the choices of the claimant, who "received social assistance" during "most of her adult life" (at para 1) and "ended up dropping out of virtually every [job-training] program she started, apparently because of her own personal problems and personality traits" (at para 8). In the Chief Justice's words, "[w]hatever sympathy Ms. Gosselin's economic circumstances might provoke" (at para 19), the 'benevolent paternalism' of Quebec's welfare scheme was not discriminatory:

> 42 The government's longer-term purpose was to provide young welfare recipients with precisely the kind of remedial education and skills training they lacked and needed in order eventually to integrate into the workforce and become self-sufficient. This policy reflects the practical wisdom of the old Chinese proverb: "Give a man a fish and you feed him for a day. Teach him how to fish and you feed him for a lifetime." This was not a denial of young people's dignity; it was an affirmation of their potential.

Indeed, the Chief Justice characterized the scheme's coercion of young welfare recipients not simply as non-discriminatory, but anti-discriminatory:

> 65 … [T]he regime set up under the Social Aid Act sought to promote the self-sufficiency and autonomy of young welfare recipients through their integration into the productive workforce, and to combat the pernicious side effects of unemployment and welfare dependency. The participation incentive worked towards the realization of goals that go to the heart of the equality guarantee: self-determination, personal autonomy, self-respect, feelings of self-worth, and empowerment. These are the stuff and substance of essential human dignity: see Law, supra, at para. 53. I respectfully disagree with the suggestion that the incentive provisions somehow indicated disdain for young people or a belief that they could be made productive only through coercion. On the contrary, the program's structure reflected faith in the usefulness of education and the importance of encouraging young people to develop their skills and employability, rather than being consigned to dependence and unemployment. In my view, the interest promoted by the differential treatment at issue in this case is intimately and inextricably linked to the essential human dignity that animates the equality guarantee set out at s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter.

In significant contrast, four separate dissenting opinions found the welfare scheme discriminatory based on a different understanding and analysis of choice.

For example, L'Heureux-Dubé J. emphasized the impacts of Quebec's welfare scheme and noted how its practical limitations left the vast majority of young recipients "unable" to qualify for adequate support:

> 130 As a result of s. 29(a), adults under 30 were uniquely exposed by the legislative scheme to the threat of living beneath what the government itself considered to be a subsistence level of income. Of those eligible to participate in the programs, 88.8 percent were unable to increase their benefits to the level payable to those 30 and over. Ms. Gosselin was exposed to the risk of severe poverty as a sole consequence of being under 30 years of age. Ms. Gosselin's psychological and physical integrity were breached. There is little question that living with the constant threat of poverty is psychologically harmful. There is no dispute that Ms. Gosselin lived at times below the government's own standard of bare subsistence. In 1987, the monthly cost of proper nourishment was $152. The guaranteed monthly payment to young adults was $170. I cannot imagine how it can be maintained that Ms. Gosselin's physical integrity was not breached.
> 131 The sole remaining question is whether a reasonable person in Ms. Gosselin's position, apprised of all the circumstances, would perceive that her dignity had been threatened. The reasonable claimant would have been informed of the legislature's intention to help young people enter the marketplace. She would have been informed that those 30 and over have more difficulty changing careers, and that those under 30 run serious social and personal risks if they do not enter the job market in a timely manner. She would have been told that the long-term goal of the legislative scheme was to affirm her dignity.
> 132 The reasonable claimant would also likely have been a member of the 88.8 percent who were eligible for the programs and whose income did not rise to the levels available to all adults 30 years of age and over. Even if she wished to participate in training programs, she would have found that there were intervals between the completion of one program and the starting of another, during which the amount of her social assistance benefit would have plunged. The reasonable claimant would have made daily life choices in the face of an imminent and severe threat of poverty … The reasonable claimant would have perceived that as a result of her deep poverty, she had been excluded from full participation in Canadian society. She would have perceived that her right to dignity was infringed as a sole consequence of being under 30 years of age, a factor over which, at any given moment, she had no control. While individuals may be able to strive to overcome the detriment imposed by merit-based distinctions, Ms. Gosselin was powerless to alter the single personal characteristic that the government's scheme made determinative for her level of benefits.

Relatedly, LeBel J. reasoned, in effect, that the Chief Justice's analysis of choice relied on the very stereotypes that section 15 was intended to challenge:

> 405 In this case, the distinction based on age … does not reflect either the needs or the abilities of social aid recipients under 30 years of age. The ordinary needs of young people are not so different from the needs of their elders as to justify such a pronounced discrepancy between the two groups' benefits. As well, young people are no more able to find or keep a job during an economic slowdown than are their elders. In fact, young people are the first to feel the impact of an economic crisis on the labour market. Because they have little experience or seniority, they are at the top of the list for termination and lay-off … Also, because the distinction made by the social aid scheme was justified by the fact that young people are able to survive a period of economic crisis better, I, like Bastarache J., am of the opinion that this distinction perpetuated a stereotypical view of young people's situation on the labour market …
> 407 I am prepared to concede that the Quebec government knew that young people are particularly vulnerable during an economic slowdown. As well, I readily acknowledge that the government sincerely believed that it was helping young people by making the payment of full benefits conditional on participation in an employability program. Nonetheless, the distinction made by the social aid scheme did not reflect the needs of young social assistance recipients under the age of 30. By trying to combat the pull of social assistance, for the "good" of the young people themselves who depended on it, the distinction perpetuated the stereotypical view that a majority of young social assistance recipients choose to freeload off society permanently and have no desire to get out of that comfortable situation. There is no basis for that vision of young social assistance recipients as "parasites". It has been disproved by numerous experts.

Which analysis of "choice" do you find more persuasive? In Fraser, should a woman's choice to job share factor into whether her lower pension is understood as discriminatory? And in Gosselin, should a youth's choice to attend employment training factor into whether denying them adequate welfare is understood as discriminatory? Notice that, in both Fraser (gender) and Gosselin (age), the claim fundamentally concerns the intersection of protected grounds with economic marginalization. Might this nexus with economic inequality contribute to certain judges' appetite for choice-based reasoning? How does this nexus impact your understanding of the relationship between choice and discrimination? More specifically, do women and youth meaningfully "choose" economic disadvantage, or does the logic of choice individualize broader systems (e.g., capitalism and patriarchy) that should be accounted for in a robust constitutional analysis?

While both Fraser and Gosselin involve "choices", one might construct these choices differently in relation to substantive equality. What about the choices in Fraser and Gosselin is similar? And what about the choices differs? Are there certain groups—or circumstances—where society might consider state coercion more legitimate? And if that legitimacy is connected to potential stereotypes about those groups, how should courts navigate constitutional scrutiny of that coercion?

More broadly, whereas discrimination historically involved more overt classificatory schemes of oppression—e.g., segregation based on race and voting based on gender (and race)—modern discrimination tends to involve systemic disparities in otherwise "neutral" schemes. Presumably with this social context in mind, Abella J. in Fraser described "[a]ddressing adverse impact discrimination" as "among the 'most powerful legal measures available to disadvantaged groups in society to assert their claims to justice.'" She continued: "Not only is such discrimination 'much more prevalent than the cruder brand of openly direct discrimination', it often poses a greater threat to the equality aspirations of disadvantaged groups" (at para 35). What modern forms of discrimination cannot be evaded—or, at least, mitigated—by "choices" made by protected groups to assimilate to dominant norms? How, then, should "choice" generally be accounted for in analysis of substantive inequality?

Choice is also implicit in the Supreme Court's approach to analogous grounds of discrimination, which we turn to next.

4 Analogous Grounds of Discrimination

4.1 Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203

As discussed above—under Part 1: "The Text"—section 15(1) guarantees equality "without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability." And as excerpted earlier—under Part 2.1: "Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia"—this constitutional text has been interpreted as contemplating enumerated and analogous grounds of discrimination from the very outset of the Court's equality jurisprudence: "The enumerated grounds in s. 15(1) are not exclusive and the limits, if any, on grounds for discrimination which may be established in future cases await definition" (at 175; Supreme Court Reports). The main "future case" considering such limits on protected grounds was Corbiere, which remains the Court's leading decision on the framework for identifying analogous grounds. It considered "whether the exclusion of off-reserve members of an Indian band from the right to vote in band elections" under the Indian Act infringed s. 15(1) of the Charter (at para 3). At the time of Corbiere, Law v Canada provided a three-step framework for section 15(1) focused on (1) distinction, (2) grounds, and (3) discrimination. In Corbiere, the Court unanimously held that "Aboriginality-residence"—i.e., "off-reserve Band member status"—was an analogous ground of discrimination. But it included two opinions: a 5-judge majority and a 4-judge concurrence that left ambiguous the nature of disagreement between them, including with respect to their analysis of analogous grounds. Given that ambiguity, key passages from both the majority and concurring opinions are included below.

> The judgment of Lamer C.J. and Cory, McLachlin, Major and Bastarache JJ. was delivered by
> //McLachlin and Bastarache JJ.//
> 1 We have read the reasons for judgment of Justice L'Heureux-Dubé. We believe that this case can be resolved on simpler grounds. We will therefore briefly outline the reasoning upon which we base our own decision.
> 2 L'Heureux-Dubé J. has set out in detail the facts in this case as well as a description of its judicial history. We adopt this factual background.
> 3 The narrow issue raised in this appeal is whether the exclusion of off-reserve members of an Indian band from the right to vote in band elections pursuant to s. 77(1) of the Indian Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. I-5, is inconsistent with s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms …
> 6 We agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J. that Aboriginality-residence (off-reserve band member status) constitutes a ground of discrimination analogous to the enumerated grounds. However, we wish to comment on two matters: (1) the suggestion by some that the same ground may or may not be analogous depending on the circumstances; and (2) the criteria that identify an analogous ground.
> 7 The enumerated grounds function as legislative markers of suspect grounds associated with stereotypical, discriminatory decision making. They are a legal expression of a general characteristic, not a contextual, fact-based conclusion about whether discrimination exists in a particular case. As such, the enumerated grounds must be distinguished from a finding that discrimination exists in a particular case. Since the enumerated grounds are only indicators of suspect grounds of distinction, it follows that decisions on these grounds are not always discriminatory; if this were otherwise, it would be unnecessary to proceed to the separate examination of discrimination …
> 8 The same applies to the grounds recognized by the courts as "analogous" to the grounds enumerated in s. 15. To say that a ground of distinction is an analogous ground is merely to identify a type of decision making that is suspect because it often leads to discrimination and denial of substantive equality. Like distinctions made on enumerated grounds, distinctions made on analogous grounds may well not be discriminatory. But this does not mean that they are not analogous grounds or that they are analogous grounds only in some circumstances. Just as we do not speak of enumerated grounds existing in one circumstance and not another, we should not speak of analogous grounds existing in one circumstance and not another. The enumerated and analogous grounds stand as constant markers of suspect decision making or potential discrimination. What varies is whether they amount to discrimination in the particular circumstances of the case.
> 9 We therefore disagree with the view that a marker of discrimination can change from case to case, depending on the government action challenged. It seems to us that it is not the ground that varies from case to case, but the determination of whether a distinction on the basis of a constitutionally cognizable ground is discriminatory. Sex will always be a ground, although sex-based legislative distinctions may not always be discriminatory. To be sure, R. v. Turpin, 1989 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1296, suggested that residence might be an analogous ground in certain contexts. But in view of the synthesis of previous cases suggested in Law, supra, it is more likely that today the same result, dismissal of the claim, would be achieved either by finding no analogous ground or no discrimination in fact going to essential human dignity.
> 10 If it is the intention of L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s reasons to affirm contextual dependency of the enumerated and analogous grounds, we must respectfully disagree. If "Aboriginality-residence" is to be an analogous ground (and we agree with L'Heureux-Dubé J. that it should), then it must always stand as a constant marker of potential legislative discrimination, whether the challenge is to a governmental tax credit, a voting right, or a pension scheme. This established, the analysis moves to the third stage: whether the distinction amounts, in purpose or effect, to discrimination on the facts of the case.
> 11 Maintaining the distinction in Law, supra, between the enumerated or analogous ground analysis and the third-stage contextual discrimination analysis, offers several advantages. Both stages are concerned with discrimination and the violation of the presumption of the equal dignity and worth of every human being. But they approach it from different perspectives. The analogous grounds serve as jurisprudential markers for suspect distinctions. They function conceptually to identify the sorts of claims that properly fall under s. 15. By screening out other cases, they avoid trivializing the s. 15 equality guarantee and promote the efficient use of judicial resources. And they permit the development over time of a conceptual jurisprudence of the sorts of distinctions that fall under the s. 15 guarantee, without foreclosing new cases of discrimination. A distinction on an enumerated or analogous ground established, the contextual and fact-specific inquiry proceeds to whether the distinction amounts to discrimination in the context of the particular case.

12 Our second concern relates to the manner in which a new analogous ground may be identified. In our view, conflation of the second and third stages of the Law framework is to be avoided. To be sure, Law is meant to provide a set of guidelines and not a formalistic straitjacket, but the second and third stages are unquestionably distinct: the former asks whether the distinction is on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground, the latter whether that distinction on the facts of the case affronts s. 15. Affirmative answers to both inquiries are a precondition to establishing a constitutional claim.

13 What then are the criteria by which we identify a ground of distinction as analogous? The obvious answer is that we look for grounds of distinction that are analogous or like the grounds enumerated in s. 15 — race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age, or mental or physical disability. It seems to us that what these grounds have in common is the fact that they often serve as the basis for stereotypical decisions made not on the basis of merit but on the basis of a personal characteristic that is immutable or changeable only at unacceptable cost to personal identity. This suggests that the thrust of identification of analogous grounds at the second stage of the Law analysis is to reveal grounds based on characteristics that we cannot change or that the government has no legitimate interest in expecting us to change to receive equal treatment under the law. To put it another way, s. 15 targets the denial of equal treatment on grounds that are actually immutable, like race, or constructively immutable, like religion. Other factors identified in the cases as associated with the enumerated and analogous grounds, like the fact that the decision adversely impacts on a discrete and insular minority or a group that has been historically discriminated against, may be seen to flow from the central concept of immutable or constructively immutable personal characteristics, which too often have served as illegitimate and demeaning proxies for merit-based decision making.

14 L'Heureux-Dubé J. ultimately concludes that "Aboriginality-residence" as it pertains to whether an Aboriginal band member lives on or off the reserve is an analogous ground. We agree. L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s discussion makes clear that the distinction goes to a personal characteristic essential to a band member's personal identity, which is no less constructively immutable than religion or citizenship. Off-reserve Aboriginal band members can change their status to on-reserve band members only at great cost, if at all.

15 Two brief comments on this new analogous ground are warranted. First, reserve status should not be confused with residence. The ordinary "residence" decisions faced by the average Canadians should not be confused with the profound decisions Aboriginal band members make to live on or off their reserves, assuming choice is possible. The reality of their situation is unique and complex. Thus no new water is charted, in the sense of finding residence, in the generalized abstract, to be an analogous ground. Second, we note that the analogous ground of off-reserve status or Aboriginality-residence is limited to a subset of the Canadian population, while s. 15 is directed to everyone. In our view, this is no impediment to its inclusion as an analogous ground under s. 15. Its demographic limitation is no different, for example, from pregnancy, which is a distinct, but fundamentally interrelated form of discrimination from gender. "Embedded" analogous grounds may be necessary to permit meaningful consideration of intra-group discrimination …

//L'Heureux-Dubé J.//

58 The differential treatment in this case is based on the status of holding membership in an Indian Act band, but living off that band's reserve. This combination of traits does not fall under one of the enumerated or already recognized analogous grounds. The fundamental consideration at the second stage, if the ground is not enumerated or already recognized as analogous, is whether recognition of the basis of differential treatment as an analogous ground would further the purposes of s. 15(1): Law, supra, at para. 93. These purposes are, as stated at para. 51 of Law:

> [T]o prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration.

59 The analysis at the analogous grounds stage involves considering whether differential treatment of those defined by that characteristic or combination of traits has the potential to violate human dignity in the sense underlying s. 15(1): Egan v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 513, at para. 171, per Cory J. In Law, the concept of human dignity as it relates to s. 15(1) was described by Iacobucci J., at para. 53, as follows:

> Human dignity means that an individual or group feels self-respect and self-worth. It is concerned with physical and psychological empowerment and integrity. Human dignity is harmed by unfair treatment premised on personal traits or circumstances which do not relate to individual needs, capacities, or merits. It is enhanced by laws which are sensitive to the needs, capacities, and merits of different individuals, taking into account the context underlying their differences. Human dignity is harmed when individuals and groups are marginalized, ignored, or devalued, and is enhanced when laws recognize the full place of all individuals and groups within Canadian society. Human dignity within the meaning of the equality guarantee does not relate to the status or position of an individual in society per se, but rather concerns the manner in which a person legitimately feels when confronted with a particular law.

The analogous grounds inquiry, like the other two stages of analysis, must be undertaken in a purposive and contextual manner: Law, supra, at para. 41. The "nature and situation of the individual or group at issue, and the social, political, and legal history of Canadian society's treatment of that group" must be considered: Law, supra, at para. 93. As stated by Wilson J. in Andrews, supra, at p. 152, cited with approval in Law at para. 29, the determination of whether a ground qualifies as analogous under s. 15(1):

> . . . is not to be made only in the context of the law which is subject to challenge but rather in the context of the place of the group in the entire social, political and legal fabric of our society. While legislatures must inevitably draw distinctions among the governed, such distinctions should not bring about or reinforce the disadvantage of certain groups and individuals by denying them the rights freely accorded to others.

60 Various contextual factors have been recognized in the case law that may demonstrate that the trait or combination of traits by which the claimants are defined has discriminatory potential. An analogous ground may be shown by the fundamental nature of the characteristic: whether from the perspective of a reasonable person in the position of the claimant, it is important to their identity, personhood, or belonging. The fact that a characteristic is immutable, difficult to change, or changeable only at unacceptable personal cost may also lead to its recognition as an analogous ground: Miron v. Trudel, 1995 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 418, at para. 148; Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493, at para. 90. It is also central to the analysis if those defined by the characteristic are lacking in political power, disadvantaged, or vulnerable to becoming disadvantaged or having their interests overlooked: Andrews, supra, at p. 152; Law, supra, at para. 29. Another indicator is whether the ground is included in federal and provincial human rights codes: Miron, supra, at para. 148. Other criteria, of course, may also be considered in subsequent cases, and none of the above indicators are necessary for the recognition of an analogous ground or combination of grounds: Miron, supra, at para. 149.

> 61 I should also note that if indicia of an analogous ground are not present in general, or among a certain group in Canadian society, they may nevertheless be present in another social or legislative context, within a different group in Canadian society, or in a given geographic area, to give only a few examples. Here, to illustrate, the nature of the decisions band members make about whether to live on or off a reserve are different from those made by many other Canadians in relation to their place of residence. So are other factors related to the analogous grounds analysis that still affect them. The second stage must therefore be flexible enough to adapt to stereotyping, prejudice, or denials of human dignity and worth that might occur in specific ways for specific groups of people, to recognize that personal characteristics may overlap or intersect (such as race, band membership, and place of residence in this case), and to reflect changing social phenomena or new or different forms of stereotyping or prejudice. As this Court unanimously held in Law, supra, at para. 73: "The possibility of new forms of discrimination denying essential human worth cannot be foreclosed".
> 62 Here, several factors lead to the conclusion that recognizing off-reserve band member status as an analogous ground would accord with the purposes of s. 15(1). From the perspective of off-reserve band members, the choice of whether to live on- or off-reserve, if it is available to them, is an important one to their identity and personhood, and is therefore fundamental. It involves choosing whether to live with other members of the band to which they belong, or apart from them. It relates to a community and land that have particular social and cultural significance to many or most band members. Also critical is the fact that as discussed below during the third stage of analysis, band members living off-reserve have generally experienced disadvantage, stereotyping, and prejudice, and form part of a "discrete and insular minority" defined by race and place of residence. In addition, because of the lack of opportunities and housing on many reserves, and the fact that the Indian Act's rules formerly removed band membership from various categories of band members, residence off the reserve has often been forced upon them, or constitutes a choice made reluctantly or at high personal cost. For these reasons, the second stage of analysis has been satisfied, and "off-reserve band member status" is an analogous ground. It will hereafter be recognized as an analogous ground in any future case involving this combination of traits. I note that in making this determination, I make no findings about "residence" as an analogous ground in contexts other than as it affects band members who do not live on the reserve of the band to which they belong …
> 125 Since writing these reasons, I have had the advantage of reading the opinion of my colleagues McLachlin and Bastarache JJ. To the extent that their reasons suggest a departure from the approach to defining analogous grounds taken in Andrews, Turpin, Egan, Miron, and Law, I must respectfully disagree with their analysis. However, this being said, in my view there is no substantive difference in our respective reasons in the approach to the case at bar.

4.2 Notes and Questions

1. The 'respectful disagreement' between the majority and concurring opinions in Corbiere is unclear. For example, the majority writes tentatively about the concurrence: "If it is the intention of L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s reasons to affirm contextual dependency of the enumerated and analogous grounds, we must respectfully disagree" (at para 10). Similarly, the concurrence writes tentatively about the majority: "To the extent that their reasons suggest a departure from the approach to defining analogous grounds taken in Andrews, Turpin, Egan, Miron, and Law, I must respectfully disagree with their analysis" (at para 125). Nevertheless, the majority and concurrence identically conclude that "Aboriginality-residence" is an analogous ground and will be recognized as such in future cases, with the majority affirming what the concurrence's "discussion makes clear" and the concurrence saying that "there is no substantive difference in [their] respective reasons in the approach to the case at bar" (at paras 14, 125). What differences do you ascertain between the majority and concurring opinions in Corbiere? And how might those differences impact the future recognition of analogous grounds under the Charter?
2. In addition to Aboriginality-residence, the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized as analogous grounds citizenship (Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, 1989 CanLII 2 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 143), marital status (Miron v. Trudel, 1995 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 418), and sexual orientation (Egan v. Canada, 1995 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 513). In contrast, it has rejected as analogous grounds occupation (Baier v. Alberta, 2007 SCC 31 (CanLII), [2007] 2 SCR 673), province of residence (R. v. Turpin, 1989 CanLII 98 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 1296), and substance orientation, i.e., the "recreational" or "lifestyle" choice of using marijuana (R. v. Malmo-Levine; R. v. Caine, 2003 SCC 74 (CanLII), [2003] 3 SCR 571). Do you agree with these recognitions and rejections? And what do they convey about the nature of analogous grounds under section 15(1) of the Charter?
3. Dickson v. Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2024 SCC 10 (CanLII) was another case challenging a residency requirement for participation in an Indigenous community's election, but it arose in a distinct context: whereas Corbiere involved elections under the Indian Act, Dickson involved elections relating to a modern treaty. A majority of the Court applied the Corbiere approach in recognizing a new analogous ground: "non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community" (at para 198). They held that this ground was more appropriate than "Aboriginality-residence" in a case involving a modern treaty. In contrast, two dissenting justices found that the analogous ground of Aboriginality-residence remained applicable, despite this distinct setting. What does Dickson suggest about the contextual nature of analogous grounds? Does this division provide further clarity—or confusion—concerning the tension in Corbiere about the "contextual dependency" of analogous grounds?

   Whether framed as "Aboriginality-residence" (Corbiere) or "non-resident status in a self-governing Indigenous community" (Dickson), only part of the story of the complex factors influencing the residence of Indigenous people is told through these grounds.

   In Corbiere, Justice L'Heureux-Dubé noted that:

   > [72] Aboriginal women, who can be said to be doubly disadvantaged on the basis of both sex and race, are among those particularly affected by legislation relating to off-reserve band members, because of their history and circumstances in Canadian and Aboriginal society.

   This history includes the Indian Act's "marrying out" provisions, under which "Indian" women and their descendants lost their status when they married men who did not have Indian status, whereas Indian men passed their status on to non-Indian women through marriage. This loss of status often resulted in Indigenous women and children leaving their communities. Even when their band membership was ultimately restored through legislative reform to the Indian Act, these women and their descendants were disproportionately represented in the category of non-residents (see Corbiere, at paras 86-89).

   Moreover, in Dickson, the residency requirement was challenged by a woman who could not live in her Nation's home community, in part, because she was the mother of a child who required medical care in a larger urban centre.

   Could Corbiere and Dickson have been framed, instead, as adverse effect claims challenging the residency requirements based on the intersection of sex with Indigeneity? How would such a shift in framing impact the analysis of discrimination, or potential remedies? And what challenges might such a framing present?
4. Professor Joshua Sealy-Harrington notes that "immutability" is a vexing paradigm for conceptualizing protected grounds under the Charter:

> [H]ow would the Court characterize the actual immutability of generally stable, yet changeable, enumerated grounds such as sex and colour? How would the Court characterize the immutability of enumerated grounds that change over time but often due to factors beyond our control, such as age and temporary disability? With respect to potential analogous grounds, how would the Court characterize the actual immutability of characteristics that are difficult, but not impossible, to change, such as weight and poverty? To date, an adequate answer to these questions remains elusive, and they must be discussed further to develop a robust and predictable approach to analogous grounds (Joshua Sealy-Harrington, "Assessing Analogous Grounds: The Doctrinal and Normative Superiority of a Multi-Variable Approach" (2013) 10 JL & Equal 37 at 49).

Is "immutability"—or even "constructive immutability"—a coherent paradigm for conceptualizing protected grounds under the Charter? What does it helpfully capture? And what might it unhelpfully obscure? To assist in reflecting on whether "immutability" comprehensively captures substantive inequality, consider the well-documented "pandemic" of violence against transgender people (see Florence Ashley, "Don't Be So Hateful: The Insufficiency of Anti-Discrimination and Hate Crime Laws in Improving Trans Wellbeing" (2018) 68:1 UTLJ 1 at 1). In Canada, while the Supreme Court has characterized transgender people as "undeniably a marginalized group in Canadian society" (Hansman v Neufeld, 2023 SCC 14 (CanLII) at para 84), it has not yet formally recognized gender identity as an analogous ground. That said, gender identity has been accepted as an analogous ground by several lower courts (see e.g. Egale Canada v Alberta, 2025 ABKB 394; Centre for Gender Advocacy v Attorney General of Quebec, 2021 QCCS 191). In stark contrast are these recent remarks from Justice Barrett of the U.S. Supreme Court rejecting transgender status as a "suspect class" in United States v. Skrmetti, 605 U.S. (2025) (Concurring opinion of Justice Barrett, at 4):

> The Sixth Circuit held that transgender individuals do not constitute a suspect class, and it was right to do so. To begin, transgender status is not marked by the same sort of "'obvious, immutable, or distinguishing characteristics'" as race or sex … In particular, it is not defined by a trait that is "'definitively ascertainable at the moment of birth.'" … The plaintiffs here, for instance, began to experience gender dysphoria at varying ages—some from a young age, others not until the onset of puberty … Meanwhile, the plaintiffs acknowledge that some transgender individuals "detransition" later in life—in other words, they begin to identify again with the gender that corresponds to their biological sex … Accordingly, transgender status does not turn on an "immutable . . . characteristi[c]."

Setting aside the well-theorized social construction of identities like race and sex/gender (see e.g., Michael Omi & Howard Winant, Racial Formation in the United States, 3rd ed (New York, NY: Routledge, 2015); Paisley Currah, Sex Is as Sex Does: Governing Transgender Identity (New York, NY: NYU Press, 2022), are religion, mental disability, or physical disability "definitively ascertainable at the moment of birth"? If not, how can one reconcile unambiguous protected grounds with such narrow articulations of analogous grounds and equality law doctrine?

5. Above—under Part 3: "Adverse Effects Discrimination"—we included a guiding question about "choice" and its impact on analysis of discrimination. But the idea of choice has also impacted the identification of analogous grounds.

   As noted, choice has not categorically prohibited the recognition of analogous grounds. Indeed, many of those grounds which have been recognized to date—e.g., Aboriginality-residence, citizenship, and marital status—involve elements of choice, albeit under conditions of severe constraint. But other "choices" have received different—even inverse—jurisprudential treatment.

   Recall Gosselin v. Québec (Attorney General), 2002 SCC 84 (CanLII), [2002] 4 SCR 429, which concerned a Quebec welfare scheme that provided young residents with financial support that was "far below not just the government's poverty line, but its basic survival amount" unless they participated in certain employment training programs (at para 252; per Bastarache J., dissenting but not on this point).

   McLachlin C.J., writing for the majority, strictly limited her analysis to "age", the enumerated ground underlying the claim (see para 19), and was generally unsympathetic to young welfare recipients who, in her view, chose below-subsistence welfare by failing to complete training programs. In contrast, Bastarache J.'s dissenting opinion (which Arbour J. was in "general agreement" with; at para 395) alluded to an analogous ground of "beneficiaries of social assistance" and considered "the vulnerability of … welfare recipients" essential to a contextual analysis:

   > 236 The appellant argues that people on social assistance have always suffered disadvantage because they are victims of stereotypical assumptions regarding the reasons for being welfare recipients, and are therefore marginalized from society. In making such an argument, the appellant is not comparing social assistance recipients under 30 to those 30 and over, but instead, comparing the relative position of young social assistance recipients to members of society as a whole. This raises the question of determining what is the proper comparator …
   > 238 … The fact that people on social assistance are in a precarious, vulnerable position adds weight to the argument that differentiation that affects them negatively may pose a greater threat to their human dignity. The fact that their status as beneficiaries of social assistance was not argued as constituting a new analogous ground should not be a matter of concern at this stage of the analysis, since it has already been determined at the second stage of the Law test that the differentiation has been made on the basis of an enumerated ground. The issue, at this stage, is to determine whether, in the context of this case, a differentiation based on an enumerated ground is threatening to the appellant's human dignity. If the vulnerability of the appellant's group as welfare recipients cannot be recognized at this stage, can we really be said to be undertaking a contextual analysis?

   Which analysis of "choice" do you find more persuasive in Gosselin? Specifically, do the choices of low-income people alter their status as a marginalized community? And, drawing on the enumerated grounds (to which novel protected grounds are analogized), does the ability for racial minorities to assimilate to white norms, religious minorities to convert to Christianity, or anyone's ability to avoid certain disabilities through prudence, negate race, religion, or disability as suspect grounds of legislative distinction?

6. Beyond the brief discussion in Gosselin excerpted above, poverty as an analogous ground of discrimination has been a long-standing controversy under section 15. In 1994, Professor Martha Jackman presciently critiqued the Charter's substantive limitations without protection against poverty-based discrimination:

   > [G]iven the severe impact of poverty on social conditions, opportunities and status in Canadian society, the Charter's guarantee of substantive equality will remain meaningless for a vast number of Canadians unless poverty itself is recognized as a prohibited ground of discrimination under section 15 (Martha Jackman, "Constitutional Contact with the Disparities in the World: Poverty as a Prohibited Ground of Discrimination under the Canadian Charter and Human Rights Law" (1994) 2:1 Rev Const Stud 76 at 78).

   Some victories related to poverty have been constitutionally vindicated, albeit by lower courts—for example, in successful legal challenges relating to the unhoused (see e.g., Victoria (City) v. Adams, 2009 BCCA 563 (CanLII); The Regional Municipality of Waterloo v. Persons Unknown and to be Ascertained, 2023 ONSC 670 (Can LII)). Still, to date, poverty remains unrecognized as a protected ground of discrimination, despite ongoing—indeed, expanding—struggles for economic equality in Canada (see e.g., "What Does Ontario Law Say About Clearing Encampments?" The Agenda, February 6, 2023, https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=G9gMCAmMWys; "Shelter Is Survival" British Columbia Civil Liberties Association (2025), https://bccla.org/campaign/shelter-is-survival/#:~:text=On%20January%2030%2C%202025%2C%20BCCLA,cruel%2C%20dehumanizing%2C%20and%20deadly).

If low-income people experience substantive inequality in Canadian society, on what normative or doctrinal basis are they so often excluded from constitutional protection against discrimination? Is there a level of economic inequality that could emerge such that poverty-based claims eventually become more constitutionally legible? Or are there specific manifestations of economic inequality—for example, "receipt of social assistance" (Falkiner v. Ontario (Minister of Community and Social Services), 2002 CanLII 44902 (ON CA))—that, while narrower than "poverty", could still challenge substantive economic inequality in meaningful ways if recognized as an analogous ground by the Supreme Court?

7. In Fraser—discussed above under Part 3.3: "Fraser v. Canada"—the majority held that the RCMP's pension scheme was discriminatory because it systemically disadvantaged employees with caregiving responsibilities, who were mostly women. However, the plaintiffs also argued that the pension scheme discriminated based on the analogous ground of "family/parental status". The majority said the following with respect to this proposed ground of discrimination:

> [T]his is not the right case to resolve whether family/parental status should be recognized as an analogous ground under s. 15(1). Not only is recognizing a new analogous ground unnecessary to fully and fairly resolve Ms. Fraser's discrimination claim, a robust intersectional analysis of gender and parenting — as this case shows — can be carried out under the enumerated ground of sex, by acknowledging that the uneven division of childcare responsibilities is one of the "persistent systemic disadvantages [that] have operated to limit the opportunities available" to women in Canadian society (Taypotat, at para. 17; see also Withler, at para. 43; Quebec v. A, at paras. 327-32; Alliance, at para. 28; Centrale, at para. 35). Human rights cases in other jurisdictions confirm that claims of parental discrimination can be brought as claims of adverse impact discrimination on the basis of sex (see Fredman (2011), at pp. 181-82; Shilton (2018), at p. 36; London Underground Ltd. v. Edwards (No. 2), [1999] I.C.R. 494 (E.W.C.A.); Phillips v. Martin Marietta Corp., 400 U.S. 542 (1971); Bostock v. Clayton County, Georgia, 140 S. Ct. 1731 (2020), at p. 1743).

One response to this reasoning is that Fraser was a missed opportunity to recognize family status as an analogous ground to provide "more precise and nuanced protection for women caregivers at the intersection of gender and family in light of the particular inequalities this group faces", as well as protections for diverse family forms (see Jennifer Koshan, "Intersections and Roads Untravelled: Sex and Family Status in Fraser v Canada" (2021) 30:2 Constitutional Forum 29). In the context of caregiving responsibilities, what is gained—and lost—analytically when that context is analyzed as a setting of inequality based on gender, rather than based on family status? Do these grounds differ in terms of focus? Or scale? Or remedy?

Alternatively, continuing with Fraser's logic: Could a "robust intersectional analysis" of race and poverty be used as an alternative means for promoting the substantive equality of low-income people who, in Canada, are disproportionately racialized? Or could such an intersectional analysis be conducted for race and criminalization, given the overrepresentation of Black and Indigenous people in the context of policing, prosecutions, and prisons? See generally: Shreya Atrey, Intersectional discrimination (Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press, 2019).

5 Affirmative Action and Section 15(2)

Prior to 2008, courts considered the ameliorative purpose of legislation as a factor relevant to whether there was discrimination, without formal reliance on section 15(2) of the Charter (see e.g. Law v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 675 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 497 at paras 72-73; Lovelace v. Ontario, 2000 SCC 37 (CanLII), [2000] 1 SCR 950 at paras 84-87). Kapp, excerpted below, was the first Supreme Court of Canada decision to give section 15(2) independent force in the section 15 analysis.

5.1 R. v. Kapp, 2008 SCC 41 (CanLII), [2008] 2 SCR 483

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Binnie, LeBel, Deschamps, Fish, Abella, Charron and Rothstein JJ. was delivered by

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND ABELLA J. —

A. Introduction

[1] The appellants are commercial fishers, mainly non-aboriginal, who assert that their equality rights under s. 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated by a communal fishing licence granting members of three aboriginal bands the exclusive right to fish for salmon in the mouth of the Fraser River for a period of 24 hours on August 19-20, 1998.

[2] The appellants base their claim on s. 15(1). The essence of the claim is that the communal fishing licence discriminated against them on the basis of race. The Crown argues that the general purpose of the program under which the licence was issued was to regulate the fishery, and that it ameliorated the conditions of a disadvantaged group. These contentions, taken together, raise the issue of the interplay between s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) of the Charter. Specifically, they require this Court to consider whether s. 15(2) is capable of operating independently of s. 15(1) to protect ameliorative programs from claims of discrimination — a possibility left open in this Court's equality jurisprudence.

[3] We have concluded that where a program makes a distinction on one of the grounds enumerated under s. 15 or an analogous ground but has as its object the amelioration of the conditions of a disadvantaged group, s. 15's guarantee of substantive equality is furthered, and the claim of discrimination must fail. As the communal fishing licence challenged in this appeal falls within s. 15(2)'s ambit — one of its objects being to ameliorate the conditions of the participating aboriginal bands — the appellants' claim of a violation of s. 15 cannot succeed….

2. Section 15(2)

[27] Under Andrews, as previously noted, s. 15 does not mean identical treatment. McIntyre J. explained that "every difference in treatment between individuals under the law will not necessarily result in inequality", and that "identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality" (p. 164). McIntyre J. explicitly rejected identical treatment as a Charter objective, based in part on the existence of s. 15(2). At p. 171, he stated that "the fact that identical treatment may frequently produce serious inequality is recognized in s. 15(2)".

[28] Rather than requiring identical treatment for everyone, in Andrews, McIntyre J. distinguished between difference and discrimination and adopted an approach to equality that acknowledged and accommodated differences…. In other words, not every distinction is discriminatory. By their very nature, programs designed to ameliorate the disadvantage of one group will inevitably exclude individuals from other groups. This does not necessarily make them either unconstitutional or "reverse discrimination." Andrews requires that discriminatory conduct entail more than different treatment. As McIntyre J. declared at p. 167, a law will not "necessarily be bad because it makes distinctions".

[29] In our view, the appellants have established that they were treated differently based on an enumerated ground, race. Because the government argues that the program ameliorated the conditions of a disadvantaged group, we must take a more detailed look at s. 15(2).

[30] The question that arises is whether the program that targeted the aboriginal bands falls under s. 15(2) in the sense that it is a "law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups". As noted, the communal fishing licence authorizing the three bands to fish for sale on August 19-20 was issued pursuant to an enabling statute and regulations — namely the ACFLR. This qualifies as a "law, program or activity" within the meaning of s. 15(2). The more complex issue is whether the program fulfills the remaining criteria of s. 15(2) — that is, whether the program "has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups".

[31] Even before the enactment of the Charter, this Court in Athabasca Tribal Council v. Amoco Canada Petroleum Co., 1981 CanLII 193 (SCC), [1981] 1 SCR 699, recognized that ameliorative programs targeting a disadvantaged group do not constitute discrimination. The issue in the case was whether the Energy Resources Conservation Board had jurisdiction to require an "affirmative action" program for the hiring of aboriginal people as a condition of its approval of a tar sands plant. The Court unanimously concluded that there was no such jurisdiction, but Ritchie J., writing for four of the judges (Laskin C.J., himself, Dickson J. and McIntyre J.), addressed the affirmative action aspect of the case, concluding that a program designed to benefit the aboriginal community was not discrimination within the meaning of The Individual's Rights Protection Act of Alberta, S.A. 1972, c. 2. …

[32] The Royal Commission Report on Equality in Employment, whose mandate was to determine whether there should be affirmative action in Canada and on which McIntyre J. relied to develop his theories of discrimination and equality, set out the principles underlying s. 15(2), at pp. 13-14:

> In recognition of the journey many have yet to complete before they achieve equality, and in recognition of how the duration of the journey has been and is being unfairly protracted by arbitrary barriers, section 15(2) permits laws, programs, or activities designed to eliminate these restraints. While section 15(1) guarantees to individuals the right to be treated as equals free from discrimination, section 15(2), though itself creating no enforceable remedy, assures that it is neither discriminatory nor a violation of the equality guaranteed by section 15(1) to attempt to improve the condition of disadvantaged individuals or groups, even if this means treating them differently.
> Section 15(2) covers the canvas with a broad brush, permitting a group remedy for discrimination. The section encourages a comprehensive or systemic rather than a particularized approach to the elimination of discriminatory barriers.
> Section 15(2) does not create the statutory obligation to establish laws, programs, or activities to hasten equality, ameliorate disadvantage, or eliminate discrimination. But it sanctions them, acting with statutory acquiescence.

[33] In essence, s. 15(2) of the Charter seeks to protect efforts by the state to develop and adopt remedial schemes designed to assist disadvantaged groups. This interpretation is confirmed by the language in s. 15(2), "does not preclude".

[34] This Court dealt explicitly with the relationship between s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) in Lovelace v. Ontario, [2000] 1 SCR 950, 2000 SCC 37. The Court, per Iacobucci J., appeared unwilling at that time to give s. 15(2) independent force, but left the door open for that possibility, at para. 108:

> [A]t this stage of the jurisprudence, I see s. 15(2) as confirmatory of s. 15(1) and, in that respect, claimants arguing equality claims in the future should first be directed to s. 15(1) since that subsection can embrace ameliorative programs of the kind that are contemplated by s. 15(2). By doing that one can ensure that the program is subject to the full scrutiny of the discrimination analysis, as well as the possibility of a s. 1 review. However, . . . we may well wish to reconsider this matter at a future time in the context of another case. [Emphasis added.]

[35] Iacobucci J. in Lovelace perceived two possible approaches to the interpretation of s. 15(2). He believed that the Supreme Court could either read s. 15(2) as an interpretive aid to s. 15(1) (the approach adopted in Lovelace) or read it as an exception or exemption from the operation of s. 15(1).

[36] He favoured the interpretive aid approach, while acknowledging that the exemption approach had some support. …

[37] In our view, there is a third option: if the government can demonstrate that an impugned program meets the criteria of s. 15(2), it may be unnecessary to conduct a s. 15(1) analysis at all. As discussed at the outset of this analysis, s. 15(1) and s. 15(2) should be read as working together to promote substantive equality. The focus of s. 15(1) is on preventing governments from making distinctions based on enumerated or analogous grounds that have the effect of perpetuating disadvantage or prejudice or imposing disadvantage on the basis of stereotyping. The focus of s. 15(2) is on enabling governments to pro-actively combat discrimination. Read thus, the two sections are confirmatory of each other. Section 15(2) supports a full expression of equality, rather than derogating from it. "Under a substantive definition of equality, different treatment in the service of equity for disadvantaged groups is an expression of equality, not an exception to it": P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp. 2007), vol. 2, at p. 55-53.

[38] But this confirmatory purpose does not preclude an independent role for s. 15(2). Section 15(2) is more than a hortatory admonition. It tells us, in simple clear language, that s. 15(1) cannot be read in a way that finds an ameliorative program aimed at combatting disadvantage to be discriminatory and in breach of s. 15.

[39] Here the appellants claim discrimination on the basis of s. 15(1). The source of that discrimination — the very essence of their complaint — is a program that may be ameliorative. This leaves but one conclusion: if the government establishes that the program falls under s. 15(2), the appellants' claim must fail.

[40] In other words, once the s. 15 claimant has shown a distinction made on an enumerated or analogous ground, it is open to the government to show that the impugned law, program or activity is ameliorative and, thus, constitutional. This approach has the advantage of avoiding the symbolic problem of finding a program discriminatory before "saving" it as ameliorative, while also giving independent force to a provision that has been written as distinct and separate from s. 15(1). Should the government fail to demonstrate that its program falls under s. 15(2), the program must then receive full scrutiny under s. 15(1) to determine whether its impact is discriminatory.

[41] We would therefore formulate the test under s. 15(2) as follows. A program does not violate the s. 15 equality guarantee if the government can demonstrate that: (1) the program has an ameliorative or remedial purpose; and (2) the program targets a disadvantaged group identified by the enumerated or analogous grounds. In proposing this test, we are mindful that future cases may demand some adjustment to the framework in order to meet the litigants' particular circumstances. However, at this early stage in the development of the law surrounding s. 15(2), the test we have described provides a basic starting point — one that is adequate for determining the issues before us on this appeal, but leaves open the possibility for future refinement.

[42] We build our analysis of s. 15(2) and its operation around three key phrases in the provision. The subsection protects "any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups". While there is some overlap in the considerations raised by each of these terms, it may be useful to consider each of them individually.

(a) "Has as Its Object"

[43] In interpreting this phrase, two issues arise. The first is whether courts should look to the purpose or to the effect of legislation. The second is whether, in order to qualify for s. 15(2) protection, a program must have an ameliorative purpose as its sole object, or whether having such a goal as one of several objectives is sufficient.

[44] The language of s. 15(2) suggests that legislative goal rather than actual effect is the paramount consideration in determining whether or not a program qualifies for s. 15(2) protection. … Scholars have nonetheless disagreed about the appropriate approach, often using the "subjective" (goal-based) and "objective" (effect-based) language.

[45] Scholars and judges who have supported judicial examination of the actual effect of a program offer one primary argument to defend their view. They express concern that a "subjective" test will permit the government to defeat a discrimination claim by declaring that the impugned law has an ameliorative purpose. … David Lepofsky and Jerome Bickenbach believe that the "better view is that the defendant must establish that the impugned program has some serious likelihood of achieving its ameliorative goal" ("Equality Rights and the Physically Handicapped", in A. F. Bayefsky and M. Eberts, eds., Equality Rights and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1985), 323, at p. 355). They justify this perspective with the argument that "if ameliorative legislative purpose were the sole test under section 15(2), a legislature could easily circumvent the egalitarian requirements under section 15(1) by including in any potentially discriminatory legislation a clause which provides that 'this Act has as its object the amelioration of the conditions of . . . a disadvantaged group'" (p. 355).

[46] In our opinion, this concern can be easily addressed. There is nothing to suggest that a test focussed on the goal of legislation must slavishly accept the government's characterization of its purpose. Courts could well examine legislation to ensure that the declared purpose is genuine. Courts confronted with a s. 15(2) claim have done just that. For example, in Manitoba Rice Farmers Association v. Human Rights Commission (Man.) (1987), 1988 CanLII 7193 (MB CA), 50 Man. R. (2d) 92 (Q.B.) (rev'd in part (1988), 55 Man. R. (2d) 263 (C.A.)), Simonsen J. explained, at para. 51:

> A bald declaration by government that it has adopted a program which "has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race . . ." does not ipso facto meet the requirements to sanctify the program under s. 15(2) of the Charter. The government cannot employ such a naked declaration as a shield to protect an activity or program which is unnecessarily discriminatory.

[47] In that vein, proponents of the approach that focusses on the ameliorative goal of the program, rather than its effect, argue that doing so will prevent courts from unduly interfering in ameliorative programs created by the legislature. They note that Canadian Charter drafters wished to avoid the American experience, whereby judges overturned affirmative action programs under the banner of equality. The purpose-driven approach also reflects the language of the provision itself, which focusses on the "object" of the program, law or activity rather than its impact. Moreover, the effects of a program in its fledgling stages cannot always be easily ascertained. The law or program may be experimental. If the sincere purpose is to promote equality by ameliorating the conditions of a disadvantaged group, the government should be given some leeway to adopt innovative programs, even though some may ultimately prove to be unsuccessful. The government may learn from such failures and revise equality-enhancing programs to make them more effective.

[48] Given the language of the provision and its goal of enabling governments to pro-actively combat discrimination, we believe the "purpose"-based approach is more appropriate than the "effect"-based approach: where a law, program or activity creates a distinction based on an enumerated or analogous ground, was the government's goal in creating that distinction to improve the conditions of a group that is disadvantaged? In examining purpose, courts may therefore find it necessary to consider not only statements made by the drafters of the program but also whether the legislature chose means rationally related to that ameliorative purpose, in the sense that it appears at least plausible that the program may indeed advance the stated goal of combatting disadvantage. The Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench suggested that it favoured an analysis of this kind in Manitoba Rice Farmers Association, at para. 54:

> In order to justify a program under s. 15(2), I believe there must be a real nexus between the object of the program as declared by the government and its form and implementation. It is not sufficient to declare that the object of a program is to help a disadvantaged group if in fact the ameliorative remedy is not directed toward the cause of the disadvantage. There must be a unity or interrelationship amongst the elements in the program which will prompt the court to conclude that the remedy in its form and implementation is rationally related to the cause of the disadvantage.

[49] Analysing the means employed by the government can easily turn into assessing the effect of the program. As a result, to preserve an intent-based analysis, courts could be encouraged to frame the analysis as follows: Was it rational for the state to conclude that the means chosen to reach its ameliorative goal would contribute to that purpose? For the distinction to be rational, there must be a correlation between the program and the disadvantage suffered by the target group. Such a standard permits significant deference to the legislature but allows judicial review where a program nominally seeks to serve the disadvantaged but in practice serves other non-remedial objectives.

[50] The next issue is whether the program's ameliorative purpose needs to be its exclusive objective. Programs frequently serve more than one purpose or attempt to meet more than one goal. Must the ameliorative object be the sole object, or may it be one of several?

[51] We can find little justification for requiring the ameliorative purpose to be the sole object of a program. It seems unlikely that a single purpose will motivate any particular program; any number of goals are likely to be subsumed within a single scheme. To prevent such programs from earning s. 15(2) protection on the grounds that they contain other objectives seems to undermine the goal of s. 15(2).

[52] The importance of the ameliorative purpose within the scheme may help determine the scope of s. 15(2) protection, however. Consider that an ameliorative program may coexist with or interact with a larger legislative scheme. If only the program has an ameliorative purpose, does s. 15(2) extend to protect the wider legislative scheme? We offer as a tentative guide that s. 15(2) precludes from s. 15(1) review distinctions made on enumerated or analogous grounds that serve and are necessary to the ameliorative purpose.

(b) "Amelioration"

[53] Section 15(2) protects programs that aim to "ameliorate" the condition of disadvantaged groups identified by the enumerated or analogous grounds. Although the word does not at first seem liable to misunderstanding, courts have previously understood the term (and s. 15(2)) to apply in surprising circumstances. In R. v. Music Explosion Ltd. (1989), 1989 CanLII 7484 (MB QB), 62 Man. R. (2d) 189, the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench upheld a Winnipeg bylaw that restricted young people under 16 from operating an amusement device without the consent of a guardian or a parent on the grounds that it was protected by s. 15(2). Smith J. declared that the bylaw "is obviously for the benefit of the special needs of young persons" (para. 21). On appeal, the decision was reversed. The Court of Appeal explained: "[T]his legislation does not confer special benefits upon young people, but rather imposes a limitation. Nor is the purpose of the legislation the amelioration of their condition" ((1990), 1990 CanLII 11042 (MB CA), 68 Man. R. (2d) 203, at para. 18). Courts have also used s. 15(2) to uphold provisions of the Criminal Code … and of the Young Offenders Act ...

[54] These precedents suggest that the meaning of "amelioration" deserves careful attention in evaluating programs under s. 15(2). We would suggest that laws designed to restrict or punish behaviour would not qualify for s. 15(2) protection. Nor, as already discussed, should the focus be on the effect of the law. This said, the fact that a law has no plausible or predictable ameliorative effect may render suspect the state's ameliorative purpose. Governments, as discussed above, are not permitted to protect discriminatory programs on colourable pretexts.

(c) "Disadvantaged"

[55] The interpretation of "disadvantaged", explored in Andrews, Miron v. Trudel, 1995 CanLII 97 (SCC), [1995] 2 SCR 418, and Law, and other cases in the context of s. 15(1), requires little further elaboration here. "Disadvantage" under s. 15 connotes vulnerability, prejudice and negative social characterization. Section 15(2)'s purpose is to protect government programs targeting the conditions of a specific and identifiable disadvantaged group, as contrasted with broad societal legislation, such as social assistance programs. Not all members of the group need to be disadvantaged, as long as the group as a whole has experienced discrimination.

3. Application of Section 15(2) to This Case

[56] The appellants have argued they were denied a benefit on the basis of race, a ground enumerated in s. 15 of the Charter. As discussed above, once the appellants have demonstrated such a distinction, the government may attempt to show the program is protected under s. 15(2). The government conferred the communal fishing licence valid for August 19-20 to particular aboriginal bands. Therefore, we are satisfied that the appellants have demonstrated a distinction imposed on the basis of race, an enumerated ground under s. 15.

[57] We have earlier suggested that a distinction based on the enumerated or analogous grounds in a government program will not constitute discrimination under s. 15 if, under s. 15(2), (1) the program has an ameliorative or remedial purpose; and (2) the program targets a disadvantaged group identified by the enumerated or analogous grounds. The question is whether the program at issue on this appeal meets these conditions.

[58] The first issue is whether the program that excluded Mr. Kapp and other non-band fishers from the fishery had an ameliorative or remedial purpose. The Crown describes numerous objectives for the impugned pilot sales program. These include negotiating solutions to aboriginal fishing rights claims, providing economic opportunities to native bands and supporting their progress towards self-sufficiency. The impugned fishing licence relates to all of these goals. The pilot sales program was part of an attempt — albeit a small part — to negotiate a solution to aboriginal fishing rights claims. The communal fishing licence provided economic opportunities, through sale or trade, to the bands. Through these endeavours, the government was pursuing the goal of promoting band self-sufficiency. In these ways, the government was hoping to redress the social and economic disadvantage of the targeted bands. The means chosen to achieve the purpose (special fishing privileges for aboriginal communities, constituting a benefit) are rationally related to serving that purpose. It follows that the Crown has established a credible ameliorative purpose for the program.

[59] The government's aims correlate to the actual economic and social disadvantage suffered by members of the three aboriginal bands. The disadvantage of aboriginal people is indisputable. In Corbiere v. Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs), 1999 CanLII 687 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 203, the Court noted "the legacy of stereotyping and prejudice against Aboriginal peoples" (para. 66). The Court has also acknowledged that "Aboriginal peoples experience high rates of unemployment and poverty, and face serious disadvantages in the areas of education, health and housing" (Lovelace, at para. 69). More particularly, the evidence shows in this case that the bands granted the benefit were in fact disadvantaged in terms of income, education and a host of other measures. This disadvantage, rooted in history, continues to this day. The communal fishing licence, by addressing long-term goals of self-sufficiency and, more immediately, by providing additional sources of income and employment, relates to the social and economic disadvantage suffered by the bands. The fact that some individual members of the bands may not experience personal disadvantage does not negate the group disadvantage suffered by band members.

[60] Mr. Kapp suggests that the focus must be on the particular forms of disadvantage suffered by the bands who received the benefit, and argues that this program did not offer a benefit that effectively tackled the problems faced by these bands. As discussed above, what is required is a correlation between the program and the disadvantage suffered by the target group. If the target group is socially and economically disadvantaged, as is the case here, and the program may rationally address that disadvantage, then the necessary correspondence is established.

[61] We conclude that the government program here at issue is protected by s. 15(2) as a program that "has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups". It follows that the program does not violate the equality guarantee of s. 15 of the Charter.

5.2 Notes and Questions

1. The constitutionality of affirmative action policies, particularly those on the basis of race, have been especially controversial in the United States, which does not have a provision such as section 15(2) of the Charter in its Constitution. Under the US Constitution, distinctions based on race are subject to strict scrutiny by the courts, but arguments have been made by proponents of affirmative action that such policies should not be subject to this standard.

   In a number of cases in the 1990s and early 2000s, a deeply divided Supreme Court of the United States held that —subject to strict parameters — certain affirmative action programs could be constitutionally permissible. For example, in Grutter v. Bollinger, 539 U.S. 306 (2003), a majority of the Court held that the United States Constitution "does not prohibit [a] law school's narrowly tailored use of race in admissions decisions to further a compelling interest in obtaining the educational benefits that flow from a diverse student body." Justice O'Connor, writing for the majority, held that sometime in the future, perhaps in twenty-five years, racial affirmative action would no longer be necessary in order to promote diversity. And twenty years later, a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States struck a significant blow to affirmative action's already marginal constitutional status in America by holding that Harvard University's race-conscious admissions policy violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment (see Students for Fair Admissions, Inc. v. President and Fellows of Harvard College, 600 U.S. 181 (2023)). No longer "compelling", a majority of the Supreme Court now labelled the benefits of diversity "not sufficiently coherent" to justify affirmative action, which it considered tantamount to racial segregation. This controversy has also extended into scholarship. For example, in "A Critique of Our Constitution Is Color-Blind" (1991) 44:1 Stan L Rev 1, Neil Gotanda rejects "superficial critiques of affirmative action programs" that legitimize "the continued subordination of the black community." Over thirty years before Students for Fair Admissions, Gotanda rejected a "symmetrical standard of review" (i.e., conceptualizing affirmative action as tantamount to racial segregation) based on the plain fact that America's "racial history is skewed":

   > The history of segregation is not the history of Blacks creating racial categories to legitimate slavery, nor is it a history of segregated institutions aimed at subordinating whites. Indeed racial categories themselves, with their metaphorical themes of white racial purity and nonwhite contamination, have different meanings for Blacks and whites. If judicial review is to consider the past and continuing character of racial subordination, then an affirmative action program aimed at alleviating the effects of racial subordination should not automatically be subject to the same standard of review as Jim Crow segregation laws.

Under what past/present circumstances do you think that affirmative action programs ought to be constitutionally permissible? Were/are those circumstances present in America? Were/are they present in Canada?

2. Kapp found that the impugned fishing strategy drew a distinction based on race before turning to section 15(2). Commentators have questioned this finding given the context of protecting Aboriginal fishing rights, including the Court's reliance on the ground of "race". See e.g. Sebastien Grammond, "Disentangling 'Race' and Indigenous Status: The Role of Ethnicity" (2008) 33 Queens LJ 48 7; June McCue, "Kapp's Distinctions: Race-Based Fisheries, the Limits of Affirmative Action for Aboriginal Peoples and Skirting Aboriginal People's Unique Constitutional Status Once Again" (2008) 5 Directions 56; Constance MacIntosh, "Developments in Aboriginal Law: The 2008-9 Term" (2008) 49 SCLR (2d) 1. For an alternative judgment in Kapp that aligns with these critiques see Sonia Lawrence, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 268.

3. Kapp emphasized the government's ameliorative objectives in applying section 15(2). It involved a claim of so-called "reverse discrimination" by a more advantaged group seeking to remove the 24-hour fishing priority for the Indigenous bands in question. What do these aspects of the decision mean for well-intentioned programs that nevertheless have the effect of disadvantaging the targeted group in some respects, e.g., by seeking a benefit for women but ultimately reinforcing their systemic inequality? And what about programs that focus on the needs of one group but neglect other groups with similar needs, e.g., by providing a benefit to people with physical disabilities but not mental disabilities?

   These questions were answered in part in three Supreme Court decisions subsequent to Kapp.

   Alberta (Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development) v. Cunningham, 2011 SCC 37 (Can LII), [2011] 2 SCR 670, involved a challenge to Alberta's Métis Settlement Act (MSA), which recognized settlement lands and self-government rights for Métis communities and provided for the preservation and enhancement of Métis culture and identity. The claimants were members of a Métis community in Alberta who were also eligible for benefits under the Indian Act. When they registered under the latter statute, their membership in the Métis settlement was revoked by virtue of a provision in the MSA. Cunningham can therefore be seen as a challenge to an underinclusive scheme that excluded Métis persons who qualified as "Indians." On behalf of a unanimous Court, McLachlin C.J. held that the claimants' exclusion did not infringe section 15(1) because the MSA was protected as an ameliorative program under section 15(2). The Court found that the government's objective was to preserve the identity, culture and self-governance of the Métis, a constitutionally recognized disadvantaged group. Modifying the test from Kapp somewhat (see Kapp, at para 52), they also found that it was sufficient that the exclusion of Métis persons who registered under the Indian Act "served or advanced" the MSA's ameliorative purpose (Cunningham, at para 45).

   Two 2018 decisions involving challenges brought by unions to 2009 amendments to Quebec's pay equity legislation also raised the application of section 15(2). Quebec (Attorney General) v. Alliance du personnel professionnel et technique de la santé et des services sociaux, 2018 SCC 17 (CanLII), [2018] 1 SCR 464, concerned aspects of the 2009 scheme that replaced employers' continuous obligations to make pay equity adjustments with pay equity audits every 5 years that denied any retroactive compensation unless an employer acted in bad faith, arbitrarily, or with discrimination. Centrale des syndicats du Québec v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2018 SCC 18 (CanLII), [2018] 1 SCR 522, challenged a six-year delay in pay equity adjustments for women in workplaces with no male comparators. Writing for a majority of the Court in both cases, Abella J. held that the 2009 amendments amounted to sex discrimination contrary to section 15(1) of the Charter and that section 15(2) did not apply. On the latter point, she stated that the purpose of section 15(2) is to save ameliorative laws and programs from "reverse discrimination" type challenges (Alliance, at para 31; Centrale, at para 38). Citing Kapp as an example, she described reverse discrimination as a claim by a group or person "outside the scope of intended beneficiaries who alleges that ameliorating the situation of the intended beneficiaries discriminates against them" (Centrale, at para 38). In contrast, a claim "by the very group the legislation seeks to protect" was found to be outside the scope of section 15(2): "[i]t stands the purpose on its head to suggest that s. 15(2) can be used to deprive the program's intended beneficiaries of the right to challenge the program's compliance with s. 15(1)" (Alliance, at paras 32, 38). The dissenting justices on the section 15 issue in these cases (Côté, Brown and Rowe JJ., with Wagner J. joining them in Centrale) saw section 15(2) as a viable argument for the Quebec government, giving it wide scope to protect its pay equity legislation as an ameliorative program.

   Does the suggestion in Alliance and Centrale that section 15(2) is aimed at guarding against "reverse discrimination" types of claims mean that underinclusive ameliorative programs can now be challenged by excluded disadvantaged groups under section 15(1) without the government being able to rely on section 15(2)? Alternatively, how might Cunningham be distinguished in future cases involving underinclusive ameliorative programs where a member of an excluded disadvantaged group seeks to participate in the program?

   For commentary on section 15(2), particularly its application to underinclusive ameliorative programs, see Jena McGill, "Ameliorative Programs and the Charter: Reflections on the Section 15 (2) Landscape since R v Kapp" (2017) 95 Can B Rev 213; Jonnette Watson Hamilton & Jennifer Koshan; "The Supreme Court, Ameliorative Programs and Disability: Not Getting It" (2013) 25 CJWL 56. For alternative judgments in Kapp that contemplate challenges to underinclusive ameliorative programs, see Jena McGill, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 221; Kasari Govender and C. Tess Sheldon, "R v Kapp" (2018) 30:2 CJWL 248. Govender and Sheldon use the term "equality regressive" rather than "reverse discrimination" to describe the type of claim brought by Kapp et al. Is it useful to think about the purpose of section 15(2) as preventing equality regressive claims?

Chapter 25: Language Rights

By Brenna Haggarty and Alexandra Heine

1 Introduction

Canadian law recognizes that language is more than a means of communication – it is an expression of culture, identity, and community. Recognizing the central role of language in Canada, Sections 16 to 23 of the Charter enshrine a set of constitutional protections, collectively known as language rights. These provisions of the Charter reflect Canada's bilingual history and affirm the equal status of English and French in key areas of public life. These rights are not subject to the notwithstanding clause, meaning governments cannot override them by invoking s. 33 of the Charter.

Sections 16 to 20 establish the framework for official bilingualism at the federal level and in New Brunswick – Canada's only officially bilingual province. These provisions govern the use of English and French in Parliament, federal institutions, and the courts, as well as the public's right to access services from government institutions in either official language.

Sections 21 and 22 serve as interpretive and protective provisions, ensuring that existing or future language rights are not limited by the Charter's language guarantees.

Section 23 represents a unique set of constitutional rights. It focuses on minority language educational rights, guaranteeing Canadian citizens belonging to official language minorities the right to have their children educated in their own language under specific conditions. This provision plays a central role in preserving the linguistic and cultural vitality of minority language communities across Canada.

While language rights were recognized before 1982, their entrenchment in the Charter marked a significant turning point. Unlike many other Charter rights, language rights are both individual and institutional, reflecting a blend of personal entitlement and broader commitments to national unity and cultural preservation.

Despite their elevated constitutional status, the Supreme Court of Canada interpreted language rights in a narrow and restrictive manner in a trilogy of cases decided in 1986. In Société des Acadiens v. Association of Parents, 1986 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 549, MacDonald v. City of Montreal, 1986 CanLII 65 (SCC), [1986] 1 SR 460, and Bilodeau v. Attorney General of Manitoba, 1986 CanLII 64 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 449, the Court characterized language rights as a product of political compromise, distinguishing them from other legal rights that are typically interpreted more expansively. As a result, in these cases language rights were seen as limited in scope, closely tied to the specific constitutional or legislative provisions that created them.

The Supreme Court's restrictive approach to language rights gave way to a generous and purposive interpretation rather quickly.

In Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 342, the Supreme Court affirmed that section 23 of the Charter guarantees not just access to minority language education, but a measure of control by minority language communities over their children's education, recognizing the critical role of education in sustaining linguistic and cultural vitality. The Court continued this trend in Reference Re Manitoba Language Rights, 1992 CanLII 115 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 212 and Reference re Public Schools Act (Manitoba), 1993 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 839, where it underscored the constitutional obligation to ensure the equal status of English and French in legislation and education, even in the face of practical and institutional challenges.

The Supreme Court's purposive and rights-affirming approach culminated in R v Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 768, a landmark decision in which the Court directly overturned its earlier restrictive interpretation of language rights. While that case focused on s. 530 of the Criminal Code (a quasi-constitutional provision that gives every accused person the right to be tried in the official language of their choice), the Court seized the opportunity to decisively declare that "[l]anguage rights must in all cases be interpreted purposively, in a manner consistent with the preservation and development of official language communities in Canada" (at para 25, emphasis in original). Writing for the majority, Justice Bastarache emphasized that language rights are not mere procedural entitlements, but rather fundamental rights that serve the dual purpose of protecting individual dignity and fostering collective identity. This decision marked a clear and enduring jurisprudential shift, recognizing all language rights as a vital component of Canada's constitution.

This chapter focuses primarily on Section 16 and Section 23 — the provisions that anchor Canada's commitment to official language equality and the educational rights of official language minorities. It will explore how Canadian Courts, specifically the Supreme Court of Canada, have interpreted and applied these two provisions.

2 Section 16 of the Charter

Section 16 of the Charter is the foundational provision for official bilingualism in Canada. It reads:

> Official languages of Canada
> 16 (1) English and French are the official languages of Canada and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada.
>
> Official languages of New Brunswick
> (2) English and French are the official languages of New Brunswick and have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick.
> Advancement of status and use
> (3) Nothing in this Charter limits the authority of Parliament or a legislature to advance the equality of status or use of English and French.

Section 16 affirms the equal status of English and French as the official languages of Canada and, in doing so, lays the groundwork for the language rights that follow in Sections 17 to 20. While Section 16 is often viewed as declaratory, the Supreme Court of Canada has recognized that Section 16 is not merely aspirational and can serve as a guide for interpreting the scope and purpose of related language rights.

2.1 Guiding questions

- What does Section 16 of the Charter establish regarding official languages in Canada?
- How does Section 16 differ from other language rights provisions in the Charter?
- To what extent does Section 16 create substantive rights versus declaratory recognition of official bilingualism in Canada?

2.2 Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2014 SCC 67, [2014] 3 SCR 340

In Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2014 SCC 67, Michel and Lynda Thibodeau filed complaints after experiencing a lack of French-language services during three international flights and at an airport in 2009. The Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages upheld four of their complaints, confirming that Air Canada had violated section 22 of the Official Languages Act by failing to provide services in French. The Thibodeaus sought damages and structural orders through the Federal Court, which awarded them $6,000 in damages and required Air Canada to implement a monitoring system to ensure future compliance. The Federal Court of Appeal overturned the Federal Court, citing the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules for International Carriage by Air (the "Montreal Convention"), an international treaty which limits liability for international air carriers.

The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the Thibodeau's appeal, holding that the Montreal Convention barred the award of damages and that the structural order was not justified in the circumstances. While the Supreme Court acknowledged the fundamental importance of language rights, it found that international treaty obligations limited the remedies available in this case.

Even though the Thibodeau's language rights claim was unsuccessful in upholding their language rights and Section 16 of the Charter was not a central issue in this case, the Supreme Court nonetheless affirmed the interpretive significance of Section 16 of the Charter. The majority described it as a "reflect[ion]" of "Canada's foundational commitment to the equality of the French and English languages" (para 4).

Cromwell J. —

I. Introduction

[1] Air Canada failed to provide services in French on some international flights as it was obliged to do under the Official Languages Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 31 (4th Supp.) (the "OLA"). Two passengers, the appellants Michel and Lynda Thibodeau, applied to the Federal Court for damages and for orders, referred to as "structural" or "institutional" orders, requiring Air Canada to take steps in order to ensure future compliance with the OLA. The airline defended against the claims for damages by relying on the limitation on damages liability set out in the Convention for the Unification of Certain Rules for International Carriage by Air, 2242 U.N.T.S. 309 (the "Montreal Convention"), which is part of Canadian federal law by virtue of the Carriage by Air Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-26, a federal statute.

[2] The Federal Court rejected Air Canada's defence, awarded damages and granted a structural order (2011 FC 876, [2013] 2 F.C.R. 83). However, the Federal Court of Appeal set that ruling aside in part, holding that the Montreal Convention precluded the damages remedy for the events that took place on board Air Canada flights and that a structural order was not appropriate (2012 FCA 246, [2013] 2 F.C.R. 155). The main issue on the further appeal to this Court is whether the Federal Court of Appeal erred in these conclusions.

[3] The issue of damages sits at the intersection of Canada's domestic commitment to official languages and its international commitment to an exclusive and uniform scheme of damages liability for international air carriers. The question thus implicates two important values.

[4] On one hand, we have Canada's duty to comply with its international undertaking, by its ratification of the Montreal Convention and its adoption of the Montreal Convention into domestic law, to establish and give effect to limitations on liability for international air carriers. Air Canada maintains that upholding a damages remedy against the airline would be inconsistent with this important international undertaking. On the other hand, we have Canada's foundational commitment to the equality of the French and English languages, a commitment reflected, among other places, in s. 16 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and in the OLA. These language rights are "basic to the continued viability of [this] nation": R. v. Mercure, 1988 CanLII 107 (SCC), [1988] 1 SCR 234, at p. 269, per La Forest J. The appellants say that a damages remedy must be available for breach of language rights in order to fulfill the purposes of the OLA.

[5] This appeal requires us to resolve this tension by interpreting the OLA and the Montreal Convention in accordance with their text and purpose. As I see it, when they are properly interpreted, there is no conflict between the general remedial powers under the OLA and the exclusion of damages under the Montreal Convention and there is no need to consider which would prevail if there were.

[6] The Montreal Convention's uniform and exclusive scheme of damages liability for international air carriers does not permit an award of damages for breach of language rights during international carriage by air. To hold otherwise would do violence to the text and purpose of the Montreal Convention, depart from Canada's international obligations under it and put Canada off-side a strong international consensus concerning its scope and effect. The general remedial power under the OLA to award appropriate and just remedies cannot — and should not — be read as authorizing Canadian courts to depart from Canada's international obligations under the Montreal Convention.

[7] I also conclude that the Federal Court of Appeal was correct to set aside the structural order as it was impermissibly vague and unclear.

[8] I would therefore dismiss the appeals.

[111] The appellants suggest that the quasi-constitutional status of the OLA prevents a harmonious interpretation of s. 77(4) of the OLA and Article 29 of the Montreal Convention: Commissioner's factum, at paras. 90-95. The argument goes that to read s. 77(4) as not permitting an award of damages in the context of international air travel would run counter to the OLA's status as quasi-constitutional legislation and therefore would run counter to Parliament's intention. With respect, I cannot accept this submission.

[112] Section 77(4) of the OLA is certainly part of a quasi-constitutional statutory scheme designed to both reflect and to actualize the "equality of status" of English and French as the official languages of Canada and the "equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada" as declared in s. 16(1) of the Charter: see, e.g., R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 768; Lavigne, at para. 23. Like s. 24(1) of the Charter, s. 77(4) of the OLA confers a wide remedial authority and should be interpreted generously to achieve its purpose. These factors, however, do not alter the correct approach to statutory interpretation which requires us to read "the words of an Act . . . in their entire context and in their grammatical and ordinary sense harmoniously with the scheme of the Act, the object of the Act, and the intention of Parliament": Lavigne, at para. 25, quoting E. A. Driedger, Construction of Statutes (2nd ed. 1983), at p. 87. As I see it, the OLA, read in its full context, demonstrates that Parliament did not intend to prevent s. 77(4) from being read harmoniously with Canada's international obligations given effect by another federal statute.

[113] It is unlikely that, by means of the broad and general wording of s. 77(4), Parliament intended this remedial power to be read as an exclusive and exhaustive statement in relation to the Federal Court's remedial authority under the OLA, overriding all other laws and legal principles. The appellants' position in effect is that Parliament, through s. 77(4), intended that courts should be able to grant damages even though doing so would be in violation of Canada's international undertakings as incorporated into federal statute law. This proposition runs afoul of the principle of interpretation that Parliament is presumed not to intend to legislate in breach of Canada's international law obligations: see, e.g., Daniels, at p. 541; Zingre v. The Queen, 1981 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1981] 2 SCR 392, at pp. 409-10; Ordon Estate v. Grail, 1998 CanLII 771 (SCC), [1998] 3 SCR 437, at paras. 128-31; Sullivan, at pp. 539-42.

[117] In short, there are no indicators here of a conflict between these two provisions in the narrow and strict sense of conflict which applies in this context, and there is no hint in the text, scheme or purpose of the OLA that the brief, broad, general and highly discretionary provision in s. 77(4) was intended to permit courts to make orders in breach of Canada's international undertakings which have been incorporated into federal law.

[118] I conclude that there is no conflict between these provisions and that, in fashioning an appropriate and just remedy under the OLA in a case of international carriage by air, the Federal Court must apply the limitation on damages set out in Article 29 of the Montreal Convention. In light of that conclusion, I do not need to consider which provision would prevail in the event of conflict.

2.3 Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia

In Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2013 SCC 42, a French language school board and a federation of Francophone parents sought to introduce exhibits written in French into evidence. Their goal was to prove that they had standing to bring an action alleging violations of French-language education rights under the Charter. The British Columbia Supreme Court dismissed the application, holding that civil proceedings in British Columbia courts must be conducted in English, based on an old English statute received into provincial law and confirmed by the Supreme Court Civil Rules. The British Columbia Court of Appeal upheld this decision.

A majority of the Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeal. It agreed that the English statute remained in force and that, even absent the statute, the Supreme Court Civil Rules require that exhibits filed in court be in English.

Although the applicants were unsuccessful, the Court acknowledged the interpretive importance of Section 16 of the Charter, while emphasizing that it must be balanced with other constitutional principles. The majority noted that Subsection 16(3) "protects legislative initiatives intended to increase the equality of the official languages but does not […] confer any rights" (at para. 57).

WAGNER J. —

[55] Finally, the appellants urge this Court to adopt an approach to these issues based on Charter values and constitutional principles. The appellants argue that the Charter requires that legislation, including received legislation, be interpreted in a manner consistent with Charter values. The Court has of course repeatedly noted the role that Charter values play in the evolution of the common law and in statutory interpretation: RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., 1986 CanLII 5 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 573; R. v. Zundel, 1992 CanLII 75 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 731; R. v. National Post, 2010 SCC 16, [2010] 1 SCR 477. The Charter explicitly provides that English and French are the official languages of Canada: s. 16. The Court has also recognized the important role of linguistic minorities in Canada: Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 79.

[56] However, the Charter also reflects a recognition that Canada is a federation and that each province has a role to play in the protection and advancement of the country's official languages. This is evident from ss. 16 to 20, which require bilingualism in the federal government, in Parliament, in courts established by Parliament, and in the province of New Brunswick. The Charter does not require any province other than New Brunswick to provide for court proceedings in both official languages. In addition, s. 16(3) provides that the legislatures may act to advance the use of English and French. In my view, therefore, while it is true that the Charter reflects the importance of language rights, it also reflects the importance of respect for the constitutional powers of the provinces. Federalism is one of Canada's underlying constitutional principles: Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 55-60. Thus, it is not inconsistent with Charter values for the British Columbia legislature to restrict the language of court proceedings in the province to English.

[57] This being said, in light of s. 16(3) of the Charter, which specifically provides that provincial legislatures may advance the equality of status of English and French, it would be open to the British Columbia legislature to enact legislation, like that proposed in 1971, to authorize civil proceedings in French. Such legislation would no doubt further the values embodied in s. 16(3), which protects legislative initiatives intended to increase the equality of the official languages but does not, as this Court has already held, confer any rights. However, given the absence of any such initiative by the British Columbia legislature, it is not possible for this Court to impose one on it.

2.4 DesRochers v. Canada (Industry)

In DesRochers v. Canada (Industry), 2009 SCC 8, the Corporation de développement économique communautaire CALDECH ("CALDECH") filed a complaint with the Commissioner of Official Languages of Canada (the "Commissioner"), alleging that the North Simcoe Community Futures Development Corporation ("North Simcoe") was not providing economic development services in French to the Francophone population of Huronia. The Commissioner found the Department of Industry Canada ("Industry Canada"), which was responsible for providing community economic development services in Huronia, in breach of its duties under Parts IV and VII of the Official Languages Act and recommended corrective action. Despite some measures being taken, follow-up reports concluded that Industry Canada remained non-compliant.

CALDECH sought relief in the Federal Court, which dismissed its application, finding that while a breach had occurred when the complaint was filed, services were being provided in both languages by the time of the application. The Federal Court of Appeal allowed the appeal, holding that the application should have been granted, but that no remedy beyond costs was appropriate. The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the further appeal, agreeing that no further remedy was needed. However, the Supreme Court held that the Federal Court of Appeal had applied an overly narrow view of linguistic equality. In interpreting Section 20 of the Charter, the Court stressed that substantive equality under section 16 requires more than identical services in each language, noting that "substantive equality will not result from the development and implementation of identical services for each language community" (para 51).

DesRochers v. Canada (Industry)*, 2009 SCC 8, [2009] 1 SCR 194

English version of the judgment of the Court delivered by

CHARRON J. —

[2] It is common ground in this appeal that the rights being claimed are of constitutional origin, since the relevant provisions of the OLA implement the constitutional right of any member of the public to be served by federal institutions in the official language of his or her choice (Lavigne v. Canada (Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages), 2002 SCC 53, [2002] 2 SCR 773). The Chief Justice stated the following constitutional question:

> Do s. 20(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and Part IV of the Official Languages Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. 31, read in light of the principle of equality set out in s. 16(1) of the Charter, require Industry Canada to provide services of equal quality in both official languages?

[14] After the second follow-up report was published in 2004, Mr. DesRochers and CALDECH applied to the Federal Court under s. 77(1) of the OLA for, inter alia, the following remedies: an order declaring that the respondents had violated and were continuing to violate Parts IV and VII of the OLA and ss. 16(1) and 20(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; an order enjoining the respondents to comply with those provisions of the OLA and the Charter; damages; an order granting CALDECH permanent and stable funding; and costs. The Commissioner intervened in the proceedings in the courts below and was granted leave to participate in the appeal to this Court as an appellant.

[48] The respondents contend that the order being sought should not be granted. Their view is that depending on the nature of the service, the government might, in order to fulfil its language duties, be required to change its method of providing the service, but not the content of the service itself. They argue that "[t]his would amount to giving official language minority communities, via subsection 20(1) of the Charter and Part IV of the Act, a right to participate in defining the content of programs, which even a generous reading of those provisions, having regard to subsection 16(1) of the Charter, does not authorize."

[49] According to the respondents, what is being claimed here is not the equal provision of available services in both languages, but the provision of services other than those being offered that better reflect the socio-demographic characteristics of the linguistic minority community. They assert that the appellants are basically claiming a right to parallel services provided by a Francophone organization. In the respondents' view, linguistic equality does not have as broad a scope as this, but is instead achieved "by guaranteeing equal linguistic access to the services offered, not by access to distinct services". They therefore submit that the Federal Court of Appeal was correct to conclude that the rights being claimed in this case exceed the scope of Part IV of the OLA.

[50] In reply to the respondents' arguments, the appellants stress that the purpose of this application is not to claim a right to parallel services managed by the linguistic minority community. In their opinion, there is ample evidence that the needs of the French-speaking minority community are indeed different from those of the English-speaking majority community and that North Simcoe, unlike CALDECH, has not succeeded in reaching the French-language business community. The appellants therefore request, in addition to the above-mentioned order, that the government be ordered to provide funding to CALDECH, at least until substantive equality is achieved in the services provided by North Simcoe both in terms of rights and privileges as to the use of the official languages and in terms of the status of those languages in the federal institution.

5.5 Application to the Case at Bar

[51] It seems clear to me that the respondents are correct to say that the principle under s. 20(1) of the Charter and Part IV of the OLA of linguistic equality in the provision of government services involves a guarantee in relation to the services provided by the federal institution. However, it is not entirely accurate to say that linguistic equality in the provision of services cannot include access to services with distinct content. Depending on the nature of the service in question, it is possible that substantive equality will not result from the development and implementation of identical services for each language community. The content of the principle of linguistic equality in government services is not necessarily uniform. It must be defined in light of the nature and purpose of the service in question. […]

[54] Given the nature of the services at issue here, I therefore disagree with Létourneau J.A.'s view that the principle of linguistic equality does not entail a right to "access to equal regional economic development services" (para. 33), or that the respondents did not have a duty under Part IV of the OLA to "take the necessary steps to ensure that Francophones are considered equal partners with Anglophones" (para. 38) in the definition and provision of economic development services. With respect, it seems to me that Létourneau J.A. did not fully consider the nature and objectives of the program in question in so defining the scope of the duties resulting from the guarantee of linguistic equality. What matters is that the services provided be of equal quality in both languages. The analysis is necessarily comparative. Thus, insofar as North Simcoe, in accordance with the programs' objectives, made efforts to reach the linguistic majority community and involve that community in program development and implementation, it had a duty to do the same for the linguistic minority community.

2.5 Charlebois v. Saint John (City)

In Charlebois v. Saint John (City), 2005 SCC 74, Charlebois filed an application, in French, against the City of Saint John. The City, as well as the Attorney General of New Brunswick, moved to strike the application. The City's pleadings were filed in English. The Attorney General's pleadings were in French, but some citations were in English. Charlebois objected to receiving pleadings in English, asserting that Section 22 of New Brunswick's Official Languages Act ("OLA") obligated the City to proceed in the official language that he had chosen for the proceedings.

The majority of the Supreme Court, affirming the decisions of the courts below, held that Section 22 did not apply to municipalities. The City was not required to adopt the language chosen by Charlebois because the word "institution" in Section 22, as defined in Section 1 of the OLA, did not include municipalities. The obligations relating to municipalities under the OLA were more limited and specific. The majority emphasized that the liberal and purposive interpretive approach to language rights cannot override the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation.

Justice Bastarache, writing on behalf of the dissenting justices, criticized the majority's approach as being overly formalistic and inconsistent with the rules of interpretation applicable to language rights. He opined that Section 22 of the OLA did apply to municipalities, and that any internal inconsistencies in the OLA should be reconciled in a way that furthers the protection of minority rights, consistent with Section 16(3) of the Charter. In his view, general obligations in the OLA should apply broadly unless clear exceptions are provided.

Charlebois v. Saint John (City)*, 2005 SCC 74, [2005] 3 SCR 563

The judgment of McLachlin C.J. and Major, Fish, Abella and Charron JJ. was delivered by

CHARRON J. —

1 The issue on this appeal is whether the City of Saint John is obliged to use, in any oral or written pleadings or any process issuing from a court, the official language chosen by the appellant Mario Charlebois in the civil proceedings brought by him against the City. Section 22 of the Official Languages Act, S.N.B. 2002, c. O-0.5 ("OLA"), imposes such a duty on "Her Majesty in right of the Province or an institution" who is a party to the civil proceedings. The issue turns on whether or not the word "institution" in s. 22 and defined under s. 1 of the OLA includes municipalities. Both courts below have concluded that it does not and that, consequently, s. 22 does not apply to the City of Saint John. I agree with that conclusion and would dismiss the appeal.

13 In its preamble, the OLA proclaims the purposes of the Act are expressly tied to the language guarantees and obligations enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. There is no dispute that the OLA is the province's legislative response to its obligations under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in relation to institutional bilingualism in New Brunswick. […]

14 In Charlebois v. Moncton, Mr. Charlebois, the same litigant as in this case, challenged the validity of a municipal by-law which was enacted only in English. The specific question before the New Brunswick Court of Appeal was whether s. 18(2) of the Charter included municipal by-laws. On a remedial and purposive reading of the Charter language guarantees, the court held that it was appropriate to include municipal by-laws in the province of New Brunswick's constitutional obligation to enact its statutes in both English and French. In the course of its analysis on this question, the court also expressed its opinion that municipalities are "institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick" within the meaning of s. 16(2) of the Charter. By way of remedy, the court declared the unilingual by-laws invalid but suspended the effect of the declaration of invalidity for one year to enable the City of Moncton and the Government of New Brunswick to comply with the constitutional obligations set out in the court's reasons. The court also provided some guidance on how the province may choose to meet its obligations. It stated as follows, at paras. 127-28:

> In the context of this case, I believe that a declaration of invalidity subject to a temporary suspension of the effect of the declaration provides the City of Moncton and the provincial government with the flexibility necessary to develop an appropriate solution that will ensure that the appellant's rights under subsection 18(2) are realized. In this regard, this Court would be loathe to interfere with and impose standards on the legislature. It is obvious that the government has a choice in the institutional means by which its obligations can be met. For example, the exhaustive inquiry of the task force on official languages in New Brunswick (Towards Equality of Official Languages in New Brunswick, at pages 337-84) dealt with the linguistic composition of the population of New Brunswick municipalities. The report acknowledged that a possible approach that would meet the constitutional obligation of the principle of equality of official languages might be to implement a language policy whereby municipal services would be available in both official languages only where numbers warrant. This is a quantitative approach in which certain municipalities might be declared bilingual on the basis of a percentage of the population representing an official language minority. The percentage would have to be determined by the legislature.
> In this connection, it should be remembered that section 1 of the Charter allows restrictions of Charter rights only by such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. Under this general limitation, the legislature can strike a balance or achieve a compromise between the exercise of a guaranteed right and the safeguarding of society's best interests. However, while certain limits imposed on the exercise of the right guaranteed under subsection 18(2) may be justifiable, this provision creates a requirement of legislative bilingualism that cannot be reduced to unilingualism or a bilingualism that is left to the discretion of municipal councils. This would amount to a denial of the constitutional language right guaranteed by subsection 18(2). Moreover, by implication, the bilingualism requirement in regard to municipal by-laws extends to the process of enactment.

15 Bastarache J. finds that it would have been more appropriate for the New Brunswick Court of Appeal in this case "to take a positive stance and see whether it was necessary to limit the scope of the newly defined term in light of the difficulties posed by the drafting of the OLA" (para. 32 (emphasis added)). I disagree. First, it is noteworthy that Charlebois v. Moncton dealt with s. 18(2) of the Charter; hence, the court's finding that municipalities are "institutions" for the purpose of s. 16(2) is obiter dictum. The question as to whether municipalities are institutions within the meaning of s. 16(2) has never been determined by this Court, it is not before us on this appeal, and I express no opinion on whether or not this interpretation is correct. Second, it is also noteworthy that the province's constitutional obligations, even as defined in Charlebois v. Moncton, do not mandate a single specific solution. As aptly noted by the court in the above-noted excerpt, there is room for flexibility. The current OLA is the province's legislative response to its constitutional obligations. It would be inappropriate to pre-empt the analysis with a blanket presumption of Charter consistency. Daigle J.A. therefore was quite correct in pursuing the analysis. This brings us back to the question of statutory interpretation that occupies us: what approach did the province of New Brunswick adopt in respect of its municipalities to meet its constitutional obligations?

23 In my respectful view, the approach advocated by Mr. Charlebois and the AJEFNB, and adopted by Bastarache J., exceeds the scope of this Court's decision in R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 768. This Court in Beaulac held that a liberal and purposive approach to the interpretation of constitutional language guarantees and statutory language rights should be adopted in all cases. I take no issue with this principle; however, as Bastarache J. acknowledges (at para. 40), this does not mean that the ordinary rules of statutory interpretation have no place. In this case, it is particularly important to keep in mind the proper limits of Charter values as an interpretative tool. In Bell ExpressVu Limited Partnership v. Rex, [2002] 2 SCR 559, 2002 SCC 42, Iacobucci J., writing for a unanimous court, firmly reiterated that > to the extent this Court has recognized a "Charter values" interpretive principle, such principle can only receive application in circumstances of genuine ambiguity, i.e., where a statutory provision is subject to differing, but equally plausible, interpretations. [Emphasis in original; para. 62.]

24 In the context of this case, resorting to this tool exemplifies how its misuse can effectively pre-empt the judicial review of the constitutional validity of the statutory provision. It risks distorting the Legislature's intent and depriving it of the opportunity to justify any breach, if so found, as a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. In this respect, Daigle J.A. properly instructed himself and rightly found, at para. 58, that the contextual and purposive analysis of the OLA "removed all ambiguity surrounding the meaning of the word 'institution'". Absent any remaining ambiguity, Charter values have no role to play.

25 For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

2.6 Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2019 FC 1102

Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2019 FC 1102 involved another application by Michel and Lynda Thibodeau in which they sought a remedy under the Official Languages Act ("OLA") for alleged violations of their language rights by Air Canada. They argued that Air Canada violated their language rights by using unilingual English signage and making less detailed boarding announcements in French. Despite Air Canada acknowledging some violations and paying damages, the Thibodeaus sought a declaration, formal apology, and additional remedies, arguing the violations were systemic.

The Federal Court ruled that Air Canada's practices violated the OLA and ordered an apology and damages. However, it declined to issue a mandatory order or punitive damages, as it did not find a systemic issue. The Commissioner of Official Languages of Canada intervened, emphasizing the principle of "substantive equality" and supporting the Court's authority to grant remedies under the OLA.

Thibodeau v. Air Canada*, 2019 FC 1102

> [40] As the Commissioner notes, the equality of the official languages has four components. Section 16 of the Charter and section 2 of the Act provide for the equality of status between French and English, as well as the equality of the rights and privileges with regard to their use. Equality of access and of quality arise from the decision in Beaulac, which describes the nature of language obligations by stating that " substantive equality is the correct norm to apply in Canadian law" and that there must be "equal access to services of equal quality for members of both official language communities in Canada" (Beaulac at paragraph 22).
> [41] The decision in DesRochers reinforces the language obligations of institutions. It defines the nature and scope of the principle of language equality in communications and the provision of services under section 20 of the Charter and Part IV of the Act. More specifically, the Supreme Court defines the scope of the notion of "services of equal quality" and states from the outset that "[s]ubstantive equality, as opposed to formal equality, is to be the norm" (DesRochers at paragraph 31).

[48] Therefore, with regard to using only the word ”exit”, I cannot agree with Air Canada’s argument that this is an acceptable word in French to designate an exit or way out. It seems clear that this word is used in a theatrical context to designate someone who is exiting the stage. Air Canada refers to the Grand Robert de la langue française, the Dictionnaire de français Larousse and the Multidictionnaire de la langue française, but none of those dictionaries refer to the word ”exit” as meaning a physical exit, in the sense of a way out. The testimony of Ms. Dugas did not convince me that the word ”exit” is universally recognized in French to designate an exit or way out. Moreover, paragraph 525.811(g) of the Airworthiness Manual, which Air Canada cites in its memorandum, describes the English terms in French. Therefore, it is not clear that this paragraph supports Air Canada’s position because: (1) it permits the use of the word ”exit” in the legend and not on the signage itself; (2) Parliament deemed it relevant to specify, in the French version, that the word ”exit” is equivalent to ”issue” in French, which does not support the position that the word ”exit” is universally recognized in French; and (3) the Airworthiness Manual sets out airworthiness standards, whereas the Act imposes language obligations.

[49] With respect to the words ”exit” and ”sortie”, I am of the opinion that the difference in the size of the characters suggests an inequality in the status of the two official languages. While Air Canada relies on the decision in DesRochers to argue that the service was rendered in both languages and that that is sufficient, the problem is not related to the quality of the service, but rather to the equality in status, which is recognized by section 16 of the Charter and section 2 of the Act.

[50] The difference in the size of the characters is not necessary to ensure substantive equality, and it seems rather obvious that a difference in the size of characters tends to affirm the predominance of one language over another.

[51] Similarly, the difference in the size of characters in the words ”warning” and ”avis” suggests an inequality in the status of French and English, which violates section 16 of the Charter and section 2 of the Act. Displaying the word ”warning” in larger characters than the word ” avis” tends to affirm the predominance of the English language.

[52] I cannot agree with Air Canada’s argument that the engraving of only the word ”lift” would not be subject to the requirements of the Act because it is the initiative of the manufacturer. Air Canada has no authority as to whether such a communication is subject to the Act.

[53] The engraving of the word ”lift” is a communication from Air Canada to its passengers and, being unilingual, it violates the requirements of the Act. If Air Canada displays this word, it must also display the French equivalent.

[54] It is not disputed that the English announcement contains more information than the French announcement. The service provided is clearly not identical, and this distinction between the two languages cannot be justified by the noble objective of ensuring substantive equality (École Rose-des-vents at paragraph 33; DesRochers at paragraph 51).

[55] Consequently, I conclude that Air Canada violated its language obligations with respect to the four issues raised.

2.7 The Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada et al. v. La Société de l’Acadie du Nouveau-Brunswick and The Attorney General for New Brunswick

In The Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada et al. v. La Société de l’Acadie du Nouveau-Brunswick and The Attorney General for New Brunswick, 2024 NBCA 70, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal addressed the constitutional language obligations of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick. The Société de l’Acadie du Nouveau-Brunswick (the “SANB”) challenged the appointment of Brenda Murphy, a unilingual English speaker, to the position, arguing that it violated Sections 16(2), 16.1(2), and 20(2) of the Charter, which pertain to the equality of English and French in New Brunswick.

At first instance, the applications judge agreed with the SANB. She found that the Lieutenant Governor, as the Crown’s representative in a constitutionally bilingual province, must be able to fulfill official and ceremonial duties in both official languages to uphold the constitutional principle of substantive equality between English and French speaking communities in New Brunswick. The applications judge concluded that appointing a unilingual English speaker was inconsistent with the Charter.

The Court of Appeal overturned that decision. It held that while the Charter guarantees institutional bilingualism – meaning that government services and institutions must be able to operate in both official languages – it does not impose a personal bilingualism requirement on individual officer holders such as the Lieutenant Governor. The Court of Appeal emphasized that constitutional language rights protect the public’s ability to receive services in either official language, not the linguistic abilities of individual officials. On February 27, 2025, the Supreme Court granted the SANB’s application for leave to appeal.

The Right Honourable Prime Minister of Canada et al. v. La Société de l’Acadie du Nouveau-Brunswick and The Attorney General for New Brunswick*, 2024 NBCA 70

[8] On December 3, 2019, the Société de l’Acadie du Nouveau-Brunswick filed an application with the Court of Queen’s Bench of New Brunswick challenging the appointment on the grounds that the appointment of a unilingual individual to the office of Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick violated the constitutional guarantees respecting official languages that apply in New Brunswick. In its application, the SANB sought, inter alia, declaratory relief pertaining to the language rights guaranteed by ss. 16(2), 18(2) and 20(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a declaration quashing the Prime Minister’s advice to the Governor General recommending Ms. Murphy’s appointment, and a declaration that the Order in Council appointing her was unlawful and of no force and effect.

[15] The Attorney General of New Brunswick argues that ss. 16(2), 16.1(1) and (2), 18(2) and 20(2) of the Charter do not require personal bilingualism and that the application judge’s finding that the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick must be bilingual is untenable in law.

[48] Canada argues there is nothing in ss. 16(2), 16.1, 18(2) and 20(2) of the Charter that requires the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick to be fluent in both official languages of the province. It submits the SANB has suggested that these provisions as a whole create a unique state bilingualism regime in New Brunswick that gives rise to a constitutional obligation that the Lieutenant Governor be bilingual. It submits the judge accepted SANB’s argument and treated these provisions indiscriminately to derive a new language obligation, namely the personal bilingualism of the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick.

[50] Subsections 16(2) and 20(2) are the two constitutional provisions that impose institutional language obligations on all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick. Canada argues that, even if ss. 16(2) and 20(2) apply to the institution of the Lieutenant Governor as a component of the “legislature” and the “government of New Brunswick,” their wording does not support a finding that they require the holder of this office to be bilingual. Canada submits that, as derived from the specific wording of these provisions, the obligation to implement language rights is directed at institution rather than individual, indicating that the person holding office is distinct from the institution he or she represents.

[52] The SANB argues the only interpretation of ss. 16(2), 16.1, 18(2) and 20(2) that is consistent with the principles of constitutional interpretation that apply to language rights leads to the conclusion the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick must be bilingual. It submits that, according to Canada, institutional bilingualism applies to the interpretation of all relevant provisions and is based on the notion entertained by Canada of an institutional language obligation or institutional bilingualism.

(b*) Subsection 16(2)*

[96] Subsection 16(2) of the Charter is to New Brunswick what s. 16(1) is to the federal government. Subsection 16(2) provides that "English and French […] have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick" (emphasis added). The dispute before this Court brings to light two conflicting theories respecting the interpretation of this provision. While some argue that s. 16(2) is a purely symbolic provision, others consider it to confer substantive rights. These two theories are summarized as follows in Les droits linguistiques au Canada:

> [TRANSLATION]
> […] According to the first theory, this provision would be purely declaratory in nature. The supporters of this theory argue that this section 16 is purely symbolic, a declaratory provision that cannot be implemented, a sort of preamble to the rule governing the interpretation of sections 17 to 22 of the Charter. According to the supporters of the second theory, this section has a specific meaning capable of supporting a claim for relief if the stated equality is not achieved. Section 16 would therefore also impose obligations on governments. […] [Footnote omitted; at p. 520]

[106] On its face, applying an approach that consists of giving the wording of s. 16(2) a broad, liberal and purposive interpretation that is consistent with the protection and development of Canada's official linguistic communities, one does not automatically arrive at an interpretation that would impose on the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick the obligation to be fluent in both official languages.

[107] If a constitutional requirement of personal bilingualism were to apply to the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick as a result of likening the office to one of the "institutions" to which s. 16(2) (or s. 20(2)) extends, we would need to ask ourselves how to distinguish the individuals heading these other institutions so that these individuals would not be subject to this requirement, while protecting the framework of institutional bilingualism. The judge bases her answer on the distinction she makes between the Lieutenant Governor and certain elected representatives such as the Premier and the Ministers, noting that they are elected by the citizens (at para. 47). However, this response does not deal with other individuals, such as the Chief Justice of New Brunswick and the Attorney General of New Brunswick, who also personify institutions. We will not deal with that question today. With all due respect, ss. 16(2) and 20(2) apply to "institutions" without making the distinction made by the judge. In Charlebois v. Saint John (City), Charron J., writing for the majority, stated as follows:

> In its preamble, the [Official Languages Act, S.N.B. 2002, c. O-0.5] proclaims the purposes of the Act are expressly tied to the language guarantees and obligations enshrined in the Canadian Constitution. There is no dispute that the OLA is the province's legislative response to its obligations under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in relation to institutional bilingualism in New Brunswick. […] [Emphasis added; para. 13]

She continued her analysis by reproducing, in part, ss. 16 to 20 of the Charter, thereby clearly establishing that these provisions create institutional obligations rather than personal obligations.

[111] In our view, the use of the words "in" and "use" in s. 16(2) indicates that the purpose is to establish an equality of status as well as equal rights and privileges with respect to the use of the official languages within institutions. By giving these words their ordinary and grammatical meaning, we note that the provision deals with the actions to be taken within an institution and not with the bilingualism of a particular individual. In our view, the use of the words "in" and "use" suggests that the purpose is to grant equality of status to the English and French languages in their use within institutions. In other words, it refers to the actions that are to be taken within institutions and does not require that any one person be bilingual.

[112] Even if we assume that the institution of Lieutenant Governor cannot be completely separated from the individual that embodies it, it is difficult to interpret the wording of s. 16(2) as requiring the personal bilingualism of the Lieutenant Governor, because this provision establishes equality of status and equal rights and privileges with respect to the "use" of English and French "in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick." The use of both official languages "in" the institution that is the Lieutenant Governor does not depend on the personal language skills of the Lieutenant Governor. The failure of a Lieutenant Governor to be fluent in both official languages does not violate the equality of status and the equal rights and privileges with respect to their use within the institution.

[146] Subsection 16(2) establishes equality of status, rights and privileges with respect to the "use" of English and French "in all institutions of the legislature and government of New Brunswick." The use of both official languages "in" the institution pertaining to the Lieutenant Governor is not dependent upon the personal linguistic capabilities of that individual. The appointment of a unilingual Lieutenant Governor in New Brunswick does not violate s. 16(2).

2.8 Girouard v. Canada (Attorney General)

In Girouard v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 FCA 129, the Federal Court of Appeal upheld the dismissal of Justice Michel Girouard's application for judicial review of the Canadian Judicial Council's ("CJC") recommendation for his removal from the Superior Court of Quebec. Girouard argued that his language rights under Section 16(1) of the Charter were violated during the CJC's inquiry, specifically regarding access to untranslated documents. The Court found that Section 16(1) does not confer substantive language rights but serves a declaratory or interpretive purpose. It concluded that Girouard's right to communicate in his official language of choice was respected, and the procedural fairness requirements were met.

Girouard v. Canada (Attorney General),* 2020 FCA 129, leave to appeal to SCC ref'd 39379 (25 February 2021)

> [5] After carefully reviewing the case and considering all of the arguments put forward by counsel for Justice Girouard challenging that judgment, I am of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed. In my view, the Federal Court did not err in finding that the Council's decision to recommend Justice Girouard's removal was reasonable. Moreover, I find that there was no breach of the principles of procedural fairness and that Justice Girouard was given full opportunity to be heard and to make submissions. Although it might have been desirable for certain portions of the transcript of the hearings before the second Inquiry Committee to have been translated, I nonetheless find that Justice Girouard was not prejudiced by this and that it would not be appropriate to set aside the Council's decision on that ground, as I will explain later.
> E. Were the appellant's language rights respected?
> [101] The appellant recognizes that section 133 of the C.A., 1867, sections 14 and 19 of the Charter and sections 14 to 16 of the Official Languages Act do not apply to the Council because it is not a court within the meaning of those provisions. In any event, Justice Girouard was given the opportunity to argue his case and testify in the official language of his choice, and those provisions were therefore respected. The appellant also acknowledges that he cannot avail himself of section 20 of the Charter and section 22 of the Official Languages Act because the language rights guaranteed by those statutes in the delivery of public services do not apply here.
> [102] The only argument the appellant put forward before us is based on subsection 16(1) of the Charter, under which French and English " have equality of status and equal rights and privileges as to their use in all institutions of the Parliament and government of Canada." According to Justice Girouard, this Court should recognize that this provision confers substantive rights and can fill the gaps of the other provisions guaranteeing language rights in the Charter.
> [103] In my view, this argument is erroneous, and, moreover, the appellant did not cite any decisions in support of his claim. Subsection 16(1) of the Charter is a provision that is declaratory or interpretive in nature, and it is not for this Court to change the state of the law on this issue. In any event, the equality of status and equal rights and privileges for both official languages enshrined in that provision have been completely respected, and the appellant's right to communicate with the second Inquiry Committee and the Council in the official language of his choice was in no way fettered. What the appellant is claiming is the right to be understood by the decision maker in the language of his choice. As the Supreme Court noted in Société des Acadiens v. Association of Parents, 1986 CanLII 66 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 549, at page 580, (1986), 27 D.L.R. (4th) 406 and MacDonald v. City of Montreal, 1986 CanLII 65 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 460, at pages 500–501, (1986), 27 D.L.R. (4th) 321, this right does not fall within the ambit of section 16 of the Charter but rather within the procedural safeguards. Contrary to the arguments of counsel for the appellant, this aspect of the aforementioned judgments was not rejected by the Supreme Court at paragraph 41 of R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 768, (1999), 173 D.L.R. (4th) 193. It is one thing to say that language rights must be interpreted "purposively, in a manner consistent with the preservation and development of official language communities in Canada" (at paragraph 25); it is another to use subsection 16(1) to add rights and fill what could be perceived as gaps in the range of the rights protected at sections 16 to 23 of the Charter.
> [104] For these reasons, I agree with the Federal Court that the appellant's language rights were not violated.

3 Section 23 of the Charter

Section 23 of the Charter grants a defined category of Canadian citizens the right to have their children receive instruction in one of the two official languages where it is the minority language:

> Language of instruction
> 23 (1) Citizens of Canada
> (a) whose first language learned and still understood is that of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province in which they reside, or
> (b) who have received their primary school instruction in Canada in English or French and reside in a province where the language in which they received that instruction is the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of the province, > have the right to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in that language in that province.
> Continuity of language instruction
> (2) Citizens of Canada of whom any child has received or is receiving primary or secondary school instruction in English or French in Canada, have the right to have all their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the same language.
>
> Application where numbers warrant
> (3) The right of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or French linguistic minority population of a province
> (a) applies wherever in the province the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient to warrant the provision to them out of public funds of minority language instruction; and
> (b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority language educational facilities provided out of public funds.

3.1 Guiding questions

- Who are the rights holders under Section 23?
    - What are the three categories?
- Does Section 23 have an internal limit?
    - What is it?
- Is the right to instruction in minority language educational facilities limited to a right to a distinct physical structure?
    - If not, what else does it include?
- What are the objectives of Section 23?
- What is the framework that the Supreme Court established in Mahe?
- How did the Supreme Court expand on or clarify the Mahe framework in Conseil scolaire (2020)?

- What is the test used to assess the quality of instruction provided to official language minorities, as established in Rose-des-vents?
    - Does the test vary with the number of minority language students?

3.2 Mahe v. Alberta

In Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 342, the appellants claimed that their rights under Section 23 were not satisfied by the existing educational system in Edmonton. They brought an action against the province seeking, inter alia declarations that: (i) there was a sufficient number of children of the French linguistic minority in the Edmonton area to warrant publicly-funded French language instruction and facilities pursuant to Section 23 , and (ii) the rights granted pursuant to that section entitled the appellants to have their children educated in facilities equivalent to those provided to English speaking children, and to be granted powers equal to those granted to the parents of such children.

At the heart of the appeal was the claim that the phrase “minority language educational facilities” referred to in Section 23(3)(b) includes administration by distinct school boards. The Court found that where the numbers warrant, Section 23 confers upon minority language parents a right to management and control over the educational facilities in which their children are taught. Where the number of Section 23 students does not warrant granting an independent school board (the maximum level of management and control), but is significant enough to warrant a higher level of rights and services, it may be sufficient to require linguistic minority representation on an existing school board.

The Court found that there were sufficient numbers of students in the Edmonton area to justify the creation of an independent school. However, the number of students were insufficient to require the establishment of an independent Francophone school board. Accordingly, the Court found that minority language parents should enjoy the right to representation on existing school boards and an appropriate degree of management and control. The Court directed the province to enact legislation consistent with Section 23.

(1) The purpose of s. 23

The general purpose of s. 23 is clear: it is to preserve and promote the two official languages of Canada, and their respective cultures, by ensuring that each language flourishes, as far as possible, in provinces where it is not spoken by the majority of the population. The section aims at achieving this goal by granting minority language educational rights to minority language parents throughout Canada.

My reference to cultures is significant: it is based on the fact that any broad guarantee of language rights, especially in the context of education, cannot be separated from a concern for the culture associated with the language. Language is more than a mere means of communication, it is part and parcel of the identity and culture of the people speaking it. It is the means by which individuals understand themselves and the world around them. …

A further important aspect of the purpose of s. 23 is the role of the section as a remedial provision. It was designed to remedy an existing problem in Canada, and hence to alter the status quo. As Kerans J.A. succinctly put it, “the very existence of the section implies the inadequacy of the present regime” (p. 534). The remedial nature of s. 23 was clearly acknowledged by this Court in the Attorney General of Quebec v. Quebec Association of Protestant School Boards, 1984 CanLII 32 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 66, at p. 79:

> The special provisions of s. 23 of the Charter make it a unique set of constitutional provisions, quite peculiar to Canada.
> This set of constitutional provisions was not enacted by the framers in a vacuum. When it was adopted, the framers knew, and clearly had in mind the regimes governing the Anglophone and Francophone linguistic minorities in various provinces in Canada so far as the language of instruction was concerned. They also had in mind the history of these regimes, both earlier ones such as Regulation 17, which for a time limited instruction in French in the separate schools of Ontario . . . as well as more recent ones such as Bill 101 and the legislation which preceded it in Quebec. Rightly or wrongly, -- and it is not for the courts to decide, -- the framers of the Constitution manifestly regarded as inadequate some -- and perhaps all -- of the regimes in force at the time the Charter was enacted, and their intention was to remedy the perceived defects of these regimes by uniform corrective measures, namely those contained in s. 23 of the Charter, which were at the same time given the status of a constitutional guarantee. [Emphasis added.]

See also Lavoie v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General) (1989), 1989 CanLII 5221 (NS CA), 91 N.S.R. (2d) 184 (N.S.C.A.), at p. 193.

In my view the appellants are fully justified in submitting that “history reveals that s. 23 was designed to correct, on a national scale, the progressive erosion of minority official language groups and to give effect to the concept of the ’equal partnership’ of the two official language groups in the context of education.”

(2) The Context of s. 23(3)(b): An Overview of s. 23

The proper way of interpreting s. 23, in my opinion, is to view the section as providing a general right to minority language instruction. Paragraphs (a) and (b) of subs. (3) qualify this general right: para. (a) adds that the right to instruction is only guaranteed where the “number of children” warrants, while para. (b) further qualifies the general right to instruction by adding that where numbers warrant it includes a right to “minority language educational facilities”. In my view, subs. (3)(b) is included in order to indicate the upper range of possible institutional requirements which may be mandated by s. 23 (the government may, of course, provide more than the minimum required by s. 23).

Another way of expressing the above interpretation of s. 23 is to say that s. 23 should be viewed as encompassing a “sliding scale” of requirement, with subs. (3)(b) indicating the upper level of this range and the term “instruction” in subs. (3)(a) indicating the lower level. The idea of a sliding scale is simply that s. 23 guarantees whatever type and level of rights and services is appropriate in order to provide minority language instruction for the particular number of students involved.

The sliding scale approach can be contrasted with that which views s. 23 as only encompassing two rights -- one with respect to instruction and one with respect to facilities -- each providing a certain level of services appropriate for one of two numerical thresholds. On this interpretation of s. 23, which could be called the "separate rights" approach, a specified number of s. 23 students would trigger a particular level of instruction, while a greater, specified number of students would require, in addition, a particular level of minority language educational facilities. Where the number of students fell between the two threshold numbers, only the lower level of instruction would be required.

There are outer limits to the sliding scale of s. 23. In general, s. 23 may not require that anything be done in situations where there are a small number of minority language students. There is little that governments can be required to do, for instance, in the case of a solitary, isolated minority language student. Section 23 requires, at a minimum, that "instruction" take place in the minority language: if there are too few students to justify a programme which qualifies as "minority language instruction", then s. 23 will not require any programmes be put in place. However, the question of what is the "minimum" programme which could constitute "instruction", and the further question of how many students might be required in order to warrant such a programme, are not at issue in this appeal and I will not be addressing them. The question at issue here concerns only the "upper level" of the possible range of requirements under s. 23 -- that is, the requirements where there are a relatively large number of s. 23 students.

(4) Management and Control -- The Text of s. 23(3)(b)

In my view, the words of s. 23(3)(b) are consistent with and supportive of the conclusion that s. 23 mandates, where the numbers warrant, a measure of management and control. Consider, first, the words of subs. (3)(b) in the context of the entire section. Instruction must take place somewhere and accordingly the right to "instruction" includes an implicit right to be instructed in facilities. If the term "minority language educational facilities" is not viewed as encompassing a degree of management and control, then there would not appear to be any purpose in including it in s. 23. This common sense conclusion militates against interpreting "facilities" as a reference to physical structures. Indeed, once the sliding scale approach is accepted it becomes unnecessary to focus too intently upon the word "facilities". Rather, the text of s. 23 supports viewing the entire term "minority language educational facilities" as setting out an upper level of management and control.

I recognize that the English text of subs. (3)(b) is perhaps ambiguous: the phrase "minority language educational facilities" could either mean the facilities of the minority, or the facilities for the minority. The French text, however, is clearer. …

23. . . .

(3) Le droit . . .

b) comprend, lorsque le nombre de ces enfants le justifie, le droit de les faire instruire dans des établissements d'enseignement de la minorité linguistique financés sur les fonds publics. [Emphasis added.]

The underlined phrase in the French text -- which utilizes the possessive "de la" -- is more strongly suggestive than the English text that the facilities belong to the minority and hence that a measure of management and control should go to the linguistic minority in respect of educational facilities.

(5) Management and Control -- The Purpose of s. 23

The foregoing textual analysis of s. 23(3)(b) is strongly supported by a consideration of the overall purpose of s. 23. That purpose, as discussed earlier, is to preserve and promote minority language and culture throughout Canada. In my view, it is essential, in order to further this purpose, that, where the numbers warrant, minority language parents possess a measure of management and control over the educational facilities in which their children are taught. Such management and control is vital to ensure that their language and culture flourish. It is necessary because a variety of management issues in education, e.g., curricula, hiring, expenditures, can affect linguistic and cultural concerns. I think it incontrovertible that the health and survival of the minority language and culture can be affected in subtle but important ways by decisions relating to these issues. To give but one example, most decisions pertaining to curricula clearly have an influence on the language and culture of the minority students.

Furthermore, as the historical context in which s. 23 was enacted suggests, minority language groups cannot always rely upon the majority to take account of all of their linguistic and cultural concerns. Such neglect is not necessarily intentional: the majority cannot be expected to understand and appreciate all of the diverse ways in which educational practices may influence the language and culture of the minority. In commenting on various setbacks experienced by the Francophone minority in Ontario, the Court of Appeal of that province noted that "[l]ack of meaningful participation in management and control of local school boards by the Francophone minority made these events possible" (Reference Re Education Act of Ontario, supra, at p. 531). A similar observation was made by the Prince Edward Island Court of Appeal in Reference Re Minority Language Educational Rights (P.E.I.), supra, at p. 259:

It would be foolhardy to assume that Parliament intended to . . . leave the sole control of the program development and delivery with the English majority. If such were the case, a majority language group could soon wreak havoc upon the rights of the minority and could soon render such a right worthless.

I agree with the sentiments expressed in these statements. If section 23 is to remedy past injustices and ensure that they are not repeated in the future, it is important that minority language groups have a measure of control over the minority language facilities and instruction.

(6) The Meaning of the Phrase "Management and Control"

Section 23 clearly encompasses a right to management and control. On its own, however, the phrase "management and control" is imprecise and requires further specification. This can be accomplished by considering what type of management and control is needed in order to fulfill the purpose of s. 23. …

In some circumstances an independent Francophone school board is necessary to meet the purpose of s. 23. However, where the number of students enrolled in minority schools is relatively small, the ability of an independent board to fulfill this purpose may be reduced and other approaches may be appropriate whereby the minority is able to identify with the school but has the benefit of participating in a larger organization through representation and a certain exclusive authority within the majority school board. Under these circumstances, such an arrangement avoids the isolation of an independent school district from the physical resources which the majority school district enjoys and facilitates the sharing of resources with the majority board, something which can be crucial for smaller minority schools. By virtue of having a larger student population, it can be expected that the majority board would have greater access to new educational developments and resources. Where the number of s. 23 students is not sufficiently large, a complete isolation of the minority schools would tend to frustrate the purpose of s. 23 because, in the long run, it would contribute to a decline in the status of the minority language group and its educational facilities. Graduates of the minority schools would be less well-prepared (thus hindering career opportunities for the minority) and potential students would be disinclined to enter minority language schools.

…What is essential, however, to satisfy that purpose is that the minority language group have control over those aspects of education which pertain to or have an effect upon their language and culture. This degree of control can be achieved to a substantial extent by guaranteeing representation of the minority on a shared school board and by giving these representatives exclusive control over all of the aspects of minority education which pertain to linguistic and cultural concerns.

In my view, the measure of management and control required by s. 23 of the Charter may, depending on the numbers of students to be served, warrant an independent school board. Where numbers do not warrant granting this maximum level of management and control, however, they may nonetheless be sufficient to require linguistic minority representation on an existing school board. In this latter case:

(1) The representation of the linguistic minority on local boards or other public authorities which administer minority language instruction or facilities should be guaranteed;

(2) The number of minority language representatives on the board should be, at a minimum, proportional to the number of minority language students in the school district, i.e., the number of minority language students for whom the board is responsible;

(3) The minority language representatives should have exclusive authority to make decisions relating to the minority language instruction and facilities, including:

(a) expenditures of funds provided for such instruction and facilities;

(b) appointment and direction of those responsible for the administration of such instruction and facilities;

(c) establishment of programs of instruction;

(d) recruitment and assignment of teachers and other personnel; and

(e) making of agreements for education and services for minority language pupils.

(8) The "Numbers Warrant" Provision

What is being considered when a court addresses the "numbers warrant" question -- existing demand, potential demand, or something else? The appellants' position was that the existing demand for Francophone services is not a reliable indicator of demand because the demand for any service will to some extent follow the provision of that service. The respondent, on the other hand, argued that the courts cannot simply use the total number of potential s. 23 students as a gauge, since it is highly unlikely that all of these students will take advantage of a proposed service. There is some force to both of these arguments; accordingly, the approach I have taken mediates between the concerns which they raise. In my view, the relevant figure for s. 23 purposes is the number of persons who will eventually take advantage of the contemplated programme or facility. It will normally be impossible to know this figure exactly, yet it can be roughly estimated by considering the parameters within which it must fall -- the known demand for the service and the total number of persons who potentially could take advantage of the service.

The numbers warrant provision requires, in general, that two factors be taken into account in determining what s. 23 demands: (1) the services appropriate, in pedagogical terms, for the numbers of students involved; and (2) the cost of the contemplated services. The first, pedagogical requirements, recognizes that a threshold number of students is required before certain programmes or facilities can operate effectively. …

Cost, the second factor, is not usually explicitly taken into account in determining whether or not an individual is to be accorded a right under the Charter. In the case of s. 23, however, such a consideration is mandated. Section 23 does not, like some other provisions, create an absolute right. Rather, it grants a right which must be subject to financial constraints, for it is financially impractical to accord to every group of minority language students, no matter how small, the same services which a large group of s. 23 students are accorded. I note, however, that in most cases pedagogical requirements will prevent the imposition of unrealistic financial demands upon the state. Moreover, the remedial nature of s. 23 suggests that pedagogical considerations will have more weight than financial requirements in determining whether numbers warrant.

3.3 Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island

In Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island, 2000 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2000] 1 SCR 3, the appellants made a request to the Commission scolaire de langue française de l'Île-du-Prince-Édouard (the "Commission scolaire") for the establishment of a French school for grades one to six in the Summerside region of Prince Edward Island for the 1995 to 1996 school year.

Thirty-four students pre-registered in January 1995. Twenty-nine of those children were from Summerside, four were from Miscouche, and one was from Kensington. Based on the results, the Commission scolaire made a conditional offer of French first language instruction in Summerside. The Minister of Education refused to approve this offer and offered instead to maintain transportation services to a French school in Abram's Village, which is located 28 kilometers from Summerside, 20 kilometers from Miscouche, and 40 kilometers from Kensington. To find a solution, the Commission scolaire proposed to provide French language instruction in Summerside through another school. The Minister also rejected this proposal.

The appellants initiated proceedings against the province seeking a declaration that they had the right to have their children receive French first language instruction in a facility in Summerside.

The Supreme Court of Canada held that the number of children that could be assembled for instruction in Summerside was sufficient to warrant the provision of French language instruction out of public funds and that the parents of those children had the right to receive that service in the Summerside area.

Arsenault-Cameron v. Prince Edward Island*, 2000 SCC 1 (CanLII), [2000] 1 SCR 3

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Major and Bastarache JJ. —

27 As this Court recently observed in R. v. Beaulac, 1999 CanLII 684 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 768, at para. 24, the fact that constitutional language rights resulted from a political compromise is not unique to language rights and does not affect their scope. Like other provisions of the Charter, s. 23 has a remedial aspect; see Mahe, supra, at p. 364. It is therefore important to understand the historical and social context of the situation to be redressed, including the reasons why the system of education was not responsive to the actual needs of the official language minority in 1982 and why it may still not be responsive today. It is clearly necessary to take into account the importance of language and culture in the context of instruction as well as the importance of official language minority schools to the development of the official language community when examining the actions of the government in dealing with the request for services in Summerside. As this Court recently explained in Beaulac, at para. 25, "[l]anguage rights must in all cases be interpreted purposively, in a manner consistent with the preservation and development of official language communities in Canada" (emphasis in original). A purposive interpretation of s. 23 rights is based on the true purpose of redressing past injustices and providing the official language minority with equal access to high quality education in its own language, in circumstances where community development will be enhanced.

28 In light of the importance of this remedial purpose, the trial judge properly began his reasons by explaining the historical background of the official language minority in Prince Edward Island and in Summerside, as had the court in Reference re: School Act, supra. From this review, the trial judge was prepared to decide whether the s. 23 rights had been infringed.

29 The historical and contextual analysis is important for courts in determining whether a government has failed to meet its s. 23 obligations. It should also guide governmental actors in reaching appropriate decisions to give effect to s. 23. In this case, the Minister was of the view that it would be more beneficial for the children to receive their instruction in a homogeneous school located at the heart of the Acadian community. Insisting on the individual right to instruction, the Minister appeared to ignore the linguistic and cultural assimilation of the Francophone community in Summerside, thereby restricting the collective right of the parents of the school children. ...

B. The Notion of Equality

31 As discussed above, the object of s. 23 is remedial. It is not meant to reinforce the status quo by adopting a formal vision of equality that would focus on treating the majority and minority official language groups alike; see Mahe, supra, at p. 378. The use of objective standards, which assess the needs of minority language children primarily by reference to the pedagogical needs of majority language children, does not take into account the special requirements of the s. 23 rights holders. The Minister and the Appeal Division inappropriately emphasized the impact of three elements on equality between the two linguistic communities: duration of the bus rides, size of schools and quality of education. Section 23 is premised on the fact that substantive equality requires that official language minorities be treated differently, if necessary, according to their particular circumstances and needs, in order to provide them with a standard of education equivalent to that of the official language majority. Before examining this issue in more detail, however, it is important to deal briefly with the "numbers warrant" analysis which was discussed in both the trial and appeal divisions.

C. The Determination of Numbers Under Section 23

32 The province has a duty to provide official minority language instruction where the numbers warrant. As Dickson C.J. pointed out in Mahe, supra, the "sliding scale" approach to s. 23 means that the numbers standard will have to be worked out by examining the particular facts of each case that comes before the courts. The relevant number is the number who will potentially take advantage of the service, which can be roughly estimated as being somewhere between the known demand and the total number of persons who could potentially take advantage of the service; see Mahe, at p. 384. Lamer C.J. defined the number in Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.) in this way, at p. 850: "the number of persons who can eventually be expected to take advantage of a given programme or facility".

33 The Appeal Division erred in adopting a different and more restrictive standard. Instead of considering the demographic data to assess potential demand, McQuaid J.A. focussed solely on actual demand (at p. 350):

> The survey conducted by the respondents, which is the best evidence of potential demand for the instruction, revealed that 49 children in grades one to six would take advantage of instruction in the French language in the Summerside area in the 1996-97 school year, with the addition of 15 over the next two years….

The trial judge had found, based on current enrolment of s. 23 children aged 6 to 11, as well as demographic projections for children up to 5 years of age in the area, that the relevant number of children who could potentially take advantage of French language education was 306. This was a projection covering a ten-year period. In this case, the appropriate estimate of the potential number of students who might attend the facility in any given year is 155, the uncontested number projected by the expert witness, Ms. Angéline Martel. Therefore, according to the approach advocated in Mahe, the relevant number would be between 49 and 155….

34 Although the plaintiffs must establish their rights under s. 23, including the sufficiency of numbers, it is not possible for minority right holders to obtain more accurate and complete information with regard to enrolment projections than what was made available here, nor is it reasonable to impose more on them. The province has the duty to actively promote educational services in the minority language and to assist in determining potential demand. This duty is in effect enshrined in the School Act at s. 7(1)(b) and recognized in Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), supra, at pp. 862-63. The province cannot avoid its constitutional duty by citing insufficient proof of numbers, especially if it is not prepared to conduct its own studies or to obtain and present other evidence of known and potential demand.

D. The Determination of What the Numbers Warrant Under Section 23

38 Mahe explains that the numbers warrant provision requires that two factors be considered in determining the demands of s. 23. First, it requires a determination of the appropriate services, in pedagogical terms, for the number of students involved. Then it requires an examination of the costs of the contemplated service. In addressing the first concern, pedagogical requirements, it is important to consider the value of linguistic minority education as part of the determination of the services appropriate for the number of students. The pedagogical requirements established to address the needs of the majority language students cannot be used to trump cultural and linguistic concerns appropriate for the minority language students.

41 The second factor to be considered is the cost of the contemplated services. At the hearing before this Court, the province explained that costs were not a consideration in the Minister's decision. This is consistent with the fact that the Minister had maintained at trial that the Board's plan to provide French language instruction locally to such a small group was not pedagogically viable. The trial judge concluded that the Minister had simply decided that a facility in Summerside was not a "practical option". This conclusion, as mentioned earlier, was based on the availability of space at École Évangéline (pp. 336-37). It can therefore be assumed for the purpose of analysis that the second factor in assessing sufficient numbers in Mahe, i.e. costs, is not at issue in this case.

E. The Role of the French Language Board

43 …. Where a minority language board has been established in furtherance of s. 23, it is up to the board, as it represents the minority official language community, to decide what is more appropriate from a cultural and linguistic perspective. The principal role of the Minister is to develop institutional structures and specific regulations and policies to deal with the unique blend of linguistic dynamics that has developed in the province (for example, see Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), supra, at p. 863).

51 … We would instead affirm the conclusion of Hallett J. in the similar case of Lavoie v. Nova Scotia (Attorney-General) (1988), 1988 CanLII 5674 (NS SC), 50 D.L.R. (4th) 405 (N.S.S.C.T.D.), at p. 415, where he said: "Sending elementary school children on bus trips of 30 to 45 minutes each way when it is not necessary, is unreasonable if appropriate priorities are kept in mind." The question is also, whose priorities? Obviously, it has to be the priorities of the minority community because the determination of such priorities lies at the core of the management and control conferred on the minority language rights holders and their legitimate representatives by s. 23. Of course, these priorities must be determined and exercised in light of the role of the Minister.

F. The Role of the Minister

52 This is not to say that the Minister's role is not important. In Mahe, supra, Dickson C.J. accepted, at p. 393, that "the government should have the widest possible discretion in selecting the institutional means by which its s. 23 obligations are to be met". This discretion is however subject to the positive obligation on government to alter or develop "major institutional structures" to effectively ensure the provision of minority language instruction and facilities and parental control on the scale warranted by the relevant number of children of the minority (see Mahe, at p. 365).

G. The Requirement for Local Facilities

56 The duty to promote French language and culture in Prince Edward Island cannot mean that the government can impose the concentration of all minority language students in one predominantly French region. Both a textual and purposive analysis of s. 23(3) of the Charter indicate that when the numbers of s. 23 children in a specific area warrant the provision of minority language instruction, that instruction should take place in facilities located in the community where those children reside. Section 23(3)(a) states that the right to minority language instruction applies "wherever in the province" (emphasis added) the number of children is sufficient to warrant such instruction. The words "wherever in the province" link the right to instruction to the geographic place where the conditions for the exercise of that right are present. As noted in Reference re: School Act, supra, at p. 516, the term "wherever in the province" when construed in relation to the numbers warrant test "will limit a particular area within the province in which minority language education will have to be provided".

57 Some have expressed concern that geographical boundaries are difficult to define, that they may change and that educational authorities should not be restricted in their ability to define the area for the reasonable assembly of students. …. The determination of the appropriate area for the provision of minority language instruction and facilities is something that has to be decided in each case with due consideration to the numbers involved as well as all of the important factors specific to the case. It is however important to note that the s. 23 standard is not neutral but favours community development. This is why Dickson C.J. stated in Mahe, supra, at p. 386: "In some instances it may be necessary to provide transportation for students, or perhaps to provide boarding, in order to meet the requirements of s. 23" (emphasis added). …

62 In particular, the Appeal Division failed to take into account the minority language children's specific circumstances and the importance of the French Language Board in deciding matters that affect the linguistic and cultural development of the community. The French Language Board has the exclusive power to decide how it will provide services to the minority in the Summerside area, within the legitimate constraints set out by the province, its decisions also being subject to the rights of individual beneficiaries under s. 23.

3.4 Doucet Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education)

In Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 SCR 3, French-speaking parents from five Nova Scotian communities sought timely construction of homogeneous French-language schools for their children.

The trial judge found that the province had long failed to prioritize its Section 23 obligations and that delay risked assimilation. The trial judge ordered the government to use its "best efforts" to open the schools by specified dates, and retained jurisdiction to receive periodic progress reports, pursuant to Subsection 24(1). The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judgment.

The Supreme Court restored the trial judge's decision. Emphasizing the remedial, urgent, and future-oriented character of Section 23 rights and the broad wording of Subsection 24(1), the Court held that superior courts may craft innovative remedies, including ongoing supervisory orders, when needed to make constitutional rights meaningful.

Doucet Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education)*, 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 SCR 3

The judgment of the majority of the Court was delivered by Iacobucci and Arbour JJ. —

1 This appeal involves the nature of remedies available under s. 24(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms for the realization of the minority language education rights protected by s. 23 of the Charter. The specific issue is whether a trial judge may, after ordering that a provincial government use its best efforts to build French-language school facilities by given dates, retain jurisdiction to hear reports on the progress of those efforts. The issue of broader and ongoing judicial involvement in the administration of public institutions is not before the Court in this case.

28 The minority language education rights protected under s. 23 of the Charter are unique. They are distinctively Canadian, representing "a linchpin in this nation's commitment to the values of bilingualism and biculturalism" (Mahe, supra, at p. 350). Section 23 places positive obligations on governments to mobilize resources and enact legislation for the development of major institutional structures (Mahe, at p. 389). While the rights are granted to individuals (Schools Reference, at p. 865), they apply only if the "numbers warrant", and the specific programs or facilities that the government is required to provide varies depending on the number of students who can potentially be expected to participate (Mahe, supra, at p. 366; Schools Reference, supra, at p. 850; Arsenault-Cameron, supra, at para. 38). This requirement gives the exercise of minority language education rights a unique collective aspect even though the rights are granted to individuals.

29 Another distinctive feature of the right in s. 23 is that the "numbers warrant" requirement leaves minority language education rights particularly vulnerable to government delay or inaction. For every school year that governments do not meet their obligations under s. 23, there is an increased likelihood of assimilation which carries the risk that numbers might cease to "warrant". Thus, particular entitlements afforded under s. 23 can be suspended, for so long as the numbers cease to warrant, by the very cultural erosion against which s. 23 was designed to guard. In practical, though not legal, terms, such suspensions may well be permanent. If delay is tolerated, governments could potentially avoid the duties imposed upon them by s. 23 through their own failure to implement the rights vigilantly. The affirmative promise contained in s. 23 of the Charter and the critical need for timely compliance will sometimes require courts to order affirmative remedies to guarantee that language rights are meaningfully, and therefore necessarily promptly, protected [citations ommitted].

30 To put the matter of judicial remedies in greater context, it is useful to reflect briefly on the role of courts in the enforcement of our laws.

43 A remedy under s. 24(1) is available where there is some government action, beyond the enactment of an unconstitutional statute or provision, that infringes a person's Charter rights (see Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 679, at pp. 719-20). In the present appeal, the difficulty does not lie with the legislation: no provision or omission in the Education Act prevented the government from providing minority language education as required by the Constitution Act, 1982. On the contrary, the Education Act, as amended in 1996, establishes a French-language school board to provide homogeneous French-language education to children of s. 23 entitled parents. Neither is the problem rooted in any particular government action; rather, the problem was inaction on the part of the provincial government, particularly its failure to mobilize resources to provide school facilities in a timely fashion, as required by s. 23 of the Charter. Section 24(1) is available to remedy this failure.

87 Section 24(1) of the Charter requires that courts issue effective, responsive remedies that guarantee full and meaningful protection of Charter rights and freedoms. The meaningful protection of Charter rights, and in particular the enforcement of s. 23 rights, may in some cases require the introduction of novel remedies. A superior court may craft any remedy that it considers appropriate and just in the circumstances. In doing so, courts should be mindful of their roles as constitutional arbiters and the limits of their institutional capacities. Reviewing courts, for their part, must show considerable deference to trial judges' choice of remedy, and should refrain from using hindsight to perfect a remedy. A reviewing court should only interfere where the trial judge has committed an error of law or principle.

88 The remedy crafted by LeBlanc J. meaningfully vindicated the rights of the appellant parents by encouraging the Province's prompt construction of school facilities, without drawing the court outside its proper role. The Court of Appeal erred in wrongfully interfering with and striking down the portion of LeBlanc J.'s order in which he retained jurisdiction to hear progress reports on the status of the Province's efforts in providing school facilities by the required dates.

3.5 Solski (Tutor of) v. Quebec (Attorney General)

Solski (Tutor of) v. Quebec (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 14 (CanLII), [2005] 1 SCR 201, involved section 73(2) of the Quebec Charter of the French Language, which allowed children to enter the English-language school system only if the "major part" of their previous schooling in Canada was in English. Parents whose children had received part of their education in English outside Quebec argued that the Minister's strict interpretation (i.e., that "major part" means more than 50 percent of either elementary or secondary schooling) violated Section 23(2)).

The Supreme Court of Canada held that the Minister's quantitative test was unconstitutional. The Court wrote that "major part" must be understood qualitatively. Decision makers must undertake a holistic, contextual assessment of the child's genuine educational experience, considering time spent in each language, the stage of education at which the choice of language of instruction was made, program availability, and learning needs. This qualitative assessment determines whether there is evidence of a real commitment to minority-language schooling.

In the result, the Court read down Subsection 73(2) to mean "a significant part", which cured the defect in the Minister's interpretation of the provision.

Solski (Tutor of) v. Quebec (Attorney General)*, 2005 SCC 14, [2005] 1 SCR 201

The judgment was delivered by the Court –

24 The main question in this appeal is to decide the proper interpretation of s. 23(2) of the Canadian Charter and whether the CFL's "major part" threshold is consistent with this constitutional requirement. …

25 Section 73(2) of the CFL establishes the eligibility requirements for a child to receive instruction in English in Quebec. It provides:

> 73. The following children, at the request of one of their parents, may receive instruction in English: . . .
> (2) a child whose father or mother is a Canadian citizen and who has received or is receiving elementary or secondary instruction in English in Canada, and the brothers and sisters of that child, provided that that instruction constitutes the major part of the elementary or secondary instruction received by the child in Canada.

The Minister has interpreted the "major part" requirement in a disjunctive and strictly mathematical manner. The Minister will consider either the child's primary school attendance or the child's secondary school attendance, but will not consider them cumulatively (appellant's record, vol. III, at pp. 400-435). Further, the Minister will determine eligibility solely on the basis of the number of months spent in each language….

27 We cannot accept that the strict mathematical approach is consistent with s. 23(2) of the Canadian Charter. Section 23(2) is designed to identify a single category of beneficiaries. It must receive a broad interpretation consistent with the constitutional objective of protecting minority language communities.

28 Based on the proper interpretation of s. 23(2), which we will set out in detail below, we are of the view that in order to comply with this constitutional provision, the CFL's "major part" requirement must involve a qualitative rather than a strict quantitative assessment of the child's educational experience through which it is determined if a significant part, though not necessarily the majority, of his or her instruction, considered cumulatively, was in the minority language. Indeed, the past and present educational experience of the child is the best indicator of genuine commitment to a minority language education. The focus of the assessment is both subjective, in that it is necessary to examine all of the circumstances of the child, and objective, in that the Minister, the ATQ and the courts must determine whether the admission of a particular child is, in light of his or her personal circumstances and educational experience, past and present, consistent with the general purposes of s. 23(2) and, in particular, the need to protect, preserve and reinforce the minority language community by granting individual rights to a specific category of beneficiaries.

(1) Scope of Section 23(2)

38 A number of factors, including those mentioned above (i.e., the time spent in each program, at what stage of education the choice of language of instruction was made, what programs are or were available, and whether learning disabilities or other difficulties exist), may be considered in the course of a qualitative assessment of a child's overall educational experience in order to determine if it is sufficient to meet the requirements of s. 23(2).

(2) Factors to Consider

(a) How Much Time Was Spent in Each Program?

39 Although it is not a conclusive factor, it is nonetheless important to consider the time a child spent in the minority language program, cumulatively, at the primary and secondary levels, where relevant, when determining if that child's total educational experience is sufficient to meet the requirements of s. 23(2). This factor is relevant because the more time a child spends in such a program, the easier it is to find a true intention to adopt that language of instruction over the other; this factor is a marker of an existing affiliation with the official minority language community. It cannot be enough, in light of the objectives of s. 23, for a child to be registered for a few weeks or a few months in a given program to conclude that he or she qualifies for admission, with his or her siblings, in the minority language programs of Quebec.

40 Since the time spent by a child in the minority language education program may evidence a more significant connection with the language of the minority than that of the majority, the purpose of s. 23(2) to provide continuity of minority language education rights, to accommodate mobility and to ensure family unity is engaged. The question of whether there is a sufficient connection with the language of the minority must therefore be viewed from both a subjective and an objective perspective. Subjectively, do the circumstances show an intention to adopt the minority language as the language of instruction? Objectively, do the educational experiences and choices to date support such a connection?

41 That being said, it is important to remember that s. 23(2) of the Canadian Charter does not specify a minimum amount of time a child must spend in a minority language education program before his or her educational experience can qualify under s. 23(2), nor does it require that the time spent in the minority language education program be greater than the time spent in the majority language education program. Thus, this factor must not be applied in a strict, mathematical matter. Nor should it be considered in isolation. Rather, the time spent in each program must be considered in concert with the other factors discussed below and always in light of the purposes of s. 23(2).

(b) At What Stage of Education Was the Choice of Language of Instruction Made?

42 Another factor that may be relevant in determining whether a child's educational experience is sufficient to meet the requirements of s. 23(2) will be the stage of education at which the choice of language of instruction was made. It may be important to consider what education came first. In some cases the initial choice of language will be a better indicator of intention to permanently adopt one language rather than the other; in other cases it will not. The reasons behind any change may be revealing. Choosing the minority language as one enters secondary school might also evidence a stronger, more informed commitment to that language than if the choice was made during the early, primary years of schooling, given the more stringent academic demands associated with secondary education, as well as its impact on post-secondary education opportunities. As stated above, once a commitment to instruction in the minority language is shown on the facts of the case, the purpose of s. 23(2) to provide continuity of minority language education rights, to accommodate mobility and to ensure family unity is engaged.

(c) What Programs Are or Were Available?

43 In determining whether a child's education experience is sufficient to meet the requirements of s. 23(2), it is also important to consider the past and present availability of minority language education programs. For example, if a child completes grade 1 in the minority language but then spends the next three school years in an area where minority language is unavailable, it is clear that he or she has not received the "major part" of his or her education to date in the minority language under the restrictive interpretation of s. 73 of the CFL. However, under a purposive interpretation of s. 23(2) of the Canadian Charter, the time spent in the majority language educational system, when a minority language school was unavailable, ought not to be considered as indicative of a choice to adopt the majority language as the child's language of instruction. One aspect of the purpose of s. 23(2) is to accommodate mobility. This purpose would be frustrated and parents and their children, as well as the minority language community as a whole, would be unjustly penalized if children were barred from continuing with instruction in the minority language once they moved to an area in which it was available again simply because they temporarily lived in an area in which it was unavailable. There again it is obvious that the situation of students moving to Quebec will be unique, the availability of instruction in English in the territories and other provinces being unquestioned. As mentioned earlier, the geographical context is always important.

44 It is also important to consider the availability of minority language education programs from a socio-cultural perspective and with respect to the circumstances of each child. When considering the situation in a province other than Quebec, one must remember that a child could have been sent to a majority language school by assimilated parents who then, in the latter stages of the child's educational experience, have changed their minds and sent the child to a minority language school in order to help the child reintegrate the minority language community and adopt its culture. It may be that the choice to enrol the child in a minority language education program, even though the program may have been available throughout the child's educational experience, did not become a viable choice until the child's assimilated parents decided to help their child reforge a connection with the minority language community and culture. In this context, the remedial purpose of s. 23(2) is engaged, and, as stated above, this right must be interpreted so as to facilitate the reintegration of children who have been isolated from the cultural community the minority school is designed to protect and develop. In these circumstances, it would be beneficial and in line with the purpose of s. 23(2) for the siblings of this child to receive minority language education. All this is to emphasize that the application of s. 23 must take into account the very real differences between the situation of the minority language community in Quebec and the minority language communities in the territories and other provinces. Therefore, while certain educational experiences may not qualify for minority language education under the "major part" requirement, defined qualitatively, in s. 73 of the CFL, this does not mean that they could not qualify under other provincial minority language education legislative schemes, which are necessarily responsive to their own province's unique historical and social context.

(d) Do Learning Disabilities or Other Difficulties Exist?

45 Another relevant factor in some circumstances will be whether the child is having difficulty learning in one language as compared to the other. For example, if a child completes grades 1, 2 and 3 in the minority language and then switches to the majority language for grades 4, 5 and 6 and experiences learning difficulties in that language, it would be unacceptably punitive to force that child to continue in the majority language, especially when it may be that the child has made a more significant connection with the minority language community, given the fact that he or she finds that instruction in that language is more conducive to learning.

46 A "major part" requirement, defined qualitatively, i.e., as meaning a "significant part", as described in para. 28 is a valid qualifier for "parcours scolaire" or "educational experience". The "major part" requirement must make room for the nuances and subjectivity required to determine whether the admission of a particular child, considering his or her personal circumstances, is consistent with the objectives of s. 23 and the specific need to protect and reinforce the minority language community.

47 The purpose of the s. 23(2) criteria is to guarantee continuity of minority language education rights and mobility to children being educated in one of the official languages. If children are in a recognized education program regularly and legally, they will in most instances be able to continue their education in the same language. This is consistent with the wording of s. 23(2) and the purposes of protecting and preserving the minority-language community, as well as with the reality that children properly enrolled in minority-language schools are entitled to a continuous learning experience and should not be uprooted and sent to majority-language schools. Uprooting would not be in the interest of the minority language community or of the child. Nevertheless, a qualitative assessment of the situation to determine whether there is evidence of a genuine commitment to a minority language educational experience is warranted, with each province exercising its discretion in light of its particular circumstances, obligation to respect the objectives of s. 23, and educational policies.

48 The approach will be both subjective and objective. This does not imply an artificial "snapshot" approach. Provincial governments are entitled to verify that registration and overall attendance in the program, the past and present educational experience of the child, are consistent with participation in the class of beneficiaries defined in s. 23(2).

3.6 Association des parents de l'école Rose des vents v. British Columbia (Education)

In Association des parents de l'école Rose-des-vents v. British Columbia (Education), 2015 SCC 21, [2015] 2 SCR 139, l'école élémentaire Rose-des-vents was the only publicly-funded French-language elementary school for students living west of the Main Street in Vancouver. The school was established in 2001. By 2011, 344 students were enrolled; however, the school only had a nominal capacity of 215 students and an operating capacity of 199 students. It was a small school, with narrow hallways and no coat hooks or lockers. The washrooms were inadequate, the library was small, and only three of the classrooms met the recommended size. Further, of the 344 students, 293 were transported by bus as they did not live within the one kilometer "walk limit". By contrast, the English-language schools in the area were much larger, with much better facilities, and most of the students lived within one kilometer of the school.

The appellants filed a petition against the Province and the Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique. They alleged that the respondents had breached the parents' minority language education rights under Section 23 of the Charter.

The Supreme Court of Canada explained that Section 23 gives an official language minority the right to an education experience that is equivalent in quality to the experience provided to the majority.

The Court stated that the focus must be on substantive equivalence, not on formal equivalence. In other words, it is not enough that public spending per student is the same for the minority and the majority; the quality of the overall educational experience must be meaningfully similar to that of the experience provided to the majority. The Court held that substantive equivalence must be assessed from the perspective of a linguistic minority parent who has to choose between the minority and a majority language school. Courts must consider whether reasonable parents would be deterred from sending their children to a school of the official language minority because it is meaningfully inferior to an available majority language school.

The comparator group that will generally be appropriate for that assessment will be the neighbouring majority language schools that represent a realistic alternative for rights holders. The comparative exercise must be alive to the varied factors that reasonable parents use to assess equivalence. The exercise is contextual and holistic, accounting for not only physical facilities, but also quality of instruction, educational outcomes, extracurricular activities, and travel times, among other factors.

Issues of practicality or cost are not relevant to the inquiry into equivalence. Those issues may, however, be relevant at the breach justification and remedies stages of the analysis, under Sections 1 or 24, respectively.

In the result, the Supreme Court agreed with the petition judge that the disparity between the minority and majority language schools limited enrollment and contributed to assimilation.

Association des parents de l'école Rose des vents v. British Columbia (Education)*, 2015 SCC 21 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 139

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Karakatsanis J. —

[25] Section 23 is a remedial right that differs from many other Charter rights. The provision is an important marker of Canada's commitment to bilingualism, and to the bicultural founding character of this country. It imposes a constitutional duty on the provinces and territories to provide minority language education to children of s. 23 rights holders where numbers warrant. This commitment sets Canada apart among nations, as Justice Vickers of the Supreme Court of British Columbia explained in Assn. des Parents Francophones:

> From its genesis, Canada brings to the world a unique history and culture of cooperation and tolerance. It is rooted in the commitment of French and English people, who had earlier been separated by geography, a history of divisive disputes, language and culture, to live together, to work together and to share the resources of a new nation. Section 23 restates a fundamental part of that commitment relating to language and culture and acknowledges the vision and faith of our nation's pioneers. Our distinct place in the world's family of nations is dependent on governments honouring the commitment entered into more than two centuries ago which has been reaffirmed by this generation of Canadians through the enactment of particular provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. [para 24]

[26] Section 23 is concerned with the preservation of culture as well as language. As the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism noted, "[l]anguage and culture are not synonymous, but the vitality of the language is a necessary condition for the complete preservation of a culture" (Report of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, Book II, Education (1968), at p. 8). As this Court noted in Mahe v. Alberta, 1990 CanLII 133 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 342, at p. 362, "any broad guarantee of language rights, especially in the context of education, cannot be separated from a concern for the culture associated with the language. Language is more than a mere means of communication, it is part and parcel of the identity and culture of the people speaking it": see also M. Bastarache, "Education Rights of Provincial Official Language Minorities (Section 23)", in G.-A. Beaudoin and E. Ratushny, eds., The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2nd ed. 1989), 687, at p. 695.

[28] One distinctive feature of s. 23 is that it is particularly vulnerable to government inaction or delay. Delay in implementing this entitlement or in addressing s. 23 violations can result in assimilation and can undermine access to the right itself….

(2) "Numbers Warrant" and the "Sliding Scale" of Section 23 Rights

[29] The s. 23 right to equivalent educational facilities for minority language rights holders where numbers warrant provides a means to counteract the assimilation that occurs when the children of rights holders attend majority language schools. In Mahe, this Court explained that s. 23 guaranteed a "sliding scale" of minority language education rights (p. 366). At the upper limit of the sliding scale, numbers will warrant the provision of the highest level of services to the minority language community. In such cases, rights holders are entitled to full educational facilities that are distinct from, and equivalent to, those found in the schools of the majority language group (Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), 1993 CanLII 119 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 839, at pp. 854-55; Mahe, at p. 378). These facilities must be accessible and, where possible, located in the community where the children reside (Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 56). The upper threshold of the sliding scale can include separate minority language school boards (Mahe, at p. 374).

(3) What Is the Test for Equivalence?

[33] The focus in giving effect to s. 23 rights, then, should be on substantive equivalence, not on per capita costs and other markers of formal equivalence. In the present case, there is evidence that the CSF receives a 15% premium in its operational funding from the Province, as compared to other school boards in the province. Given economies of scale, higher per capita costs for a minority language board or school are not unexpected (Mahe, at p. 378). However, there is no particular per capita number that will satisfy the requirements of s. 23 in any given instance. Rather, what is paramount is that the educational experience of the children of s. 23 rights holders at the upper end of the sliding scale be of meaningfully similar quality to the educational experience of majority language students. As this Court noted in Arsenault-Cameron, "[s]ection 23 is premised on the fact that substantive equality requires that official language minorities be treated differently, if necessary, according to their particular circumstances and needs, in order to provide them with a standard of education equivalent to that of the official language majority" (para. 31).

(a) What Analytical Perspective Is Relevant in Assessing Equivalence?

[34] The first step in any s. 23 analysis is to determine the entitlement of the parents, who are the holders of the right. This requires assessing what level of service the number of rights holders in a given community warrants. In the present case, a court has previously determined, and the parties accept, that numbers warrant the highest level of French-language educational instruction and facilities, which necessarily includes an element of management and control for the rights holders. This being established, the issue in this case is how to determine whether the Parents have, in fact, been provided the substantive equivalence to which they are entitled.

(b) What Geographic Scope Is Relevant for the Assessment of Equivalence?

[37] If rights holders consider which school their child should attend, or whether to withdraw their child from a minority language school, they will look to nearby majority language schools as alternatives. It follows that the comparator group that will generally be appropriate for the assessment of substantive equivalence of a minority language school will be the neighbouring majority language schools that represent a realistic alternative for rights holders. To compare the facilities of a minority language school to facilities outside of the area would not realistically capture the choice available to rights holders, who cannot send their children to a school located across the province. Of course, the precise geographic scope of the comparator group, and the relative usefulness of this sort of comparison, will vary with the circumstances (Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 57).

(c) What Factors Are to Be Compared in Assessing Equivalence?

[39] Thus, the comparative exercise is contextual and holistic, accounting for not only physical facilities, but also quality of instruction, educational outcomes, extracurricular activities, and travel times, to name a few factors. Such an approach is similar to the way parents make decisions regarding their children's education. Of course, the extent to which any given factor will represent a live issue in assessing equivalence will be dictated by the circumstances of each case. The relevant factors are considered together in assessing whether the overall educational experience is inferior in a way that could discourage rights holders from enrolling their children in a minority language school.

(4) Is There a Role for Costs and Practicalities Within the Equivalence Test?

[50] To summarize, issues of costs and practicalities are considered in determining where a minority language community falls on the sliding scale of rights guaranteed under s. 23. Where the community is entitled to the highest level of educational services, on an equal footing with the majority language community, costs and practicalities will not be relevant to a determination of whether the rights holders are receiving the services to which they are entitled. It may be, however, that costs and practicalities will be relevant in attempts to justify a breach of s. 23, and in attempts to fashion an appropriate and just remedy for a breach.

3.7 Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie Britannique v. British Columbia

In Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, [2020] 1 SCR 678, the Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique brought a claim against the province. They argued, inter alia, that inadequate capital funding and small, scattered facilities breached Section 23.

The Supreme Court of Canada reversed the decisions below on the basis that they adopted an inordinately narrow interpretation of section 23 and its role in the Canadian constitutional order.

In its decision, the Supreme Court refined the framework in Mahe, where the Court explained that "situating a given number of students on the sliding scale requires that the analysis focus on (1) the services appropriate, in pedagogical terms, for the number of students involved; and (2) the cost of the contemplated services" (Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, at para. 52).

The Supreme Court explained that to determine where the situation falls on the sliding scale, the number of students who will avail themselves of the minority language education must first be established. Second, courts must consider whether the proposed school is appropriate considering pedagogy and costs. A comparative approach is to be used, asking whether the number of minority language students for a proposed school is comparable to the number of students at particular majority language schools in the province. A majority language school of comparable size to a proposed minority language school will yield a presumption that the minority language community is entitled to a homogenous school. The burden of proof is on the claimants at these two stages.

In exceptional cases, the province can rebut a presumptive entitlement to a homogenous school by showing on a balance of probabilities either that the majority language schools used as comparators are not appropriate for that purpose or that the school proposed by the minority is not appropriate from the standpoint of pedagogy or cost.

If the number of students is comparable, and the presumption has not been rebutted, the number is at the high end of the sliding scale and the minority is therefore entitled to have its children receive instruction in a homogeneous school. If that is not the case, other options exist, such as separate administrators, separate report cards, offerings of courses in the minority language, and even giving control over a certain portion of a school. In such a situation, the court must show deference to the level of services proposed by the minority language school board.

The Supreme Court also took the opportunity to address the unresolved issue of whether the approach developed in Rose-des-vents regarding the quality of education was applicable in the context of small minority schools whose size is not comparable to that of the majority language schools.

The Supreme Court explained that children of Section 23 rights holders must receive an educational experience that is substantively equivalent to the experience provided to the majority, regardless of the size of the school or program in question. The substantive equivalence test applies everywhere on the sliding scale. However, where a minority language school is not comparable in size to nearby majority language schools, a judge must consider whether reasonable parents who are aware of the inherent characteristics of small schools would be deterred from sending their children to a school of the official language minority because the educational experience there is meaningfully inferior to the experience at available majority language schools.

In the result, the Court ordered the province to provide new or improved schools in several communities and awarded Charter damages for under-funding of bus transportation.

Judgment of the majority delivered by The Chief Justice —

V. Analysis

A. What Is the Approach to Take in Order to Situate a Given Number of Students on the Sliding Scale?

[51] This appeal is an opportunity for the Court to clarify the approach to be taken in order to situate a given number of students on the sliding scale. The sliding scale, which serves to determine the level of services to which an official language minority is entitled, is used to decide whether the minority is entitled to a homogeneous school, to educational facilities shared with the majority or to another appropriate solution. It is also used to decide whether the minority is entitled to a separate school board. This Court has stated the principles the courts must apply in this exercise, but has never explained the approach that should be taken.

[52] In Mahe, this Court explained that situating a given number of students on the sliding scale requires that the analysis focus on "(1) the services appropriate, in pedagogical terms, for the number of students involved; and (2) the cost of the contemplated services" (p. 384). Obviously, however, given the remedial nature of s. 23, pedagogical requirements will have more weight than cost (p. 385). Mahe did not include an exhaustive definition of these two factors, but their scope can be established by reviewing the case law and terminology.

[53] To begin, the word "pedagogy" is defined as "the theory or principles of education; a method of teaching based on such a theory" (Oxford English Dictionary (online)). Similarly, the French word "pédagogie" is defined as [translation] "the whole of the methods used to educate children and adolescents" (Le Dictionnaire Larousse (online)). In Mahe, the Court, per Dickson C.J., stressed "that a threshold number of students is required before certain programmes or facilities can operate effectively" (p. 385). The Court has also referred, in a case in which it was asked to rule on the pedagogical needs factor, to a proposed school's ability to "mee[t] all curriculum requirements" (Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 39).

[54] Both the definition of "pedagogy" and the concerns expressed by the Court in the past show that this factor relates to the pedagogical viability of the official language minority's proposal. This factor is concerned with answering the following question: In light of the number of students at issue, will the level of services proposed by the minority make it possible to meet all curriculum requirements, that is, those related to the knowledge and skills the students must acquire while in school?

[57] To take the pedagogical and cost considerations discussed in Mahe into account, I propose that the following approach be taken in order to situate a given number of students on the sliding scale. This approach is designed to recognize the remedial nature of s. 23 "so as to give effect to the equal partnership of Canada's two official language groups in the context of education" (Rose-des-vents, at para. 27 (emphasis added), citing Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 26, Mahe, at p. 364). It is based on the premise that a homogeneous school, that is, a separate facility under the control of the official language minority, is warranted where such a school is available to a comparable number of majority language students.

(1) First Step: Establishing the Number of Students in Question

[58] The first step in situating the number of students in question on the sliding scale is to determine how many students will eventually avail themselves of the contemplated service. This is the starting point for the "numbers warrant" analysis. The burden of proof regarding the number of students who will eventually avail themselves of the service is on the claimants from the official language minority. To discharge it, the claimants must adduce evidence that would enable the court to rule on this issue. That evidence might include expert testimony, various statistical tools such as the census, and statistical models that take into account the demographics of the community in question, its geographical location and any other factor that might have an impact on the number of students.

[59] Long-term projections are necessary. As this Court noted in Mahe, "the relevant figure for s. 23 purposes is the number of persons who will eventually take advantage of the contemplated programme or facility" (p. 384). An approach based on a short-term projection of enrolment rather than on the number of students who will eventually avail themselves of the service would be contrary to s. 23 and to this Court's case law. The effect of such an approach, which might be said to be "temporal" in nature, would be to place on the minority the burden of asking the government for enhancements to the services provided to it each time the number of students reached a new level on the sliding scale and, if necessary, going to court to assert its rights in this regard. That would not be a desirable result. An approach focused on enrolment over the long term might limit the frequency with which such steps need to be taken.

(2) Second Step: Taking a Comparative Approach in Order to Determine Whether the School Contemplated by the Minority Is Appropriate from the Standpoint of Pedagogy and Cost

[61] At the second step, the court must determine whether the school or program proposed by the minority is appropriate from the standpoint of pedagogy and cost for the number of students in question. I favour a simple approach, that is, a comparative approach, which also has the advantage of limiting the need to resort to litigation.

[65] … a province-wide comparison is required.

[69] I thus find that the existence of majority language schools that serve a given number of students, regardless of where they are located in the province, supports a presumption that it is appropriate from the standpoint of pedagogy and cost to create a comparably sized school for the minority. The province can, however, rebut this presumption by showing on a balance of probabilities either that the majority language schools used as comparators are not appropriate for that purpose or that the school proposed by the minority is not appropriate from the standpoint of pedagogy or cost. I also wish to be clear that the claimants, who are responsible for identifying comparator schools, must endeavour to submit to the court a reasonable number of schools that, to the best of their knowledge, are appropriate comparators in light of the principles set out in these reasons. This will favour judicial economy by ensuring, for example, that courts and parties do not have to analyze hundreds of schools in detail.

[75] There are two possible ways for the province to rebut this presumption. It has the choice of arguing (1) that the comparator schools identified by the claimants are not appropriate comparators from the standpoint of pedagogy or cost, or (2) that the school contemplated by the minority does not meet the requirements from the standpoint of pedagogy or cost. I will explain these different possibilities.

[76] First, the province can show that the comparator school is not an appropriate comparator. To do so, it might establish that the school in question does not meet the requirements of the provincial curriculum. Here are some examples. A school that serves a student population with very particular needs — disabled students or students in a specialized arts program — is one in which the learning outcomes might justify its having a small number of students. Such schools have very particular educational plans, which explains their departure from the province's usual standards.

[80] Second, the province can show that the school contemplated by the minority is not appropriate. To do so, it might establish that the service in question would not suffice to achieve the requirements of the provincial curriculum. This can be shown by means of expert testimony or any other evidence the province considers relevant. If, for example, the province wants to show that there are too few students from the official language minority and that this would prevent the socialization objectives of the provincial curriculum from being achieved, it must explain precisely what the objectives of the curriculum are and how the number of students in question would not suffice to achieve them. The province is in the best position to do this, as the education ministry's experts are the people who develop the curriculum's standards. As well, it is the provincial education ministry that issues diplomas and ensures that schools meet academic standards. It is therefore entirely appropriate that the ministry be responsible for showing how, even if the contemplated service would be provided to a number of students comparable to the numbers in majority language schools, it would not suffice to satisfy the province's academic standards.

(3) Third Step: Determining the Level of Services That Must Be Provided

[84] At the third step, the level of services to be provided to the official language minority must be determined. If the court has found at the second step that the number of students is comparable and that the presumption has not been rebutted, that number is at the high end of the sliding scale and the minority is therefore entitled to have its children receive instruction in a homogeneous school

[85] If, on the other hand, the court has found at the second step that the number of minority language students is not comparable, the number then falls below the high end and a homogeneous school is therefore not required. In such circumstances, there is a range of services that can be provided to the minority. These services vary from the provision of certain courses in the minority language to control over a portion of a school shared with the majority. These different levels of services represent a variety of possibilities.

[87] At the lower levels of the sliding scale, it is obviously not possible to use the comparative approach I set out above in order to determine what is appropriate from the standpoint of pedagogy and cost. I reiterate that at this stage, the court will have found that the number of minority language students in question is not comparable to the numbers at majority language schools, even at the smallest of those schools. Given that the parties have not proposed a specific approach in this regard and that this case does not turn on such an approach, it would be premature to rule on this issue.

[88] I will simply say that, in such a context, governments must be deferential to the proposals made by the school board, and their decisions must be guided by pedagogical and financial considerations, as defined above. However, the cost issue will rarely be decisive, as the sharing of facilities obviously produces economies of scale. The focus must be on whether the contemplated service is able to meet the pedagogical requirements established by the province in a setting that is respectful of the minority's language and culture. This last factor, the need "to consider the value of linguistic minority education as part of the determination of the services appropriate for the number of students" (Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 38), is particularly important in cases in which the number of students in question falls in the lower levels of the sliding scale. Where a number of students falls at the high end of the scale and therefore warrants a separate facility, it goes without saying that the educational setting will be respectful of the minority's language and culture.

B. Does the Test Used to Assess the Quality of Instruction Provided to Official Language Minorities Vary With the Number of Minority Language Students?

[104] Section 23 gives an official language minority the right to an educational experience that is equivalent in quality to the experience provided to the majority. In Rose-des-vents, this Court discussed the proper approach for determining what constitutes instruction that is equivalent in quality in a case in which the number of minority language students was comparable to the numbers of students in local majority language schools.

[116] In short, the Rose-des-vents approach continues to apply where the number of students at a minority language school is comparable to the numbers of students attending nearby majority language schools. Where a minority language school is not comparable in size to nearby majority language schools, a judge must consider whether reasonable parents who are aware of the inherent characteristics of small schools would be deterred from sending their children to a school of the official language minority because the educational experience there is meaningfully inferior to the experience at available majority language schools.

3.8 Commission scolaire francophone des Territoires du Nord-Ouest v. Northwest Territories (Education, Culture and Employment), 2023 SCC 31

In Commission scolaire francophone des Territoires du Nord Ouest v. Northwest Territories (Education, Culture and Employment), 2023 SCC 31, five parents who did not meet the requirements under Section 23 applied to the Minister of Education of the Northwest Territories (the "Minister") for their children's admission to a French first language education program.

In each case, the Commission scolaire francophone des Territoires du Nord-Ouest recommended admission because it would promote the development of the Francophone community of the Northwest Territories. Despite that, the Minister denied each of the applications for admission on the ground that the non-rights holder parents did not meet the conditions established by the ministerial directive on enrolment in French first language programs, which created categories of eligible non-rights holders.

On judicial review, the Minister's decisions were quashed because they did not reflect a proportionate balancing of the protections conferred by section 23. That decision was reversed on appeal.

On further appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld the reviewing judge's ruling. In doing so, the Supreme Court provided authoritative guidance on applying the Doré/Loyola framework when administrative discretion affects minority-language education.

The Supreme Court explained that even if a discretionary decision does not infringe a Charter right granted by Section 23, that provision still has to be considered by administrative decision-makers if the Charter values underlying the provision are engaged by the discretionary decision.

The Minister failed to persuade the Court that the Minister identified the relevant Section 23 values and proportionately balanced them against statutory objectives. The decisions ignored the benefits of bolstering the Francophone community, misstated cost impacts, discounted the school board's expertise, and improperly assessed how the admission of the children would affect the consistency and fairness of the admissions process in the future. Such deficiencies rendered the decisions unreasonable.

In its decision, the Court also reaffirmed that Section 23 values are engaged even where the applicants are non-rights holders, because broadened enrollment can help preserve and develop minority language communities.

Commission scolaire francophone des Territoires du Nord-Ouest v. Northwest Territories (Education, Culture and Employment)*, 2023 SCC 31

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Côté J. —

[62] Here is where the essence of the parties' disagreement lies: the appellants submit that the impugned decisions engage the values underlying s. 23 of the Charter, whereas the respondent takes the opposite view. The respondent maintains that the protections afforded by s. 23 are not engaged because the appellant parents are not rights holders under this provision; as non-rights holders, they are unable to show that the right guaranteed by s. 23 was infringed by the Minister's decisions. In other words, the respondent argues that the Doré framework applies only in cases where an administrative decision directly infringes a right (R.F., at para. 57). According to the respondent, Charter values serve only to interpret the scope of the rights that reflect them (Loyola, at paras. 4 and 36).

[63] I note that it is not in dispute that no infringement of s. 23 can be established with respect to the appellant parents, as non-rights holders. The CSFTNO does, of course, represent the interests of rights holders and plays a fundamental role in managing and controlling minority language schools and in expressing their special needs (Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique, at para. 86; Arsenault-Cameron, at para. 44; Mahe, at pp. 373-80). However, it is not necessary to determine whether the CSFTNO, as a representative of rights holders, might itself enjoy the benefit of the s. 23 rights for the purposes of this case.

[64] Indeed, it has consistently been held that the Doré framework applies not only where an administrative decision directly infringes Charter rights but also in cases where it simply engages a value underlying one or more Charter rights, without limiting these rights (Doré, at paras. 35 et seq.; Loyola, at para. 4; Trinity Western University, at para. 57).

[65] This is the case because administrative decision makers have an obligation to consider the values relevant to the exercise of their discretion, in addition to respecting Charter rights. There can be no doubt about this, because "[t]he Constitution — both written and unwritten — dictates the limits of all state action" (Vavilov, at para. 56). As L'Heureux-Dubé J. clearly stated in Baker v. Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration), 1999 CanLII 699 (SCC), [1999] 2 SCR 817, a discretionary decision, to be reasonable, must be made in accordance with the "fundamental values of Canadian society" as reflected in the Charter (para. 56). Relying on this statement, Abella J. held in Doré that discretionary decisions must "always" take Charter values into consideration (para. 35 (emphasis in original))

[66] An administrative decision maker must consider the relevant values embodied in the Charter, which act as constraints on the exercise of the powers delegated to the decision maker. I refer in this regard to the considerations identified by this Court in Vavilov: ". . . a decision, to be reasonable, must be justified in relation to the constellation of law and facts that are relevant to the decision . . ." (para. 105). In practice, it will often be evident that a value must be considered, whether because of the nature of the governing statutory scheme (at para. 108), because the parties raised the value before the administrative decision maker (at paras. 127-28), or because of the link between the value and the matter under consideration (P. Daly, "The Doré Duty: Fundamental Rights in Public Administration" (2023), 101 Can. Bar Rev. 297, at p. 309). For example, it is obvious that the development of policies and the making of decisions that are likely to have an impact on a minority language educational environment require consideration of the values underlying s. 23 of the Charter (p. 309). A decision cannot be unreasonable because the decision maker failed to consider a Charter value that was not relevant for the purposes of its decision. However, if the decision maker takes a relevant value into account in its decision while opting to prioritize another objective, it must be concluded that the decision engages the Charter.

[67] Once the reviewing court has determined that the impugned administrative decision infringes Charter rights or limits the values underlying them, the court must, under the approach laid down in Doré, determine whether the decision is reasonable through an analysis of its proportionality. This involves assessing whether the exercise of discretion reflects a "proportionate balancing" of Charter rights and the values underlying them, on the one hand, with the statutory objectives in respect of which the discretion was granted, on the other (para. 57; Loyola, at paras. 37 and 39; Trinity Western University, at para. 58).

[68] The focus of judicial review is "on the decision actually made by the decision maker, including both the decision maker's reasoning process and the outcome" (Vavilov, at para. 83). As is the case for any other decision, the context constrains "what will be reasonable for an administrative decision maker to decide" when it exercises its discretion in a manner that limits Charter protections (para. 89; Loyola, at para. 41; Trinity Western University, at para. 81). To be reasonable, a decision must reflect the fact that the decision maker considered the Charter values that were relevant to the exercise of its discretion (E. Fox-Decent and A. Pless, "The Charter and Administrative Law: Substantive Review", in C. M. Flood and P. Daly, eds., Administrative Law in Context (4th ed. 2022), 399, at p. 410). The decision must also show that the decision maker "meaningfully" (Vavilov, at para. 128) addressed the Charter protections to "reflect" the impact that its decision may have on the concerned group or individual (para. 133).

[69] This means that when the decision maker gives precedence to the legislature's intention over Charter protections in order to achieve the statutory objectives, it must do so in a manner that is "proportionate to the resulting limitation on the Charter right" (Trinity Western University, at para. 82). A decision that has a "disproportionate impact" on Charter protections can in no way show that the decision maker meaningfully considered these protections or that its reasoning reflects the significant impact that the decision may have (para. 80). Such a decision is therefore unreasonable.

[78] Here, there is a clear link between s. 23 of the Charter and the Minister's decisions, because the decisions were likely to have an impact on a minority language educational environment….

[79] Section 23(3)(a) of the Charter guarantees certain categories of citizens the right to instruction in the minority official language where "the number of children of citizens who have such a right is sufficient". This Court has interpreted this constitutional provision as having three purposes: the right is "at once preventive, remedial and unifying" in nature (Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique, at para. 15). As the Court stated about the provision in Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique, "[i]t is intended not only to prevent the erosion of official language communities, but also to redress past injustices and promote the development of those communities" (para. 15).

[80] In practical terms, this means that the preservation and development of minority language communities are among the values underlying s. 23. Protection of the right to instruction in the minority official language, explicitly entrenched in the Constitution, is a reflection of these values, insofar as education is a means of realizing the societal ideal that they embody. These values require preserving and developing the vitality not only of the minority language, but also of the minority culture…..

[81] The admission of children of parents who are not rights holders under s. 23 of the Charter can have an impact on the preservation and development of minority language communities. In Gosselin, this Court pointed out that minority language schools must not become "centres of assimilation" by allowing the presence of children from the majority language community to end up swamping the children from the minority language community (para. 31). A few years later, in Yukon Francophone School Board, Education Area #23 v. Yukon (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 25, [2015] 2 SCR 282, this Court noted that, although the Yukon Francophone School Board had no authority to set admission criteria for children of non-rights holders because such authority had not been delegated to it, "nothing stops the Board from arguing that the Yukon's approach to admissions prevents the realization of s. 23's purpose" (para. 74).

[83] Thus, the decisions rendered by provincial and territorial governments regarding the admission of children of non-rights holder parents to minority language schools, even when they do not directly infringe the right guaranteed by s. 23, can nevertheless have a significant impact on the preservation and development of minority language communities. It follows that these values are always relevant when the government exercises such a discretion and that they must therefore be taken into account. For the purposes of this appeal, this means that the Minister was required to consider the values of preservation and development of minority language communities in exercising her discretion to decide whether to admit children of non-rights holder parents to the schools of the Francophone minority in the Northwest Territories.

Chapter 26: Enforcement of Rights

By Sonia Lawrence

"we are endowed with rights' slips off the legal tongue … 'we are endowed with remedies' has a more prosaic ring…"[105]

This Chapter considers the remedial provisions of the Constitution and the development of Canadian jurisprudence in the area of Charter remedies. Despite the former Chief Justice's recognition that remedies might be less exciting than rights,[106] this Chapter assumes a keen interest in remedies and a certain recognition that "we should look at rights and remedies as part of a single package".[107] As Kent Roach has written, "Rights without effective remedies are not just useless: they tell a false and legitimating story about the state of the world"[108] and so "any study of the Charter that does not include remedies will be radically incomplete"[109]. Understanding the right requires understanding the scope for remedy.[110]

1 Introduction

1.1 Remedies and Standing

1.1.1 R. v. Big M. Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] CanLII 69

39. Any accused, whether corporate or individual, may defend a criminal charge by arguing that the law under which the charge is brought is constitutionally invalid. Big M is urging that the law under which it has been charged is inconsistent with s. 2(a) of the Charter and by reason of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 , it is of no force or effect. [emphasis added]

40. Whether a corporation can enjoy, or exercise freedom of religion is therefore irrelevant.

1.2 Relationship between Sections 24 and 52

Constitutional remedies are provided in the text of the Constitution via section 52 and section 24. Their interpretation and application raise fundamental questions about the relationship between the courts in their zone of institutional competence and the appropriate role of the legislatures in theirs.

Section 52(1) is the supremacy clause, and it indicates that all laws inconsistent with the Constitution of Canada will have no force or effect. Courts are clearly empowered by the text to determine the consistency or inconsistency of the constitution,

> 52.(1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

In contrast, section 24(1) applies only to the Charter, not the rest of the Constitution. This remedial section allows Courts to remedy breaches of the Charter.

> 24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.
> (2) Where, in proceedings under section (1), a court concludes that evidence was obtained in a manner that infringed or denied any rights or freedoms guaranteed by this Charter, the evidence shall be excluded if it is established that, having regard to all circumstances, the admission of it in the proceedings would bring the administration of justice into disrepute.[111]

The differences between section 24(1) and section 52 of the Canadian Charter reflect their distinct functions and scopes. Section 52 applies to all laws that are inconsistent with the Constitution, and its focus is exclusively on laws—meaning it does not extend to actions or conduct. It considers the degree to which a law conflicts with the Charter, and if such inconsistency is found, the law is deemed "of no force and effect." This results in a remedy that applies to the law itself and can be pursued by anyone. Sections 52 and 24(1) are not mutually exclusive. The breadth of section 24(1) means that a court can offer both a section 52 remedy and a section 24(1) remedy in a particular case.

1.2.1 R. v. Big M. Drug Mart Ltd, [1985] CanLII 69

> 37. Section 24(1) sets out a remedy for individuals (whether real persons or artificial ones such as corporations) whose rights under the Charter have been infringed. It is not, however, the only recourse in the face of unconstitutional legislation. Where, as here, the challenge is based on the unconstitutionality of the legislation, recourse to s. 24 is unnecessary and the particular effect on the challenging party is irrelevant.
> 38. Section 52 sets out the fundamental principle of constitutional law that the Constitution is supreme. The undoubted corollary to be drawn from this principle is that no one can be convicted of an offence under an unconstitutional law. The respondent did not come to court voluntarily as an interested citizen asking for a prerogative declaration that a statute is unconstitutional. If it had been engaged in such "public interest litigation" it would have had to fulfill the status requirements laid down by this Court in the trilogy of "standing" cases (Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, 1974 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1975] 1 SCR 138, Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, 1975 CanLII 14 (SCC), [1976] 2 SCR 265, Minister of Justice of Canada v. Borowski, 1981 CanLII 34 (SCC), [1981] 2 SCR 575) but that was not the reason for its appearance in Court.

1.2.2 R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6 (CanLII), [2008] 1 SCR 96

> (3) The Remedial Scheme of the Charter
> [48] As I noted at the outset, remedies for breaches of the Charter are governed by s. 24(1) of the Charter and s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 .
> [49] When a law produces an unconstitutional effect, the usual remedy lies under s. 52(1), which provides that the law is of no force or effect to the extent that it is inconsistent with the Charter . A law may be inconsistent with the Charter either because of its purpose or its effect: R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985]1 SCR 295; R. v. Edwards Books and Art Ltd., 1986 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1986] 2 SCR 713. Section 52 does not create a personal remedy. A claimant who otherwise has standing can generally seek a declaration of invalidity under s. 52 on the grounds that a law has unconstitutional effects either in his own case or on third parties... .
> [50] Section 24(1), by contrast, is generally used as a remedy, not for unconstitutional laws, but for unconstitutional government acts committed under the authority of legal regimes which are accepted as fully constitutional... The acts of government agents acting under such regimes are not the necessary result or "effect" of the law, but of the government agent's applying a discretion conferred by the law in an unconstitutional manner. Section 52(1) is thus not applicable. The appropriate remedy lies under s. 24(1).
> [51] .... ss. 52(1) and 24(1) serve different remedial purposes. Section 52(1) provides a remedy for laws that violate Charter rights either in purpose or in effect. Section 24(1), by contrast, provides a remedy for government acts that violate Charter rights. It provides a personal remedy against unconstitutional government action and so, unlike s. 52(1), can be invoked only by a party alleging a violation of that party's own constitutional rights: Big M; R. v. Edwards, 1996 CanLII 255 (SCC), [1996] 1 SCR 128. ...
> [53] The jurisprudence of this Court allows a s. 24(1) remedy in connection with a s. 52(1) declaration of invalidity in unusual cases where additional s. 24(1) relief is necessary to provide the claimant with an effective remedy: R. v. Demers, [2004] 2 SCR 489, 2004 SCC 46. ....

1.2.3 Kent Roach, Dialogic remedies, International Journal of Constitutional Law, Volume 17, Issue 3, July 2019, Pages 860–883, https://doi.org/10.1093/icon/moz056

Roach argues that "[n]ew [remedial] models based on "dialogue" between courts and legislatures,….attempt to provide a role for courts in interpreting rights while allowing governments to engage in robust policymaking"

Students of remedy might find the following parts especially useful in setting the theoretical context for remedies as a zone of tension between the powers of courts and legislatures.

1. Introduction
2. The place of remedies in constitutional theory
3.6. The two-track approach applied to Canada's assisted dying case

1.2.4 Note: Interpretation as Charter Enforcement

R. v. Butler, 1992 CanLII 124 (SCC) illustrates the way that courts sometimes have to interpret complex pieces of legislation in order to begin the Charter analysis. In cases where the legislation is capable of a narrower, and more likely to be constitutional interpretation and a broader, more likely to violate the Charter interpretation, the court will choose the one which is constitutional at the outset, before embarking on the Charter analysis. This interpretive exercise occurs before the Charter analysis begins but is significant to the outcome of the Charter challenge. This approach is not remedial as such, but it is another tool the court can use to require constitutional compliance.

2 Remedies under section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982

2.1 General principles of section 52 Charter Remedies

Although the text of section 52 could be read to mean that once once inconsistency with the Constitution is established, the law is of no force and effect at all. However, caselaw reveals otherwise. Depending on the specifics of the inconsistency between the Constitution and the law in question, courts have engaged in the following remedial actions under section 52:

1. Declarations of invalidity: A full declaration of invalidity applying to the challenged provision or the challenged Act. Words and phrases like "of no force and effect", nullified, and "struck down" represent this kind of declaration.
2. Severance: Partial declarations of invalidity through severing parts of a challenged statute where only a part of the statute is determined to be invalid. The invalid part is struck down (declared invalid) and severed (cut) from the rest of the statute.
3. Reading in: Adding words to statutes to make them compliant with the Constitutio
4. Reading down: Reading down sees a court limiting the reach of legislation by declaring it to be of no force and effect to a precisely defined extent. Reading down is an appropriate remedy when "the offending portion of a statute can be defined in a limited manner" (Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38 para 113).

The following two techniques can be applied in addition to the ones above.

1. Courts have temporarily suspended whole or partial declarations of invalidity, delaying their coming into force, a technique which the text of section 52 does not appear to contemplate.
2. Even more controversially, courts have also discussed the idea that they could offer constitutional exemptions from otherwise valid legislation which might be unconstitutional in application to particular groups or individuals or in particular rare cases. As Peter Sankoff has written, "… very few courts have attempted to explain the legal basis upon which the exemption is ultimately granted. Vague reference is often made to s.24 of the Charter or s.52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but too often details have been absent" (Sankoff, Peter, Constitutional Exemptions: Myth or Reality?. National Journal of Constitutional Law, Vol. 11, 2000,via SSRN at 16). Since it seems most likely that the exemptions offered in Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2016 SCC 4 (CanLII), are section 24(1) remedies, in this text they appear under that heading.

2.1.1 Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38 (some citations omitted)

This Chapter offers two excerpts from this Ontario AG v. G. The excerpt offered here focuses on general principles of section 52 remedies. The next one, below, looks more closely at suspensions of declarations of invalidity.

> The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. was delivered byKarakatsanis J. —
> [82] As I shall explain, this Court's leading decision on remedies for laws that violate the Charter, Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 679, has provided helpful guidance on how to craft a responsive and effective remedy for unconstitutional laws for nearly three decades. But, in some respects, this Court's remedial jurisprudence has moved beyond Schachter. By employing and building on Schachter's guidance in determining the form and breadth of declarations of invalidity, suspending the effect of those declarations, and exempting individuals from suspensions, this Court's remedial practice has come to coalesce around a group of core remedial principles. Recognizing those remedial principles and explicitly identifying approaches that strike the right balance between them will encourage greater consistency and transparency in remedial decision making.
> (1) Principled Remedial Discretion
> [85] Section 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, provides in absolute terms that laws inconsistent with the Constitution are of no force or effect to the extent of the inconsistency. Although it states the legal result where there is conflict between a law and the Constitution, s. 52(1) does not explicitly provide courts with a grant of remedial jurisdiction.[2] A general declaration pursuant to courts' statutory or inherent jurisdiction is the means by which they give full effect to the broad terms of s. 52(1).
> [86] That a law is "of no force or effect" only "to the extent of the inconsistency" with the Constitution means that a court faced with a constitutional challenge to a law must determine to what extent it is unconstitutional and declare it to be so. Our jurisprudence teaches us that a measure of discretion is inevitable in determining how to respond to an inconsistency between legislation and the Constitution.
> [87] There is a theory, consonant with the Blackstonian declaratory theory of the law, that "judges never make law, but merely discover it" (Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 SCR 429, at para. 79). On this view, when a law is unconstitutional, courts and other decision-makers have no remedial discretion — s. 52(1) renders unconstitutional laws of no force or effect from the moment of their enactment.
> [88] However, while s. 52(1) is the substantive basis of constitutional invalidity, the public and the state will often disagree about whether a given law is unconstitutional and, if so, to what extent. Our legal order, grounded in related principles of constitutional supremacy and the rule of law, requires that there be an institution empowered to finally determine a law's constitutionality; s. 52(1) confirms "[t]he existence of an impartial and authoritative judicial arbiter" to determine whether the law is of no force and effect (Reference re Supreme Court Act, ss. 5 and 6, 2014 SCC 21, [2014] 1 SCR 433, at para. 89). Even in the absence of a formal declaration, s. 52(1) operates to prevent the application of unconstitutional laws. For example, because of the limits of its statutory jurisdiction, a tribunal or a provincial court's determination that legislation is unconstitutional has no legal effect beyond the decision itself; nevertheless, it must refuse to give effect to legislation it considers unconstitutional. Thus, the reach of a judicial determination of the unconstitutionality of a law will be limited in the absence of statutory or inherent jurisdiction to issue a general declaration of invalidity.
> [89] As I will explain, while s. 52(1) recognizes the primacy of the Constitution, including the fundamental rights and freedoms of individuals and groups guaranteed by the Charter, fashioning constitutional remedies inevitably implicates other — at times, competing — constitutional principles (K. Roach, "Principled Remedial Discretion Under the Charter" (2004), 25 S.C.L.R. (2d) 101, at pp. 112-13). Courts must strike an appropriate balance between these principles in determining how to give effect to s. 52(1) in a manner that best aligns with our broader constitutional order.
> [90] Kent Roach argues, and the intervener the Asper Centre submits, that Charter remedies should be granted in accordance with "principled discretion": a middle ground between "strong" or "pure" discretion, which would give judges free rein to fashion remedies as they see fit, and "rule-based" discretion, which would tightly constrain judges with hard-and-fast rules (Roach (2004), at pp. 102 and 107-13). I agree.

[91] Pure discretion has the benefit of being endlessly adaptable to any factual context, but has the clear downside of permitting results based on "the wills and whims of a person or a group of people" (Roach (2004), at p. 107, quoting P. Birks, "Three Kinds of Objections to Discretionary Remedialism" (2000), 20 Uwa. L. Rev. 1, at p. 15). It also fails to encourage transparent reasoning — if the decision-maker can do anything, there is less incentive to explain the basis for the decision. Rule-based discretion, by contrast, has the benefit of being applicable in different contexts in a predictable way. However, it does not encourage courts to engage with the purposes behind the rules and tends to lead to mechanical application of those rules, which can produce unfair results in individual cases.

[92] A review of this Court's jurisprudence shows that it favours principled discretion, which requires judges to consider multiple, competing remedial principles and resolve conflicts between them while justifying their prioritization of certain considerations over others.

[93] "Remedial principles", in this sense, are more general than rules and, unlike rules, may conflict and be weighed differently (Roach (2004), at pp. 111-13, citing R. Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously (1977)). Articulating the core general principles that structure the exercise of principled remedial discretion will assist in promoting principled, transparent, and consistent approaches to s. 52(1) remedies.

[94] Schachter provided remedial principles of this kind, identifying twin principles of respect for the purposes of the Charter and respect for the legislature, and thereby guiding the discretion of Canadian courts for nearly three decades. But in the process of applying that approach, this Court has sometimes articulated additional relevant or analogous principles. As I will explain, when legislation violates the Charter, courts have been guided by the following fundamental remedial principles, grounded in the Constitution, in determining the appropriate remedy, applying them at every stage:

A. Charter rights should be safeguarded through effective remedies.

B. The public has an interest in the constitutional compliance of legislation.

C. The public is entitled to the benefit of legislation.

D. Courts and legislatures play different institutional roles.

[95] Safeguarding rights lies at the core of granting Charter remedies because the Charter exists to protect rights, freedoms, and inherent dignity; this purpose inheres in the Charter as a whole. The Court's purposive approach to constitutional remedies ensures that the effective vindication and protection of rights is at the core of the remedies it grants for legislation that violates the Charter.

[96] The rule of law is explicitly recognized in the preamble to the Charter, which says that "Canada is founded upon principles that recognize . . . the rule of law". It is also implicitly recognized in the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867, which says Canada has "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom".. Two facets of the rule of law are foundational here: the government must act within the law and there must be positive laws to preserve order in society. This Court has recognized that adherence to the principle of the rule of law means that the impact of legislation, even unconstitutional legislation, extends beyond those whose rights are violated — it is bad for all of society for unconstitutional legislation to "remain on the books". But the public interest cuts both ways — the public is also entitled to the benefit of legislation, which individuals rely upon to organize their lives and protect them from harm. Laws validly enacted by democratically elected legislatures "are generally passed for the common good" and there is accordingly a "public interest" in legislation that "weighs heavily in the balance" of remedial discretion.

[97] Legislation is enacted by the legislature, which is sovereign in the sense that, within its constitutional ambit, it has "exclusive authority to enact, amend, and repeal any law as it sees fit" (Reference re pan-Canadian securities regulation, 2018 SCC 48, [2018] 3 SCR 189, at para. 54; Constitution Act, 1867, ss. 91 to 95; Constitution Act, 1982, ss. 44 and 45). This fact serves as an important constraint on courts' exercise of their remedial authority. Parliamentary sovereignty is an expression of democracy, because it accords exclusive legislative authority to Parliament and the provincial legislatures, each of which includes an elected chamber without whose consent no law can be made.

[98] Even so, the courts remain "guardians of the Constitution and of individuals' rights under it" (Hunter v. Southam Inc., 1984 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1984] 2 SCR 145, at p. 169) — "[d]eference ends . . . where the constitutional rights that the courts are charged with protecting begin" (Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 SCR 3, at para. 36). This is because "[i]t is emphatically the province and duty of [the courts] to say what the law is" (Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137 (1803), at p. 177).

[99] These remedial principles — fundamental aspects of our constitutional order, including democracy and the rule of law — are reflected in the Court's remedial decisions since the Charter came into force.

(2) Schachter

[100] In Schachter, this Court set out a general approach to granting remedies for legislation that violates the Charter. Schachter endorsed remedies tailored to the breadth of rights violations, thereby allowing constitutionally compliant aspects of unconstitutional legislation to be preserved. Schachter also recognized that, in rare circumstances, the effect of a declaration of invalidity could be suspended for a period of time to protect the public interest.

[101] At the core of Schachter was its recognition that flexibility is necessary to arrive at appropriate remedies involving legislation, and its endorsement of remedies short of a full declaration of invalidity. Lamer C.J. made clear that "[d]epending upon the circumstances, a court may simply strike down, it may strike down and temporarily suspend the declaration of invalidity, or it may resort to the techniques of reading down or reading in" (p. 695).

[102] Different types of remedy can be granted because the circumstances may implicate general remedial principles in different ways. Schachter recognized the "twin guiding principles" of "respect for the role of the legislature and the purposes of the Charter" (p. 715) that play a key role in determining the type of remedy that would be ordered.

[103] Schachter held that the first step in choosing the appropriate remedy is defining the extent of the inconsistency between the legislation and the Charter. The second step is determining the form of the declaration. Beyond the extent of the inconsistency, Schachter said that the form of a remedy would be influenced by courts' respect for the role of the legislature. The general rule is that tailored remedies should only be granted when a court can fairly conclude that the legislature would have enacted the law as it would be modified by the court (pp. 697 and 700).

[104] Schachter also endorsed the use of suspended declarations — declarations that legislation is unconstitutional, but whose effect is suspended for some period of time. Lamer C.J. reasoned that a delayed order could be justified based on the effect of an immediate declaration on the public and that, by contrast, the roles of courts and legislatures should not enter into the question of whether to suspend a declaration (p. 717).

[105] Finally, Schachter considered how s. 52(1) remedies could be combined with individual remedies for Charter violations. Lamer C.J. concluded that individual remedies under s. 24(1) of the Charter "will rarely be available in conjunction with" remedies involving legislation (p. 720).

[106] Much of Schachter remains good guidance three decades later. However, as I will explain, the jurisprudence on Charter remedies has built upon the foundation of Schachter and moved beyond it in some ways. While Schachter wisely advised courts to consider the principled basis for their remedial decisions, those remedial principles have since been further developed. In part, the guidelines Schachter endorsed for determining the extent of rights violations were tied to an articulation of the Oakes test that has since been overtaken. Aspects of its discussion of suspended declarations have been overlooked by courts and criticized in academic commentary for their failure to rely on coherent principles and encourage transparent application. Finally, its admonition against combining s. 52(1) and individual remedies has frequently not been followed.

[107] Since Schachter, this Court has granted at least 60 s. 52(1) remedies for Charter breaches. In my view, the guidelines given in Schachter should be clarified and updated in light of those decisions.

(3) The Form and Breadth of Section 52(1) Declarations

[108] As our jurisprudence demonstrates, and the language of s. 52(1) directs, the first step in crafting an appropriate s. 52(1) remedy in a given case is determining the extent of the legislation's inconsistency with the Constitution. Courts should bear in mind both "the manner in which the law violates the Charter and the manner in which it fails to be justified under s. 1" (Schachter, at p. 702) in crafting tailored remedies. (While this general guideline remains useful, courts should bear in mind that the Oakes test has evolved since Schachter was decided, such that it now focuses on justifying the infringing measure rather than the law as a whole (compare Schachter, at pp. 703-5 and RJR-MacDonald, at para. 144).) The nature and extent of the underlying Charter violation lays the foundation for the remedial analysis because the breadth of the remedy ultimately granted will reflect at least the extent of the breach.

[109] Defining the extent of the constitutional defect by reference to the substantive violation of the Charter safeguards the rights of all those directly affected by ensuring that the law is cured of all its constitutional defects. It also serves the broader public interest in having government act in accordance with the Constitution. These remedies reach beyond the claimant — and can even be granted when the claimant is not directly affected by the law — because "[n]o one should be subjected to an unconstitutional law" (Nur, at para. 51; see also R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295, at p. 313). This step of the analysis therefore reflects the Charter's rights-protecting purpose, the public's interest in constitutional compliance, and the text of s. 52(1) — the law is of no force or effect to the full extent of its inconsistency with the Constitution.

[110] For example, in some cases where a criminal offence's effects on particular groups of people or in certain circumstances have been found unconstitutional, all of those people and circumstances have been exempted from criminal liability (see, e.g*., Carter v. Canada (Attorney General),* 2015 SCC 5, [2015] 1 SCR 331; R. v. Sharpe, 2001 SCC 2, [2001] 1 SCR 45, as interpreted in R. v. Barabash, 2015 SCC 29, [2015] 2 SCR 522; R. v. Appulonappa, 2015 SCC 59, [2015] 3 SCR 754, as interpreted in R. v. Rajaratnam, 2019 BCCA 209, 376 C.C.C. (3d) 181; R. v. Smith, 2015 SCC 34, [2015] 2 SCR 602). The same is true for mandatory minimum penalties, which can be invalidated even when the applicant is not directly affected (see, e.g., Nur; Lloyd).

[111] On the other hand, it also follows from s. 52(1) that to the extent they are not inconsistent with the Constitution, the public is entitled to the benefit of laws passed by the legislature. Tailored remedies that address the precise constitutional flaw can permit a court to both safeguard the constitutional rights of all those affected and preserve the constitutional aspects of the law. Many of the Court's tailored remedies reflect both these principles. The criminal offences considered in Carter, Sharpe, Smith, and Appulonappa, for example, were declared of no force or effect only to the extent that they violated rights, preserving their constitutionally compliant effects.

[112] The second step is determining the form that a declaration should take. In doing so, Schachter explained that remedies other than full declarations of invalidity should be granted when the nature of the violation and the intention of the legislature allows for them. Full statutory schemes or Acts are rarely struck down in their entirety — to my knowledge, this Court has only done so on eight occasions.[3] To ensure the public has the benefit of enacted legislation, remedies of reading down, reading in, and severance, tailored to the breadth of the violation, should be employed when possible so that the constitutional aspects of legislation are preserved (Schachter, at p. 700; Vriend, at paras. 149-50). Crucially, in Canada, the declaration issued cures the law's unconstitutionality. A declaration that fails to do so, like the kind suggested by my colleagues, Justice Côté and Justice Brown, at para. 248 of their reasons, is more akin to the declaration of "inconsistency" or "incompatibility" made in jurisdictions where courts do not have the authority to strike down unconstitutional legislation (see, e.g., Attorney-General v. Taylor, [2018] NZSC 104, [2019] 1 N.Z.L.R. 213; Human Rights Act 1998 (U.K.), 1998, c. 42, s. 4(4) and (6)).

[113] Reading down is when a court limits the reach of legislation by declaring it to be of no force and effect to a precisely defined extent. Reading down is an appropriate remedy when "the offending portion of a statute can be defined in a limited manner" (Schachter, at p. 697). Inversely, reading in is when a court broadens the grasp of legislation by declaring an implied limitation on its scope to be without force or effect. Reading in is an appropriate remedy when the inconsistency with the Constitution can be defined as "what the statute wrongly excludes rather than what it wrongly includes" (Schachter, at p. 698, emphasis in original). Severance is when a court declares certain words to be of no force or effect, thereby achieving the same effects as reading down or reading in, depending on whether the severed portion serves to limit or broaden the legislation's reach. Severance is appropriate where the offending portion is set out explicitly in the words of the legislation. These forms of remedy illustrate a court's flexibility in responding to a constitutional violation.

[114] However, if granted in the wrong circumstances, tailored remedies can intrude on the legislative sphere. Schachter cautioned that tailored remedies should only be granted where it can be fairly assumed that "the legislature would have passed the constitutionally sound part of the scheme without the unsound part" and where it is possible to precisely define the unconstitutional aspect of the law (p. 697, citing Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, 1947 CanLII 347 (UK JCPC), [1947] A.C. 503 (P.C.), at p. 518). If it appears unlikely that the legislature would have enacted the tailored version of the statute, tailoring the remedy would not conform to its policy choice and would therefore undermine parliamentary sovereignty (Schachter, at pp. 705-6; Hunter, at p. 169). The significance of the remaining portion of the statute must be considered, and tailored remedies should not be granted when they would interfere with the legislative objective of the law as a whole (Schachter, at pp. 705-15). For example, in Vriend, Iacobucci J. read "sexual orientation" into the Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, because the term was sufficiently precise and because the legislature would rather have included that protection than sacrificed the entire scheme (paras. 155-60 and 167-69). In R. v. Hall, 2002 SCC 64, [2002] 3 SCR 309, McLachlin C.J. severed part of the tertiary ground for denying bail because the rest of the provision "is capable of standing alone without doing damage to Parliament's intention" (para. 44). This Court has granted a remedy short of full invalidity of a statutory provision at least 24 times.[4] Nonetheless, a tailored remedy will frequently not be appropriate. This Court has opted to fully invalidate a provision at least 55 times.[5] These include the cases dealing with mandatory minimum penalties referenced above — the goal of a mandatory minimum sentence is to remove judicial discretion, so tailoring the declaration to reintroduce that discretion would distort the provision so that it no longer conformed to its legislative purpose (R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 SCR 96, at paras. 50 and 53).

[115] Lamer C.J. was also conscious of the limitation of the judicial role, explaining in Schachter that tailored remedies should not be granted when they do not "flo[w] with sufficient precision from the requirements of the Constitution", because although courts are capable of determining what the Constitution requires, they are not well-suited to making "ad hoc choices from a variety of options" (p. 707).

[116] In sum, consistent with the principle of constitutional supremacy embodied in s. 52(1) and the importance of safeguarding rights, courts must identify and remedy the full extent of the unconstitutionality by looking at the precise nature and scope of the Charter violation. To ensure the public retains the benefit of legislation enacted in accordance with our democratic system, remedies of reading down, reading in, and severance, tailored to the breadth of the violation, should be employed when possible so that the constitutional aspects of legislation are preserved (Schachter, at p. 700; Vriend, at paras. 149-50). To respect the differing roles of courts and legislatures foundational to our constitutional architecture, determining whether to strike down legislation in its entirety or to instead grant a tailored remedy of reading in, reading down, or severance, depends on whether the legislature's intention was such that a court can fairly conclude it would have enacted the law as modified by the court. This requires the court to determine whether the law's overall purpose can be achieved without violating rights. If a tailored remedy can be granted without the court intruding on the role of the legislature, such a remedy will preserve a law's constitutionally compliant effects along with the benefit that law provides to the public. The rule of law is thus served both by ensuring that legislation complies with the Constitution and by securing the public benefits of laws where possible.

(6) General Remedial Principles for Legislation That Violates the Charter

[153] As I have explained, running through this Court's remedial practice — from determining the form and breadth of remedies involving legislation, to suspending the effect of those remedies, to exempting litigants from suspensions — are recurring touchstones. These guide the principled discretion that this Court exercises when granting remedies for legislation that violates the Charter.

[154] Safeguarding rights lies at the core of that remedial approach. Section 52(1) calls for courts to invalidate any legislation to the extent it violates the Charter. The Charter "constrain[s] government action in conformity with certain individual rights and freedoms, the preservation of which [is] essential to the continuation of a democratic, functioning society in which the basic dignity of all is recognized" (Richardson, at para. 57). The fundamental principle that courts should provide meaningful remedies for the violation of constitutional rights (Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 25) shapes the form and breadth of the declaration, acts as a strong counterweight against suspending the effect of such a declaration, and weighs in favour of granting an individual remedy in tandem with a suspension.

[156] Another aspect of the rule of law, reflected in s. 52(1)'s caution that laws are of no force or effect only "to the extent of the inconsistency" with the Constitution, is the entitlement to a positive order of laws that organizes society and protects it from harm. The public has an interest in preserving legislation duly enacted by its democratically elected legislatures, to the extent it is not unconstitutional. This is why courts will tailor remedies to retain constitutional aspects of an unconstitutional law where possible and will temporarily suspend the effect of a declaration when an immediate order would undermine the public interest by depriving the public of laws passed for its benefit. In contrast, concerns about legal instability may weigh against suspension.

[157] Finally, running through this Court's remedial practice for unconstitutional legislation is respect for the role of the legislature coupled with an understanding of the duties of the judicial role. When determining the form and breadth of remedies, courts will preserve as much of the law as possible to respect the legislature's policy choices, following its discernible intention when doing so. But courts will not shrink from performing their duty to protect rights through s. 52(1) remedies, determining the full extent of inconsistencies with the Constitution and declaring legislation to be of no force or effect when necessary. Suspensions can be granted when the legislature's democratic role as policymaker would be so seriously undermined by an immediately effective declaration that it outweighs important countervailing principles. In such circumstances, if an exemption would undermine that role, it will weigh against an individual remedy.

[158] As I have explained, these constitutional considerations, drawn from our constitutional text and the broader architecture of our constitutional order and the rule of law, have repeatedly arisen in this Court's decisions on s. 52(1) remedies for Charter violations and give rise to four foundational principles:

A. Charter rights should be safeguarded through effective remedies.

B. The public has an interest in the constitutional compliance of legislation.

C. The public is entitled to the benefit of legislation.

D. Courts and legislatures play different institutional roles.

[159] In my view, these remedial principles provide the groundwork for meaningful remedies in different contexts. They provide guidance to courts and encourage them to transparently explain remedial results. They will not always lead to agreement on the correct outcome; their value is in transparency, helping those who disagree articulate their specific points of disagreement.

2.2 Schachter v. Canada [1992] 2 SCR 67 (citations omitted)

[from the headnote]

Respondent's spouse received 15 weeks of maternity benefits in 1985 under s. 30 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971. Although respondent had intended to stay home with the newborn as soon as his spouse was able to return to work after the birth, he ultimately took three weeks off without pay. He had first applied for benefits under s. 30 in respect of the time he had to take off work, but, since s. 30 was limited to maternity benefits, modified his application to one under s. 32 for "paternity benefits". Section 32 provides for parental benefits for adoptive parents for 15 weeks following the placement of their child with them. These benefits are to be shared between the two parents in accordance with their wishes. The respondent's application was denied on the basis that he was "not available for work", a ground of disentitlement for all applicants except those applying for maternity benefits or adoption benefits.

….[at trial the] judge found a violation of s. 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in that s. 32 discriminated between natural parents and adoptive parents with respect to parental leave. He granted declaratory relief under s. 24(1) of the Charter and extended the same benefits to natural parents as were granted to adoptive parents …. The violation of s. 15 was subsequently ceded by appellants.

[By the time the Supreme Court heard the appeal, the Federal government had amended the provision] to extend parental benefits to natural parents on the same footing as they are provided to adoptive parents for a period totalling 10 weeks rather than the original 15.

IV. Remedial Options Appropriate to this Case

A. The Nature of the Right Involved

The right which was determined to be violated here is a positive right: the right to equal benefit of the law. Positive rights by their very nature tend to carry with them special considerations in the remedial context. It will be a rare occasion when a benefit conferring scheme is found to have an unconstitutional purpose. Cases involving positive rights are more likely to fall into the remedial classifications of reading down/reading in or striking down and suspending the operation of the declaration of invalidity than to mandate an immediate striking down. Indeed, if the benefit which is being conferred is itself constitutionally guaranteed (for example, the right to vote), reading in may be mandatory. For a court to deprive persons of a constitutionally guaranteed right by striking down underinclusive legislation would be absurd. Certainly the intrusion into the legislative sphere of extending a constitutionally guaranteed benefit is warranted when the benefit was itself guaranteed by the legislature through constitutional amendment.

Other rights will be more in the nature of "negative" rights, which merely restrict the government. However, even in those cases, the rights may have certain positive aspects. For instance, the right to life, liberty and security of the person is in one sense a negative right, but the requirement that the government respect the "fundamental principles of justice" may provide a basis for characterizing s. 7 as a positive right in some circumstances. Similarly, the equality right is a hybrid of sorts since it is neither purely positive nor purely negative. In some contexts it will be proper to characterize s. 15 as providing positive rights.

The benefit with which we are concerned here is a monetary benefit for parents …not one which Parliament is constitutionally obliged to provide to the included group or the excluded group. What Parliament is obliged to do, by virtue of the conceded s. 15 violation, is equalize the provision of that benefit. The benefit itself is not constitutionally prohibited; it is simply underinclusive. Thus striking down the provision immediately would be inappropriate as such a course of action would deprive eligible persons of a benefit without providing any relief to the respondent. Such a situation demands, at the very least, that the operation of any declaration of invalidity be suspended to allow Parliament time to bring the provision into line with constitutional requirements. …. The question which remains is whether this is a case in which it is appropriate to go further and read the excluded group into the legislation. This question must be answered with reference to the specific legislation under consideration.

B. The Context of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971

It is not difficult to discern the legislative objective of this scheme as a whole. The following overall objective emerges from Justice La Forest's judgment concerning the same legislative scheme in Tétreault-Gadoury, supra, at p. 41:

> . . . to create a social insurance plan to compensate unemployed workers for loss of income from their employment and to provide them with economic and social security for a time, thus assisting them in returning to the labour market.

It is, however, not as simple to discern the objective of the particular provision. It is not clear on the text of the provision alone that the purpose of it is to extend benefits to parents of newborns caring for them at home, a purpose which reading in the excluded group would further. Indeed, on the express language of the provision, one could quickly conclude that the benefits were only intended to be conferred on adoptive parents and that natural parents were deliberately excluded…[W]e have not been provided with the further assistance of a s. 1 argument here or in the courts below [because the government conceded the section 15 violation in this case].

Without a mandate based on a clear legislative objective, it would be imprudent for me to take the course of reading the excluded group into the legislation. A consideration of the budgetary implications of such a course of action further underlines this conclusion. … Here, the excluded group sought to be included likely vastly outnumbers the group to whom the benefits were already extended.

Given the nature of the benefit and the size of the group to whom it is sought to be extended, to read in natural parents would in these circumstances constitute a substantial intrusion into the legislative domain. This intrusion would be substantial enough to change potentially the nature of the scheme as a whole. If this Court were to dictate that the same benefits conferred on adoptive parents under s. 32 be extended to natural parents, the ensuing financial shake-up could mean that other benefits to other disadvantaged groups would have to be done away with to pay for the extension. Parliament and the provincial legislatures are much better equipped to assess the whole picture in formulating solutions in cases such as these. Clearly, the appropriate action for the Court to take is to declare the provision invalid but to suspend that declaration to allow the legislative body in question to weigh all the relevant factors in amending the legislation to meet constitutional requirements.

I think it significant and worthy of mention that in this case Parliament did amend the impugned provision following the launching of this action, and that that amendment was not the one that reading in would have imposed. Parliament equalized the benefits given to adoptive parents and natural parents but not on the same terms as they were originally conferred by s. 32. The two groups now receive equal benefits for ten weeks rather than the original fifteen. This situation provides a valuable illustration of the dangers associated with reading in when legislative intention with respect to budgetary issues is not clear. In this case, reading in would not necessarily further the legislative objective and it would definitely interfere with budgetary decisions in that it would mandate the expenditure of a greater sum of money than Parliament is willing or able to allocate to the program in question. ….

The reasons of La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. were delivered by LA FOREST J. -- I have had the benefit of reading the reasons of the Chief Justice and I agree with his proposed disposition and answers to the constitutional questions….

Ordinarily, a case is dealt with in light of facts that define the scope of the Court's pronouncement. Here we are forced to deal with the tests for reading down or reading in in a manner that may give the impression that they are of universal application. But it must be underlined that the case is one involving a scheme of social assistance which may dictate a quite different approach from that which one would follow in other areas. Thus this Court has repeatedly stated in cases like R. v. Wong, 1990 CanLII 56 (SCC), [1990] 3 SCR 36, for example, that it was not the business of the courts to invent schemes that had the effect of increasing police powers (at pp. 56-57). The rationale for this was not so much the complexity of possible schemes (as the Chief Justice appears to suggest at one stage), but rather that this could distract the courts from their fundamental duty under the Charter to protect the rights guaranteed to the individual.

The simple fact is, as I noted before, that it is for Parliament and the legislatures to make laws. It is the duty of the courts to see that those laws conform to constitutional norms and declare them invalid if they do not. This imposes pressure on legislative bodies to stay within the confines of their constitutional powers from the outset. Reliance should not be placed on the courts to repair invalid laws. In social assistance schemes, there is perhaps more room (and certainly more temptation) for judicial intervention, in cases like Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), 1991 CanLII 12 (SCC), [1991] 2 SCR 22, for example, where the remedy is obvious and Parliament would clearly enact it rather than have the whole scheme fail. But when one is dealing with laws that impinge on the liberty of the subject, the judicial stance should be one that does not encourage the legislature to overreach, and the courts should be slow indeed to provide a corrective.

Where I am most doubtful about the Chief Justice's reasons is in closely tying the process of reading down or reading in with the checklist set forth in R. v. Oakes, 1986 CanLII 46 (SCC), [1986] 1 SCR 103. Though this may be useful at times, it may, I fear, encourage a mechanistic approach to the process, rather than encourage examination of more fundamental issues, such as those to which I have referred above, issues that go well beyond the factual context.

2.3 Vriend v. Alberta, 1998 CanLII 816 (SCC), [1998] 1 SCR 493 (citations omitted)

The remedial decision in Vriend (see other excerpts from this case in Chapter 24, Part 3.2) might be a bit of a surprise, as the Court seems to read in the very thing the Alberta legislature expressly decided against in paras 4-6 below. The majority responds to such concerns starting at para 165 below.

CORY J.

[2] The Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2 ("IRPA" or the "Act"), was first enacted in 1973. When the legislation was introduced in 1972, the Minister responsible commented upon and emphasized the nature and importance of the Act, stating: "it is . . . the commitment of this legislature that we regard The Individual's Rights Protection Act in primacy to any other legislative enactment. . . . [W]e have committed ourselves to suggest that Alberta is not the place for partial rights or half freedoms, but that Alberta hopefully will become the place where each and every man and woman will be able to stand on his own two feet and be recognized as an individual and not as a member of a particular class" (Alberta Hansard, November 22, 1972, at p. 80-63). These are courageous words that give hope and comfort to members of every group that has suffered the wounds and indignities of discrimination. Has this laudable commitment been met?

I. Factual Background

A. History of the IRPA

[3] The IRPA prohibits discrimination in a number of areas of public life, and establishes the Human Rights Commission to deal with complaints of discrimination. The IRPA as first enacted (S.A. 1972, c. 2) prohibited discrimination in public notices (s. 2), public accommodation, services or facilities (s. 3), tenancy (s. 4), employment practices (s. 6), employment advertising (s. 7) or trade union membership (s. 9) on the basis of race, religious beliefs, colour, sex, marital status (in ss. 6 and 9), age (except in ss. 3 and 4), ancestry or place of origin. The Act has since been expanded to include other grounds, in a series of amendments (S.A. 1980, c. 27; S.A. 1985, c. 33; S.A. 1990, c. 23; S.A. 1996, c. 25). These additions were apparently, at least in part, made in response to the enactment of the Charter and its judicial interpretation. In the most recent amendments the name of the Act was changed to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act. In 1990, the Act included the following list of prohibited grounds of discrimination: race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry and place of origin. At the present time it also includes marital status, source of income and family status.

[4] Despite repeated calls for its inclusion sexual orientation has never been included in the list of those groups protected from discrimination. In 1984 and again in 1992, the Alberta Human Rights Commission recommended amending the IRPA to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. In an attempt to effect such an amendment, the opposition introduced several bills; however, none went beyond first reading. Although at least one Minister responsible for the administration of the IRPA supported the amendment, the correspondence with a number of cabinet members and members of the Legislature makes it clear that the omission of sexual orientation from the IRPA was deliberate and not the result of an oversight. The reasons given for declining to take this action include the assertions that sexual orientation is a "marginal" ground; that human rights legislation is powerless to change public attitudes; and that there have only been a few cases of sexual orientation discrimination in employment brought to the attention of the Minister.

[5] In 1992, the Human Rights Commission decided to investigate complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. This decision was immediately vetoed by the Government and the Minister directed the Commission not to investigate the complaints.

[6] In 1993, the Government appointed the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel to conduct a public review of the IRPA and the Human Rights Commission. When it had completed an extensive review, the Panel issued its report, entitled Equal in Dignity and Rights: A Review of Human Rights in Alberta (1994) (the "Dignity Report"). The report contained a number of recommendations, one of which was that sexual orientation should be included as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the Act. In its response to the Dignity Report (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel (1995)), the Government stated that the recommendation regarding sexual orientation would be dealt with through this case.

B. Vriend's Dismissal from King's College and Complaint to the Alberta Human Rights Commission

[7] In December 1987 the appellant Delwin Vriend was employed as a laboratory coordinator by King's College in Edmonton, Alberta…. In early January 1991, the Board of Governors of the College adopted a position statement on homosexuality, and shortly thereafter, the President of the College requested Vriend's resignation. He declined to resign, and on January 28, 1991, Vriend's employment was terminated by the College…..

[8] On June 11, 1991, Vriend attempted to file a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission on the grounds that his employer discriminated against him because of his sexual orientation. On July 10, 1991, the Commission advised Vriend that he could not make a complaint under the IRPA, because the Act did not include sexual orientation as a protected ground.

[9] Vriend, the Gay and Lesbian Awareness Society of Edmonton (GALA), the Gay and Lesbian Community Centre of Edmonton Society and Dignity Canada Dignité for Gay Catholics and Supporters (collectively the "appellants") applied by originating notice of motion to the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta for declaratory relief. The appellants challenged the constitutionality of ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1) and 8(1) of the IRPA on the grounds that these sections contravene s. 15(1) of the Charter because they do not include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

5. Conclusion Regarding Section 15

[107] In summary, this Court has no choice but to conclude that the IRPA, by reason of the omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground, clearly violates s. 15 of the Charter. The IRPA in its underinclusive state creates a distinction which results in the denial of the equal benefit and protection of the law on the basis of sexual orientation, a personal characteristic which has been found to be analogous to the grounds enumerated in s. 15. This, in itself, would be sufficient to conclude that discrimination is present and therefore there is a violation of s. 15. The serious discriminatory effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act reinforce this conclusion. As a result, it is clear that the IRPA, as it stands, violates the equality rights of the appellant Vriend and of other gays and lesbians. It is therefore necessary to determine whether this violation can be justified under s. 1…

[128] …I conclude that the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA does not meet the requirements of the Oakes test and accordingly, it cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter.

I. Remedy

A. Introduction: The Relationship Between the Legislatures and the Courts Under the Charter

[129] Having found the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA to be an unjustifiable violation of the appellants' equality rights, I now turn to the question of remedy under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Before discussing the jurisprudence on remedies, I believe it might be helpful to pause to reflect more broadly on the general issue of the relationship between legislatures and the courts in the age of the Charter.

[130] Much was made in argument before us about the inadvisability of the Court interfering with or otherwise meddling in what is regarded as the proper role of the legislature, which in this case was to decide whether or not sexual orientation would be added to Alberta's human rights legislation. Indeed, it seems that hardly a day goes by without some comment or criticism to the effect that under the Charter courts are wrongfully usurping the role of the legislatures. I believe this allegation misunderstands what took place and what was intended when our country adopted the Charter in 1981-82.

[131] When the Charter was introduced, Canada went, in the words of former Chief Justice Brian Dickson, from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to constitutional supremacy). Simply put, each Canadian was given individual rights and freedoms which no government or legislature could take away. However, as rights and freedoms are not absolute, governments and legislatures could justify the qualification or infringement of these constitutional rights under s. 1 as I previously discussed. Inevitably disputes over the meaning of the rights and their justification would have to be settled and here the role of the judiciary enters to resolve these disputes. Many countries have assigned the important role of judicial review to their supreme or constitutional courts.

[132] We should recall that it was the deliberate choice of our provincial and federal legislatures in adopting the Charter to assign an interpretive role to the courts and to command them under s. 52 to declare unconstitutional legislation invalid.

[133] However, giving courts the power and commandment to invalidate legislation where necessary has not eliminated the debate over the "legitimacy" of courts taking such action. As eloquently put by A. M. Bickel in his outstanding work The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (2nd ed. 1986), "it thwarts the will of representatives of the. . . people" (p. 17). So judicial review, it is alleged, is illegitimate because it is anti-democratic in that unelected officials (judges) are overruling elected representatives (legislators).

[134] To respond, it should be emphasized again that our Charter's introduction and the consequential remedial role of the courts were choices of the Canadian people through their elected representatives as part of a redefinition of our democracy. Our constitutional design was refashioned to state that henceforth the legislatures and executive must perform their roles in conformity with the newly conferred constitutional rights and freedoms. That the courts were the trustees of these rights insofar as disputes arose concerning their interpretation was a necessary part of this new design.

[135] So courts in their trustee or arbiter role must perforce scrutinize the work of the legislature and executive not in the name of the courts, but in the interests of the new social contract that was democratically chosen. All of this is implied in the power given to the courts under s. 24 of the Charter and s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[136] Because the courts are independent from the executive and legislature, litigants and citizens generally can rely on the courts to make reasoned and principled decisions according to the dictates of the constitution even though specific decisions may not be universally acclaimed. In carrying out their duties, courts are not to second-guess legislatures and the executives; they are not to make value judgments on what they regard as the proper policy choice; this is for the other branches. Rather, the courts are to uphold the Constitution and have been expressly invited to perform that role by the Constitution itself. But respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others' role and the role of the courts.

[137] This mutual respect is in some ways expressed in the provisions of our constitution as shown by the wording of certain of the constitutional rights themselves. For example, s. 7 of the Charter speaks of no denial of the rights therein except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, which include the process of law and legislative action. Section 1 and the jurisprudence under it are also important to ensure respect for legislative action and the collective or societal interests represented by legislation. In addition, as will be discussed below, in fashioning a remedy with regard to a Charter violation, a court must be mindful of the role of the legislature. Moreover, s. 33, the notwithstanding clause, establishes that the final word in our constitutional structure is in fact left to the legislature and not the courts. (see P. Hogg and A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75).

[138] As I view the matter, the Charter has given rise to a more dynamic interaction among the branches of governance. This interaction has been aptly described as a "dialogue" by some. In reviewing legislative enactments and executive decisions to ensure constitutional validity, the courts speak to the legislative and executive branches. As has been pointed out, most of the legislation held not to pass constitutional muster has been followed by new legislation designed to accomplish similar objectives. By doing this, the legislature responds to the courts; hence the dialogue among the branches.

[139] To my mind, a great value of judicial review and this dialogue among the branches is that each of the branches is made somewhat accountable to the other. The work of the legislature is reviewed by the courts and the work of the court in its decisions can be reacted to by the legislature in the passing of new legislation (or even overarching laws under s. 33 of the Charter). This dialogue between and accountability of each of the branches have the effect of enhancing the democratic process, not denying it.

[140] There is also another aspect of judicial review that promotes democratic values. Although a court's invalidation of legislation usually involves negating the will of the majority, we must remember that the concept of democracy is broader than the notion of majority rule, fundamental as that may be. In this respect, we would do well to heed the words of Dickson C.J. in Oakes, supra, at p. 136:

> The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.

[141] So, for example, when a court interprets legislation alleged to be a reasonable limitation in a free and democratic society as stated in s. 1 of the Charter, the court must inevitably delineate some of the attributes of a democratic society. Although it is not necessary to articulate the complete list of democratic attributes in these remarks, Dickson C.J.'s comments remain instructive.

[142] Democratic values and principles under the Charter demand that legislators and the executive take these into account; and if they fail to do so, courts should stand ready to intervene to protect these democratic values as appropriate. As others have so forcefully stated, judges are not acting undemocratically by intervening when there are indications that a legislative or executive decision was not reached in accordance with the democratic principles mandated by the Charter.

[143] With this background in mind, I now turn to discuss the jurisprudence on the specific question of the choice of the appropriate remedy that should apply in this appeal.

B. Remedial Principles

[144] The leading case on constitutional remedies is Schachter, supra. Writing on behalf of the majority in Schachter, Lamer C.J. stated that the first step in selecting a remedial course under s. 52 is to define the extent of the Charter inconsistency which must be struck down. In the present case, that inconsistency is the exclusion of sexual orientation from the protected grounds of the IRPA. As I have concluded above, this exclusion is an unjustifiable infringement upon the equality rights guaranteed in s. 15 of the Charter.

[145] Once the Charter inconsistency has been identified, the next step is to determine which remedy is appropriate. In Schachter, this Court noted that, depending upon the circumstances, there are several remedial options available to a court in dealing with a Charter violation that was not saved by s. 1. These include striking down the legislation, severance of the offending sections, striking down or severance with a temporary suspension of the declaration of invalidity, reading down, and reading provisions into the legislation.

[146] Because the Charter violation in the instant case stems from an omission, the remedy of reading down is simply not available. Further, I note that given the considerable number of sections at issue in this case and the important roles they play in the scheme of the IRPA as a whole, severance of these sections from the remainder of the Act would be akin to striking down the entire Act.

[147] The appellants suggest that the circumstances of this case warrant the reading in of sexual orientation into the offending sections of the IRPA. However, in the Alberta Court of Appeal, O'Leary J.A. and Hunt J.A. agreed that the appropriate remedy would be to declare the relevant provisions of the IRPA unconstitutional and to suspend that declaration for a period of time to allow the Legislature to address the matter. McClung J.A. would have gone further and declared the IRPA invalid in its entirety. With respect, for the reasons that follow, I cannot agree with either remedy chosen by the Court of Appeal.

[148] In Schachter, Lamer C.J. noted that when determining whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate, courts must have regard to the "twin guiding principles", namely, respect for the role of the legislature and respect for the purposes of the Charter, which I have discussed generally above. Turning first to the role of the legislature, Lamer C.J. stated at p. 700 that reading in is an important tool in "avoiding undue intrusion into the legislative sphere. . . . [T]he purpose of reading in is to be as faithful as possible within the requirements of the Constitution to the scheme enacted by the Legislature."

[149] He went on to quote the following passage from Carol Rogerson in "The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness", in R. J. Sharpe, ed., Charter Litigation (1987), 233, at p. 288:

> Courts should certainly go as far as required to protect rights, but no further. Interference with legitimate legislative purposes should be minimized and laws serving such purposes should be allowed to remain operative to the extent that rights are not violated. Legislation which serves desirable social purposes may give rise to entitlements which themselves deserve some protection.

[150] As I discussed above, the purpose of the IRPA is the recognition and protection of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of Albertans through the elimination of discriminatory practices. It seems to me that the remedy of reading in would minimize interference with this clearly legitimate legislative purpose and thereby avoid excessive intrusion into the legislative sphere whereas striking down the IRPA would deprive all Albertans of human rights protection and thereby unduly interfere with the scheme enacted by the Legislature.

[151] I find support for my position in Haig, supra, where the Ontario Court of Appeal read the words "sexual orientation" into s. 3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. H-6. At p. 508, Krever J.A., writing for a unanimous court, stated that it was > inconceivable . . . that Parliament would have preferred no human rights Act over one that included sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. To believe otherwise would be a gratuitous insult to Parliament.

[152] Turning to the second of the twin guiding principles, the respondents suggest that the facts of this case are illustrative of a conflict between two grounds, namely, religion and sexual orientation. If sexual orientation were simply read into the IRPA, the respondents contend that this would undermine the ability of the IRPA to provide protection against discrimination based on religion, one of the fundamental goals of that legislation. This result is alleged to be "inconsistent with the deeper social purposes of the Charter".

[153] I concluded above that the internal balancing mechanisms of the IRPA were an adequate means of disposing of any conflict that might arise between religion and sexual orientation. Thus, I cannot accept the respondents' assertion that the reading in approach does not respect the purposes of the Charter. In fact, as I see the matter, reading sexual orientation into the IRPA as a further ground of prohibited discrimination can only enhance those purposes. The Charter, like the IRPA, is concerned with the promotion and protection of inherent dignity and inalienable rights. Thus, expanding the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA allows this Court to act in a manner which, consistent with the purposes of the Charter, would augment the scope of the IRPA's protections. In contrast, striking down or severing parts of the IRPA would deny all Albertans protection from marketplace discrimination. In my view, this result is clearly antithetical to the purposes of the Charter.

[154] In Schachter, Lamer C.J. noted that the twin guiding principles can only be fulfilled if due consideration is given to several additional criteria which further inform the determination as to whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate. These include remedial precision, budgetary implications, effects on the thrust of the legislation, and interference with legislative objectives.

[155] As to the first of the above listed criteria, the court must be able to define with a "sufficient degree of precision" how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. I do not believe that the present case is one in which this Court has been improperly called upon to fill in large gaps in the legislation. Rather, in my view, there is remedial precision insofar as the insertion of the words "sexual orientation" into the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA will, without more, ensure the validity of the legislation and remedy the constitutional wrong.

[156] In her reasons in this case, Hunt J.A. concluded that there was insufficient remedial precision to justify the remedy of reading in. She expressed two concerns. Firstly, she held that adequate precision likely would not be possible without a definition of the term "sexual orientation". With respect, I cannot agree. Although the term "sexual orientation" has been defined in the human rights legislation of the Yukon Territory, it appears undefined in the Canadian Human Rights Act, the human rights legislation of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, and s. 718.2(a)(i) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, as amended by

S.C. 1995, c. 22, s. 6. In addition, "sexual orientation" was not defined when it was recognized by this Court in Egan, supra, as an analogous ground under s. 15 of the Charter. In my opinion, "sexual orientation" is a commonly used term with an easily discernible common-sense meaning.

[157] In addition, I concur with the comments of R. Khullar (in "Vriend: Remedial Issues for Unremedied Discrimination" (1998), 7 N.J.C.L. 221) who stated (at pp. 237-38) that,

> [i]f there is any ambiguity in the term "sexual orientation," it is no greater than that encompassed by terms such as "race," "ethnic origin" or "religion," all of which are undefined prohibited grounds of discrimination in the Charter which have not posed any undue difficulty for the courts or legislatures to understand and apply.

[158] Hunt J.A. was also troubled by the possible impact of reading in upon s. 7(2) of the IRPA. This section states that s. 7(1) (employment), as regards age and marital status, "does not affect the operation of any bona fide retirement or pension plan or the terms or conditions of any bona fide group or employee insurance plan". As the Court of Appeal heard no argument on this point and as there was no evidence before the court to explain the rationale behind this provision, Hunt J.A. held that, if the protections of the IRPA were to be extended to gay men and lesbians, it would be necessary to decide whether this group would be included or excluded from s. 7(2). She found that this was something the court was in no position to do. In light of this difficulty, Hunt J.A. was concerned that the reading in remedy "would engage the court in the kind of 'filling in of details' against which Lamer, C.J.C., cautions in Schachter [supra]" (p. 69).

[159] In my view, whether gay men and lesbians are included or excluded from s. 7(2) is a peripheral issue which does not deprive the reading in remedy of the requisite precision. I agree with K. Roach who noted that the legislature "can always subsequently intervene on matters of detail that are not dictated by the Constitution" (Constitutional Remedies in Canada (1994 (loose-leaf)), at p. 14-64.1). I therefore conclude on this point that, in the present case, there is sufficient remedial precision to justify the remedy of reading in.

[160] Turning to budgetary repercussions, in the circumstances of the present appeal, such considerations are not sufficiently significant to warrant avoiding the reading in approach. On this issue, the trial judge stated (at p. 18):

> There will undoubtedly be some budgetary impact on the Human Rights Commission as a result of the addition of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. But, unlike Schachter [supra], it would not be substantial enough to change the nature of the scheme of the legislation.

Although the scope of this Court's review of the IRPA is considerably broader than that which the trial judge was asked to undertake, as I noted above, having not heard anything persuasive to the contrary, I am not prepared to interfere with the trial judge's findings on this matter.

[161] As to the effects on the thrust of the legislation, it is difficult to see any deleterious impact. All persons covered under the current scope of the IRPA would continue to benefit from the protection provided by the Act in the same manner as they had before the reading in of sexual orientation. Thus, I conclude that it is reasonable to assume that, if the Legislature had been faced with the choice of having no human rights statute or having one that offered protection on the ground of sexual orientation, the latter option would have been chosen. As the inclusion of sexual orientation in the IRPA does not alter the legislation to any significant degree, it is reasonable to assume that the Legislature would have enacted it in any event.

[163] Lamer C.J. went on to note that, "[w]here the group to be added is smaller than the group originally benefitted, this is an indication that the assumption that the legislature would have enacted the benefit in any case is a sound one" (p. 712). In the present case, gay men and lesbians are clearly a smaller group than those already benefited by the IRPA. Thus, in my view, reading in remains the less intrusive option.

[164] The final criterion to examine is interference with the legislative objective. In Schachter, Lamer C.J. commented upon this factor as follows (at pp. 707-8):

> The degree to which a particular remedy intrudes into the legislative sphere can only be determined by giving careful attention to the objective embodied in the legislation in question. . . . A second level of legislative intention may be manifest in the means chosen to pursue that objective.

[165] With regard to the first level of legislative intention, as I discussed above, it is clear that reading sexual orientation into the IRPA would not interfere with the objective of the legislation. Rather, in my view, it can only enhance that objective. However, at first blush, it appears that reading in might interfere with the second level of legislative intention identified by Lamer C.J.

[166] As the Alberta Legislature has expressly chosen to exclude sexual orientation from the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA, the respondents argue that reading in would unduly interfere with the will of the Government. McClung J.A. shares this view. In his opinion, the remedy of reading in will never be appropriate where a legislative omission reflects a deliberate choice of the legislating body. He states that if a statute is unconstitutional, "the preferred consequence should be its return to the sponsoring legislature for representative, constitutional overhaul" (p. 35). However, as I see the matter, by definition, Charter scrutiny will always involve some interference with the legislative will.

[167] Where a statute has been found to be unconstitutional, whether the court chooses to read provisions into the legislation or to strike it down, legislative intent is necessarily interfered with to some extent. Therefore, the closest a court can come to respecting the legislative intention is to determine what the legislature would likely have done if it had known that its chosen measures would be found unconstitutional. As I see the matter, a deliberate choice of means will not act as a bar to reading in save for those circumstances in which the means chosen can be shown to be of such centrality to the aims of the legislature and so integral to the scheme of the legislation, that the legislature would not have enacted the statute without them.

[168] Indeed, as noted by the intervener Canadian Jewish Congress, if reading in is always deemed an inappropriate remedy where a government has expressly chosen a course of action, this amounts to the suggestion that whenever a government violates a Charter right, it ought to do so in a deliberate manner so as to avoid the remedy of reading in. In my view, this is a wholly unacceptable result.

[169] In the case at bar, the means chosen by the legislature, namely, the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA, can hardly be described as integral to the scheme of that Act. Nor can I accept that this choice was of such centrality to the aims of the legislature that it would prefer to sacrifice the entire IRPA rather than include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, particularly for the reasons I will now discuss.

[170] As mentioned by my colleague Cory J., in 1993, the Alberta Legislature appointed the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel to conduct a public review of the IRPA and the Alberta Human Rights Commission. The Panel issued a report making several recommendations including the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination in all areas covered by the Act. The Government responded to this recommendation by deferring the decision to the judiciary: "This recommendation will be dealt with through the current court case Vriend v. Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Alberta and Her Majesty's Attorney General in and for the Province of Alberta" (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel, supra, at p. 21).

[171] In my opinion, this statement is a clear indication that, in light of the controversy surrounding the protection of gay men and lesbians under the IRPA, it was the intention of the Alberta Legislature to defer to the courts on this issue. Indeed, I interpret this statement to be an express invitation for the courts to read sexual orientation into the IRPA in the event that its exclusion from the legislation is found to violate the provisions of the Charter. Therefore, primarily because of this and contrary to the assertions of the respondents, I believe that, in these circumstances, the remedy of reading in is entirely consistent with the legislative intention.

[172] In addition to the comments which I outlined above, McClung J.A. also criticizes the remedy of reading in on a more fundamental level. He views the reading of provisions into a statute as an unacceptable intrusion of the courts into the legislative process. Commenting upon the trial judge's decision to read sexual orientation into the IRPA he stated (at pp. 29-30):

> To amend and extend it, by reading up to include "sexual orientation" was a sizeable judicial intervention into the affairs of the community and, at a minimum, an undesirable arrogation of legislative power by the court. . . . [T]o me it is an extravagant exercise for any s. 96 judge to use the enormous review power of his or her office in this way in order to wean competent legislatures from their "errors."

[173] McClung J.A. goes on to suggest that, by reading in, the trial judge overrode the express will of the electors of the Province of Alberta who, speaking through their parliamentary representatives, have decided that sexual orientation is not to be included in the protected categories of the IRPA.

[174] With respect, for the reasons outlined in the previous section of these reasons, I do not accept that extending the legislation in this case is an undemocratic exercise of judicial power. Rather, I concur with the comments of W. Black, who states (supra, at p. 128) that:

> . . . there is no conflict between judicial review and democracy if judges intervene where there are indications that a decision was not reached in accordance with democratic principles. Democracy requires that all citizens be allowed to participate in the democratic process, either directly or through equal consideration by their representatives. Parliamentary sovereignty is a means to this end, not an end in itself.

[175] In my view, the process by which the Alberta Legislature decided to exclude sexual orientation from the IRPA was inconsistent with democratic principles. Both the trial judge and all judges in the Court of Appeal agreed that the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA was a conscious and deliberate legislative choice. While McClung J.A. relies on this fact as a reason for the courts not to intervene, the theories of judicial review developed by several authors (see e.g. Black, supra; J. H. Ely, Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980); P. Monahan, "A Theory of Judicial Review Under the Charter", in Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada (1987), at pp. 97-138; D. M. Beatty, Constitutional Law in Theory and Practice (1995)) suggest the opposite conclusion.

[176] As I have already discussed, the concept of democracy means more than majority rule as Dickson C.J. so ably reminded us in Oakes, supra. In my view, a democracy requires that legislators take into account the interests of majorities and minorities alike, all of whom will be affected by the decisions they make. Where the interests of a minority have been denied consideration, especially where that group has historically been the target of prejudice and discrimination, I believe that judicial intervention is warranted to correct a democratic process that has acted improperly.

[178] …. When a court remedies an unconstitutional statute by reading in provisions, no doubt this constrains the legislative process and therefore should not be done needlessly, but only after considered examination. However, in my view, the "parliamentary safeguards" remain. Governments are free to modify the amended legislation by passing exceptions and defences which they feel can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Thus, when a court reads in, this is not the end of the legislative process because the legislature can pass new legislation in response, as I outlined above (see also Hogg and Bushell, supra). Moreover, the legislators can always turn to s. 33 of the Charter, the override provision, which in my view is the ultimate "parliamentary safeguard."

[179] On the basis of the foregoing analysis, I conclude that reading sexual orientation into the impugned provisions of the IRPA is the most appropriate way of remedying this underinclusive legislation. The appellants suggest that this remedy should have immediate effect. I agree. There is no risk in the present case of harmful unintended consequences upon private parties or public funds (see e.g. Egan, supra). Further, the mechanisms to deal with complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation are already in place and require no significant adjustment. I find additional support for my position in both Haig, supra, and Newfoundland (Human Rights Commission) v. Newfoundland (Minister of Employment and Labour Relations) (1995), 1995 CanLII 6252 (NL SC), 127 D.L.R. (4th) 694 (Nfld. S.C.), where sexual orientation was read into the impugned statutes without a suspension of the remedy. There is no evidence before this Court to suggest that any harm resulted from the immediate operation of the remedy in those cases.

2.4 Suspensions of declarations of invalidity

2.4.1 Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38 (citations omitted)

This Chapter offers two excerpts from this Ontario AG v. G. The excerpt offered here looks closely at suspensions of declarations of invalidity. The other, above, focuses on general principles of section 52 remedies.

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Martin and Kasirer JJ. was delivered by Karakatsanis J. —

I. Introduction

[1] People with mental illnesses face persistent stigma and prejudicial treatment in Canadian society, which has imposed profound and widespread social, political, and legal disadvantage on them. In particular, discriminatory perceptions that those with mental illnesses are inherently and indefinitely dangerous persist. …

[2] This appeal requires the Court to apply the equality guarantee to the manner in which those found not criminally responsible on account of mental disorder (NCRMD) of sexual offences are treated by Ontario's sex offender registry regime. It also provides an opportunity to set out a consistent set of principles applicable to granting remedies for legislation that violates the Charter.

[3] In Ontario, Christopher's Law (Sex Offender Registry), 2000, S.O. 2000, c. 1 (Christopher's Law), requires those who are either convicted or found NCRMD of a sexual offence to physically report to a police station to have their personal information added to the province's sex offender registry. They must continue to report in person at least once a year to keep their information up to date. They must also report every time certain information changes. Even when individuals are no longer required to report or when they die, information previously gathered about them under the registry is retained.

[4] Those who are found guilty of a sexual offence can be exempted from reporting in the first place by receiving a discharge under s. 730 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, can be removed from the registry upon receipt of a free pardon, and can be exempted from continuing to report upon receipt of either a free pardon or criminal record suspension. There is therefore some opportunity, based on an individualized assessment, to be exempted from the sex offender registry. By contrast, everyone found NCRMD must report upon discharge by a provincial review board or court, without exception, no one found NCRMD can ever be removed from the registry, and no one found NCRMD can ever be exempted from reporting. This is so even if they have received a discharge from a review board.

[5] G, the respondent, was found NCRMD of two sexual offences and then absolutely discharged by the Ontario Review Board (ORB). His record in the 19 years since those offences occurred has been spotless. Nevertheless, as Christopher's Law currently stands, G will have to report and will be a registered "sex offender" for the rest of his life. His information will remain in the registry even after he passes away. He has no opportunity for removal.

[6] ….Christopher's Law draws discriminatory distinctions between people found guilty and people found NCRMD of sexual offences on the basis of mental disability, contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter. These discriminatory distinctions cannot be justified in a free and democratic society. ….

II. Background

[7] In September 2001, G experienced his first and only manic episode. A month later, he was charged with two counts of sexually assaulting his then-wife, one count of unlawfully confining her, and one count of harassment. The two incidents underlying the charges occurred as a result of that manic episode.

[8] In June 2002, G was found NCRMD. When G appeared before the ORB in July 2002, he received a conditional discharge. In August 2003, the ORB ordered that he be absolutely discharged on the basis that "[t]here is simply no evidence to find that [G] is a significant risk to the safety of the public". G has not engaged in criminal activity since being absolutely discharged approximately 17 years ago. He has adhered to treatment and his symptoms have been in full remission. He has maintained stable employment and has strong and supportive relationships with his family.

[9] G was placed on the provincial sex offender registry in August 2004, and on the federal registry in January 2005. Since then, G has fully complied with his reporting obligations. He has reported in person annually as required by Christopher's Law and has complied with other requirements imposed by the federal Sex Offender Information Registration Act, S.C. 2004, c. 10 (SOIRA).

D. What Is the Appropriate Remedy?

[80] The parties submit that the effect of any declaration that Christopher's Law is of no force or effect should be suspended, but disagree on whether G should be immediately exempted from that suspension. ….

[81] In recent years, academic commentators have urged that remedies for unconstitutional laws be determined in a more principled, coherent, and transparent way. In particular, our jurisprudence dealing with suspensions of declarations of invalidity, and the exemption of individuals from those suspensions, has been criticized for unduly compromising the protection of rights by failing to grant meaningful remedies, and for diminishing the quality of decision making by failing to transparently explain the basis for a suspension. …

[83] …. suspensions of declarations of invalidity should be rare, granted only when an identifiable public interest, grounded in the Constitution, is endangered by an immediate declaration to such an extent that it outweighs the harmful impacts of delaying the declaration's effect. And when declarations are suspended, granting individual exemptions pursuant to s. 24(1) of the Charter will often balance the interests of the litigant, the broader public, and the legislature in a manner that is "appropriate and just".

[paragraphs between 82-116 appear in the earlier excerpt from Ontario AG v G, found here]

(4) Suspending the Effect of Section 52(1) Declarations

[117] There are times when an immediately effective declaration of invalidity would endanger an interest of such great importance that, on balance, the benefits of delaying the effect of that declaration outweigh the cost of preserving an unconstitutional law that violates Charter rights.

[118] In total, this Court has suspended declarations of invalidity in 23 out of approximately 90 decisions in which it declared legislation to be of no force or effect for violating the Charter.[6] ….. Suspensions were initially recognized to be available when necessary to protect against serious threats to the rule of law. Then, in Schachter, this Court took an approach to granting suspensions based on determining whether cases fit into one of a list of categories — threats to the rule of law, threats to public safety, or underinclusive benefits — based on the public interest in the law's interim application. Since then, many cases have gone beyond the Schachter categories to grant suspensions for other reasons, including concerns related to the roles and capacities of courts and legislatures. The 12 declarations of invalidity for Charter violations after Schachter between 1992 and 1997 — from Zundel to Benner — took immediate effect. By contrast, between 2003 and 2015 — from Trociuk to Carter — 13 out of 17 s. 52(1) declarations were suspended. Those more recent cases have been criticized for suspending declarations too frequently and without sufficient explanation. This case gives the Court an opportunity to recalibrate the remedial principles that guide the judicial discretion to delay the effect of a declaration of invalidity.

[119] Suspensions of declarations of invalidity have attracted significant concern even as they have come to be used in jurisdictions around the world, including Canada, Germany, South Africa, Hong Kong, and Indonesia. While most accept that there will be some circumstances when the immediate enforcement of rights must give way to other constitutional concerns, opinions vary on the appropriate underlying principles and the right balance between them. Some argue suspensions should only be granted in "extreme cases" in order to prevent "legal chaos". Others suggest that suspensions can be granted to "remand complex issues to legislative institutions", giving them the first opportunity to respond to a finding of unconstitutionality. Still others endorse an approach based on proportionality, which would import considerations from the Oakes test to require the government to demonstrate that a suspension is justified. But all commentators recognize some discretion to grant suspensions in Canada.

[125] Schachter's categorical approach has resulted in uncertainty about when suspensions will be granted. Some decisions have gone beyond the Schachter categories. ….In other cases, failing to fit into a Schachter category has been given as an explanation for declining to grant a suspension. At times, the Court has provided no explanation for suspending the effect of its declaration….

[126] A principled approach makes it possible to reconcile these cases on suspended declarations, and encourage consistency and transparency. …. The categorical approach in Schachter has been overtaken by the underlying remedial principles that animated those categories.

[127] As well, the relevance of some of the underlying principles has evolved in our jurisprudence. Lamer C.J. specifically noted in Schachter that "whether to delay the application of a declaration of [invalidity] should . . . turn not on considerations of the role of the courts and the legislature, but rather on considerations . . . relating to the effect of an immediate declaration on the public" (p. 717, emphasis added).

[128] ….. Respecting the legislature cannot come at the expense of the functions the Constitution assigns to the judiciary: giving effect to constitutional rights and making determinations of law.

[130] In determining whether to exercise remedial discretion to suspend a declaration of invalidity, the Court should consider whether and to what extent the government has demonstrated that an immediately effective declaration would have a limiting effect on the legislature's ability to set policy. In the vast majority of cases, as Bruce Ryder recognizes, "[a] suspended declaration neither enlarges nor diminishes the range of constitutional choices open to a legislature" (p. 285)… By contrast, there may be some cases where an immediate declaration could create legal rights that could narrow the range of constitutional policy choices available to the government or undermine the effectiveness of its policy choices. As I shall explain, this case offers an example of a situation in which the legal rights created by the declaration of invalidity could undermine the effectiveness of the legislature's policy choices. Even so, avoiding such restrictions on the ability to legislate is but a relevant consideration, and may not be sufficient to justify a suspension of invalidity.

[131] The benefit achieved (or harm avoided) by the suspension must then be transparently weighed against countervailing fundamental remedial principles, namely the principles that Charter rights should be safeguarded through effective remedies and that the public has an interest in constitutionally compliant legislation. This includes considering factors such as the significance of the rights infringement (Bedford, at para. 167) — for example, the weight given to ongoing rights infringement will be especially heavy when criminal jeopardy is at stake — and the potential that the suspension will create harm such as legal uncertainty (Leckey, at pp. 594-95). Albeit in different constitutional contexts, the Constitutional Courts of South Africa and Germany have similarly recognized that the propriety of a constitutional remedy short of an immediate declaration of invalidity is a question of balancing the harms of failing to immediately protect rights against the harms of an immediate declaration.

[132] However, a balancing approach does not mean that suspensions will be easier to justify. A categorical approach may have been intended to provide narrow circumstances in which an unconstitutional law may continue to apply temporarily, but it has not had that effect. A balancing approach permits courts to engage with the underlying principles and ensure that a delayed declaration is not ordered unless there are compelling reasons to do so. The appropriate balance will result in suspensions only in rare circumstances…

[133] ….that the government bears the onus of demonstrating that the importance of another compelling interest grounded in the Constitution outweighs the continued breach of constitutional rights. In each case, the specific interest, and the manner in which an immediate declaration would endanger that interest, must be identified and, where necessary, supported by evidence. Suspensions of declarations of invalidity will be rare. Indeed, this aligns with this Court's recent practice. This Court has not suspended the effect of a declaration of invalidity since its decision in Carter over five years ago, making 13 immediately effective declarations that legislation was of no force or effect for violating the Charter over that period.[9]

[134] When deciding whether to grant a suspension, a court must also determine its length. ….

[135] In my view, the onus to demonstrate the appropriate length of time remains with the government and there is no "default" length of time such as 12 months. ….It is the government's responsibility to make a case for the length of the suspension it seeks.

[136] I add this. My colleagues contend that s. 33 of the Charter is an express and, thus, more legitimate source of authority that allows Parliament or a provincial legislature to suspend the effect of a declaration of invalidity. Since the Constitution gives Parliament and the provincial legislatures this power, my colleagues suggest that suspension is legislative in nature and at odds with the judicial role.

[137] This is an unsustainable proposition. ….. Court-ordered suspension leaves Parliament and the legislatures free to respond to the declaration of invalidity, including by using s. 33. The court cannot shirk its responsibility to remedy constitutional violations simply because s. 33 permits Parliament or a legislature to exceptionally override certain Charter rights and freedoms.

[138] The court has the authority — and responsibility — to determine whether a declaration of invalidity should be suspended. It is not for the courts to direct or encourage Parliament and the provincial legislatures to use their exceptional authority to override Charter rights and freedoms.

[139] In sum, the effect of a declaration should not be suspended unless the government demonstrates that an immediately effective declaration would endanger a compelling public interest that outweighs the importance of immediate constitutional compliance and an immediately effective remedy for those whose Charter rights will be violated. The court must consider the impact of such a suspension on rights holders and the public, as well as whether an immediate declaration of invalidity would significantly impair the legislature's democratic authority to set policy through legislation. The period of suspension, where warranted, should be long enough to give the legislature the amount of time it has demonstrated it requires to carry out its responsibility diligently and effectively, while recognizing that every additional day of rights violations will be a strong counterweight against giving the legislature more time.

(5) Individual Remedies — Exemptions From Suspensions

[140] Where a declaration of invalidity is suspended, it often raises the issue of whether the claimant should receive an individual remedy or exemption from that suspension. The Attorney General argues that individual exemptions from suspensions should not be granted except in extreme circumstances where the claimant will not benefit from the declaration absent an exemption. He says individual exemptions create uncertainty and undermine the rule of law by applying laws to everyone except the claimants who challenged them. He says granting individual exemptions usurps the role of the legislature by imposing judicial discretion where the statute precludes it.

….

[142] …s. 24(1) is too flexible to be restricted in this way. As other jurisprudence of this Court suggests, individual exemptions from suspensions will often be an "appropriate and just" remedy when an individual claimant has braved the storm of constitutional litigation and obtained a declaration whose benefit "enures to society at large" (Demers, at para. 99, per LeBel J.). On the other hand, where an exemption would undermine the rationale for the suspension, this will be a strong countervailing factor against granting an exemption.

….

[144] This Court has said that to be "appropriate and just", a s. 24(1) remedy should meaningfully vindicate the right of the claimant, conform to the separation of powers, invoke the powers and function of a court, be fair to the party against whom the remedy is ordered, and allow s. 24(1) to evolve to meet the challenges of each case (Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-59). In particular, an effective remedy that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimant will take into account the nature of the rights violation and the situation of the claimant, will be relevant to the claimant's experience and address the circumstances of the rights violation, and will not be "smothered" in procedural delays and difficulties (para. 55). The court's approach to s. 24(1) remedies must stay flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case (para. 59).

[145] This Court's jurisprudence makes clear that granting individual remedies while the effects of declarations of invalidity are suspended can be appropriate and just. ….

[146] A rule that individual claimants cannot be exempted from suspensions of declarations of invalidity would improperly fetter the broad discretion afforded under s. 24(1) of the Charter for courts to grant remedies they "conside[r] appropriate and just in the circumstances." [and] would often be unfair to the claimant, especially given that it is a court's decision to grant a suspension that makes the individual remedy necessary. ….

[147] ….. The importance of safeguarding constitutional rights weighs heavily in favour of an individual remedy. The concern for vindicating individual rights with effective remedies reaches back to Blackstone and Dicey, and continues to have force in the present day.

[148] Exempting only the claimant from a suspension may appear unfair at first glance. But the claimant is not in the same position as others subject to the impugned law in a key respect: the claimant who brings a successful constitutional challenge has done the public interest a service by ensuring that an unconstitutional law is taken off the books — the claimant has pursued the "right of the citizenry to constitutional behaviour by Parliament" . While, as the Attorney General submits, it is in the public interest for laws to apply to everyone uniformly, immediate remedies for claimants are also in the public interest. The practical realities of bringing a constitutional challenge may reduce the incentive for rights claimants to bring cases that carry substantial societal benefits. Individual exemptions can temper any further disincentive caused by suspensions. As a result, courts should focus not only on the case or legislation before them, but also encourage Charter compliance in the long term through their s. 24(1) remedies.

[149] [T]here must be a compelling reason to deny the claimant an immediately effective remedy. Two examples seem apparent.

[150] First, a court must consider whether and to what degree granting an exemption in the claimant's particular circumstances would undermine the interest motivating the suspension in the first place. Thus, the ability of the legislature to fashion policy responses to the declaration and the public interest in the interim operation of the legislation will be important considerations in determining whether an exemption can be granted. For example, when the effect of a declaration is suspended to protect public safety, an individual exemption would not be appropriate and just if it would endanger public safety. Evidence of the individual claimant's situation, which the court will likely have, will inform whether this is the case.

[151] Second, courts may also have a compelling reason to refrain from granting an individual exemption where practical considerations like judicial economy make it inappropriate to do so. For instance, if a large group or class of claimants comes forward, it may not be practical — or even possible — to conduct the individual assessments necessary to grant them all individual exemptions.

[152] …. …. Thus, if an exemption is otherwise appropriate and just, [claimants] should be exempted from suspensions in the absence of a compelling reason not to. Exemptions from suspensions will often be necessary to balance the interests of the litigant, the broader public, and the legislature.

[paras 153-159 appear in the earlier excerpt from Ontario A.G. v G., found here]…..

(7) Application to This Case

(a) What Form and Breadth Should the Remedy Take?

[160] The first step in determining the breadth and form of a s. 52(1) remedy is determining the extent of the law's inconsistency with the Charter…

[161] Here, Christopher's Law limits s. 15(1) of the Charter by requiring those found NCRMD to comply with the sex offender registry upon discharge without providing them with any opportunities for exemption and removal based on individualized assessment. It draws distinctions based on the enumerated ground of mental disability by extending opportunities for exemption and removal to those found guilty of a sexual offence but denying them to those found NCRMD. Those distinctions are discriminatory because they perpetuate the historical and enduring disadvantage experienced by persons with mental illnesses.

[162] The s. 15(1) infringement was found not to be minimally impairing of the right because making any form of individualized assessment that could lead to exemption and removal available to those found NCRMD would be less impairing of the right.

[163] Turning to the second step, a court must determine whether a tailored remedy would be appropriate, rather than a declaration of invalidity applying to the whole of the challenged law.

[164] Given the limited and precisely defined nature of the violation in the context of the overall scheme of the sex offender registry, some form of tailored remedy was clearly appropriate to respond to the unconstitutionality. The legislature would no doubt have enacted Christopher's Law to apply to those convicted of a sexual offence even if it could not include those found NCRMD and granted a discharge.

[165] In this case, reading in an individualized assessment requirement would intrude on the legislative sphere — there are many ways to provide for such an assessment and "it is the legislature's role to fill in the gaps, not the court's" (Schachter, at p. 705).

[166] On the other hand, a declaration reading down Christopher's Law such that it is of no force or effect to the extent it applies to everyone unconstitutionally affected effectively vindicates rights without interfering with aspects of the statute's operation unaffected by the finding of unconstitutionality. Granting a tailored remedy here will better protect the public's interest in legislation enacted for its benefit and will better respect the role of the legislature, while also safeguarding Charter rights and realizing the public's interest in constitutionally compliant legislation.

(b) Was the Effect of the Declaration Properly Suspended?

[172] The Attorney General has identified public safety as the public interest that justifies a suspension. The importance of this interest, and its appropriate weight in the analysis, is informed by the danger posed by those found NCRMD of sexual offences and granted absolute discharges by a provincial review board.

[173] The Criminal Code requires provincial review boards to absolutely discharge any person found NCRMD who does not pose a significant risk of committing a serious criminal offence (Winko, at para. 57). If a person poses that type of risk, the review board may discharge them subject to conditions it considers appropriate (Criminal Code, s. 672.54(b)). The review board's "paramount consideration" in making any disposition is public safety.

[174] The application judge found those discharged after an NCRMD finding to be at a statistically higher risk of offending than the general population. Those who are absolutely discharged therefore may pose some elevated risk of committing criminal offences. …..

[175] The application judge found that the registry contributed to public safety by enhancing the ability of police to prevent and investigate sexual offences. Immediately relieving a group of people who may pose some risk of committing sexual offences from the obligation to report or permitting them to seek removal of their information could detract from this enhanced ability. The threat to public safety is therefore meaningful. However, given that persons found NCRMD who pose the highest demonstrable risk to reoffend are not given absolute discharges, this threat is limited.

[176] The other public interest at stake is respect for the legislature's ability to enact its preferred rights-respecting scheme. Granting an immediate declaration of invalidity could risk compromising the legislature's ability to fulfil its role as policymaker because allowing everyone found NCRMD of a sexual offence and absolutely discharged to be removed from the sex offender registry could restrict the effectiveness of the new version of Christopher's Law eventually enacted by the Ontario legislature in response to these reasons. Identifying those individuals and requiring them to register and report again — or to undergo individualized assessment of some kind — would likely be impracticable because their information simply would not be retained in the interim.

[177] Balanced against these considerations is the significance of the rights violation that the suspension would temporarily prolong. Christopher's Law treats those found NCRMD and discharged in accordance with a persistent, demeaning stereotype. The law compels them to report in person to a police station, subjects them to the spectre of random police checks at their residence, and retains their personal information without providing an opportunity to determine whether they pose sufficient risk to justify that intrusion on their liberty and privacy. Importantly, granting a suspension also runs counter to the public's interest in constitutionally compliant legislation.

[178] Here, there is an ongoing threat to public safety, although it is limited as the group of individuals whose information would no longer be tracked consists entirely of persons who the Review Board has deemed do not pose a significant threat to public safety. The legislature's ability to address that gap in public safety would, however, be appreciably restricted by an immediate declaration. This is a close call. But on balance, the combination of these two legitimate interests (public safety and preserving the legislature's latitude to respond to the finding of unconstitutionality) justifies temporarily depriving those affected of the immediate benefit of this judgment and allowing the violation to persist.

[179] The parties agree with the 12-month suspension ordered by the Court of Appeal. I see no basis to interfere with that determination. However, in future, courts will expect more detailed submissions on the length of time required.

(c) Should G Have Been Exempted From the Suspension?

[180] The final question is whether it was appropriate and just to exempt G from the suspension. The Attorney General submits that, because of a lack of "expert forensic risk assessment", it was not.

[181] Although judges may not have the expertise to conduct such forensic assessments themselves, they are well-suited to deciding and frequently charged with making determinations relating to public safety and risk in other contexts, including those that lead to exemption and removal from the sex offender registry. When judges decide whether to absolutely or conditionally discharge someone found guilty of an offence, they consider the best interests of the accused and the public interest (Criminal Code, s. 730). Further, a judge deciding whether to make a termination or exemption order in respect of a person subject to the federal sex offender registry must determine whether the impact of compliance on the applicant "would be grossly disproportionate to the public interest in protecting society through the effective prevention or investigation of crimes of a sexual nature" (Criminal Code, ss. 490.016(1) and 490.023(2); Bill C-16, Sex Offender Information Registration Act, 3rd Sess., 37th Parl., 2004, s. 20). These are not decisions that require expert forensic evidence. …

[182] The Court of Appeal granted G an individual exemption from Christopher's Law. … The exercise of the court's discretion deserves deference. The ORB, an expert tribunal, determined that G was not at significant risk of committing a serious criminal offence 17 years ago. His record since his release has been spotless and there is no indication that he poses a risk to public safety. An exemption would ensure he receives an effective remedy — nearly six years have passed since he filed his notice of application and his case has been argued in three levels of court.

[183] The individual exemption to the suspension by definition lasts only as long as the suspension by itself. Whether G will be caught by new legislation, while highly unlikely, will depend on whether he comes within its terms. Courts cannot grant an exemption to legislation that has not yet been enacted, because they cannot predict the outcome of the legislative process.

2.4.2 R. v. Albashir, 2021 SCC 48 (citations omitted): Are suspended declarations retroactive or purely prospective?

December 20, 2013*: In Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford, 2013 SCC 72 (CanLII), [2013] 3 SCR 1101, https://canlii.ca/t/g2f56, the Supreme Court of Canada declared Section 210, as it relates to prostitution, and ss. 212(1)(j) and 213(1)(c) inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and hence void. The word "prostitution" was struck from the definition of "common bawdy-house" in s. 197(1) of the Criminal Code as it applies to s. 210 only of the Criminal Code invalid. The Court suspended the declaration of invalidity for one year.

March 15, 2014-December 5, 2014: Albashir said to have committed offences under one of the provisions challenged in Bedford, s.212.(1)(j) ("Every one who (j) lives wholly or in part on the avails of prostitution of another person, is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years").

December 22, 2016: Albashir and two co-accused were charged under the provisions declared invalid in Bedford, and some newer provisions, for offences committed between March 15, 2014 and December 5, 2014, during the suspension period.

January 29, 2018*: Conclusion of trial. "At the trial [(2018 BCSC 736 (Masuhara J) unpublished] the judge quashed two counts on the indictment that charged the appellants under s. 212(1)(j) (counts 6 and 13). He did so because he found that although the appellants committed these offences while Bedford's declaration of non-constitutionality was suspended, they could not be convicted and sentenced for an offence that did not meet constitutional requirements". (R. v. Mohsenipour, 2023 BCCA 6 (CanLII), <https://canlii.ca/t/jtstm> at 11].

On appeal the BCCA restored the conviction (2020 BCCA 160). Albashir and Mohsenipour appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Abella, Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Martin and Kasirer JJ. was delivered by

Karakatsanis J. —

[1] Ontario (Attorney General) v. G, 2020 SCC 38, this Court provided a framework for identifying those exceptionally rare cases where a declaration of constitutional invalidity should be temporarily suspended to permit the legislature to respond. A suspended declaration is only justified where a compelling public interest, grounded in the Constitution, outweighs the harms of temporarily maintaining the unconstitutional law. This case requires us to determine the legal consequences of suspending declarations of invalidity of a criminal offence. In particular, can persons who commit that offence prior to the expiry of the suspension be convicted once the suspension expires and the declaration takes effect? The answer depends on whether the declaration (or any remedial legislation) has retroactive or purely prospective application.

[2] Retroactive declarations change the law for all time, both reaching into the past and affecting the future. Once the declaration takes effect, the law is deemed to have been invalid from the moment of its enactment. Conversely, when the declaration is purely prospective, the law was valid from its enactment but is invalid once the declaration takes effect.

[3] In Canada (Attorney General) v. Bedford this Court found s. 212(1)(j) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, which prohibited living on the avails of sex work, to be unconstitutionally overbroad because it criminalized non-exploitative actions that could enhance the safety and security of sex workers. … This declaration did not take immediate effect but rather was suspended for one year. The Court did not explicitly state whether this declaration would apply retroactively or purely prospectively at the conclusion of the period of suspension.

[4] Parliament enacted remedial legislation before the suspension expired. The former s.212(1)(j) was replaced with a new provision that prohibits obtaining a material benefit from sexual services but exempts legitimate, non-exploitative conduct. The new legislation did not include any transitional or retroactive provisions.

[5] The appellants were found by the trial judge to be parasitic, exploitative pimps during the one-year period of suspension, contrary to s. 212(l)(j). The prosecution proceeded after the suspension expired. The appellants successfully applied to quash the resulting charges at trial. The British Columbia Court of Appeal allowed the Crown's appeals…. and entered convictions on each count. The appellants now ask this Court to set aside the Court of Appeal's order and restore the trial judge's order quashing the counts.

[6] I would dismiss the appeals and affirm the appellants' convictions. The purpose animating the suspension in Bedford was to avoid the deregulation of sex work (thus maintaining the protection of vulnerable sex workers) while Parliament crafted replacement legislation. In light of that purpose, I conclude that the declaration of invalidity was purely prospective, effective at the end of the period of suspension. Thus, the appellants were liable under s. 212(1)(j) for their conduct during the suspension period, and could be charged and convicted under this provision even after the suspension expired.

[7] The temporal application of a declaration is grounded in foundational constitutional principles and the presumptions to which they give rise.

[8] As I shall explain, judicial declarations are presumptively retroactive but that presumption is rebutted when retroactivity would defeat the compelling public interests that required the suspension. However, this does not leave those who may be personally prejudiced by a Charter breach during the suspension without a remedy. Where the remedial declaration operates prospectively, the findings of unconstitutionality by this Court can operate retroactively in individual cases, giving remedial effect to both s. 24(1) of the Charter and s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Such a result respects the constitutional roles of both the legislature and the judiciary, ensures that the public and vulnerable persons maintain the protections of the criminal law, ensures that Parliament has the option to design a specific regime, and gives remedial protection to those whose Charter rights have been violated.

….

I. Background

A. Bedford and Responding Legislation

[10] On December 20, 2013, this Court released its decision in Bedford. ….

[12] Two weeks before the suspension expired, Parliament enacted remedial legislation, replacing the living on the avails offence with the offence of obtaining a material benefit from sexual services provided for consideration: Criminal Code, s. 286.2. The new offence includes a number of exceptions but they do not apply in abusive or exploitative situations: Criminal Code, s. 286.2(5). Parliament did not state whether the amendments were to apply retroactively or prospectively.

B. Supreme Court of British Columbia, 2018 BCSC 736 (Masuhara J.)

[13] About two years after the declaration took effect, the appellants, Tamim Albashir and Kasra Mohsenipour, were charged with numerous offences arising out of an "escort" operation. They managed practically all aspects of the operation — clients, service locations, advertising, supplies, and transportation.

[15] …., on the trial judge's findings the appellants were precisely the type of "controlling and abusive pimps" that were the legitimate targets of the living on the avails offence: Bedford, at para. 142.

[16] Despite that, the trial judge … quashed the charges because, once the Bedford suspension expired, the offence was unconstitutional.

[17] The trial judge relied on this Court's decision in Canada (Attorney General) v. Hislop, 2007 SCC 10, [2007] 1 SCR 429, as saying that suspended s. 52(1) declarations have a "delayed retroactive effect", unless the court clearly states otherwise: para. 345. Thus, "[o]nce the suspension expires, the law will always have been unconstitutional" and the effect of the Bedford suspension expiring was that "s. 212(1)(j) has always been invalid": paras. 345 and 350.

[25] The key issue on appeal is whether s. 212(1)(j) was retroactively invalid such that it could not subsequently ground a conviction. The answer to this turns on the temporal nature of judicial remedies. I will then consider the relationship between a declaration of invalidity under s. 52(1) and individual remedies under s. 24(1).

A. Temporal Nature of Remedies

[26] When a court makes a declaration of invalidity under s. 52(1), the temporal effect of that constitutional remedy is rooted in the nature of the remedy itself. Constitutional remedies must be purposively interpreted in their "proper linguistic, philosophic and historical contexts". They must also be interpreted in a "generous and expansive" manner that is sensitive to evolving circumstances.

[27] When legislation violates a Charter right, three foundational constitutional principles guide the interpretation of constitutional remedies: constitutionalism, the rule of law, and the separation of powers.

[29] This supremacy clause [s.52(1)] has existed in other forms since Canada's original constitution, the Constitution Act, 1867. The Canadian judiciary's role in reviewing the constitutionality of legislation thus has a considerable history.

[30] When a court finds legislation to be inconsistent with the Constitution, it must consider not only the principle of constitutional supremacy in s. 52(1), but other — at times competing — constitutional imperatives to determine an appropriate remedy. In this way, courts are also guided in their remedial discretion by the principles of the rule of law and the separation of powers. They can take into account, for example, the entitlement of the public to the benefit of legislation, as well as the different institutional roles that courts and legislatures are called to play: G, at para 94.

[31] Thus, despite the absolute language of s. 52(1), when a court exercises its remedial jurisdiction to grant a declaration of unconstitutionality, it has discretion to give the principle of constitutional supremacy immediate effect or to suspend the declaration for a given period of time: G, at paras. 120-21. In rare circumstances, a compelling public interest will warrant a suspension, although this suspension must not last longer than is necessary for the government to address the constitutional infirmity: G, at paras. 132 and 135.

[33] Unlike a formal declaration under s. 52(1) that renders the legislation invalid, s. 24(1) is an entirely personal remedy that can only be invoked by a claimant alleging a violation of their own constitutional rights: R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 SCR 96, at para. 61.

[35] There is a strong presumption against retroactive application of legislation because the rule of law requires that people be able to order their affairs in light of an established legal order: R. Sullivan, Statutory Interpretation (3rd ed. 2016), at p. 354. As Professor Sullivan aptly puts it, when legislation is retroactive, "the content of the law becomes known only when it is too late to do anything about it": p. 354. Even so, the rule of law does not prohibit retroactive legislation. When they can do so within the confines of the Charter (for example, when it does not offend the protections of s. 11(g) or (i)), legislatures can decide how and when their laws will apply. It may thus be open to them to correct a constitutional infirmity retroactively.

[37] No one in this case has argued that the remedial legislation was intended to be retroactive. Thus, in the absence of retroactive legislative intent either explicitly or by necessary implication, the strong presumption that legislation is prospective is not challenged.

[38] Whereas the rule of law dictates a presumption that legislation is prospective, the inverse is true for judicial remedies. Generally, legal determinations of this Court are effective immediately, and all courts are bound to apply this Court's decisions about the constitutional infirmities of legislation in outstanding matters before them. In this sense, this Court's decisions are retroactive, applying even to cases arising before the decision. As one author notes, "it is the basic role of courts to decide disputes after they have arisen. That function requires that judicial decisions operate (at least ordinarily) with retroactive effect".

[39] When a court makes a s. 52(1) declaration of invalidity, the same presumption of retroactivity arises. The appellants say that this arises from the Blackstonian theory that judges do not create but merely discover the law so that a constitutionally invalid law is "invalid from the moment it is enacted".

[40] A strict Blackstonian theory, however, cannot easily be reconciled with modern constitutional law. Many fundamental principles that are essential to our constitutional system curtail the retroactive reach of judicial remedies. Res judicata, for example, prevents the reopening of settled matters due to later judicial pronouncements, even maintaining convictions for offences later declared unconstitutional if the accused has exhausted their appeals such that they are no longer "in the judicial system". Similarly, the de facto and qualified immunity doctrines validate and preclude financial liability for government actions taken under laws that are later found to be unconstitutional. These doctrines balance the generally retroactive nature of judicial remedies with the need for finality and stability. Finally, it is also difficult to square the Blackstonian view with the judicial discretion to suspend a declaration of invalidity: G, at paras. 87-89. Thus, the theory is subject to numerous exceptions and qualifications. It cannot preclude purely prospective constitutional remedies. ….

[41] That said, the general presumption that declarations of constitutional invalidity have retroactive effect is firmly rooted in principles of constitutional interpretation and s. 52(1).

[42] Section 52(1), the cornerstone of constitutionalism, enshrining the supremacy of the Constitution, must be read in light of all constitutional principles. A s. 52(1) declaration will generally be both immediate and retroactive. Retroactive remedies that immediately apply to everybody who is still "in the system" maximize the protection and vindication of Charter rights, as a general system of delayed prospective remedies would risk leaving those harmed in the past by an unconstitutional law without a remedy. Furthermore, legislatures would have lesser incentives to ensure that new legislation complies with the Charter if they could rely on the second chances provided by consequence-free prospective declarations.

B. Temporal Nature of Suspended Declarations

[44] When compelling public interests outweigh the continued violation of Charter rights, courts may suspend a declaration of invalidity: G, at paras. 117 and 126. The tool of a suspended declaration allows courts to temper the retroactive effects of a declaration. However, a court's decision to suspend a declaration does not alter the presumptively retroactive application of the declaration but merely changes when it comes into effect. The presumption of retroactivity persists, although it may be rebutted explicitly or by necessary implication. For example, this Court's first experience issuing a suspended declaration of invalidity was in Manitoba Language Reference. Nearly all of Manitoba's legislation was found to be unconstitutional because it was enacted in English only. Because an immediate retroactive remedy would have created a legal vacuum in Manitoba, with catastrophic consequences for the rule of law, the Court suspended its declaration of invalidity to give the legislature time to pass new, constitutionally sound laws: p. 758. Nonetheless, the declaration was retroactive.

[45] In Hislop, this Court explained some circumstances where "judges may rule prospectively": para. 96. In these circumstances, the presumption of retroactivity is rebutted and a s. 52(1) declaration will operate prospectively. A prospective remedy could be appropriate if there is a "substantial change in the law": para. 99. ….

[46] In my view, a suspended declaration of invalidity may provide another exception to the presumption of retroactivity where the purpose of the suspension, by necessary implication, requires a purely prospective declaration. Suspended declarations will only issue where the government demonstrates that compelling public interests, grounded in the Constitution, outweigh the continued breach of constitutional rights and require that the legislature have an opportunity to remedy the constitutional infirmity. Furthermore, declarations of invalidity will be issued only if more tailored remedies, such as reading in, reading down, or severance, are inappropriate. When these rare and exceptional circumstances arise, a retroactive application of the declaration at the conclusion of the suspension could frustrate the purpose — the compelling public interests — that required a period of transition, creating uncertainty and removing the protection that justified the suspension in the first place. The necessary implication of the suspension may be that the declaration, when it comes into effect, must operate purely prospectively so that it does not defeat the very purpose of the suspension.

[47] The appellants suggest that concerns with self-defeating retroactive declarations can be alleviated by Parliament enacting retroactive remedial legislation. Ultimately, however, the choice of whether to make remedial legislation retroactive belongs to the legislature. ….

[48] … the courts must exercise their duty to craft coherent, principled s. 52(1) remedies that give effect to the interests and the various foundational principles of the Constitution at stake — including when establishing the temporal application of a declaration.

[49] The appellants further submit that a declaration cannot be prospective unless the court explicitly directs. While such precision is strongly advised, this Court has rarely stated explicitly when a declaration will apply purely prospectively. … the necessary implications of transition periods or suspended declarations of invalidity demonstrate that, even in the absence of explicit language, the Court's declaration operates purely prospectively.[1]

[50] For example, in R. v. Brydges, 1990 CanLII 123 (SCC), [1990] 1 SCR 190, this Court found that the right to counsel under s. 10(b) of the Charter includes the right to be informed of the existence and availability of legal aid and duty counsel: p. 211. Recognizing that police officers generally fulfilled their informational duties by reading from printed caution cards, the declaration was suspended for 30 days to allow police departments across Canada to prepare new caution cards that included information about legal aid and duty counsel: p. 217. The prospective application of this declaration is necessarily implied from the reason for the suspension. It would have defeated the purpose of the suspension to suspend the declaration because police officers could not realistically comply with the judgment for the next 30 days, only to then have the declaration apply retroactively to everybody detained in the previous 30 days.

[51] Suspended declarations invalidating legislation have also operated in this way. For example, in R. v. Bain, 1992 CanLII 111 (SCC), [1992] 1 SCR 91, this Court held that the Crown's disproportionate number of juror stand-asides was unconstitutional, but suspended that declaration for six months to "avoid a hiatus": p. 104. Again, the necessary implication of the suspension was that the declaration applied purely prospectively. A retroactive application, invalidating any juries selected during the suspension period, would have defeated the very purpose of the suspension.

[53] …. G emphasized the importance of transparently explaining the reasons for suspending a s. 52(1) declaration: paras. 125-26 and 159. …. I would expect courts in the future to explicitly state the temporal application of their s. 52(1) declarations to avoid any confusion. ….

C. Temporal Nature of the Bedford Suspended Declaration

[54] ….. The key issue in this case is whether, in the absence of explicit language, the presumption of retroactivity is rebutted by necessary implication. In my view, the purpose of the Bedford suspension required the declaration to operate purely prospectively.

[55] The Bedford suspension emanated from a concern about immediately leaving sex work entirely unregulated: para. 167. A retroactive declaration would have rendered the regulatory system of criminal offences that was maintained by the suspension entirely unenforceable once the suspension expired, undermining the protection of the vulnerable victims that was at the root of the finding of unconstitutionality and defeating the purpose of the suspension.

[56] Nor would a retroactive declaration have given effect to and vindicated Charter rights. …the Court issued a declaration of invalidity rather than reading the provisions down, recognizing that a judicially crafted exclusion for non-exploitative protective services could have unforeseen impacts on other aspects of the regulatory scheme: para. 165. The suspension temporarily maintained in effect both the constitutional "protection" and unconstitutional "prevention" aspects of the offence…. Far from vindicating the Charter rights of sex workers, as Bedford sought to do, a retroactive declaration would have gravely imperiled those rights.

[57] Conversely, prospective application is far more consonant with the purpose of the Bedford suspension and more protective of sex workers' rights. As Bedford intended, the status quo regulation continued for one year. In that time, sex workers retained the full protection of the criminal law against parasitic and exploitative conduct, thus providing them the benefit of the law.

[58] Given the purely prospective nature of the declaration in Bedford, the specific challenge in this case is to determine what happens to those who committed the Bedford offences prior to the expiry of the suspension. Any answer involves some degree of legal uncertainty. This uncertainty reinforces why suspensions must be rare. Where suspensions are necessary, the court should also consider whether any measures during the suspension may minimize the impact of the ongoing Charter breaches. …. Of course, the legislature can always legislate a different approach, including retroactively, within the confines of the Constitution.

D. Protection of Rights Under Prospective Remedies

Remedies Available Following a Prospective Declaration

[62] While s. 52(1) is the usual remedy against unconstitutional laws and s. 24(1) is "generally used" against unconstitutional acts, both can be combined to provide relief in cases where it is appropriate to do so: Ferguson, at paras. 59-60 and 63. A declaration under s. 52(1) provides general relief against the law, whereas an individual remedy under s. 24(1) — such as an exemption or a stay of proceedings — can mitigate the effects of that law or of actions taken under the law in specific cases. In Ferguson, this Court held that, while constitutional exemptions under s. 24(1) are not appropriate substitutes for s. 52(1) challenges to the unconstitutionality of legislation, s. 24(1) can be combined with s. 52(1) when additional relief is necessary to provide an effective remedy in a specific case: para. 63.

[63] Similarly, in G, this Court held that there was no rule against granting both a suspended s. 52(1) declaration and a retroactive s. 24(1) remedy. There are numerous examples in our jurisprudence of a personal constitutional remedy being granted during the period of suspension of a declaration under s. 52(1)…

[64] The same reasoning holds when the suspended declaration is prospective. This is because there is a conceptual distinction between the legal findings as to the constitutional validity of a law and the particular relief ordered…

[65] …When a judge is asked to consider whether a particular accused's Charter rights have been breached under s. 24(1), the constitutional findings of this Court are binding, even when the declaration itself is not operative. While this Court's decision to suspend the declaration or to make it purely prospective keeps the law temporarily alive so as not to create a legal vacuum that would compromise compelling public interests, this does not preclude personal remedies for violations of Charter rights before the coming into force of the declaration. Whether a remedy is appropriate in the circumstances is a separate question.

[67] Thus, s. 24(1) remedies may be available even during the period of suspension if the accused can demonstrate that conviction under the legislation found to be constitutionally infirm would be a breach of their own Charter rights, and if granting an individual remedy would not undermine the purpose of suspending the s. 52(1) declaration.

[68] Applying this reasoning to this case, a person charged under s. 212(1)(j) for conduct prior to or during the suspension may seek an individual remedy under s. 24(1). …. While the constitutional flaw related to the s. 7 rights of sex workers, this finding has direct implications for providers of security-enhancing services who are charged under s. 212(1)(j). The liberty of these accused is put in jeopardy, despite the finding in Bedford that this aspect of the living on the avails offence bears no relation to its purpose.

[69] This risk may be mitigated through a personal remedy under s. 24(1). …. when an application judge finds as a fact that the accused before them acted within the safety-enhancing unconstitutional overbreadth overbreadth, s. 24(1) may be available to stay the charges. Doing so upholds the Constitution fully and maximizes rights protection.

[71] In sum, the fact that the Bedford declaration was purely prospective does not mean someone will be convicted of s. 212(1)(j) in violation of their Charter rights. While the law remains valid and can ground legal convictions, no one should be convicted of the offence if its overbreadth violates their rights. However, where the conduct does not fall within the area of overbreadth identified by this Court, individuals may be charged, prosecuted, and convicted under s. 212(1)(j) for conduct that occurred while the law still governed.

III. Conclusion

[72] A suspended declaration of invalidity may be purely prospective where the purpose of the suspension requires such a temporal application. In Bedford, this Court's remedy was purely prospective, because the purpose of the suspension — avoiding deregulation that would leave sex workers vulnerable — would be frustrated by a retroactive remedy. As the remedy was purely prospective, the appellants could be charged for their conduct prior to the declaration taking effect. Thus, an accused could be convicted for conduct caught by s. 212(1)(j) before the effective date of the declaration. However, an accused who could demonstrate that their personal rights were prejudiced by the constitutional infirmity could seek relief under s. 24(1), provided their conduct did not undermine the public interests the suspension was designed to protect.

[73] Because the appellants engaged in exploitative and parasitic conduct, the exact conduct that was always legitimately criminalized, a s. 24(1) remedy is not available to them. I would dismiss the appeals.

3 Remedies under section 24(1)

3.1 General principles

In contrast to section 52, section 24(1) applies only to breaches of the Charter, but it can capture governmental actions where section 52 only applies to laws. The courts have wide discretion in deciding whether a section 24(1) remedy is appropriate at all and, if so, what form it should take. Section 24(1) can offer remedies in addition to invalidity when invalidity alone does not provide "appropriate and just" redress. A section 24(1) might apply only to the applicant, the one whose rights were breached, or the benefit of the remedy might be enjoyed more broadly.

The breadth of remedial possibilities under section 24(1) is vast. Remedies might include stopping particular actions (defensive remedies) like a ordering a stay of proceedings, declaring a law invalid, declaring a particular interpretation of government policy to be invalid, or quashing a conviction. Section 24(1) can also support affirmative remedies, including mandatory injunctions ordering particular government actions, or financial remedies

The scope of remedies under section 24(1) is not limited by those offered by the courts in the past. Some of the more creative or unexpected remedies under section 24(1) include ordering the government to provide a lawyer to a particular claimant where the failure to do so was found to breach the Charter (New Brunswick v. G(J) 1999 CanLII 653 (SCC), [1999] 3 SCR 46), and the one offered in the first case below, Doucet-Boudreau.

3.2 Declarations under section 24(1)

3.2.1 Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Minister of Justice), 2000 SCC 69 (CanLII), [2000] 2 SCR 1120, <https://canlii.ca/t/5239> (citations omitted)

[From the headnote:]

The appellant bookstore, of which the individual appellants are the directors and controlling shareholders, carried a specialized inventory catering to the gay and lesbian community which consisted largely of books that included gay and lesbian literature, travel information, general interest periodicals, academic studies related to homosexuality, AIDS/HIV safe-sex advisory material and gay and lesbian erotica. Since its establishment in 1983, the store has imported 80 to 90 percent of its erotica from the United States. Code 9956(a) of Schedule VII of the Customs Tariff prohibits the importation of "[b]ooks, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind that . . . are deemed to be obscene under subsection 163(8) of the Criminal Code". At the entry level, Customs inspectors determine the appropriate tariff classification, pursuant to s. 58 of the Customs Act.

The classification exercise under Code 9956 largely consists of the Customs inspector making a comparison of the imported materials with the illustrated manual accompanying Memorandum D9-1-1, which describes the type of materials deemed obscene by Customs. At the relevant time, an item considered "obscene" and thus prohibited was subject (under s. 60 of the Act) to a re-determination upon request, by a specialized Customs unit, and upon a further appeal subject to a further re-determination by the Deputy Minister or designate. Once these administrative measures have been exhausted, an importer may appeal the prohibition under s. 67 of the Act to a judge of the superior court of the province where the material was seized, with a further appeal on a question of law to the Federal Court of Canada, and then with leave to the Supreme Court of Canada. Section 152(3) provides that in any proceeding under the Act the burden of proof in any question in relation to the compliance with the Act or the regulations in respect of any goods lies on the importer.

After a lengthy trial the trial judge found not only that the Customs officials had wrongly delayed, confiscated, destroyed, damaged, prohibited or misclassified materials imported by the appellant bookstore on numerous occasions, but that these errors were caused by the "systemic targeting" of the store's importations. He concluded that the Customs legislation infringed s. 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but was justified under s. 1. Although he denied a remedy under s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, the trial judge issued a declaration under s. 24(1) of the Charter that the Customs legislation had at times been construed and applied in a manner contrary to ss. 2(b) and 15(1) of the Charter. The Court of Appeal, in a majority judgment, dismissed the appellants' appeal.

3.2.1.1 Majority – Binnie J

[154] In my view, the appellants have established that:

1. Section 152(3) of the Customs Act should not be construed and applied so as to place the onus on an importer to establish that goods are not obscene within the meaning of s. 163(8) of the Criminal Code. The burden of proving obscenity rests on the Crown or other person who alleges it.

2. The rights of the appellants under s. 2(b) and s. 15(1) of the Charter have been infringed in the following respects:

(a) They have been targeted as importers of obscene materials despite the absence of any evidence to suggest that gay and lesbian erotica is more likely to be obscene than heterosexual erotica, or that the appellants are likely offenders in this regard;

(b) In consequence of the targeting, the appellants have suffered excessive and unnecessary prejudice in terms of delays, cost and other losses in having their goods cleared (if at all) through Canada Customs;

(c) The reasons for this excessive and unnecessary prejudice include:

(i) failure by Customs to devote a sufficient number of officials to carry out the review of the appellants' publications in a timely way;

(ii) the inadequate training of the officials assigned to the task;

(iii) the failure to place at the disposal of these officials proper guides and manuals, failure to update Memorandum D9-1-1 and its accompanying illustrative manual in a timely way, and the failure to develop workable procedures to deal with books consisting mostly or wholly of written text;

(iv) failure to establish internal deadlines and related criteria for the expeditious review of expressive materials;

(v) failure to incorporate into departmental guides and manuals relevant advice received from time to time from the Department of Justice;

(vi) failure to provide the appellants in a timely way with notice of the basis for detention of publications, the opportunity to make meaningful submissions on a re-determination, and reasonable access to the disputed materials for that purpose; and

(vii) failure to extend to the appellants the equal benefit of fair and expeditious treatment of their imported goods without discrimination based on sexual orientation.

[155] It is apparent that this catalogue particularizes in greater detail the declaration issued by the trial judge, namely:

THIS COURT DECLARES that Tariff Code 9956(a) of Schedule VII and s. 114 of the Customs Tariff, S.C. 1987, c. 41 (3rd Supplement) and ss. 58 and 71 of the Customs Act, S.C. 1986, c. 1 (2nd Supplement) have at times been construed and applied in a manner contrary to s. 2(b) and s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[157] Having rejected that s. 52 argument, except as to the reverse onus provision, the remaining question is whether the Court should attempt to fashion a more structured s. 24(1) remedy. I conclude, with some hesitation, that it is not practicable to do so. The trial concluded on December 20, 1994. We are told that in the past six years, Customs has addressed the institutional and administrative problems encountered by the appellants. In the absence of more detailed information as to what precisely has been done, and the extent to which (if at all) it has remedied the situation, I am not prepared to endorse my colleague's conclusion that these measures are "not sufficient" (para. 262) and have offered "little comfort" (para. 265). Equally, however, we have not been informed by the appellants of the specific measures (short of declaring the legislation invalid or inoperative) that in the appellants' view would remedy any continuing problems.

[158] The most detailed suggestion the appellants have made in the way of a s. 24(1) remedy is the following request:

> . . . in the final alternative an injunction restraining Customs from applying and administering the Customs Tariff, S.C. 1987, c. 41 (3rd Supplement) s. 114, Schedule VII, Code 9956(a) and the Customs Act, S.C. 1986 (2nd Supp.), s. 58 and s. 71, as amended, permanently or until such time as there is no risk that the unconstitutional administration will continue.

The first branch of the proposed injunction ("permanently") amounts to a s. 52 declaration of inoperability, which I do not consider justified. The second branch ("until such time") sets an unrealistic standard ("no risk"). If diluted to a call for constitutional behaviour, the result would add little to the general duty that falls on any government official to act in accordance with the Constitution, injunction or no injunction, and would scarcely advance the objectives of either clarity or enforceability. A more structured s. 24(1) remedy might well be helpful but it would serve the interests of none of the parties for this Court to issue a formal declaratory order based on six-year-old evidence supplemented by conflicting oral submissions and speculation on the current state of affairs. The views of the Court on the merits of the appellants' complaints as the situation stood at the end of 1994 are recorded in these reasons and those of my colleague Iacobucci J. These findings should provide the appellants with a solid platform from which to launch any further action in the Supreme Court of British Columbia should they consider that further action is necessary.

3.2.1.2 Dissenting in Part: Iacobucci J

[253] Given Smith J.'s finding that there were "grave systemic problems" in the administration of the law -- a conclusion with which I wholeheartedly agree -- the primarily declaratory remedy relied on by Binnie J. is simply inadequate. Systemic problems call for systemic solutions. I believe that Customs' history of improper censorship, coupled with its inadequate response to the declarations of the courts below, confirms that only striking down the legislation in question will guarantee vindication of the appellants' constitutional rights. Having concluded that the law must fall, I will offer some broad guidelines for future reform.

(i) Legislation Must Ensure Constitutional Application

[254] As was already illustrated in reviewing this Court's decisions in Morgentaler, Hunter v. Southam, and Bain, it is legislation itself, not merely its application, that must make an effort to ensure that constitutionally protected rights are not infringed. In this case, it is true that nothing in the Customs legislation itself forces Customs to ignore evidence of literary and artistic merit; to make decisions without even allowing written submissions from the parties affected; and to discriminate against gay and lesbian materials. However, the legislation does call for prior restraint by an investigatory rather than adjudicatory body, and does not provide for any meaningful safeguards aimed at preventing the inevitable flaws that result from such a system.

[255] Effectively, the respondents call on this Court to trust them. Our jurisprudence, most explicitly in Bain has consistently rejected … the government's invitation to trust them. Instead, we demanded that the legislature enact laws that affirmatively safeguarded constitutional rights, rather than leaving them to the mercy of administrators.

[256] …., the respondents' approach would mean that every unconstitutional law requires no more than a declaratory remedy; after all, Parliament is fully capable of amending a law to bring it into compliance with the Constitution at any time. I therefore disagree with Binnie J.'s conclusion that, with the exception of s. 152(3) of the Customs Act, a declaratory remedy is sufficient in this case. While the government is free to delegate powers, it must do so in a way that ensures -- or at the very least attempts to ensure -- that Charter rights will be respected.

(ii) Declaratory Relief Is Insufficient

[258] The need to strike down the Customs legislation as it applies to expressive materials is reinforced by comparison with the alternate remedy adopted by both the courts below, and by Binnie J. in this Court. …. [D]eclarations are often preferable to injunctive relief because they are more flexible, require less supervision, and are more deferential to the other branches of government. However, declarations can suffer from vagueness, insufficient remedial specificity, an inability to monitor compliance, and an ensuing need for subsequent litigation to ensure compliance: see ibid., at para. 12.320.

[260] … Striking down the applicability of the Customs legislation to expressive materials will not make the appellants worse off; it will fully vindicate their rights. While the appellants are admittedly not entitled to any particular legislative scheme, they are entitled to a remedy that will prevent further systematic and consistent violations of their constitutional rights. Only invalidating the impugned Customs legislation will achieve that goal.

[261] A final reason that declaratory relief is inappropriate in this case is the difficulties the appellants face in enforcing it. This case has been a massive undertaking for the appellants. Proving the constitutional violations recognized by Smith J. required the production of an enormous record. Unfortunately, if the appellants are unsatisfied with the government's compliance with the declaration affirmed by this Court, they have little choice but to try to assemble a similar record documenting the enforcement of the Customs regime since the declaration was made. This is obviously a heavy burden, and indeed unfair. A stronger remedy is necessary to vindicate the appellants' rights.

[267] The need for structural reform is reinforced by Customs' long history of excessive, inappropriate censorship. Before the appellants launched this case, Customs illegally prohibited depictions of anal penetration; it systematically targeted Little Sisters and other alternative bookstores; it favoured books by mainstream authors like Bret Easton Ellis and Madonna, in comparison to gay and lesbian authors; and it failed to consider artistic merit in spite of Butler's clear instruction to always err on the side of protecting expressive freedom. Customs has entirely fulfilled Emerson's dire predictions of how a system of prior restraint will work in practice.

[268] These are not the kinds of problems that can be solved by simply directing Customs to behave themselves. In all the circumstances, further indulgence misses the mark; what is needed is the firm guidance that only new legislation from Parliament can provide…

(iv) Remedial Options

[274] Freedom of speech means not just the right to question the dominant political structure, but to question the dominant society and culture. Unfortunately, the Customs legislation has systematically stifled that right. I sincerely hope that Parliament will recognize this grave injustice. In that hope, I will offer several suggestions as to how the current legislative scheme could be constitutionally improved…

[275] First, I believe that new legislation must provide for a number of basic standards to properly safeguard the fundamental expressive rights at stake. At a minimum, there should be a procedure to allow citizens to be promptly informed of the fact that expressive materials which they are attempting to import have been detained, along with the preliminary reasons for this detention. The importer should then have a right to examine the detained materials and to make effective representations as to why the detained materials are not obscene. …. As pointed out by Binnie J., the onus must be on the state to establish, on a balance of probabilities, that the detained materials are in fact obscene under s. 163(8) of the Criminal Code. Determinations should be made in a prompt fashion, and brief reasons must be given when materials are determined to be obscene. A time limit to exhaust the administrative decision and internal appeal mechanisms should be provided, with any materials not released or prohibited within the prescribed time being automatically released. Of course, a further right of appeal must continue to exist to the superior court of a province. The goal would be to create an open, expeditious process that allows for greater interaction between the individuals affected and the state.

[276] Second, I believe that Parliament should give consideration to the establishment of a specialized administrative tribunal to expeditiously review obscenity determinations made by front-line Customs officers…

[279] Finally, and as a further alternative, I believe that Parliament may wish to consider relying on the criminal law to deal with the importation of obscene materials into the country in lieu of a prior restraint regime. …

[281] No doubt there are many other steps that could be taken to improve the current system. I put these suggestions forward to show that there is a variety of approaches available to Parliament to underscore the importance of ensuring Canadians have access to as many expressive materials as possible while realizing the practical constraints that are involved. Because the present regime essentially treats books like any other commodity, I hope that Parliament will review and revise the current Customs legislation to reflect the seminal importance of freedom of expression in our Canadian democracy.

IV. Conclusion

[282] In conclusion, I respectfully cannot agree with my colleague Binnie J. that the only amendment needed to the existing legislation is to shift the onus from the importer to the government. Without the opportunity for importers to make effective representations and a statutory guarantee that decisions will be made in a timely fashion, I question the significance of a shift in onus. In my opinion, the record in this appeal amply bears out Smith J.'s conclusion that there are "grave systemic" flaws in the enforcement of the Customs legislation. But I cannot agree that the remedy is simply to issue a declaration and take it on faith that Canada Customs – an agency which, it bears repeating, has a long and ignominious record of excessive censorship throughout this century – will reform its ways.

3.2.1.3 Aftermath and Access to Justice

Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Commissioner of Customs and Revenue), [2007] 1 SCR 38, 2007 SCC 2 [Little Sisters #2], provides an important postscript to Little Sisters #1 above. As Binnie J. foreshadowed in Little Sisters #1 at 158, the bookstore did "consider that further action [was] necessary". However, the issue which made it back to the Supreme Court was whether Little Sisters was eligible for an advance costs award, since they could not afford the litigation costs. When the Supreme Court ruled against Little Sisters, that was the ended this round of litigation.

3.2.2 Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3 (CanLII), [2010] 1 SCR 44 (citations omitted)

The following is the judgment delivered by THE COURT —

I. Introduction

[1] Omar Khadr, a Canadian citizen, has been detained by the United States government at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, for over seven years. The Prime Minister asks this Court to reverse the decision of the Federal Court of Appeal requiring the Canadian government to request the United States to return Mr. Khadr from Guantanamo Bay to Canada.

[2] For the reasons that follow, we agree with the courts below that Mr. Khadr's rights under s. 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms were violated. However, we conclude that the order made by the lower courts that the government request Mr. Khadr's return to Canada is not an appropriate remedy for that breach under s. 24(1) of the Charter. Consistent with the separation of powers and the well-grounded reluctance of courts to intervene in matters of foreign relations, the proper remedy is to grant Mr. Khadr a declaration that his Charter rights have been infringed, while leaving the government a measure of discretion in deciding how best to respond. We would therefore allow the appeal in part.

II. Background

[3] Mr. Khadr was 15 years old when he was taken prisoner on July 27, 2002, by U.S. forces in Afghanistan. He was alleged to have thrown a grenade that killed an American soldier in the battle in which he was captured. About three months later, he was transferred to the U.S. military installation at Guantanamo Bay. He was placed in adult detention facilities.

[4] On September 7, 2004, Mr. Khadr was brought before a Combatant Status Review Tribunal which affirmed a previous determination that he was an "enemy combatant". He was subsequently charged with war crimes and held for trial before a military commission. In light of a number of procedural delays and setbacks, that trial is still pending.

[5] In February and September 2003, agents from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service ("CSIS") and the Foreign Intelligence Division of the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade ("DFAIT") questioned Mr. Khadr on matters connected to the charges pending against him and shared the product of these interviews with U.S. authorities. In March 2004, a DFAIT official interviewed Mr. Khadr again, with the knowledge that he had been subjected by U.S. authorities to a sleep deprivation technique, known as the "frequent flyer program", in an effort to make him less resistant to interrogation. During this interview, Mr. Khadr refused to answer questions. In 2005, von Finckenstein J. of the Federal Court issued an interim injunction preventing CSIS and DFAIT agents from further interviewing Mr. Khadr in order "to prevent a potential grave injustice" from occurring: Khadr v. Canada, 2005 FC 1076, [2006] 2 F.C.R. 505, at para. 46. ….

[6] Mr. Khadr has repeatedly requested that the Government of Canada ask the United States to return him to Canada: in March 2005 during a Canadian consular visit; on December 15, 2005, when a welfare report noted that "[Mr. Khadr] wants his government to bring him back home" (Report of Welfare Visit, Exhibit "L" to Affidavit of Sean Robertson, December 15, 2005 (J.R., vol. IV, at p. 534)); and in a formal written request through counsel on July 28, 2008.

[7] The Prime Minister announced his decision not to request Mr. Khadr's repatriation on July 10, 2008, during a media interview. The Prime Minister provided the following response to a journalist's question, posed in French, regarding whether the government would seek repatriation:

> [TRANSLATION] The answer is no, as I said the former Government, and our Government with the notification of the Minister of Justice had considered all these issues and the situation remains the same. . . . We keep on looking for [assurances] of good treatment of Mr. Khadr. (http://watch.ctv.ca/news/clip65783#clip65783, at 3'3", referred to in Affidavit of April Bedard, August 8, 2008 (J.R., vol. II, at pp. 131-32).)

[8] On August 8, 2008, Mr. Khadr applied to the Federal Court for judicial review of the government's "ongoing decision and policy" not to seek his repatriation (Notice of Application filed by the respondent, August 8, 2008 (J.R., vol. II, at p. 113)). He alleged that the decision and policy infringed his rights under s. 7 of the Charter….

III. The Issues

[11] Mr. Khadr argues that the government has breached his rights under s. 7 of the Charter, and that the appropriate remedy for this breach is an order that the government request the United States to return him to Canada.

[12] Mr. Khadr does not suggest that the government is obliged to request the repatriation of all Canadian citizens held abroad in suspect circumstances. Rather, his contention is that the conduct of the government of Canada in connection with his detention by the U.S. military in Guantanamo Bay, and in particular Canada's collaboration with the U.S. government in 2003 and 2004, violated his rights under the Charter, and requires as a remedy that the government now request his return to Canada. ….

[24] We conclude that Canadian conduct in connection with Mr. Khadr's case did not conform to the principles of fundamental justice. That conduct may be briefly reviewed. The statements taken by CSIS and DFAIT were obtained through participation in a regime which was known at the time to have refused detainees the right to challenge the legality of detention by way of habeas corpus. It was also known that Mr. Khadr was 16 years old at the time and that he had not had access to counsel or to any adult who had his best interests in mind. As held by this Court in Khadr 2008, Canada's participation in the illegal process in place at Guantanamo Bay clearly violated Canada's binding international. In conducting their interviews, CSIS officials had control over the questions asked and the subject matter of the interviews. Canadian officials also knew that the U.S. authorities would have full access to the contents of the interrogations (as Canadian officials sought no restrictions on their use) by virtue of their audio and video recording. The purpose of the interviews was for intelligence gathering and not criminal investigation. While in some contexts there may be an important distinction between those interviews conducted for the purpose of intelligence gathering and those conducted in criminal investigations, here, the distinction loses its significance. Canadian officials questioned Mr. Khadr on matters that may have provided important evidence relating to his criminal proceedings, in circumstances where they knew that Mr. Khadr was being indefinitely detained, was a young person and was alone during the interrogations. Further, the March 2004 interview, where Mr. Khadr refused to answer questions, was conducted knowing that Mr. Khadr had been subjected to three weeks of scheduled sleep deprivation….

[25] This conduct establishes Canadian participation in state conduct that violates the principles of fundamental justice. Interrogation of a youth, to elicit statements about the most serious criminal charges while detained in these conditions and without access to counsel, and while knowing that the fruits of the interrogations would be shared with the U.S. prosecutors, offends the most basic Canadian standards about the treatment of detained youth suspects.

[26] We conclude that Mr. Khadr has established that Canada violated his rights under s. 7 of the Charter.

B. Is the Remedy Sought Appropriate and Just in All the Circumstances?

[27] … The issue on this appeal is whether the breach of s. 7 of the Charter entitles Mr. Khadr to the remedy of an order that Canada request of the United States that he be returned to Canada. Two questions arise at this stage: (1) Is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach? and (2) Is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative power over foreign affairs?

[28] The judge at first instance held that the remedy sought was open to him. … [W]e conclude that the trial judge, on the record before us, erred in the exercise of his discretion in granting the remedy sought.

[29] First, is the remedy sought sufficiently connected to the breach? …

[30] An appropriate and just remedy is "one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants"… The first hurdle facing Mr. Khadr, therefore, is to establish a sufficient connection between the breaches of s. 7 that occurred in 2003 and 2004 and the order sought in these judicial review proceedings. In our view, the sufficiency of this connection is established by the continuing effect of these breaches into the present. Mr. Khadr's Charter rights were breached when Canadian officials contributed to his detention by virtue of their interrogations at Guantanamo Bay …. As the information obtained by Canadian officials during the course of their interrogations may be used in the U.S. proceedings against Mr. Khadr, the effect of the breaches cannot be said to have been spent. It continues to this day. As discussed earlier, the material that Canadian officials gathered and turned over to the U.S. military authorities may form part of the case upon which he is currently being held. The evidence before us suggests that the material produced was relevant and useful. There has been no suggestion that it does not form part of the case against Mr. Khadr or that it will not be put forward at his ultimate trial. We therefore find that the breach of Mr. Khadr's s. 7 Charter rights remains ongoing and that the remedy sought could potentially vindicate those rights.

[32] We conclude that the necessary connection between the breaches of s. 7 and the remedy sought has been established for the purpose of these judicial review proceedings.

[33] Second, is the remedy sought precluded by the fact that it touches on the Crown prerogative over foreign affairs? A connection between the remedy and the breach is not the only consideration. As stated in Doucet-Boudreau, an appropriate and just remedy is also one that "must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy" (para. 56) and must be a "judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court" (para. 57). The government argues that courts have no power under the Constitution of Canada to require the executive branch of government to do anything in the area of foreign policy. It submits that the decision not to request the repatriation of Mr. Khadr falls directly within the prerogative powers of the Crown to conduct foreign relations, including the right to speak freely with a foreign state on all such matters.

[34] The prerogative power is… a limited source of non-statutory administrative power accorded by the common law to the Crown: Hogg, at p. 1-17.

[37] The limited power of the courts to review exercises of the prerogative power for constitutionality reflects the fact that in a constitutional democracy, all government power must be exercised in accordance with the Constitution. This said, judicial review of the exercise of the prerogative power for constitutionality remains sensitive to the fact that the executive branch of government is responsible for decisions under this power, and that the executive is better placed to make such decisions within a range of constitutional options. The government must have flexibility in deciding how its duties under the power are to be discharged: see, e.g., Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at paras. 101-2. But it is for the courts to determine the legal and constitutional limits within which such decisions are to be taken. It follows that in the case of refusal by a government to abide by constitutional constraints, courts are empowered to make orders ensuring that the government's foreign affairs prerogative is exercised in accordance with the constitution.

….

[39] Our first concern is that the remedy ordered below gives too little weight to the constitutional responsibility of the executive to make decisions on matters of foreign affairs in the context of complex and ever-changing circumstances, taking into account Canada's broader national interests. For the following reasons, we conclude that the appropriate remedy is to declare that, on the record before the Court, Canada infringed Mr. Khadr's s. 7 rights, and to leave it to the government to decide how best to respond to this judgment in light of current information, its responsibility for foreign affairs, and in conformity with the Charter.

….

[41] In some situations, courts may give specific directions to the executive branch of the government on matters touching foreign policy. For example, in Burns, the Court held that it would offend s. 7 to extradite a fugitive from Canada without seeking and obtaining assurances from the requesting state that the death penalty would not be imposed. The Court gave due weight to the fact that seeking and obtaining those assurances were matters of Canadian foreign relations. Nevertheless, it ordered that the government seek them.

[42] The specific facts in Burns justified a more specific remedy. ….

[43] The present case differs from Burns. Mr. Khadr is not under the control of the Canadian government; the likelihood that the proposed remedy will be effective is unclear; and the impact on Canadian foreign relations of a repatriation request cannot be properly assessed by the Court.

[44] This brings us to our second concern: the inadequacy of the record. The record before us gives a necessarily incomplete picture of the range of considerations currently faced by the government in assessing Mr. Khadr's request. We do not know what negotiations may have taken place, or will take place, between the U.S. and Canadian governments over the fate of Mr. Khadr. As observed by Chaskalson C.J. in Kaunda v. President of the Republic of South Africa, [2004] ZACC 5, 136 I.L.R. 452, at para. 77: "The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal." It follows that in these circumstances, it would not be appropriate for the Court to give direction as to the diplomatic steps necessary to address the breaches of Mr. Khadr's Charter rights.

[45] Though Mr. Khadr has not been moved from Guantanamo Bay in over seven years, his legal predicament continues to evolve. [This evolution]… signals caution in the exercise of the Court's remedial jurisdiction.

[46] In this case, the evidentiary uncertainties, the limitations of the Court's institutional competence, and the need to respect the prerogative powers of the executive, lead us to conclude that the proper remedy is declaratory relief. A declaration of unconstitutionality is a discretionary remedy…. A court can properly issue a declaratory remedy so long as it has the jurisdiction over the issue at bar, the question before the court is real and not theoretical, and the person raising it has a real interest to raise it. Such is the case here.

[47] The prudent course at this point, respectful of the responsibilities of the executive and the courts, is for this Court to allow Mr. Khadr's application for judicial review in part and to grant him a declaration advising the government of its opinion on the records before it which, in turn, will provide the legal framework for the executive to exercise its functions and to consider what actions to take in respect of Mr. Khadr, in conformity with the Charter.

IV. Conclusion

[48] …. This Court declares that through the conduct of Canadian officials in the course of interrogations in 2003-2004, as established on the evidence before us, Canada actively participated in a process contrary to Canada's international human rights obligations and contributed to Mr. Khadr's ongoing detention so as to deprive him of his right to liberty and security of the person guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter, contrary to the principles of fundamental justice. …

3.2.2.1 Aftermath of Canada (Prime Minister) v. Khadr, 2010 SCC 3 (CanLII), [2010] 1 SCR 44

Less than a week after the decision in Khadr (2010) was released in January 2010, then Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon said that the government would not ask for Khadr's repatriation from an American detention centre in Cuba. In October 2010, Khadr accepted a plea deal in America. He has said his lawyers believed this was the only way that he could return to Canada. Khadr was not returned to Canada until 2012, at the age of 26. He remained in prison until May 2015 when he was released on bail. In July 2017 the Canadian government provided an apology and a reported $10.5m settlement.[112]

3.2.3 Association des parents de l'école Rose-des-vents v. British Columbia (Education), 2015 SCC 21 (CanLII), [2015] 2 SCR 139, <https://canlii.ca/t/gh9nr> (citations omitted)

> [65] … there is a tradition in Canada of state actors taking Charter declarations seriously: see, e.g., P. W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at p. 40-37. As this Court noted in Doucet-Boudreau, "[t]he assumption underlying this choice of remedy is that governments will comply with the declaration promptly and fully" (para. 62)…
> [67] The declaratory relief granted by the judge at the conclusion of the first phase of litigation defers to the parties, allowing them to determine among themselves the best course of action to remedy the lack of equivalence (see Mahe, at pp. 392-93). To the extent that there are disputes between a provincial ministry of education and a minority language school board over how best to ensure compliance with the requirements of s. 23, these disputes should be worked out between those parties whenever possible. While parents may have representation on school boards, and thus have a degree of input over school board priorities, school boards are also governmental actors. It does not play to the institutional strength of courts to have judges participate deeply in operational questions, such as detailed decisions surrounding the construction of a new school facility. In the face of competing resource demands and the imperfect realities of day-to-day management of an education system, s. 23 of the Charter requires good faith on the part of all interested parties to ensure substantive equivalence for rights holders.
> [68] As this Court noted in Doucet-Boudreau, "[f]or every school year that governments do not meet their obligations under s. 23, there is an increased likelihood of assimilation", which undermines the remedial goals of s. 23 (para. 29). The situation is urgent

3.2.4 Canada (Attorney General) v. PHS Community Services Society, 2011 SCC 44 (CanLII), [2011] 3 SCR 134, <https://canlii.ca/t/fn9cf> (citations omitted)

See other excerpts from this case in Chapter 23, Part 4.3.1.

> [146] One option would be to issue a declaration that the Minister erred in refusing to grant a further exemption to Insite in May 2008, and return the matter to the Minister to reconsider the matter and make a decision that respects the claimants' Charter rights.
> [147] However, this remedy would be inadequate.
> [148] The infringement at stake is serious; it threatens the health, indeed the lives, of the claimants and others like them. The grave consequences that might result from a lapse in the current constitutional exemption for Insite cannot be ignored. These claimants would be cast back into the application process they have tried and failed at, and made to await the Minister's decision based on a reconsideration of the same facts. Litigation might break out anew. A bare declaration is not an acceptable remedy in this case.
> [149] Nor is the granting of a permanent constitutional exemption appropriate where the remedy is for a state action, not a law. In any event, such exemptions are to be avoided: R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6, [2008] 1 SCR 96. Moreover, the Minister should not be precluded from withdrawing an exemption to Insite should changed circumstances at Insite so require. The flexibility contemplated by s. 56 of the CDSA would be lost.
> [150] In the special circumstances of this case, an order in the nature of mandamus is warranted. I would therefore order the Minister to grant an exemption to Insite under s. 56 of the CDSA forthwith. (This of course would not affect the Minister's power to withdraw the exemption should the operation of Insite change such that the exemption would no longer be appropriate.) On the trial judge's findings of fact, the only constitutional response to the application for a s. 56 exemption was to grant it. The Minister is bound to exercise his discretion under s. 56 in accordance with the Charter. On the facts as found here, there can be only one response: to grant the exemption. There is therefore nothing to be gained (and much to be risked) in sending the matter back to the Minister for reconsideration.
> [151] This does not fetter the Minister's discretion with respect to future applications for exemptions, whether for other premises, or for Insite. As always, the Minister must exercise that discretion within the constraints imposed by the law and the Charter.
> [152] The dual purposes of the CDSA — public health and public safety — provide some guidance for the Minister. Where the Minister is considering an application for an exemption for a supervised injection facility, he or she will aim to strike the appropriate balance between achieving the public health and public safety goals. Where, as here, the evidence indicates that a supervised injection site will decrease the risk of death and disease, and there is little or no evidence that it will have a negative impact on public safety, the Minister should generally grant an exemption.
> [153] The CDSA grants the Minister discretion in determining whether to grant exemptions. That discretion must be exercised in accordance with the Charter. This requires the Minister to consider whether denying an exemption would cause deprivations of life and security of the person that are not in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice. The factors considered in making the decision on an exemption must include evidence, if any, on the impact of such a facility on crime rates, the local conditions indicating a need for such a supervised injection site, the regulatory structure in place to support the facility, the resources available to support its maintenance, and expressions of community support or opposition.

3.3 Structural Injunctions

3.3.1 Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62 (CanLII), [2003] 3 SCR 3 (citations omitted)

[From the headnote:]

The appellants are Francophone parents living in five school districts in Nova Scotia. They applied for an order directing the Province and the Conseil scolaire acadien provincial to provide, out of public funds, homogeneous French-language facilities and programs at the secondary school level. The trial judge noted that the government did not deny the existence or content of the parents' rights under s. 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms but rather failed to prioritize those rights and delayed fulfilling its obligations, despite clear reports showing that assimilation was "reaching critical levels". He found a s. 23 violation and ordered the Province and the Conseil to use their "best efforts" to provide school facilities and programs by particular dates. He retained jurisdiction to hear reports on the status of the efforts. The Province appealed the part of the order in which the trial judge retained his jurisdiction to hear reports. The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and struck down the impugned portion of the order. On the basis of the common law principle of functus officio, the majority held that the trial judge, having decided the issue between the parties, had no further jurisdiction to remain seized of the case. They also held that, while courts have broad ranging powers under s. 24(1) of the Charter to fashion remedies, the Charter does not extend a court's jurisdiction to permit it to enforce its remedies.

[31] Canada has evolved into a country that is noted and admired for its adherence to the rule of law as a major feature of its democracy. But the rule of law can be shallow without proper mechanisms for its enforcement. In this respect, courts play an essential role since they are the central institutions to deal with legal disputes through the rendering of judgments and decisions. But courts have no physical or economic means to enforce their judgments. Ultimately, courts depend on both the executive and the citizenry to recognize and abide by their judgments.

[32] Fortunately, Canada has had a remarkable history of compliance with court decisions by private parties and by all institutions of government. That history of compliance has become a fundamentally cherished value of our constitutional democracy; we must never take it for granted but always be careful to respect and protect its importance, otherwise the seeds of tyranny can take root.

[33] This tradition of compliance takes on a particular significance in the constitutional law context, where courts must ensure that government behaviour conforms with constitutional norms but in doing so must also be sensitive to the separation of function among the legislative, judicial and executive branches. While our Constitution does not expressly provide for the separation of powers, the functional separation among the executive, legislative and judicial branches of governance has frequently been noted. In New Brunswick Broadcasting Co. v. Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly), 1993 CanLII 153 (SCC), [1993] 1 SCR 319, McLachlin J. (as she then was) stated, at p. 389:

> Our democratic government consists of several branches: the Crown, as represented by the Governor General and the provincial counterparts of that office; the legislative body; the executive; and the courts. It is fundamental to the working of government as a whole that all these parts play their proper role. It is equally fundamental that no one of them overstep its bounds, that each show proper deference for the legitimate sphere of activity of the other.

[34] In other words, in the context of constitutional remedies, courts must be sensitive to their role as judicial arbiters and not fashion remedies which usurp the role of the other branches of governance by taking on tasks to which other persons or bodies are better suited. Concern for the limits of the judicial role is interwoven throughout the law. The development of the doctrines of justiciability, and to a great extent mootness, standing, and ripeness resulted from concerns about the courts overstepping the bounds of the judicial function and their role vis-à-vis other branches of government.

[35] In addition, it is unsurprising, given how the Charter changed the nature of our constitutional structure by requiring that all laws and government action conform to the Charter, that concerns about the limits of the judicial role have animated much of the Charter jurisprudence and commentary surrounding it ….. Thus, in Vriend, supra, this Court stated, at para. 136:

> In carrying out their duties, courts are not to second-guess legislatures and the executives; they are not to make value judgments on what they regard as the proper policy choice; this is for the other branches. Rather, the courts are to uphold the Constitution and have been expressly invited to perform that role by the Constitution itself. But respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others' role and the role of the courts.

[36] Deference ends, however, where the constitutional rights that the courts are charged with protecting begin. …

[37] Returning to this appeal, we believe that [trial judge] LeBlanc J. was duly guided by historical and contextual factors in crafting a remedy that would meaningfully protect, indeed implement, the applicants' rights to minority official language education for their children while maintaining appropriate respect for the proper roles of the executive and legislative branches.

[38] As indicated earlier, the history of French-language education in Nova Scotia has been disappointing, resulting in high rates of assimilation that have continued well into the period when this litigation began. While the situation is not what it was in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries when French-language education in Acadia was for the most part either expressly prohibited or unavailable, the promise of s. 23 had yet to be fulfilled in the five school districts at issue in this appeal when the appellants brought their application demanding homogeneous French-language facilities before the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in 1998. Through the mid-1990s, s. 23 parents had pressured the government to provide homogeneous French-language facilities in presentations to Legislative Committees and in written and oral submissions to Ministers of Education. They had submitted petitions, letters, and expert analyses on assimilation to the Province. In 1996, amendments to the Education Act provided for a French-language school board, the Conseil scolaire acadien provincial, geared toward the fulfilment of the Province's s. 23 obligations. The school board then decided to provide the facilities at issue in this appeal. From 1997 to 1999, the provincial government announced the construction of homogeneous French-language schools in Petit-de-Grat, Clare, and Argyle. The schools were never built, and the construction projects were officially put on hold in September 1999.

[39] The reason for the delay, broadly speaking, was the government's failure to give due priority to s. 23 rights in educational policy setting. Indeed, LeBlanc J. observed that the real issue between the parties by the time of trial was the date on which the programs ought to be implemented, rather than any question as to whether they were required in the first place. The government cited a lack of consensus in the community, a consequent fear that enrollment would drop, and lack of funds as reasons for its decision to place the previously announced school construction projects on hold pending cost-benefit reviews. LeBlanc J. rightly concluded that none of these reasons justified the government's failure to fulfill its obligations under s. 23. He found that the government had been treating the provision of s. 23 schools no differently from programs or facilities generally, without attention to purposes of s. 23 of the Charter and the role that homogeneous schools play in French linguistic and cultural preservation and flourishing (para. 205). Meanwhile, assimilation continued (para. 210) and enrollment in the Conseil's schools was dropping. Programs were in jeopardy (paras. 229-30).

[40] It is in this urgent context of ongoing cultural erosion that LeBlanc J. crafted his remedy. He was sensitive to the need for timely execution, the limits of the judicial role, and the desirability of allowing the government flexibility in the manner of fulfilling its constitutional obligations when he ordered the government to make best efforts to provide facilities by particular dates and retained jurisdiction to hear progress reports. However, the urgency of the context does not by itself create jurisdiction in a superior court to issue a remedy of unlimited scope under s. 24(1) of the Charter. We now turn to the question of whether LeBlanc J.'s order was within the jurisdiction of a superior court.

(2) The Jurisdiction of a Superior Court to Issue a Remedy Under Section 24(1) of the Charter

[43] ….In the present appeal, the difficulty does not lie with the legislation: no provision or omission in the Education Act prevented the government from providing minority language education as required by the Constitution Act, 1982. On the contrary, the Education Act, as amended in 1996, establishes a French-language school board to provide homogeneous French-language education to children of s. 23 entitled parents. Neither is the problem rooted in any particular government action; rather, the problem was inaction on the part of the provincial government, particularly its failure to mobilize resources to provide school facilities in a timely fashion, as required by s. 23 of the Charter. Section 24(1) is available to remedy this failure.

….

[51] The power of the superior courts under s. 24(1) to make appropriate and just orders to remedy infringements or denials of Charter rights is part of the supreme law of Canada. It follows that this remedial power cannot be strictly limited by statutes or rules of the common law. We note, however, that statutes and common law rules may be helpful to a court choosing a remedy under s. 24(1) insofar as the statutory provisions or common law rules express principles that are relevant to determining what is "appropriate and just in the circumstances".

(3) The Meaning of "Appropriate and Just in the Circumstances"

[52] What, then, is meant in s. 24(1) by the words "appropriate and just in the circumstances"? Clearly, the task of giving these words meaning in particular cases will fall to the courts ordering the remedies since s. 24(1) specifies that the remedy should be such as the court considers appropriate and just. Deciding on an appropriate and just remedy in particular circumstances calls on the judge to exercise a discretion based on his or her careful perception of the nature of the right and of the infringement, the facts of the case, and the application of the relevant legal principles…

[53] … In our view, judicial restraint and metaphors such as "dialogue" must not be elevated to the level of strict constitutional rules to which the words of s. 24 can be subordinated. The same may be said of common law procedural principles such as functus officio which may to some extent be incorporated in statutes…

[54] While it would be unwise at this point to attempt to define, in detail, the words "appropriate and just" or to draw a rigid distinction between the two terms, there are some broad considerations that judges should bear in mind when evaluating the appropriateness and justice of a potential remedy. These general principles may be informed by jurisprudence relating to remedies outside the Charter context, such as cases discussing the doctrine of functus and overly vague remedies, although, as we have said, that jurisprudence does not apply strictly to orders made under s. 24(1).

[55] First, an appropriate and just remedy in the circumstances of a Charter claim is one that meaningfully vindicates the rights and freedoms of the claimants. Naturally, this will take account of the nature of the right that has been violated and the situation of the claimant. A meaningful remedy must be relevant to the experience of the claimant and must address the circumstances in which the right was infringed or denied. An ineffective remedy, or one which was "smothered in procedural delays and difficulties", is not a meaningful vindication of the right and therefore not appropriate and just…

[56] Second, an appropriate and just remedy must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy. As discussed above, a court ordering a Charter remedy must strive to respect the relationships with and separation of functions among the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. This is not to say that there is a bright line separating these functions in all cases. A remedy may be appropriate and just notwithstanding that it might touch on functions that are principally assigned to the executive. The essential point is that the courts must not, in making orders under s. 24(1), depart unduly or unnecessarily from their role of adjudicating disputes and granting remedies that address the matter of those disputes.

[57] Third, an appropriate and just remedy is a judicial one which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court. It will not be appropriate for a court to leap into the kinds of decisions and functions for which its design and expertise are manifestly unsuited. The capacities and competence of courts can be inferred, in part, from the tasks with which they are normally charged and for which they have developed procedures and precedent.

[58] Fourth, an appropriate and just remedy is one that, after ensuring that the right of the claimant is fully vindicated, is also fair to the party against whom the order is made. The remedy should not impose substantial hardships that are unrelated to securing the right.

[59] …. s. 24, because of its broad language and the myriad of roles it may play in cases, should be allowed to evolve to meet the challenges and circumstances of those cases. That evolution may require novel and creative features when compared to traditional and historical remedial practice because tradition and history cannot be barriers to what reasoned and compelling notions of appropriate and just remedies demand….

[From the headnote:]

Here, the remedy ordered by the trial judge was appropriate and just in the circumstances. He exercised his discretion to select an effective remedy that meaningfully vindicated the s. 23 rights of the appellants in the context of serious rates of assimilation and a history of delay in the provision of French-language education.

The order is a creative blending of remedies and processes already known to the courts in order to give life to the rights in s. 23. Given the critical rate of assimilation found by the trial judge, it was appropriate for him to grant a remedy that would in his view lead to prompt compliance. The remedy took into account, and did not depart unduly or unnecessarily from, the role of the courts in our constitutional democracy. The remedy vindicated the rights of the parents while leaving the detailed choices of means largely to the executive. The reporting order was judicial in the sense that it called on the functions and powers known to courts. The range of remedial orders available to courts in civil proceedings demonstrates that constitutional remedies involving some degree of ongoing supervision do not represent a radical break with the past practices of courts. Further, although the common law doctrine of functus officio cannot strictly pre-empt the remedial discretion in s. 24(1), an examination of the functus question indicates that the trial judge issued an order that is appropriately judicial. The retention of jurisdiction did not include any power to alter the disposition of the case and did nothing to undermine the provision of a stable basis for launching an appeal. Finally, in the context, the reporting order was not unfair to the government.

While, in retrospect, it would certainly have been advisable for the trial judge to provide more guidance to the parties as to what they could expect from the reporting sessions, his order was not incomprehensible or impossible to follow. It was not vaguely worded so as to render it invalid.

3.3.2 Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v. Canada (Justice), 1996 CanLII 3500 (BC SC)

This excerpt is from the trial level decision, where at para 14-22 the BCSC rejected a structural injunction requested by Little Sisters prior to the first Supreme Court decision.

14. The relief sought in items 2 and 3 above is what counsel have characterized as a "structural injunction". The plaintiffs contend that, because the deficiencies identified in the administration of the customs legislation are systemic and not able to be corrected quickly, there is a probability that unconstitutional decisions will continue to be made for some period of time. They point, in this regard, to the evidence that Canada Customs continues to inspect imported shipments bound for Little Sisters. As well, they say I should draw an inference that there will be resistance by Customs officers to compliance with the Court's declaration from the circumstances leading to the amendment of Memorandum D-9-1-1 with respect to anal penetration as a ground of prohibition, and from the fact that Customs has not released or reclassified materials prohibited on that ground. Further, they submit that there will be a continuing controversy as to whether and when the administrative deficiencies have been corrected and that the parties and the public generally would benefit from the more precise terms of injunctive relief to augment the general language of the declaration.

> 15 The Minister argues that the government acted immediately to implement the changes in administrative procedures mandated by my findings. …. These circumstances, he submits, do not warrant the Court intruding into the functions of the executive branch of the government.
> 16 The plaintiffs urge judicial activism in a field where Canadian courts have traditionally acted with restraint….
> 20 The likelihood of unconstitutional decisions occurring during the period of reform is significantly lessened by the interim procedures adopted by Canada Customs. Moreover, the appeal procedures provided in the Customs Act remain available to aggrieved importers. Further, I am not prepared to draw an inference that customs officials will be resistant to reform. Their actions since publication of my reasons for judgment belie that suggestion. These considerations do not warrant the Court departing at this time from its traditional stance in relation to the other branches of government.

3.3.3 Thibodeau v. Air Canada, 2012 FCA 246 (CanLII), [2013] 2 FCR 155, <https://canlii.ca/t/fsxh5> [citations omitted]

The Federal Court, in a judgment dated July 13, 2011, held that Air Canada had by its own admission failed to comply with the requirements of the Official Languages Act on four occasions (referring to specific flights without bilingual flight attendants, announcements about weather, arrival time and baggage collection that were not provided in French).

The trial judge, inter alia, ordered Air Canada to "introduce, within six months of this judgment, a proper monitoring system and procedures to quickly identify, document and quantify potential violations of its language duties, as set out at Part IV of the OLA and at section 10 of the ACPPA, particularly by introducing a procedure to identify and document occasions on which Jazz does not assign flight attendants able to provide services in French on board flights on which there is significant demand for services in French." On appeal, the Federal Court of Appeal reasoned as follows:

> [57] In my view, the orders issued in Doucet-Boudreau and Quigley v. Canada (House of Commons), 2002 FCT 645, [2003] 1 F.C. 132 (Quigley), to which the Commissioner refers to support the wording of the order in this case, are more precise and adhere more closely to the principle of specificity discussed hereinabove. Thus, in Doucet-Boudreau, at paragraph 7, the order read as follows:
> 3. In Île Madame-Arichat (Petit-de-Grat), the Respondent CSAP shall use its best efforts to provide a homogeneous French program for grades 9 through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall use its best efforts (a) to provide a homogeneous French facility (on an interim basis) for grades 9 through 12 by September 2000 and (b) to provide a permanent homogeneous French facility by January 2001.
> 4. In Argyle, the Respondent CSAP shall use its best efforts to provide a homogeneous French program for grades Primary through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall provide a homogeneous French facility for grades Primary through 12 by September 2001.
> 5. In Clare, the Respondent CSAP shall provide a homogeneous French program for grades Primary through 12 by September 2000 and the Respondent Department of Education shall take immediate steps to provide homogeneous French facilities for grades Primary through 12 by September 2001.
> [58] In Quigley, at paragraph 60, the formal judgment read as follows:
> IT IS ORDERED that:
> 1. A declaration will issue that the current method of the respondents, Canada (House of Commons) and Canada (Board of Internal Economy) for providing television broadcasts of parliamentary proceedings contravenes section 25 of the Act.
> 2. The above-named respondents shall, within one year of the date of this decision, take the necessary steps to bring its practices into compliance with section 25 of the Act.
> [59] In both cases, the respondents were able to know exactly what was expected of them, while having a certain amount of latitude in the choice of the method used to achieve the result ordered. However, this case is fundamentally different, in that Part IV of the OLA encompasses all communications with the public by Air Canada and its subcontractors, whether on board airplanes, in airports or call centres, both in Canada and abroad. These are continuous obligations, which Air Canada meets essentially through its bilingual staff which is responsible for interacting with the public at about 161 500 000 points of contact per year ….
> [60] The order, as drafted, would have to be interpreted by the court hearing contempt of court proceedings. In such a case, the order would not be able to remedy the harm. The court would have to address the meaning of the words "reasonable efforts" both qualitatively and quantitatively. Even when read in the context of the institutional order accompanying it, whose interpretation presents challenges which I will discuss below, the general order is still vague and lacking in specificity.

3.4 Constitutional Exemptions

Can s. 24(1) be relied upon to grant an individual a "constitutional exemption" from the application of a law? The general answer is "yes," but with some limitations.

3.4.1 R. v. Ferguson, 2008 SCC 6 (CanLII), [2008] 1 SCR 96 [citations omitted]

> During an altercation with a detainee held in a cell at an RCMP detachment, the accused, an RCMP officer, shot and killed the detainee. The accused was charged with second-degree murder but was convicted by a jury of the lesser offence of manslaughter. Notwithstanding the mandatory minimum sentence of four years imposed by a s. 236(a) of the Criminal Code for manslaughter with a firearm, the trial judge imposed a conditional sentence of two years less a day. He granted the accused a constitutional exemption from the four-year sentence because, on the circumstances of this case, he found that the minimum mandatory sentence constituted cruel and unusual punishment in violation of s. 12 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
> The judgment of the Court was delivered by The Chief Justice —

[25] Having found that the four-year minimum sentence of imprisonment required by s. 236(a) does not violate Constable Ferguson's right not to suffer cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s. 12 of the Charter, it is not necessary to consider whether a constitutional exemption would have been available had we found a violation of s. 12. …..[H]owever, there has been considerable debate and disagreement in the lower courts as to whether the remedy of a constitutional exemption is available. The matter having been fully argued, it is appropriate to settle the question of whether a constitutional exemption would have been available to Constable Ferguson, had the minimum sentence violated s. 12 of the Charter.

[26] … The only issue is whether a law imposing such punishment can be permitted to stand subject to constitutional exemptions in particular cases, or whether the only remedy is a declaration that the law is inconsistent with the Charter and hence falls under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

[28] The usual remedy for a mandatory sentencing provision that imposes cruel and unusual punishment contrary to s.12 of the Charter is a declaration that the law is of no force and effect under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. …

[29] …[Ferguson's] argument for a constitutional exemption proposes that the law remain in force, but that it not be applied in cases where its application results in a Charter violation. The judge would thus be free to impose a sentence below the minimum set by law, which would nevertheless continue to stand.

[30] ….The first prong of the argument is that where a mandatory minimum sentence that is constitutional in most of its applications generates an unconstitutional result in a small number of cases, it is better to grant a constitutional exemption in these cases than to strike down the law as a whole. The s. 52(1) remedy of declaring invalid a law that produces a result inconsistent with the Charter is a blunt tool. A law that may be constitutional in many of its applications — and indeed ruled constitutional on a reasonable hypothetical analysis — is struck down because in one particular case, or in a few cases, it produces an unconstitutional result. Would it not be better, the argument goes, to allow the law to stand, while providing an individual remedy in those cases — arguably rare — where its application offends the Charter?

[31] The second and complementary prong of the argument asserts that the remedy is available on the wording of the Charter and the jurisprudence. Section 24(1), it is argued, grants courts a wide discretion to grant such constitutional remedies as are "appropriate and just". Granting a constitutional exemption and substituting a constitutional sentence removes the law's inconsistency with the Charter, making s. 52(1) inapplicable. The cases that have considered the matter, while inconclusive, do not rule constitutional exemptions out as a remedy for unconstitutional sentences flowing from mandatory minimum sentence laws. More generally, granting constitutional exemptions for unconstitutional effects of mandatory minimum sentence laws fits well with the Court's practices of severance, reading in and reading out in order to preserve the law to the maximum extent possible: see Schachter v. Canada, 1992 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1992] 2 SCR 679.

[32] Attractive as they are, the arguments for constitutional exemptions in a case such as this are, on consideration, outweighed and undermined by counter-considerations. I reach this conclusion on the basis of four considerations: (1) the jurisprudence; (2) the need to avoid intruding on the role of Parliament; (3) the remedial scheme of the Charter; and (4) the impact of granting constitutional exemptions in mandatory sentence cases on the values underlying the rule of law.

(1) The Jurisprudence

[33] This Court has not definitively ruled whether constitutional exemptions are available as a remedy for mandatory minimum sentences that produce unconstitutional sentences. In concurring opinions, judges of this Court have expressed both positive and negative evaluations of constitutional exemptions as remedies for unconstitutional minimum sentences.

[35] Lower courts have taken contradictory positions on the availability of constitutional exemptions from mandatory minimum sentences. The Ontario and New Brunswick courts of appeal have held against the availability of constitutional exemptions from mandatory sentence laws…. By contrast, such exemptions have been granted in Saskatchewan and the Northwest and Yukon Territories and have been recognized in obiter in British Columbia…. The Quebec Court of Appeal has expressed both positive and negative views on the question in obiter: ....

[37] …. In summary, the majority of this Court in Seaboyer has commented critically on the use of constitutional exemptions as a stand-alone remedy in the case of mandatory laws generally, a view supported by Wilson J. in Osborne and consistent with the majority's reasoning in Corbiere. In Smith, Le Dain J. rejected their use in the context here at issue, mandatory minimum sentence laws. On the other side of the issue are the remarks of L'Heureux-Dubé and Arbour JJ. in their respective concurring opinions in Rose and Morrisey.

[38] I conclude that while the availability of constitutional exemptions for mandatory minimum sentencing laws has not been conclusively decided, the weight of authority thus far is against them and sounds a cautionary note.

(2) Intrusion on the Role of Parliament

[40] …. This Court has thus emphasized that in considering alternatives to striking down, courts must carefully consider whether the alternative being considered represents a lesser intrusion on Parliament's legislative role than striking down. …. In this case, the effect of granting a constitutional exemption would be to so change the legislation as to create something different in nature from what Parliament intended. It follows that a constitutional exemption should not be granted.

[41] When a court opts for severance or reading in as an alternative to striking down a provision, it does so on the assumption that had Parliament been aware of the provision's constitutional defect, it would likely have passed it with the alterations now being made by the court by means of severance or reading in. …. If it is not clear that Parliament would have passed the scheme with the modifications being considered by the court — or if it is probable that Parliament would not have passed the scheme with these modifications — then for the court to make these modifications would represent an inappropriate intrusion into the legislative sphere. In such cases, the least intrusive remedy is to strike down the constitutionally defective legislation under s. 52. It is then left up to Parliament to decide what legislative response, if any, is appropriate.

[46] …. granting a constitutional exemption from a mandatory minimum sentence law that results in an unconstitutional sentence goes directly against Parliament's intention. To allow constitutional exemptions for mandatory minimum sentences is, in effect, to read in a discretion to a provision where Parliament clearly intended to exclude discretion. If it would be inappropriate to read in such a discretion under s. 52, then necessarily it would be inappropriate to allow judges to grant constitutional exemptions having the same effect under s. 24(1). It cannot be assumed that Parliament would have enacted the mandatory minimum sentencing scheme with the discretion that allowing constitutional exemptions would create. For the Court to introduce such a discretion would thus represent an inappropriate intrusion into the legislative sphere.

> [47] I conclude that these considerations are sufficient to exclude constitutional exemptions as an appropriate remedy for unconstitutional mandatory minimum sentences. In the absence of any provision providing for discretion, a court that concludes that a mandatory minimum sentence imposes cruel and unusual punishment in an exceptional case before it is compelled to declare the provision invalid.
> (3) The Remedial Scheme of the Charter
> [51]. …. this Court has repeatedly affirmed that the validity of laws is determined by s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, while the validity of government action falls to be determined under s. 24 of the Charter. We are here concerned with a law that is alleged to violate a Charter right. This suggests that s. 52(1) provides the proper remedy.
> [52] It is argued that s. 24(1), while normally applicable to government acts, can also be used to provide a stand-alone remedy for the unconstitutional effects of mandatory minimum sentence laws.
> [55] The presence of s. 52(1) with its mandatory wording suggests an intention of the framers of the Charter that unconstitutional laws are deprived of effect to the extent of their inconsistency, not left on the books subject to discretionary case-by-case remedies: see Osborne, per Wilson J. In cases where the requirements for severance or reading in are met, it may be possible to remedy the inconsistency judicially instead of striking down the impugned legislation as a whole: Vriend; Sharpe. Where this is not possible — as in the case of an unconstitutional mandatory minimum sentence — the unconstitutional provision must be struck down. The ball is thrown back into Parliament's court, to revise the law, should it choose to do so, so that it no longer produces unconstitutional effects. In either case, the remedy is a s. 52 remedy that renders the unconstitutional provision of no force or effect to the extent of its inconsistency. To the extent that the law is unconstitutional, it is not merely inapplicable for the purposes of the case at hand. It is null and void, and is effectively removed from the statute books.
> [56] ….[I]f the unconstitutional effects of laws are remediable on a case-by-case basis under s. 24(1), in theory all Charter violations could be addressed in this manner, leaving no role for s. 52(1). …[T]he risk is that the role intended for s. 52(1) would be undermined and that laws that should be struck down — over-inclusive laws that pose a real risk of unconstitutional treatment of Canadians — would remain on the books, contrary to the intention of the framers of the Charter.
> (4) The Rule of Law
> [57] Constable Ferguson's principal argument for constitutional exemptions, as we have seen, is an appeal to flexibility. Yet this flexibility comes at a cost: constitutional exemptions buy flexibility at the cost of undermining the rule of law.
> [58] The principles of constitutionalism and the rule of law lie at the root of democratic governance.. It is fundamental to the rule of law that "the law must be accessible and so far as possible intelligible, clear and predictable".
> [59] Constitutional exemptions for mandatory minimum sentence laws raise concerns related to the rule of law and the values that underpin it: certainty, accessibility, intelligibility, clarity and predictability.
> [60] …When a constitutional exemption is granted, the successful claimant receives a personal remedy under s. 24(1), but the law remains on the books, intact. … As constitutional exemptions are actually granted, the law in the statute books will in fact increasingly diverge from the law as applied.
> [61] Constitutional exemptions from mandatory minimum sentences leave the law uncertain and unpredictable, … how is the judge to decide whether the case before her is rare? The bright line required for constitutional certainty is elusive.
> [62] The divergence between the law on the books and the law as applied — and the uncertainty and unpredictability that result — exacts a price paid in the coin of injustice. First, it impairs the right of citizens to know what the law is in advance and govern their conduct accordingly — a fundamental tenet of the rule of law. Second, it risks over-application of the law… Third, it invites duplication of effort. The matter of constitutionality would not be resolved once and for all as under s. 52(1); in every case where a violation is suspected, the accused would be obliged to seek a constitutional exemption. In so doing, it creates an unnecessary barrier to the effective exercise of the convicted offender's constitutional rights, thereby encouraging uneven and unequal application of the law. A final cost of constitutional exemptions from mandatory minimum sentence laws is to the institutional value of effective law making and the proper roles of Parliament and the courts. Allowing unconstitutional laws to remain on the books deprives Parliament of certainty as to the constitutionality of the law in question and thus of the opportunity to remedy it. Legislatures need clear guidance from the courts as to what is constitutionally permissible and what must be done to remedy legislation that is found to be constitutionally infirm. In granting constitutional exemptions, courts would be altering the state of the law on constitutional grounds without giving clear guidance to Parliament as to what the Constitution requires in the circumstances: Rosenberg and Perrault, at p. 391. Bad law, fixed up on a case-by-case basis by the courts, does not accord with the role and responsibility of Parliament to enact constitutional laws for the people of Canada.
> [63] I conclude that constitutional exemptions should not be recognized as a remedy for cruel and unusual punishment imposed by a law prescribing a minimum sentence. If a law providing for a mandatory minimum sentence is found to violate the Charter, it should be declared inconsistent with the Charter and hence of no force and effect under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

> [64] I would dismiss the appeal…

3.4.2 Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2016 SCC 4 (CanLII), [2016] 1 SCR 13

See other excerpts from this case in Chapter 23, Parts 4.3.3 and 5.4.

This case seems to illustrate the conditions under which exemptions might be appropriate. In this case which followed Carter #1 (Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 5 (CanLII) para 128-129), the Court considered an extension on the 12 month suspension of the declaration of invalidity. A new government had been elected during the suspension period, and it was the new government which sought the extension. The Court also decided 5:4 to revisit their decision in Carter #1 not to create an exemption mechanism during the period of suspension:

> [6] This is the first time the Court has been asked to consider whether to grant individual exemptions during an extension of a suspension of a declaration of invalidity. Parliament was given one year to determine what, if any, legislative response was appropriate. In agreeing that more time is needed, we do not at the same time see any need to unfairly prolong the suffering of those who meet the clear criteria we set out in Carter. An exemption can mitigate the severe harm that may be occasioned to those adults who have a grievous, intolerable and irremediable medical condition by making a remedy available now pending Parliament's response. The prejudice to the rights flowing from the four-month extension outweighs countervailing considerations…We would, as a result, grant the request for an exemption so that those who wish to seek > assistance from a physician in accordance with the criteria set out in para. 127 of our reasons in Carter, may apply to the superior court of their jurisdiction for relief during the extended period of suspension. Requiring judicial authorization during that interim period ensures compliance with the rule of law and provides an effective safeguard against potential risks to vulnerable people.

Exemptions were provided in more than 30 reported cases based on Carter #2, but as Kent Roach has written, "we do not know how many people who would have qualified for medical assistance in dying under Carter were unable or unwilling to litigate to receive an individual remedy".[113]

3.5 Charter Damages

3.5.1 Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance) 2002 SCC 13: Damages and Limited Immunity [citations omitted]

Mackin and a few other judges claimed that section 11(d) was violated by the abolition of the position of supernumerary judges in New Brunswick. The Minister did not offer any section 1 argument, and a violation of section 11(d) was found by the Courts. However the damages claim was rejected as follows.

> (1) Damages
> 78 According to a general rule of public law, absent conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power, the courts will not award damages for the harm suffered as a result of the mere enactment or application of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional. In other words "[i]nvalidity of governmental action, without more, clearly should not be a basis for liability for harm caused by the action". In the legal sense, therefore, both public officials and legislative bodies enjoy limited immunity against actions in civil liability based on the fact that a legislative instrument is invalid. With respect to the possibility that a legislative assembly will be held liable for enacting a statute that is subsequently declared unconstitutional, R. Dussault and L. Borgeat confirmed in their Administrative Law: A Treatise (2nd ed. 1990), vol. 5, at p. 177, that:
> > In our parliamentary system of government, Parliament or a legislature of a province cannot be held liable for anything it does in exercising its legislative powers. The law is the source of duty, as much for citizens as for the Administration, and while a wrong and damaging failure to respect the law may for anyone raise a liability, it is hard to imagine that either Parliament or a legislature can as the lawmaker be held accountable for harm caused to an individual following the enactment of legislation. [Footnotes omitted.]
> 79 …The limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government. In other words, this doctrine makes it possible to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just in the circumstances. Consequently, the reasons that inform the general principle of public law are also relevant in a Charter context. [I]f [government acts] good faith and without abusing their power under prevailing law and only subsequently are their acts found to be unconstitutional, they will not be liable. Otherwise, the effectiveness and efficiency of government action would be excessively constrained. …[I]it is only in the event of conduct that is clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power that damages may be awarded
> 80 Thus, it is against this backdrop that we must read the following comments made by Lamer C.J. in Schachter, supra, at p. 720:
>
> > An individual remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter will rarely be available in conjunction with an action under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Ordinarily, where a provision is declared unconstitutional and immediately struck down pursuant to s. 52, that will be the end of the matter. No retroactive s. 24 remedy will be available. [Emphasis added.]
> 81 In short, although it cannot be asserted that damages may never be obtained following a declaration of unconstitutionality, it is true that, as a rule, an action for damages brought under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for a declaration of invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.
> 82 … I do not find any evidence that might suggest that the government of New Brunswick acted negligently, in bad faith or by abusing its powers. Its knowledge of the unconstitutionality of eliminating the office of supernumerary judge has never been established. On the contrary, Bill 7 came into force on April 1, 1995, more than two years before this Court expressed its opinion in the Provincial Court Judges Reference, supra, which, it must be recognized, substantially altered the situation in terms of the institutional independence of the judiciary. Consequently, it may not reasonably be suggested that the government of New Brunswick displayed negligence, bad faith or wilful blindness with respect to its constitutional obligations at that time.
> 83 Furthermore, I cannot accept the statement of Ryan J.A. of the Court of Appeal that the failure of the Minister of Justice to keep his promise to refer Bill 7 to the Law Amendments Committee was an instance of bad faith that justified the awards of damages. Even if admitted to be true, such evidence is far from establishing a negligent or unreasonable attitude on the part of government. In fact, it has no probative value as to whether, in the circumstances, the legislation was enacted wrongly, for ulterior motives or with knowledge of its unconstitutionality.
> 84 The claim of the respondent judges for damages is accordingly dismissed.

3.5.2 Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27 (CanLII), [2010] 2 SCR 28

On August 1, 2002, police received a tip that someone planned to throw a pie at then Prime Minister of Canada Jean Chretien, during his appearance in Vancouver that day. Ward, a lawyer, was misidentified as the would-be pie thrower based on a description police received from the tipster.

> "When the VPD officers noticed him, Mr. Ward was running and appeared to be avoiding interception. The officers chased Mr. Ward down and handcuffed him. Mr. Ward loudly protested his detention and created a disturbance, drawing the attention of a local television camera crew. The television broadcast showed that Mr. Ward had a "very agitated look on his face", "appeared to be yelling for the benefit of the onlookers" and was "holding back" as he was being escorted down the street." (para 7).

Ward was arrested for breach of the peace. At the lockup police strip searched him ("Mr. Ward complied in part but refused to take off his underwear. The officers did not insist on complete removal and Mr. Ward was never touched during the search." at para 8). Police had also impounded his car while waiting for a warrant to search it. After the strip-search was completed, Mr. Ward was placed in a small cell before being released 4.5 hours post-arrest.

> [from the headnote]

With respect to the strip search and the car seizure, the trial judge held that, although the Province and the City did not act in bad faith and were not liable in tort for either incident, the Province's strip search and the City's vehicle seizure violated W's right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure under s. 8 of the Charter. The trial judge assessed damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter at $100 for the seizure of the car and $5,000 for the strip search. The Court of Appeal, in a majority decision, upheld the trial judge's ruling.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

A. When Are Damages Under Section 24(1) Available?

(1) The Language of Section 24(1) and the Nature of Charter Damages

[20] ….Briefly, an appropriate and just remedy will: (1) meaningfully vindicate the rights and freedoms of the claimants; (2) employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy; (3) be a judicial remedy which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court; and (4) be fair to the party against whom the order is made: Doucet-Boudreau, at paras. 55-58.

[21] Damages for breach of a claimant's Charter rights may meet these conditions. They may meaningfully vindicate the claimant's rights and freedoms. They employ a means well-recognized within our legal framework. They are appropriate to the function and powers of a court. And, depending on the circumstances and the amount awarded, they can be fair not only to the claimant whose rights were breached, but to the state which is required to pay them. I therefore conclude that s. 24(1) is broad enough to include the remedy of damages for Charter breach. That said, granting damages under the Charter is a new endeavour, and an approach to when damages are appropriate and just should develop incrementally. Charter damages are only one remedy amongst others available under s. 24(1), and often other s. 24(1) remedies will be more responsive to the breach.

[22] The term "damages" conveniently describes the remedy sought in this case. However, it should always be borne in mind that these are not private law damages, but the distinct remedy of constitutional damages…The nature of the remedy is to require the state (or society writ large) to compensate an individual for breaches of the individual's constitutional rights. An action for public law damages — including constitutional damages — lies against the state and not against individual actors. Actions against individual actors should be pursued in accordance with existing causes of action. However, the underlying policy considerations that are engaged when awarding private law damages against state actors may be relevant when awarding public law damages directly against the state. Such considerations may be appropriately kept in mind.

(2) Step One: Proof of a Charter Breach

[23] Section 24(1) is remedial. The first step, therefore, is to establish a Charter breach. This is the wrong on which the claim for damages is based.

(3) Step Two: Functional Justification of Damages

[24] A functional approach to damages finds damages to be appropriate and just to the extent that they serve a useful function or purpose…

[31] …[D]amages under s. 24(1) of the Charter are a unique public law remedy, which may serve the objectives of: (1) compensating the claimant for loss and suffering caused by the breach; (2) vindicating the right by emphasizing its importance and the gravity of the breach; and (3) deterring state agents from committing future breaches. Achieving one or more of these objects is the first requirement for "appropriate and just" damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

(4) Step Three: Countervailing Factors

[33] … A complete catalogue of countervailing considerations remains to be developed as the law in this area matures. At this point, however, two considerations are apparent: the existence of alternative remedies and concerns for good governance.

[34] A functional approach to damages under s. 24(1) means that if other remedies adequately meet the need for compensation, vindication and/or deterrence, a further award of damages under s. 24(1) would serve no function and would not be "appropriate and just". The Charter entered an existent remedial arena which already housed tools to correct violative state conduct. Section 24(1) operates concurrently with, and does not replace, these areas of law. Alternative remedies include private law remedies for actions for personal injury, other Charter remedies like declarations under s. 24(1), and remedies for actions covered by legislation permitting proceedings against the Crown.

[35] …. The claimant need not show that she has exhausted all other recourses. Rather, it is for the state to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach. For example, if the claimant has brought a concurrent action in tort….the resulting award of damages would adequately address the Charter breach [and]… an award of Charter damages would be duplicative. ….

[36] The existence of a potential claim in tort does not therefore bar a claimant from obtaining damages under the Charter. Tort law and the Charter are distinct legal avenues. However, a concurrent action in tort, or other private law claim, bars s. 24(1) damages if the result would be double compensation.

[37] Declarations of Charter breach may provide an adequate remedy for the Charter breach, particularly where the claimant has suffered no personal damage…

[38] Another consideration that may negate the appropriateness of s. 24(1) damages is concern for effective governance. Good governance concerns may take different forms. At one extreme, it may be argued that any award of s. 24(1) damages will always have a chilling effect on government conduct and hence will impact negatively on good governance. The logical conclusion of this argument is that s. 24(1) damages would never be appropriate. Clearly, this is not what the Constitution intends. Moreover, insofar as s. 24(1) damages deter Charter breaches, they promote good governance. Compliance with Charter standards is a foundational principle of good governance.

[39] In some situations, however, the state may establish that an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance such that damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity… duly enacted laws should be enforced until declared invalid, unless the state conduct under the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power"… The rule of law would be undermined if governments were deterred from enforcing the law by the possibility of future damage awards in the event the law was, at some future date, to be declared invalid. Thus, absent threshold misconduct, an action for damages under s. 24(1) of the Charter cannot be combined with an action for invalidity based on s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982: Mackin, at para. 81.

[40] The Mackin principle recognizes that the state must be afforded some immunity from liability in damages resulting from the conduct of certain functions that only the state can perform. Legislative and policy-making functions are one such area of state activity. The immunity is justified because the law does not wish to chill the exercise of policy-making discretion…

(5) Step Four: Quantum of Section 24(1) Damages

[47] As discussed earlier, damages may be awarded to compensate the claimant for his loss, to vindicate the right or to deter future violations of the right. These objects, the presence and force of which vary from case to case, determine not only whether damages are appropriate, but also the amount of damages awarded. Generally, compensation will be the most important object, and vindication and deterrence will play supporting roles. This is all the more so because other Charter remedies may not provide compensation for the claimant's personal injury resulting from the violation of his Charter rights. However, as discussed earlier, cases may arise where vindication or deterrence play a major and even exclusive role.

[48] Where the objective of compensation is engaged, the concern is to restore the claimant to the position she would have been in had the breach not been committed, as discussed above. As in a tort action, any claim for compensatory damages must be supported by evidence of the loss suffered.

[50] In other cases, like this one, the claimant's losses will be non-pecuniary. Non-pecuniary damages are harder to measure. Yet they are not by that reason to be rejected. Again, tort law provides assistance. Pain and suffering are compensable. Absent exceptional circumstances, compensation is fixed at a fairly modest conventional rate, subject to variation for the degree of suffering in the particular case. In extreme cases of catastrophic injury, a higher but still conventionally determined award is given on the basis that it serves the function purpose of providing substitute comforts and pleasures…

[51] When we move from compensation to the objectives of vindication and deterrence, tort law is less useful. Making the appropriate determinations is an exercise in rationality and proportionality and will ultimately be guided by precedent as this important chapter of Charter jurisprudence is written by Canada's courts. That said, some initial observations may be made.

[52] A principal guide to the determination of quantum is the seriousness of the breach, having regard to the objects of s. 24(1) damages. ….Generally speaking, the more egregious the conduct and the more serious the repercussions on the claimant, the higher the award for vindication or deterrence will be.

[53] Just as private law damages must be fair to both the plaintiff and the defendant, so s. 24(1) damages must be fair — or "appropriate and just" — to both the claimant and the state. …. Large awards and the consequent diversion of public funds may serve little functional purpose in terms of the claimant's needs and may be inappropriate or unjust from the public perspective. In considering what is fair to the claimant and the state, the court may take into account the public interest in good governance, the danger of deterring governments from undertaking beneficial new policies and programs, and the need to avoid diverting large sums of funds from public programs to private interests.

[54] Courts in other jurisdictions where an award of damages for breach of rights is available have generally been careful to avoid unduly high damage awards. This may reflect the difficulty of assessing what is required to vindicate the right and deter future breaches, as well as the fact that it is society as a whole that is asked to compensate the claimant. ….The private law measure of damages for similar wrongs will often be a useful guide. ….

[57] To sum up, the amount of damages must reflect what is required to functionally serve the objects of compensation, vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches, insofar as they are engaged in a particular case, having regard to the impact of the breach on the claimant and the seriousness of the state conduct. The award must be appropriate and just from the perspective of the claimant and the state.

(6) Forum and Procedure

[58] For a tribunal to grant a Charter remedy under s. 24(1), it must have the power to decide questions of law and the remedy must be one that the tribunal is authorized to grant.. Generally, the appropriate forum for an award of damages under s. 24(1) is a court which has the power to consider Charter questions and which by statute or inherent jurisdiction has the power to award damages. Provincial criminal courts are not so empowered and thus do not have the power to award damages under s. 24(1).

[59] As was done here, the claimant may join a s. 24(1) claim with a tort claim. It may be useful to consider the tort claim first, since if it meets the objects of Charter damages, recourse to s. 24(1) will be unnecessary. This may add useful context and facilitate the s. 24(1) analysis. This said, it is not essential that the claimant exhaust her remedies in private law before bringing a s. 24(1) claim.

3.5.2.1 Note: Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, [2020] 1 SCR 678

This decision confirms the availability of Charter damages in cases involving unconstitutional policies.

3.5.3 Canada (Attorney General) v. Power, 2024 SCC 26 [citations omitted]

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Karakatsanis, Martin, O'Bonsawin and Moreau JJ. was delivered by The Chief Justice and Karakatsanis J. —

[2] The facts as pleaded indicate that the respondent Joseph Power's Charter rights were violated when Parliament enacted legislation that retrospectively changed the availability of criminal record suspensions for certain offenders. These changes made Mr. Power permanently ineligible for a record suspension. As a result, he was unable to maintain his employment. The appellant Attorney General of Canada concedes that the retrospective application of the legislation violates s. 11(h) and (i) of the Charter in a manner that cannot be justified by s. 1 (A.R., at pp. 89 and 91). Mr. Power brings a claim against Canada for damages under s. 24(1). ..

[3] This appeal raises the question of whether damages can ever be an appropriate and just remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter in respect of the enactment of legislation later declared unconstitutional. Canada submits that it enjoys absolute immunity from s. 24(1) damages for the enactment of unconstitutional legislation. …

[4] We disagree. The state is not entitled to an absolute immunity from liability for damages when it enacts unconstitutional legislation that infringes Charter rights. Rather, as this Court held in Mackin v. New Brunswick (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 13, [2002] 1 SCR 405, the state enjoys a limited immunity in the exercise of its law-making power. Accordingly, damages may be awarded under s. 24(1) for the enactment of legislation that breaches a Charter right. However, the defence of immunity will be available to the state unless it is established that the law was clearly unconstitutional, or that its enactment was in bad faith or an abuse of power. This is a high threshold. But it is not insurmountable.

[5] An absolute immunity fails to properly reconcile the constitutional principles that protect legislative autonomy, such as parliamentary sovereignty and parliamentary privilege, and the principles that require the government be held accountable for infringing Charter rights, such as constitutionality and the rule of law. Each of these principles constitutes an essential part of our constitutional law and they must all be respected to achieve an appropriate separation of powers. By shielding the government from liability in even the most egregious circumstances, absolute immunity would subvert the principles that demand government accountability. The necessary reconciliation of these principles demands that we affirm the limited immunity threshold recognized in Mackin.

[6] We would dismiss the appeal.

[24] Canada and Mr. Power advance opposing views on how to interpret and apply s. 24(1) in the context of a claim for damages for unconstitutional legislation that violates a Charter right. Canada submits that important constitutional principles require an absolute immunity for such damages. Mr. Power submits that the government is only entitled to a limited immunity.

(2) Section 32(1): Application of the Charter

[30] Clearly, the federal and provincial legislatures are subject to Charter scrutiny. As this Court has explained, the words of s. 32(1) express that "the Charter is essentially an instrument for checking the powers of government over the individual". The Charter "is intended to constrain governmental action inconsistent with those rights and freedoms" (Hunter, at p. 156). As explained further below, ss. 32(1) and 24 of the Charter, along with s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, entrench the court's role in holding the government to account for Charter violations.

(3) Remedies for Breaches of Charter Rights

[39] The broad discretion afforded under s. 24(1) and a purposive approach to remedies combine to give meaning to the idea that Charter rights are only as meaningful as the remedies provided for their breach. In this way, s. 24(1) is "a cornerstone upon which the rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter are founded, and a critical means by which they are realized and preserved" (Dunedin, at para. 20).

[40] In Doucet-Boudreau, the Court noted that s. 24 must be allowed to evolve to meet the different contexts in which Charter violations occur, and must remain flexible and responsive to the needs of a given case (para. 59). In general terms, the Court explained that a just and appropriate remedy under s. 24(1) will: (1) meaningfully vindicate the claimant's rights and freedoms; (2) employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy; (3) be a judicial remedy which vindicates the right while invoking the function and powers of a court; and (4) be fair to the party against whom the order is made (paras. 55-58).

(4) Damages as a Section 24(1) Remedy

[41] An award of damages against the state for exceeding its legal powers has long been recognized as an important requirement of the rule of law.

[42] In Ward, this Court set out a four-step test for determining whether damages are an appropriate and just remedy:

1. Has a Charter right been breached?
2. Would damages fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindicating the right, or deterring future breaches?
3. Has the state demonstrated that countervailing factors defeat the functional considerations that support a damage award and render damages inappropriate or unjust?
4. What is the appropriate quantum of damages?

[43] Canada's argument for absolute immunity to a claim for damages rests on two propositions that implicate the countervailing factors considered at the third step.

[44] First, Canada relies on the availability of an alternative remedy. Canada asserts that the availability of a declaration of invalidity under s. 52(1) will always render damages inappropriate and unjust. Canada asserts that damages will never be appropriate for the enactment of legislation subsequently declared unconstitutional because the declaration of unconstitutionality will always be sufficient. Canada submits that judicial review of a decision under the invalid law may also be appropriate in certain cases.

[45] While there is a general presumption against combining remedies under ss. 24(1) and 52(1) (Schachter, at p. 720; Mackin, at paras. 78-81), there is no categorical restriction. This Court has instead adopted a functional and flexible approach to combining remedies that is driven by principled and purposive considerations. It is true that the existence of an alternative remedy is a countervailing consideration (Ward, at para. 33). However, the concern with alternative remedies is to avoid duplication and double recovery (para. 35; Brazeau v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 ONCA 184, 149 O.R. (3d) 705, at para. 43). Provided an award of Charter damages is not duplicative, the potential to combine declarations and damages must remain available in situations where a declaration would fail to satisfy the functional need for compensation, vindication or to meaningfully deter future breaches (Albashir, at paras. 61-67; Ward, at para. 56; see also P. W. Hogg and W. K. Wright, Constitutional Law of Canada (5th ed. Supp.), at § 40:13). …

[46] The second countervailing consideration that Canada raises … are concerns for good governance. Canada submits that Charter damages would interfere with Parliament's law-making functions, impeding the state's ability to govern effectively. While this Court has held that good governance concerns may defeat an award of damages, we have also cautioned that the mere suggestion that damages will have a chilling effect on government is not sufficient to defeat the applicant's functional entitlement to Charter damages established at steps one and two of the four-step test (Ward, at para. 38). Indeed, damages may promote good governance by encouraging constitutional compliance and deterring Charter breaches. ….

(5) Constitutional Principles

[47] Canada argues that anything less than absolute immunity is inconsistent with three longstanding and foundational constitutional principles: parliamentary sovereignty, the separation of powers, and parliamentary privilege. Mr. Power responds that these principles do not necessitate absolute immunity and, moreover, that such immunity is inconsistent with other foundational constitutional principles, including constitutionalism and the rule of law. Each of these principles inform the separation of powers. We will briefly consider each in turn, before addressing the parties' substantive submissions later in the analysis.

(a) Parliamentary Sovereignty, Separation of Powers, and Parliamentary Privilege

[48] Canada rightly notes that parliamentary sovereignty, the separation of powers and parliamentary privilege are constitutional principles that ensure that democratically elected officials are free to make laws and to hold the executive to account, without undue interference from an unelected judiciary. The preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867 states that Canada has "a Constitution similar in Principle to that of the United Kingdom". Parliamentary sovereignty, the separation of powers and parliamentary privilege are core features of the British Constitution. As a result, these are also important constitutional principles in Canada.

[49] As for parliamentary sovereignty, there are important differences between the United Kingdom and Canada. In the United Kingdom, the "laws enacted by the Crown in Parliament are the supreme form of law". In Canada, it is the Constitution that is the supreme law: the legislature can "make or unmake any law it wishes, within the confines of its constitutional authority". In other words, in Canada the principle of parliamentary sovereignty must not be confused with parliamentary supremacy.

[50] The separation of powers is part of the foundational architecture of our constitutional order. It is a constitutional principle which recognizes that the three branches of government have different functions, institutional capacities and expertise; and that each must refrain from undue interference with the others. The separation of powers allows each branch to fulfill its distinct but complementary institutional role without undue interference and to create a system of checks and balances within our constitutional democracy.

[51] Parliamentary privilege plays an essential role in our democratic and constitutional order by allowing legislative officials to carry out their function, including vigorously debating laws and holding the executive to account.

[52] This Court has characterized parliamentary privilege as "the sum of the privileges, immunities and powers enjoyed by the Senate, the House of Commons and provincial legislative assemblies, and by each member individually, without which they could not discharge their functions". Courts cannot review conduct within an area of parliamentary privilege, even for compliance with the Charter (New Brunswick Broadcasting, at p. 384). The sphere of activity for which privilege is claimed must therefore be closely scrutinized, and it will only receive protection if it is closely and directly connected with the fulfillment by the assembly or by its members of their functions as a legislative and deliberative body (Chagnon, at para. 27; Vaid, at para. 46).

(b) Constitutionalism and the Rule of Law

[53] Mr. Power submits that none of these principles are absolute and that none mandate absolute immunity. Rather, these principles must be reconciled with the role of courts as guardians of the Constitution, as reflected in the principles of the rule of law and constitutionality, both of which require courts to award meaningful and effective remedies for breaches of the Charter (Reference re Secession of Quebec, 1998 CanLII 793 (SCC), [1998] 2 SCR 217, at para. 72; Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 25).

[54] The rule of law is "a fundamental postulate of our constitutional structure" (Roncarelli, at p. 142) and is "clearly implicit in the very nature of a Constitution" (Reference re Manitoba Language Rights, 1985 CanLII 33 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 721, at p. 750). It protects "individuals from arbitrary state action" by providing "that the law is supreme over the acts of both government and private persons" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, at paras. 70-71).

[55] The Constitution is the supreme law of Canada. The principle of constitutionalism finds clear expression in s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982. Thus, "with the adoption of the Charter, the Canadian system of government was transformed to a significant extent from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to one of constitutional supremacy".

[56] These principles "lie at the root of our system of government" (Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 70). Together, they explain the duty that courts have "to act as vigilant guardians of constitutional rights and the rule of law" (Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 110). Thus, courts play a fundamental role in holding the executive and legislative branches of government to account in Canada's constitutional order.

[57] We agree with Mr. Power that these constitutional principles must be respected in determining the judicial reach of meaningful remedies for breaches of the Charter. Together, they inform the appropriate balance underlying the extent of immunity for the enactment of unconstitutional legislation.

B. This Court Has Recognized a Limited Immunity for the Enactment of Unconstitutional Legislation

(1) Mackin Set a High Threshold for Damages

[59] We agree with Mr. Power and the courts below that in Mackin, this Court considered precisely the same issue: the availability of Charter damages for the enactment of Charter-infringing unconstitutional legislation.

[60] The applicants in Mackin were two provincial court judges. They challenged a provincial statute that eliminated the system of supernumerary judges in favour of a panel of retired judges paid on a per diem basis. They claimed that the statute violated the right to judicial independence enshrined in s. 11(d) of the Charter and sought s. 24(1) damages and s. 52(1) declaratory relief.

[61] The Court agreed with the judges that the legislation was unconstitutional and declared it to be of no force or effect. Turning to the claim for damages, Gonthier J. explained that while legislative bodies enjoy immunity from damages for the "mere enactment or application of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional" (para. 78 (emphasis added)), such immunity will give way to liability when the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power" (para. 79 (emphasis added)). He concluded that damages were not justified in that case because there was no evidence to suggest that this threshold was satisfied (para. 82).

[63] First, Mackin concerned only the enactment of legislation. The state's actions under the law was not at issue: it was the legislation itself that abolished the supernumerary judicial status, thereby depriving the judges of their status and income — and thus, their independence. Accordingly, we do not accept Canada's argument that Mackin never contemplated a claim for damages against the state for the enactment of unconstitutional legislation. The Mackin principle of limited immunity was plainly set out in the context of the "enactment" of law, and as applying to "legislative bodies" (para. 78).

[64] Second, the Court did not deny the judges' claim because the state enjoyed an absolute immunity for the enactment of legislation, but because the threshold was not satisfied. Gonthier J. found that there was no evidence to suggest the government of New Brunswick acted in bad faith or abused its power. He explained that the government could not have known of later developments in the law concerning judicial independence at the time the statute was enacted. In reaching this conclusion, Gonthier J. looked to the state's motives, knowledge and conduct during the legislative process. He found the state had a "perfectly legitimate purpose" when it passed the invalid law: "efficiency, flexibility and cost savings" (para. 70). He also found that there was no evidence the state acted with "wilful blindness with respect to its constitutional obligations" (para. 82), nor that the state enacted the law with "knowledge" of its unconstitutionality, nor for an "ulterior motiv[e]" (para. 83).

[65] Third, the threshold for liability established in Mackin was expressly designed to reconcile competing constitutional principles. Gonthier J. explained that the "limited immunity given to government is specifically a means of creating a balance between the protection of constitutional rights and the need for effective government" (para. 79). To award damages merely because legislation was unconstitutional would fail to strike the right balance because it would not give effect to the need for effective government. Yet, at the same time, he recognized that "the government and its representatives are required to exercise their powers in good faith and to respect the 'established and indisputable' laws that define the constitutional rights of individuals" (ibid.).

[66] For these reasons, Gonthier J. held that the "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power" threshold provides the appropriate qualification on the state's liability for the enactment of an unconstitutional law.

(2) The Mackin Threshold Has Not Been Overruled by Subsequent Cases

[67] Canada further argues that if Mackin established a limited immunity, this Court has overruled that immunity in subsequent cases.

[68] We do not agree. Rather, we agree with Mr. Power and the courts below that the post-Mackin jurisprudence does not depart from the limited immunity threshold.

[69] The first category of cases said to have overruled Mackin are those Canada says demonstrate that the limited immunity threshold in Mackin has been restricted in application to situations of executive action, such that it no longer applies in the realm of legislative power. We reject this argument.

[70] True, some of this Court's cases have referred to the threshold applying to executive conduct under the law. For example, in Ward, McLachlin C.J. referred to Mackin as applying to "state conduct under the law" (para. 39). And in Henry v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 24, [2015] 2 SCR 214, Moldaver J. referred to it as applying to "state action taken pursuant to a law" (para. 42). But those cases involved such executive conduct. There is no inconsistency here. As explained above, Gonthier J. said in Mackin that the threshold applied to the "enactment or application" of legislation later declared unconstitutional (para. 78 (emphasis added)). Indeed, the Mackin threshold was described in general terms in Ward as recognizing "that the state must be afforded some immunity from liability in damages resulting from the conduct of certain functions that only the state can perform. Legislative and policy-making functions are one such area of state activity" (para. 40 (emphasis added)).

[71] Similarly, in Conseil scolaire francophone de la Colombie-Britannique v. British Columbia, 2020 SCC 13, [2020] 1 SCR 678, this Court considered a different type of situation again: whether the Mackin threshold applied to government decisions made under government policies. Canada points out that at one point the Mackin threshold is described as applying to "acts carried out pursuant to a law that is subsequently declared to be invalid" (para. 168). But, at another point, the threshold is described as applying to "those who make laws" or "the legislature" (ibid.). Both are consistent with Mackin, and the Court was unanimous on this point. Although dissenting in the result, Brown and Rowe JJ. noted that "a key holding" in Mackin was its broad formulation of the immunity threshold and that it "plainly encompasses acts of both the legislatures and other public officials" (paras. 286-87 (emphasis deleted)).

[72] Canada also argues that the principles set down in Mikisew overrule Mackin. We do not agree. Canada is right that Mikisew says that courts should not meddle with the law-making process, including in the enactment of legislation. However, Mikisew is readily distinguishable. This appeal concerns remedies for an invalid law that breaches Charter rights. Mikisew concerned whether to impose a procedural step in the form of a duty to consult under s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 within the legislative process (paras. 31 and 52). And, while the majority in Mikisew accepted that it is "rarely appropriate for courts to scrutinize the law-making process" (para. 2), and that the judiciary "should forebear from intervening" in this process (para. 32), it also noted that after-the-fact review remains available in some circumstances (para. 52).

C. Mackin Should Not Be Overruled

[77] …. [W]e would not overturn Mackin. Limited immunity respects the constitutional principles underpinning both legislative autonomy and accountability. … In order to fulfill its institutional function, the legislative branch requires an independent space for elected representatives to carry out their parliamentary duties, to freely debate and decide what laws should govern, and to exercise the unfettered ability to hold the executive branch of the state to account. But absolute immunity would subvert the principles that command government compliance with the Charter and the courts' role in enforcing its fundamental guarantees.

(1) Limited Immunity Respects All of the Constitutional Principles

[79] Our constitutional jurisprudence has not created hierarchies of constitutional principles. It has aimed to provide flexibility and accommodation in the pursuit of good governance and fundamental rights. This is especially important in an era of increased transparency and accountability. Our constitutional remedies must reflect the interdependency of principles, and balance the need for both government autonomy and accountability.

[80] [T[he Mackin threshold is consistent with and best reconciles each of the constitutional principles engaged by this appeal.

[81] First, parliamentary sovereignty is not undermined by the Mackin threshold. ….Limited immunity does not impair Parliament's power to make and repeal laws within the confines of the Constitution.

[82] Second, limited immunity is consistent with the separation of powers. The separation of powers does not mean that each branch is completely "separate" or works in isolation. The separation of powers in Canada is not strict (Reference re Secession of Quebec, at para. 15; Cooper v. Canada (Human Rights Commission), 1996 CanLII 152 (SCC), [1996] 3 SCR 854, at para. 10). We have "never adopted a watertight system of separation of judicial, legislative and executive functions" (Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 107). Rather, our Court has always emphasized that each branch cannot exercise "undue" interference, which depends entirely on the circumstances and the constitutional principles engaged. The availability of an after-the-fact judicial remedy for unconstitutional legislation does not interfere with the law-making process. However, respect for the legislative role requires a high threshold for liability for the enactment of unconstitutional legislation. The high bar for liability established in Mackin ensures that the judiciary does not unduly interfere with the government's ability to carry out its legislative function. ….

[83] Like parliamentary privilege, discussed below, the separation of powers supports the need for some immunity, but not absolute immunity. …. Insofar as an award of damages provides any guidance to the legislature at all, it merely says that "the government and its representatives are required to exercise their powers in good faith and to respect the 'established and indisputable' laws that define the constitutional rights of individuals" (Mackin, at para. 79). While the separation of powers demands a core of legislative autonomy, it also demands legislative accountability through the role of the courts.

[84] Third, courts can respect parliamentary privilege when applying the limited immunity threshold. Parliamentary privilege provides the legislature with the tools to execute its core functions. It operates by "shielding some areas of legislative activity from external review" (Chagnon, at para. 1). …. Parliamentary privilege cannot be subordinated or diminished by other parts of the Constitution.

[85] But Charter damages for the enactment of unconstitutional legislation are not claimed against any individual members involved in the legislative process. The action is against the state. An action for public law damages "is not a private law action in the nature of a tort claim for which the state is vicariously liable but [a distinct] public law action directly against the state for which the state is primarily liable" (Ward, at para. 22).The nature of the remedy requires "the state (or society writ large) to compensate an individual for breaches of the individual's constitutional rights" (Ward, at para. 22). For these reasons, the Attorney General for the Crown or a government agency is the appropriate defendant in Charter damages claims (Roach, Constitutional Remedies, at § 11:13).

[88] This Court has emphasized that parliamentary privilege must not be extended beyond the scope necessary to protect the legislature's core democratic functions (Chagnon, at para. 25; Vaid, at para. 41). In both Vaid and Chagnon, this Court rejected claims of parliamentary privilege, recognizing that the scope of each category of privilege must be carefully scrutinized, in part on the basis that the matters protected by the claimed privilege cannot be externally reviewed, including by courts on Charter grounds. In Vaid, this Court held that the parliamentary privilege to control parliamentary proceedings did not extend so far as to preclude a human rights claim on the basis of discrimination by the chauffeur to the Speaker of the House of Commons. In Chagnon, this Court held that the parliamentary privilege to either manage employees or to exclude strangers from the National Assembly does not prevent judicial review of the dismissal of security guards employed by the National Assembly. Because of its inherent nature, parliamentary privilege means that its existence and scope must be strictly anchored to its rationale, delimited by the purposes it serves. Such an approach helps to reconcile the privilege with the Charter, by ensuring that it is only as broad as is necessary for the proper function of a constitutional democracy.

[89] A limited immunity reconciles the importance of parliamentary privilege with the Charter by ensuring that the privilege is no broader than is justified for a functioning constitutional democracy. In this respect, we agree that "parliamentary privilege, like parliamentary institutions themselves, must operate within — and never trump — the constitutional framework from which those bodies have emerged, and upon which they depend for their lawful authority and powers. In a country respectful of the rule of law, the courts must continue to maintain the supremacy of constitutional norms" (W. J. Newman, "Parliamentary Privilege, the Canadian Constitution and the Courts" (2008), 39 Ottawa L. Rev. 573, at p. 609).

[91] To be clear though, parliamentary privilege may prevent claimants from adducing certain types of evidence relating to the legislative process. In this way, parliamentary privilege may limit a claimant's practical ability to satisfy the threshold in a given case. Indeed, it may well be that a claimant will not be able to lead any evidence. But this possibility does not foreclose the availability of such a cause of action in principle. ….

[92] It does not improperly undermine parliamentary privilege for the courts, engaged in a proper judicial task, to examine evidence and adjudicate an assertion of privilege in the context of a claim for damages. Courts regularly assess such evidence, including Hansard, in determining the background and purpose of legislation under a s. 1 analysis (see, e.g., R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., 1985 CanLII 69 (SCC), [1985] 1 SCR 295; R. v. Morgentaler, 1993 CanLII 74 (SCC), [1993] 3 SCR 463, at p. 484; R. v. Moriarity, 2015 SCC 55, [2015] 3 SCR 485, at para. 31; R. v. Sharma, 2022 SCC 39, at paras. 88-90). Indeed, this Court has in other contexts assessed whether the legislature acted in good faith in enacting a law, or whether the state had actual or constructive knowledge of the unconstitutional effects of a law. Granted, the purpose of the review may be different in a claim for Charter damages. But these examples reveal that the judicial assessment of the nature of legislation and Parliament's purpose or objective in enacting it can be accomplished without violating parliamentary privilege.

[93] Fourth, an absolute immunity does not accommodate the principles recognized in this Court's jurisprudence on constitutional remedies. It leaves little room for the principles that underpin legislative accountability — including the broad and purposive approach to rights and remedial provisions in the Charter, as well as constitutionalism and the rule of law. All these principles militate against absolute immunity. …

[95] ….An absolute immunity would undermine the purpose and text of s. 24(1), which asks courts to look at the specific context of a given violation to determine whether a remedy is appropriate and just. The Charter requires courts to enforce constitutional rights. Enforcement means ensuring that remedies are commensurate with the extent of the violation (Corbiere, at para. 46). In this way, the separation of powers also protects the judiciary's independence to carry out its constitutional duties: "Nothing less [is] required to maintain the normative ordering of the Canadian legal system" (Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 109).

[97] In setting a high bar for immunity, Mackin has stood the test of time. It has been good law for over two decades. It has resulted neither in chilling good governance, nor in a floodgate of claims against the state for damages….

(2) Clarifying the Mackin Threshold

[99] The question remains how to best articulate the qualified immunity threshold. The parties and interveners point to a number of different descriptions within Mackin and ask us to clarify the threshold.

[100] In Mackin, Gonthier J. used several formulations to describe the circumstances in which damages may be an appropriate and just remedy for legislation later declared unconstitutional. …

[103] … We would clarify that this inquiry is better understood as a focus on whether the legislation is "clearly unconstitutional", which directs a judge to look objectively at the legislation itself, particularly the nature and extent of its constitutional invalidity. Underlying this objective assessment is a presumption of the legislature's knowledge of and respect for basic Charter rights.

[104] … we would reject any of the formulations suggested by the interveners that would set the threshold so high that it immunizes the government from liability for unprecedented but egregious constitutional breaches. Thus, the threshold will be met where the legislation was "clearly unconstitutional" in the sense that, at the time of its enactment, it would clearly violate Charter rights . Such egregious or obvious violations of Charter rights are clearly wrong. We would not set the test as high as Jamal J.'s proposed articulation of the clearly unconstitutional threshold.

[105] A finding of clear unconstitutionality will usually imply that the state either knew that the law was clearly unconstitutional, or was reckless or wilfully blind as to its unconstitutionality. As Sharpe and Juriansz JJ.A. helpfully explained in Brazeau, where the law is clearly unconstitutional, the state may have shown a "'clear disregard' for Charter rights" by "proceeding with a course of action in the face of a known risk that the Charter will be violated or by deliberately failing to inquire about the likelihood of a Charter breach when the state knows that there is a good reason to inquire" (para. 87, citing Ward, at para. 43).

[106] … other rare situations may require judges to ask whether there is evidence that the state acted in bad faith or abused its power in enacting the invalid law…

[107] We would not attempt to define bad faith or abuse of power in the law-making process with exactitude without the benefit of a full record and submissions…

[108] When it comes time to assess an allegation of bad faith or abuse of power on the basis of specific facts, other contexts of bad faith and abuse of power may provide guidance (see, e.g., Roncarelli, at p. 141). However, we note that these concepts are "flexible" and their "content will vary from one area of law to another" (Entreprises Sibeca Inc. v. Frelighsburg (Municipality), 2004 SCC 61, [2004] 3 SCR 304, at para. 25). In the context of the state's law-making function, in which Parliament and legislative bodies are entitled to enact any law within their constitutional confines, bad faith and abuse of power may require a higher degree of misconduct than in other contexts. These are legal standards applied by courts, they are not means of evaluating the wisdom or policy of the enactment process or the enacted law.

[109] Our colleague Jamal J. accepts the clearly unconstitutional standard but rejects bad faith and abuse of power. He reasons that while clearly unconstitutional is an objective standard, based on the enactment of the legislation, bad faith and abuse of power inherently implicate conduct that is beyond judicial review. We disagree. In our view, bad faith or abuse of power could be satisfied without violating parliamentary privilege. Moreover, like bad faith and abuse of power, the clearly unconstitutional standard implicates Parliament's conduct in enacting legislation. As we explained, a finding of clear unconstitutionality amounts to a conclusion that in "enacting" the legislation, lawmakers knew the law was unconstitutional, or were reckless or wilfully blind as to its unconstitutionality. Changing the verb "enacting" to the noun "enactment" does not change the nature of the inquiry.

[112] Thus, we would clarify that "clearly wrong" reflects an objective assessment into whether the legislation was clearly unconstitutional at the time it was enacted, and that bad faith and abuse of power remain part of the threshold. To that extent we would restate the Mackin threshold relating to the enactment of legislation later found to be unconstitutional: the good governance defence will prevail unless the law was clearly unconstitutional, in bad faith or an abuse of power. The exacting nature of the threshold means that an applicant's failure to provide detailed particulars will be fatal to their claim at the pleadings stage (Henry (2015), at para. 43). Bald or vague assertions will necessarily fall short.

(3) The Threshold Is Assessed at Step Three of the Ward Framework

[114] In our view, the four-part test in Ward governs all claims for Charter damages. Immunity is not a preliminary question in a claim for Charter damages based on invalid legislation. The state's limited immunity defence fits best as a consideration at the third step of the Ward test. In order for an inquiry into the state's limited immunity to arise under s. 24(1), a claimant must first demonstrate that their rights were violated as a result of an unconstitutional law, and that damages are an otherwise appropriate and just remedy for that violation (Ward, at paras. 23-24). This Court and others have recognized that the Mackin threshold and other immunity considerations are an expression of the principles underlying the good governance concerns considered at the third stage of Ward (Ward, at paras. 39 and 68; Ernst, at para. 42; Brazeau, at paras. 46-48; Roach, Constitutional Remedies, at §§ 11:11 and 11:20; P. W. Hogg, P. J. Monahan and W. K. Wright, Liability of the Crown (4th ed. 2011), at pp. 204-5; Hogg and Wright, at § 40:19). Like good governance concerns in other contexts, the limited immunity threshold functions to ensure damages that may otherwise interfere with effective government are not awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity (Ward, at para. 39; Henry (2015), at paras. 39-41).

[115] Limited immunity ends at the point where it no longer strikes a justifiable constitutional balance. If the state enacts legislation that is subsequently declared invalid and that is clearly unconstitutional, in bad faith or in an abuse of power, good governance concerns can no longer justify shielding the government from liability for violating Charter rights. Damages may instead "promote good governance" by supporting the "foundational principle of good governance" that state action must comply with the Constitution (Ward, at para. 38). If the Mackin threshold is not met, the balance of constitutional principles tilts in favour of state immunity. In such cases, the constitutional imperative that the government be afforded the autonomy to govern effectively will defeat the claim to damages.

VI. Conclusion

[116] ….the state may be liable for Charter damages for enacting invalid legislation only if it is clearly unconstitutional or was in bad faith or an abuse of power.

[The dissenting justices in Power argued for an absolute immunity for preparing and drafting primary legislation due to parliamentary privilege, but agreed that damages might be available for "clearly unconstitutional" enactments. They wanted to remove the "bad faith" and "abuse of power" grounds in Mackin as they infringe on parliamentary privilege].

3.5.4 Damages in Charter class actions

Those noting the low quantum of damages in Ward might be interested in the more recent proliferation of class action Charter claims.

3.5.4.1 Brazeau v. Canada (Attorney General), 2020 ONCA 184 (CanLII), <https://canlii.ca/t/j5s7r>

Appeal of successful Charter class action claim in which the Government of Canada was ordered to pay $20 million in damages to inmates subject to solitary confinement pursuant to "administrative segregation" contrary to section 7 (there were other claims under section 9, which were rejected, and under section 12, which were partly vindicated). The case illustrates the application of the Ward framework, use of evidence from international law, application of the

[1] SHARPE and JURIANSZ JJ.A. (TROTTER J.A. concurring): — …..

[2] In [Brazeau v. Canada (Attorney General), [2019] O.J. No. 1451, 2019 ONSC 1888 (S.C.J.)],the class consists of offenders in federal custody between November 1, 1992 and the present who were placed in administrative segregation; were diagnosed with or suffered from serious mental illness,… and were still alive on July 20, 2013.

[4] In Canadian Civil Liberties Assn. v. Canada (Attorney General) (2019), 144 O.R. (3d) 641, [2019] O.J. No. 1537, 2019 ONCA 243, this court struck down ss. 31-37 of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c. 20 ("CCRA"), which authorized administrative segregation in federal penitentiaries, on the grounds that administrative segregation amounts to solitary confinement and that subjecting an inmate to solitary confinement for longer than 15 days constitutes cruel and unusual punishment [page710] contrary to s. 12 of the Charter. The court stated, at para. 5, that "prolonged administrative segregation [more than 15 days] causes foreseeable and expected harm which may be permanent, and which cannot be detected through monitoring until it has already occurred". The CCRA lacked the safeguards necessary to prevent inmates from remaining in segregation for more than 15 days and, thus, to prevent grossly disproportionate treatment: at paras. 113-115. …[T]he application judge [found] that the legislation violated s. 7 of the Charter because it does not provide for an independent review of the decision to place an inmate in administrative segregation: 2017 ONSC 7491 (S.C.J.).

[5] The Court of Appeal for British Columbia in British Columbia Civil Liberties Assn. v. Canada (Attorney General), [2019] B.C.J. No. 1151, 2019 BCCA 228, 377 C.C.C. (3d) 420, struck down ss. 31-37 of the CCRA on the grounds that they violated s. 7 of the Charter by authorizing prolonged administrative segregation (more than 15 days) that deprives persons of life, liberty or security in a manner that is grossly disproportionate to the law's objectives, and because they did not provide for independent review of administrative segregation decisions.

[6] Both decisions were released after Brazeau was decided.

[7] In June 2019, Bill C-83, An Act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and another Act, 1st Sess., 42nd Parl., 2019 (S.C. 2019, c. 27), received royal assent, and entered into force in November 2019. That legislation replaces ss. 31-37 of the CCRA with a scheme of "Structured Intervention Units" ("SIUs") that are to provide inmates with four hours a day out of their cells and at least two hours of meaningful human contact in place of administrative segregation, as well as a mechanism for independent review.

[8] The appellant, the Attorney General of Canada, received leave to appeal CCLA and BCCLA to the Supreme Court …[2019] S.C.C.A. No. 96; [2019] S.C.C.A. No. 308. …. Canada accepts, however, that unless and until CCLA is reversed by the Supreme Court…CCLA establishes the Charter breaches relied upon by the respondents. [The appeal was discontinued ↗]

[9] The motion judge granted summary judgment …., finding Canada liable in damages for breach of the class members' Charter rights. …..

[10] …In Brazeau, he ordered that the aggregate damages, less approved legal fees and disbursements, be appropriated for "additional mental health or program resources for structural changes to penal institutions": at para. 458. He retained supervisory jurisdiction over distribution of the funds to implement these "structural changes": at para. 459.

[11] The central issue …. is the availability of damages for the breaches of ss. 7 and 12 of the Charter. …[There is also the issue of ….the propriety of the damage award to implement structural changes. …

A. Facts

[12] As CCLA has found that administrative segregation as practiced in Canadian penitentiaries violates s. 12 of the Charter, and as Canada did not appeal the Superior Court's finding of the s. 7 violation, our review of the facts will be brief.

[paras 13-18 review the breach of section 7]

B. The Legislation

[19] In CCLA, at paras. 7-18, this court provided the following helpful outline of ss. 31-37 of the CCRA, which deal with administrative segregation, and other relevant provisions.

[the outline is omitted]

[20] Prior to the introduction of the new "SIU" regime in late 2019, the most significant commissioner's directive in the administrative segregation context was CD-709, which set out guidelines for administrative segregation. Various sections of the Corrections and Conditional Release Regulations also dealt with the segregation regime: see SOR/92-620, ss. 19-23, as they appeared before November 30, 2019. [page717]

C. Issues

(4) Did the motion judge err by awarding Charter damages…?

(5) Did the motion judge err by directing that damages be used to implement "structural changes" (Brazeau)?

D. Analysis

(4) Charter damages

[39] Before us, little issue was taken with the motion judge's findings that Charter rights have been breached in each case. … Nor is issue taken that damages would fulfill one or more of the related functions of compensation, vindication of the right and deterrence of future breaches. The disagreement focuses on the third stage.

[40] At the third stage, the evidentiary burden shifts to the state to attempt to demonstrate that a damage award would be inappropriate or unjust. While the chief justice, at para. 33, says there is no "complete catalogue of countervailing considerations", she discusses two: the availability of alternative remedies and "concerns for good governance". We address each of these in turn.

(a) Alternative remedies

[43] We are not persuaded that the mere existence or possibility of a tort claim precluded the motion judge from awarding Charter damages. Ward does not establish a firm rule that a court should not award Charter damages simply because there is a possible private law claim for the same damages. The concern expressed with respect to alternative remedies is the need to avoid duplication and double recovery. Ward contemplates concurrent claims for private law and Charter damages, provided an award of Charter damages is not "duplicative": at para. 35. If there is another avenue to damages, "a further award of damages under s. 24(1) would serve no function and would not be 'appropriate and just'" (emphasis added): at para. 34. Nor does Ward create a hierarchy of remedies with Charter remedies coming last. A claimant is not required to "show that she has exhausted all other recourses": at para. 35. The evidentiary burden is the reverse. It is for the state "to show that other remedies are available in the particular case that will sufficiently address the breach": at para. 35.

[44] The state can only complain if the award of Charter damages duplicates the available private law damages. Double recovery will not occur in this case. …

[45] The other possible alternative remedy is the declaration granted … that the class members' Charter rights were violated. In our view, the availability of a declaration should not displace damages in these cases. A declaration would fail to satisfy the need for compensation or provide meaningful deterrence of future breaches of the Charter right.

(b) Concerns for good governance

[46] The second countervailing consideration that makes a damage award inappropriate and unjust, which the chief justice discussed in Ward, was "concerns for good governance". ….

[47] In Mackin, [the court held] a limited immunity that protects government "against actions in civil liability based on the fact that a legislative instrument is invalid": Mackin, at para. 78.

[49] The chief justice added, at para. 42 of Ward, that Mackin was not exhaustive and that other situations might arise where "the state might seek to show that s. 24(1) damages would deter state agents from doing what is required for effective governance".

[51] Canada submits that by striking down the administrative segregation provisions of the CCRA in CCLA, this court determined that government has immunity from the class claims advanced here under the Mackin principle. We do not agree. The applicant in CCLA was a public interest litigant with no standing to claim damages under s. 24(1) and the issue of damages was not before the court.

[52] Even if CCLA is not determinative, Canada argues the Mackin principle applies because the source of the breaches of both ss. 7 and 12 of the Charter is the Act.

[53] The respondents seek to distinguish the s. 12 breaches in the cases before us from Mackin by pointing out that in Mackin, it was the statute and nothing else that deprived the plaintiff of the income and status he would otherwise have enjoyed. Here, … the CCRA did not require the correctional authorities to act in a certain way but rather left it to them to determine when to resort to administrative segregation. .. [and]provisions of the CCRA … appear to safeguard against the routine use of prolonged administrative segregation.

[54] …The constitutional infirmity found in CCLA was that "ss. 31-37 of the Act authorize and do not safeguard against" (emphasis added) treatment that offends s. 12 of the Charter: at para. 119. The s. 12 Charter breach was in part a product of the legislation but, at least in part, it was a product of the practices and policies adopted by the correctional authorities.

[55] While that is so, it does not exclude consideration of the good governance concern as a possible limitation on the liability of the state for Charter damages. Mackin, at para. 78 refers not only to harm suffered as a result of the mere enactment of a law that is subsequently declared to be unconstitutional, but also to its application. …. Mackin considerations have been subsumed in the third step of the Ward test for Charter damages.

[56] We accept that at the third stage of the Ward test, the more general good governance concern does come into play …. These are class-wide claims that do not rest upon proof of individual or specific acts of maladministration. They challenge the regulatory scheme and the systemic practices and policies adopted by the correctional authorities in the application of the CCRA. This court held in CCLA, at paras. 116-118, that the constitutional infirmity in ss. 31-37 of the CCRA was not the maladministration of the legislative scheme but rather the systematic way administrative segregation was used by the correctional authorities and the failure of the CCRA to safeguard against such treatment.

[57] The correctional authorities adopted practices and policies under the umbrella of ss. 31-37 of the CCRA … plainly premised on the routine use of long-term administrative segregation as a way of maintaining peace and safety in federal penitentiaries.

[58] This can be inferred from the extraordinary number of placements of inmates in administrative segregation for lengthy periods: almost 22,000 placements from 2011 to 2019, averaging 59 days…from the regulatory requirements for reviews of long-term placements in [page724] administrative segregation lasting longer than 60 days…. Commissioner's directive 709 establishes the National Long-Term Segregation Review Committee to review the case of every inmate who reaches 60 days in administrative segregation and at least every 30 days thereafter: s. 68. These reviews presume the regular use of lengthy, indeterminate periods in administrative segregation.

[59] When a regulatory regime is challenged, the state is entitled to assert that "concerns for good governance" immunity must be considered. The regulatory regime is the sort of policy choice for which, in the words of Ward, "the state might seek to show that s. 24(1) damages would deter state agents from doing what is required for effective governance": at para. 42.

[60] Considering the damages that flow from the breach of s. 7 of the Charter leads to this conclusion more directly. That is because the s. 7 breach for the lack of independent review of administrative segregation decisions, as found by the application judge in CCLA and not appealed to this court, is premised directly on the provisions of the statute. It is not possible to disentangle the damages that flow from the s. 7 breach from those that flow from the s. 12 breach. ….

[61] We are satisfied that the good governance concern arises for the Charter breaches in these cases.

(c) Appropriate fault threshold

[62] This brings us to what appears to be the real issue at the third stage of the inquiry. It is the issue that lies at the heart of this case. Ward states, at para. 39, that where an award of Charter damages would interfere with good governance, "damages should not be awarded unless the state conduct meets a minimum threshold of gravity". The issue is whether the imposition of administrative segregation meets the minimum threshold of gravity.

[63] The question at stage three [page725] of Ward is whether the state is sufficiently at fault to warrant lifting its prima facie good governance immunity.

[64] …The court in Mackin used various terms to describe the fault threshold required to trigger liability. At one point, the court referred to the general public law principle that in such cases, there is no liability unless the enactment of the law was "clearly wrong, in bad faith or an abuse of power": at para. 78. The court also said the government and its representatives will not be liable "if they act in good faith and without abusing their power under prevailing law and only subsequently are their acts found to be unconstitutional": at para. 79. At three other points in the judgment, the court refers to "negligence": at para. 82 ("negligently, in bad faith or by abusing its powers" and "negligence, bad faith or wilful blindness") and at para. 83 ("a negligent or unreasonable attitude on the part of government").

[66] In Ward, the chief justice said that where good governance concerns arise, "a minimum threshold, such as clear disregard for the claimant's Charter rights, may be appropriate": at para. 43. However, "[d]ifferent situations may call for different thresholds" in a manner analogous to private law, ranging from malice for [page726] malicious prosecution to negligence for claims based on inadequate police investigation: at para. 43.

[67] As we are dealing with a regulatory regime premised on administrative segregation of indeterminate duration rather than legislation requiring that result, we consider it appropriate to apply the minimum threshold of fault described in Ward, namely, "a clear disregard for the claimant's Charter rights": at para. 43.

[68] Canada submits that fault cannot be found …because the legal characterization of administrative segregation as a form of solitary confinement and cruel and unusual punish-ment has only recently evolved. While the use of solitary confinement as a means of maintaining security in prisons has been debated for some time, Canada argues that it could not have known that administrative segregation violates s. 12 of the Charter until this court's decision in CCLA.

[71] As we will explain, a ban on the use of solitary confinement for inmates with mental illness, some form of cap for all inmates, and the need for independent review of segregation decisions have been urged since the 1990s. The move to the 15-day cap as an international standard was well underway by 2011 and ultimately codified in the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners (the Nelson Mandela Rules)…

[72] Another reason for rejecting Canada's plea that it should be allowed to take a gradual approach is the gravity of the Charter breach and harm caused to the class members. As this court recognized in CCLA, at para. 58, citing Ogiamien v. Ontario (Ministry of Community Safety and Correctional Services), [2017] O.J. No. 4401, 2017 ONCA 667, …at para. 9, there is a high threshold for establishing that punishment or treatment is cruel and unusual. It must be "so excessive as to outrage standards of decency"; "grossly disproportionate for the offender, such that Canadians would find the punishment abhorrent or intolerable": CCLA, at para. 58. In the appeals presently before this court, the Charter breach has caused severe harm to very vulnerable people and the state's conduct has been condemned as being cruel, excessive, abhorrent and intolerable. The state should be expected to be particularly vigilant to avoid inflicting such harm.

[74] … The record in this case establishes that since the 19th century, there has been a consistent stream of medical opinion that incarceration in solitary confinement causes and exacerbates mental illness. …. Stuart Grassian, a psychiatrist qualified as an expert in both appeals, stated … summarizing a journal article …. "the fact that solitary confinement has a particular, severe psychiatric toxicity was clearly known by well before the end of the nineteenth century, and became a source of international alarm in the 1950's". In CCLA, this court accepted the application judge's finding in that case that "there is no serious question the practice of keeping an inmate in administrative segregation for a prolonged period is harmful and offside responsible medical opinion": at para. 98.

[75] In international law, for at least 30 years, there has been a growing recognition of the need to eliminate use of solitary confinement for prisoners with mental illness and strictly limit its use for all prisoners. Principle 7 of the Basic Principles for the Treatment [page728] of Prisoners, …, states that efforts to abolish solitary confinement as a punishment, or to restrict its use, should be undertaken and encouraged.

[76]…In 1994, the Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment of the Council of Europe stated that "[s]olitary confinement can, in certain circumstances, amount to inhuman and degrading treatment; in any event, all forms of solitary confinement should be as short as possible". …

[77] In 2008, the United Nations Special Rapporteur of the Human Rights Council on Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment informed the General Assembly that "the prolonged isolation of detainees may amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment and, in certain instances, may amount to torture. . . . In the opinion of the Special Rapporteur, the use of solitary confinement should be kept to a minimum, used in very exceptional cases, for as short a time as possible, and only as a last resort": UNGAOR, 63rd Sess., UN Doc. A/63/175, (2008), at paras. 77 and 83.

[78] In 2011, the UN Special Rapporteur …concluded that at 15 days, solitary confinement becomes "prolonged solitary confinement" because the medical literature [page729] establishes that "some of the harmful psychological effects of isolation can become irreversible": at para. 26. He concluded that any imposition of solitary confinement beyond 15 days constitutes torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, in contravention of various norms codified in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights…

[79] These international developments were certainly brought home to Canada's correctional authorities. The Office of the Correctional Investigator is created by Part III of the CCRA. The Correctional Investigator's mandate is to serve as an independent ombudsman for federally sentenced offenders: CCRA, s. 167(1). The Correctional Investigator's 2011-12 Annual Report, at p. 13, stated:

> In August 2011, the UN Special Rapporteur of the Human Rights Council on Torture and other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or Punishment reported on the effects of or indefinite solitary confinement. Among other findings and recommendations, Juan E. Méndez noted:
> > . . . . .Prolonged solitary confinement in excess of 15 days should be subject to an absolute prohibition, and indefinite solitary confinement should be abolished.. . . .
> > I once more recommend, in keeping with Canada's domestic and international human rights commitments, laws and norms, an absolute prohibition on the practice of placing mentally ill offenders and those at risk of suicide or serious self-injury in prolonged segregation.

[80] In 2012, the UN Committee against Torture expressed concern about Canada's "use of solitary confinement, in the forms of disciplinary and administrative segregation, often extensively prolonged, even for persons with mental illness": Report of the Committee against Torture, UNGAOR, 67th Sess., Supp. No. 44, UN Doc. A/67/44 (2012), at p. 120. The report recommended that Canada … "[a]bolish the use of solitary confinement for persons with serious or acute mental illness": at pp. 120-21.

[81] In 2013, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights stated that, as the prohibition on torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment is universal, all member states, including Canada, must adopt concrete measures to eliminate prolonged or indefinite isolation in all circumstances. The [page730] Commission also affirmed that solitary confinement must never be applied to persons with mental disabilities.

[82] Finally, in 2015, the United Nations General Assembly unanimously adopted the Mandela Rules, imposing a 15-day limit on incarceration in solitary confinement for all prisoners and a complete prohibition on solitary confinement for mentally ill prisoners. Canada not only voted for the Mandela Rules but played a role in their development: …. No publicly available minutes of the Expert Group's meetings suggest that Canada took any exception to the suggested limits on solitary confinement.

[83] The attack on solitary confinement was not restricted to the international level. In 1996, Louise Arbour's Commission of Inquiry into Certain Events at the Prison for Women in Kingston recommended a 30-day consecutive and a 60-day non-consecutive annual limit on solitary confinement: at p. 105. ….

[84] In 2013, the Coroner's Inquest Touching the Death of Ashley Smith recommended an absolute prohibition on the practice of placing female inmates in conditions of long-term segregation, clinical seclusion, isolation, or observation. The recommendation defined long-term as any period in excess of 15 days.

[86] In our view, the record establishes that from the late 2000s it was widely recognized and accepted that placing inmates suffering from mental illness into solitary confinement caused them serious harm and therefore should be avoided. It was also widely recognized from 2011 that the prolonged solitary confinement of any inmate caused serious harm and should be avoided.

[87] As we have stated, in this case the minimum fault threshold required to overcome the claim of good governance immunity is "clear disregard" for Charter rights. Drawing on criminal law principles, we view the Ward fault standard of "clear disregard" for Charter rights as analogous to recklessness or wilful blindness. …A "clear disregard" for Charter rights connotes either proceeding with a course of action in the face of a known risk that the Charter will be violated or by deliberately failing to inquire about the likelihood of a Charter breach when the state knows that there is a good reason to inquire.

[88] In assessing Canada's fault in failing to respect the Charter rights of inmates to be free from cruel and unusual punishment, it is therefore important to consider the failure of Canada's correctional authorities to respond positively to pleas for limiting the use of solitary confinement, which has been frequently pointed out and criticized.

[89] While a 15-day upper limit only gradually emerged as a firm standard in or around 2011, there was an earlier recognition that prolonged solitary confinement was harmful and there were repeated recommendations that it be eliminated or only used for as short a time as possible. Canada refused to accept any limit or cap. By 2011, the UN Special Rapporteur recommended the 15-day cap that was finally adopted by the General Assembly in 2015 as part of the Mandela Rules. As we have noted, Canada participated in the adoption of the Mandela Rules. Similarly, Canada chose to ignore repeated recommendations for some form of independent review of administrative segregation. Canada also continued to place inmates suffering from mental illness in administrative segregation despite repeated warnings of the harm that this practice caused.

[90] The importance of independent review has been internally and externally flagged for the CSC for nearly a quarter of a century: the Arbour Commission's 1996 report, a 1997 report of [page732] a CSC task force on segregation, and subsequent reports of the Correctional Investigator in 2002-2003, 2005-2006, 2014-2015, 2016-2017 have all either recommended the adoption of in-dependent review mechanisms or identified lack of independent review as an area of serious concern. …

[91] The motion judge concluded his detailed review of Canada's refusal to make any changes to administrative segregations in Brazeau as follows, at paras. 130-131:

> For decades, the Federal Government's regime for administrative segregation has been criticized for the absence of a robust and timely adjudicative review process for placements in administrative segregation infused with the rule of law. The Arbour Commission of Inquiry and the Task Force on Administrative Segregation recommended that a placement in administrative segregation be reviewed within three days to determine whether it should be continued.

For decades, the Federal Government's regime for administrative segregation has been criticized for the failure to adequately monitor the segregated inmate's current mental health status, with a special emphasis on the evaluation of the risk for self-harm.

[92] Those findings are well supported by the record. For over 30 years, Canada's correctional authorities have steadfastly refused to heed warnings about the harm caused by administrative segregation and the need for independent review.

[100] In our view, Canada's failure to alter its administrative segregation policies in the face of this mounting and concerted criticism from the medical profession, a Royal Commission, a coroner's inquest, the Correctional Investigator, and various international agencies meets the standard of a "clear disregard for Charter rights".

[101] We are satisfied that this "clear disregard" dates back to at least the start dates for these claims: July 20, 2009 for inmates suffering from mental illness, in Brazeau... Canada was repeatedly told of the harm administrative segregation caused, of the need to impose a cap on the length of time inmates were subjected to the practice, of the need not to use administrative segregation for inmates suffering from mental illness, and of the need for proper independent review of administrative segregation decisions. Canada was repeatedly told that its policies and practices caused serious harm to inmates and amounted to cruel and unusual treatment. Canada had to know that there was a serious risk that its administrative segregation practices and policies failed to meet the standards of the Charter under both ss. 7 and 12. In our view, the respondents have established the "clear disregard" fault threshold applies in these cases. Thus, Canada is not insulated from liability for Charter damages by countervailing good governance considerations.

(5) Quantum of damages and damages for "structural changes"

[105] In Brazeau, the motion judge … awarded $20 million as a base level of damages. He found that entire amount to be appropriate for vindication and deterrence and left the issue of compensation for the individual issues stage of the proceedings. He then took the unusual course, at paras. 458-459, of ordering that the $20 million, after deduction for legal fees and disbursements, be used by Canada for "additional mental health or program resources for structural changes to penal institutions as the court on further motion may direct".

[106] The motion judge erred in law in making this order.

[107] First, he did so on his own motion and without submissions from the parties as to the appropriateness of such an order. The rights of both the class members and Canada were affected by the order and they should have been given the opportunity to argue the point. The order was, to say the least, unusual, and by making it without the benefit of submissions from the parties, the motion judge denied them procedural fairness. [page736]

[110] …, the order made by the motion judge ran afoul of the principle set out in Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 56, that Charter remedies "must employ means that are legitimate within the framework of our constitutional democracy"; "respect the relationships with and separation of functions among the legislature, the executive and the judiciary"; and that courts must not "depart unduly or unnecessarily from their role of adjudicating disputes and granting remedies that address the matter of those disputes".

[111] As Doucet-Boudreau itself shows, there is room in some situations for innovative remedies that include ongoing, post-judgment involvement by the court to ensure compliance with the Charter. At issue in that case was the affirmative promise of s. 23 of the Charter for minority language education in the urgent context of cultural erosion of minority rights through assimilation: at paras. 38-40. The Supreme Court upheld the propriety of a trial judge maintaining jurisdiction to receive reports to monitor the government's progress in establishing the required facilities. ….

[112] But the order at issue in the Brazeau appeal is not a "reporting order" to monitor state compliance with a defined affirmative right; the order made in this case provides for a much more active form of judicial involvement. The motion judge assumed the power to direct the state to divert a damage award for harm suffered and use the damages as he saw fit to provide such "additional mental health or program resources for structural [page737] changes to penal institutions": at paras. 456-459. That order was not fair to either the class or Canada and it amounted to an unjustifiable assumption of judicial control over a complex public institution. It was not an "appropriate and just remedy" and therefore it must be set aside.

[113] We were invited to maintain the aggregate damage award of $20 million and order it distributed to the class members. Given the serious error of law made by the motion judge, we set aside his award of damages and remit the issue of damages to be determined on proper principles.

4 Constitutional Remedies in other Jurisdictions

Constitutional remedies engage the question of the power of courts over legislatures. They often must analyse the proper interpretation of the remedial provisions of a constitution. Looking to how courts in other constitutional democracies have offered constitutional remedies can illuminate the contextual nature of constitutional jurisprudence and highlight interpretive choices made in the Canadian context. The decision of the Constitutional Court of South Africa, below, is but one of many cases which can expand our thinking about constitutional remedies beyond the national context of Canada.

4.1 South Africa: Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (No 2) (CCT8/02) [2002] ZACC 15; 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC); 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) (5 July 2002)

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

THE COURT:

Introduction

[1] The HIV/AIDS[114] pandemic in South Africa has been described as "an incomprehensible calamity" and "the most important challenge facing South Africa since the birth of our new democracy" and government's fight against "this scourge" as "a top priority". It "has claimed millions of lives, inflicting pain and grief, causing fear and uncertainty, and threatening the economy". These are not the words of alarmists but are taken from a Department of Health publication in 2000 and a ministerial foreword to an earlier departmental publication.[115]
[2] This appeal is directed at reversing orders made in a high court against government because of perceived shortcomings in its response to an aspect of the HIV/AIDS challenge. The court found that government had not reasonably addressed the need to reduce the risk of HIV-positive mothers transmitting the disease to their babies at birth. More specifically the finding was that government had acted unreasonably in (a) refusing to make an antiretroviral drug called nevirapine[3] available in the public health sector where the attending doctor considered it medically indicated and (b) not setting out a timeframe for a national programme to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

[3] The case started as an application in the High Court in Pretoria on 21 August 2001. The applicants were a number of associations and members of civil society concerned with the treatment of people with HIV/AIDS and with the prevention of new infections. In this judgment they are referred to collectively as "the applicants". The principal actor among them was the Treatment Action Campaign (TAC). The respondents were the national Minister of Health and the respective members of the executive councils (MECs) responsible for health in all provinces save the Western Cape.[116] They are referred to collectively as "the government" or "government".

[4] Government, as part of a formidable array of responses to the pandemic, devised a programme to deal with mother-to-child transmission of HIV at birth and identified nevirapine as its drug of choice for this purpose.[117] The programme imposes restrictions on the availability of nevirapine in the public health sector. This is where the first of two main issues in the case arose. The applicants contended that these restrictions are unreasonable when measured against the Constitution, which commands the state and all its organs to give effect to the rights guaranteed by the Bill of Rights. This duty is put thus by sections 7(2) and 8(1) of the Constitution respectively:

"7(2) The state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.

. . . .

8(1) The Bill of Rights applies to all law, and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state."

At issue here is the right given to everyone to have access to public health care services and the right of children to be afforded special protection. These rights are expressed in the following terms in the Bill of Rights:

"27(1) Everyone has the right to have access to –

(a) health care services, including reproductive health care;

. . . .

(2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights.

. . . .

28(1) Every child has the right –

. . . .

(c) to basic nutrition, shelter, basic health care services and social services".

[5] The second main issue also arises out of the provisions of sections 27 and 28 of the Constitution. It is whether government is constitutionally obliged and had to be ordered forthwith to plan and implement an effective, comprehensive and progressive programme for the prevention of mother-to-child transmission of HIV throughout the country. …

[8] On 14 December 2001 the High Court made an order…[requiring the government to plan and implement an effective, comprehensive and progressive programme for the prevention of mother-to-child transmission of HIV]…

[9] Because of the importance and urgency of the matter, an early date was allocated for the hearing of government's appeal against the order of the High Court. ….

Factual background
[10] The two principal issues had been in contention between the applicants and government for some considerable time prior to the launching of the application in the High Court. …

[12] Nevirapine had been registered in 1998 by the Medicines Control Council, a specialist body created by the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act 101 of 1965 to determine the safety of drugs before their being made available in South Africa. In terms of this Act registration of a drug by definition entails a positive finding as to its quality, safety and efficacy. In January 2001 the World Health Organization recommended the administration of the drug to mother and infant at the time of birth in order to combat HIV …

[14] ….The Minister….quite clearly intimated that neither undertaking was or would be given. The decision was to confine the provision of nevirapine in the public sector to the research sites and their outlets.

[15] It can be accepted that an important reason for this decision was that government wanted to develop and monitor its human and material resources nationwide for the delivery of a comprehensive package of testing and counselling, dispensing of nevirapine and follow-up services to pregnant women attending at public health institutions. ….These research and training sites could provide vital information on which in time the very best possible prevention programme for mother-to-child transmission could be developed.

[17] The crux of the problem, however, lies elsewhere: what is to happen to those mothers and their babies who cannot afford access to private health care and do not have access to the research and training sites? ….What is plain … is that for a protracted period nevirapine would not be supplied at any public health institution other than one designated as part of a research site.

The issues

[22] In their argument counsel for the government raised issues pertaining to the separation of powers. This may be relevant in two respects – (i) in the deference that courts should show to decisions taken by the executive concerning the formulation of its policies; and (ii) in the order to be made where a court finds that the executive has failed to comply with its constitutional obligations. These considerations are relevant to the manner in which a court should exercise the powers vested in it under the Constitution. ….

[36] The state is obliged to take reasonable measures progressively to eliminate or reduce the large areas of severe deprivation that afflict our society. The courts will guarantee that the democratic processes are protected so as to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness, as the Constitution requires in section 1. As the Bill of Rights indicates, their function in respect of socio-economic rights is directed towards ensuring that legislative and other measures taken by the state are reasonable. As this Court said in Grootboom, "[i]t is necessary to recognise that a wide range of possible measures could be adopted by the State to meet its obligations". [118]

[37] …. in dealing with such matters the courts are not institutionally equipped to make the wide-ranging factual and political enquiries necessary for determining what the minimum-core standards called for by the first and second amici should be, nor for deciding how public revenues should most effectively be spent. There are many pressing demands on the public purse. As was said in Soobramoney:

> "The State has to manage its limited resources in order to address all these claims. There will be times when this requires it to adopt a holistic approach to the larger needs of society rather than to focus on the specific needs of particular individuals within society."[119]

[38] Courts are ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where court orders could have multiple social and economic consequences for the community. The Constitution contemplates rather a restrained and focused role for the courts, namely, to require the state to take measures to meet its constitutional obligations and to subject the reasonableness of these measures to evaluation. Such determinations of reasonableness may in fact have budgetary implications, but are not in themselves directed at rearranging budgets. In this way the judicial, legislative and executive functions achieve appropriate constitutional balance.

[The Constitutional Court concluded that it was not constitutionally reasonable to restrict the use of nevirapine to the research and training sites.]

[94] We are … conscious of the daunting problems confronting government as a result of the pandemic. And besides the pandemic, the state faces huge demands in relation to access to education, land, housing, health care, food, water and social security. These are the socio-economic rights entrenched in the Constitution, and the state is obliged to take reasonable legislative and other measures within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of each of them. In the light of our history this is an extraordinarily difficult task. Nonetheless it is an obligation imposed on the state by the Constitution.

[95] The rigidity of government's approach when these proceedings commenced affected its policy as a whole. If, as we have held, it was not reasonable to restrict the use of nevirapine to the research and training sites, the policy as a whole will have to be reviewed. Hospitals and clinics that have testing and counselling facilities should be able to prescribe nevirapine where that is medically indicated. The training of counsellors ought now to include training for counselling on the use of nevirapine. As previously indicated, this is not a complex task and it should not be difficult to equip existing counsellors with the necessary additional knowledge. In addition, government will need to take reasonable measures to extend the testing and counselling facilities to hospitals and clinics throughout the public health sector beyond the test sites to facilitate and expedite the use of nevirapine for the purpose of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

The powers of the courts

[96] Counsel for the government contended that even if this Court should find that government policies fall short of what the Constitution requires, the only competent order that a court can make is to issue a declaration of rights to that effect. That leaves government free to pay heed to the declaration made and to adapt its policies in so far as this may be necessary to bring them into conformity with the court's judgment. This, so the argument went, is what the doctrine of separation of powers demands.

[97] In developing this argument counsel contended that under the separation of powers the making of policy is the prerogative of the executive and not the courts, and that courts cannot make orders that have the effect of requiring the executive to pursue a particular policy.

[99] The primary duty of courts is to the Constitution and the law, "which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice". [120] The Constitution requires the state to "respect, protect, promote, and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights". [121] Where state policy is challenged as inconsistent with the Constitution, courts have to consider whether in formulating and implementing such policy the state has given effect to its constitutional obligations. If it should hold in any given case that the state has failed to do so, it is obliged by the Constitution to say so. In so far as that constitutes an intrusion into the domain of the executive, that is an intrusion mandated by the Constitution itself. There is also no merit in the argument advanced on behalf of government that a distinction should be drawn between declaratory and mandatory orders against government. Even simple declaratory orders against government or organs of state can affect their policy and may well have budgetary implications. Government is constitutionally bound to give effect to such orders whether or not they affect its policy and has to find the resources to do so. Thus, in the Mpumalanga case, [122] this Court set aside a provincial government's policy decision to terminate the payment of subsidies to certain schools and ordered that payments should continue for several months. Also, in the case of August [123] the Court, in order to afford prisoners the right to vote, directed the Electoral Commission to alter its election policy, planning and regulations, with manifest cost implications.

[100] The rights that the state is obliged to "respect, protect, promote and fulfil" include the socio-economic rights in the Constitution…

[101] A dispute concerning socio-economic rights is thus likely to require a court to evaluate state policy and to give judgment on whether or not it is consistent with the Constitution. If it finds that policy is inconsistent with the Constitution it is obliged in terms of section 172(1)(a) to make a declaration to that effect. But that is not all. Section 38 of the Constitution contemplates that where it is established that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed a court will grant "appropriate relief". It has wide powers to do so and in addition to the declaration that it is obliged to make in terms of section 172(1)(a) a court may also "make any order that is just and equitable".[124]

[102] In Fose v Minister of Safety and Security[125] this Court held that

> "[a]ppropriate relief will in essence be relief that is required to protect and enforce the Constitution. Depending on the circumstances of each particular case the relief may be a declaration of rights, an interdict, a mandamus or such other relief as may be required to ensure that the rights enshrined in the Constitution are protected and enforced. If it is necessary to do so, the courts may even have to fashion new remedies to secure the protection and enforcement of these all-important rights."[126]

The judgment (per Ackermann J) went on to state:

> "I have no doubt that this Court has a particular duty to ensure that, within the bounds of the Constitution, effective relief be granted for the infringement of any of the rights entrenched in it. In our context an appropriate remedy must mean an effective remedy, for without effective remedies for breach, the values underlying and the right entrenched in the Constitution cannot properly be upheld or enhanced. Particularly in a country where so few have the means to enforce their rights through the courts, it is essential that on those occasions when the legal process does establish that an infringement of an entrenched right has occurred, it be effectively vindicated. The courts have a particular responsibility in this regard and are obliged to 'forge new tools' and shape innovative remedies, if needs be, to achieve this goal."[127]

[104] The power to grant mandatory relief includes the power where it is appropriate to exercise some form of supervisory jurisdiction to ensure that the order is implemented…

[105] This Court has said on other occasions that it is also within the power of courts to make a mandatory order against an organ of state[128] and has done so itself. For instance, in the Dawood case, a mandamus was issued directing the Director-General of Home Affairs and immigration officials to exercise the discretion conferred upon them in a manner that took account of the constitutional rights involved.[129] In the August case a mandatory order, coupled with an injunction to submit a detailed plan for public scrutiny, was issued by this Court against an organ of state – the Electoral Commission.[130]

[106] We thus reject the argument that the only power that this Court has in the present case is to issue a declaratory order. Where a breach of any right has taken place, including a socio-economic right, a court is under a duty to ensure that effective relief is granted. The nature of the right infringed and the nature of the infringement will provide guidance as to the appropriate relief in a particular case.[131] Where necessary this may include both the issuing of a mandamus and the exercise of supervisory jurisdiction.

[107] An examination of the jurisprudence of foreign jurisdictions on the question of remedies shows that courts in other countries also accept that it may be appropriate, depending on the circumstances of the particular case, to issue injunctive relief against the state. In the United States, for example, frequent use has been made of the structural injunction – a form of supervisory jurisdiction exercised by the courts over a government agency or institution. Most famously, the structural injunction was used in the case of Brown v Board of Education[132] where the US Supreme Court held that lower courts would need to retain jurisdiction of Brown and similar cases. These lower courts would have the power to determine how much time was necessary for the school boards to achieve full compliance with the Court's decision and would also be able to consider the adequacy of any plan proposed by the school boards "to effectuate a transition to a racially nondiscriminatory school system".[133]

[108] Even a cursory perusal of the relevant Indian case law demonstrates a willingness on the part of the Indian courts to grant far-reaching remedial orders. Most striking in this regard is the decision in M.C. Mehta v State of Tamil Nadu and Others[134] where the Supreme Court granted a wide-ranging order concerning child labour that included highly detailed mandatory and structural injunctions.

[109] Although decisions of the German Federal Constitutional Court are mostly in the form of declaratory orders, the Court also has the power to prescribe for a temporary period which steps have to be taken in order to create a situation in conformity with the Basic Law.[135] The most far-reaching execution order was probably that made by the Court in the Second Abortion Case,[136] declaring several provisions of the Criminal Code unconstitutional and void and replacing them by a detailed interim law to remain in place until new legislation came into force.

[110] In Canada, it appears that both the supreme and the lower courts have the power to issue mandatory orders against organs of state.[137] Canadian courts have, however, tended to be relatively cautious in this regard. For example, in Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General),[138] the Supreme Court of Canada considered a declaration of unconstitutionality preferable to "some kind of injunctive relief" on the basis that "there are myriad options available to the government that may rectify the unconstitutionality of the current system". The Canadian courts have also tended to be wary of using the structural injunction.[139]

[111] In the United Kingdom, although injunctive relief may be granted against officers of the Crown, the House of Lords has held that this should only be done in the "most limited circumstances. In the majority of situations so far as final relief is concerned, a declaration will continue to be the appropriate remedy on an application for judicial review involving officers of the Crown. As has been the position in the past, the Crown can be relied upon to co-operate fully with such declarations."[140]

[112] What this brief survey makes clear is that in none of the jurisdictions surveyed is there any suggestion that the granting of injunctive relief breaches the separation of powers. The various courts adopt different attitudes to when such remedies should be granted, but all accept that within the separation of powers they have the power to make use of such remedies – particularly when the state's obligations are not performed diligently and without delay.

[113] South African courts have a wide range of powers at their disposal to ensure that the Constitution is upheld. These include mandatory and structural interdicts. How they should exercise those powers depends on the circumstances of each particular case. Here due regard must be paid to the roles of the legislature and the executive in a democracy. What must be made clear, however, is that when it is appropriate to do so, courts may – and if need be must – use their wide powers to make orders that affect policy as well as legislation.

[114] A factor that needs to be kept in mind is that policy is and should be flexible. …Court orders concerning policy choices made by the executive should therefore not be formulated in ways that preclude the executive from making such legitimate choices.

[The government had already, in the period since the case had started, expanded the availability of nevirapine and increased the budget allocation for HIV prevention and treatment.]

[121] We have earlier referred to section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution, which requires a court deciding a constitutional matter to "declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency". A declaration to that effect must therefore be made in this matter. The declaration must be in a form which identifies the constitutional infringement. Whether remedial action must also be specified is a separate question involving a different enquiry.

Relief

[124] What remains to be considered is whether it is appropriate in the circumstances of the present case to grant further relief. We have come to the conclusion that it is appropriate to do so, though in terms differing from the orders made by the High Court.

[125] …. We have held that its policy fails to meet constitutional standards because it excludes those who could reasonably be included where such treatment is medically indicated to combat mother-to-child transmission of HIV. That does not mean that everyone can immediately claim access to such treatment, although the ideal… is to achieve that goal. Every effort must, however, be made to do so as soon as reasonably possible. The increases in the budget to which we have referred will facilitate this.

[126] …. all sectors of the community, in particular civil society, should co-operate in the steps taken to achieve this goal. In our view that will be facilitated by spelling out the steps necessary to comply with the Constitution.

[127] We will do this on the basis of the policy that government has adopted as the best means of combating mother-to-child transmission of HIV, which is to make use of nevirapine for this purpose. Government must retain the right to adapt the policy, consistent with its constitutional obligations, should it consider it appropriate to do so. The order that we make has regard to this.

[129] The order made by the High Court included a structural interdict requiring the appellants to revise their policy and to submit the revised policy to the court to enable it to satisfy itself that the policy was consistent with the Constitution…. We do not consider, however, that orders should be made in those terms unless this is necessary. The government has always respected and executed orders of this Court. There is no reason to believe that it will not do so in the present case.

[132] Government policy is now evolving. …What now remains is for the other provinces to follow suit. The order that we make will facilitate this.

[133] … Having regard to the nature of the problem, the steps that have to be taken to comply with the order that we make should be taken without delay.

Orders

[135] We accordingly make the following orders:

1. The orders made by the High Court are set aside and the following orders are substituted.

2. It is declared that:

a) Sections 27(1) and (2) of the Constitution require the government to devise and implement within its available resources a comprehensive and co-ordinated programme to realise progressively the rights of pregnant women and their newborn children to have access to health services to combat mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

b) The programme to be realised progressively within available resources must include reasonable measures for counselling and testing pregnant women for HIV, counselling HIV-positive pregnant women on the options open to them to reduce the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV, and making appropriate treatment available to them for such purposes.

c) The policy for reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV as formulated and implemented by government fell short of compliance with the requirements in subparagraphs (a) and (b) in that:

i) Doctors at public hospitals and clinics other than the research and training sites were not enabled to prescribe nevirapine to reduce the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV even where it was medically indicated and adequate facilities existed for the testing and counselling of the pregnant women concerned.

ii) The policy failed to make provision for counsellors at hospitals and clinics other than at research and training sites to be trained in counselling for the use of nevirapine as a means of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

3. Government is ordered without delay to:

a) Remove the restrictions that prevent nevirapine from being made available for the purpose of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV at public hospitals and clinics that are not research and training sites.

b) Permit and facilitate the use of nevirapine for the purpose of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV and to make it available for this purpose at hospitals and clinics when in the judgment of the attending medical practitioner acting in consultation with the medical superintendent of the facility concerned this is medically indicated, which shall if necessary include that the mother concerned has been appropriately tested and counselled.

c) Make provision if necessary for counsellors based at public hospitals and clinics other than the research and training sites to be trained for the counselling necessary for the use of nevirapine to reduce the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

d) Take reasonable measures to extend the testing and counselling facilities at hospitals and clinics throughout the public health sector to facilitate and expedite the use of nevirapine for the purpose of reducing the risk of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

4. The orders made in paragraph 3 do not preclude government from adapting its policy in a manner consistent with the Constitution if equally appropriate or better methods become available to it for the prevention of mother-to-child transmission of HIV.

5. The government must pay the applicants' costs, including the costs of two counsel.

6. The application by government to adduce further evidence is refused.

> In addressing questions about the present state and likely future of the law of constitutional remedies, this Article relies on two assumptions. First, we cannot understand what substantive constitutional rights are, or what it means to have a substantive right, without attention to the extent — if any — of available and possibly constitutionally guaranteed remedies. Second, we cannot understand the current law defining the relationship between substantive constitutional rights and rights of access to courts to vindicate them without understanding the historical and constitutional background from which the current law developed and, in increasingly important respects, from which the current law now deviates.
> …[T]his Article advances a single, central argument that combines empirical and normative aspects: shaping the right-remedy relationship is a crucial lawmaking function that has historically been shared between Congress and the courts, especially the Supreme Court. Contrary to some of the Court’s critics, the relationship between rights and remedies is not conceptually determinate.[49] One cannot deduce entitlements to particular remedies directly from the concept of a right without reliance on other premises and consideration of multiple contingent factors.[50] At the same time, ….nothing in the Constitution’s history or tradition mandates that the Supreme Court must leave the provision of remedies that are necessary to the effective enforcement of substantive rights entirely to Congress. Nor is Congress’s authority to grant or withhold remedies for constitutional violations, sometimes including damages and injunctions, wholly unconstrained. If we have entered an era in which a majority of the Justices believe otherwise, the situation is, in my view, a deeply regrettable one, which will cheapen what it means to have a constitutional right.[52] Rights that exist in name will increasingly fall vulnerable to flouting in the absence of political commitments to enforcing them. We also risk erosion of the rule-of-law ideal that the government and its officials should be accountable for their violations of law in actions before the courts.53 Although some of my concerns and theses in this Article are familiar, my aim is to achieve a relatively panoptic perspective on historical trends and normative themes in the law of constitutional remedies, to bring criticisms of the Supreme Court’s restrictions of available remedies up to date, and to forecast likely future developments — a number of which I find alarming.” pp 1307-1308

4.3 Other cases to consider

4.3.1 Swann v. Charlotte -Mecklenburg Board of Education, 402 U.S. 1 (1971),

This case illustrates complex structural injunctions (in this case, about busing plans intended to desegregate schools) in the aftermath of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) in which the Supreme Court of the United States ended de jure segregation on the basis of race in U.S. public schools.
